3 And when I heard this thing, I rent my garment and my mantle, and plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard, and sat down astonished.

4 Then were assembled unto me every one that trembled at the words of the God of Israel, because of the transgression of those that had been carried away; and I sat astonished until the evening sacrifice.

5 ¶ At the evening sacrifice I arose up from my heaviness; and having rent my garment and my mantle, I fell upon my knees, and spread out my hands unto the LORD my God.

only of very great grief and sorrow, but expressed his sense of the divine displeasure. For the Jews rent their clothes when they apprehended God to be highly offended (see Grotius upon Matt. xxvi. 65). The Talmudists say, the high-priest rent his garments otherwise than other men, not above from the shoulders to the bottom, but below at his feet, and the skirts of his garments, upward.

And plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard,] This was still a higher sign of exceeding great grief; for in ordinary sorrow they only neglected their hair, and let it hang down scattered in a careless manner; but this was used in bitter lamentations, even among the heathens. So Bochart observes out of many authors, particularly Homer, in several places. For example, speaking of Ulysses and his companions bewailing the death of Elpenor, he saith, Odyss. x.

Ἐζόμενοι δ' ἐπ' αὐτὰ θάψον, τίλλοντο τε χεῖρας.

"They sitting down there howled and plucked off their hairs" (see Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 35). To shave the head or the beard was another thing; which the law forbade the Jews in their mourning for the dead, because it was a custom of their idolatrous neighbours, whose manners he would not have them imitate.

And sat down astonished,] With amazement that they should be so ungrateful to God, who had delivered them from captivity, and with an apprehension of their danger, there being so open a breach of the divine law, which had formerly proved their ruin.

Ver. 4. The words of the God of Israel,] Which it is likely he read to them, and told them the importance of them.

Because of the transgression of those that had been carried away;] Into Babylon, but now were returned to their own land, little or nothing amended, either by their banishment or their restoration. He speaks not of those who were lately come back with him, but of those who came back with Zerubbabel, and of their children.

I sat astonished until the evening sacrifice,] When the people used to meet together to worship God.

Ver. 5. At the evening sacrifice I arose up from my heaviness;] Wherein he had sat ever since he heard of their foul transgression.

Having rent my garment and my mantle,] He mentions that again, because he still continued and appeared in a mournful condition.

I fell upon my knees,] But put himself now into the posture of an humble supplicant to the divine majesty.

6 And said, O my God, I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God: for our iniquities are increased over our head, and our trespass is grown up unto the heavens.

7 Since the days of our fathers have we been in a great trespass unto this day; and for our iniquities have we, our kings, and our priests, been delivered into the hands of the kings of the lands, to the sword, to captivity, and to a spoil, and to confusion of face, as it is this day.

8 And now for a little space grace hath been shewed from the LORD our God, to leave us a remnant to escape, and to give us a nail in his holy place, that our God may lighten our eyes, and give us a little reviving in our bondage.

9 For we were bondmen; yet our God hath not forsaken us in our bondage, but hath extended mercy unto us in the sight of the kings of Persia, to give us a reviving, to set up the house of our God, and to repair the desolations thereof, and to give us a wall in Judah and in Jerusalem.

10 And now, O our God, what shall we say after this? for we have forsaken thy commandments,

11 Which thou hast commanded by thy servants the prophets, saying, The land, unto which ye go to possess it, is an unclean land with the filthiness of the people of the lands, with their abominations, which have filled it from one end to another with their uncleanness.

12 Now therefore give not your daughters unto their sons, neither take their daughters unto your sons, nor seek their peace or their wealth for ever: that ye may be strong, and eat the good of the land, and leave it for an inheritance to your children for ever.

13 And after all that is come upon us for our evil deeds, and for our great trespass, seeing that thou our God hast punished us less than our iniquities deserve, and hast given us such deliverance as this;

14 Should we again break thy commandments, and join in affinity with the people of these abominations? wouldest not thou be angry with

Ver. 6. O my God, I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God:] The sum of his confession and deprecation is this, which it may be useful to represent at once: that he was confounded when he thought of the greatness of their sins, which were ready to overwhelm them, and of the boldness and insolence of them beyond all measure; and that, though they had seen the divine vengeance upon their forefathers (from whom they derived this impious disposition) in so terrible a manner, that they had not yet worn off the marks of his displeasure (ver. 6, 7). He had begun indeed to show favour unto them (ver. 8); but this so much the more aggravated their wickedness, in that not very many years after he had been so gracious as to deliver a small handful of them, and give them a footing again in their own land, and in the holy place, and thereby had made them joyful, and given them life, as it were, from the dead, by restoring them to their liberty, they returned to their old provocations, and forgot both that they had been bondmen, and that God had been so kind to them in that bondage, as to make those whom they served to pity them, and give them leave to go to their own land, and build the house of their God (ver. 8, 9). What shall any one say for such a wretched people as this (ver. 10), who had no regard to their prophets, nor to Moses himself, who had charged them to have nothing to do with the people of Canaan, whom he intended to destroy, because they had defiled that land, but to separate themselves from them, and seek to root them out, which was the way to plant themselves firmly there for ever (ver. 11, 12). Can we expect less than utter destruction of this small remnant, when, after all the punishments he hath inflicted upon us for our sins, and his ceasing to punish us, and rescuing us in this manner from our captivity, we return to those sins which are so odious to him, because so expressly against his commandments (ver. 13, 14)? If he deal so with us, we must acknowledge the justice of his proceedings. For when we remain a monument of his mercy, who are rescued (as is apparent) from our bondage, we are notwithstanding here before him in our offences so guilty, that we have nothing to plead for ourselves, we are not able to say one word to excuse our detestable ingratitude.

There cannot be a more pathetic supplication than this, taken altogether; several phrases of which it may be fit to explain.

For our iniquities are increased over our head.] A metaphor taken from deep waters, wherein men are drowned and ready to perish.

Our trespass is grown up unto the heavens.] This signifies, as I have expressed it in my paraphrase, the high presumption and insolence of their wickedness.

Ver. 7.] And therefore were punished unto this day, as the verse concludes. For many of their brethren were still in Babylon, or other countries, and they who returned were in danger to be undone for their continued sins.

Ver. 8. And to give us a nail in his holy place.] By nails or pins tents were fastened to the ground; therefore this signifies (as it is explained in the margin) "a settled abode," after long banishment.

Ver. 9. To give us a reviving.] For Ezekiel compares them, when they were in Babylon, to the dry bones of dead men lying in their graves (ch. xxxvii. 1, &c.).

And to give us a wall in Judah and in Jerusalem.] From hence some infer, that the wall of Jerusalem, before Nehemiah came, was built as well as the temple. But the Hebrew word gedar should be otherwise translated; for it doth not properly signify a wall, but a hedge or fence, such as were made for the folds of sheep. Whereby Ezra expresses (as Huetius well notes) the singular care of God of them; who, being the "Shepherd of Israel," had gathered together his scattered sheep, and brought them back into their ancient folds; wherein he preserved them safe, even when they had no wall, to defend them, under the powerful protection of the king of Persia.

Ver. 10—12.] These verses need no explication more than I have given in the paraphrase upon them.

Ver. 13.] In the Hebrew the words are, "hast withheld beneath our iniquities:" that is, forborne to punish. For as, when God will no longer forbear, he is said to arise, and take vengeance: so here (as Lud. de Dieu observes), on the contrary, he is said to "withhold himself below:" that is, not to arise, but to wait patiently for their amendment.

Ver. 14.] Not one of such a wicked nation left remaining, but all utterly extirpated.

us till thou hast consumed us, so that there should be no remnant nor escaping?

15 O LORD God of Israel, thou art righteous:

Ver. 15. O Lord God of Israel, thou art righteous, &c.] Either the word righteous here signifies very merciful, which was the reason they were not destroyed as they deserved; or the next words must be translated, not "for we remain," but "though we remain escaped:" that is, God's justice will not let us escape, though, for the present, he forbear to punish us.

For we cannot stand before thee because of this.] As this cannot be denied, so it cannot be defended or excused: but we must yield up ourselves to bear the punishment unto which thou wilt condemn us.

Thus he concludes this admirable representation of their condition: which is as much as if he had said, Unless we reform, I know not how to beg for mercy, but we must be undone, and that most justly. For he gives them no hope, intending to put them into a great terror and affrightment, and see how that would work upon their hearts. And we find, in the next chapter (ver. 2), it had this effect; that one stood up and spake in the name of all the rest, that they would renew their covenant with God, and put away these abominations (which was effectual repentance), and then they hope God would be merciful unto them.

CHAPTER X.

1 Shechaniah encourageth Ezra to reform the strange marriages. 6 Ezra mourning assembleth the people. 9 The people, at the exhortation of Ezra, repent, and promise amendment. 15 The care to perform it. 18 The names of them which had married strange wives.

1 Now when Ezra had prayed, and when he had confessed, weeping and casting himself down before the house of God, there assembled unto him out of Israel a very great congregation of men, and women, and children: for the people wept very sore.

2 And Shechaniah the son of Jehiel, one of the sons of Elam, answered and said unto Ezra, We have trespassed against our God, and have taken strange wives of the people of the land: yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing.

3 Now therefore let us make a covenant with our God to put away all the wives, and such as are born of them, according to the counsel of my lord, and of those that tremble at the commandment of our God; and let it be done according to the law.

4 Arise; for this matter belongeth unto thee:

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1.] This prayer being made at the time of the evening sacrifice (as we read before, ch. ix. 5), when many assembled to worship God; and being uttered with great passion, and the highest expressions of grief and sorrow, it moved those very much who were present; especially to see such a person as Ezra, a priest of God, and a great ruler under the king of Persia, so dejected, full of fear, confusion, and astonishment: the report of which was presently carried through all Jerusalem, and, perhaps, to neighbouring places: which brought together a great number of people of all sorts, men, women, and children; who all made great lamentation, looking upon themselves as under the high displeasure of the Almighty.

Ver. 2. Shechaniah — answered and said unto Ezra.] He seems to have been a good man, not being numbered among those that had trespassed; though several of his family were: even his own father, Jehiel, and several of his uncles, the sons of his grandfather Elam (ch. v. 26).

We have trespassed against our God,] Ezra seemed to have given up all for gone, the more to awaken and affright them out of their sins; and therefore this person stands up to keep them from despair, and to propound a remedy which he hoped would prove effectual. This he spake in the name of the rest; with the principal of which, perhaps, he had consulted.

Ver. 3.] That which was done contrary to the law of God was looked upon as null, and therefore these were accounted no marriages, and their children were no better than those we call bastards, and were not to be a part of the family, but to be put away with their mothers. St. Paul, indeed, allows the Corinthians to keep their pagan wives or husbands, because they had them before they were Christians; and there was no law of God or man against their marriages, as there was here a very strict law of God forbidding them. It may seem hard, indeed, that the children should be put away as well as their mothers; but they were unlawfully born, and must follow the condition of their mothers, and being educated in superstition, might corrupt other children: and therefore it was unlawful hereafter to marry with the children of these women, for they were reputed unclean, though their fathers were Israelites. Thus Maimonides reports the sense of the law to be, "A son begot of a gentile by an Israelite, is not to be accounted a son." If a son, indeed, were begot by a gentile of an Israelitish woman, the child was accounted an Israelite, for partus sequitur ventrem. But a child was of the same condition with his mother, and no regard was had to the father at all: so that if a child was begot by an Israelite, of a woman that was a slave, the child was a slave; but if, on the contrary, a woman of Israel had a child by one that was a slave, the child was as free as any other Israelite (see Selden, in the place above mentioned, page 616).

But it is likely, when they put away these wives and children, they made some provision for them; for all was to be done according to the counsel of Ezra, and other good men, who feared God, and trembled to think his commandment was broke, and therefore judged they should be put away: but they prescribed the manner of it, how it should be done; which, it is probable, was not without some consideration of them.

Ver. 4. Arise,] For he lay prostrate upon the ground (ver. 1).

we also will be with thee; be of good courage, and do it.

5 ¶ Then arose Ezra, and made the chief priests, the Levites, and all Israel, to swear that they should do according to this word. And they sware.

6 ¶ Then Ezra rose up from before the house of God, and went into the chamber of Johanan the son of Eliashib: and when he came thither, he did eat no bread, nor drink water: for he mourned because of the transgression of them that had been carried away.

7 And they made proclamation throughout Judah and Jerusalem unto all the children of the captivity, that they should gather themselves together unto Jerusalem;

For this matter belongeth unto thee:] Who had the greatest skill in the law, and a full power from the king of Persia to see every thing done according unto it (ch. vii. 14). Now the renewing of the covenant for the observation of the law was to be done by the authority of the sovereign, as we see by the examples of Asa, Hezekiah, and Josiah: and therefore it is a great mistake (as Mr. Thorndike observes) to imagine the people could renew it, or any part of it, without the consent of the sovereign. From whence we may conclude, that Ezra having such a commission as is mentioned ch. vii. was established by the sovereign power, with an authority to execute the law against all transgressors.

We also will be with thee:] He promises his assistance, and the assistance of the principal persons: which might give him confidence of success.

Ver. 5. Then arose Ezra, and made the chief priests, the Levites, &c.] All that were then present.

To swear that they should do according to this word.] He admonished them of their duty in the name of God, and then persuaded them to take a solemn oath (as they did) to put away their strange wives and children. For the commission given to Ezra supposing a full leave to the people to live according to the law, enabled him to govern them by it, yea, to swear them to observe it; for he might do whatsoever he found necessary to keep them in obedience.

Ver. 6. Then Ezra rose up from before the house of God.] This seems to signify, that he made them swear before he would rise up; that they, seeing his great humiliation before God, in the most doleful condition, might be moved to a more forward compliance.

And went into the chamber of Johanan] That he might there consult with the princes and elders (ver. 8), how to put this counsel in execution. This Eliashib was the high-priest who succeeded Joiakim, who succeeded Jeshua; who living a long time, his son Joiakim enjoyed the priesthood but a few years: and Eliashib lasted not long, but seems to have been dead (as Dr. Alix thinks) a little after the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Memnon (see Neh. xii. 10).

When he came thither, he did eat no bread,] The word when is not in the Hebrew: therefore it had better be translated till he came thither he had eaten nothing.

For he mourned] And in time of mourning and sorrow were they wont to fast.

Ver. 7.] This proclamation was issued forth by the counsel of the princes and elders mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 8. Whosoever would not come within three

8 And that whosoever would not come within three days, according to the counsel of the princes and the elders, all his substance should be forfeited, and himself separated from the congregation of those that had been carried away.

9 ¶ Then all the men of Judah and Benjamin gathered themselves together unto Jerusalem within three days. It was the ninth month, and the twentieth day of the month; and all the people sat in the street of the house of God, trembling because of this matter, and for the great rain.

10 And Ezra the priest stood up, and said unto them, Ye have transgressed, and have taken strange wives, to increase the trespass of Israel.

11 Now therefore make confession unto the days.] This was a short time; but they were resolved to be speedy in the business, lest they that propounded it should cool, or any thing occur to hinder it.

According to the counsel of the princes and the elders.] It was a great power which the king of Persia intrusted Ezra withal; which he managed very discreetly: for he would not make the following decree by his own sole authority, without the advice of the Sanhedrin; which is generally thought to be meant by the "princes and elders," viz. the high court of Jerusalem; for they that are here called princes, are, verse 14, called judges.

All his substance should be forfeited,] In the Hebrew, devoted. Which signifies that his goods were to be so forfeited, as to become sacred to God; and so incapable to be restored to the former owner, being put into the treasury of God's house.

And himself separated from the congregation of those that had been carried away.] Excluded from their society, and all the benefits of their religion (see chapter vii. 26). This was a punishment inflicted by all nations on those who would not conform themselves to the laws; as Grotius observes, De Imperio Sum. Potest. circa Sacra, cap. 9, p. 242: edit. Hagæ and Selden, De Synedr. lib. i. cap. 7, p. 146, 147, 150.

Ver. 9. Then all the men of Judah and Benjamin gathered themselves together] And all they of other tribes complied also with this proclamation, as appears from verse 25, but these are alone mentioned, because they were the chief, and the others were mixed with them.

It was the ninth month,] About a quarter of a year after Ezra and his company came to Jerusalem.

All the people sat in the street of the house of God,] Some take this to be the street which led to the temple; But it was rather the court of the people where they worshipped; which, lying open, and not being yet girt about with a wall (as we may guess from Neh. ii. 8), is called a street.

Trembling because of this matter,] The offence they had committed against God, and the consequence thereof.

For the great rain.] Which they took as a token of God's anger against them, because of their sin.

Ver. 10.] When they should have been bewailing their former sins, which cast them out of their land, they added new transgressions when they were restored to it.

Ver. 11. Make confession unto the Lord—and do his pleasure:] Confession of sin alone, without obedience to God's will and entire submission to him, is insufficient to reconciliation with him.

LORD God of your fathers, and do his pleasure: and separate yourselves from the people of the land, and from the strange wives.

12 Then all the congregation answered and said with a loud voice, As thou hast said, so must we do.

13 But the people are many, and it is a time of much rain, and we are not able to stand without, neither is this a work of one day or two; for we are many that have transgressed in this thing.

14 Let now our rulers of all the congregation stand, and let all them which have taken strange wives in our cities come at appointed times, and with them the elders of every city, and the judges thereof, until the fierce wrath of our God for this matter be turned from us.

15 ¶ Only Jonathan the son of Asahel, and Jahaziah the son of Tikvah, were employed about this matter: and Meshullam and Shabbethai the Levite helped them.

16 And the children of the captivity did so. And Ezra the priest, with certain chief of the fathers, after the house of their fathers, and all of them by their names, were separated, and sat down in the first day of the tenth month to examine the matter.

17 And they made an end with all the men that had taken strange wives by the first day of the first month.

18 ¶ And among the sons of the priests there were found that had taken strange wives: namely, of the sons of Jeshua the son of Jozadak, and his brethren; Maaseiah, and Eliezer, and Jarib, and Gedaliah.

19 And they gave their hands that they would put away their wives; and being guilty, they offered a ram of the flock for their trespass.

Separate yourselves from the people of the land, and from the strange wives.] There being no mention here made of their children, but only of their wives, it hath made some think that they kept their children, and by circumcision dedicated them to God, teaching them to renounce the infidelity of their mothers. For though Shechaniah propounded the putting away the children also (ver. 3), yet it may be thought that Ezra, to whom the matter was referred, mitigated the severity of it; because we do not read any thing of them, but only of the wives, when he came to order what should be done.

Ver. 12.] They saw no other remedy, and therefore submitted to what he required, as the pleasure of God.

Ver. 13.] They give very good reasons why for the present they should be dismissed, and more time taken to make inquisition after all the offenders, and examine them: and to show they really desired the thing should be done, they propound a method, in the next verse, for the management of it.

Ver. 14.] They would have the great council at Jerusalem settled (for that is meant by "let the rulers of all the congregation stand"), and be ready to take cognizance of this matter: set days being appointed for the offenders in every city to be brought before them, by the elders and judges of those cities (that is, some delegates from the senate of that place), who should testify that they had seen the divorces made from their strange wives; for they were best able to know the circumstances of every person, and all his actions. And this they would have to continue, as long as there remained any thing to be done in this business; that the anger of God might be turned away from them. So De Dieu truly renders, I think, the last words of this verse.

How elders and judges differ, is a dispute among learned men. Sometimes they signify the same; but when they are mentioned together, it is reasonable to think their powers were distinct. And Campegius Vitringa seems to me to have given a good account of them; that by elders are meant the supreme senate in every city, who judged in all civil causes; and by judges (as distinct from the other) are meant judges of an inferior bench, by whom all money matters were tried. For though the senate might judge in all causes, yet it is reasonable to think they referred small matters to a lower court. This he gathers out of the scriptures, and shows it is conformable to the traditions of the Talmudists (De Synagoga Veter. lih. ii. cap. 9, p. 58, and see L'Empereur upon Bertram, De Repub. Jud. p. 395).

Ver. 15. Only Jonathan—and Jahaziah—were employed about this matter:] These were two priests, who were chosen to see all things done according to the foregoing resolution: that is, to appoint the time when the men of each city should come to bring in their names, and to acquaint the great council that these were elders and judges of the cities, who had seen their orders executed.

Meshullam and Shabbethai the Levite helped them.] They were both of them Levites, as I take it, who were to assist the forenamed priests in so great a work.

Ver. 16.] The children of the captivity did so.] They who came up out of Babylon to their own country are constantly called "the children of the captivity;" to put them in mind of their servitude, and of their freedom from it.

Were separated,] Sequestered themselves from all other business, to attend wholly to the issue of this.

Sat down—to examine the matter.] I cannot imagine what it was that they were set apart to examine, unless it was whether the persons before named did their duty: for it is likely they brought the names of those who were found guilty (which here follow) unto Ezra and these assessors; who examined whether they found more than these, and of what quality and condition they were.

Ver. 17.] Three months therefore were spent in this disquisition, which shows it was very exact.

Ver. 18.] No wonder the people broke the law, when so many of those who were supposed to understand it best (viz. the priests) gave them such a foul example of lust and levity (as Pellicanus speaks), yea, some of the sons of the high-priest; which made the example more pernicious. Which may be the reason, as he conjectures, why Jeshua, the high-priest, was represented in a vision to Zechariah the prophet in filthy garments; because his family (sons and brethren) were defiled with this impurity. For as Cicero saith, out of Plato, in a letter to Lentulus, Tales plerumque civis reliqui esse solent, quales principes in civitate fuerint viri; "such the rest of the citizens are wont to be, as the great men in the city are."

Ver. 19. They gave their hands that they would put away their wives;] Solemnly engaged, by making a covenant, or by an oath, that they would do what was enjoined (see Ezek. xvii. 18). But it may be expounded simply, "they put their hand to the business;" that is, did it effectually, and actually put away their strange wives.

20 And of the sons of Immer; Hanani, and Zebadiah.

21 And of the sons of Harim; Maaseiah, and Elijah, and Shemaiah, and Jehiel, and Uz-ziah.

22 And of the sons of Pashur; Elioenai, Maaseiah, Ishmael, Nethaneel, Jozabad, and Elasaah.

23 Also of the Levites; Jozabad, and Shimei, and Kelaiah, (the same is Kelita,) Pethahiah, Judah, and Eliezer.

24 Of the singers also; Eliashib: and of the porters; Shallum, and Telem, and Uri.

25 Moreover of Israel: of the sons of Parosh; Ramiah, and Jeziah, and Malchiah, and Miamin, and Eleazar, and Malchijah, and Benaiah.

26 And of the sons of Elam; Mattaniah, Zechariah, and Jehiel, and Abdi, and Jeremoth, and Eliah.

27 And of the sons of Zattu; Elioenai, Eliashib, Mattaniah, and Jeremoth, and Zabad, and Aziza.

28 Of the sons also of Bebai; Jehohanan, Hananiah, Zabbai, and Athlai.

29 And of the sons of Bani; Meshullam,

Malluch, and Adaiah, Jashub, and Sheal, and Ramoth.

30 And of the sons of Pahath-moab; Adna, and Chelal, Benaiah, Maaseiah, Mattaniah, Bezaleel, and Binnui, and Manasseh.

31 And of the sons of Harim; Eliezer, Ishijah, Malchiah, Shemaiah, Shimeon, 32 Benjamin, Malluch, and Shemariah.

33 Of the sons of Hashum; Mattenai, Mattathah, Zabad, Eliphelet, Jeremai, Manasseh, and Shimei.

34 Of the sons of Bani; Maadai, Amram, and Uel,

35 Benaiah, Bedeiah, Chelluh,

36 Vaniah, Meremoth, Eliashib,

37 Mattaniah, Mattenai, and Jaasau,

38 And Bani, and Binnui, Shimei,

39 And Shelemiah, and Nathan, and Adaiah,

40 Machnadebai, Shashai, Sharai,

41 Azareel, and Shelemiah, Shemariah,

42 Shallum, Amariah, and Joseph.

43 Of the sons of Nebo; Jeiel, Mattithiah, Zabad, Zebina, Jadan, and Joel, Benaiah.

44 All these had taken strange wives: and some of them had wives by whom they had children.

Being guilty, they offered a ram of the flock for their trespass.] More than that, they openly confessed their guilt, and made an offering for their offence; and bereby, perhaps, endeavoured to make some amends for their sin, by being the first that condemned themselves and reformed, and offered a trespass-offering, which, some think, all the rest made, after their example.

Ver. 20—22.] All these were priests, who were very deep in this guilt, and being public persons, led others fearlessly into it.

Ver. 23.] There were not so many Levites, as there were priests, in the transgression.

Ver. 24.] These seem to have been more modest; there being but one offender found among the singers, and but three among the porters.

Ver. 25.] The Hebrews call all those Israel, who were not Levites, or dedicated to the service of the temple. Whence the court of Israel was that place wherein the men of Israel worshipped, as they were distinguished from the priests and Levites.

Ver. 26.] This Jehiel was Shechaniah's father, ver. 2. And yet, notwithstanding, though his father and kindred were guilty of this crime, which Ezra bewailed, he did not stick to speak his mind, how it should be punished. An admirable example of zealous integrity!

Ver. 27.] The two former, Parosh and Elam, with this Zattu, and all that follow to ver. 32, were of the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 32.] Now follows an account of those of the other tribe.

Ver. 43.] Some take Nebo for a place, of which the following families were citizens. But nothing of this is worth inquiring into.

Ver. 44. All these had taken strange wives:] There is no great number of them, in comparison with all that returned from captivity: but they seem to have been eminent persons, who would have spread the contagion, if a stop had not been put to it.

Some of them had wives by whom they had children.] There were some of them women that had brought them children, as the Vulgar translates it: which De Dieu shows is the plainest translation of these words. Here was a fair occasion to have spoken of the putting away their children as well as their wives, if that motion had been prosecuted: but nothing being here said of it, it makes me think, the observation is true which I made ver. 11 (see there).

BOOK OF NEHEMIAH.

THAT Nehemiah himself was the author of this book there can be no reasonable doubt; for he saith as much in the beginning of it, and all along relates what he did in his own person, for the rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem, and other things. He lived in the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and came into Judea thirteen years after Ezra; unto whom the king of Persia gave great authority, as he had done to Ezra; God disposing his heart to have some Jews still about him in his court, for whom he had a kindness. After him, we do not find that the kings of Persia made any governor, but left things, it is probable, to the management of Jaddua the high-priest, as Corn. Bertram thinks (see De Republ. Judaica, p. 168, 173, 175).

CHAPTER I.

1 Nehemiah, understanding by Hanani the misery of Jerusalem, mourneth, fasteth, and prayeth. 5 His prayer.

1 THE words of Nehemiah the son of Hachaliah. And it came to pass in the month Chisleu, in the twentieth year, as I was in Shushan the palace,

2 That Hanani, one of my brethren, came, he and certain men of Judah; and I asked them concerning the Jews that had escaped, which were left of the captivity, and concerning Jerusalem.

3 And they said unto me, The remnant that are left of the captivity there in the province are in great affliction and reproach: the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire.

4 ¶ And it came to pass, when I heard these words, that I sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted, and prayed before the God of heaven,

5 And said, I beseech thee, O LORD God of heaven, the great and terrible God, that keepeth covenant and mercy for them that love him and observe his commandments;

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. The words of Nehemiah] Or, as Pellicanus translates it, gesta (for so the Hebrew word often signifies), the things which Nehemiah did.

The son of Hachaliah.] We are nowhere told who this was, nor of what tribe: Eusebius and others say of the tribe of Judah.

Chisleu.] Which answers to our November, and part of December.

In the twentieth year.] Not of Artaxerxes, but of Nehemiah's life (see ch. ii. 1).

As I was in Shushan the palace.] In the reign of Elymais, where the Persian kings kept their court in winter, and, from its pleasant and beautiful situation was called by heathen writers Susa, which signifies a lily; or (as Athenæus saith, lib. xii.) arose. Stephanus Byzantinus gives this account of it: It was called Σούσα, ἀπὸ τῶν κρίνων ἃ πολλὰ ἐν τῇ χώρᾳ πεφύκει ἐκείνῃ, "from the lilies that grew in abundance in that country." Our Dr. Hyde hath a peculiar fancy, that the Persians called it Sus, which signifies licorice: but the Jews, to compliment Ahasuerus, called it in these books by this name, of a better sound, which signifies a lily (Hist. Relig. Vet. Pers. cap. 35, p. 414).

Ver. 2.] That Hanani, one of my brethren.] And I suppose, one of his family.

Came he, and certain men of Judah;] Came from Jerusalem to Shushan, either about business, or finding things very hard with them in Judea. He inquired of the condition wherein they were who returned out of Babylon into Judea, and whether Jerusalem were again become a flourishing city; as it was natural for him to do, especially being a man that loved his nation exceedingly.

Ver. 3. In the province] So Judea is called, Ezra v. 8 (see there).

Are in great affliction and reproach: the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire.] They answer to both parts of this inquiry, that the people were in great distress and contempt by their insolent neighbours, wherewith they were surrounded, and Jerusalem lay without any walls or gates to defend it from their injuries. He knew very well that it was burnt by Nebuchadnezzar, and the walls beaten down; therefore their meaning is, that the walls and gates lay as the Chaldeans left them after that devastation, and were not repaired, though the temple was built again.

Ver. 4. I sat down] Upon the ground, as the manner was, in great sorrow, and, perhaps, in ashes.

And prayed before the God of heaven.] With his face towards Jerusalem.

Ver. 5. I beseech thee, O Lord God of heaven.] In this style they all spake of God (as I observed, Ezra i.) after the captivity: signifying, as Conrad. Pellicanus observes, his sovereign dominion over all things that are contained within the compass of the heavens; the sun, moon, and stars, angels, and men, and all creatures.

6 Let thine ear now be attentive, and thine eyes open, that thou mayest hear the prayer of thy servant, which I pray before thee now, day and night, for the children of Israel thy servants, and confess the sins of the children of Israel, which we have sinned against thee: both I and my father's house have sinned.

7 We have dealt very corruptly against thee, and have not kept the commandments, nor the statutes, nor the judgments, which thou commandedst thy servant Moses.

8 Remember, I beseech thee, the word that thou commandedst thy servant Moses, saying, If ye transgress, I will scatter you abroad among the nations:

The great and terrible God,] He is called great, not with respect to those petty gods that the heathen worshipped, who had no power at all, but with respect to all potentates either in heaven or in earth; and he is called terrible, because he is most humbly to be worshipped and revered by them all.

That keepeth covenant and mercy for them that love him and observe his commandments:] Next, he celebrates his faithfulness and truth in performing his promises to those that plainly declare they sincerely love him, by keeping his commandments. These he never fails to bless, because they are faithful to him.

Ver. 6.] A deep sense of our own unworthiness, is a good qualification for the mercy we beg of God. This Nehemiah expresses very sensibly, both here and in the next verse.

Ver. 7. We have dealt very corruptly against thee,] Some of the Jews expound it, "We have despised and contemned thee."

And have not kept the commandments,] But violated every one of them, to the high offence both of God and man.

Ver. 8.] Which they had seen fulfilled by the Assyrians and Chaldeans.

Ver. 9. But if ye—keep my commandments, and do them, &c.] As he hoped some of them now did. This promise made by Moses he hoped God would fulfil, as he had done the threatening. It is a very pious observation of Dr. Jackson (book iii. ch. 17), that Nehemiah framed this prayer to God, and directed his enterprise for the restoration of Jerusalem, by the rule of Moses, mentioned in Deut. xxx. 1—4, and he plainly found the truth of that prediction in 9 But if ye turn unto me, and keep my commandments, and do them; though there were of you cast out unto the uttermost part of the heaven, yet will I gather them from thence, and will bring them unto the place that I have chosen to set my name there.

10 Now these are thy servants, and thy people, whom thou hast redeemed by thy great power, and by thy strong hand.

11 O LORD, I beseech thee, let now thine ear be attentive to the prayer of thy servant, and to the prayer of thy servants, who desire to fear thy name; and prosper, I pray thee, thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man. For I was the king's cup-bearer.

the readiness of the king of Persia to grant his petition: which confirmed his belief of what Moses there saith, although a prophet by profession dissuaded his enterprise as likely to prove dangerous to his person (ch. vi. 10, 11).

Ver. 10.] For nothing but the overruling power of God could have moved Cyrus to dismiss this whole nation out of captivity, and let them return to their own land. Or, as some think, he beseeches his compassion to them, because they were his peculiar people, redeemed out of the Egyptian bondage by many miracles.

Ver. 11. Let now thine ear be attentive—to the prayer of thy servants, who desire to fear thy name:] He was not alone in this petition for mercy, but there were many others, who would worship him sincerely. So the words are in the Hebrew, "who will fear," or "delight to fear, thy name."

And prosper,—thy servant this day,] He prayed night and day, as he saith, ver. 6. But this was the prayer he made on that day when he went to wait upon the king.

Grant him mercy in the sight of this man.] He means the king, unto whom he pointed as it were with his finger, when he was going to attend upon him.

For I was the king's cup-bearer.] And perhaps, as he came into his presence, he secretly made this prayer to God in his own breast. Many of the Jews, by the singular favour of God, obtained considerable dignities in their captivity, as Daniel and his companions, Zerubbabel, and others: among whom was this good man, who was advanced to this place of cup-bearer, when he was but a youth, as our Rainoldus hath shown, in his Censura, Lib. Apocryph. p. 1496.

CHAPTER II.

1 Artaxerxes understanding the cause of Nehemiah's sadness, sendeth him with letters and commission to Jerusalem. 9 Nehemiah, to the grief of the enemies, cometh to Jerusalem. 12 He vieweth secretly the ruins of the walls. 17 He inciteth the Jews to build in despite of their enemies.

1 AND it came to pass in the month Nisan, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that wine was before him: and I took up the wine, and gave it unto the king. Now I had not been beforetime sad in his presence.

2 Wherefore the king said unto me, Why is

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. In the month Nisan, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes] Which was almost four months after he heard of the desolate condition wherein Jerusalem lay; in all which time, I suppose, his turn of waiting did not come: so that he wanted opportunity to speak unto the king. Or, as others will have it, he and his friends retired all this time, and spent it in fasting and prayers.

That wine was before him:] He was at dinner or supper, and he called for wine; which was ready for him.

I took up the wine, and gave it unto the king.] After the manner that the cup-bearer was wont to do.

Now I had not been beforetime sad in his presence.]

thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick? this is nothing else but sorrow of heart. Then I was very sore afraid,

3 And said unto the king, Let the king live for ever: why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire?

4 Then the king said unto me, For what dost thou make request? So I prayed to the God of heaven.

5 And I said unto the king, If it please the king, and if thy servant have found favour in thy sight, that thou wouldest send me unto Judah, unto the city of my fathers' sepulchres, that I may build it.

But always appeared cheerful and well-pleased as young men so advanced use to be. And perhaps entertained the king at table with pleasant discourse.

Ver. 2. Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick?] There did not appear in his countenance any sign of indisposition of body.

This is nothing else but sorrow of heart.] Some inward trouble which grieved his spirit.

Then I was very sore afraid.] Lest the king should have a suspicion that he had any treasonable design in his thoughts, and intended to poison him, as it was easy for the cup-bearer to do: or rather, he was afraid he should not prevail in his suit; the court it is likely being full of such as would oppose it.

Ver. 3. Let the king live for ever.] They that think he was afraid the king should be jealous of him, take the meaning to be, Let not the king fear I mean him any harm, but pray for his long life. But this was a common form of wishing the king long happiness, as appears from several places in Daniel, and hath no respect to that now mentioned.

Why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste,] Men naturally have a great love to the monuments of their ancestors, and are troubled to see the place where they are laid desolate. He did not speak a word of religion, or the divine worship (as Grotius observes), for though Artaxerxes had a great affection for the Jews, and had their God in veneration (as appears by the edict he sent to Ezra thirteen years before), yet the company about him might not be so well disposed, but had the same affection and concern for their country and relations that he had, though they did not worship the same God.

Ver. 4. For what dost thou make request?] This argues the king had a great kindness for him, that he so readily asked what he would have him to do for him, to ease him of his trouble.

So I prayed to the God of heaven.] In his mind he silently besought God to guide his tongue, and to bow the king's heart to grant his request.

Ver. 5. If it please the king, and if thy servant have found favour in thy sight.] It was a bold request he was going to make, and therefore, before he mentions it, he submits it to the king's will and pleasure; and acknowledges he had no merit, but depended wholly upon the king's kindness; unto whom, perhaps, he might have performed some acceptable service.

That thou wouldest send me unto Judah.] This might lead Eusebius and others to think Nehemiah was of the tribe of Judah, because his ancestors dwelt in Jerusalem, and were there buried.

That I may build it.] Build the walls of it, and make it a city again: whereas now it was but an open town.

6 And the king said unto me, (the queen also sitting by him,) For how long shall thy journey be? and when wilt thou return? So it pleased the king to send me; and I set him a time.

7 Moreover, I said unto the king, If it please the king, let letters be given me to the governors beyond the river, that they may convey me over till I come into Judah;

8 And a letter unto Asaph the keeper of the king's forest, that he may give me timber to make beams for the gates of the palace which appertained to the house, and for the wall of the city, and for the house that I shall enter into. And the king granted me, according to the good hand of my God upon me.

9 ¶ Then I came to the governors beyond the

Ver. 6. And the king said unto me, (the queen also sitting by him,)] Which was not usual, as historians say, but is noted here as a thing extraordinary; because it is likely she favoured him, and promoted the grant of his request.

For how long shall thy journey be? and when wilt thou return?] This is another argument of the kindness he had for him; that he would not lose his service, nor be long without it.

So it pleased the king to send me; and I set him a time.] He having told the king how long he desired to be absent from his duty, the king permitted him to go. How long that was, is not certain. But it is not likely it was for twelve years (mentioned ch. v. 14, xiii. 6); but rather he asked leave for a year, or perhaps for half so much: which made him so quick in despatching the building of the wall, which he finished in two-and-fifty days (ch. vi. 15). After which, it is likely, he returned to Shushan, according to his appointment: and the king sent him back as his governor for twelve years; his presence being very serviceable, or perhaps necessary there, for the better ordering of that province, to the king's content.

Ver. 7.] Give him a safe conduct, and furnish him with necessities in his journey through their several provinces, where they had authority.

Ver. 8. And a letter unto Asaph the keeper of the king's forest.] I suppose he means the forest of Lebanon; from whence he might be furnished with materials for his building. Here the word pardes signifies differently from what it doth in other places where it is used; which are but two besides this, Eccles. ii. 5, Cant. iv. 13, where it signifies a most pleasant garden, planted with all sorts of trees. And this forest, it seems, was so sweet and pleasant a place, that it deserved to be called by the same name.

That he may give me timber to make beams for the gates of the palace] The Vulgar Latin, by the palace, understands the "tower of the house;" and so Pellicanus, portas templi, "the gates of the temple." For though the temple itself was built, yet the several courts seem not to have been walled about, nor the gates to the temple made. For, that it should be meant of the gates of the king's palace, which was near the temple, is altogether unlikely; there being no occasion to build a palace for the king of Persia; and no other king could be intended.

For the house that I shall enter into.] He desired leave to build a convenient house for himself, and for those that should be future governors.

And the king granted me, according to the good hand of my God upon me.] The hand is sometimes taken (as Drusius observes) in an ill sense, for in-river, and gave them the king's letters. Now the king had sent captains of the army and horsemen with me.

10 When Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, heard of it, it grieved them exceedingly that there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel.

11 So I came to Jerusalem, and was there three days.

12 ¶ And I arose in the night, I and some few men with me; neither told I any man what my God had put in my heart to do at Jerusalem; neither was there any beast with me, save the beast that I rode upon.

13 And I went out by night by the gate of the flicting punishments (Ruth i. 13, Jer. xv. 17), for we strike others with the hand: and sometimes in a good sense, for helping and assisting others; for we extend favours to men with our hand. Thus he explains Ps. lxxxviii. 6, "cut off from thy hand;" that is, fallen from thy grace and favour. Pindar, he observes, thus uses the "hand of God" for his help and aid, Olymp. x. Θεοῦ εἰν παλάμη, "by the hand of God," which the scholiast interprets, Τῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ δυνάμει καὶ βοήθειᾳ, "by the power and help of God" (Miscellanea, cent. i. cap. 85). Thus Nehemiah is to be here understood by the divine favour, which inclined the king to do what he desired; which he calls God's good hand.

Ver. 9.] This the king did over and above what he desired: which procured him the greater respect from the governors, when they saw the care the king took for the safety of his person.

Ver. 10. When Sanballat the Horonite,] He seems to have been a petty prince of Moab; or some great man of that country. For Horonaim was an eminent city there (Isa. xv. 5; xlviii. 3, 5, 34).

And Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite,] He had been a slave of that country; but now advanced to some authority (perhaps to be a governor of a province) in these parts. The mention of these two great men shows, that the nations of Moab and Ammon were restored as well as the Jews, according to the divine oracles; and were well known, that their destruction by the people of God might be the more observable; which was in the time of the Maccabees, who subdued those nations, according to the predictions of several prophets.

It grieved them exceedingly that there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel.] With such authority from the king, and in such favour with him; as appeared by the letters he brought with him, and the guard that attended him, and the diligence of the several governors, through whose provinces he passed, to serve him.

Ver. 11.] In which he rested himself, and received the visits of his friends, as Ezra had done, ch. viii. 32.

Ver. 12. I arose in the night,] At the end of those days, it is likely, for he was resolved to make no delay.

Some few men with me;] In whom he most confided.

Neither told I any man what my God had put in my heart to do at Jerusalem:] He, being a courtier, had learned to hold his peace, and observe when it was a fit time to speak, and to whom. For he would not trust to every body, knowing there was much falseness in men's hearts; and secrecy was necessary to keep his designs from being betrayed.

Neither was there any beast with me, save the valley, even before the dragon well, and to the dung port, and viewed the walls of Jerusalem, which were broken down, and the gates thereof were consumed with fire.

14 Then I went on to the gate of the fountain, and to the king's pool: but there was no place for the beast that was under me to pass.

15 Then went I up in the night by the brook, and viewed the wall, and turned back, and entered by the gate of the valley, and so returned.

16 And the rulers knew not whither I went, or what I did; neither had I as yet told it to the Jews, nor to the priests, nor to the nobles, nor to the rulers, nor to the rest that did the work.

17 ¶ Then said I unto them, Ye see the dis-beast that I rode upon.] They all went on foot, besides himself, that there might be the less noise, and no notice taken of what he did. What beast it was on which he rode, whether horse or mule, is not worth the inquiry: it is likely a mule, on which great men were wont to ride in those countries.

Ver. 13. I went out by night by the gate of the valley,] This valley is mentioned again, ch. iii. 13, but whereabouts it was, is not remembered, but only that it lay before the well called the dragon well.

Even before the dragon well,] So called, either from the silent sliding of the water (as a serpent creeps) from the fountain Siloam; or, from a dragon (as Bochartus thinks) which haunted this place since the city lay desolate; for serpents delight in such places, especially near fountains of water.

To the dung port,] Out of which dung was wont to be carried out of Jerusalem, when it was before inhabited.

And viewed the walls of Jerusalem, which were broken down,] Trying (as Conradus Pellicanus reasonably conjectures) whether the foundation was still sound, and would support a new wall laid upon it; or whether it was rotten, and must be laid again.

Ver. 14. Then I went on to the gate of the fountain,] Either of Siloe or of Gihon. The wall was not so broken down, but some part of it still remained, and the place where the gates were known (see ch. iv. 6, 7; vi. 1).

To the king's pool:] Which is generally supposed to be that which Hezekiah made (2 Chron. xxxii. 3, 30).

There was no place for the beast that was under me to pass.] Being full of rubbish, or of water.

Ver. 15. Then went I up in the night by the brook,] The same night he went by the brook Kidron.

And viewed the wall, and turned back,] He seems not to have gone round about the whole city; for there were several other gates which are not here mentioned; but having seen in what condition so many parts of the wall were, by which he judged of the rest, he turned back into the city, and entered at the same gate from whence he went out (ver. 13).

Ver. 16. The rulers knew not whither I went, or what I did,] These rulers (Conradus Pellicanus thinks) were gentiles, for they are distinguished from the Jews in the following words, and from other rulers among them; and therefore were the officers of the kings of Persia, who had hitherto obstructed the work.

Neither had I as yet told it to the Jews,] To any of the people of the Jews, for he had not so much as acquainted the priests, nor the nobles, nor any that had authority among them, with his intentions.

Nor to the rest that did the work,] Whom he intended hereafter to employ in the work: or, he told treasure that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste, and the gates thereof are burned with fire: come, and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem, that we be no more a reproach.

18 Then I told them of the hand of my God which was good upon me; as also the king's words that he had spoken unto me. And they said, Let us rise up and build. So they strengthened their hands for this good work.

19 But when Sanballat the Horonite, and To-biab the servant, the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arabian, heard it, they laughed us to scorn, and despised us, and said, What is this thing that ye do? will ye rebel against the king?

20 Then answered I them, and said unto them, The God of heaven, he will prosper us; therefore we his servants will arise and build: but ye have no portion, nor right, nor memorial, in Jerusalem.

none of those that went with him to view the ruins what his design was.

Ver. 17. Ye see the distress that we are in,] Not long after he took a fit opportunity to represent to them their low condition; and to let them understand what he intended, and had power to undertake.

That we be no more a reproach,] Exposed to the scorn and insults of the people round about them.

Ver. 18. I told them of the hand of my God which was good upon me; as also the king's words] He acquainted them how favourable God had made the king to him, and all the discourse he had with him, and the commission which he had received from him.

So they strengthened their hands for this good work,] When they heard of the favour of God, and of the king.

Ver. 19. But when Sanballat,—and Tobiah—and Geshem the Arabian heard it,] It is probable that they were in Arabia, as the two former were in Moab and Ammon. But others take them rather to have been all three great men among the Samaritans.

They laughed us to scorn, and despised us,] As men that made a vain attempt, which they would never be able to accomplish.

Will ye rebel against the king?] This was the most odious calumny they could invent, that they intended to set up for themselves, and be no longer the king's subjects.

Ver. 20. The God of heaven, he will prosper us;] We have authority for what we do from a higher power than yours.

Ye have no portion, nor right, nor memorial, in Jerusalem,] Do not you trouble yourselves about this matter; who have no part, either in the labour, or the merit, or the fame of it: for you are not of our religion; and therefore may mind your own business, and not meddle with ours.

CHAPTER III.

The names and order of them that builded the wall.

I THEN Eliashib the high-priest rose up, with his brethren the priests, and they builded the sheep gate; they sanctified it, and set up the doors of it; even unto the tower of Meah they sanctified it, unto the tower of Hananeel.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. Then Eliashib the high priest rose up with his brethren the priests,] Now he shows by whom, and in what order, the wall was built: which was begun by Eliashib, the grandchild of Jeshua the high-priest (as we read ch. xii. 10): who with his brethren gave a noble example, in being the first that went about the work, and built the gate here mentioned.

They builded the sheep gate;] Which was at the south side of the city, in that part of the valley which looked towards the city of David and the temple. The sheep used to enter in here which were to be sacrificed; and therefore, I suppose, the priests undertook this part of the work as most proper for them. Dr. Lightfoot hath taken a great deal of pains to find in what quarter these gates were; to whom I refer the reader in his Chorog. Century of the Land of Israel, ch. xxvi.

They sanctified it, and set up the doors of it;] When they had completed it, they blessed it by solemn prayers, and perhaps by sacrifices; as the first-fruits of this pious work: for we do not read that any other part, but this which they built, was sanctified. Some think this was done because of the relation that this gate had to sacred uses: but it was rather such a ceremony as was imitated by other

2 And next unto him builded the men of Jericho. And next to them builded Zaccur the son of Imri.

3 But the fish gate did the sons of Hassenaah build, who also laid the beams thereof, and set nations, when they begun their walls; which they commended to the protection of their gods. Some translate it, "they made it an excellent structure:" others, they cleansed it from the rubbish, and the profanation which the Babylonians had brought upon it; restoring it to its ancient splendour. But our translation, I think, is best; for it being the priest's work, it became them to bless and sanctify it.

Even unto the tower of Meah they sanctified it, unto the tower of Hananeel,] They sanctified the rest of the wall, which they built as far as the tower of Meah on one side, and the tower of Hananeel on the other. But Pellicanus thinks, that Meah is not the name of a tower, but signifies a hundred; and makes the sense to be, They not only built the sheep-gate, but a hundred cubits of the wall to a tower so far off from the gate, and also to the tower of Hananeel. This sheep-gate some think is the same with the Προβαταριον, mentioned John v. 2. which being the first that was built by the priests of God, and particularly commended to his blessing, had that singular gift bestowed upon the neighbouring pool, that it should miraculously heal those that first entered into it every day; and that from this time it had this virtue. Afterward they dedicated the whole wall, as we read ch. xii. 27.

Ver. 2. Zaccur] Whom some take for a principal person in Jericho.

up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.

4 And next unto them repaired Meremoth the son of Urijah, the son of Koz. And next unto them repaired Meshullam the son of Berechiah, the son of Meshezabeel. And next unto them repaired Zadok the son of Baana.

5 And next unto them the Tekoites repaired; but their nobles put not their necks to the work of their Lord.

6 Moreover, the old gate repaired Jehoiada the son of Paseah, and Meshullam the son of Besodeiah; they laid the beams thereof, and set up the doors thereof, and the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.

7 And next unto them repaired Meletiah the Gibeonite, and Jadon the Meronothite, the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah, unto the throne of the governor on this side the river.

8 Next unto him repaired Uzziel the son of Harhaiah, of the goldsmiths. Next unto him also repaired Hananiah the son of one of the apothecaries, and they fortified Jerusalem unto the broad wall.

9 And next unto them repaired Rephaiah the son of Hur, the ruler of the half part of Jerusalem.

Ver. 3. But the fish gate did the sons of Hasse-naah build.] This was a gate which looked towards the sea; from which fish was wont to be brought, and sold here.

Who also laid the beams thereof, &c.] They made a complete piece of work of this gate; to which they gave the last finishing; which was not done universally till after some time (see ch. vi. 1: vii. 1).

Ver. 4.] These repaired the wall till they came to the old gate; for there was no other gate till they came there.

Ver. 5. Next unto them the Tekoites repaired;] The people of the city of Tekoa carried on the wall with those three before named.

But their nobles put not their necks to the work of their Lord.] They were either proud, and would not stoop to this work: or they were negligent, and cared not whether it were done or not. By their Lord some understand the leader and head of the whole family, who was active in it; others Nehemiah; and some God himself, whose work this was; unto which, therefore, well-disposed persons, though ever so great, put their necks; that is, laboured hard, not refusing to carry burdens, &c.

Ver. 6. Moreover the old gate repaired Jehoiada—and Meshullam] Some think it was called "the old gate," because there were some remains of it from the times of the Jebusites, yea, of Melchisedec, by whom it was at first built.

They laid the beams thereof;] They imitated those mentioned ver. 3, as several others did (ver. 13—15).

Ver. 7.] These, and they that follow in the next verse, repaired as far as to the wall of the broad street. And among these was a great man, whose name was Chisse (so Pellicanus translates the word we render the throne), a petty prince in Syria, under the king of Persia; who, being proselyted, joined in this work.

Ver. 8.] These were two eminent persons; one among the goldsmiths, the other among the perfumers; who did not build the wall, because it was very good in this place; but only fortified it, and made it strong. As for this was the broad street of 10 And next unto them repaired Jedaiah the son of Harumaph, even over against his house. And next unto him repaired Hattush the son of Hashabnah.

11 Malchijah the son of Harim, and Hashub the son of Pahath-moab, repaired the other piece, and the tower of the furnaces.

12 And next unto him repaired Shallum the son of Halohesh, the ruler of the half part of Jerusalem, he and his daughters.

13 The valley gate repaired Hanun, and the inhabitants of Zanoah; they built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof, and a thousand cubits on the wall unto the dung gate.

14 But the dung gate repaired Malechiah the son of Rechab, the ruler of part of Beth-hacerem; he built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.

15 But the gate of the fountain repaired Shallun the son of Col-hozeh, the ruler of part of Mizpah; he built it, and covered it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof, and the wall of the pool of Siloah by the king's garden, and unto the stairs that go down from the city of David.

16 After him repaired Nehemiah the son of the city, where there was a market-place for the selling of commodities.

Ver. 9.] There were two principal overseers of the work, on the two sides of the city: this, as some think, in that part which was in the tribe of Judah; and the other (ver. 12), in that which was in the tribe of Benjamin (see ch. iv. 19).

Ver. 10.] The first of these repaired "against his house;" because that lay most convenient for him to bestow his cost upon it; and thereby he consulted his own safety, together with the public good.

Ver. 11.] The words we translate "the other piece," are the second measure. But what the first was we cannot tell, and therefore are ignorant of the second: perhaps, half as much as the former had repaired. "The tower of the furnaces" is mentioned again, ch. xii. 38, as near to this place (see there).

Ver. 12. And next unto him repaired Shallum—the ruler of the half part of Jerusalem;] There was another part mentioned before, verse 9.

He and his daughters.] Who are generally thought either to be heiresses, or rich widows; who piously contributed to this work.

Ver. 13.] This was called the valley of Jehoshaphat, which lay between the city and the mount of Olives; through which the brook Kidron ran, from the north to the south. The gate which led to this was the east gate; which was repaired, together with more of the wall than any others repaired, by these persons here mentioned.

Ver. 14.] He was a great man who commanded part of a city, which had its name from the vineyards that were there, as Pellicanus probably conjectures.

Ver. 15. Shallun] This man also was a great benefactor, being a considerable person, as the former was.

Unto the stairs that go down from the city of David.] Which stood upon the high hill of Zion; from whence they descended by steps to Jerusalem.

Ver. 16. Nehemiah] Of the same name but not of the same family with the writer of this book.

Azbuk, the ruler of the half part of Beth-zur, unto the place over against the sepulchres of David, and to the pool that was made, and unto the house of the mighty.

17 And after him repaired the Levites, Rehun the son of Bani. Next unto him repaired Hashabiah, the ruler of the half part of Keilah, in his part.

18 After him repaired their brethren, Bavai the son of Henadad, the ruler of the half part of Keilah.

19 And next to him repaired Ezer the son of Jeshua, the ruler of Mizpah, another piece over against the going up to the armory, at the turning of the wall.

20 After him Baruch the son of Zabbai earnestly repaired the other piece, from the turning of the wall unto the door of the house of Eliashib the high-priest.

21 After him repaired Meremoth the son of Urijah, the son of Koz, another piece, from the door of the house of Eliashib even to the end of the house of Eliashib.

22 And after him repaired the priests, the men of the plain.

23 After him repaired Benjamin and Hashub, over against their house. After him repaired

Azariah the son of Maaseiah the son of Ananiah, by his house.

24 After him repaired Binnui the son of Henadad, another piece, from the house of Azariah unto the turning of the wall, even unto the corner.

25 Palal the son of Uzai, over against the turning of the wall, and the tower which lieth out from the king's high house, that was by the court of the prison. After him Pedaiah the son of Parosh.

26 Moreover, the Nethinims dwelt in Ophel, unto the place over against the water gate toward the east, and the tower that lieth out.

27 After them the Tekoites repaired another piece, over against the great tower that lieth out, even unto the wall of Ophel.

28 From above the horse gate repaired the priests, every one over against his house.

29 After them repaired Zadok the son of Immer over against his house. After him repaired also Shemaiah the son of Shechaniah, the keeper of the east gate.

30 After him repaired Hananiah the son of Shelemiah, and Hanun the sixth son of Zalaph, another piece. After him repaired Meshullam the son of Berachiah, over against his chamber.

Unto the place over against the sepulchres of David.] Where David had a sepulchre for himself, and for his successors in the kingdom.

To the pool that was made.] This is supposed to be the place mentioned 2 Kings xx. 20.

Unto the house of the mighty.] There the king's guard were lodged, who were all mighty men of valour. But we can only guess at the sense of these words.

Ver. 17. In his part.] In his street (as Pellicanus renders it), or with the men of his part or country where he was ruler.

Ver. 18. Repaired their brethren.] Other Levites. Bavai—the ruler of the half part of Keilah.] Of the other half of the city.

Ver. 19. Another piece] Or rather, “one piece;” because another is mentioned in the next verse.

Over against the going up to the armory] There is such a place mentioned in the forest (Isa. xxii. 8), which Solomon, it is likely, made; but this was in Jerusalem, then well known, and one of the most noted places in the city, because here all warlike provision was laid up.

At the turning of the wall.] At some corner, where the wall turned another way.

Ver. 20. Earnestly repaired the other piece.] With great zeal, as if he was ashamed the work went on so slowly; or that they should repair only one piece, and leave the other undone.

From the turning of the wall] From the place before mentioned.

Unto the door of the house of Eliashib] Who had the honour to begin this good work (ver. 1).

Ver. 21.] He carried on the work from the place where the other left off, from the entrance of the house to the end of it; which being the house of a great man, we may suppose very large.

Ver. 22. After him repaired the priests, the men of the plain.] Near to Jerusalem, ch. xii. 28.

Ver. 23. After him] There was some eminent priest who engaged others with him, as Eliashib had done his brethren (ver. 1).

Benjamin and Hashub—Azariah] These were some of the tribe of Benjamin, settled in Jerusalem, who repaired over against their own doors, as far as their houses extended.

Ver. 24.] This, in all likelihood, was another of the tribe of Benjamin, who carried on the wall from the place where Azariah ended.

Ver. 25.] There are so many turnings of the wall mentioned, that none can now give an account of them, nor of the “king's high house” (which some take to have been a house built for that prospect). The “court of the prison” is often mentioned in the book of the prophet Jeremiah.

Ver. 26.] Not only the priests and Levites, but the meanest persons that belonged to the house of God, inferior officers contributed to this work. And the water-gate, it is likely, was that at which these lower ministers brought in water for the use of the temple: near to which Ophel was, which seems to have been a great tower (2 Chron. xxvii. 3). “The tower which lay out” I can give no account of; but the next verse tells us where it was.

Ver. 27.] The people of this place are mentioned before, ver. 5, whose nobles, perhaps, who at the first withdrew themselves from this work, lent their help, now that they saw every body engaged in it.

Ver. 28.] It was called the horse-gate, as some think, because they went through it to water their horses at the brook Kidron: or, there was a place for the standing of horses.

Ver. 29.] It is uncertain whether he speaks of the east gate of the city, or of the temple: but whichever it was, it seems to have been a principal gate, and therefore committed to the custody of an eminent person.

Ver. 30. After him repaired Hananiah] Some copies read after me; as if Nehemiah in modesty concealed his own work, and only intimated that he did something himself: but ours is the right reading.

And Hanun the sixth son of Zalaph, another piece.] He had more zeal, it is likely, than his elder brethren, and therefore, is here particularly noted as a worthy man, of less estate, but of more virtue than the rest of his family.

After him repaired Meshullam—over against his chamber.] Which he had, I suppose, in the temple.

Ver. 31.] It seems the Nethinims had a part of the city assigned them for their habitation, which was among the merchants: near to whom there was a house of correction (as some think the work miphkad imports), where they visited (as the Hebrews speak), that is, punished men for their faults.

Ver. 32. Between the going up of the corner unto the sheep gate.] There they began (ver. 1), and there they ended: which shows that they left not off till they had compassed the whole city with a wall, and that it was but one (as Pellicanus observes), not two or three, which was sufficient to preserve them from the incursions of their enemies.

32 And between the going up of the corner unto the sheep gate repaired the goldsmiths and the merchants.

Repaired the goldsmiths and the merchants.] Some will have these to have been their names, taken at first from their professions.

No man can think (as the same Pellicanus notes) that the names of them that repaired the walls of Jerusalem were set down so diligently, as here they are, without some rational cause for it. And the reason was, because it was a work of great virtue to love and to do honour to their country; a work of piety to restore the holy city; a religious thing to defend the true worshippers of God, that they might serve him in quietness and safety; and a courageous thing, in the midst of so many enemies, to go on with this work in a pious confidence of the power of God to support them. The names, therefore, of such persons deserved to be preserved and transmitted to future generations, as a most noble example to them.

CHAPTER IV.

1 While the enemies scoff, Nehemiah prayeth and continueth the work. 7 Understanding the wrath and secrets of the enemy, he setteth a watch. 13 He armeth the labourers, 19 and giveth military precepts.

1 BUT it came to pass, that when Sanballat heard that we builded the wall, he was wroth, and took great indignation, and mocked the Jews.

2 And he spake before his brethren and the army of Samaria, and said, What do these feeble Jews? will they fortify themselves? will they sacrifice? will they make an end in a day? will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the rubbish which are burned?

3 Now Tobiah the Ammonite was by him, and he said, Even that which they build, if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stone wall.

4 Hear, O our God; for we are despised: and turn their reproach upon their own head, and give them for a prey in the land of captivity;

5 And cover not their iniquity, and let not their sin be blotted out from before thee: for they have provoked thee to anger before the builders.

6 So built we the wall; and all the wall was

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. Though he boiled inwardly with anger, yet he seemed to condemn that which he feared, and scoffed at the Jews.

Ver. 2. He spake before his brethren, and the army of Samaria.] By "his brethren" are meant the commanders-in-chief in those parts; who mustered, I suppose, all their forces in Samaria, as if they intended to invade the Jews, and hinder the work they were about.

What do these feeble Jews? &c.] But first he exposes them to scorn, as a people that had no power. He heard there were so many hands at work, as if they meant to build the wall, and keep a feast, and dedicate it by sacrifice, all in one day; and so takes an occasion to laugh at their foolish diligence, and the haste they made, as if they could begin and end at once. He represents it as impossible they should repair the wall, unless they could make the broken pieces, which were also mouldered, to become whole stones again.

Ver. 3. Now Tobiah the Ammonite was by him.] One of "his brethren," mentioned in the verse before going.

If a fox go up, he shall even break down their stone wall.] Foxes abounded in that country, especially about Jerusalem, since its devastation (Lam. v. 18). At the wall of which Tobiah jeered, saying, It was so low that those creatures might leap over it; and so weak, that they might throw it down, or break through it. This opinion, it is likely, made them neglect to interrupt them in their building till it was too late.

Ver. 4. Hear, O our God; for we are despised: and turn their reproach upon their own head.] He beseeches God to take such notice of their scoffs, that, as they now despised his people, so they themselves might be laughed to scorn, and had in derision.

Give them for a prey in the land of captivity;] And carry them far away from the captives into some other land.

Ver. 5. Cover not their iniquity, and let not their sin be blotted out from before thee:] This seems something harsh, that he should pray they might never be forgiven; but he spake by the spirit of prophecy, as David did in Ps. cix. they being of such a malicious and implacable spirit against God and his people, that he foresaw they would never be capable of his mercy, but be utterly destroyed by him. And, indeed, there were several oracles upon which this prayer was grounded, and it was confirmed by the destruction of these nations by the Maccabees and their successors.

For they have provoked thee to anger before the builders.] By scoffing at them, and discouraging them in the work, which was for God's honour, and for the safety of his people. And therefore it highly provoked him that these men should set themselves with such spite against it.

joined together unto the half thereof: for the people had a mind to work.

7 ¶ But it came to pass, that when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and the Arabians, and the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites, heard that the walls of Jerusalem were made up, and that the breaches began to be stopped, then they were very wroth.

8 And conspired all of them together to come and to fight against Jerusalem, and to hinder it.

9 Nevertheless we made our prayer unto our God, and set a watch against them day and night, because of them.

10 And Judah said, The strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed, and there is much rubbish; so that we are not able to build the wall.

11 And our adversaries said, They shall not know, neither see, till we come in the midst among them, and slay them, and cause the work to cease.

12 And it came to pass, that when the Jews which dwelt by them came, they said unto us ten times, From all places whence ye shall return unto us they will be upon you.

13 ¶ Therefore set I in the lower places behind the wall, and on the higher places, I even set the people after their families with their swords, their spears, and their bows.

14 And I looked, and rose up, and said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, Be not ye afraid of them: remember the Lord, which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters, your wives, and your houses.

15 And it came to pass, when our enemies heard that it was known unto us, and God had brought their counsel to nought, that we returned all of us to the wall, every one unto his work.

16 And it came to pass from that time forth, that the half of my servants wrought in the work, and the other half of them held both the spears, the shields, and the bows, and the habergeons; and the rulers were behind all the house of Judah.

17 They which builded on the wall, and they that bare burdens, with those that laded, every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon.

18 For the builders, every one had his sword girded by his side, and so builded. And he that sounded the trumpet was by me.

19 ¶ And I said unto the nobles, and to the

Ver. 6. All the wall was joined together unto the half thereof:] Till it was raised to the half of its height.

For the people had a mind to work.] Were very much set upon it, and went about it cheerfully, notwithstanding their jeers and contempt.

Ver. 7. When Sanballat, and Tobiah, and the Arabians, and the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites,] Some of these people were never mentioned before; and therefore this shows, that Sanballat endeavoured to draw all the neighbouring nations into a confederacy against the Jews.

That the breaches began to be stopped,] It seems the Chaldeans had not entirely thrown down the walls, but contented themselves to make wide breaches and gaps in them.

Then they were very wroth.] So incensed, that it moved them to take the following resolution.

Ver. 8.] The last words in the Hebrew are, "to make an error in it;" that is, to put them by the work, or to make them not know which way to turn themselves.

Ver. 9.] They committed themselves to the protection of the Almighty, whose servants they were, keeping a constant watch, that they might not be surprised, for they knew them to be very vigilant to do mischief.

Ver. 10. The strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed,] They had wrought so long and so hard, that some of the Jews told him the labourers were quite spent.

There is much rubbish; so that we are not able to build the wall.] There was still a great deal of rubbish remaining, more than they were able to remove; and therefore they must desist, at least for the present, from building the wall.

Ver. 11.] They pretended also to have intelligence, that the forenamed enemies did not intend to appear with an army before Jerusalem, but to march so secretly, that they should have no notice of their approach till they saw them in the city, and put them to the sword.

Ver. 12. When the Jews which dwell by them came, they said unto us ten times,] But there were some Jews who were neighbours to that people that found out their designs, and came to inform them of it a great many times: for ten times signify a great many in scripture (see Gen. xxi. 7).

From all places whence ye shall return unto us they will be upon you.] The words in the Hebrew are no more than these, "from all places whence they return unto us" (there being no words answering to those, "they will be upon you"); if any words be added, they should be "they informed us of our danger."

Ver. 13. Therefore set I in the lower places behind the wall.] Where the wall was not yet raised to its just height (ver. 6).

On the higher places,] Where it was completely finished.

With their swords, their spears,] With such weapons as they were furnished withal.

Ver. 14.] When he saw how they were disposed, he rose up and made this speech to them. All was at stake, therefore he exhorts them to be valiant, trusting in God, who was stronger than all their enemies.

Ver. 15.] When they heard their plot was discovered, and they had no hope to surprise us, but we were ready to receive them, they laid aside their designs, and we went on with ours.

Ver. 16.] But, lest their enemies should imagine they were secure, and had quite laid aside their arms, and so might resume their enterprise, he ordered, that while half of his own servants wrought upon ^{the} walls, another half should stand by with weapons, ready to put into their hands, if there were occasion. The rest, I suppose, followed this example; and the rulers stood at their backs to encourage them, and put them forward in their work.

Ver. 17.] That is, they were well appointed for both, to build and to fight. For it is a figurative speech: it not being possible for them to work if both hands had not been at liberty. And the next verse saith, their swords were by their sides.

Ver. 18.] This expounds the foregoing words.

He that sounded the trumpet was by me.] To give the alarm, if need should be, and so call them unto rulers, and to the rest of the people, The work is great and large, and we are separated upon the wall, one far from another.

20 In what place therefore ye hear the sound of the trumpet, resort ye thither unto us: our God shall fight for us.

21 So we laboured in the work: and half of them held the spears from the rising of the morning till the stars appeared.

him for orders. It appears by this that he was continually with them while they wrought.

Ver. 19.] In several quarters of it, some of which were at a good distance from others.

Ver. 20.] For while they lay scattered, they could not oppose their enemies successfully; but being united with him, and under his direction and conduct, he bids them not doubt of God's protection.

Ver. 21. Half of them held the spears] For the use of every man, if there should be occasion.

From the rising of the morning till the stars appeared.] All the day long, from break of day till it was quite night.

Ver. 22.] It is likely, that many of them at night went into the suburbs, or neighbouring villages, and lodged there; but he would have them all lodge in Jerusalem, for the greater security of the city in the night, and that they might be more ready to work in the morning.

Ver. 23. None of us put off our clothes.] He, and his kindred, and family, and guard, gave them a noble 22 Likewise at the same time said I unto the people, Let every one with his servant lodge within Jerusalem, that in the night they may be a guard to us, and labour on the day.

23 So neither I, nor my brethren, nor my servants, nor the men of the guard which followed me, none of us put off our clothes, saving that every one put them off for washing.

example; for none of them put off their clothes when they went to bed, but lay in them, that they might be more ready to fight if any assault was made on the city.

Saving that everyone put them off for washing.] These last words are variously expounded by interpreters, and the fewest approve of our translation. Rabbi Solomon repeats the word not; "They put not off their clothes, no, not for washing." The Hebrew word is water, which some here take for "the water of the feet," as the Hebrews speak, and make the sense to be, "no, not when they made water." De Dieu quite contrary, "except only to make water." But it is a more simple sense, "Every man had his sword ready when he made water." So the word shicho may be rendered, as we translate it in the margin, "every man went with his weapon for water." But Grotius follows our translation, and takes these words for an exception to what went before; and the plain meaning is, they put off their garments only for those ablutions which the law required, or custom had introduced.

CHAPTER V.

1 The Jews complain of their debt, mortgage, and causeth them to make a covenant of restitution. 14 He forbeareth his own allowance, and keepeth hospitality.

1 AND there was a great cry of the people and of their wives against their brethren the Jews.

2 For there were that said, We, our sons, and our daughters, are many: therefore we take up corn for them, that we may eat, and live.

3 Some also there were that said, We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards, and houses, that we might buy corn, because of the dearth.

4 There were also that said, We have borrowed money for the king's tribute, and that upon our lands and vineyards.

5 Yet now our flesh is as the flesh of our brethren, our children as their children: and lo, we

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1.] At this time there was a grievous complaint of the poor against their rich brethren: for though they were cured of their idolatry by their captivity, yet they were not cured of their other sins, but loved strange women, as we read before in the book of Ezra; and were so covetous, that they oppressed the poor and needy; and this at a time when their enemies threatened the destruction of them all. But this was the more heinous crime, because the twentieth of Artaxerxes, wherein this was done, began about the end of a sabbatic year (as Dr. Alix observes), which raised the cry of the poor to a greater height against their creditors, who exacted their debts of them contrary to the law (Deut. xv. 3), which was read to them publicly in such a year (Deut. xxxi. 12). For it was of such moment, that it moved Nehemiah to make the Jews take a solemn oath that they would observe this law, and release all the debts that were owing to them in this year (ch. x. of this book, ver. 31).

Ver. 2. We, our sons, and our daughters are many.] They had numerous families.

Therefore we take up corn for them, that we may eat, and live.] They had no way to keep them from starving, but by buying corn for them at unreasonable rates; which the rich demanded when they saw them in such necessity, that they must pay what they asked or die.

Ver. 3.] There had been a great scarcity for want of rain; which God denied, because they minded building their own houses more than his, as we read Hag. i. 9—11. Now the effects of such droughts caused among the people great scarcity of provisions, in which the rich had no compassion on their poor brethren, but forced them to sell all they had for bread.

Ver. 4.] They do not complain that they were constrained to borrow money, but that they could not have it without taking it upon usury, as it appears from ver. 7, which was contrary to the law of God (Exod. xxii. 25, &c.); otherwise they could not have paid their tribute to the king of Persia, who laid it upon all his subjects every where (Ezra iv. 13; vii. 24).

Ver. 5. Yet now our flesh is as the flesh of our brethren.] They represent very pathetically that there was no difference between them and their brethren, but bring into bondage our sons and our daughters to be servants, and some of our daughters are brought unto bondage already, neither is it in our power to redeem them; for other men have our lands and vineyards.

6 ¶ And I was very angry when I heard their cry, and these words.

7 ¶ Then I consulted with myself, and I rebuked the nobles, and the rulers, and said unto them, Ye exact usury, every one of his brother. And I set a great assembly against them:

8 And I said unto them, We, after our ability, have redeemed our brethren the Jews, which were sold unto the heathen; and will ye even that they were poor, and the other rich; for they were all Jews of the same stock, from the same original, all alike circumcised: so that by nature, and by the favour of God, they were every way the same, and therefore ought to enjoy the same freedom that they and their children did.

We bring into bondage our sons and our daughters to be servants,] In case of great necessity this was lawful, Exod. xxi. 7. But they were very void of compassion, who forced their brethren to do a thing so much against nature. Some of the tender sex, who were least able to endure hardship, they had been already forced to part withal.

Neither is it in our power to redeem them;] Their condition was very lamentable, for none would lend them money freely; and to pay their usury, they were forced to sell their children, whom they had not power to redeem, because their lands were mortgaged to those oppressors: so that they were in a worse condition than when they were in Babylon, being not in so much danger to be devoured by their cruel neighbours (who sought their destruction), as by their barbarous friends and neighbours.

Ver. 6.] It could not but move his indignation, to hear them complain one of another; but much more when he heard the reason.

Ver. 7. Then I consulted with myself,] It is not safe to do any thing in a fit of anger; but coolly to consider and deliberate what is fit to be done.

I rebuked the nobles and the rulers,] Whom he did not fear to reprove severely, when he found them in fault.

Ye exact usury, every one of his brother.] And that a very heavy one; such as was used among the heathen, called centesima, the "hundredth part" (ver. 11), which was twelve per cent.

I set a great assembly against them.] That he might put them to the greater shame. For this great assembly I take to be the whole body of the people, with their judges, as Bertram observes, De Repub. Jud. p. 171 (see Ezra x. 8, 14).

Ver. 8. We after our ability] Either he speaks of himself in the plural number, as great men are wont to do; or he means, he, with Ezra, and such like lovers of their country, had done what follows.

Have redeemed our brethren the Jews, which were sold unto the heathen;] Had done their utmost to deliver the Jews out of the captivity of Babylon; whereby they were restored both to their own country, and to their liberty. And perhaps they had with their own money procured the freedom of such as were slaves to some of the Babylonians; who would not part with them, when they desired to go to Jerusalem, unless they were paid the price of them, being their own proper goods.

Will ye even sell your brethren?] For that they might expect, since their parents could not redeem them.

sell your brethren? or shall they be sold unto us? Then held they their peace, and found nothing to answer.

9 Also I said, It is not good that ye do: ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God, because of the reproach of the heathen our enemies?

10 I likewise, and my brethren, and my servants, might exact of them money and corn: I pray you, let us leave off this usury.

11 Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their olive-yards, and their houses, also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and the oil, that ye exact of them.

Or shall they be sold unto us?] Must I redeem them out of your hands, as I have helped to redeem some out of Babylon!

Then held they their peace,] There was such an express law of God against them (Deut. xxiii. 19), that they had nothing to reply: and therefore were silent because they could neither deny the fact, nor were able to justify it.

Ver. 9. It is not good that ye do:] This encouraged him to proceed in his reprehension; and to tell them that they had committed a great sin. For that is the meaning of "it is not good:" a soft form of speech, used when they mean it is very bad; Prov. xvi. 29, and many other places.

Ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God,] Being so lately delivered by him from oppression, and having so many enemies about them, to observe what they did.

Because of the reproach of the heathen] Who might justly upbraid them with inhumanity; and thereupon reproach their religion.

Ver. 10. I likewise, and my brethren, and my servants, might exact of them money and corn:] As a reward of their care and diligence in the public service.

I pray you, let us leave off this usury,] But what then would become of the poor people, who were too much oppressed already? And therefore he beseeches them to leave off this usury; seeing he and his rather waived their own right, than demanded any thing for their labour and toil in the discharge of their offices.

Ver. 11. Restore, — their lands, &c.] Though they had lent money upon the security of those lands, &c. yet, since they were the possessions of the poor, who were reduced to great straits, and could not pay them, he beseeches them to restore them, and that without delay.

Also the hundredth part of the money,] The hundredth part was an usury then practised in those countries, as afterward among the Romans; which was the hundredth part of what was lent every month; so that every year they paid the eighth part of the principal: thus it is commonly said. But Salmastius hath observed, that in the eastern countries there were never any laws to determine what interest should be taken for money lent for a day, or a week, or a month, or a year (for there were all these sorts of usury), but every one was left to demand what he pleased; and according to what was agreed they paid for what was borrowed; therefore we cannot certainly tell whether this was heavy or light usury. But among the Greeks and Romans there was a measure set (as he notes in his book De Fœnore Trapezitico), and ἑκατοστή, the hundredth part, was among the Greeks the lowest usury; though it was more or less in several ages, as he there shows, and in his book De Modis Usurarum, where he notes the difference between the Greeks and Romans in this matter, cap. vi. p. 230, &c.

Ver. 12.] They readily consented to restore their 12 Then said they, We will restore them, and will require nothing of them; so will we do as thou sayest. Then I called the priests, and took an oath of them, that they should do according to this promise.

13 Also I shook my lap, and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labour, that performeth not this promise, even thus be he shaken out, and emptied. And all the congregation said, Amen, and praised the LORD. And the people did according to this promise.

14 ¶ Moreover, from the time that I was appointed to be their governor in the land of Judah, from the twentieth year even unto the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that is, twelve years, I and my brethren have not eaten the bread of the governor.

15 But the former governors that had been before me were chargeable unto the people, and lands, vineyards, and houses, and demand no interest for the money. They so entirely agreed to what he desired, that it made a kind of jubilee among the people; for, no doubt, there was great joy when this was done. While they were in this good mind he called the priests and made them swear in their presence, who were witness to it, that they would keep their word.

Ver. 13.] He prayed God that they might lose all they had, who did not make good their promise; and predicted their poverty by an external sign, as the manner of the prophets was to do. For, holding up the skirts of his garment, and then scattering them abroad, he represented how God would cast them out of their possessions, and the fruit of their labours, who did not observe this oath. God so wrought upon the people's hearts, that even they who had been guilty of taking usury, consented to this imprecation, and wished the same mischief to themselves, if they did not do as he required. And, which was more, they praised God, who had given them such a governor, and put into them this good mind, to submit unto him.

The people did according to this promise.] Made an immediate restitution of what had been mortgaged to them, and released them of their obligation for money.

Ver. 14. From the time that I was appointed to be their governor in the land of Judah,—that is, twelve years.] All which time he was not in Judea; but he ordered him, who was his deputy, in his absence, to do as he did.

I and my brethren] He and his domestics; or those whom, as I said, he deputed in his room.

Have not eaten the bread of the governor.] Taken the allowances which were made to the governors, appointed by the kings of Persia, to provide them a table. Which it was but reasonable they should have: that they who did the public business should be maintained at the public charge. But he would not do that which was lawful, when he saw it would be burdensome to his countrymen, and therefore lived upon his own estate which he had in Judea, and upon the salary which he had as cup-bearer to the king of Persia; in whose service, it is likely, he had enriched himself before he came to Jerusalem.

Ver. 15. But the former governors] Who these were he doth not say, but spares their names, it being sufficient to declare he did not imitate them, whosever they were. Nor doth he relate how much bread and wine they exacted, but only that they had besides forty shekels of silver every day, I suppose, to make provision of other things for their table. But from these words Scaliger concludes that before Nehemiah had taken of them bread and wine, beside forty shekels of silver; yea, even their servants bare rule over the people: but so did not I, because of the fear of God.

16 Yea, also, I continued in the work of this wall, neither bought we any land: and all my servants were gathered thither unto the work.

17 Moreover, there were at my table an hundred and fifty of the Jews and rulers, beside those that came unto us from among the heathen that are about us.

18 Now that which was prepared for me daily was one ox and six choice sheep; also fowls were prepared for me, and once in ten days store of all sorts of wine: yet for all this required not I the bread of the governor, because the bondage was heavy upon this people.

19 Think upon me, my God, for good, according to all that I have done for this people.

and Ezra there had been other governors placed over them by the kings of Persia. And if we may believe the Jewish Annals, compiled by the author of Seder Olam Zuta, the first governor, Zerubbabel, returning from Jerusalem to Babylon, died there: and was succeeded in his government of Judea by his son Meshullam, and after him by his grandson Chananiah.

Yea, even their servants bare rule over the people.] They connived at the exactions of their servants, who demanded what they pleased.

But so did not I, because of the fear of God.] It was not vain-glory that made him thus generous, but his love to God, and to his country; for he loved religion better than riches; and took not his own due, that the people might serve God more cheerfully.

Ver. 16. Yea also I continued in the work of this wall.] And all this while he took as much pains as any of them, in building the wall of Jerusalem.

Neither bought we any land.] Which they might have done of the poor at an easy price, if they had desired wealth: but they would not make any advantage to themselves of other men's necessities.

All my servants were gathered thither unto the work.] They were constantly employed also in the same work, and received no pay for their labour, though it could not be done without neglect of his private business.

Ver. 17.] This was the greater expense, because they were not inferior people that were entertained at his table, but persons of quality among the Jews and strangers who came about business, and perhaps, brought him intelligence concerning the state of the neighbouring heathen, and of their designs.

Ver. 18. That which was prepared for me daily was one ox and six choice sheep, &c.] This shows that he kept a noble house, as we speak; and indeed, it was very becoming a great man to entertain great persons, both of his own country and strangers, with magnificence.

The bondage was heavy upon this people.] They could not without great hardship maintain themselves.

Ver. 19.] He expected his reward only from God, who he hoped would show him the same kindness that he had done for his people. There is no reason to think he speaks too much of himself, and his own worthy acts; for it was no more than was necessary in such a state of things, that posterity might be furnished with an excellent example of extraordinary virtue; and no more than St. Paul was constrained to speak of himself in his Epistle to the Corinthians; of whom he would take nothing, that he might stop the mouths of false apostles, and covetous people (see ch. xiii. 22).

CHAPTER VI.

1 Sanballat practiseth by craft, by rumours, by hired prophecies, to terrify Nehemiah. 15 The work is finished to the terror of the enemies. 17 Secret intelligence passeth between the enemies and the nobles of Judah.

1 Now it came to pass, when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and Geshem the Arabian, and the rest of our enemies, heard that I had builded the wall, and that there was no breach left therein, (though at that time I had not set up the doors upon the gates);

2 That Sanballat and Geshem sent unto me, saying, Come, let us meet together in some one of the villages in the plain of Ono. But they thought to do me mischief.

3 And I sent messengers unto them, saying, I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down: why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you?

4 Yet they sent unto me four times after this sort; and I answered them after the same manner.

5 Then sent Sanballat his servant unto me in like manner the fifth time with an open letter in his hand;

6 Wherein was written, It is reported among the heathen, and Gashmu saith it, that thou and the Jews think to rebel: for which cause thou buildest the wall, that thou mayest be their king, according to these words.

7 And thou hast also appointed prophets to preach of thee at Jerusalem, saying, There is a king in Judah: and now shall it be reported to the king according to these words. Come now therefore, and let us take counsel together.

8 Then I sent unto him, saying, There are no such things done as thou sayest, but thou feignest them out of thine own heart.

9 For they all made us afraid, saying, Their hands shall be weakened from the work, that it be not done. Now therefore, O God, strengthen my hands.

10 Afterward I came unto the house of Shemaiah the son of Delaiah the son of Mehetabeel, who was shut up; and he said, Let us meet to-

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. When Sanballat, and Tobiah, &c.] Mentioned ch. iv. 7.

Though at that time I had not set up the doors upon the gates;] Not upon all of them, though some had been set up at the charge of particular persons (ch. iii. 3, 6, 13, &c.)

Ver. 2. Come, let us meet together] Either to consult about the common good of their several provinces wherein they governed (of which perhaps they pretended they were to give an account to their master), or to establish a friendship and good correspondence one with another, or some such purpose.

In the plain of Ono.] A place in the tribe of Benjamin, ch. xi. 25; 2 Chron. viii. 12 (see there).

But they thought to do me mischief.] He would not trust them, suspecting they intended to kill him; of which, perhaps, he had received some private intelligence.

Ver. 3.] He showed so much respect to them, as not to return an answer by those whom they sent to him, but despatched a messenger of his own to them. He did not know any business they could have with him of such great concernment, as that which he had in hand; and therefore he would not put a stop to it to confer with them. This was one reason, but not the only one for his refusal.

Ver. 4.] They were restlessly bent upon his destruction, and therefore importuned him often to give them a meeting. For they thought, I suppose, if they did not take this opportunity to overthrow what he had done, before he set up the doors upon the gates, they should never be able to enter the city afterward. He still persisted constantly to give no other answer; whereby they might understand he was resolved to finish the work.

Ver. 5.] There is no mention of Tobiah in all the foregoing negotiation, and now Geshem is left out; and Sanballat alone sent him a message, pretending, it is likely, special respect and kindness unto him, in informing him what was laid to his charge. Certain it is, he was the great contriver and manager of all the mischief intended against him. Before the message was delivered by word of mouth, but now by letter; yet open that every one might see of what he was accused.

Ver. 6. It is reported among the heathen.] The report was spread among the nations thereabout.

Gashmu] The same, I suppose, with Geshem, mentioned ver. 1.

Saith it,] Undertakes to prove it.

That thou mayest be their king, according to these words.] That he might establish his authority, and reign over them according to the common report.

Ver. 7. Thou hast also appointed prophets to preach of thee at Jerusalem.] This was cunningly suggested, that he might not think there was any prophet on his side: as indeed there was, for he had corrupted Shemaiah, as it presently follows.

Come now therefore, and let us take counsel together.] How they should wipe off this suspicion, if it should be put into the king's mind, as he told him it certainly would.

Ver. 8. Then I sent unto him.] In an open letter, I suppose, that every body might see it.

There are no such things done] Nothing done to give a jealousy of a rebellion; nor any prophet that encouraged it.

But thou feignest them] He had invented this report to defame Nehemiah, without any ground for it.

Ver. 9.] Their business was to contrive false stories, to put the Jews in fear; being confident they would be discouraged by such reports, as some were. Therefore he beseeches God to strengthen him that he might support others.

Ver. 10. I came unto the house of Shemaiah] Who was a prophet (it appears from ver. 12), whom, it is likely, Nehemiah took to be his friend, and therefore went to consult and advise with him at his house.

Who was shut up;] Out of fear he pretended; and by this action would have had Nehemiah to understand what he himself should do for his own security: for it was the manner of the prophets to instruct the people by actions and signs, as well as by words. But others think he "shut himself up," that is, retired, as a holy man, from the affairs of the world, to spend his time in meditation and prayer in some of gether in the house of God, within the temple, and let us shut the doors of the temple; for they will come to slay thee; yea, in the night will they come to slay thee.

11 And I said, Should such a man as I flee? and who is there, that, being as I am, would go into the temple to save his life? I will not go in.

12 And, lo, I perceived that God had not sent him; but that he pronounced this prophecy against me: for Tobiah and Sanballat had hired him.

13 Therefore was he hired, that I should be afraid, and do so, and sin, and that they might have matter for an evil report, that they might reproach me.

the chambers of the temple; whither he advised Nehemiah to retire, and to take sanctuary there from the great dangers to which he was exposed.

Let us meet together in the house of God, within the temple, &c.] By "the temple" he means the outward court of it, where he had a chamber; whither, as a friend in whom Nehemiah confided, he prayed him to come, that they might meet and consult together how to preserve Jerusalem, and where he might be safe himself from his enemies; who could not easily enter in there, it being a strong place, and besides, privileged by its holiness, unto which even heathens, perhaps, might have such regard as not to violate it; whereas the gates of Jerusalem were not yet in such a condition as to keep them out. By this means he hoped Nehemiah would become contemptible, when the people saw his cowardice; and the Jews would be disheartened, as much as their enemies took courage. And, perhaps, he intended, with some priests, his confederates, to seize on him, and deliver him into the hands of Sanballat; at least, it would give some countenance to the calumny he had raised, of his affecting to be king; because he fled from his work, and durst not stand upon his integrity. Shemaiah also might think hereby to draw him in to offend God, by coming into that court where the priests only might come, and where it is supposed this prophet now was.

Yea, in the night will they come to slay thee.] I take the meaning to be, Even this very night will they fall upon thee; therefore consult thy safety, by fleeing hither.

Ver. 11. Should such a man as I flee? Who am a governor, and ought to give a good example of undaunted courage; and have professed to put great confidence in God; and hitherto been marvellously preserved by him, and assisted in his undertaking.

I will not go in.] There might have been colour for this advice, if Jerusalem had been an open place, without any walls, without armed men in it, or that had no courage to defend it: but they had appeared on the walls to defend it (ch. iv. 13), and being so well appointed, he was resolved still to rely on God, and on their fidelity and valour; and not be so base as to desert them, till they deserted him; which they might well do, if they saw him flee from them for fear.

Ver. 12. He pronounced this prophecy against me:] Not to secure him, but to betray him; as he plainly discovered in a little time: which showed there was no such danger, as this false prophet pretended.

For Tobiah and Sanballat had hired him.] Tobiah was not idle all this time, but it is likely invented this plot, to bribe this man to be a false prophet:

14 My God, think thou upon Tobiah and Sanballat according to these their works, and on the prophetess Noadiah, and the rest of the prophets, that would have put me in fear.

15 ¶ So the wall was finished in the twenty and fifth day of the month Elul, in fifty and two days.

16 And it came to pass, that when all our enemies heard thereof, and all the heathen that were about us saw these things, they were much cast down in their own eyes: for they perceived that this work was wrought of our God.

17 ¶ Moreover in those days the nobles of Judah sent many letters unto Tobiah, and the letters of Tobiah came unto them.

18 For there were many in Judah sworn unto which, perhaps, was discovered to Nehemiah by some undoubted prophets of God, who were on their side.

Ver. 13. That I should be afraid, and do so, and sin.] That they might draw him in to offend God, by distrusting his care of him; and dishonour himself by base cowardice.

That they might reproach me.] As a man guilty of what they accused him.

Ver. 14. My God, think thou upon Tobiah and Sanballat] Their calumnies, and malicious contrivances, and foul practices, which he hoped God would take a time to punish. The wicked temper of this people is very wonderful, who had already got false prophets among them, both men and women, whom Nehemiah did not think fit as a judge to punish, but left them to the judgment of God. Nor do we read that he informed the king of Persia of the foul dealings of these men (which certainly he would have punished), but prayed God to reward them after their deeds: for he would have all know that he depended wholly upon the power of God to enable him to perfect this work, and not upon the help of human force.

Ver. 15.] Which may seem incredible to those who do not reflect what a great number of people (who were not hired, but voluntarily) engaged in this work, and how full they were of zeal, and that the foundation of the wall was not razed by the Chaldeans; nay, there were some pieces of it standing, only great gaps being made in it. And other histories acquaint us with the like diligence; particularly Arrianus and Curtius relate, that Alexander the Great built the walls of Alexandria (which was seven miles in compass) in the space of twenty days.

Ver. 16. When all our enemies heard thereof,] When they heard how all the designs of their enemies were disappointed, and saw Jerusalem was built, and flourished.

They perceived that this work was wrought of our God.] Being finished in so short a time, beyond all expectation, and in the midst of great fears and sad apprehension.

Ver. 17.] To add to all the other wickedness of this nation, there were false brethren among their great men, who held a correspondence with their most pestilent enemies against Nehemiah.

Ver. 18. For there were many in Judah sworn unto him,] Against the interest of their country, and of their religion; to such a height of impiety were many arrived.

Because he was the son in law of Shechoniah the son of Arah;] So dangerous were marriages with foreigners, which Ezra therefore had great reasons to make void; for by these alliances they were engaged in wicked designs against their country.

Ver. 19. They reported his good deeds before me,] To such an impudence were they arrived, that they him, because he was the son-in-law of Sheehaniah the son of Arah: and his son Johanan had taken the daughter of Meshullam the son of Berechiah.

highly commended him as a very worthy man in the presence of Nehemiah, who knew so much of his wickedness.

And uttered my words to him.] Or informed him of all that Nehemiah did. For so we translate in the margin, matters, not words.

19 Also they reported his good deeds before me, and uttered my words to him. And Tobiah sent letters to put me in fear.

Tobiah sent letters to put me in fear.] Still continued such practices as are mentioned ver. 6, that if it were possible they might put him into such fear as would move him to do something to disgrace himself.

CHAPTER VII.

1 Nehemiah committeth the charge of Jerusalem to Hanani and Hananiah. 5 A register of the genealogy of them which came at the first out of Babylon, 9 of the people, 39 of the priests, 43 of the Levites, 46 of the Nethinims, 57 of Solomon's servants, 63 and of the priests which could not find their pedigree. 66 The whole number of them, with their substance. 70 Their oblations.

1 Now it came to pass, when the wall was built, and I had set up the doors, and the porters and the singers and the Levites were appointed,

2 That I gave my brother Hanani, and Hananiah the ruler of the palace, charge over Jerusalem: for he was a faithful man, and feared God above many:

3 And I said unto them, Let not the gates of Jerusalem be opened until the sun be hot; and while they stand by, let them shut the doors, and bar them: and appoint watches of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, every one in his watch, and every one to be over against his house.

7 Now the city was large and great: but the people were few therein, and the houses were not builded.

5 ¶ And my God put into mine heart to gather together the nobles, and the rulers, and the people, that they might be reckoned by genealogy: and I found a register of the genealogy of them which came up at the first, and found written therein,

6 These are the children of the province, that went up out of the captivity, of those that had been carried away, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away, and came again to Jerusalem and to Judah, every one unto his city;

7 Who came with Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Nehe-

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1.] The porters were to attend the gates; but what the Levites and the singers had to do there is not easily resolved; perhaps they were to be ready against the time that the wall should be dedicated, which is mentioned ch. xii.

Ver. 2. That I gave my brother Hanani,] Who was the man that came from Jerusalem to Shushan, to acquaint him with the deplorable condition of the city, and implore his help (ch. i. 2).

Hananiah the ruler of the palace,] So the house where Nehemiah dwelt is called, because he was governor for the king, and a kind of viceroy, who did all the king's business, and here gave audience to all people, as the king was wont to do in his palace. He made Hanani, I suppose, principal governor over Jerusalem, and Hananiah was his assistant and deputy.

For he was a faithful man, and feared God above many.] He saith nothing of Hanani, who was well known to be zealous for God and for his country, by the journey he took to Shushan (which I before mentioned); but he gives the reason why he joined Hananiah with him, because he knew he might be trusted, being a man of conscience, who acted out of religious principles, which a great many in those days did not. The reason why he took this care for the city, it is likely, was, because he himself was returning to Shushan, to give the king an account of the state of affairs in Judea; and therefore placed such men in Jerusalem as he knew would faithfully secure it in his absence.

Ver. 3. Let not the gates of Jerusalem be opened until the sun be hot;] Till it had been risen a good while, that they might see clearly round about them, and that all the people might be ready in case of any danger. And at night he charges them to stand by and see the gates shut and barred in their presence. Or, as some expound it, they should not suffer any man to stir till they shut the gates, lest through carelessness they should chance to be left open. So De Dieu renders the words, "While the standers-by shut the gates, hold them fast;" that is, he gave them power to keep all there present, and not let them go away till this was done. The gates being shut, he charges them to set the watch in proper places; every one keeping watch in that part which was next to his own house.

Ver. 4. The city was large and great:] And therefore required many watches.

But the people were few therein,] In comparison with the bigness of the city.

The houses were not builded.] That is, not all that had been in former times, but a great deal of ground still lay waste.

Ver. 5. My God put into mine heart to gather together the nobles,] Whatsoever good motion came into his mind he ascribed it to God, and not to his own prudent consideration, though that was employed in this business. For without God we can do nothing, who ought therefore to be in all our thoughts.

That they might be reckoned by genealogy.] That, by knowing of what family they were, and where they formerly dwelt, he might recall those of them whose habitations had heretofore been in Jerusalem, to come and settle there again, now that the wall was built, and they might dwell there in safety.

I found a register] The words following.

Ver. 6.] These are the very words which we read miah, Azariah, Raamiah, Nahamani, Mordecai, Bilshan, Mispereth, Bigvai, Nehum, Baanah. The number I say, of the men of the people of Israel was this;

8 The children of Parosh, two thousand an hundred seventy and two.

9 The children of Shephatiah, three hundred seventy and two.

10 The children of Arah, six hundred fifty and two.

11 The children of Pahath-moab, of the children of Jeshua and Joab, two thousand and eight hundred and eighteen.

35 The children of Harim, three hundred and twenty.

36 The children of Jericho, three hundred forty and five.

37 The children of Lod, Hadid, and Ono, seven hundred twenty and one.

38 The children of Senaah, three thousand nine hundred and thirty.

39 ¶ The priests: the children of Jedaiah, of the house of Jeshua, nine hundred seventy and three.

40 The children of Immer, a thousand fifty and two.

41 The children of Pashur, a thousand two hundred forty and seven.

42 The children of Harim, a thousand and seventeen.

43 ¶ The Levites: the children of Jeshua, of Kadmiel, and of the children of Hodevah, seventy and four.

56 The children of Nezhiah, the children of Hatipha.

in the second chapter of Ezra, ver. 1, &c. from whence he seems to have transcribed them, and added something to them.

Ver. 7.] He that is here called Azariah, is called there Seraiah; and there are some other small differences in the name, but all the same, only here Nahamani is added.

Ver. 8.] I shall not transcribe all this genealogy, concerning which I have nothing to observe, but that in some few things it differs from that in Ezra (see my annotations on Ezra ii. 5). There are also some families named here which are not in Ezra, as in ver. 22, 48—52, which are all omitted in Ezra. For it must be considered, that one of these accounts was taken by Ezra in Babylon, the other by Nehemiah in Judea: and therefore it is no wonder that a greater number are sometimes mentioned in Nehemiah than in Ezra; for in the first account that was taken of them, many were ignorant of their genealogy; but before the last, the book of their genealogy was found: and yet in

60 All the Nethinims, and the children of Solomon's servants, were three hundred ninety and two.

61 And these were they which went up also from Tel-melah, Tel-haresha, Cherub, Addon, and Immer: but they could not show their father's house, nor their seed, whether they were of Israel.

62 The children of Delaiah, the children of Tobiah, the children of Nekoda, six hundred forty and two.

63 ¶ And of the priests: the children of Habaiah, the children of Koz, the children of Barzillai, which took one of the daughters of Barzillai the Gileadite to wife, and was called after their name.

64 These sought their register among those that were reckoned by genealogy, but it was not found: therefore were they, as polluted, put from the priesthood.

65 And the Tirshatha said unto them, that they should not eat of the most holy things, till there stood up a priest with Urim and Thummin.

66 ¶ The whole congregation together was forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore;

67 Beside their man-servants and their maid-servants, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred thirty and seven: and they had two hundred forty and five singing men and singing women.

68 Their horses, seven hundred thirty and six: their mules, two hundred forty and five.

69 Their camels, four hundred thirty and five; six thousand seven hundred and twenty asses.

70 ¶ And some of the chief of the fathers gave unto the work. The Tirshatha gave to the treasure a thousand drams of gold, fifty basons, five hundred and thirty priests' garments.

71 And some of the chief of the fathers gave to the treasure of the work twenty thousand drams of gold, and two thousand and two hundred pounds of silver.

72 And that which the rest of the people gave was twenty thousand drams of gold, and two thousand pounds of silver, and threescore and seven priests' garments.

73 So the priests, and the Levites, and the porters, and the singers, and some of the people, and the Nethinims, and all Israel, dwelt in their cities: and when the seventh month came, the children of Israel were in their cities.

the whole number the two accounts agree, though in the particular sums they vary. Compare verse 66, of this chapter with the second of Ezra, verse 64, of which Dr. Lightfoot gives this account in his Chronicle of the Times of the Old Testament, page 146. "The matter is to be conceived and apprehended thus: That Nehemiah found that list and catalogue of those that came up in the first of Cyrus, as it was taken then; and that he called over the names of the families as they lay in order there: he observed the order of that list in calling and listing them; but he took the number of them, as they were now when he numbered them. And some families were now more in number than they were when that was first made, and some were less; and some that were in that list, were not to be found now: for some had more of the same stock come out of Babel since the first numbering; and some that had come up at first, and were then numbered, were now gone back." And so he observed, by comparing that list and the present number, how the plantation in Judea had gone forward or backward, increased or decayed, since the first return.

Ver. 65.] It is the opinion of Jacobus Capellus, that Zerubbabel is here meant by the Tirshatha (Ezra ii. 63). Whosoever he was, he expresses his hope that God might in time restore the urim and thummin (as he had done the nation), and so give answer about obscure and difficult matters, as he had done in former ages. But till then these priests were not admitted to partake of the most holy things, because it did not appear by good proof that they were of the family of the priests; and not to appear, and not to be, are the same thing in law. But the Talmudists, as the same person observes, interpret these words as if it had been said, "Till the dead rise, or till the Messiah come." For after the first temple was destroyed, "the cities of the Levites, with their suburbs, were wanting, and so were urim and thummin, and the kings of the house of Judah" (see his Historia Exot. et Sacra, ad A. M. 3357).

Ver. 70—72.] The offering mentioned in these three verses was made by different persons from those who are said to have been offered in Ezra ii. 68, 69, and therefore no wonder the gold and silver, and other things offered were different.

Ver. 73.] These are the very same words with those in the second chapter of Ezra, and the last verse; and in both places it is said all Israel dwelt in their cities. Which, though it be chiefly to be understood of Judah and Benjamin, yet it is evident some of the ten tribes did return with them, according to those prophecies, Jer. l. 4: Zech. viii. 13. And, indeed, there were many of the Israelites that did live in the tribe of Judah before the captivity (2 Chron. x. 17: xi. 16). When all the business before named was over, the people were sent back, by Nehemiah's direction, to their several cities unto which they belonged: where they remained till the seventh month came; which was five days after the wall was finished, on the twenty-fifth day of the sixth month (ch. vi. 15).

CHAPTER VIII.

1 The religious manner of reading and hearing the law. 9 They comfort the people. 13 The forwardness of them to hear and be instructed. 16 They keep the feast of tabernacles.

1 AND all the people gathered themselves together as one man into the street that was before the water gate; and they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book of the law of Moses which the LORD had commanded to Israel.

2 And Ezra the priest brought the law before the congregation both of men and women, and all that could hear with understanding, upon the first day of the seventh month.

3 And he read therein before the street that was before the water-gate from the morning until midday, before the men and the women, and those that could understand; and the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the law.

4 And Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit of wood, which they had made for the purpose; and beside him stood Mattithiah, and Shema, and Anaiah, and Urijah, and Hilkiah, and Maaseiah, on his right hand; and on his left hand, Pedaiah, and Mishael, and Malchiah, and Hashum, and Hashbadana, Zechariah, and Meshullam.

5 And Ezra opened the book in the sight of all the people; (for he was above all the people;) and when he opened it, all the people stood up:

6 And Ezra blessed the LORD, the great God. And all the people answered, Amen, Amen, with lifting up their hands: and they bowed their heads, and worshipped the LORD with their faces to the ground.

7 Also Jeshua, and Bani, and Sherebiah, Jamin, Akkub, Shabbethai, Hodijah, Maaseiah,

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. All the people gathered themselves together] In this month was the first great feast that fell out after the building of the wall; as it was just after their first company returned to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra iii. 1).

Into the street that was before the water gate;] Which gate is mentioned before, ch. iii. 26, the street before which being very capacious, they all might meet there; for the court of the temple was not large enough to contain such a multitude.

They spake unto Ezra the scribe] This, no doubt, is the same person mentioned in the foregoing book; who had been at Babylon, it is thought, since his first coming into Judea, and was now returned; beholding with great joy the wall of Jerusalem built, as before he had seen the temple.

To bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded to Israel.] They called to mind that place in Deuteronomy, ch. xxxi. 10, 11, &c. where God requires the law to be read publicly every seventh year in the feast of tabernacles, which was appointed to be kept in this month. This, no doubt, Ezra was ready to perform; but such was the forward zeal of the people at this time, that they prevented him by their pious entreaties, that he would observe that law.

Ver. 2. Ezra the priest] So he is called, as before the scribe; both of these titles being put together in the foregoing book.

Brought the law before the congregation] For the city being restored and re-inhabited, the next thing that was proper to be done was to instruct them in those laws whereby they were to live.

All that could hear with understanding,] That were not mere children.

Upon the first day of the seventh month.] Which was not the feast wherein the law was to be read; but, as Pellicanus well observes, all this month was in a manner holy, so that they continued employed in these holy exercises till the end of the two and twentieth day, which was the conclusion of the feast of tabernacles.

Ver. 3. From the morning until midday.] In the Hebrew the words are, "from the light:" that is from the break of day (as we speak), or the sunrising, until noon. Then, I suppose, they went to take some repast, it being a festival, and a day of great rejoicing, "a memorial of blowing with trumpets," Lev. xxiii. 24, on which he thought good to begin the reading of the law, that he might do more than they desired, if they spake to him of reading it on the feast of tabernacles. This is a general account of what he did: the particulars follow.

Ver. 4. Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit of wood.] To raise him higher than the people; that he might be the better seen and heard by them all; whence, in the Hebrew, it is called "a tower of wood:" but was not like our pulpits, which contain no more than one person; but large and long, that many persons might stand in it, as appears by what follows. Vitringa hath lately described it largely in his book De Synagoga Veteri, p. 184, &c. It is evident by these words, that six persons stood on his right hand, and seven on his left, in the same pulpit, being in all fourteen.

Ver. 5. For he was above all the people;] He being in the very middle of the pulpit, and the forenamed persons on each side of him.

When he opened it, all the people stood up:] Out of reverence to the holy word of God (see Judg. iii. 20).

Ver. 6. And Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God. And all the people answered, Amen, Amen.] He seems to have used the words, wherein David ordered them to bless, 1 Chron. xvi. 36, where all the people answered, Amen; as they do here with great affection. But the Jewish doctors pretend, that in the temple, the people never answered Amen, but said, "Blessed be the name of his glorious kingdom, for ever and ever." So Vitringa notes in his book De Synagoga Veteri, p. 1096, and our Mr. Thorndike observed the same long before, in his religious Assemblies, p. 230.

With lifting up their hands, &c.] Which were all postures in prayer, and in thankful acknowledgments to God.

Ver. 7.] It is thought by some, that these persons expounded to the people what had been read to them; for the same persons did not read, they imagine, and make them understand what was read. But Stephanus Morinus hath observed very well, that it is not likely that Ezra was a mere reader, and Levites the doctors and expositors of the law before Ezra and Nehemiah. It is far more likely that Ezra began to read; and that when he was weary, some of those who stood by him on each side went on where Kelita, Azariah, Jozabad, Hanan, Pelaiah, and the Levites, caused the people to understand the law: and the people stood in their place.

8 So they read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading.

9 ¶ And Nehemiah, which is the Tirshatha, and Ezra the priest the scribe, and the Levites that taught the people, said unto all the people, This day is holy unto the LORD your God; mourn not, nor weep. For all the people wept when they heard the words of the law.

he left off; for it was too much for one man to read from morning to mid-day. And he also instructed these Levites, if there was any difficulty, to make the people understand what was read.

The people stood] Listening both to what was read, and what was delivered as the explication of it.

Ver. 8. So they read in the book] That is, Ezra and his assistants read not all the book of the law, but only Deuteronomy, as they do at this day.

In the law of God distinctly,] With a clear voice and distinct pronunciation.

And gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading.] Ezra, and the other persons directed by him, gave the sense, and made them understand what was read. So the last words are commonly expounded. But Isaac Casaubon, in an epistle of his to Sufridus Calignon (Epist. dex.), disputes at large, that all the Jews take the meaning to be, that the people in their captivity having disused the Hebrew tongue, and been accustomed to the Chaldee, Ezra and his companions rendered the Hebrew words exactly into the Chaldee language. And to put all out of doubt, that this is their sense, he observes, that the Jews at this day retain this custom (which they received from Ezra) in their synagogues, to read the same portion of scripture, first in Hebrew, and then in Chaldee; as he himself was witness at Frankfort. And he justifies those who take these words, "caused them to understand the reading," to signify, expounded the scripture. Though the word micra be nowhere so used in the Bible, to signify the scripture, neither doth it signify reading. And another learned man thinks the Hebrew words may be most exactly translated, Dabant intelligentiam per ipsam Scripturam; "they gave the sense by the scripture itself." But there is not good warrant to assert this. And the discourse of Casaubon is grounded on a tradition of the Jews, which hath no better foundation than this; that they had forgot their language in Chaldeea, and therefore they read the law in that tongue, which they understood better than their own. But if this were true, why did the prophets write in Hebrew after their return from captivity? And this very book shows the contrary, ch. xliii. 23, 24, where the Jews' language appears to have been spoken by the people. Nor is the custom of reading the Targum after the law very ancient, nor generally used in their synagogues.

Ver. 9. Nehemiah, &c. that taught the people,] Who had instructed them in their duty out of the law that had been read to them.

All the people wept, when they heard the words of the law.] They bewailed the ignorance wherein they lived; and the many violations of the law, whereof they had been guilty. Just as Josiah did when he heard the words of the law read out of a book found unexpectedly (2 Chron. xxii).

Ver. 10. Then he said] That is, the Tirshatha gave this command, who was the principal person 10 Then he said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared: for this day is holy unto our LORD: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the LORD is your strength.

11 So the Levites stilled all the people, saying, Hold your peace; for the day is holy; neither be ye grieved.

12 And all the people went their way to eat, and to drink, and to send portions, and to make great mirth, because they had understood the words that were declared unto them.

among those forenamed, having the same authority that Zerubbabel had (see ch. vii. 65).

Go your way,] Now that it was noon, it was time for them to refresh themselves.

Eat the fat, and drink the sweet,] Make a feast, and provide as good cheer as you are able, according to the manner on their festival days.

And send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared:] It did not become religious people only to make much of themselves; but he would have them out of their fulness to feast their poor brethren, that they might rejoice with them.

For this day is holy unto our Lord:] Being the first new moon in the year, and the feast of blowing with trumpets (Lev. xxiii. 24). And nothing was more unsuitable to such festivals than mourning and lamentation; for they were appointed to be solemnities for mirth and gladness; and are therefore called "the days of your gladness," in Num. x. 10. And in Ps. xcii. 4, for the sabbath, the Psalmist saith, "Thou, Lord, hast made me glad through thy works; I will triumph in the works of thy hands;" expressing the subject of his gladness, the remembrance of the creation of the world, upon that day celebrated.

Neither be ye sorry:] Inwardly grieved.

For the joy of the Lord is your strength.] Joy in the Lord for the great things he had done for them in restoring them to their own land, building the temple, and the walls of Jerusalem, was never more becoming than upon a festival day, which afforded other matter of joy. And beside, it would make them cheerfully perform the rest of their duty, and fortify them against troubles and adversities; nay, it was the way to remove them, or to keep them off: for when the service of God was their delight, he promised to keep off those plagues which were threatened in the law against transgressors, and to give them all the blessings they could desire.

Ver. 11.] What Nehemiah had said to as many as could hear him, the Levites said to the rest of the people; going about, and persuading them to lay aside their heaviness, and make it a good day.

Ver. 12. The people went their way to eat, and to drink,—and to make great mirth,] As all nations were wont to do upon their festival days. There being very few among the Greeks, wherein they made lamentations; but they rather exceeded all bounds of decency in their jollity upon sacred solemnities, being wont, besides music and dancing (which were very proper) to entertain one another with jests and scoffs, and unbecoming laughter; as the illustrations Spanhemius shows, in his observations upon Callimachus's hymn, in Lavacrum Palladis, ad Versum 324.

Because they had understood the words that were declared unto them.] This was an extraordinary reason for their mirth, that they were illuminated in divine knowledge, and understood the will of God better than they did before.

13 ¶ And on the second day were gathered together the chief of the fathers of all the people, the priests, and the Levites, unto Ezra the scribe, even to understand the words of the law.

14 And they found written in the law which the Lord had commanded by Moses, that the children of Israel should dwell in booths in the feast of the seventh month:

15 And that they should publish and proclaim in all their cities, and in Jerusalem, saying, Go forth unto the mount, and fetch olive branches, and pine branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths, as it is written.

16 ¶ So the people went forth, and brought them, and made themselves booths, every one upon the roof of his house, and in their courts, and in the courts of the house of God, and in the street of the water gate, and in the street of the gate of Ephraim.

17 And all the congregation of them that were come again out of the captivity made booths, and sat under the booths: for since the days of Jeshua the son of Nun unto that day had not the children of Israel done so. And there was very great gladness.

18 Also day by day, from the first day unto the last day, he read in the book of the law of God. And they kept the feast seven days; and on the eighth day was a solemn assembly, according unto the manner.

Ver. 13.] This was no festival day, but so desirous were they to be acquainted with the law (of the knowledge of which he had given them a taste), that they came again this day to beg farther instruction. Which, it is evident from hence, Ezra gave them, not the priests and the Levites, who came to be instructed by him as well as the people.

Ver. 14.] It is probable that he read to them particularly the duties belonging to this month, wherein they were assembled, in which they found the feast of tabernacles was to be observed; and therefore they came to him for direction how it was to be kept, that they might obey the precept. And first he informed them that they must "dwell in booths:" which Maimonides shows how it is to be understood in his Seder Zeraim, where he explains the tradition of the ancients, who believed, that when God gave a precept he also gave the exposition of it, which he pretends was preserved by their wise men; which is a vain fancy of the Jews, to support the credit of their traditions. But the book Cosri thinks these words ["they found it written"] are to be understood of the common people; for the better sort understood well enough that such festivals were to be observed, and had not forgotten any of the precepts (par. iii. sect. 63).

Ver. 15. Proclaim in all their cities, and in Jerusalem, saying,] Then he tells them that proclamation should be made in all their cities, beginning in Jerusalem, that this feast ought to be observed on such a day (Lev. xxiii. 4, 34).

Go forth unto the mount, and fetch olive branches,] The nearest mount to Jerusalem was the mount of Olives, where it is likely all these trees grew. But the word shaman, which we translate olive branches, our famous Dr. Castell thinks signifies citrons, which is not material, they being such branches as the mount afforded.

Ver. 16. Every one upon the roof of his house,] Which by the law was to be built flat (Deut. xxii. 8).

And in their courts, &c.] They durst not make them without the walls of the city, for fear of their enemies.

Ver. 17. All the congregation—made booths, and sat under the booths:] They not only made them, but left their houses, and dwelt in them all the days of the feast.

For since the days of Jeshua the son of Nun unto that day had not the children of Israel done so.] This is scarce credible, as Mr. Mede speaks, that for a thousand years none of the good kings in Israel should observe this festival, at least in this main circumstance "of dwelling in booths." But so he thinks it was, and that this horrible omission of this feast alone foreshadowed the Jews would not acknowledge Christ, whom this signified to be Emmanuel, God dwelling in our flesh (see book i. discourse xlv. p. 354). But I think this is not the meaning, that this festival had never been observed since Joshua's time; for we read in the foregoing book, that it was kept at their return from Babylon. But the meaning is, that the joy had never been so great as it was now since that time: for which there was a special reason, as the Jews observe in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 30, for they rejoiced in the days of Joshua, that they had got possession of the land of Canaan; and now they rejoiced that they were restored to it, and quietly settled in it, after they had been cast out of it.

Ver. 18.] There was a command that the law should be read on this feast, as I observed above (Deut. xxxi. 10—12), but not that it should be read every day. This was the effect of their great zeal to be instructed in the law of God, which made them desire to hear it on the second day of this month, which was a festival (ver. 13): and perhaps the eighth day, on which a solemn assembly was appointed (Lev. xxiii. 26), they continued the same holy exercise. But that seems contrary to this verse, which speaks only of seven days.

CHAPTER IX.

1 A solemn fast, and repentance of the people. 4 The Levites make a religious confession of God's goodness, and their wickedness.

1 Now in the twenty and fourth day of this month the children of Israel were assembled with fasting, and with sackclothes, and earth upon them.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1.] The feast being over, which ended upon the twenty-second day (all which time mourning was forbidden, as contrary to the nature of the feast, which was to be kept with joy), they now return to that which they were about before (ch. viii. 9, 12), and spent this whole day in humbling themselves

2 And the seed of Israel separated themselves from all strangers, and stood and confessed their sins, and the iniquities of their fathers.

3 And they stood up in their place, and read in the book of the law of the LORD their God one fourth part of the day, and another fourth part they confessed, and worshipped the LORD their God.

4 ¶ Then stood up upon the stairs, of the Levites, Jeshua, and Bani, Kadmiel, Shebaniah, Eunni, Sherebiah, Bani, and Chenani, and cried with a loud voice unto the LORD their God.

5 Then the Levites, Jeshua, and Kadmiel, Bani, Hashabaniah, Sherebiah, Hodijah, Shebaniah, and Pethahiah, said, Stand up, and bless the LORD your God for ever and ever: and blessed be thy glorious name, which is exalted above all blessing and praise.

6 Thou, even thou, art LORD alone; thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all things that are therein, the seas, and all that is therein, and thou preservest them all; and the host of heaven worshippeth thee.

7 Thou art the LORD the God, who didst choose Abram, and broughtest him forth out of Ur of the Chaldees, and gavest him the name of Abraham;

8 And foundest his heart faithful before thee, and madest a covenant with him to give the land of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Jebusites, and the Girgashites, to give it, I say, to his seed, and hast performed thy words; for thou art righteous:

9 And didst see the affliction of our fathers in Egypt, and heardest their cry by the Red sea:

10 And showedst signs and wonders upon Pharaoh, and on all his servants, and on all the before God for their sins. The reason why they did not immediately after the feast of tabernacles keep this fast, was (as Josephus Scaliger conjectures), because the twenty-third day was another festival, made by the constitution of the elders, by the same authority wherewith afterward they appointed the feast of Purim, mentioned in the book of Esther. It was called "the festival of the law," still observed by the Jews on the twenty-third day of this month, because then they make an end of reading the law, which they begin again every year the next sabbath after. Now this being a day of joy, as other festivals were, on which they were forbidden to mourn, they deferred their mourning till this solemnity also was past, and then they fell to weeping again, as they did when they first heard the law read.

Ver. 2.] Who had been guilty of taking strange women to be their wives; for which Ezra had severely censured them, and constrained them to put them away. But so depraved were some among them that it seems they transgressed again in this matter, as they did in other things, who confessed their own guilt, and the guilt of those that were before them, and, as a token of their true repentance, separated themselves from these strangers. Which they did in such a manner, that they stood at a distance from them, to show that they renounced them. For so the word stood is to be taken in this place, not for a posture of prayer, wherein they confessed their sins: for appearing in sackcloth, and with earth on their heads, it is more likely they lay down and bewailed themselves, as the manner was in such cases. And accordingly the Levites called upon them (ver. 5), to stand up: which supposes that they lay on the ground or fell on their knees, and were not standing when they spake unto them.

Ver. 3. They stood up in their place.] That is, the Levites stood up in a place built for them, like that whereon Ezra stood (ch. viii. 4), for otherwise they could not have been heard when they read. They read the law and confessed (that is, praised God, ver. 5), interchangeably. For in one fourth part of the day, that is, from the first hour to the third, they did the one, and from thence to the sixth hour (that is, till twelve o'clock) they did the other. Then they began the former again till the ninth hour, and from thence till the evening they spent their time in the other.

Ver. 4. Then stood up upon the stairs.] Or, upon the scaffold (as the margin translates it), which raised them above the people, that they might all see and hear.

And cried with a loud voice unto the Lord] They most earnestly besought him to be merciful to them.

Ver. 5.] After the Levites before named had cried to God for mercy (the people, I suppose, begging it on their knees), another company of Levites bade the people stand up, and praise the Lord, and give him thanks as long as they had any being. The Levites, it is likely, praised him in these words, acknowledging that the noblest creatures could not reach his superexcellent perfections, and all the people repeated the same words after them.

Ver. 6. Thou, even thou, art Lord alone, &c.] As they confess the Lord to be the only God, so they attribute two things to him: that he is the creator and the conservator of the universe; for having made it, no doubt he takes care of every part thereof.

The host of heaven worshippeth thee.] Sometimes the stars, and sometimes the angels, are called "the host of heaven." The latter seem to be here meant; for the other are mentioned before when he saith, "the heavens with all their host." Concerning "the heaven of heavens," see in Solomon's prayer, 1 Kings viii. 27.

Ver. 7.] Here follows a compendious history of the affairs of the Hebrew nation, in this confession of God's benefits, and their ingratitude. Which Nehemiah and Ezra, it is likely, composed in the form of a prayer, and delivered it to the Levites, whom they ordered to speak it distinctly before the whole congregation from their several scaffolds, which were conveniently placed in several parts of the assembly, that they might be heard.

Ver. 8. And foundest his heart faithful before thee.] In many instances, especially in that great trial of his faith and obedience, when he required him to offer up his only son to him (Gen. xxii. and see also Gen. xv. 6; xvii. 5, &c.).

For thou art righteous:] True to his word in faithfully fulfilling his promises (see Gen. xv. 7, 18; xvii. 2, 4, 7, &c.).

Ver. 9.] They pass by all God's providences over Isaac and Jacob, to come to that which God had done for them since they were a nation: that is, since he had made good his covenant with Abraham, to multiply his seed as the stars of heaven; at which time he foretold him of the grievous affliction of his seed in Egypt (Gen. xv. 5, 13), from which he graciously delivered them, they here acknowledge, and completed their deliverance at the Red sea.

Ver. 10. And showedst signs and wonders upon people of his land; for thou knewest that they dealt proudly against them; so didst thou get thee a name, as it is this day.

11 And thou didst divide the sea before them, so that they went through the midst of the sea on the dry land; and their persecutors thou threwest into the deeps, as a stone into the mighty waters.

12 Moreover, thou leddest them in the day by a cloudy pillar, and in the night by a pillar of fire, to give them light in the way wherein they should go.

13 Thou camest down also upon mount Sinai, and spakest with them from heaven, and gavest them right judgments, and true laws, good statutes and commandments:

14 And madest known unto them thy holy sabbath, and commandedst them precepts, statutes, and laws, by the hand of Moses thy servant:

15 And gavest them bread from heaven for their hunger, and broughtest forth water for them out of the rock for their thirst, and promisedst them that they should go in to possess the land which thou hadst sworn to give them.

Pharaoh,] Which are recorded in the book of Exodus, ch. vii. viii. &c.

For thou knewest that they dealt proudly against them.] Intending to make them their slaves for ever, as, for the present, they treated them with the utmost contempt and cruelty (Exod. v. 17, 18).

So didst thou get thee a name,] See Exod. ix. 16.

Ver. 11. Thou didst divide the sea] See Exod. xiv. 21, 22.

As a stone into the mighty waters.] So that they sunk down, and rose up no more to persecute them. The Hebrew word signifies the strong or rough waters. And so Bechartus observes out of many Greek authors, that that sea is called, and said, in short, to be κατὰ πάντα φοβερὰ, "in all regards formidable or terrible." In his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 13.

Ver. 12.] Concerning which, see Exod. xiii. 21.

Ver. 13.] This seems to relate, in the beginning of the verse, to the ten commandments, spoken by the mouth of God himself: but the latter part comprehends all the law delivered by him to Moses in the mount (ch. xxi.—xxiii.).

Ver. 14. And madest known unto them thy holy sabbath,] The scripture mentions the sabbath as a singular gift bestowed upon the Jewish nation (Exod. xvi. 29). It being a sign between him and them, that he was their God, who sanctified, that is, separated them out of all other people to be his peculiar people; that is, the worshippers of the Creator of the world, whom they acknowledged to be the Lord their God, while the heathen worshipped the sun, moon, and stars, and other creatures, as their gods, Exod. xxii. 13, and Ezek. xx. 12, 20, in which the prophet tells us, that God intended, by this, to show that he had chosen Israel, as I said, to be his peculiar people above all other nations, and that they had no other God.

And commandedst them precepts, statutes, and laws, by the hand of Moses] Which are those before mentioned, which were not spoken by God himself, but delivered by him to Moses in the mount, who was his faithful servant, and delivered nothing but what he received from God's own mouth. The observation of which is often pressed upon them as an acknowledgment of him to be their Creator who brought them out of the land of Egypt.

16 But they and our fathers dealt proudly, and hardened their necks, and hearkened not to thy commandments, 17 And refused to obey, neither were mindful of thy wonders that thou didst among them; but hardened their necks, and in their rebellion appointed a captain to return to their bondage: but thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and forsookest them not.

18 Yea, when they had made them a molten calf, and said, This is thy God that brought thee up out of Egypt, and had wrought great provocations;

19 Yet, thou in thy manifold mercies, forsookest them not in the wilderness: the pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither the pillar of fire by night, to show them light, and the way wherein they should go.

20 Thou gavest also thy good spirit to instruct them, and withheldest not thy manna from their mouth, and gavest them water for their thirst.

21 Yea, forty years didst thou sustain them

Ver. 15. And gavest them bread from heaven] See Exod. xvi. 14, 15; xvii. 6.

And promisedst them that they should go in to possess the land] Which he set before them, and bade them go and possess it, as Moses tells them, Dent. i. 8.

Ver. 16.] A famous instance of this there was when they refused to go up and possess the land, to the borders of which he had brought them (Numb. xiv. 1, 2, &c.); and afterward more insolently rebelled against Moses and Aaron, who had been their conductors through the wilderness (Numb. xvi. 3).

Ver. 17. Neither were mindful of thy wonders that thou didst among them;] Their ingratitude was the greater, because these wonders were not done among other nations, but were peculiar to them; which our Saviour makes a very high aggravation of the sins of their posterity, Mat. xi. 21).

And in their rebellion appointed a captain to return to their bondage:] See Numb. xiv. 4, where they consulted about it, and it seems came to this resolution, that they agreed upon a captain to lead them back to Egypt: or their resolving to do it was the same with the actual appointment of a captain, as it was in the case of Abraham's offering his son.

But thou art a God ready to pardon, &c.] This was the character God gave of himself to Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7), which he made good to all generations (see Psalm cxlv. 8).

Ver. 18.] This was the highest provocation, considering how lately he had spoken to them from heaven not to make a graven image, and how many cautions he had afterward given them against it.

Ver. 19. Yet thou in thy manifold mercies forsookest them not] But gave them an early instance of his clemency.

The pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day,—neither the pillar of fire by night,] Which testified that, notwithstanding their provocation, God was still among them, and continued his gracious presence with them, of which this was a glorious token, as Moses told them, Numb. xiv. 14.

Ver. 20. Thou gavest also thy good spirit to instruct them,] The spirit of prophecy, which was upon Moses, God imparted to seventy other persons, that the people might be better governed (Numb. xi. 16, 17).

in the wilderness, so that they lacked nothing; their clothes waxed not old, and their feet swelled not.

22 Moreover thou gavest them kingdoms and nations, and didst divide them into corners: so they possessed the land of Sihon, and the land of the king of Heshbon, and the land of Og king of Bashan.

23 Their children also multipliedst thou as the stars of heaven, and broughtest them into the land, concerning which thou hadst promised to their fathers, that they should go in to possess it.

24 So the children went in and possessed the land, and thou subduedst before them the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, and gavest them into their hands, with their kings, and the people of the land, that they might do with them as they would.

25 And they took strong cities, and a fat land, and possessed houses full of all goods, wells digged, vineyards, and olive-yards, and fruit trees in abundance: so they did eat and were filled, and became fat, and delighted themselves in thy great goodness.

26 Nevertheless they were disobedient, and rebelled against thee, and cast thy law behind their backs, and slew thy prophets which testified against them to turn them to thee, and they wrought great provocations.

27 Therefore thou deliveredst them into the hand of their enemies, who vexed them: and in the time of their trouble, when they cried unto thee, thou heardest them from heaven; and according to thy manifold mercies thou gavest them saviours, who saved them out of the hand of their enemies.

28 But after they had rest, they did evil again before thee: therefore ledest thou them in the hand of their enemies, so that they had the dominion over them: yet when they returned, and cried unto thee, thou heardest them from heaven; and many times didst thou deliver them according to thy mercies;

29 And testifiedst against them, that thou mightest bring them again unto thy law: yet they dealt proudly, and hearkened not unto thy commandments, but sinned against thy judgments, (which if a man do, he shall live in them;) and withdrew the shoulder, and hardened their neck, and would not hear.

30 Yet many years didst thou forbear them, and testifiedst against them by thy spirit in thy

And withheldest not thy manna] But continued it till they came to Canaan: or else they might have been starved (see Josh. v. 12).

And gavest them water] When the whole congregation deserved to perish, according to their own wish, that they had died when their brethren died before the Lord (Numb. xx. 3).

Ver. 21.] See Deut. viii. 4.

Ver. 22. And didst divide them into corners:] Some translate the last words, "Thou didst divide them by angles;" that is, he parted those kingdoms among them as by a line. But others understand it of the people dispossessed by the Jews, whom he drove into corners.

So they possessed the land of Sihon, and the land of the king of Heshbon.] Most of the inhabitants of which he destroyed, and the rest fled and hid themselves in corners. But it must be observed that Heshbon being the city of Sihon (Numb. xxi. 26), the first words should be rendered, "the land of Sihon, even the land of the king of Heshbon."

Ver. 23.] See Gen. xv. 5.

Ver. 24.] These words express the easy conquest they made of the whole country.

Ver. 25. They took strong cities.] The walls of Jericho falling down flat before them.

A fat land.] A fruitful country flowing with milk and honey.

And possessed houses full of all goods, &c.] They were enriched with the estates of the people whom they destroyed, having houses ready built, and well furnished, together with all sorts of trees planted to their hands.

So they did eat, and were filled.] They wanted nothing, but rather had superfluity of all worldly blessings.

And delighted themselves in thy great goodness.] Their highest pleasure indeed ought to have been in their thoughts how good God was unto them; but the meaning of these words is no more than this, That God had bestowed so many blessings upon them, that they took great pleasure in the enjoyment of them.

Ver. 26. Nevertheless they were disobedient.]

The pleasant life they led in the good land God gave them made them wanton, and forgetful of God and of his laws, which they regarded not at all.

And slew thy prophets] We read of many prophets slain by Jezebel, 1 Kings xviii. 4: xix. 10.

They wrought great provocations.] By abominable idolatries.

Ver. 27.] The whole book of Judges verifies this, that God delivered them for their sins unto the Moabites, the Canaanites, and divers other enemies, who grievously domineered over them; but when they cried to God for help, he was so gracious as to send such great men as Barak, Gideon and others, to be their saviours, that is, deliverers from their tyranny.

Ver. 28. But after they had rest, they did evil again before thee:] No sooner did they begin to prosper, and the judge that saved them was dead, but they revolted from God, who had been so good to them.

Therefore ledest thou them in the hand of their enemies.] God so abandoned them, that he let the Philistines rule over them forty years (Judg. xiii. 1), unto which, perhaps, this passage relates.

Many times didst thou deliver them according to thy mercies:] For nothing else could move him to it; they being through all generations inconstant and unsteadfast in their obedience.

Ver. 29.] And testifiedst against them.] By many remarkable punishments he testified how highly he was displeased with them, that he might reform them.

Yet they dealt proudly.] Which one would have expected should have humbled them; but they grew more bold and obstinate in their sins.

He shall live in them;] That is, be a happy man.

And withdrew the shoulder.] Withdrawing the shoulder is a metaphor (I have observed before) taken from refractory oxen, that draw back, and will not submit to the yoke.

Ver. 30. Yet many years didst thou forbear them.] Before he suffered them to be carried captive out of their own land.

And testifiedst against them by thy spirit in thy prophets; yet would they not give ear: therefore gavest thou them into the hand of the people of the lands.

31 Nevertheless, for thy great mercies' sake, thou didst not utterly consume them, nor forsake them; for thou art a gracious and merciful God.

32 Now therefore, our God, the great, the mighty, and the terrible God, who keepest covenant and mercy, let not all the trouble seem little before thee, that hath come upon us, on our kings, on our princes, and on our priests, and on our prophets, and on our fathers, and on all thy people, since the time of the kings of Assyria unto this day.

33 Howbeit, thou art just in all that is brought upon us; for thou hast done right, but we have done wickedly:

34 Neither have our kings, our princes, our priests, nor our fathers, kept thy law, nor hearkprophets:] Whom he raised up (I have observed elsewhere) in every age, in every king's reign, to tell them their duty, and reprove them for their sins.

Therefore gavest thou them into the hand of the people of the lands.] At last he delivered them into the hands of the Chaldeans, as we read 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15, 16, who are called the "people of the lands," because they had got possession of all the countries thereabouts, which God put under their power, as he had done other countries beyond Euphrates.

Ver. 31. Thou didst not utterly consume them.] But left them a remnant of the poorer sort in the land, and showed favour to the captives in the land of Babylon.

For thou art a—merciful God.] To which alone they owed their preservation from utter destruction.

Ver. 32. Now therefore, our God, the great, the mighty, &c.] Thus he began his address to God, before he came to Shushan (see ch. 1. 5).

Let not all the trouble seem little before thee, that hath come upon us.—since the time of the kings of Assyria unto this day.] For those kings first began to invade their country, and carried away the ten tribes (2 Kings xv. 19: xvii. 3, 5, &c.) After which, calamities came upon Judah, their good king Josiah being slain, Manasseh carried to Babylon before the great captivity.

Ver. 33—35.] In these three verses they acknowledge the justice of God, in all the punishments he had inflicted on them, though heavy, and of long continuance. For from the highest to the lowest they had done all wickedly, and would not be reclaimed.

Ver. 36.] God had, indeed, marvellously restored them to their own country; yet the marks of his displeasure for their sins still remained very visible: for they were but servants unto others, not owners, and proprietors of the lands which God had given to their fathers. Out of which they had been cast for their ened unto thy commandments and thy testimonies, wherewith thou didst testify against them.

35 For they have not served thee in their kingdom, and in thy great goodness that thou gavest them, and in the large and fat land which thou gavest before them, neither turned they from their wicked works.

36 Behold, we are servants this day; and for the land that thou gavest unto our fathers, to eat the fruit thereof and the good thereof, behold, we are servants in it:

37 And it yieldeth much increase unto the kings whom thou hast set over us because of our sins: also they have dominion over our bodies, and over our cattle, at their pleasure, and we are in great distress.

38 And because of all this, we make a sure-covenant, and write it; and our princes, Levites, and priests, seal unto it.

wickedness, and had not yet perfectly recovered it, but laboured for their lords and masters.

Ver. 37. It yieldeth much increase unto the kings whom thou hast set over us] For their land paid a great tribute to the kings of Persia, out of the profit of it (Ezra vi. 8: vii. 24, and in this book, ch. v. 4).

Also they have dominion over our bodies, and over our cattle.] For their bodies were liable to be pressed to serve in the king's wars, or in his works; and their cattle subject to them, when they had occasion to send post about the king's business.

We are in great distress.] Though they were permitted to live by their own laws (as we read in the book of Ezra), which was a great privilege, yet they lay under those public burdens, and were compelled to bear them. By which we may learn how vain their proud boasts were in John viii. 33, that they "were never in bondage to any man;" when they had long been slaves in Egypt, and lately in Babylon, and after they came from thence, as they here complain; and even they paid tribute to the Romans when they made those brags to our Saviour.

Ver. 38.] In consideration of which they resolved to renew their covenant with God of better obedience; which they promised under their hands and seals, as the only remedy to procure perfect deliverance. And, to make it more effectual, they seem to declare this in the presence of God, at the conclusion of the foregoing confession and prayer.

It signifies little, indeed, as Pellicanus observes, what such an untoward people promised; for what regard would they have to their own hand-writing who regarded not the ten commandments, written on tables of stone by the finger of God? But it was very useful, that there should be a public instrument to convince them of their impiety, and that they might be publicly confounded when they proved perfidious deserters, by showing them their engagements under their own hands, to future fidelity.

CHAPTER X.

1 The names of them that sealed the covenant. 29 The points of the covenant.

1 Now those that sealed were, Nehemiah the Tirshatha, the son of Hachaliah, and Zidkijah,

2 Seraiah, Azariah, Jeremiah,

26 And Abijah, Hanan, Anan,

27 Malluch, Harim, Baanah.

28 ¶ And the rest of the people, the priests, the Levites, the porters, the singers, the Nethinims, and all they that had separated themselves from the people of the lands unto the law of God, their wives, their sons, and their daughters, every one having knowledge, and having understanding;

29 They clave to their brethren, their nobles, and entered into a curse, and into an oath, to walk in God's law, which was given by Moses the servant of God, and to observe and do all the commandments of the Lord our Lord, and his judgments, and his statutes;

30 And that we would not give our daughters unto the people of the land, nor take their daughters for our sons:

31 And if the people of the land bring ware or any victuals on the sabbath day to sell, that we would not buy it of them on the sabbath, or on the holy day: and that we would leave the seventh year, and the exaction of every debt.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1.] Nehemiah was the governor of the country under the king of Persia, and therefore the principal prince among them, who led the way to the rest; who are not mentioned, unless we suppose Zidkijah to have been a prince; for they that followed were priests.

Ver. 2—8.] I need not transcribe the rest of the names to the eighth verse, at the end of which it is said "these were the priests," that is, the chief of them, for there are but twenty and one of them in all; and there is no mention of Ezra the priest among them; of which it is hard to give an account, unless we suppose him to be now gone to Babylon: which must be very lately; for he was at Jerusalem in the beginning of the seventh month (ch. viii. 2); though on the twenty-fourth day of it, when they fasted and prayed, we do not find him named throughout the whole ninth chapter; yet at the feast of the dedication he was come to Jerusalem again (ch. xii. 36). Some therefore think he was now hindered by sickness from being present at this sealing.

Ver. 9, 10.] There are fourteen Levites mentioned in these and the following verses, to ver. 14, which, perhaps, were all the Levites that were then present; or rather were the principal Levites, who were not priests: for some of these are mentioned before, as chosen to expound the law to the people, and to make public prayers to God (ch. viii. 7; ix. 4, 5).

Ver. 14. The chief of the people; It had been tedious to make all the people subscribe and seal the writing; therefore the principal persons did it in the name of the rest, whose names, in number forty and three, are here recorded till ver. 28.

Ver. 28.] All that did not subscribe and seal, because they were too many, yet gave their consent to what the forenamed persons did. And not only the men, but their wives, and their children who were arrived at years of discretion, engaged themselves, as follows in the next verse.

Ver. 29.] They declared they were of the same mind with those that had sealed, and owned by word of mouth what they had set their hands unto; and said, it was their act, as much as their nobles' and brethren's, from whom they would not depart. And more than that, they added an oath, whereby they obliged themselves to observe the law; and an imprecation upon themselves, wishing all the curses written in the law might fall upon them, if they did not do as the law required in all things.

Ver. 30.] Besides their general promise, they specify those things that were most difficult; as not marrying with strangers, observing the sabbath, bringing oblations for the use of the temple, &c. The first thing here specified was of great importance; and they solemnly engaged to perform it: for though both Ezra and Nehemiah had found them guilty of breaking this law, yet they were so prone to offend in this thing, that it seems, notwithstanding all they could do, some continued to violate it.

Ver. 31. If the people of the land] That is, their heathen neighbours.

Bring ware or any victuals on the sabbath day to sell; We do not find any express law forbidding them to buy what was offered to be sold on the sabbath-day; but they obliged themselves not to do it, that the rest might be better observed. For none would come to sell, when there were no chapmen for their commodities.

32 Also we made ordinances for us, to charge ourselves yearly with the third part of a shekel, for the service of the house of our God;

33 For the shew-bread, and for the continual meat-offering, and for the continual burnt-offering, of the sabbaths, of the new moons, for the set feasts, and for the holy things, and for the sin-offerings, to make an atonement for Israel, and for all the work of the house of our God.

34 And we cast the lots among the priests, the Levites, and the people, for the wood-offering, to bring it into the house of our God, after the houses of our fathers, at times appointed, year by year, to burn upon the altar of the Lord our God, as it is written in the law;

35 And to bring the first-fruits of our ground, and the first-fruits of all fruit of all trees, year by year, unto the house of the Lord:

36 Also the first-born of our sons, and of our cattle, as it is written in the law, and the firstlings of our herds, and of our flocks, to bring to the house of our God, unto the priests that minister in the house of our God:

37 And that we should bring the first-fruits of our dough, and our offerings, and the fruit of all manner of trees, of wine, and of oil, unto the priests, to the chambers of the house of our God; and the tithes of our ground unto the Levites, that the same Levites might have the tithes in all the cities of our tillage.

38 And the priest the son of Aaron shall be with the Levites, when the Levites take tithes: and the Levites shall bring up the tithe of the tithes unto the house of our God, to the chambers, into the treasure house.

39 For the children of Israel and the children of Levi, shall bring the offering of the corn, of the new wine, and the oil, unto the chambers, where are the vessels of the sanctuary, and the priests that minister, and the porters, and the singers: and we will not forsake the house of our God.

Or on the holy day:] That is, on all days of rest from their labours, such as the passover, the feast of tabernacles, and others.

That we would leave the seventh year,] That is, let their land rest every seventh year, and leave the fruit of it, which grew up of itself, for the poor, as the law required (Lev. xxv. 4, &c.).

The exaction of every debt.] That is, remit in that year the debts which the poor owed them (Deut. xv. 2, &c.).

Ver. 32.] We do not find this enjoined any where by an express law: but reason required it at this time; and therefore they obliged themselves to it by an ordinance of the elders, that the service of God at the temple might be maintained by this small duty which was laid upon every one.

Ver. 33.] There was a treasury formerly in the house of God, out of which all these things were supplied: and when it was exhausted by the many great sums which were sent out of it to foreign princes in the days of Hezekiah, that prince maintained the burnt-offerings at his own charge (2 Chron. xxxi. 3). But both these failing for the present, there was this oblation made to furnish all the things here mentioned, and every thing else that was necessary for the service of God. And, no doubt, many good people dedicated things to the same use; whereby the expenses were well maintained.

Ver. 34.] They determined, by casting of lots, how much wood every one should bring in for his share, to maintain their fire continually upon the altar to burn the sacrifices; and in what order it should be brought (what family that is, should begin first, and what should follow next), and at what times of the year. For there was another solemn feast (besides those I mentioned before,) called "the feast of the wood-offering," which took its original from hence; and, as Scaliger observes, was kept on the twenty-second day of the month Ab. But Mr. Thorndike observes, out of the Mischna (in his Religious Assemblies, p. 269,) that it was held nine days in several months, whereof a great part fell in that month; and is meant by these words, "at times appointed, year by year." The Talmudists also say, that every family, on the day when they brought in the wood, sacrificed a voluntary burnt-offering, called the "korban of wood," as Petrus Cuneus observes, in his book De Republica Hebræorum, lib. ii. cap. 13, where he notes also, that herein Josephus differs from the Talmudists; that he mentions but one day of the feasts, which he calls ξυλοφορία: which was such a solemn festival (as Maimonides saith, in his Furniture of the Temple, ch. 6,) that none might mourn on this day, nor fast, nor do any work.

Ver. 35.] According to the command, Exod. xxiii. 19; Lev. xix. 23 (see below, ver. 39.)

Ver. 36.] The law which gave all the firstlings of God is in Exod. xiii. the beginning, and ver. 11, 13, and God gave them all to Aaron the priest, in Numb. xviii. 15, 16.

Ver. 37. That we should bring the first-fruits of our dough.] See Lev. xxiii. 17; Numb. xv. 19, 20. It was to be so large, that it is called a gift in Deut. xviii. 4.

The fruit of all manner of trees,] See Numb. xviii. 12, &c.

The tithes of our ground] See Lev. xxvii. 30; Numb. xviii. 21.

Ver. 38.] As the people gave the tithes of their land to the Levites, so the Levites gave a tithe to the priests. And when the people brought them to the Levites, one of the priests was appointed to be present to inspect them, and to see that, without fraud, they tithed the tithes; that is, set out the tenth part of the tithes they had received for the priests, which was brought to the chambers, wherein it was deposited for the priests in God's house.

Ver. 39. The offering of the corn,] Deut. xii. 6, 11.

Unto the chambers, where are the vessels of the sanctuary, and the priests that minister, &c.] Where other holy things were kept, and where God's ministers attended, for whose use they were designed, and were to be brought thither at their own charge. These chambers were in the court of the priests; but L'Empereur thinks the court of the people likewise might have such places in it, wherein these things were bestowed, being more than the other could contain. For (as the Jews observe) though the priests had a court proper to themselves, into which none might come but they alone, yet they were not excluded from the court of Israel; and if there was not room enough to receive all the things forementioned, there were receptacles under ground, besides the upper room mentioned Jer. xxxv. 4.

We will not forsake the house of our God.] They promise, according to their covenant and oath, to be no more so negligent in these matters as they had been; and accordingly they did fulfil this promise, as we read ch. xii. 44, 45, unto the end.

CHAPTER XI.

1 The rulers, voluntary men, and the tenth man chosen by lot, dwell at Jerusalem. 3 A catalogue of their names. 20 The residue dwell in other cities.

1 AND the rulers of the people dwelt at Jerusalem: the rest of the people also cast lots, to bring one of ten to dwell in Jerusalem the holy city, and nine parts to dwell in other cities.

2 And the people blessed all the men that willingly offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem.

3 ¶ Now these are the chief of the province that dwelt in Jerusalem, but in the cities of Judah dwelt every one in his possession in their cities, to wit, Israel, the priests, and the Levites, and the Nethinims, and the children of Solomon's servants.

4 And at Jerusalem dwelt certain of the children of Judah, and of the children of Benjamin. Of the children of Judah; Athaiah the son of Uzziah, the son of Zechariah, the son of Amariah, the son of Shephatiah, the son of Mahala-leel, of the children of Perez;

5 And Maaseiah the son of Baruch, the son of Col-hozeh, the son of Hazaiah, the son of Adaiah, the son of Joiarib, the son of Zechariah, the son of Shiloni.

6 All the sons of Perez that dwelt at Jerusalem were four hundred threescore and eight valiant men.

7 And these are the sons of Benjamin; Sallu the son of Meshullam, the son of Joed, the son of Pedaiah, the son of Kolaiah, the son of Maaseiah, the son of Ithiel, the son of Jesaiah.

8 And after him Gabbai, Sallai, nine hundred twenty and eight.

9 And Joel the son of Zichri was their over-

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1.] Their neighbours were so enraged to see the walls at Jerusalem built again, and were so restless in their designs to keep this city from rising to its former splendour, that it terrified many of the Jews from coming to dwell there, thinking themselves more safe in the country, where their enemies had no pretence to disturb them. The rulers, therefore, of the people came and settled themselves at Jerusalem, that they might invite and encourage others to come and inhabit it; and several persons, as the next verse intimates, did come and offer themselves freely to dwell with them there. But though the rulers were settled here, and some followed their example, and all that formerly belonged to Jerusalem were ordered to return (ch. vii. 4, 5), yet still there was room for more citizens; and the city, considering how large it was, being very empty, they consulted to make it populous, by compelling every tenth man in Judah and Benjamin to quit his present habitation in the country, and come and dwell there; leaving the rest to dwell where they pleased. For which end they cast lots, that among ten men it might be known whom God chose to come thither; and the lot falling by a divine appointment upon such a person, rather than another, no doubt, he removed the more contentedly to this city.

Ver. 2.] Beside those who were chosen by lot, it seems there were some who voluntarily chose to go and live there; whom the people highly commended and praised, beseeching God to bless and prosper them: for indeed they were worthy to be honoured as men that sought the welfare of their country, the glory of God, the restoring of their nation, the defence of their city, and had a zeal for the divine service performed there.

Ver. 3. These are the chief of the province] Of those Jews that came from Babylon into the province of Judea. Whose names are mentioned verse 4, &c.

But in the cities of Judah dwelt every one in his possession in their cities, &c.] But those that dwelt in the other cities of Judah, he would not reckon in this catalogue; whom he comprehends under the name of Israel, the priests, the Levites, the Nethinims, and Solomon's servants. By Israel he means all the people of the ten tribes, as well as Judah and Benjamin, who were the chief; but he calls them Israel, because those of Judah and Benjamin dwelt at Jerusalem: the rest of Israel were in the other cities of Judah.

Ver. 4. At Jerusalem dwelt certain of the children of Judah, and—Benjamin.] For these were the tribes that anciently possessed Jerusalem; which stood partly in the one, partly in the other tribe. Therefore, in some places of scripture, Jerusalem is reckoned as belonging to the children of Judah (see Josh. xv. 63: Judg. i. 8), and sometimes in the same words to the children of Benjamin (Judg. xviii. 20: xxi. 28), and here to both. But what part of the city belonged to the one, and what part to the other, is not agreed among learned men. Pineda hath represented the several opinions about it at large, in his book De Rebus Solomonis, lib. v. cap. 5.

Of the children of Judah; Athaiah, &c. of the children of Perez;] These were all that family of Pharez the son of Judah. If the names of these persons mentioned in this chapter be compared with the names of those who came back with Zerubbabel, it will appear, that they were the fourth, fifth, and sixth generation from Zerubbabel: which is a demonstration that Nehemiah did not come to Jerusalem, in the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, but of Artaxerxes Mnemon. For this observation I am beholden to my worthy friend Dr. Alix.

Ver. 5.] These were all of the same family, as the next verse informs us.

Ver. 6.] Who seem to me to have offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem, and help to defend it by their valour, whose chiefs were Athaiah and Maaseiah.

Ver. 8. After him Gabbai, Sallai,] These two and Sallu (before named) were the chief men among them.

Nine hundred twenty and eight.] There were almost as many more of Benjamin as of Judah (who were but four hundred sixty and eight); for though mount Zion was in the tribe of Judah, yet the city of Jerusalem was in the tribe of Benjamin; which made them have a great desire to see it inhabited, and inflamed the minds of the most valiant, who were best able to defend it, to come and live there.

Ver. 9.] The former of these was the governor of seer: and Judah the son of Senuah was second over the city.

10 Of the priests: Jedaiah the son of Joiarib, Jachin.

11 Seraiah the son of Hilkiah, the son of Meshullam, the son of Zadok, the son of Meraioth, the son of Ahitub, was the ruler of the house of God.

12 And their brethren, that did the work of the house, were eight hundred twenty and two: and Adaiah the son of Jeroham, the son of Pelaliah, the son of Amzi, the son of Zechariah, the son of Pashur, the son of Malchiah,

13 And his brethren, chief of the fathers, two hundred forty and two: and Amashai the son of Azareel, the son of Ahasai, the son of Meshullam, the son of Immer, 14 And their brethren, mighty men of valour, an hundred twenty and eight: and their overseer was Zabdai, the son of one of the great men.

15 Also of the Levites: Shemaiah the son of Hashub, the son of Azrikam, the son of Hashabiah, the son of Bunni:

16 And Shabbethai and Jozabad, of the chief of the Levites, had the oversight of the outward business of the house of God.

17 And Mattaniah the son of Micah, the son of Zabdi, the son of Asaph, was the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer; and Bakkukiah the second among his brethren, and Abda the son of Shammua, the son of Galal, the son of Jeduthun.

18 All the Levites in the holy city were two hundred fourscore and four.

19 Moreover, the porters, Akkub, Talmon, and their brethren that kept the gates, were an hundred seventy and two.

20 ¶ And the residue of Israel, of the priests and the Levites, were in all the cities of Judah, every one in his inheritance.

21 But the Nethinims dwelt in Ophel: and Ziha and Gispa were over the Nethinims.

22 The overseer also of the Levites at Jerusalem was Uzzi the son of Bani, the son of Hashabiah, the son of Mattaniah, the son of Micha. Of the sons of Asaph, the singers were over the business of the house of God.

23 For it was the king's commandment con-the city; and the other was his deputy; who is called secondary, because he was next to him in the discharge of that office. Who is he, as Bertram thinks, that is called in the second book of Maccabees, ch. iii. 4, ἀποστάτης τοῦ ἱεροῦ, "the prefect of the temple;" and by Josephus, Antiq. xiv. 11, ἀποστρατήγος ἐν Ἱερουσαλήμοις, "the under governor in Jerusalem" (see his Repub. Jud. p. 163).

Ver. 10.] Now he comes to speak of the tribe of Levi; many of which it was necessary should dwell there to attend the house of God. And first he begins with the priests, who were his chief ministers.

Ver. 11.] This Seraiah was such a chief man among the priests, as he that is mentioned in 2 Chron. xix. 11 (see there). Some take him to be the same with him that is called in the New Testament στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ, which we translate "the captain of the temple."

Ver. 12. Their brethren that did the work of the house] Who discharged all the offices of the priests in the temple.

Ver. 14. Mighty men of valour,] Some of the priests were noted to be men of great courage, who, when there was occasion, fought for their country, especially to defend the house of God.

Their overseer was Zabdai, the son of one of the great men.] Or, as the margin, "the son of Haggadolim," was set over these valiant men; being descended (it is supposed by some) from some of the great men among the priests; as the word haggadolim imports.

Ver. 15.] After the priests he gives an account of the Levites; among whom this person, and the two other mentioned in the next verses, were the chief.

Ver. 16.] There were a great many things to be done without the temple, as well as within, to prepare for the service of it; particularly to gather the third part of a shekel, which every one was to give to make provision for it (ch. x. 32), which work was committed to these men. Though Bertram (De Republica Judaica, p. 160, 363), thinks this may be the meaning, That they were judges and officers in the country, where their presence was necessary, when there were but few to discharge such outward business in Israel, as it is called in 1 Chronicles xxvi. 29.

Ver. 17. Mattaniah—was the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer:] He was the precursor (as we call him in our choirs) who began to sing the hymn at morning and evening sacrifice; which seems to be that in 1 Chron. xvi. 7, 8, &c., in the latter part of which they pray to God, as in the former they give thanks.

And Bakkukiah the second among his brethren, and Abda] The first of these seems to have supplied the place of Mattaniah when he was absent.

Ver. 18.] Who certainly attended there; unless we suppose with Bertram, that they went forth some time about some outward business, which they were required to despatch.

Ver. 19.] Who had the custody of the gates of the temple.

Ver. 20.] He had said before that the rest of Israel dwelt in their own cities (verse 3), and now he saith, that so did the rest of the priests and the Levites dwell in the cities anciently appointed for them.

Ver. 21. Ophel:] Which was a place upon the wall of Jerusalem, or a tower near it (see ch. iii. 26: 2 Chron. xxvii. 3).

Ziha and Gispa were over the Nethinims.] Two persons of their own body, I suppose, who were appointed to see them do their duty.

Ver. 22. The overseer also of the Levites at Jerusalem was Uzzi] He was set over the Levites, to govern them, and see them discharge their offices in an orderly manner. The LXX. translate it ἑριστοκος, and so doth the Vulgar; for he was supervisor of those below him.

Of the sons of Asaph, the singers were over the business of the house of God.] They were ordered to look after the reparation of the temple; for which they had the more leisure, both because they did not come in their courses to Jerusalem, as others did, but were settled there; and were to attend at the temple only at certain hours, after which they might look after other business.

Ver. 23.] Beside the forenamed reasons, they had great encouragement from the king, who ordered them a certain portion for their maintenance every day. Some are of opinion, that this was king David, who first appointed them to attend in a settled cerning them, that a certain portion should be for the singers, due for every day.

24 And Pethahiah the son of Meshezabeel, of the children of Zerah, the son of Judah, was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people.

25 And for the villages, with their fields, some of the children of Judah dwelt at Kirjath-arba, and in the villages thereof, and at Dibon, and in the villages thereof, and at Jekabzeel, and in the villages thereof,

26 And at Jeshua, and at Moladah, and at Beth-pheret, 27 And at Hazar-shual, and at Beer-sheba, and in the villages thereof,

28 And at Ziklag, and at Mekonah, and in the villages thereof, course; but it is more likely it was the king of Persia, who out of his munificence made them a daily allowance for their better support; they that sang hymns to their gods being persons much valued in all countries: and if David made any provision for them, it being lost, most likely was not yet restored.

Ver. 24. And Pethahiah the son of Meshezabeel.] We had the children of Pharez named before, who settled at Jerusalem (ver. 6), and now it appears that some of the posterity of his brother did the same; for here is one man mentioned who was of great authority under the king of Persia, as it here follows.

Was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people.] The king appointed them to receive all petitions from the people, and by him returned them answers. This seems the plain sense, according to our translation. But some translate it, not "at the king's hand," but "on the king's part," that is, he heard all causes in civil matters between the king and the people; as, about his tribute, or any grievance of which they complained. And Bertram thinks it appears by the very context, that he was appointed by the king (so at his hand, or by his hand, may be understood) to see all things supplied which the people were bound to furnish for the temple: or rather, as Pellicanus thinks, to see that what the king allowed for public sacrifices to be made for him, and for his family (Ezra vi. 10), was duly paid out of the treasury of the province.

Ver. 25.] He gives no account of the families that 29 And at En-rimmon, and at Zareah, and at Jarmuth,

30 Zanoah, Adullam, and in their villages, at Lachish, and the fields thereof, at Azekah, and in the villages thereof. And they dwelt from Beer-sheba unto the valley of Hinnom.

31 The children also of Benjamin from Geba dwelt at Michmash, and Aija, and Beth-el, and in their villages,

32 And at Anathoth, Nob, Ananiah,

33 Hazor, Ramah, Gittaim,

34 Hadid, Zeboim, Neballat,

35 Lod, and Ono, the valley of craftsmen.

36 And of the Levites were divisions in Judah, and in Benjamin.

dwelt in the country, as he doth of those that settled in Jerusalem, but only mentions the towns wherein they dwelt, which formerly had been walled cities, but now open villages, wherein houses were built, but not their walls.

Ver. 26.] In this and in the following verses unto ver. 31, he mentions the other towns wherein the children of Judah dwelt, who did not come to inhabit at Jerusalem.

Ver. 30.] It appears by this account that some of these great towns or cities without walls had little villages about them, but others had only fields and no villages in them, the country being as yet but thinly peopled.

Ver. 31.] Geba had formerly been an eminent place in this tribe, and so was Beth-el.

Ver. 35.] We read of Lod and Ono before in the first book of Chronicles (see ch. viii. 12).

Ver. 36.] The rest of the Levites who were not settled at Jerusalem were distributed among the people of Judah and Benjamin, who dwelt in the fore-named towns, whom they taught and instructed in religion and good manners.

We read also 1 Chron. ix. 3, that some of the children of Ephraim and Manasseh dwelt at Jerusalem; but, I suppose, they were so few, that they are not here remembered; or, perhaps, they removed to some other place when Jerusalem continued without walls.

CHAPTER XII.

1 The priests, 8 and the Levites, which came up with Zerubbabel. 10 The succession of high priests. 22 Certain chief Levites. 27 The solemnity of the dedication of the walls. 44 The offices of priests and Levites appointed in the temple.

I Now these are the priests and the Levites that went up with Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Jeshua: Seraiah, Jeremiah, Ezra,

2 Amariah, Malluch, Hattush,
3 Shechaniah, Rehum, Meremoth,
4 Iddo, Ginnetho, Abijah,

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. Now these are the priests] The chief of the priests, as they are called ver. 7, whom he thought fit to mention here, because he intended to describe the dedication and consecration of the city, where the ministry of the priests and Levites was to be employed.

Ezra.] If this was the same Ezra that wrote the foregoing book, or part of it, then he went back to Babylon after his coming up to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, and came again instructed with a large power in the seventh year of Artaxerxes: but there are many reasons to prove he was not the same.

Ver. 2. Malluch.] He that is here called Malluch, is called Melicu, ver. 14, and such differences are in some of the following names, which are repeated ver. 15, 16, &c. It being common among the Jews (as I have noted upon the book of Chronicles) to vary in the pronunciation of names, and sometimes to give two names.

Ver. 3.] The first of these is called Shebaniah, ver.

5 Miamin, Maadiah, Bilgah,
6 Shemaiah, and Joiarib, Jedaiah, 7 Sallu, Amok, Hilkiah, Jedaiah. These were the chief of the priests, and of their brethren, in the days of Jeshua.

8 Moreover, the Levites: Jeshua, Binnui, Kadmiel, Sherebiah, Judah, and Mattaniah, which was over the thanksgiving, he and his brethren.

9 Also Bakkukiah and Unni, their brethren, were over against them in the watches.

10 ¶ And Jeshua begat Joiakim, Joiakim also begat Eliashib, and Eliashib begat Joiada,

11 And Joiada begat Jonathan, and Jonathan begat Jaddua.

12 And in the days of Joiakim were priests, the chief of the fathers; of Seraiah, Meraiah; of Jeremiah, Hananiah;

13 Of Ezra, Meshullam; of Amariah, Jehohanan:

14 Of Melicu, Jonathan; of Shebaniah, Joseph;

15 Of Harim, Adna; of Meraioth, Helkai;

16 Of Iddo, Zechariah; of Ginnethon, Me-shullam;

17 Of Abijah, Zichri; of Miniamin, of Moadiah, Piltai;

14, and the other two in ver. 15, are called Harim and Meraioth.

Ver. 4.] The second of these is called Ginnethon, ver. 16, which is a small difference. And Abijah was the head of the course of priests from whom Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, sprung, as Bertram thinks, De Rep. Jud. cap. 18, p. 311.

Ver. 5.] The first of these is called Miniamin, and the next Moadiah, ver. 17, which are likewise very small variations.

Ver. 7. Sallu.] The first of these is called Sallai, ver. 20.

These were the chief of the priests] Heads of the courses of the priests which David instituted, and were restored after their return from captivity, though as yet not so many as they had been before (see Ezra vi. 18).

And of their brethren in the days of Jeshua.] Who was the high-priest at the return from captivity. The meaning seems to be, that they were not only heads of all those who were under them, but the chief of the heads, who were properly their brethren.

Ver. 8.] They were appointed to see the psalm of thanksgiving sung every morning and evening at the burnt-sacrifice.

Ver. 9.] That is, these ministered in their courses as the others did, and kept their stations over against them in their turns of attendance, which are called "their watches" or wards (see ver. 24).

Ver. 10, 11.] In these two verses is an account of the succession of the high-priests from the return of the captivity till the time that they began to bear the greatest sway in the Jewish nation. For this Jaddua is commonly thought to be that Jaddus the high-priest who went to meet Alexander the Great, in his pontifical habit, as he came from the conquest of Tyre and Gaza, and procured great privileges for the Jewish nation. Now this being granted, the scripture history ends, as Grotius observes, where the very light of times (as he speaks), that is, the affairs of Alexander, begins: from which time all things in history are clear, the affairs of the Jews being re-

18 Of Bilgah, Shammua; of Sheinaiah, Jehonathan;

19 And of Joiarib, Mattenai; of Jedaiah, Uzzi;

20 Of Sallai, Kallai; of Amok, Eber;

21 Of Hilkiah, Hashabiah; of Jedaiah, Ne-thaneel.

22 ¶ The Levites in the days of Eliashib, Joiada, and Johanan, and Jaddua, were recorded chief of the fathers; also the priests, to the reign of Darius the Persian.

23 The sons of Levi, the chief of the fathers, were written in the book of the Chronicles, even until the days of Johanan, the son of Eliashib.

24 And the chief of the Levites: Hashabiah, Sherebiah, and Jeshua the son of Kadmiel, with their brethren over against them, to praise and to give thanks, according to the commandment of David the man of God, ward over against ward.

25 Mattaniah, and Bakkukiah, Obadiah, Meshullam, Talmon, Akkub, were porters keeping the ward at the thresholds of the gates.

26 These were in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua, the son of Jozadak, and in the days of Nehemiah the governor, and of Ezra the priest, the scribe.

recorded by many Greek writers (several of whom are now perished), as appears by St. Jerome upon Daniel.

Ver. 13.] As he had mentioned those who were chief of the priests in the days of Jeshua, so now he thinks fit to mention the sons of every one of them who officiated in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua, either as assistants to their fathers, or succeeding them when they were dead. He begins with those three named ver. 1, and so proceeds in order to give an account of the rest, which reaches to ver. 22, and need not be transcribed.

Ver. 22. The Levites in the days of Eliashib, Joiada, and Johanan (called Jonathan, ver. 11),—also the priests, to the reign of Darius the Persian.] This is thought by many to be that Darius whom Alexander conquered, till whose time there were records kept of the principal families of the Levites, in the days of those four high-priests, as well as of the priests already mentioned.

Ver. 23.] As there had been a register of them in the public records before that time from Jeshua to Johanan. Some think this refers to 1 Chron. ix. 14, &c.

Ver. 24. And the chief of the Levites:—to praise and to give thanks.] These were particularly appointed for this office, which was of great importance.

Ward over against ward.] In their turns, one coming on when another went out, to attend in their courses, which are called wards.

Ver. 25.] Of the house of God, where they attended and performed their office; or, as some will have it, at the treasuries, as in the margin of our bibles.

Ver. 26.] It is impossible to give a certain account why these are so particularly registered in this book; but we may be sure there was some great reason for it in those days: perhaps, that it might demonstrate their care to employ the best men in all offices for which they were fit; and that they took special care to preserve a faithful record of those who were to serve God as his ministers, as long as they 27 ¶ And at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem they sought the Levites out of all their places, to bring them to Jerusalem, to keep the dedication with gladness, both with thanksgivings, and with singing, with cymbals, psalteries, and with harps.

28 And the sons of the singers gathered themselves together, both out of the plain country round about Jerusalem, and from the villages of Netophathi;

29 Also from the house of Gilgal, and out of the fields of Geba, and Azmaveth: for the singers had builded them villages round about Jerusalem.

30 And the priests and the Levites purified themselves, and purified the people, and the gates, and the wall.

31 Then I brought up the princes of Judah, upon the wall, and appointed two great companies of them that gave thanks, whereof one went on the right hand upon the wall: toward the dung gate:

32 And after them went Hoshajah, and half of the princes of Judah, 33 And Azariah, Ezra, and Meshullam.

34 Judah and Benjamin, and Shemaiah, and Jeremiah,

35 And certain of the priests' sons with trumpets; namely, Zechariah the son of Jonathan, the son of Shemaiah, the son of Mattaniah, the son of Michaiah, the son of Zaeur, the son of Asaph;

36 And his brethren, Shemaiah, and Azarai, Milalai, Gilalai, Maai, Nethaneel, and Judah. Hanani, with the musical instruments of David the man of God, and Ezra the scribe before them.

37 And at the fountain gate, which was over against them, they went up by the stairs of the city of David, at the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the water gate eastward.

38 And the other company of them that gave thanks went over against them, and I after them, and the half of the people upon the wall, from beyond the tower of the furnaces even unto the broad wall;

39 And from above the gate of Ephraim, and above the old gate, and above the fish gate, and the tower of Hananeel, and the tower of Meah, even unto the sheep gate: and they stood still in the prison gate.

40 So stood the two companies of them that gave thanks in the house of God, and I, and the half of the rulers with me:

were a nation: which they have not a long time been, and so all distinctions among them are confounded.

Ver. 27.] As Solomon and all the children of Israel dedicated the house of the Lord when it was built (of which see 1 Kings viii. 2 Chron. vii.) so now Nehemiah, having set things in good order, thought it meet to dedicate the city, whose wall was built, and gates set up (ver. 30.) as a place in which God had chosen to dwell, by settling his house here. And therefore they assembled to beseech his blessing and protection upon this city; which being made strong, and well defended, they hoped to serve God in his house there with greater quietness and security.

The Jewish doctors are of opinion, that the oracle being wanting in the temple, this dedication gave no new sanctity, but only restored it to the old; for it was still the holy city, as it is called twice in the foregoing chapter of this book, ch. xi. 1, 18. See Selden, lib. iii. De Synedriis, cap. 13, sect. 6, where he observes, that it being said here it was dedicated with a song (for so it is in the Hebrew,) there was some particular song of dedication, which had been formerly used, which was now sung upon this occasion. And some think, that ever after this time they made a yearly commemoration of this dedication, as they conceive there was of Solomon's dedication of the temple. For the heathen, who imitated the Jews (whose temple Solomon built two hundred and sixty-three years before Rome was built) were wont so to do. But Selden thinks Hospinianus rightly judges, that the Maccabees kept the first anniversary dedication, ch. 14, sect. 7, and upon another account.

Ver. 28, 29.] These were the places where they had settled their habitations; from whence, upon Nehemiah's summons, they came to be present and assist at this solemnity.

For the singers had builded them villages round about Jerusalem.] That they might be the more ready to attend the service of God, when there should be occasion.

Ver. 30. The priests and the Levites purified themselves.] With certain ablutions and expiations, that especially which is mentioned, in Numb. xix. where a "water of separation" is prescribed to purify all uncleanness, ver. 9, &c. which is called "the water of purifying," Numb. viii. 7.

And purified the people, and the gates, and the wall.] By sprinkling, I suppose, the same water upon them, and by prayers, and sacrifices.

Ver. 31. Appointed two great companies of them that gave thanks.] So the LXX. translate the Hebrew words shethe tothoth gedoloth, δύο μεγάλοις χοροῖς, "two great for praise;" that is, "two great choirs," as the Vulgar translates it, which most versions follow. But our great Selden thinks the words should be translated, "two eucharistical sacrifices," prepared for the altars, which were proper to the present business. The Spanish Jews translate the words, "two grand processions," (lib. iii. De Syned. cap. 13, sect. 6, p. 210, and see Dr. Hammond upon Ps. xxiv. annot. p. 139.)

Whereof one went on the right hand upon the wall toward the dung gate:] We add those words "whereof one," because of the other mentioned ver. 38, but in the Hebrew the words are, "going on the right," &c.

Ver. 33. And Azariah, Ezra,] Not Ezra the scribe, who was in a more honourable place (ver. 36.)

Ver. 35, 36.] They, in these verses, were priests; and therefore Ezra, who was an eminent priest, led them up at the head of them.

Ver. 37.] See ch. iii. 15.

Ver. 40.] The great man before mentioned translates the first words, "So stood the two eucharistical sacrifices in the house of God."

The order wherein they thus marched, in a pompous manner, round about the city, now seems a little obscure: but the sense of the whole description is this; That they being met together in the same place, half of the rulers went upon the wall on the right hand, accompanied with several priests and Levites, and Ezra the scribe at the head of them (ver.

41 And the priests; Eliakim, Maaseiah, Miniamin, Michaiah, Elieonai, Zechariah, and Hananiah, with trumpets;

42 And Maaseiah, and Shemaiah, and Eleazar, and Uzzi, and Jehohanan, and Malchijah, and Elam, and Ezer. And the singers sang aloud, with Jezrahiah their overseer.

43 Also that day they offered great sacrifices, and rejoiced; for God had made them rejoice with great joy: the wives also and the children rejoiced; so that the joy of Jerusalem was heard even afar off.

44 ¶ And at that time were some appointed over the chambers for the treasures, for the offerings, for the first-fruits, and for the tithes, to gather into them, out of the fields of the cities, 36), and the other half took the left hand, and walked upon the wall in the same order, accompanied with Nehemiah, who brought up the rear of them (ver. 38), and at length both parts of this chorus met in the temple; and there they stood still, and completed their praises and thanksgivings, and offered sacrifices, as it here follows. Where all the people walked it is not certain, but only that half of them went with Nehemiah upon the wall; the rest, it is likely, walking below, because the wall could not contain them.

Ver. 41, 42.] It doth not appear that they sounded the trumpets or sang while they were in the procession, but the song and the music began when they came to the house of God.

Ver. 43. Also that day they offered great sacrifices, and rejoiced:] Feasting, I suppose, upon the eucharistical sacrifices which were then offered.

For God had made them rejoice with great joy:] By restoring the holy city to such a secure condition, that they praised the Lord there without fear of disturbance. It was also an universal joy. The singers sang with such loud voices, and had so many loud instruments, the women and children also shouting, that they might be heard at a great distance: or, the meaning may be, that the report of it was spread into far distant countries.

Ver. 44. Some appointed over the chambers for the treasures,] By "the treasures," he means those places where the oblations, first-fruits, tithes (which they had promised to pay duly, ch. x. 31, &c.), were laid up, and preserved for the use of the priests and Levites. Of which, that they might not be defrauded, a certain officer was at this time appointed, to see they were brought in according to the law, and to take care that every one had his portion.

For Judah rejoiced for the priests and for the Levites that waited.] They were so glad to see such a great concourse of them (ver. 27, &c.), and that they performed their duty upon this occasion to the general satisfaction of all that were present, that their hearts were enlarged in love to them, which moved them to take care they should never want the provision appointed by God for them.

Ver. 45. Both the singers and the porters kept the the portions of the law for the priests and Levites: for Judah rejoiced for the priests and for the Levites that waited.

45 And both the singers and the porters kept the ward of their God, and the ward of the purification, according to the commandment of David, and of Solomon his son.

46 For in the days of David and Asaph, of old, there were chief of the singers, and songs of praise and thanksgiving unto God.

47 And all Israel, in the days of Zerubbabel, and in the days of Nehemiah, gave the portions of the singers and the porters every day his portion; and they sanctified holy things unto the Levites, and the Levites sanctified them unto the children of Aaron.

ward of their God, and the ward of the purification,] These and other ministers (who also were Levites) did their duty so carefully, that they were much in the people's favour. For the singers "kept the ward of their God," that is, sang orderly in their courses, and praised God; and the porters "kept the ward of purification," that is, duly observed the orders about purification in not suffering any unclean person or unclean thing to come into the house of God.

According to the commandment of David, and of Solomon] Who had regulated all things belonging to the duty of these persons (see 1 Chron. xxv. xxvi.).

Ver. 46.] There were other famous men joined with Asaph, viz. Heman and Jeduthun; but he was the principal person whom David employed in this regulation. And this verse gives the reason why the Levites and the singers performed their duty so accurately; because, from the time of David, who constituted their orders and offices, there were some great men who presided over them, and were careful both to instruct them in their duty, and keep them to it.

Ver. 47. And all Israel, in the days of Zerubbabel, and in the days of Nehemiah, gave the portions of the singers and the porters every day his portion:] Those men that were appointed to look after the treasures, mentioned ver. 44, did their duty so well, that these inferior officers, much less the rest of the Levites and priests, never wanted what was due unto them, but had it every day while Zerubbabel and Nehemiah governed.

They sanctified holy things unto the Levites; and the Levites sanctified them unto the children of Aaron.] The people separated and set apart the tenth part of their crop for the use of the Levites; and the Levites separated from their tithes the tenth part of them for their priests. For the people had no right to the tenth part, but it was holy, that is, to be separated from the rest for God's ministers, the Levites; and the Levites had no right to the tenth part of their tithes which they had received from the people, but it was to be set apart (which is called sanctified), for the children of Aaron, that is, the priests.

CHAPTER XIII.

1 Upon the reading of the law separation is made from the mixed multitude. 4 Nehemiah at his return causeth the chambers to be cleansed. 10 He reformeth the offices in the house of God. 15 The violation of the sabbath, 23 and the marriages with strange wives.

1 On that day they read in the book of Moses in the audience of the people; and therein was found written, that the Ammonite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of God for ever;

2 Because they met not the children of Israel with bread and with water, but hired Balaam against them, that he should curse them; howbeit our God turned the curse into a blessing.

3 Now it came to pass, when they had heard the law, that they separated from Israel all the mixed multitude.

4 ¶ And before this, Eliashib the priest, having the oversight of the chamber of the house of our God, was allied unto Tobiah:

5 And he had prepared for him a great chamber, where aforetime they laid the meat-offerings, the frankincense, and the vessels, and the tithes of the corn, the new wine, and the oil, which was commanded to be given to the Levites, and the singers, and the porters; and the offerings of the priests.

6 But in all this time was not I at Jerusalem: for in the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes king of Babylon came I unto the king, and after certain days obtained I leave of the king:

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1.] This was not done upon the day of the dedication of the wall of the city, but upon some day after Nehemiah was returned to Jerusalem from Persia, whither he went to wait upon the king (ver. 6). For it is not likely that the people, who were so well affected to the ministers of God, as we read in the foregoing chapter, should so soon forget and neglect them; or that those who were appointed to look after their concerns (ch. xii. 41), should be turned out of their office immediately, or lay aside all care of them: for it is apparent, from verse 10, of this chapter, their dues were not paid them when Nehemiah was not there to look after them. But when he was returned, all this was amended, and other abuses corrected: he continuing the public reading of the law, at stated times, probably on the great festivals, when all the people met together (such as those mentioned ch. viii.), upon some day of which that portion of scripture was read, in Deut. xxiii. 3, which forbids the admission of the Ammonites and Moabites into the congregation of the Lord; the meaning whereof see in my annotations there. I will only add here, that they who by the congregation of God, in this place, understand the public assemblies for divine worship, are very much mistaken: for no man, of any nation, was forbidden to come and pray to God at the temple, but men of every nation, who would become proselytes, were admitted into their communion; and if they would be circumcised, had like privileges with all other Israelites, even to eat the passover (Exod. xii. 48, 49). They therefore, that think the meaning is, they should be excluded from all public offices, interpret it better: but that is not the truth neither; for it is to be understood of marrying with them; as I have shown in the explication of that law.

Ver. 2.] See upon Deut. xxiii. 4, 5.

Ver. 3.] Who were born of strangers, whom the law would not allow to partake of the rites of marriage with Israelites.

Ver. 4. Before this,] That is, before this separation was made.

Eliashib the priest,] There were several of this name in those times, and some of them priests (Ezra x. 6, 24, 26, 37). But this seems to have been the high-priest mentioned ch. iii. 1, for his family was much corrupted, as appears from verse 28 of this chapter.

Having the oversight of the chamber] Here the singular number is used for the plural; for he had not the oversight of one chamber only, but of all the chambers, as the following verses, 5, 9 show. But this may seem to indicate, that Eliashib was not high-priest, it being below him to be "set over the chamber" (as the phrase is in the Hebrew), though the high-priest, no doubt, had an inspection over them all.

Was allied unto Tobiah:] An Ammonite, as he is often called in this book; with whom he ought to have contracted no affinity, by suffering his grandson to marry with Sanballat's daughter; who was the fast friend of Tobiah, and the great enemy of the Jews. We read also in Ezra that several of the priests had married strange wives; and among the rest some of the sons of the high-priest are there mentioned.

Ver. 5. He had prepared for him a great chamber.] By breaking down the partitions, it is likely, between several little chambers, where holy things were laid, he prepared one great room for his reception.

Where aforetime they laid the meat-offerings, the frankincense, and the vessels, &c.] All the offerings that belonged to the ministers of God (and the vessels wherewith they ministered), which there had been great care taken should be brought into these chambers (the latter end of ch. x.), were now all profanely thrown out to make room for this man.

Ver. 6. But in all this time was not I at Jerusalem:] They took this boldness in Nehemiah's absence; and were the more audacious, because many of the nobles of Judah (it is likely) favoured this Tobiah, and were his friends, as they had been heretofore (ch. vi. 17, 18).

For in the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes king of Babylon came I unto the king.] He was governor twelve years in this province; but did not continue all that time in Judea: for he sometimes stepped to Babylon, to give an account of his management to the king, who, it is likely (as I have before observed), would not dispense with so long an absence from his attendance to his office at court (see upon ch. ii. 6: v. 41).

After certain days] In the Hebrew the words are "at the end of days," that is, at the end of the year. For so the word jamin [days] often signifies in scripture, Exodus xiii. 10: Leviticus xxv. 29 (see below, verse 15).

Obtained I leave of the king:] To return to Jeru-

7 And I came to Jerusalem, and understood of the evil that Eliashib did for Tobiah, in preparing him a chamber in the courts of the house of God.

8 And it grieved me sore: therefore I cast forth all the household stuff of Tobiah out of the chamber.

9 Then I commanded, and they cleansed the chambers; and thither brought I again the vessels of the house of God, with the meat-offering and the frankincense.

10 ¶ And I perceived that the portions of the Levites had not been given them: for the Levites and the singers that did the work were fled every one to his field.

11 Then contended I with the rulers, and said, Why is the house of God forsaken? And I gathered them together, and set them in their place.

12 Then brought all Judah the tithe of the salem: from whence, it is probable, he heard of the forenamed disorders, and therefore once more begged leave to go thither, that he might redress them.

Ver. 7. I came to Jerusalem, and understood of the evil that Eliashib did for Tobiah.] He was fully informed what evil had been committed, before he went about to reform it.

In preparing him a chamber in the courts] In the court of the Israelites, which was a sacred place, into which no stranger might enter.

Ver. 8.] His indignation was raised, as well as his sorrow, to see such a profanation: first, in bringing a stranger into the place where only Israelites were to come; and he an Ammonite, one of the worst of the strange nations, and a greater enemy of the Jews than many of the Ammonites; for whose sake he had removed the holy things, and put Tobiah in their place, who brought his household-stuff along with him; and all this done by the high-priest, who ought to have opposed such an attempt, and, indeed, was the only man that could have hindered it, till Nehemiah came, whose authority, as governor under the king of Persia, was superior to his; by which he threw all his goods out of the chamber, and forced him also to depart. Here is no mention of his reprehending Eliashib, which is an argument, that he died after Nehemiah went from Jerusalem.

Ver. 9.] He gave order, that the chambers, which had been thus profaned, should be restored to their former sanctity by the water of purification, mentioned in the nineteenth of Numbers; whereby things, as well as persons, were cleansed from their impurities. And when the chambers were thus prepared, he brought in again all the vessels, and other things (mentioned verse 5), which had been thrown out to make room for Tobiah.

Ver. 10. I perceived that the portions of the Levites had not been given them.] For either the people did not pay them well, when they saw they were not laid up for their proper use in the place appointed, or Eliashib employed them for the entertainment of Tobiah; which he might as well do, as bring him into the sacred place: into which when they were not brought, the people, not knowing what became of them, might keep them to themselves (see Bishop Montague, of Tithes, p. 347).

For the Levites and the singers, that did the work, were fled every one to his field.] This made those that attended the service at Jerusalem forsake the city, and betake themselves to their country concerns, where they might make provision for the sustenance of their families. And, indeed, it is a great corn and the new wine and the oil unto the treasures.

13 And I made treasurers over the treasures, Shelemiah the priest, and Zadok the scribe; and of the Levites, Pedaiah; and next to them was Hanan the son of Zaccur, the son of Mattaniah; for they were counted faithful, and their office was to distribute unto their brethren.

14 Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds that I have done for the house of my God, and for the offices thereof.

15 ¶ In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses; as also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the sabbath day: and I testified against them in the day wherein they sold victuals.

artifice of the devil, as Wolfius here observes, by his instruments to defraud the ministers of religion of their necessary maintenance, that he may thereby abolish religion itself.

Ver. 11. Then contended I with the rulers.] He earnestly expostulated with them, and reproved them.

Why is the house of God forsaken?] There was no account to be given of it, but the negligence of the magistrates; whom he awakens to their duty, by representing to them that God himself was highly affronted, by having none of his servants to attend him at his house.

I gathered them together.] He recalled the Levites to Jerusalem, out of the country, whither they were fled to look after their own estates.

Set them in their place.] Every one to his proper work and business.

Ver. 12.] When they saw these things were likely to go the right way, and be employed to their proper uses, they brought them to their proper place. For the people (as Conradus Pellicanus here notes) readily obey, if the magistrates and the priests be not remiss in their duty.

Ver. 13.] There had been some appointed heretofore unto this office (ch. x. 44, &c.), but they not performing their trust, Nehemiah sought out some persons, here mentioned, who had the general reputation of being men of integrity; whose business it was to give every one of their brethren his portion.

Ver. 14.] It is very natural here to observe, that to make provision for the maintenance of God's ministers, and of his worship and service, is a work of high esteem with God. For these are the good deeds (as appears by the foregoing verses) for which Nehemiah recommends himself to the divine favour and remembrance. And therefore what shall we think of the times wherein we live; when men account them the most religious to God-ward, who would unfurnish the house of God most, and who most rob his priests? This is the reflection which Mr. Mede made upon these words of Nehemiah, book i. discourse xxxiv.

Ver. 15. In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the sabbath, &c.] The treading wine-presses, shows that he came back in the latter end of the year (as I have explained "in the end of days," verse 6), when he found them carrying in sheaves and wine, and all manner of burdens (that is, doing all manner of work), on the sabbath, as if it had been a common day.

I testified against them in the day wherein they sold

16 There dwelt men of Tyre also therein, which brought fish, and all manner of ware, and sold on the sabbath unto the children of Judah, and in Jerusalem.

17 Then I contended with the nobles of Judah, and said unto them, What evil thing is this that ye do, and profane the sabbath day?

18 Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city? yet ye bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the sabbath.

19 And it came to pass, that when the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark before the sabbath, I commanded that the gates should be shut, and charged that they should not be opened till after the sabbath: and some of my servants set I at the gates, that there should no burden be brought in on the sabbath day.

20 So the merchants and sellers of all kind victuals.] Or, as Pellicanus translates it, "I contested with them, that they should sell provisions on such days as they might be sold, and not on the Sabbath."

Ver. 16. There dwell men of Tyre also therein, which brought fish, and all manner of ware.] The city of Tyre was a place of great trade, and, lying on the sea, abounded with fish, which they brought from thence to Joppa, and so to Jerusalem. Tyre was nigh to Sidon, which had its name (as Justin saith, lib. xviii. ab ubertate piscium, "from plenty of fish.")

And sold on the sabbath unto the children of Judah, and in Jerusalem.] Not only in the country, but in the holy city, as Jerusalem was called, where holy assemblies were to be held, and God worshipped solemnly, on the Sabbath.

Ver. 17. Then I contended with the nobles of Judah.] As I had done before, ver. 11, for they who did not correct abuses when it was in their power, were more in fault than they that committed them.

What evil thing is this that ye do.] For if they had exercised their authority, the people durst not have done as they did.

Ver. 18.] He bids them reflect and consider, that this was one of the crimes of which their fathers were guilty; for which God suffered them to be carried captive out of their land, and their city to be destroyed (see Jer. xvii. 19—21, &c.). This aggravated their guilt, that they would not beware of those sins which had been their ruin; and would bring greater judgments upon them, because they were not amended by what they had suffered.

Ver. 19. When the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark] That is, when they who sat there could not see to do any thing, which was about sunset, the mountains about Jerusalem intercepting the light there sooner than in other places.

Before the sabbath.] In the evening of that day.

Some of my servants set I at the gates.] It seems, he could not trust to the common porters of the gates; and therefore appointed some of his own family, who he knew would neither be careless nor corrupted, to see the gates were kept shut, and all traffic hindered.

Ver. 20. So the merchants] Who came from Tyre and other places (ver. 16).

Lodged without Jerusalem once or twice.] In the open fields (as appears by the next verse), where, perhaps, they pitched their tents, and opened their packs, hoping to sell their wares on the sabbath to the country people, though they could not get admittance into Jerusalem.

Ver. 21. I testified against them.] He solemnly deof ware lodged without Jerusalem once or twice.

21 Then I testified against them, and said unto them, Why lodge ye about the wall? if ye do so again, I will lay hands on you. From that time forth came they no more on the sabbath.

22 And I commanded the Levites that they should cleanse themselves, and that they should come and keep the gates, to sanctify the sabbath day. Remember me, O my God, concerning this also, and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy.

23 ¶ In those days also saw I Jews that had married wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab:

24 And their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language, but according to the language of each people.

clared to them, and called God to witness, that he would not suffer them to lodge there any more.

If ye do so again, I will lay hands on you.] Seize their persons and their goods, and punish them as offenders.

From that time forth came they no more on the sabbath.] Such power have good magistrates; especially when they are resolute. And it is very observable, that these being men of other nations, were not bound by the law of the Sabbath, and did not transgress in breaking it; yet he would not permit them to make the Jews, who were under the obligation of the law, to break it; and thereby trouble the commonwealth of Israel, by drawing the people into sin. It is also observable, that though buying and selling was not a servile work, yet he thought this comprehended in those words, "Thou shalt do no manner of work."

Ver. 22. I commanded the Levites that they should cleanse themselves.] He thought the Levites would be more revered than his servants; and therefore appointed them to this office of keeping the gates on the Sabbath-day, that it might not fail to be sanctified as it ought to be. And they being also on that day to attend upon other offices which were holy, he commanded them also to cleanse themselves by some known purification, which might procure them the greater reverence. There was another reason why he joined the Levites with his servants to look after the gates on the Sabbath-day, because he would have this watch continued, when he and his servants were gone from Jerusalem, till this evil custom was quite-broken.

Remember me, O my God, concerning this also, and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy.] He had besought God to remember his good deeds (ver. 14); but, to show that he did not think there was any proper merit or worthiness in them, which required a reward as a debt in justice due unto them, he here explains himself, and desires to be rewarded, or rather pardoned, out of God's free goodness, according to "the greatness" or "the multitude" of his mercies.

Ver. 23.] They had at this very time married strangers, as Pellicanus thinks; and by what Nehemiah did for their correction, one would think some were again revolted into that sin, which they had most solemnly renounced both before him and before Ezra (ch. x. 30; Ezra x.). So hard is it to root out tares, which will be continually sprouting up again.

Ver. 24.] Whom they had married. For their mothers, with whom they were bred, spake to them in the language of their own country, and not in the language of the Jews; which it seems by this was very different from that of Ashdod, though they were neighbours to the Philistines. And so was the language of the Egyptians, and other countries thereabout, very different as Bochartus observes in his Canaan, lib. ii. cap. I (see Scaliger, De Emend. Temp. lib. vi. p. 580). But there doth not seem to have been such difference between the language of the Canaanites and the Hebrews in the time of Abraham; for he made use of no interpreters, that we read of, in his conversation with them. Yet it is probable, that by length of time these people had altered their language very much, which was preserved pure among the Jews.

25 And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves.

26 Did not Solomon king of Israel sin by these things? yet among many nations was there no king like him, who was beloved of his God, and God made him king over all Israel: nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin.

Ver. 25. I contended with them, and cursed them.] He expostulated with them, and denounced God's judgment against them; or, as Aben Ezra thinks, he excommunicated them, and cast them out of the society of God's people. But that was in use only when they could not punish offenders according to their law, which now they had power to do; and accordingly it follows, that he did inflict punishments upon them.

Smote certain of them.] Ordered the officers to beat some of the most notorious offenders, either with rods, or with scourges, according to Deut. xxv. 2.

Plucked off their hair.] Which was a great disgrace in those eastern countries (see Isa. i. 6; Jer. xlviii. 37); the hair being esteemed a great ornament and a token one was a freeman. Therefore "plucking off the hair" was a putting them to shame, and making them look like vile slaves.

And made them swear by God.] He also took an oath of them that they would reform. But this he had done before (ch. x. 29, 30); and therefore, since the most sacred promises of amendment did not keep them fast to God, he also severely chastised them in the manner before related, that nothing might be wanting to make them better.

Ver. 26. Did not Solomon—sin by these things?] He argued also with them, and persuaded them to amend, from the example of the greatest men, who had been undone by such marriages, particularly king Solomon.

Nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin.] As much as to say, If such a man as he, who excelled all men in wisdom, and was so highly in God's favour, that he preferred him before all his brethren to be king over all Israel, was not safe from seducement by strange women, how shall ye be able to preserve yourselves from their enticements?

Ver. 27.] That is, Would you have me connive at this wickedness, and so bring guilt upon myself, and ruin upon you?

Ver. 28. One of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib] It is supposed that Eliashib died before Nehemiah returned from Persia, and Joiada his son succeeded him, one of whose sons had offended in this matter. He was his grandson.

Was son in law to Sanballat] He is said by Josephus to be that Manasseh, who, by Sanballat's in-27 Shall we then hearken unto you to do all this great evil, to transgress against our God in marrying strange wives?

28 And one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib the high priest, was son in law to Sanballat the Horonite: therefore I chased him from me.

29 Remember them, O my God, because they have defiled the priesthood, and the covenant of the priesthood, and of the Levites.

30 Thus cleansed I them from all strangers, terest, procured leave to build a temple in mount Gerizim, to which all the Jews that had married strange wives resorted (lib. xi. cap. 8), and, as Solomon Virga saith, in Schebet Judab, he made proclamation in all the countries round about, that whosoever would come to his temple, they should pay neither first-fruits nor tithes, but only make voluntary offerings: by which he gained many of the poor sort to him (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 15, p. 623).

Therefore I chased him from me.] That he should not serve at the altar; which Josephus will have to be decreed by the great Sanhedrin, who, if he would have before them renounced that unlawful wife, and put her away, offered to continue him in the exercise of his priesthood. See Selden, De Succession. in Pontif. lib. ii. cap. 6, and lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 15, p. 649, where he observes, that Solomon Virga saith, he was put out of his ministry at the temple by an assembly of all the priests, who met together and expelled him. But there was no need of their authority, for Nehemiah himself "chased him from him," that is, banished him from Judea, as Bertram expounds this phrase, in his De Repub. Jud. cap. 13, p. 165, &c.

Ver. 20. Remember them, O my God.] To punish them (that is, according to their deserts), as he desired God to remember him by rewarding him for the good he had done. But Rasi takes it for a prayer to God, to reform them and render them good for evil.

Because they have defiled the priesthood.] God required greater purity in the priests than in other Israelites, and in the high-priests especially, who might marry none but a virgin of his own people (see Lev. xxi. 6, 7, unto ver. 16).

The covenant of the priesthood, and of the Levites.] There was a covenant made with Phinehas (Numb. xxv.) of an everlasting priesthood, which they had violated, because the covenant was mutual, binding them to observe the laws of the priesthood, as God engaged himself to preserve them in their office. What covenant was made with the Levites, I do not find; but I suppose the meaning is, they dishonoured the whole tribe of Levi, who were set apart for divine ministries. For it is likely some of the Levites had transgressed in this matter, by the bad example of the priests. This great corruption of the priests seems to have been the occasion of God's sending Malachi, the last of the prophets, to correct it, after Ezra and Nehemiah had not been able to root out this corruption. And the covenant here mentioned, was that made in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, wherein they engaged to put away their strange wives. Thus Dr. Alix, whose judgment I prefer to my own, in this point.

Ver. 30. Thus cleansed I them from all strangers.] That is, both priests and Levites were separated from their strange wives.

And appointed the wards of the priests and the Levites, every one in his business.] To observe their courses of attendance at the house of God, and every and appointed the wards of the priests and the Levites, every one in his business ;

31 And for the wood offering, at times ap-one to perform there that business which was proper to him.

Ver. 31. For the wood offering, at times appointed,] He commanded them to observe the decrees which had been passed some time ago (ch. x. 34, 35). Maimonides, in his treatise of the Manner of offering Sacrifices, ch. 14, gathers from these words, that it was lawful for any man freely to vow either wine, or frankincense, or oil, or wood, to burn on the altar : for this, saith he, was a kind of sacrifice or offering, as Nehemiah here informs us.

pointed, and for the firstfruits. Remember me, O my God, for good.

Remember me, O my God, for good.] He concludes his book with a short prayer, to God, wherein he commends himself, and all he had done, unto God's gracious acceptance. As it becomes all men, especially those who are employed in divine things, if they have done any thing that is good, to remember it was by God's help and assistance, not by their own power ; beseeching the Father of mercies, by his only begotten Son, to make it serviceable to his church, and his own good. Thus Joh. Wolfius concludes his commentary upon this book.

THE BOOK OF ESTHER.

THERE is a great variety of opinions concerning the author of this book. Whom a great number of late interpreters, and some of the Hebrew doctors, take to have been Mordecai ; which is the common opinion of the Latins, and of Clemens Alexandrinus among the Greeks ; which, they think, is sufficiently warranted by those words in the ninth chapter, ver. 20, &c., where it is said, "Mordecai wrote all these things, and sent letters unto the Jews," &c. This, they think, relates to this whole history, which he wrote as it is recorded in this book : but those words plainly relate only to the decree of observing the feast of Purim perpetually ; which supposes they had been acquainted with the occasion and ground of it before those letters came, as Huetius observes ; who therefore is of the same opinion with the Talmudists in Baba Bathra, that this book was written by the men of the great synagogue. Which opinion he the rather embraces (though I see no ground at all for it), because it comprehends theirs who think Mordecai was the author, and theirs who ascribe it to Ezra, and theirs who think it was Joiakim the son of Jeshua the high-priest ; for all these might well have been in that synagogue. Whoever was the author, Maimonides saith (in his More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 45) their wise men openly declare, the book of Esther was dictated by the Holy Ghost ; that is, as he explains it, by a motion or impulse (as he calls it) from the Spirit of God, who excited him to write this history, as by the same motion others indited psalms, and gave wholesome precepts, to regulate the lives of men (see ch. x. 3).

And that this history fell out after the captivity of Babylon was ended, and after the time of Darius the Mede, is very evident : for Shushan was not the royal city of the Medes, but of the Persians. Nor had the Medes so large a dominion, as from India to Ethiopia. But in what reign of the Persian kings these things fell out, is hard to determine (see the last verse of this book).

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. In the days of Ahasuerus,] This was a Persian, but which of them is a great doubt ; for learned men think several of them had this name. There are, I think, eight several opinions about him here mentioned. Our great primate Usher takes him to have been Darius Hystaspes ; but he married the daughter of the great Cyrus, to confirm himself in his kingdom, and would not have so easily parted with her as Ahasuerus did with Vashti. The great Scaliger therefore thinks him to have been his successor Xerxes; whose wife's name being Amystris, he takes her for Esther, this name being in the Persian language Ham-esther. But this hath been confuted by many learned men, particularly by Jacobus Capellus; who observes, that this Amystris was the daughter of a powerful man among the Persians, whom Herodotus calls Otanes. Several other reasons he gives against this in his Historia Sacra et Exotica, ad A. M. 3640, 3650, where by good arguments he proves it was not Artaxerxes Longimanus, nor Darius Nothus, nor Artaxerxes Mnemon, but concludes, that it was the next king, Ochus, which agrees well with his Persian name, which was Achasch, to which Verosch being added as his surname, he was called by the Persians Achasch-verosch, which the Greeks translated Ahasuerus.

This is Ahasuerus which reigned from India even unto Ethiopia,] We are told by Herodotus, that Darius conquered India (lib. iv. cap. 44). And there might well be so many provinces between that and Ethiopia, whether we understand thereby the country beyond Egypt, or that near Arabia. Herodotus seems to direct us to the former, when he said, That Darius found by his conquests, that Asia, in that eastern part of the world, was like to Libya.

Ver. 2. When the king Ahasuerus sat on the throne of his kingdom,] Enjoying peace and quietness throughout his large dominions. Some think, this phrase, "when he sat on the throne of his kingdom," signifies when he began to reign. But this is confuted by ver. 3, which saith, in the third year of his reign he did what follows.

Which was in Shushan the palace,] This was a noble city, which Strabo calls Πόλιν ἀξιολογώτατην, "a most famous and highly-to-be-praised city;" where Cyrus and the Persian kings, after the conquest of the Medes (whose country was remote), settled their royal seat, that they might not be far from Babylon. The country about it also was wonderfully fruitful, producing a hundred, and sometimes two hundred fold, as he writes, lib. xv. p. 727, 731. It was built, as Pliny saith, by Darius (lib. vi. cap. 27): or rather enlarged, by building there a most magnificent palace, as Ælian explains it (lib. xiii. De Animal. cap. 59); which Aristotle, in his book De Mundo, calls θαυμαστόν βασιλείου οἶκον, "a wonderful royal palace," shining with gold, and amber, and ivory.

Ver. 3. He made a feast unto all his princes and his servants;] By his servants are meant his subjects; who were called servants in the eastern countries. And it was the manner of the Roman emperors sometimes to feast all the people of Rome, as well as the senate.

The power of Persia and Media,] And first he speaks of the feast made for the great men, whom he calls the "power of Media and Persia;" men in power, as we now speak.

The nobles and princes of the provinces, being before him:] He explains who they were; the governors of provinces, and other noble persons, who were all then at his court. The word parthemim, which we translate nobles, some would have to be the corruption

5 And when these days were expired, the king made a feast unto all the people that were present in Shushan the palace, both unto great and small, seven days, in the court of the garden of the king's palace;

6 Where were white, green, and blue, hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble: the beds were of gold and silver, upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black, marble.

of the Greek word καράτιμος, "honourable persons;" and Junius, with others, deduce it from the Greek word κῆρυξ. But the Greeks were not yet got among them; and therefore it is a Persian word, signifying governors, as R. Solomon expounds it: and Joseph Kimchi thinks they were such great men as governed that tract of land that lay upon the river Phrath, that is, Euphrates. But Hottinger will have it to be a compound word from par, which signifies high, and ram, which signifies spirit; as much as to say "high-spirited" or "heroic" persons; which seems to me to be but an ingenious conceit.

What the occasion of this feast was, is variously conjectured. Some think, it was begun on his birthday. The Targum saith, a great rebellion had been lately suppressed, which filled him with joy. But the next words seem to inform us, that it was to show his magnificent greatness to all his subjects. For in those countries they delighted much in making great feasts; as we read afterward, that Alexander (when he was there) entertained τετρακοσίου ἡγεμόνας, "four hundred captains," or great commanders, who all sat in silver chairs, &c., as Duris tells us in Athenæus, lib. i. Deipnosoph. cap. 14.

Ver. 4.] Which was for the space of six months; from the vernal to the autumnal equinox; which is a hundred fourscore and seven days. For Vashti kept a feast of seven days, at the end of his feast for the women of Susa, as Ochus did for the men (ver. 7, 10). Thus Jacobus Capellus. Some indeed will have it, that he was thus long in making preparation for this splendid entertainment, which did not last many days. But this custom is continued still to this day, of keeping an annual festival a hundred and eighty days, if we may give credit to Dr. Fryar, who lived lately in this country, and gives us an account of it in his Travels (letter v. cap. 12, p. 348).

Ver. 5. The king made a feast unto all the people that were present in Shushan] Not only to the inhabitants of Shushan, but to all that were present in the city, out of all parts of his dominions, the Israelites not excepted, as the Targum saith.

In the court of the garden of the king's palace;] In the entrance of the royal palace; which was very spacious and planted with all sorts of fruit-trees, and aromatics, as the Targum explains it.

Ver. 6. Where were white, green, and blue, hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble:] How the Targum came to fancy that these hangings, being spread from one tree to another, were tied to them with silken purple strings, I know not; for the text saith expressly, they were hanged on pillars of marble, set up, no doubt, for that purpose.

The beds were of gold and silver,] On which they sat, or rather lay, at their meat. The beds themselves were of melitim (as Jonathan expresses it), of the softest wool; that is, the Milesian, which is the best in the world, as Bochartus hath observed out of many authors, in his Phaleg, lib. i. cap. 8. But the bedsteads were of "gold and silver;" that is, studded with gold and silver, or overlaid with plates of them as the 7 And they gave them drink in vessels of gold, (the vessels being diverse one from another,) and royal wine in abundance, according to the state of the king.

8 And the drinking was according to the law; none did compel; for so the king had appointed to all the officers of his house, that they should do according to every man's pleasure.

9 Also Vashti the queen made a feast for the women in the royal house which belonged to king Ahasuerus.

10 ¶ On the seventh day, when the heart of the king was merry with wine, he commanded Mehuman, Biztha, Harbona, Bigtha, and Abagtha, Zethar, and Carcas, the seven chamberlains that served in the presence of Ahasuerus the king, 11 To bring Vashti the queen before the king with the crown royal, to shew the people and the princes her beauty: for she was fair to look on.

12 But the queen Vashti refused to come at the king's commandment by his chamberlains: therefore was the king very wroth, and his anger burned in him.

manner was; as Dietericus shows in his Antiq. Biblicæ, p. 388.

Upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black, marble.] In the Hebrew, Upon a pavement "of bahat, and ses, and dar, and sochereth," which signify several sorts of stones, as Bochartus hath proved beyond contradiction: but what stones are here meant is not easy to resolve, nor is it of much moment to know. He hath spent a large chapter to prove that dar signifies a pearl; which, though very precious, it is not incredible was used in this Persian luxury, among other stones, to adorn this pavement. Which he justifies by many good arguments; and shows there are examples of such profuseness in other histories (Hieroicoicon, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 8). Drusius also hath said a great deal about sochereth, to which I refer the learned reader, Miscellanea, cent. i. cap. 74.

Ver. 7.] There was a great variety of wines, it is likely, as well as great plenty; and great variety of vessels to drink in, different from all that they had seen. So Drusius translates those words in the parenthesis, variantia diversa vasa, as the Jews are said, ch. iii. 8, to have laws different from all other people, where there is the same word (Miscellanea, cent. i. cap. 16). Strabo saith, these princes were so luxurious that they had their wine from Syria, called chalybomium; and the water they drank with it, from Eulaeus, it being ῥαιτῶν ἡλαφρότατον, "the lightest of all other waters."

Ver. 8. And the drinking was according to the law; none did compel:] The plainest translation seems to be, "the drinking according to custom, none did compel." It was customary to compel men to drink more than they had a mind to do; but this prince left every man to his liberty, that no man should incur any displeasure if he did not drink what others would impose upon him. But Drusius thinks the word dath never signifies a custom.

For so the king had appointed to all the officers of his house, that they should do according to every man's pleasure.] Which made the feast most acceptable, when every one drank for his own pleasure, and not for other men's. And such had been the custom of the ancient Persians, who (as Xenophon tells us) were very sparing in eating and drinking, though in his time they were grown extremely riotous. But nothing was more barbarous than their pressing men to drink beyond their inclinations; which the son of Sirach expresses by the word δυναμι (Ecclus. xxxi. 37), it being no less inhuman to force a man to drink when he is not thirsty, than to deny him drink when he is ready to perish with thirst. According to an ancient saying of Sophocles in Athenæus, lib. x. Τὸ πρὸς βίαν πίνειν, ἵσον καὶνόν τῳ δυνάμι βίῳ. "To compel a man to drink by force, is as bad as to compel him to endure thirst for want of drink."

Ver. 9. Also Vashti the queen made a feast for the women] I have before said, it is not likely (as primate Usher thinks) that this was Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, whom Darius Hystaspes married: for the reason of that match being to strengthen himself in the kingdom, he would not have so lightly parted with her. Jacobus Capellus thinks, by the addition of the word par to her name, she was called by the Persians Par-vashti, which by the Greeks is pronounced Parvatis, the mother of Artaxerxes Mnemon. But she could not be the wife of Ochus, who was his son.

In the royal house which belonged to king Ahasuerus.] Where she entertained the wives of the princes, and other women; not in the open air, as the men were, but more privately, as was fit for women, who were not wont to eat together with men.

Ver. 10. On the seventh day,] Which was in the conclusion of this feast.

When the heart of the king was merry with wine,] Which made him a little forget himself, and not consider what became both his own state and that of the queen.

He commanded—the seven chamberlains that served in the presence of Ahasuerus] These eunuchs (as the word is translated in the margin) were men of principal authority in the court; where they had great offices about the king. And therefore he did her honour enough, in sending so many of them to wait upon her, and let her know his pleasure.

Ver. 11.] It is a very absurd conceit of the former Targum, who saith, he commanded her to be brought quite naked, that her comely proportions might be seen as well as her face. And yet in Pirke Eliezer they are so bold as to say, it was the custom of the Persian kings to have their wives publicly dance before them naked. It was too much, she thought, that he should expose her countenance to be beheld, especially by all the people: which was contrary to the custom of that country; where they kept their wives very close from the sight of all men but themselves.

Ver. 12. But the queen Vashti refused to come,] Which she might do out of modesty, not pride; because, as I said, it was contrary to the custom; and the great men, inflamed with wine, might be provoked by her beauty (as Jacobus Capellus speaks) to lust after her.

Therefore was the king very wroth, and his anger burned in him.] It was the more immoderate, because his blood was heated with wine: which made his passion too strong for his reason. Otherwise he would not have thought it decent for the queen, nor safe for himself, to have her beauty (which was very great) exposed in this unusual manner. Josephus saith, he was the more enraged, because he sent more than once to her, but still she refused to come. Which is not probable; for though it would have become him to send again to know her reason for refusing, yet he persisting in his command, one would think she would have yielded obedience.

13 ¶ Then the king said to the wise men, which knew the times, (for so was the king's manner toward all that knew law and judgment:

14 And the next unto him was Carshena, She-thar, Admatha, Tarshish, Meres, Marsena, and Memucan, the seven princes of Persia and Media, which saw the king's face, and which sat the first in the kingdom;)

15 What shall we do unto the queen Vashti according to law, because she hath not performed the commandment of the king Ahasuerus by the chamberlains?

16 And Memucan answered before the king and the princes, Vashti the queen hath not done wrong to the king only, but also to all the princes, and to all the people that are in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus.

17 For this deed of the queen shall come abroad unto all women, so that they shall despise their husbands in their eyes, when it shall be reported, The king Ahasuerus commanded Vashti the queen to be brought in before him, but she came not.

18 Likewise shall the ladies of Persia and Media say this day unto all the king's princes, which have heard of the deed of the queen. Thus shall there arise too much contempt and wrath.

19 If it please the king, let there go a royal commandment from him, and let it be written among the laws of the Persians and the Medes, that it be not altered, That Vashti come no more before king Ahasuerus; and let the king give her royal estate unto another that is better than she.

20 And when the king's decree which he shall make shall be published throughout all his empire, (for it is great,) all the wives shall give to their husbands honour, both to great and small.

Ver. 13. Then the king said to the wise men, which knew the times,] What had been done in former days; or, what was fit to be done on all occasions: men well versed in ancient histories (as Vitrunga explains it), and in the laws and customs of their country; who were able to give counsel in all dubious and perplexed cases, such as this was, which rarely happened (De Synag. Vetëri, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 8).

For so was the king's manner toward all that knew law and judgment:] It was his constant practice: and he did not forget this laudable practice even in his drink, to consult with his counsellors before he resolved any thing: who were skilled in the laws of their country, and could judge what advice was to be given in all cases.

Ver. 14. The next unto him was—the seven princes of Persia and Media,] These are called the king's seven counsellors in Ezra vii. 14, who took their original from Daniel, who, being in great power under Darius the Mede, and having a great hand in framing the government of that state, caused the Persian court (as Mr. Mede conjectures) to resemble that of heaven, ordaining seven chief princes to stand before the king, as seven great angels are said in Scripture to stand before the throne of God (see book i. discourse x.).

Which saw the king's face,] Who were his principal ministers, and admitted into his presence; which was not allowed to every one, but only to the great men of the kingdom (see Grotius upon Matt. xviii. 10).

Which sat the first in the kingdom;] Next to the king; being his royal judges, who determined what was right among the Persians, and were the interpreters of the laws of the country. Of whom Herodotus makes mention, lib. iii. cap. 14, 31, and Plutarch, in Artaxerxes, as primate Usher observes.

Ver. 15.] These words make it plain, that the fore-named great persons were the supreme judges of what was law; and that the king did not govern arbitrarily, by his own will and pleasure, but by the laws of the kingdom.

Ver. 16. Memucan answered] He is the last of the seven princes, mentioned ver. 14, which inclines me to think, that the puny judge, as we now speak, delivered his opinion first (as they do here), and so they spake in order till they came to the first. And thus I find the latter Targum takes it, "He was the least of them, and therefore gave his opinion first." But others take it quite contrary, that Memucan was the president of the council, or the king asked him first what he thought of the matter. He declared it to be a crime of such a dangerous nature, that it would have a mischievous influence upon the whole kingdom, if it were not severely punished.

Ver. 17. For this deed of the queen shall come abroad,] This transgression of the king's commandment (as Maimonides explains it, in More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 23) will be known everywhere; for it could not be concealed, being a public affront to his majesty.

So that they shall despise their husbands] His opinion was, that then they would take upon them to disobey their husbands, and slight their commands, when they heard what Vashti had done, and was not punished for it.

Ver. 18. Likewise shall the ladies of Persia and Media, &c.] He repeats it again, that it would have this effect immediately, especially on the great women, who, from this time forward, would take example by the queen, and say to their lords, Are you more honourable than Ahasuerus the king, whose wife would not come when she was sent for! So the latter Targum.

Thus shall there arise too much contempt and wrath.] Contempt in the wives, and wrath in their husbands, which would make great brawlings and contentions in all families.

Ver. 19. If it please the king, let there go a royal commandment from him,] He would not have a mere order given, but a law made, which, as it follows, should stand inviolable. The same Targum saith, that Memucan had married a wife, who, being richer than himself, was very proud, and would not speak to him but in her own language; and now he took this opportunity to be revenged of her, and make her do whatever he pleased.

That it be not altered,] This was cunningly done, saith the same Targum; for if she had recovered the king's favour, when his anger was over, this counsel might have cost him his head. But what made laws unalterable among them is uncertain. The Targum saith, because the king confirmed it by an oath, and then it became immutable; or, it was sealed, not only by the king, but by all the princes, as one would guess from Dan. vi. 8, 12, 15.

Let the king give her royal estate unto another] This was a very rigorous decree. But Drusius observes, that the Persians were inclined to be severe to their wives.

Ver. 20.] For none would dare to disobey, when they heard that the greatness of the queen could not preserve her from such a heavy punishment.

21 And the saying pleased the king and the princes; and the king did according to the word of Memucan:

22 For he sent letters into all the king's provinces, into every province according to the

Ver. 21.] With whom all the other six judges concurred in their opinion.

Ver. 22.] The meaning seems to be, that this decree was published in every province, after the manner that such things used to be proclaimed, and in their own tongue, that every one, women as well as men, might understand it. The decree runs thus in the Hebrew, "That every man should bear rule in his own house, and speak in the language of his people." It seems the Persians had yielded so much to their wives, that when they had married a stranger, they suffered her to bring her own language into the family. But this decree altered that custom, and allowed no other language to be spoken in the family writing thereof, and to every people after their language, that every man should bear rule in his own house, and that it should be published according to the language of every people.

but that of the man, and of the people among whom he lived (see De Dieu). And thus the former Targum, "Every man shall rule in his own house, and compel his wife to speak in the language of her husband, and in the language of his people." Which, indeed, was a token of dominion; all conquerors endeavouring to bring in their own language into the country which they have conquered. The latter Targum hath only these words, that "every man shall be honoured in his own house, and speak according to the language of his people;" that is, give his commands in his own language, which every one was bound to learn.

CHAPTER II.

1 Out of the choice of virgins a queen is to be chosen. 5 Mordecai the nursing father of Esther. 8 Esther is preferred by Hegai before the rest. 12 The manner of purification, and going in to the king. 15 Esther best pleasing the king is made queen. 21 Mordecai discovering a treason is recorded in the chronicles.

1 AFTER these things, when the wrath of king Ahasuerus was appeased, he remembered Vashti, and what she had done, and what was decreed against her.

2 Then said the king's servants that ministered unto him, Let there be fair young virgins sought for the king:

3 And let the king appoint officers in all the provinces of his kingdom, that they may gather together all the fair young virgins unto Shushan the palace, to the house of the women, unto the custody of Hegai the king's chamberlain, keeper of the women; and let their things for purification be given them:

4 And let the maiden which pleaseth the king be queen instead of Vashti. And the thing pleased the king; and he did so.

5 ¶ Now in Shushan the palace there was a certain Jew, whose name was Mordecai, the son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite;

6 Who had been carried away from Jerusalem

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1.] When his anger was abated, and the wine gone out of his head, his ancient love began to revive to Vashti, whose beauty was exceeding charming; but then he remembered withal her undutiful behaviour, and the decree he had passed against her, which was irrevocable, so that he was in a great strait. Yet the latter Targum saith he called for the seven princes, who had given him the forenamed counsel, and said unto them, I am no longer angry at Vashti, but at you, who, from what I said in my drink, took occasion to destroy her; and thereupon commanded them all to be slain. For which there is no ground; but by what follows it appears to be a fable.

Ver. 2.] The same servants, in all likelihood, mentioned ver. 14 of the foregoing chapter, who continually attended him. And when they saw him afflicted, contrived by a new love to blot out the remembrance of the old.

Ver. 3.] The better to divert him, they propound that a great number of the most beautiful virgins that could be found should be brought from all parts to Shushan, that out of them he might take his choice which of them he would make his queen.

The house of the women.] Or rather "of the virgins;" for the house of those who were women or wives was different from this, and under another governor (ver. 14).

Unto the custody of Hegai—keeper of the women;]

Of the virgins, as Shaashgaz was of the women or concubines (ver. 14).

And let their things for purification be given them: In this house, saith the former Targum, there was a place for bathing, and they were furnished with ointments and perfumes, and all other things necessary either for ornament or cleanliness; for the Hebrew word signifies both.

Ver. 4.] He approved of the advice, and gave order about it.

Ver. 5. In Shushan the palace there was a certain Jew, whose name was Mordecai.] Who is thought by some to have come to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (because one of that name is mentioned in his company), but returned back again to Babylon, being one of the king's servants; for he was one of his guard, or keeper of the door; or, as we translate it, he "sat in the king's gate" (ver. 19, 21). But this was another Mordecai, as appears from the time wherein he lived, in the latter end of the Persian empire.

The son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite;] The latter Targum here gives his pedigree down from Benjamin, the son of Jacob, but mixed with such fables that no credit can be given to it.

Ver. 6.] Mordecai was not then carried away but Kish, who is mentioned just before, from whom Mordecai was descended (see our Rainoldus. Cens. lib. Apocryph. prælect. cxlvi.). And Bonfrerius also hath well observed (in his appendix to his Præloquium to with the captivity which had been carried away with Jeconiah king of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away.

7 And he brought up Hadassah, that is, Esther, his uncle's daughter: for she had neither father nor mother, and the maid was fair and beautiful; whom Mordecai, when her father and mother were dead, took for his own daughter.

8 ¶ So it came to pass, when the king's commandment and his decree was heard, and when many maidens were gathered together unto Shushan the palace, to the custody of Hegai, that Esther was brought also unto the king's house, to the custody of Hegai, keeper of the women.

9 And the maiden pleased him, and she obtained kindness of him; and he speedily gave her her things for purification, with such things as belonged to her, and seven maidens, which were meet to be given her, out of the king's house: and he preferred her and her maids unto the best place of the house of the women.

10 Esther had not shewed her people nor her kindred: for Mordecai had charged her that she should not shew it.

11 And Mordecai walked every day before the court of the women's house, to know how Esther did, and what should become of her.

12 ¶ Now when every maid's turn was come to go in to king Ahasuerus, after that she had been twelve months, according to the manner of the women, (for so were the days of their purifications accomplished, to wit, six months with oil his Commentaries on the scripture, ch. 7), if he himself was then brought from Jerusalem, he must be at least a hundred and ten years old (supposing this history to have fallen out in the time of Darius Hystaspes) when he came into the place of Haman; for, from the captivity of Jeconiah, till their deliverance from captivity, was eighty-one years; and from thence to the reign of Darius Hystaspes was almost twenty years, as Eusebius saith; and Haman was hanged in the twelfth year of this king; so here are a hundred and ten years. But it is not credible that a man of such a great age should be advanced to such authority as he had; and more incredible that Esther, who was his cousin-german should be beloved of Ahasuerus when she was an old maid, as she must have been, if Mordecai was of these years.

Ver. 7. He brought up Hadassah, that is, Esther, his uncle's daughter.] Her Jewish name was Hadassah, signifying in Chaldee a myrtle, as the former Targum saith; but her Persian name was Esther, which he fancies was from the Greek word, ἄστρον, a star. But the other Targum derives it from sator, which signifies hidden, because she was hidden in Mordecai's house a long time, and no man saw her but he; or rather, because her nation was concealed and not known. Primate Usher thinks, that as Vashti was Atossa, so Esther was she whom the heathens called Artystona; who, as Herodotus saith, was the wife Darius loved above all other, and had her statue made of pure gold (lib. ii. cap. 88, and lib. vii. cap. 69). He saith, indeed, that she also was another daughter of Cyrus, and sister to Atossa; but he was either ignorant (as that great man thinks) of the Persian genealogies, or out of envy concealed their original. It is more likely he gives a true account of her descent, as he doth of other things, and she was not Esther.

For she had neither father nor mother.] Her father died, saith the former Targum, when her mother was big with child of her, and her mother died as soon as she was brought to bed.

Whom Mordecai, — took for his own daughter.] The Vulgar translates it, adopted her for his daughter. Which doth not signify such an adoption as among the Romans (as Mr. Selden observes), but only paternal love and care to bring up a child who had lost her parents. For the Hebrew doctors are so far from acknowledging any adoption, that they say he took her to make her his wife. So Jarchi by bat [daughter] understands beth a house; which the LXX. follow, he educated her εἰς γυναῖκα, “to be his wife” (lib. De Succession. cap. 4. p. 18).

Ver. 8.] The words which we translate “was brought,” may be translated was taken: and that by force, as the word sometimes signifies, and as the former Targum here explains it, “she was brought by violence.” The latter Targum tells the manner of it at large, That Mordecai, hearing of this order, hid his cousin in a private place where the officers could not find her. But when the virgins were gathered together, and Esther was missing, whom all the neighbours knew to be a very great beauty, they procured an order from the king to Mordecai, that upon pain of death he should produce her; which he did. But perhaps I take too much notice of these Jewish fables.

Ver. 9. The maiden pleased him, and she obtained kindness of him.] That is Hegai, who was much taken with her countenance, and her mien, and her sweet disposition (it is likely), and all other things, which he thought would make her acceptable to the king.

He speedily gave her her things for purification.] That she might be fit before the usual time to go in unto the king, that is, in a year's time, as some understand it (ver. 12, 16).

With such things as belonged to her.] For her clothes and diet, which the former Targum makes to be very sumptuous.

Seven maidens.] One for every day in the week, saith the same Targum, whose names he gives us, and the days of the week on which they waited.

Which were meet to be given her.] Persons of quality, fit to attend her.

He preferred her and her maids unto the best place of the house.] And did her so much honour, that he assigned her and her maids the best apartment in the house of virgins.

Ver. 10.] Lest she should be contemned, and looked upon as no better than a slave.

Ver. 11.] He might walk there without being suspected, because he belonged to the court, and was a man of condition: for those that were carried away in Jeconiah's captivity (as his ancestors were) were of the better sort (2 Kings xxiv. 14, &c. Dan. i. 4). And Esther might find means, by some of those that attended her, to let him know the state of her health, and of her affairs.

Ver. 12. Now when every maid's turn was come to go in to king Ahasuerus, after that she had been twelve months.] They were kept close so long, that the king might be sure he should not be imposed upon by a child begotten by another man. And besides, it was suitable to the state of the king to have them wait a great while, before they were brought into his company: and another reason here follows. Herodotus explains the first words, lib. iii. cap. 69, where he saith, the Persian women go in to their husbands, ἐν κύκλῳ, “in a circle,” by turns.

Six months with oil of myrrh, and six months with sweet odours.] It is observed by Pliny, lib. xiii. cap. 1.

of myrrh, and six months with sweet odours, and with other things for the purifying of the women;]

13 Then thus came every maiden unto the king; whatsoever she desired was given her to go with her out of the house of the women unto the king's house.

14 In the evening she went, and on the morrow she returned into the second house of the women, to the custody of Shaashgaz, the king's chamberlain, which kept the concubines: she came in unto the king no more, except the king delighted in her, and that she were called by name.

15 ¶ Now when the turn of Esther, the daughter of Abihail the uncle of Mordecai, who had taken her for his daughter, was come to go that ointments were first invented by the Persians; which were very necessary in so hot a country, where men and women are apt to sweat much, and smell rankly, without great care to keep themselves clean and sweet. For which purpose the oil of myrrh was much used, being very fragrant, and apt also to make the skin soft and smooth, and to cleanse it from scurf. The sweet odour served to the same use, to take away all ill scents, and, as some think, to make the body more vigorous.

There are many authors (as Fortunatus Scacchus observes) who take the word mor to signify not myrrh, but that fragrant herb which we call marum, or as some think, marjoram, from which excellent oils were drawn (lib. i. Myrothecium, cap. 50), but he takes it, as we do, for myrrh: from whence not only a noble oil was drawn, but being beat to a powder, such a fumigation was made with it, as was offered unto their gods. Whence Athenæus blames Alexander's arrogance, for suffering Σμύρα, καὶ τὰ ἄλλα θυμάρια, "myrrh and other sweet odours to be offered to him" (lib. xii. cap. 8).

Six months] This was a long time, which was set (first with that oil, and as many more with sweet odours) for their purification: or rather for their absterion or cleansing, as the same Scacchus observes: for there were no such purifications here used, as were among the Jews; but it is a known thing, that, as women in all countries were wont to spend a great deal of time in their dressing, and trimming up of themselves, that they might appear well abroad; so much more in this country, and when they were to go to the bed of a great king. A year, indeed, was a long time; but Athenæus saith, that among the Sybarites (who were a delicate, luxurious people), there was a sanction that the women, when they were called to the public sacrifices at great festivals, πρὸ ἐνιαυτὸν εἴη παρασκευὴ ποιέσθαι, "were to make preparation for it a year before."

With other things for the purifying of the women;] Whatsoever was proper for this purpose, was used in their preparations for the king's bed.

Ver. 13.] Whatsoever ornaments or attendants she desired.

Ver. 14. On the morrow she returned into the second house of the women;] She returned no more into the former house, having lost her virginity: but was treated in another house, as one of the king's wives: for so concubines were, of a secondary sort, as I have often noted.

She come in unto the king no more, except—she were called by name;] For every one's name was registered as the Targum saith, and the night, I suppose, when she went in unto the king.

in unto the king, she required nothing but what Hegai the king's chamberlain, the keeper of the women, appointed. And Esther obtained favour in the sight of all them that looked upon her.

16 So Esther was taken unto king Ahasuerus into his house royal in the tenth month, which is the month Tebeth, in the seventh year of his reign.

17 And the king loved Esther above all the women, and she obtained grace and favour in his sight more than all the virgins; so that he set the royal crown upon her head, and made her queen instead of Vashti.

18 Then the king made a great feast unto all his princes and his servants, even Esther's feast; and he made a release to the provinces, and gave gifts, according to the state of the king.

Ver. 15. When the turn of Esther,—was come to go in unto the king, she required nothing;] But was contented with her own natural beauty, and desired nothing of art to recommend her.

But what Hegai—appointed;] Yet she did not refuse what he, who had been so kind to her, ordered for her.

Esther obtained favour in the sight of all them that looked upon her;] All that beheld her, as she passed from the house of the women to the king's house, admired her beauty: which needed no ornament, for the greatest ornaments of virgins are modesty (as Pellicanus speaks), silence, well-disciplined eyes, a serene countenance without levity, a horror of all wantonness; which meeting all in her, made her acceptable to every one that saw her.

Ver. 16. So Esther was taken unto king Ahasuerus into his house royal;] She was not sent back in the morning unto the second house of the women, as the rest were, but the king kept her in his own house, intending to make her more than a concubine.

In the tenth month,—in the seventh year of his reign;] He made the great feast we read of in the foregoing chapter in the third year of his reign, in the end of which Vashti was sent away. How it came to pass that it was so long before Esther was advanced to succeed her, seems difficult to resolve: but we are to consider, that a great deal of time was spent in gathering the virgins together, and that she was a year in preparing herself for admission to the king; and several, it is likely, went in before her, who had also their time for preparation: and took some time, it is likely, to try how he liked her wit, humour, and conversation.

Ver. 17.] She being at this time, as Jacobus Capellus computes, twenty years old, ad A. M. 3645. But some make a question whether she did not commit a great sin to come at this dignity, not considering the custom of those times and countries. For those persons whom the king took into his bed after the manner before mentioned, were not harlots, but became his wives of a lower sort; for whom he provided ever after, and they were no longer chargeable to their parents or friends; nor might any other man marry them. Such a one Esther would have been, if he had not liked her so well as to do more for her. Which, no doubt, was ordered by a special providence of God, who thus rewarded her virtue, and also preserved the whole nation of the Jews from perishing.

Ver. 18. Then the king made a great feast—even Esther's feast;] So it was called, because it was made in honour of her, and, if we may believe Josephus, lasted a whole month.

19 And when the virgins were gathered together the second time, then Mordecai sat in the king's gate.

20 Esther had not yet shewed her kindred nor her people; as Mordecai had charged her: for Esther did the commandment of Mordecai, like as when she was brought up with him.

21 ¶ In those days, while Mordecai sat in the king's gate, two of the king's chamberlains, Bigthan and Teresh, of those which kept the

He made a release to the provinces,] At this feast he gave the people some ease in their imposts, and forgave them some of the duties they were bound to pay him. Some have affirmed, that this is reported by Herodotus to have been the custom of the Persian kings at their marriages. But I can find no more than this in him, that ὁ καθιστάμενος Βασιλεὺς, "when he was made king, he remitted the tribute that was due to him from all the cities" (lib. vi. cap. 59).

And gave gifts,] He made great presents to the queen, as the manner of the Persian kings was; who gave to their queen at their marriage such a city to buy them clothes, such a one for their hair, another for their necklaces and other ornaments, and so for the rest of their expenses. Here the latter Targum tells an idle tale, how the king desired Esther to tell him what country she was of, and who were her ancestors from whom she descended. To which she answered, that her parents dying when she was an infant, she did not know who were her forefathers: which the king hearing, he released all men of their taxes, and gave them gifts, saying, I will be kind to all people of all nations, because I will be sure to be kind to the people of Esther, who are among some of them.

Ver. 19.] This doth not signify that there was another inquisition for virgins after Esther was married; but, to join this history with what follows, he repeats what was said before, ver. 2, that at the time when this second collection of virgins was made for the choice of a new wife, as there had been one before, when Vashti was married, then Mordecai was in attendance at the gate of the palace; and so proceeds to show how he discovered a plot against the life of the king.

Ver. 20. Esther had not yet shewed her kindred nor her people; as Mordecai had charged her:] Which he would not have her to discover, lest she should be door, were wroth, and sought to lay hand on the king Ahasuerus.

22 And the thing was known to Mordecai, who told it unto Esther the queen; and Esther certified the king thereof in Mordecai's name.

23 And when inquisition was made of the matter, it was found out; therefore they were both hanged on a tree: and it was written in the book of the chronicles before the king.

hated for her nation's sake, or her nation be envied for her good fortune.

For Esther did the commandment of Mordecai,] A rare example of virtue, that she should be so obedient of him when she was a queen; for most forget what they were, when they are unexpectedly grown very great.

Ver. 21.] These were two great men, who, perhaps, kept the door of the king's bedchamber, and were incensed at the divorce of Vashti (whose creatures they were), or at the advancement of Esther, knowing her to be related to Mordecai, who they were afraid would be raised to greater power than themselves. Thus the former Targum writes, "Doth not the queen by her power with the king intend to turn us out of our places, and put in Mordecai?" therefore they resolved to poison him, as both that and the latter Targum understand it.

Ver. 22.] One of their servants, whose name (as Josephus saith) was Barnabazus, discovered the conspiracy to Mordecai, who found means to inform Esther of it, and she acquainted the king with it from Mordecai.

Ver. 23. When inquisition was made of the matter it was found out;] His information which he gave to the king appeared to be true, upon a due inquiry into the matter.

Therefore they were both hanged on a tree: and it was written in the book of the chronicles before the king.] In the day-book, wherein all memorable things were recorded, to be read (as the Targum observes) before the king, when he required. Here we may see the infelicity and the danger of the most potent persons: the life of a great king depending upon the fidelity of one single person, whose service was neglected by the court, though a memorial was made of it. Thus all masters of families are obnoxious to the perfidiousness of their servants that wait upon them. They are the words of Conradus Pellicanus.

CHAPTER III.

1 Haman, advanced by the king, and despised by Mordecai, seeketh revenge upon all the Jews. 7 He casteth lots. 8 He obtaineth by calumination a decree of the king to put the Jews to death.

1 AFTER these things did king Ahasuerus promote Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, and advanced him, and set his seat above all the princes that were with him.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. After these things] About five years after, as appears from ver. 7.

Did king Ahasuerus promote Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite,] He was descended from the royal race of the Amalekites kings, and grown into great favour in this court, as Daniel and his companions, who were of noble blood also (Dan. i. 3). The latter Targum hath given us the pedigree of Haman, up to Eliphaz, the eldest son of Esau.

2 And all the king's servants, that were in the king's gate, bowed, and revered Haman: for the king had so commanded concerning him. But Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence.

And set his seat above all the princes that were with him,] Either of his own or other nations. For it is likely the Persian kings, as the Chaldee before them, had many kings and princes, whom they had conquered, with them, who had the honour sometimes to sit on royal seats before them (2 Kings xxv. 28).

Ver. 2. And all the king's servants, that were in the 3 Then the king's servants, which were in the king's gate, said unto Mordecai, Why transgressest thou the king's commandment?

4 Now it came to pass, when they spake daily unto him, and he hearkened not unto them, that they told Haman, to see whether Mordecai's matters would stand: for he had told them that he was a Jew.

5 And when Haman saw that Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence, then was Haman full of wrath.

6 And he thought scorn to lay hands on Mordecai alone; for they had shewed him the people of Mordecai: wherefore Haman sought to destroy all the Jews that were throughout the whole kingdom of Ahasuerus, even the people of Mordecai.

7 ¶ In the first month, that is, the month Nisan, in the twelfth year of king Ahasuerus, they cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman from day to day, and from month to month, to the twelfth month, that is, the month Adar.

8 ¶ And Haman said unto king Ahasuerus, There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of thy kingdom; and their laws are diverse from king's gate, bowed, and revered Haman:] To bow the knee or the body to all great persons was a common respect; for which there needed not a particular command to require this of every body with respect to Haman, since no doubt they did it to all princes, and would much more do it to him, who took place of them all, and was the prince's favourite. There was therefore some kind of divine honour intended in this: such as was paid to the Persian kings themselves, to whom the Greeks would not pay this sort of respect, because it was accounted divine. And the word reverence imports something beyond bowing, which was falling flat upon their faces to the ground. Such prostrations the kings of Persia expected: and Ahasuerus, to express his great affection to Haman, would have it paid to him. The former Targum I believe thought of this, when he saith, "They in the king's gate bowed down to his image which he had set up, and worshipped Haman."

But Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence.] Because he was of a nation devoted by God to destruction, with whom therefore the Jews would have no friendship, nor show them any kindness, but remember the injuries they had done them (Deut. xxv. 18, 19). But this doth not seem a reason weighty enough, why he should not pay him civil respect, which was given to all men in great place, especially since by denying it he might expose his whole nation to danger. This is an argument that there was something more intended: and accordingly the author of the apocryphal additions to this book understood it, who represents Mordecai praying after this manner: "Thou knowest, O Lord, that it is not contumacy, nor pride, nor desire of vain-glory, that makes me not worship Haman; for I would willingly kiss his feet, for the safety of Israel: but I do it, that I may not prefer the glory of a man to the glory of God; nor adore any one but thee my Lord alone."

Ver. 3.] I suppose it seemed strange to them, that one single person should refuse to do what everybody did, especially since thereby he disobeyed the king: therefore they expostulated with him, to make him sensible of his duty and his danger.

Ver. 4. He hearkened not unto them,] Seemed not to regard what they said, and perhaps gave them no answer.

They told Haman, to see whether Mordecai's matters would stand:] Whether he would persist in his stiffness, and what would be the issue of it.

For he had told them he was a Jew.] Being much pressed by them, he confesses the reason why he could not do as they did. For, that they might not think it was pride or sullenness, that made him not comply with the king's order, he acquaints them plainly of what religion and what nation he was; who might not show any respect to an Amalekite (as some take it) or worship any but God alone, as I take the meaning to be. And thus the latter Targum here explains it: when they asked him why he did not obey the king, he answered, "What is the son of man that he should exalt himself? what is he that is born of a woman, who comes lamenting into the world, and is of few days, and then returns to his earth, that I should worship him? No, I worship God, the living God, who endures for ever," &c. And so he goes on, describing very well the glorious majesty of God, the Lord of heaven and earth, and thus concludes, "He is to be praised by us, and before him we ought to bow down ourselves."

Ver. 5.] It is likely he did not mind what every one did that was in the king's gate (where there was a great crowd), till he was told of Mordecai's neglect: and then he marked him when he next passed by, and was highly enraged at him.

Ver. 6.] He disdain'd to take so poor a revenge as to rid himself of one man alone, but resolved to make the whole nation suffer, who he knew were enemies to that nation from whence he sprung.

Ver. 7.] It was the manner of the eastern country, by casting lots into an urn, to inquire what days would be fortunate, and what not, to undertake any business in: according to which superstition Haman endeavoured to find what time of the year was most favourable to the Jews, and what most unlucky. And first he inquired what month was most unfortunate, and found the month Adar, which was the last month in the year, answerable to our February. For, as Guill. Schieckard observes, there was no festival solemnity in this month, nor was it sanctified by any peculiar rites. And then he inquired the day, and found the thirteenth day was not auspicious to them (ver. 13). Some think there were as many lots as there were days in the year, and for every day he drew a lot; but found none to his mind, till he came to the last month of all, and to the middle of it (see Hottinger's Smegma Orientale, p. 75). Now this whole business was governed by a wonderful providence of God; by whom these lots were directed, and not by the Persian gods, to fall in the last month of the year; whereby almost a whole year intervened between the design and its execution, and gave time for Mordecai to acquaint Esther with it, and for her to intercede with the king, for the revoking or suspending his decree, and disappointing the conspiracy.

Ver. 8. Haman said unto king Ahasuerus,] Or rather had said: for it is not likely he would cast his lots till he knew his mind, for fear he should lose his labour.

There is a certain people scattered abroad, and dispersed among the people in all the provinces] For a great number of them, being well settled in the land of their captivity, would not return to Judea when Cyrus gave them leave; whom Haman represents as a despicable people, or vagrants and stragglers (as the latter Tar-all people; neither keep they the king's laws; therefore it is not for the king's profit to suffer them.

9 If it please the king, let it be written that they may be destroyed: and I will pay ten thousand talents of silver to the hands of those that have the charge of the business, to bring it into the king's treasuries.

10 And the king took his ring from his hand, and gave it unto Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, the Jews' enemy.

11 And the king said unto Haman, The silver is given to thee, the people also, to do with them as it seemeth good to thee.

12 Then were the king's scribes called on the thirteenth day of the first month, and there was written according to all that Haman had commanded unto the king's lieutenants, and to the governors that were over every province, and to the rulers of every people of every province according to the writing thereof, and to every people after their language; in the name of king Ahasuerus was it written, and sealed with the king's ring.

13 And the letters were sent by posts into all the king's provinces, to destroy, to kill, and to cause to perish, all Jews, both young and old, little children and women, in one day, even upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month Adar, and to take the spoil of them for a prey.

14 The copy of the writing for a commandment to be given in every province was published unto all people, that they should be ready against that day.

15 The posts went out, being hastened by the gum understands it), dispersed here and there up and down in his dominions.

Their laws are diverse from all people; neither keep they the king's laws:] A proud, high-spirited people (as the same Targum represents the sense), who live by laws of their own, and will observe none of the king's; for they will neither eat of our meat, nor drink of our wine, nor keep our festivals: but have several of their own, on which they will not work, nor do the king's business. All which he sets forth at large in that paraphrase.

Therefore it is not for the king's profit to suffer them.] The former Targum thus glosses upon these words, "The king gets nothing by them, while they live in this kingdom; but what will he not get if he destroys them all?" The other Targum makes him represent them as griping usurers, which was to the damage of the king's people.

Ver. 9. If it please the king, let it be written that they may be destroyed:] He desires, not only a verbal command, but an order in writing, for their utter extirpation as a pestilent people.

I will pay ten thousand talents of silver] He promises to compensate the loss of the tribute which they paid yearly by a vast sum of money, which he would pay immediately. But he intended not to pay one farthing of it himself, it being easy to raise it out of the spoil of the Jews' goods (ver. 13).

To the hands of those that have the charge of the business,] Not of those who had the charge to kill them, but of those that received the king's money; as appears by the next words, "to bring it into the king's treasuries." And so the same Targum, "I will pay it into the hands of those who coin the king's money;" that is, into the mint, as we now speak.

Ver. 10.] Without any examination into the condition of the people, he consented to their destruction. So loath are men that love their pleasure to take any pains to distinguish between truth and falsehood.

Ver. 11.] He gave him power to draw up what decree he pleased, and seal it with his own ring; but as for the money, he loved him so much, he would have none of it.

Ver. 12. Then were the king's scribes called] As there were sacred scribes among the Jews, who were men learned in the law, so there were political both among them and other nations, as L'Empereur observes upon Bertram, De Repub. Jud. p. 381. And there were two sorts of them; one of which was employed in writing public letters or contracts, and other acts that were to be signed by authority, the more honourable and highest of which were such as are called here the "king's scribes," whom the Chaldees call the king's notaries, and we now call secretaries of state.

On the thirteenth day of the first month,] This was not wisely projected, to let his design be known so long before it was to take effect; for the king's mind might alter, or the Jews might find some way to deliver themselves, or might steal out of the kingdom.

In the name of king Ahasuerus was it written, and sealed with the king's ring.] He himself indited the decree by the royal authority, and made it, no doubt, as strict as it was possible; and perhaps commanded it to be executed under great penalties, by all manner of officers, who were required to take care to see it done. And that none might be ignorant, it was written in the language of every people, and in the character they could read.

Ver. 13. The letters were sent by posts into all the king's provinces,] Concerning these posts which were in use among the Persians, see Herodotus, lib. viii. cap. 98, where, describing the despatches, which were sent into Persia, to carry the news of Xerxes's overthrow, he saith, Τοῦτ' ἔστιν δὲ τῶν Ἀγγέλων οὐδὲν ἔστι δάσσειν, ὅτι παραγίνεται θνητὸν ἄνθρωπον, &c. "There is nothing upon earth swifter than these messengers, whom neither snow, nor rain, nor heat, nor night, can hinder from finishing their course speedily." The manner of which he there sets down, which the Persians, he saith, call Ἀγγαίον.

To take the spoil of them for a prey.] This was a strong motive to such a bloody execution, that they who killed them should enrich themselves by their spoil.

Ver. 14.] Copies of this original decree of the king were sent into every province, and there ordered to be published, requiring them to be ready against that day.

Ver. 15. The posts went out, being hastened by the king's commandment, and the decree was given in Shushan] He procured a new commandment from the king, requiring their speedy delivery of this decree, that the people might not want time to prepare for its execution; and he also got it signed by the king's council: for that seems to be meant by its being given in Shushan.

The king and Haman sat down to drink:] It is likely Haman made an entertainment for the king, to thank him for his great kindness to him in this grant.

But the city Shushan was perplexed.] The Jews king's commandment, and the decree was given in Shushan the palace. And the king and Haman sat down to drink; but the city Shushan was perplexed.

that lived there, who were very numerous, knew not what to do: and it is probable other people in the city were very fearful what would become of them; not knowing but that they might also suffer in such a massacre: and perhaps some of them were related to the Jews, or had made friendship with them, and therefore were much concerned at this horrid decree.

CHAPTER IV.

- 1 The great mourning of Mordecai and the Jews. 4 Esther, understanding it, sendeth to Mordecai, who sheweth the cause, and adviseth her to undertake the suit. 10 She excusing herself is threatened by Mordecai. 15 She appointing a fast undertaketh the suit.

1 WHEN Mordecai perceived all that was done, Mordecai rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth with ashes, and went out into the midst of the city, and cried with a loud and a bitter cry;

2 And came even before the king's gate: for none might enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth.

3 And in every province, whithersoever the king's commandment and his decree came, there was great mourning among the Jews, and fasting, and weeping, and wailing; and many lay in sackcloth and ashes.

4 ¶ So Esther's maids and her chamberlains came and told it her. Then was the queen exceedingly grieved; and she sent raiment to clothe Mordecai, and to take away his sackcloth from him: but he received it not.

5 Then called Esther for Hatach, one of the king's chamberlains, whom he had appointed to attend upon her, and gave him a commandment to Mordecai, to know what it was, and why it was.

6 So Hatach went forth to Mordecai unto the street of the city, which was before the king's gate.

7 And Mordecai told him of all that had happened unto him, and of the sum of the money that Haman had promised to pay to the king's treasuries for the Jews, to destroy them.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. When Mordecai perceived all that was done,] Which it is likely he heard by some friend before it was publicly known, but did not express his grief till the edict was hung up.

Mordecai rent his clothes,] Both before and behind, saith the latter Targum.

And put on sackcloth with ashes,] As the manner was, in great sorrow.

And went out into the midst of the city, and cried with a loud and a bitter cry:] Saying, as the same Targum expresses it, What a heavy decree is this which the king and Haman have passed upon us? Not against a part of us, but upon us all, to root us out of the earth: whereupon all the Jews flocked about him; and he caused the book of the law to be brought to the gate of Shushan, covered with sackcloth; and therein he read those words of Moses in Deut. iv. 30, 31, "When thou art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee, in the latter days, if thou turn to the Lord thy God, and shall be obedient to his voice (for the Lord thy God is a merciful God), he will not forsake thee, nor destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers, which he sware unto them." After which he exhorted them to fasting, humiliation, and repentance, according to the example of the Ninevites.

Ver. 2. And came even before the king's gate:] That his cry might come to the ears of Esther. But he durst not take his place in the gate, because none that were in mourning might come there: so careful they were, not in the least to disturb the king in his pleasures. By this it appears, as from many other places, that in the gate they made their court, as we speak, and despatched all public affairs (as I have noted often before), which was here practised more than in other places, because the Persian monarchs lived more retired than other princes, few but those who attended them being admitted into their palace.

Ver. 3.] All day long they fasted, and wept, and lamented themselves; and in the night many lay, not in their beds, but on the ground in sackcloth and ashes.

Ver. 4. So Esther's maids and her chamberlains came and told it her.] As a piece of news, or perhaps they understood there was some relation between them.

Then was the queen exceedingly grieved:] Imagining some mischief had befallen him, and not knowing what it was.

She sent raiment to clothe Mordecai,] That he might come to court, and take his place in the gate.

But he received it not.] This, no doubt, very much increased her grief.

Ver. 5. Then called Esther for Hatach, one of the king's chamberlains,] In whom the king had a great confidence, and whom she could intrust with such a message.

And gave him a commandment to Mordecai, to know what it was,] What was the cause of his weeping and wailing, and why he would not accept of the garments which she sent him; as the latter Targum very well explains it.

Ver. 6.] Where, it is like, he still continued lamenting their miserable condition.

Ver. 7. Mordecai told him of all that had happened unto him,] How he had refused to worship Haman (as the former Targum explains it), and how this had incensed him against the whole nation.

And of the sum of the money that Haman had promised to pay] The ten thousand talents he had offered, to procure the king's consent to their destruction.

Some of the Jews here add another marvellous thing which had happened to Mordecai the very night before Hatach came to him, which he desired Esther might be acquainted withal: whether it be true or false, I think fit here to remember it (it seeming to be so piously designed), as I had it, near threescore years ago, from a great man in the Jewish learning,

8 Also he gave him the copy of the writing of the decree that was given at Shushan to destroy them, to shew it unto Esther, and to declare it unto her, and to charge her that she should go in unto the king, to make supplication unto him, and to make request before him for her people.

9 And Hatach came and told Esther the words of Mordecai.

10 ¶ Again Esther spake unto Hatach, and gave him commandment unto Mordecai;

11 All the king's servants, and the people of the king's provinces, do know, that whosoever, whether man or woman, shall come unto the king into the inner court, who is not called, there is one law of his to put him to death, except such to whom the king shall hold out the golden sceptre, that he may live: but I have not been called to come in unto the king these thirty days.

who quotes for it R. Moses Almosnino, in a book called Jede Moseh (the hands of Moses), where he says, That Mordecai going home in great heaviness, reflecting on the danger his whole nation was in, met three boys coming from school, whom he examined what they had learned that day; one of them told him his lesson had been in Prov. iii. 25, 26, "Be not afraid of sudden fear, nor of the desolation of the wicked when it cometh: for the Lord shall be thy confidence," &c. Then Mordecai cried out, I am confident this desolation shall not be so speedy. Then the second child told him he had learned that day, Isa. viii. 10, "Take counsel together, it shall come to nought; speak the word (or pronounce the decree), it shall not stand; for God is with us." O the wonderful goodness of God, said Mordecai, that thus out of the mouth of babes and sucklings ordaineth strength! And what have you learned? said he, to the third child; who answered, Isa. xli. 4, "Even to your old age I am he (that is, the God); unto hoar hairs will I carry you; I have made, and I will bear: even I will carry, and will deliver you." Now, blessed be God, cried Mordecai, that hath not left us comfortless; his hand shall be with us, as in former ages, &c. But another great man, in this learning, hath lately admonished me that this rabbin is but of yesterday, and designed to elude the prophecy of Psalm viii. quoted in the gospel, and therefore unworthy to be mentioned in this place.

Ver. 8. Also he gave him the copy of the writing of the decree] That she might be fully satisfied what was intended.

To charge her that she should go in unto the king,] He charged her, I suppose, in the name of God, or, as she loved her nation, to go and earnestly to beseech the king to be merciful to the Jews, as the Targum expounds it.

Ver. 11. All the king's servants, and the people of the king's provinces, do know,] That is, nobody, either in the court or in the whole kingdom, was ignorant.

That whosoever,—shall come unto the king in the inner court, who is not called,] Here the king kept retired from all company, but such as he called for, or was pleased to admit.

There is one law of his to put him to death,] Let him be of ever such quality there was no exception: but one law reached all that were so presumptuous. This seems to have been an ancient law in that country, mentioned by Herodotus, lib. i. and Athenæus, lib. xii. But the former Targum will have it, that it was 12 And they told to Mordecai Esther's words.

13 Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther, Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews.

14 For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?

15 ¶ Then Esther bade them return Mordecai this answer,

16 Go, gather together all the Jews that are present in Shushan, and fast ye for me, and neither eat nor drink three days, night or day: I also and my maidens will fast likewise; and so procured by Haman, that none might come into the king's presence unless he introduced them.

Except such to whom the king shall hold out the golden sceptre,] Which, I suppose, was so seldom done, that few would venture to stand in need of a pardon. A sceptre was the ensign of the highest and most absolute authority: so that, as Wagenseil observes, when Mordecai was advanced to the greatest dignity next to the king, having royal apparel, and a great crown on his head (viii. 15), yet he had no sceptre; for that was proper and peculiar to the king.

But I have not been called to come in unto the king these thirty days,] Which might justly make her fear his love was cooled to her, and then her person and petition might not be acceptable to him.

Ver. 12.] There seems to have been more than one person that went with this message, to confirm the truth of what she said.

Ver. 13.] He would not have her flatter herself with a vain imagination, that because she was queen she should be spared; for she would find no more privilege in the king's house than the rest of the Jews did abroad.

Ver. 14.] He did not know whence, but he confided in God, that by some means or other he would preserve them from utter destruction. And would have her believe that God would cut off her and her family for self-love, and want of zeal to preserve her nation. Rather than refuse to intercede for her people, he would have her think (though there was danger in it) that God had raised her up to the dignity in which she was, on purpose that she might be the deliverer of her people, and therefore go courageously about it.

Ver. 16. Go, gather together all the Jews that are present in Shushan,] Not all into one public congregation, for that might have given suspicion of an intended insurrection, but in several private assemblies.

And fast ye for me, and neither eat nor drink three days, night or day:] None, or very few, could keep a fast for three days and nights, without tasting any meat or drink: the meaning therefore is, that they should make no set meal in their families, neither dinner nor supper, but only eat and drink so much at night as would support them in prayer to God for a blessing upon her undertaking; or, as Josephus understands it, they should abstain from all delicacies, and be content with hard and coarse fare. But Drusius thinks this fast was only one whole day and two nights, according as it is said of our Saviour, that he lay three days and three nights in the grave; and then they will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law : and if I perish, I perish.

might fast so long without taking any refreshment : and in those hot countries we read of monks that fasted four or five days.

I also and my maidens will fast likewise ;] It is not likely her maidens were Jews ; yet notwithstanding they might be disposed to fast with her ; which was not unusual with the gentiles in times of great distress, as appears by the story of the Ninivites, whose fast the Targum thinks Mordecai imitated, making the cattle, oxen, and sheep to abstain, as well as men and women.

And so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law :] Being thus recommended to God, she resolved not so much to regard the law, as the preservation of her people ; for there are in some cases such violent circumstances, that to observe the law, as Grotius notes, would be to offend the chiefest law. Whither Puffendorf refers what we read in Valerius Maximus, lib. iii. cap. 7, n. 1, cap. 8, n. 6.

17 So Mordecai went his way, and did according to all that Esther had commanded him.

And if I perish, I perish.] This is not a speech of despondence, but of courage and resolution ; being as much as to say, I am content to perish in so good a cause ; and if I perish for it in this world (as the Targum glosses), I shall have my portion in the world to come.

Ver. 17.] Betook himself to fasting and prayer (unto which he called all the Jews) as long as Esther required, omitting the joys of the paschal feast, and turning it into a fast, if we may believe the former Targum : for that paraphrast thinks, that Haman laying his plot in the month of Nisan (ii. 7), and Mordecai presently applying himself to defeat it, these things must fall out about the passover, which was in this month. But in memory of this the Jews keep a fast on the thirteenth of Adar, which they call Esther's fast.

CHAPTER V.

1 Esther, adventuring on the king's favour, obtaineth the grace of the golden sceptre, and inviteth the king and Haman to a banquet. 6 She, being encouraged by the king in her suit, inviteth them to another banquet the next day. 9 Haman, proud of his advancement, repenteth at the contempt of Mordecai. 14 By the counsel of Zeresh he buildeth for him a pair of gallows.

1 Now it came to pass on the third day, that Esther put on her royal apparel, and stood in the inner court of the king's house, over against the king's house : and the king sat upon his royal throne in the royal house, over against the gate of the house.

2 And it was so, when the king saw Esther the queen standing in the court, that she obtained favour in his sight : and the king held out to Esther the golden sceptre that was in his hand. So Esther drew near, and touched the top of the sceptre.

3 Then said the king unto her, What wilt thou, queen Esther ? and what is thy request ? it shall be even given thee to the half of the kingdom.

4 And Esther answered, If it seem good unto the king, let the king and Haman come this day unto the banquet that I have prepared for him.

5 And the king said, Cause Haman to make haste, that he may do as Esther hath said. So

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. On the third day,] In the conclusion of the fast, or, as the former Targum, on the third day of the passover.

That Esther put on her royal apparel, and stood in the inner court] But first, saith the latter Targum, she made a solemn prayer to God, with many tears, as soon as she was dressed, saying, "Thou art the great God, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God of my father Benjamin : as thou didst deliver Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, out of the fiery furnace, and Daniel from the lion's den, so deliver me now out of the hand of the king, and give me grace and favour in his eyes," &c. And so he goes on in a very long prayer.

The king sat—over against the gate of the house.] So that he could see every one that came into the court.

Ver. 2. When the king saw Esther—she obtained favour in his sight :] He was much moved, saith the former Targum, to see trouble in her countenance, and her eyes full of tears ; and so immediately comforted her in the manner following.

The king held out to Esther the golden sceptre] In token of his favour, and inviting her approach. But the other Targum says, that the officers about him, as soon as she entered, ran to apprehend her, that she might be put to death : but the king stopped them, by his showing she was acceptable to him. So true is that of Solomon, "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord ; as the rivers of water, he turneth it whithersoever he will" (Prov. xxi. 1).

So Esther—touched the top of the sceptre.] Kissed it, saith the Vulgar, or put her hand under it, saith Grotius, in token of her subjection and thankfulness for his favour.

Ver. 3.] This is a usual form of speech among kings, when their hearts are enlarged, and they overflow with affection to others, or when they give them the freest liberty to demand what they please, as Grotius explains it upon Matt. xiv. 7. It is a foolish addition, which the latter Targum here makes, that he excepted one thing, which was the building the house of the sanctuary at Jerusalem, which he would not grant, because he promised Geshem, Sanballat, and Tobiah, it should not be built, lest the Jews should rebel.

Ver. 4.] It was very prudent not to open her mind presently, but first to endear his affection by feasting, music, dancing, and whatsoever might please him : and it was no small pleasure, it is likely, that she invited his favourite to come to her entertainment together with him. There was also a singular providence of God in this matter, which so disposed her mind, that the high honour the king bestowed on Mordecai the next day might fall out between this and that, and make way for her petition.

Ver. 5. Cause Haman to make haste.] Get himself ready with all speed.

the king and Haman came to the banquet that Esther had prepared.

6 ¶ And the king said unto Esther at the banquet of wine, What is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee: and what is thy request? even to the half of the kingdom it shall be performed.

7 Then answered Esther, and said, My petition and my request is;

8 If I have found favour in the sight of the king, and if it please the king to grant my petition, and to perform my request, let the king and Haman come to the banquet that I shall prepare for them, and I will do to morrow as the king hath said.

9 ¶ Then went Haman forth that day joyful and with a glad heart: but when Haman saw Mordecai in the king's gate, that he stood not up, nor moved for him, he was full of indignation against Mordecai.

10 Nevertheless Haman refrained himself:

Ver. 6. The king said unto Esther at the banquet of wine.] At the conclusion of the entertainment: for they did not drink wine, but water, at the beginning of their feasts.

What is thy petition?] This shows it was not a sudden passion of love that made him speak so kindly to her before, but he had a settled affection for her, which disposed him to be very bountiful, and showed he was much pleased with her entertainment.

Ver. 8.] That is, make her request to him; which she thought would be more seasonable, when she had won his heart by fresh expressions of her desire to please him, and obtained also a new promise from him, that he would deny her nothing: for there was need of a great preparation, to dispose him to do so great a thing for her, as to revoke or suspend his own decree. The latter Targum, after his fashion, gives several frivolous reasons why she invited Haman to the banquet twice; but the last of them is tolerable. The Israelites were in great expectation of the issue of this feasting, and hoped to see Haman presently cut off; but she was resolved to turn their thoughts the right way, that is, from her unto God, looking for mercy from their heavenly Father.

Ver. 9. Then went Haman forth that day joyful] To think he was in such favour with the queen, as well as with the king. The Targum still repeats it, that he saw Mordecai would not rise up before this image.

Ver. 10. Nevertheless Haman refrained himself.] From taking any sudden revenge.

He sent and called for his friends, and Zeresh his wife.] The daughter of Totni (saith the latter Targum), one of the king of Persia's governors beyond the river.

Ver. 11. Haman told them of the glory of his riches,] How splendidly he lived.

And the multitude of his children,] It was a glory in this country, as Drusius observes, to have abundance of children; but the Targum had no shame, when he affirms he had two hundred and fourscore, besides those ten that were princes in the provinces, and besides Shimstæus the king's secretary.

All the things wherein the king had promoted him,] What offices and dignities he had conferred upon him and when he came home, he sent and called for his friends, and Zeresh his wife.

11 And Haman told them of the glory of his riches, and the multitude of his children, and all the things wherein the king had promoted him, and how he had advanced him above the princes and servants of the king.

12 Haman said moreover, Yea, Esther the queen did let no man come in with the king unto the banquet that she had prepared but myself; and to morrow am I invited unto her also with the king.

13 Yet all this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king's gate.

14 ¶ Then said Zeresh his wife and all his friends unto him, Let a gallows be made of fifty cubits high, and to morrow speak thou unto the king that Mordecai may be hanged thereon: then go thou in merrily with the king unto the banquet. And the thing pleased Haman; and he caused the gallows to be made.

How he had advanced him] So that he took place of the greatest princes who were natives of the country, and of all the officers in the court.

Ver. 12.] He did not fail to relate the peculiar honour the queen had done him, which he could not but look upon as a token that he was established in the favour of the court.

Ver. 13.] How small a matter will spoil all the satisfaction of those who are arrived at the top of human felicity! immense riches, glory, and honour, gave not Haman so much pleasure, as he felt pain from one man's disrespect unto him: and yet he might have given himself case before this, by speaking one word to the king to displace Mordecai, or put him to death, if his pride and passion would have let him be contented, without the destruction of a whole nation.

Ver. 14. Let a gallows be made of fifty cubits high,] That men might see him that was hanged on it afar off, and be struck with the greater terror, by that spectacle, of giving any disgust to Haman. They advised him not to wait till the general slaughter of all the Jews, but to rid him presently of Mordecai: for which he had now a fair opportunity, being to attend on the king to-morrow unto the banquet.

Then go thou in merrily with the king unto the banquet.] When his heart was eased of this trouble, the despatch of his enemy, and the banquet, giving him a double pleasure.

He caused the gallows to be made.] And set up before the door of Mordecai's house, saith the former Targum, against the plain words of this history, vii. 9, where it is said, they stood in Haman's house; from whence, it is possible, he intended to remove them to the door of Mordecai: that Targum hath a great deal of frivolous stuff about this consultation which Haman's friends had how to destroy Mordecai; some advising one way, and some another, but none approved of till this was propounded. The reason given for it is foolish; but at last he concludes piously, that the Jews were extremely troubled at the sight of the gallows, and all cried to God in the words of the Psalmist (exxiii. 2), "Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that he have mercy upon us."

CHAPTER VI

1 Ahasuerus, reading in the chronicles of the good service done by Mordecai, taketh care for his reward. A Haman, coming to sue that Mordecai might be hanged, unawares giveth counsel that he might do him honour.
 12 Complaining of his misfortune, his friends tell him of his final destiny.

1 Ox that night could not the king sleep, and he commanded to bring the book of records of the chronicles; and they were read before the king.

2 And it was found written, that Mordecai had told of Bigthana and Teresh, two of the king's chamberlains, the keepers of the door, who sought to lay hand on the king Ahasuerus.

3 And the king said, What honour and dignity hath been done to Mordecai for this? Then said the king's servants that ministered unto him, There is nothing done for him.

4 ¶ And the king said, Who is in the court? Now Haman was come into the outward court of the king's house, to speak unto the king to hang Mordecai on the gallows that he had prepared for him.

5 And the king's servants said unto him, Behold, Haman standeth in the court. And the king said, Let him come in.

6 So Haman came in. And the king said unto him, What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour? Now Haman thought in his heart, To whom would the king delight to do honour more than to myself?

7 And Haman answered the king, For the man whom the king delighteth to honour,

8 Let the royal apparel be brought which the king useth to wear, and the horse that the king rideth upon, and the crown royal which is set upon his head:

9 And let this apparel and horse be delivered to the hand of one of the king's most noble princes, that they may array the man withal whom the king delighteth to honour, and bring him on horseback through the street of the city,

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. On that night could not the king sleep,] Now follows a wonderful turn of affairs: God so disposing it, that the king could take no rest in the night; and instead of music and singing, and diverting himself with his wives and concubines, he called for the records of the kingdom to be read to him.

He commanded to bring the book of records of the chronicles:] These were diaries, wherein was set down what passed every day, which we now call journals (as I observed ii. 13). And in them it was the manner of the Persians to set down the names of those who had done the king any eminent service; as Grotius notes out of Herodotus, Thucydides, and Procopius.

Ver. 2.] It was a singular providence of God, that they should read in that very part of the book wherein the service of Mordecai was recorded. And the latter Targum, to increase the wonder, saith, that Shimstæus, who brought the book, and opened it at this place, seeing this which was written of Mordecai, turned over the leaves, and would have read in another part of the book; but the leaves flew back again to the same place where he opened it, and he was forced to read that story to the king.

Ver. 3.] Great men sometimes are unmindful of the highest services that are done them, and take no care to reward them. Though some think the king ordered him a reward, of which, by the artifice of those in the court, who hated the Jews, he was deprived. But there was a special providence in it, that he went without a reward then, which procured it for him most opportunely at this time. It is not improbable, that, as Josephus saith, the history of some of his ancestors was read before they came to his reign; wherein was set down what service men had done, and what preferment or gifts had been bestowed upon them; which moved the king to ask, when they came to this story of Mordecai, what had been done for him?

Ver. 4. Who is in the court?] For he was resolved immediately to show how sensible he was of his service.

Now Haman was come into the outward court] Vol. II.—88

He was come very early to court, that he might gratify his revenge, and go with more pleasure to the banquet. This was another part of God's providence, to bring him so soon to court when the king was thus disposed.

Ver. 5.] Which he durst not do, as great as he was, without leave.

Ver. 6. What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour?] The king, in all probability, would not have asked this question, but ordered himself what he thought fit, if God had not intended that Mordecai should have the greatest honour done him, and that by the judgment of his greatest enemy.

To whom would the king delight to do honour more than to myself?] He had reason to think so, because he had already heaped so many favours upon him, and was now invited by the queen to keep him company at her banquet.

Ver. 8. Let the royal apparel be brought which the king useth to wear,] When he went abroad, and appeared publicly among his people; which should rather be translated, "the royal robe," an external garment, or stole, coming down to his feet, which none wore but himself.

The horse that the king rideth upon,] I suppose it was a horse which none might ride upon but himself; like the mule among the kings of Israel, which was peculiarly appointed to their own use, as I have noted on 1 Kings i. 33, Herodotus (lib. i.) mentions such a generous and most noble horse belonging to the king of Persia.

The crown royal which is set upon his head:] That is, upon the horse's head, upon which there was a royal ornament; as there is now at Rome, called a fiocco. For keter is a large word, signifying any ornament about the head or the neck. And that this refers to the horse, not to the king, is plain in the Hebrew, and from the next verse, and ver. 10, 11, where there is no more mention of this keter; but only of the robe, and of the horse to which this royal ornament upon his head belonged (see Ludovicus De Dieu).

Ver. 9.] This proclamation, in all likelihood, was made by some public officer.

and proclaim before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour.

10 Then the king said to Haman, Make haste, and take the apparel and the horse, as thou hast said, and do even so to Mordecai the Jew, that sitteth at the king's gate: let nothing fail of all that thou hast spoken.

11 Then took Haman the apparel and the horse, and arrayed Mordecai, and brought him on horseback through the street of the city, and proclaimed before him, Thus shall it be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour.

12 ¶ And Mordecai came again to the king's gate. But Haman hasted to his house mourning, and having his head covered.

13 And Haman told Zeresh his wife and all his friends every thing that had befallen him. Then said his wise men and Zeresh his wife unto him, If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt not prevail against him, but shalt surely fall before him.

14 And while they were yet talking with him, came the king's chamberlains, and hasted to bring Haman unto the banquet that Esther had prepared.

Ver. 10.] It is very likely these words astonished Haman, and made as great commotions in him, as the Targum here describes: but he durst not dispute the king's command, nor ask him what Mordecai he meant (there being many of that name), when the king had plainly told him on whom it was he intended to bestow this honour. But if he made any difficulty to obey this command, or desired to be excused, the king bade him say no more, but go (as the verse concludes), and "let nothing fail of all that he had spoken."

Ver. 11.] At which sight (saith the latter Targum) Esther praised God in the words of the Psalmist, cxiii. 7, 8. "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill: that he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people." And Mordecai said those words, Ps. xxx. 11, 12, "Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing: thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness: I will praise thee, O Lord God my redeemer, that thou hast not let mine enemy triumph over me."

Ver. 12. Mordecai came again to the king's gate.] Returned to his duty, clothed, not in sackcloth, as the Targum represents him (for then he might not have come there), but in his own raiment. Showing he was not puffed up with the honour that had been done him; but foreseeing, no doubt, the happy event which followed.

But Haman hasted to his house—having his head covered.] Which was a token of sadness and dejection.

Ver. 13. Haman told Zeresh his wife and all his friends] Who were waiting to hear what was become of Mordecai, whom they advised to get hanged on the gallows.

Every thing that had befallen him.] How cross every thing had fallen out to him that morning.

Then said his wise men and Zeresh his wife] They whose counsel he had used in his divination by lots now changed their mind; and his wife concurred in opinion with them, that these were bad omens.

If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews,—thou shalt not prevail against him.] They had observed, it is likely, how the Jews had been wonderfully raised from under great oppressions, since the time of Cyrus; and thence concludes there was a particular providence that took care of them. And it is possible they had heard something of the oracle against the Amalekites, that they should perish by the hands of the Jews. And, as Dr. Jackson excellently notes (book i. on the Creed, ch. 21), Those plots which would have crushed other nations, did often turn to their advancement, and the fall of their enemies. Whence both their rising and falling, and consequently the success of such as opposed them, was in the apprehension of wise men of other nations merely fatal; altogether incorrigible by worldly policy. Whence these wise men of Chaldea (as he calls them), upon the first notice of the wind's turning for them, read Haman's destiny. And accordingly Achior's speech to Holofernes, Judith v. 17, &c. (whether truly uttered, or feigned by the penman of the history), was framed according to the known experience of those times, and contained such advices as a faithful counsellor, well acquainted with the estate of the Jews, should have given to his lord, who did not so well understand it.

Ver. 14.] He hearing their opinion that these things boded some evil to him, was very slow, we may well suppose, in his motion; and could have been content, perhaps, not to have gone to the banquet: or he was musing what to do for his preservation, which made him stay longer than he should have done, before he waited on the king to it.

CHAPTER VII.

1 Esther, entertaining the king and Haman, maketh suit for her own life and her people's. She accuseth Haman.
7 The king in his anger, understanding of the gallows which Haman had made for Mordecai, causeth him to be hanged thereon.

1 So the king and Haman came to banquet with Esther the queen.

2 And the king said again unto Esther on the second day at the banquet of wine, What is thy petition, queen Esther? and it shall be granted thee: and what is thy request? and it shall be performed, even to the half of the kingdom.

3 Then Esther the queen answered and said, If I have found favour in thy sight, O king, and promise, renewed the third time, gave her courage to present her suit to him.

Ver. 2. The king said again unto Esther—at the banquet of wine.] When his heart was merry, and highly delighted with his entertainment.

Ver. 3. Then Esther the queen] Lifting up her eyes to heaven, as the Targum enlarges it.

If I have found favour in thy sight, O king,] Thus

What is thy request? and it shall be performed,] This

if it please the king, let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request :

4 For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish. But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue, although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage.

5 ¶ Then the king Ahasuerus answered and said unto Esther the queen, Who is he, and where is he, that durst presume in his heart to do so ?

6 And Esther said, The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman. Then Haman was afraid before the king and the queen.

7 ¶ And the king arising from the banquet of wine in his wrath went into the palace garden. and Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther the queen ; for he saw that there was evil determined against him by the king.

8 Then the king returned out of the palace garden into the place of the banquet of wine ; and Haman was fallen upon the bed whereon Esther was. Then said the king, Will he force the queen also before me in the house ? As the word went out of the king's month, they covered Haman's face.

9 And Harbonah, one of the chamberlains, said before the king, Behold also, the gallows fifty cubits high, which Haman had made she prefaced to her request, when she only besought him to accept of a banquet from her.

My people at my request :] That is, the life of her people.

Ver. 4. For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed.] For Haman had offered a great sum of money to purchase their destruction. She uses so many words, that she might express the outrageous mischief intended against them, which was no less than their extermination.

But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen I had held my tongue.] For that might have turned to the king's profit, and they might, at one time or other, have recovered their liberty.

Although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage.] The king would not have gained so much as he would have lost by it. But there is another interpretation which Aben Ezra mentions, who takes the Hebrew word hazkar not to signify an enemy, but distress, misery, and trouble. Which makes this sense, "If they had sold us for slaves, I had not troubled the king with my petition, because that misery of ours would not have been so much to the king's damage" (see De Dieu).

Ver. 5.] It seemed incredible that any man should entertain such a thought (for the king, I suppose, had forgot the decree Haman had obtained from him), to cut off a whole nation. In the Hebrew the words are, "Who is he whose heart hath filled him to do so ?" A speech like that in the New Testament, Acts v. 3, "Why hath Satan filled thine heart ?" Made thee so daring and presumptuous. The like, Eccles. viii. 11.

Ver. 6. The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman.] She found now that she need not fear to speak plainly.

Then Haman was afraid before the king and the queen.] For he could not but see the danger he was in to lose his greatness and his life. And his fear was the greater, now he knew that the queen was one of that nation whom he had conspired to destroy.

Ver. 7. And the king arising from the banquet of wine in his wrath went into the palace garden :] To take breath, and cool himself ; being in a great commotion, by variety of passions boiling and struggling in him. For as he loved the queen, so he loved Haman ; and yet was full of indignation that he should engage him in such an odious design.

Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther.] Who he thought might have so much tenderness as to take compassion upon him and forgive him.

For he saw that there was evil determined against him by the king.] Which he discerned by the king's countenance, and by his going out of the room in a great fume, and violent passion ; which, it is likely, broke out into threatening words.

Ver. 8. Then the king returned—and Haman was fallen upon the bed whereon Esther was.] They sat, or rather lay upon beds, as they ate and drank ; and Haman fell down as a suppliant at the feet of Esther laying his hand upon her knees, and beseeching her to take pity upon him. I have not read anywhere that this was the manner among the Persians ; but it was among the Greeks and Romans, to embrace the knees of those whom they petitioned to be favourable to them. Inasmuch, that it was a rite in their religious worship to touch the knees of their gods (see Pliny, lib. xi. cap. 45). And thus Sulpitius Severus takes it to have been done here, "Deinde regressus rex, vidit Aman reginæ genua amplexum."

Will he force the queen also before me in the house ?] The king finding him in this posture, interpreted it, as if he were so imprudent as, before the king's face, and in his own palace, to offer violence to the queen's chastity. Not that he believed this was his intention ; but in his furious passion he turned every thing to the worst sense, and made use of it to aggravate his crime.

As the word went out of the king's mouth, they covered Haman's face.] That he might not see the face of the king any more ; or rather, as a man condemned, this told him his doom ; for it is likely the king, when he saw him in that posture, made a sign what they should do with him, which immediately was performed. Though Aben Ezra saith, this was always done to those with whom the king was angry, though they were not put to death ; to show them what they deserved, never to see the king more.

Ver. 9. Harbonah, one of the chamberlains, said before the king.] The latter Targum saith, that this Harbonah was one of Haman's counsel, who advised him to set up the gallows to hang Mordecai ; but seeing this strange turn of affairs, incensed the king, by telling him what Haman designed against him who had saved the king's life.

Behold also the gallows fifty cubits high, which Haman had made for Mordecai.] Upon which he intended to make Mordecai an example to all those that should presume to offend him.

Hang him thereon.] But whether dead or alive is not said, as Salmasius observes ; who shows, by many instances (in his book De Cruce, p. 494), that it was the manner of the Persians, first to cut off the heads of malefactors, and then to hang them on a gibbet. Josephus, indeed, saith that he commanded Haman, ἐκ σταυροῦ κρεμασθῆναι ἀποθανεῖν, "to be put to death hanging on a cross ;" but crucifying was not a Persian punishment ; nor did the Romans let the bodies of malefactors die on the cross themselves ; but they extinguished them some other way.

Ver. 10. So they hanged Haman on the gallows] The latter Targum here adds a great deal of frivolous stuff, how the king sent for Mordecai, and charged him to see the execution done upon Haman ; and how he begged of Mordecai to spare his life, at least and proclaim before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour.

10 Then the king said to Haman, Make baste, and take the apparel and the horse, as thou hast said, and do even so to Mordecai the Jew, that sitteth at the king's gate : let nothing fail of all that thou hast spoken.

11 Then took Haman the apparel and the horse, and arrayed Mordecai, and brought him on horseback through the street of the city, and proclaimed before him, Thus shall it be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour.

12 ¶ And Mordecai came again to the king's gate. But Haman hasted to his house mourning, and having his head covered.

13 And Haman told Zeresh his wife and all his friends every thing that had befallen him. Then said his wise men and Zeresh his wife unto him, If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt not prevail against him, but shalt surely fall before him.

14 And while they were yet talking with him, came the king's chamberlains, and hasted to bring Haman unto the banquet that Esther had prepared.

Ver. 10.] It is very likely these words astonished Haman, and made as great commotions in him, as the Targum here describes : but he durst not dispute the king's command, nor ask him what Mordecai he meant (there being many of that name), when the king had plainly told him on whom it was he intended to bestow this honour. But if he made any difficulty to obey this command, or desired to be excused, the king bade him say no more, but go (as the verse concludes), and "let nothing fail of all that he had spoken."

Ver. 11.] At which sight (saith the latter Targum) Esther praised God in the words of the Psalmist, cxiii. 7, 8. "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill : that he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people." And Mordecai said those words, Ps. xxx. 11, 12, "Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing : thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness : I will praise thee, O Lord God my redeemer, that thou hast not let mine enemy triumph over me."

Ver. 12. Mordecai came again to the king's gate.] Returned to his duty, clothed, not in sackcloth, as the Targum represents him (for then he might not have come there), but in his own raiment. Showing he was not puffed up with the honour that had been done him ; but foreseeing, no doubt, the happy event which followed.

But Haman hasted to his house—having his head covered.] Which was a token of sadness and dejection.

Ver. 13. Haman told Zeresh his wife and all his friends] Who were waiting to hear what was become of Mordecai, whom they advised to get hanged on the gallows.

Every thing that had befallen him.] How cross every thing had fallen out to him that morning.

Then said his wise men and Zeresh his wife] They whose counsel he had used in his divination by lots now changed their mind ; and his wife concurred in opinion with them, that these were bad omens.

If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews,—thou shalt not prevail against him.] They had observed, it is likely, how the Jews had been wonderfully raised from under great oppressions, since the time of Cyrus ; and thence concludes there was a particular providence that took care of them. And it is possible they had heard something of the oracle against the Amalekites, that they should perish by the hands of the Jews. And, as Dr. Jackson excellently notes (book i. on the Creed, ch. 21), Those plots which would have crushed other nations, did often turn to their advancement, and the fall of their enemies. Whence both their rising and falling, and consequently the success of such as opposed them, was in the apprehension of wise men of other nations merely fatal ; altogether incorrigible by worldly policy. Whence these wise men of Chaldea (as he calls them), upon the first notice of the wind's turning for them, read Haman's destiny. And accordingly Achior's speech to Holofernes, Judith v. 17, &c. (whether truly uttered, or feigned by the penman of the history), was framed according to the known experience of those times, and contained such advices as a faithful counsellor, well acquainted with the estate of the Jews, should have given to his lord, who did not so well understand it.

Ver. 14.] He hearing their opinion that these things boded some evil to him, was very slow, we may well suppose, in his motion ; and could have been content, perhaps, not to have gone to the banquet : or he was musing what to do for his preservation, which made him stay longer than he should have done, before he waited on the king to it.

CHAPTER VII.

1 Esther, entertaining the king and Haman, maketh suit for her own life and her people's. She accuseth Haman.
7 The king in his anger, understanding of the gallows which Haman had made for Mordecai, causeth him to be hanged thereon.

1 So the king and Haman came to banquet with Esther the queen.

2 And the king said again unto Esther on the second day at the banquet of wine, What is thy petition, queen Esther ? and it shall be granted thee : and what is thy request ? and it shall be performed, even to the half of the kingdom.

3 Then Esther the queen answered and said, If I have found favour in thy sight, O king, and promise, renewed the third time, gave her courage to present her suit to him.

Ver. 3. Then Esther the queen] Lifting up her eyes to heaven, as the Targum enlarges it.

If I have found favour in thy sight, O king,] Thus

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 2. The king said again unto Esther—at the banquet of wine,] When his heart was merry, and highly delighted with his entertainment.

What is thy request ? and it shall be performed,] This

if it please the king, let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request :

4 For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish. But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue, although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage.

5 ¶ Then the king Ahasuerus answered and said unto Esther the queen, Who is he, and where is he, that durst presume in his heart to do so ?

6 And Esther said, The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman. Then Haman was afraid before the king and the queen.

7 ¶ And the king arising from the banquet of wine in his wrath went into the palace garden. and Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther the queen ; for he saw that there was evil determined against him by the king.

8 Then the king returned out of the palace garden into the place of the banquet of wine ; and Haman was fallen upon the bed whereon Esther was. Then said the king, Will he force the queen also before me in the house ? As the word went out of the king's mouth, they covered Haman's face.

9 And Harbonah, one of the chamberlains, said before the king, Behold also, the gallows fifty cubits high, which Haman had made she prefaced to her request, when she only besought him to accept of a banquet from her.

My people at my request :] That is, the life of her people.

Ver. 4. For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed.] For Haman had offered a great sum of money to purchase their destruction. She uses so many words, that she might express the outrageous mischief intended against them, which was no less than their extermination.

But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen I had held my tongue.] For that might have turned to the king's profit, and they might, at one time or other, have recovered their liberty.

Although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage.] The king would not have gained so much as he would have lost by it. But there is another interpretation which Aben Ezra mentions, who takes the Hebrew word hatar not to signify an enemy, but distress, misery, and trouble. Which makes this sense, "If they had sold us for slaves, I had not troubled the king with my petition, because that misery of ours would not have been so much to the king's damage" (see De Dieu).

Ver. 5.] It seemed incredible that any man should entertain such a thought (for the king, I suppose, had forgot the decree Haman had obtained from him), to cut off a whole nation. In the Hebrew the words are, "Who is he whose heart hath filled him to do so ?" A speech like that in the New Testament, Acts v. 3, "Why hath Satan filled thine heart ?" Made these so daring and presumptuous. The like, Eccles. viii. 11.

Ver. 6. The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman.] She found now that she need not fear to speak plainly.

Then Haman was afraid before the king and the queen.] For he could not but see the danger he was in to lose his greatness and his life. And his fear was the greater, now he knew that the queen was one of that nation whom he had conspired to destroy.

Ver. 7. And the king arising from the banquet of wine in his wrath went into the palace garden.] To take breath, and cool himself ; being in a great commotion, by variety of passions boiling and struggling in him. For as he loved the queen, so he loved Haman ; and yet was full of indignation that he should engage him in such an odious design.

Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther.] Who he thought might have so much tenderness as to take compassion upon him and forgive him.

For he saw that there was evil determined against him by the king.] Which he discerned by the king's countenance, and by his going out of the room in a great fume, and violent passion ; which, it it is likely, broke out into threatening words.

Ver. 8. Then the king returned—and Haman was fallen upon the bed whereon Esther was.] They sat, or rather lay upon beds, as they ate and drank ; and Haman fell down as a suppliant at the feet of Esther laying his hand upon her knees, and beseeching her to take pity upon him. I have not read anywhere that this was the manner among the Persians ; but it was among the Greeks and Romans, to embrace the knees of those whom they petitioned to be favourable to them. Inasmuch, that it was a rite in their religious worship to touch the knees of their gods (see Pliny, lib. xi. cap. 45). And thus Sulpitius Severus takes it to have been done here, "Deinde regressus rex, vidit Aman reginæ genua amplectum."

Will he force the queen also before me in the house ?] The king finding him in this posture, interpreted it, as if he were so imprudent as, before the king's face, and in his own palace, to offer violence to the queen's chastity. Not that he believed this was his intention ; but in his furious passion he turned every thing to the worst sense, and made use of it to aggravate his crime.

As the word went out of the king's mouth, they covered Haman's face.] That he might not see the face of the king any more ; or rather, as a man condemned, this told him his doom ; for it is likely the king, when he saw him in that posture, made a sign what they should do with him, which immediately was performed. Though Aben Ezra saith, this was always done to those with whom the king was angry, though they were not put to death ; to show them what they deserved, never to see the king more.

Ver. 9. Harbonah, one of the chamberlains, said before the king.] The latter Targum saith, that this Harbonah was one of Haman's counsel, who advised him to set up the gallows to hang Mordecai ; but seeing this strange turn of affairs, incensed the king, by telling him what Haman designed against him who had saved the king's life.

Ver. 10. So they hanged Haman on the gallows] The latter Targum here adds a great deal of frivolous stuff, how the king sent for Mordecai, and charged him to see the execution done upon Haman ; and how he begged of Mordecai to spare his life, at least and sealed it with the king's ring, and sent letters by posts on horseback, and riders on mules, camels, and young dromedaries :

11 Wherein the king granted the Jews which were in every city to gather themselves together, and to stand for their life, to destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish, all the power of the people and province that would assault them, both little ones and women, and to take the spoil of them for a prey.

12 Upon one day in all the provinces of king Ahasuerus, namely, upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month Adar.

13 The copy of the writing for a commandment to be given in every province was published unto all people, and that the Jews should be ready against that day to avenge themselves on their enemies.

14 So the posts that rode upon mules and camels went out, being hastened and pressed on by the king's commandment. And the decree was given at Shushan the palace.

15 ¶ And Mordecai went out from the presence of the king in royal apparel of blue and white, and with a great crown of gold, and with a garment of fine linen and purple : and the city of Shushan rejoiced and was glad.

16 The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy, and honour.

17 And in every province, and in every city, word mare among the ancient Gauls was derived, which Pausanius tells us signified a horse : for there was such a transposition of letters as is in the word forma, which comes from μορφή. In his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 42, there is extant a work of a very learned young man of our own (now with God), who, after that he had observed that neither the latter nor the ancient Jews, nor the Gemarists themselves knew what to make of this word, hath made a large discourse about it (see Guil. Guisius, in his annotations upon that title in the Mishna, called Kelaim).

The sense of the whole is, that he sent men on horseback (naked, as the first Targum will have it, that they might be lighter), and upon other creatures as swift as horses, and upon mules both old and young, according as the places were nearer or farther off. So he ordered the letters to be sent with great speed by the post, which carried them from stage to stage, till they came to the place whither they were directed.

Ver. 11. Wherein the king granted the Jews which were in every city to gather themselves together. Notwithstanding that former decree sent by Haman.

To stand for their life, to destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish, all the power of the people and province that would assault them, &c. It must be presumed that some would obey the former order, out of their hatred to the Jews ; therefore this gives them authority, if any attempt was made upon them, either in great bodies or small parties, not only to defend themselves and repel them, but to make as great a slaughter of them as they were able (for he uses many words to express the liberty he gave them to destroy their enemies), not sparing children and women ; and to possess themselves of their goods, as men used to do in war, and as Haman had procured them license to take the goods of the Jews (iii. 13).

Ver. 12.] Which day was chosen and appointed by Haman for their destruction.

Ver. 13. The copy of the writing for a commandment to be given in every province. To warrant them to do what was therein commanded.

That the Jews should be ready against that day to revenge themselves on their enemies. Furnish themselves with arms, and all things necessary for their defence, and to annoy their enemies on that day. The latter Targum makes bold to insert a copy of this letter, which imports that the king was deceived by Haman, who persuaded him to write the former letter ; but now he had hanged him, because he found the Jews to be an innocent people, worthy of his protection : and especially commended Esther and Mordecai, whom he had taken into his favour : and therefore sent this new signification of his will and pleasure to them in the behalf of the Jews. There are many expressions in it, which, no doubt, he never used ; but the sense of it is good.

Ver. 14. So the posts that rode upon mules and camels went out. Here are two of the same words used again, reches and ahasteranim ; the latter of which is translated camels, as it was before ; which, though they be not swift creatures, yet are very fit to travel through dry countries better than horses, being very patient of thirst and labour.

Being hastened and pressed on by the king's commandment. Who gave them a strict charge to make all the speed possible to disperse this new order.

The decree was given at Shushan. As that sent by Haman was (iii. 15), and, as I there observed, signed, it is probable, by the king's counsellors.

Ver. 15. Mordecai went out—in royal apparel of blue and white. In such robes as the princes of Persia were wont to wear.

With a great crown of gold. Not like that of the kings ; but such a coronet as was used by the greatest peers of the realm.

With a garment of fine linen and purple. This was his inner garment, as the former was the outward. The former Targum hath made an extravagant description of the riches of the habit, wherein Mordecai appeared ; his tunic costing four hundred and twenty talents of gold ; and many such things which he saith about his sword, and the chain of gold about his neck, which it would be a vanity to mention. But one thing he saith, which is pious, if it were truly related ; that Esther looking out of her window, saw him walk in this state : and he spying her, said those words of the Psalmist (cxxxiv. 6), “ Blessed be the Lord, who hath not given me a prey unto their teeth.” To which she replied in the words of Ps. cxxii. 7, “ Our help standeth in the Lord, who hath made heaven and earth.”

The city of Shushan rejoiced and was glad. At his advancement, and at the fall of Haman, who designed the ruin of such an excellent person.

Ver. 16. The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy. All these words signify the same thing, expressing the highest joy and satisfaction.

And honour. They were much respected by the people.

Ver. 17. In every province,—whithersoever the king's commandment and his decree came. His commandment was, that the decree should be published with all speed ; and both of them were known together : what decree the king had made, and how he pressed the delivery of it (ver. 14).

The Jews had joy and gladness, a feast and a good day. Not only in Shushan, but everywhere else, they entertained one another, and their neighbours, with good cheer, being full of joy at this unexpected alteration of their affairs. For they doubted not this new decree of the king's would be observed by his people ; and they were resolved to defend themselves against those that did not observe it, and destroy them.

Many of the people of the land became Jews.] Many of the Persians became proselytes to the Jewish religion, as both the Targums explain it; but that they were circumcised is not probable. Such persons there were in all times, especially in the days of David and Solomon, when the affairs of the Jews were very prosperous. But the Jews say they did not admit them presently, until the court of judgment approved them as sincere converts. See Selden, De Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. ii. cap. 2, 4, where he observes, that such persons ever after went by the name of Jews (as Dio himself takes notice), and were not reckoned gentiles if they fell to idolatry, but called apostates (see p. 149, &c. 160).

For the fear of the Jews fell upon them.] The liberty granted them by the king's edict, and the power of the queen and Mordecai, made the Persians stand in awe of them and of their God, who had so marvelously disposed things in their favour (see the next chapter, ver. 2, 3).

But this hath made some admire that such a marvellous and memorable thing should not be related, nor so much as touched, by any exotic writer whatsoever. Of which Jacobus Capellus hath given a plain reason, that the history of Oechus is described by no writer, but only Diodorus Siculus: and he meddles with the affairs of Persia no farther than as they cohere with the affairs of Greece.

CHAPTER IX.

- 1 The Jews (the rulers, for fear of Mordecai, helping them) slay their enemies, with the ten sons of Haman.

their hurt: and no man could withstand them; for the fear of them fell upon all people.

5 Thus the Jews smote all their enemies with

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. In the day that the enemies of the Jews hoped to have power over them;] As they often boasted (it is likely) and threatened, since the decree, which Haman sent, came to them, for they had gotten start of the other, and put the Jews into great terror and confusion, and their enemies into high expectation of their ruin.

Though it was turned to the contrary, that the Jews had rule over them that hated them;] As it appeared presently when the time was come for the executing both the decrees.

Ver. 2. The Jews gathered themselves together in their cities—to lay hand on such as sought their hurt:] As some did, being possessed with hatred to them, and being combined, it is likely, upon the receipt of Haman's decree, to endeavour to destroy them. It cannot be imagined, that when Haman perished, all his friends and potentates perished with him; but he had a great party everywhere, some of which were so furiously enraged at his fall, that they could not contain themselves from showing their indignation at those who were the occasion of it.

No man could withstand them;] But they fled before them.

For the fear of them fell upon all people.] When they heard that Haman had lost all his authority and his life, and that his family was destroyed, and how Mordecai was in great power (as it here follows), and the queen herself was a Jew, no doubt it daunted all those who were disposed to execute the first decree. And though some were so desperately envenomed against the Jews, that they did rise up to assault them, yet they had not such courage as the Jews had to oppose them.

Ver. 3. All the rulers of the provinces, &c., helped the Jews;] Which was a great advantage to them, and disheartened their enemies, who hoped for their assistance.

Because the fear of Mordecai fell upon them.] They were men of the times (as we speak), and would have been as ready to execute Haman's decree, if he had continued in power, as to aid the Jews in this: which it was their interest to do, being afraid to be turned out of their places by Mordecai, who was the chief minister, if they did otherwise.

Ver. 4. For Mordecai was great in the king's house,] Having the management of all the queen's affairs in the court, where she was beloved of the king; who also (it appears by the foregoing chapter, ver. 15) gave him the highest authority in the kingdom.

His fame went out throughout all the provinces:] It is soon known everywhere who is the favourite at the court, which makes all addresses to be paid to him.

Mordecai waxed greater and greater.] In the esteem of the people, who not only stood in awe of his power, but highly applauded his wisdom and justice in the management of all affairs: for one cannot but think he was very eminent in those noble qualities.

Ver. 5. Thus the Jews smote all their enemies with the stroke of the sword, and slaughter, and destruction,] That is, they that had no swords slew them with clubs and staves, and such like weapons as they the stroke of the sword, and slaughter, and destruction, and did what they would unto those that hated them.

6 And in Shushan the palace the Jews slew and destroyed five hundred men.

7 And Parshandatha, and Dalphon, and Aspatha,

8 And Poratha, and Adalia, and Aridatha, 9 And Parmashta, and Arisai, and Aridai, and Vajezatha, 10 The ten sons of Haman the son of Hammedatha, the enemy of the Jews, slew they; but on the spoil laid they not their hand.

11 On that day the number of those that were slain in Shushan the palace was brought before the king.

12 ¶ And the king said unto Esther the queen, The Jews have slain and destroyed five hundred men in Shushan the palace, and the ten sons of Haman; what have they done in the rest of the king's provinces? now what is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee: or what is thy request further? and it shall be done.

13 Then said Esther, If it please the king, let it be granted to the Jews which are in Shushan to do to-morrow also according unto this day's decree, and let Haman's ten sons be hanged upon the gallows.

14 And the king commanded it so to be done: and the decree was given at Shushan; and they hanged Haman's ten sons.

15 For the Jews that were in Shushan gathered themselves together on the fourteenth day also of the month Adar, and slew three hundred men at Shushan; but on the prey they laid not their hand.

16 But the other Jews that were in the king's provinces gathered themselves together, and stood could procure; as the former Targum understands it.

Did what they would unto those that hated them.] Had them perfectly at their mercy.

Ver. 6. In Shushan the palace.] That is, in the city where the king's palace was.

The Jews slew and destroyed five hundred men.] It is commonly thought that these and the rest mentioned, ver. 15, 16, were such as they knew were confederate with Haman, and perhaps Amalekites (as the latter Targum saith); for Mordecai, they think it is likely, required them to kill none but those who declared themselves forward to execute Haman's decree. But I see no ground for this: if men were quiet, and did not rise up against them, they had no authority to hurt them, much less to kill them. Therefore these five hundred, and the rest killed in other places, were men who could not conceal their wicked inclinations, but openly assaulted them; and such Ahasuerus gave them power to destroy (viii. 11). And Dr. Alix thinks the conjecture of the Targum is right; that these five hundred men were Amalekites, who followed the fortune of Haman: and by their slaughter were accomplished the prophecies against Amalek. Some others, it is likely, joined with them; but they were the most enraged against the Jews, and the readiest to attempt their destruction.

Ver. 9. Vajezatha,] It is too curious an observation of the Jews, that the letter vav before the last of these names is larger than ordinary, to show, that though this was the youngest son of Haman, yet he was the most violent against the Jews of all the rest. Or, as others will have it (for such conceits are endless), this being the numeral letter for the number six, it signifies this was the sixth son of Haman, but placed last, out of contempt, as the vilest of them all.

Ver. 10. The ten sons of Haman—slew they;] It is likely they were at the head of the rest, who were so bold as to attempt the destruction of the Jews in this city; being mad with rage, and resolved to revenge their father's death; and rather perish than not execute his design as far as they were able.

But on the spoil laid they not their hand,] The king had granted them leave to take it (viii. 11,) but they would not meddle with it, that they might not seem to desire any thing but their own safety, and that the king might have the greater kindness for them, into whose exchequer these goods were to come, if he pleased.

Ver. 11.] Who required an account, that he might know how people stood affected towards the Jews.

Ver. 12. What have they done in the rest of the king's provinces?] That was not yet known, but he thought in all likelihood they must have killed a great many more.

Now what is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee:] If this did not satisfy her, he asks her what she had to desire farther, and he would not deny her.

Ver. 13. Let it be granted to the Jews which are in Shushan to do to-morrow also according unto this day's decree.] That is, kill as many of their enemies as they could find; for some that appeared against them, perhaps, escaped their hands, whom they might meet withal the next day.

Let Haman's ten sons be hanged upon the gallows,] By their father, I suppose.

Ver. 14. And the king commanded it so to be done:] That both her petition and request should be granted. This was a new decree, authorizing them to do on the fourteenth day as they had on the thirteenth.

They hanged Haman's ten sons,] For their great infamy, that they might be exposed to public reproach, and their bodies remain unburied, being left to rot upon the gallows, or to be devoured by crows and vultures, and suchlike ravenous creatures. For, though the Jews suffered none to hang on a tree (so they called a gallows) longer than till the evening of the day, whereon they were hanged, yet other nations let them hang till they were there consumed; as appears from the story of the Gibeonites (2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10), and from the vulgar saying among the Romans, passere in cruce corvos, "to feed ravens on a gibbet."

Ver. 15.] The former Targum saith still, these three hundred men were of the family of Amalek. But whosoever they were, I take them to have been such as the day before rose up against them, but in the conflict escaped by flight, and now were found out and killed.

Ver. 16. But the other Jews that were in the king's provinces—stood for their lives,] They they did upon the thirteenth day, when they defended themselves from those that rose up against them to destroy them.

And had rest from their enemies,] Who could not stand before them; but ceased to molest them.

And slew of their foes seventy and five thousand,] There is some reason to think these were Amalekites, as the former Targum saith; for it is likely, many of that nation might be dispersed throughout the king's provinces as well as the Jews; and being the old enemies of the Jews, might be very forward to help to destroy them. But whosoever they were, the Jews prevailed against them, and slew so many thou-for their lives, and had rest from their enemies, and slew of their foes seventy and five thousand, but they laid not their hands on the prey, 17 On the thirteenth day of the month Adar; and on the fourteenth day of the same rested they, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.

18 But the Jews that were at Shushan assembled together on the thirteenth day thereof, and on the fourteenth thereof; and on the fifteenth day of the same they rested, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.

19 Therefore the Jews of the villages, that dwelt in the unwallied towns, made the fourteenth day of the month Adar a day of gladness and feasting, and a good day, and of sending portions one to another.

20 ¶ And Mordecai wrote these things, and sent letters unto all the Jews that were in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, both nigh and far,

21 To stablish this among them, that they sands, that thereby we may judge what a great number of Jews still remained in other countries, and did not return to their own.

But they laid not their hands on the prey,] It is likely Mordecai, in his letters, had charged them not to make use of the liberty the king had given them to take the spoil (viii. 11), because they universally avoided it.

Ver. 17. On the thirteenth day of the month Adar;] This is to be referred to the foregoing words; the slaughter was made in the provinces on the thirteenth day of this month, when they should have been destroyed themselves.

And on the fourteenth day of the same rested they, and made it a day of feasting and gladness,] And so the Jews in the provinces made the next day a festival of rejoicing for their great deliverance. For there never was any day of joy and gladness for any blessing, without feasting and liberal entertainment of each other, and of the poor.

Ver. 18.] The Jews, indeed, in the city of Shushan, made the fifteenth day a festival, because they had liberty to avenge themselves of their enemies, not only on the thirteenth, but on the fourteenth, which were both days of slaughter; and therefore they rested not till the fifteenth day.

Ver. 19.] This verse gives an account of the reason of the different observation of the festival in Shushan, and in the country towns throughout the king's provinces. There they had leave only on one day to slay their enemies, which was the thirteenth of Adar; therefore the fourteenth was a day of gladness to them: whereas in Shushan the fifteenth was the day of gladness, the fourteenth being, by the king's leave, made like the thirteenth, another day of slaughter. But this was at the first done thus, only of their own free accord; afterward the law established it otherwise.

A day of gladness and feasting, and a good day,] A day of thanksgiving and praise to God, as well as of feasting one with another, and of sending portions to their neighbours out of their own good cheer, that the meaner sort might feast and rejoice also. And as, to add to their joy, they sent them meat from their tables; so the Jews have made a constitution, that they should make a collection of money to send to the poor at this time of the year, that they may provide themselves things necessary to make a feast. Which money it is unlawful (as Guilielmus Schickar-should keep the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and the fifteenth day of the same, yearly,

22 As the days wherein the Jews rested from their enemies, and the month which was turned unto them from sorrow to joy, and from mourning into a good day: that they should make them days of feasting and joy, and of sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor.

23 And the Jews undertook to do as they had begun, and as Mordecai had written unto them;

24 Because Haman the son of Hammedatha, the Agagite, the enemy of all the Jews, had devised against the Jews to destroy them, and had cast Pur, that is, the lot, to consume them, and to destroy them;

25 But when Esther came before the king, he commanded by letters that his wicked device, which he devised against the Jews, should return upon his own head, and that he and his sons should be hanged on the gallows.

26 Wherefore they called these days Purim thus observes) to apply to any other use, but only the making themselves merry at this time (see Neh. viii. 10).

Ver. 20.] That which they had done at the first voluntarily, he thought good to turn into a law, and sent it into the whole realm.

Ver. 21.] But, to make these more solemn times, they now keep a fast before the feast (after the example of Esther) on the thirteenth day of the month Adar.

Ver. 22.] For in the provinces they had done their work before the fourteenth day, and then rested and rejoiced: but in Shushan not before the fifteenth; and then they rejoiced there.

Ver. 23.] That is, to keep these days as festivals everywhere throughout all generations.

Ver. 25.] These two verses give an account why this festival was ordained, which they took care should be understood by all posterity: who observe it at this day; and tell us it consists in these three things; in reading, in rest from labour, and in fasting. The reading begins in the evening, as soon as the stars appear; when the history of Haman is read from the beginning to the end, out of a Hebrew manuscript written on parchment: for it is not lawful to read it out of a printed Bible, no more than they do the law itself, as Schickard observes out of their writers, who say, three prayers go before this reading. In the first of which they praise God for counting them worthy to attend this divine service: in the second, they thank him for the miraculous preservation of their ancestors: and in the third, that they have lived to observe another festival in memory of it. After this they go to supper upon spoon-meats; and next morning to the synagogue, where the history is read over again with the same ceremonies. After which they have done with religion and piety, and spend the two days in idleness, and eating, and drinking. Surenhuysius hath given a full account of this reading, and the benedictions, in his notes upon the Megillah, p. 387. And for their rest and feasting, they say in their books, that the first is kept so sacredly, that they will not so much as set or sow any thing in their garden on these days; but play at chess, and suchlike games, or spend the time in music and dancing, till it be time to feast. And then they indulge themselves so far, that they think it not unlawful to drink so much, as not to be able to distinguish between the blessing of Mordecai and the curse of Haman, as they themselves speak. Inasmuch, after the name of Pur. Therefore for all the words of this letter, and of that which they had seen concerning this matter, and which had come unto them, 27 The Jews ordained, and took upon them, and upon their seed, and upon all such as joined themselves unto them, so as it should not fail, that they would keep these two days according to their writing, and according to their appointed time every year;

28 And that these days should be remembered and kept throughout every generation, every family, every province, and every city; and that these days of Purim should not fail from among the Jews, nor the memorial of them perish from their seed.

that our learned primate Usher calls this feast, "The Bacchanals of the Jews."

Ver. 26. Purim, after the name of Pur.] A Persian word, signifying a lot.

Therefore for all the words of this letter, and of that which they had seen concerning this matter, and which had come unto them,] This seems to refer to the foregoing words; "wherefore they called these days Purim," because of what was contained in the letters of Mordecai, and because of what they had seen when these things fell out, and what they heard reported of them in the places where they could not see them. But we take them to be the reason of what follows; viz. of the keeping these days.

Ver. 27. Upon all such as joined themselves unto them,] All that should become proselytes to their religion.

That they would keep these two days according to their writing,—every year;] According as Mordecai had written, so they engaged without fail to keep these two days in the time appointed; viz. on the fourteenth day they kept the festival in the country all over the king's dominions, and on the fifteenth they kept it in Shushan. The former of these the Jews now call in their calendar the lesser feast of Purim, and the latter the greater feast.

Ver. 28. That these days should be remembered and kept] Accordingly at this day they kept this festival, as they did in more ancient times: for in the second book of Maccabees, xv. 37, we find, that Judas having obtained a great victory over Nicanor, they ordained it should be commemorated upon the thirteenth of Adar, "the day before the feast of Mordecai," which was this of Purim. This shows, that in those days they kept this deliverance in memory by celebrating this feast, and that the thirteenth of Adar was not then a fast.

That these days of Purim should not fail from among the Jews,] This is but a repetition of what was said before, to make them more seriously attend to their obligation; which was laid upon them all throughout all generations. Accordingly now, as they tell us in their books, the little children, the women, they that are base born, and servants, &c., are bound to keep this feast.

Ver. 29.] These days were first recommended to their observation by the authority of Mordecai, ver. 20. But either they were neglected, or sometime intermitted, or were thought not to be sufficiently established; therefore the first order was confirmed and ratified by a second, which was backed by the authority of the queen. And the opinion of Maimonides is not improbable, that this was also an ordinance of the prophets; viz. Haggai, Zechariah, and others, that lived in the days of Esther. But this cannot be true; for they were dead long before this time.

Ver. 30. He sent the letters unto all the Jews, to the 29 Then Esther the queen, the daughter of Abihail, and Mordecai the Jew, wrote with all authority, to confirm this second letter of Purim.

30 And he sent the letters unto all the Jews, to the hundred twenty and seven provinces of the kingdom of Ahasuerus, with words of peace and truth,

31 To confirm these days of Purim in their times appointed, according as Mordecai the Jew and Esther the queen had enjoined them, and as they had decreed for themselves and for their seed, the matters of the fastings and their cry.

32 And the decree of Esther confirmed these matters of Purim; and it was written in the book.

hundred twenty and seven provinces of the kingdom of Ahasuerus,] And consequently as far as Jerusalem; for Syria and Judea were among his provinces, and the Jews should have been killed there, as well as in the rest of his dominions: and were bound to thank God for their preservation throughout all ages; for otherwise they had not been any longer a people.

With words of peace and truth,] Full of sincere love and affectionate desires of their happiness. "Verbis amicis et sinceris." Or, as others will have it, wishing their prosperity, and exhorting them to live in love and peace, and to be faithful in their religion; and particularly in keeping their promise of observing these days. But after all, Conradus Pellicanus seems to me to have guessed the best at the meaning of these words peace and truth; which he thinks were the salutation at the top of the letter.

Ver. 31.] Some learned men understand these words, as if they meant, that these days of Purim were therefore appointed, that they might be a memorial of that deliverance, which was obtained of God by fastings and prayers unto him; which, if it be admitted, gives no ground to conclude from thence, that they observed a fast upon this occasion, as well as a feast. The Jews, indeed, think quite otherwise; and, if we may believe their calendar, have ever since kept a fast on the thirteenth of Adar, which was the day appointed for their extirpation. Upon the hearing of which decree, all places were filled with doleful lamentations, there being no help for them if God did not deliver them; unto whom therefore they cried with fasting and prayer. In memory of which, they undertook to keep a yearly fast, as well as days of feasting and gladness, which immediately ensued. But their calendar is a new piece, and of no credit at all; nor do we find the least indication that Esther or Mordecai enjoined any thing but a feast, no mention being made of a fast in their decree: and therefore it was voluntarily undertaken by the Jews themselves in after-ages, as this verse seems to import. Which the former Targum thus paraphrases (and the latter to the same purpose): "To confirm these days of Purim, as Mordecai the Jew, and Esther the queen, appointed concerning them; and as the Jews ordained for themselves, and for their posterity, to keep in memory the matter of their fastings and their prayers."

Ver. 32.] Either she made a new decree by her sole authority to enforce the former; or the meaning is, that she commanded the forementioned decree, which confirmed the days of Purim, to be recorded and made a public act, in a book where, perhaps, this whole history was contained. Which record testified in time to come what passed in her days; viz. their danger, and their wonderful deliverance, and the decree of Esther concerning the observation of these days.

CHAPTER X.

1 Ahasuerus's greatness. 3 Mordecai's advancement.

1 AND the king Ahasuerus laid a tribute upon the land, and upon the isles of the sea.

2 And all the acts of his power and of his might, and the declaration of the greatness of Mordecai, whereunto the king advanced him, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia?

3 For Mordecai the Jew was next unto king Ahasuerus, and great among the Jews, and accepted of the multitude of his brethren, seeking the wealth of his people, and speaking peace to all his seed.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1.] Having great occasion for money, he laid a new tax upon all his provinces, both in the continent (as we speak) and in the isles of the sea, belonging to his dominions. Some think, that the imposts which he released to his people at the marriage of Esther (ii. 18), which continued for some years, were now revived; and that this is all which is meant by these words. But this doth not well agree with this phrase of laying a tribute on them. Our primate Usher understands by the isles here mentioned, those in the Ægean Sea, which were conquered by Darius Hystaspes, who was the first that laid a tribute on his subjects: for Cyrus, and Cambyses before him laid none; but being begun, they continued it to the reign of this king, ad Annum Per. Julian. 4219. Strabo saith (lib. xv. p. 735), that the tribute exacted on the sea-coast was paid in silver; but that from the land, in such commodities as every country afforded, in wool, drugs, cattle, &c.

Ver. 2. All the acts of his power and of his might,] Which was so great, that the Egyptians in their hieroglyphics represented Ochus by a sword. And Plutarch (as Jacobus Capellus observes) calls him the most terrible of all the Persian kings.

And the declaration of the greatness of Mordecai,—are they not written in the book of the chronicles] These words signify, that as this king did great things, so they were to be ascribed very much to the management of Mordecai, after he was advanced to the highest authority in the kingdom. But it was not the design of the author of this history to relate such things; for which he refers to the public records of the kingdom, which were kept in some part of the king's house (it appears from vi. 1), and were extant in those days when this book was written.

Ver. 3. For Mordecai the Jew was next unto king Ahasuerus,] I cannot but observe here, in the conclusion of this book, that Mordecai is so often called the Jew by this author (see ix. 29, 31), that it hath inclined me to think it was not written by one of that nation, but by some proselyte of Persia who was converted, as many were at this time (viii. 17), to the Jewish religion. Some of which might be in these times divinely inspired, as Nicholas, a proselyte of Antioch, was in the apostles' days (Acts vi. 5). But I have no authority for this, which I mention as a mere conjecture.

And great among the Jews,] His greatness did not make him forget his brethren; by whom he was highly esteemed, and much honoured by every one of them.

Seeking the wealth of his people,] And no wonder he was so acceptable, for his study was how to do them good.

And speaking peace to all his seed,] Advising and promoting whatsoever was for their advantage; and speaking still to the king for that which might tend to the happiness and prosperity of his nation, which he advanced to the utmost of his power. Unto which a most earnest desire of the coming of the Messiah contributed exceedingly; and the serious study of the law, which he recommended to them, as the only means of living happily. Thus Conradus Pellicanus concludes his commentary on this book; but where he found this I cannot tell. It is only highly probable, that so good a man as Mordecai was very solicitous they should be obedient to the law of Moses (as Malachi was), and live in expectation of the Messiah, concerning whom Moses prophesied. For, as Epiphanius and Seder Olam, and others, observe, this book of Esther is the last canonical book of the Old Testament; and the nearer they approached to the coming of Christ, the more desirous holy men were to see him. Others, indeed, think Malachi is the last divine writer; but, on the other side, it seems probable, that he, having taken no notice of the deliverance under Esther, prophesied some time before it.

THE BOOK OF JOB.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

WILLIAM, EARL OF BEDFORD,

Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter, &c.

MY VERY GOOD LORD AND PATRON.

MY LORD,

THOUGH I have not pursued the design, which I have long had in my thoughts, of making some public acknowledgment of my obligations to your Lordship, for placing me, when I thought not of it, in this station which I hold in Covent-Garden; yet I have only deferred it, till the most proper opportunity, as it seems to me, for this small expression of my gratitude. For I could not have prefixed your Lordship's name to any work of mine, which I believe would have been so acceptable, as this wherewith I now present you; desiring it may remain as a lasting testimony of the sense I have of the favours I have received from your Lordship. In whom, as I have always observed a particular veneration and affection for the Holy Scriptures; so I know to be a constant reader of them: and therefore humbly offer this assistance to your Lordship, for the understanding of the oldest book (as I have shown) of that sacred volume, which, I am confident, you esteem above all earthly treasures.

There have been many large volumes written for its explication: which will cost abundance of time and pains to peruse; and after all the design and scope of the whole may not be understood, while the reader's mind stays so long in the several parts. I have therefore taken quite another course, and only given the sense of it in a compendious but perspicuous Paraphrase (or Metaphrase rather, as the ancients would have called it), which is not much longer than the text, put into other words. It would have been more easy to have enlarged it, than it was to make it thus short; which I the rather chose to do, not merely because it will be more useful for those who have little leisure, or less money, but because thereby I have preserved, I persuade myself, the majesty of the book; and made it still look, not like the word of a man, but, as it is indeed, the word of God.

Which I could never have presented to your Lordship and the world more seasonably than now; when the state of our affairs is so dangerously perplexed, that we cannot stand upright, nor preserve our souls from sinking into the saddest fears or discontents, or some such troublesome passion, without a strong confidence in the most wise, just, and merciful providence of the Almighty; which orders things, in unsearchable ways, to the good of those that steadfastly adhere unto him in faithful obedience. Which is so admirably represented in this holy book, that one cannot read it seriously, and not be moved to resign the conduct of ourselves, and all that concerns us, unto God's most blessed will and pleasure; to wait patiently for him, as the Psalmist speaks, and keep his way; not to be disheartened by any trouble that befalls us, much less forsake our integrity; but still expect "the end of the Lord," as St. James speaks, i. e. the issue to which he will bring our troubles; persuading ourselves that he is very pitiful, and of tender mercy; and therefore, as he doth not love to grieve us by laying afflictions on us, so is wont many times to bring the greatest good out of the greatest evil; and to produce it by such unexpected means, as shall surprise us with the greater admiration of his wisdom and goodness.

For a great reader of ancient writers tells us, "He hath observed, in the histories of all ages, that the great events which determine the fate of great affairs do happen less frequently according to design, than by accident and occasion. Our enterprises here below are derived from above; and we but engines and actors of pieces that are composed in heaven. Homo histrio, Deus vero poeta est: 'God is the sovereign poet;' and we cannot refuse the part which he appoints us to bear in the scene. All our business is to act it well; cheerfully complying with his orders concerning us, and submitting ourselves to the direction of his providence."

To which, and all other religious courses, did we more heartily apply ourselves, there is no doubt but that in this book we might read God's gracious intentions towards this church and kingdom. Which his most merciful providence would bring, as he did his servant Job, through all these clouds which now encompass us, into a splendour incomparably beyond all that wherein hitherto we have appeared. Why should we despair of it, when he shows by the unexpected discovery which he hath made of the designs of our enemies against us, that he hath no mind to cast us off, if we will not carelessly cast away ourselves, by the continual neglect of our duty to him?

God of his infinite goodness awaken all our hearts, to make such a good use both of that deliverance, and of our present distress (which is so great that we see no way out of it, but by his power alone to whom Job owed his resurrection), that we may, in the issue, be the more happy, and the better established, for having been so miserably unsettled. In which prayer, I am sure your Lordship will cordially join with,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most humble and affectionate servant,
SY. PATRICK.

April 19, 1679.

PREFACE.

THE study of the Holy Scriptures is much recommended to us by the Scriptures themselves, and hath been judged so necessary by the holy doctors of the church, that St. Chrysostom (who was wont to press this duty with great earnestness, not only in his sermons, but in his private discourses with his people) adventures to say (Hom. 3, in Lazar. tom. v. 243), that "a man cannot, he cannot be saved, unless he be conversant in this spiritual reading." But, as the neglect of them is very dangerous when men are able to read them: so the reading them without understanding must needs be unprofitable. Though a Christian (as the forenamed great person speaks) can no more be without the Scriptures, than an artificer without his tools; yet we must acknowledge, that he will make but ill work with them in many places, unless he be instructed how to use and apply them to the purpose for which they were designed. Whosoever, therefore, shall assist the minds of Christians, by giving a clear meaning of them (in which that holy father employed much of his time), it is certain, doth great service to God, and to their souls. For this contributes much to the honour of the Holy Scriptures (which want nothing to make them revered by considering men, but to be understood), and it invites men to the reading them, and it conveys the heavenly truth easily and delightfully into their minds.

Which hath moved me to attempt the explaining of the most ancient book in the whole Bible, by way of a short paraphrase. In which, if I have not always tied myself to our English translation (which ever gives an excellent sense of the original words), it was because I thought another meaning sometimes more agreeable to the whole discourse; which I have endeavoured to carry on coherently, from first to last. But if the matter would bear it, I have, when I met with a word of two senses, expressed them both. And where I found any difficulty, I consulted with such interpreters as are of best note in the church; being unwilling to do any thing without the warrant of some or other of them. I was forced, indeed, here and there to follow only my own judgment; but not without the appearance of very urgent reasons; of which, if I should give an account, by adding notes to those places, it would make this, which I intend for common use, swell into too big a volume. I have only, therefore (in the argument prefixed to each chapter), pointed to such histories in the Bible as may help to illustrate some passages; and shown how the dispute is managed, till God himself determine it.

But there are two things of which I think myself bound to give a larger account, to avoid the imputation of such novelty as may be justly censured. The one is that I have interpreted those three known verses in the nineteenth chapter, 25—27, not of Job's resurrection from the dead at the last day, but of his restoration to a happy estate in this world; after he had been so sorely afflicted. There are many, of no mean esteem (Mr. Calvin among the rest), who have done so before me; in following whom, I do not forsake the sense of the ancient doctors. For though I take that to be the literal sense of the words, yet I doubt not there is another more secret and hidden, which lies covered under them; and that we ought to look upon Job's restoration (and so I have always explained it) as a notable type of the future resurrection of our bodies out of the grave. And accordingly our church hath very fully applied the words (as many of the fathers do) to this purpose, in the office for the burial of the dead.

St. Jerome (or the author of the Commentaries upon Job under his name) is my guide in this business; who saith no more than this, that Job, in these words, resurrectionem futuram prophetat in Spiritu, "prophesied in the Spirit the future resurrection." Now the words of the prophets had commonly an immediate respect to something which was then doing, or shortly to be done, besides that sense which the Holy Ghost directed them to signify in the latter days. And so had these words of Job, of which that father, indeed, gives us only the mystical sense; but he doth so in many other places of that book, where it is certain and acknowledged the holy man had another meaning, in which he was more nearly concerned. I shall refer the reader only to one place in the first chapter; where he saith, that Job did "ferre typum Christi" (and so he saith in his preface, "Figuram Christi portavit;" and in his conclusion, xlii. 14, "Figuram manifeste habuit salvatoris"); and therefore expounds those words, ver. 20, 21, in this manner: "He fell on the ground when he emptied himself of the form of God, to take on him the form of a servant; and came naked out of his mother's womb, being not aspersed with the least spot of original sin." He that will may read what follows, and see how he only sets down a mystical sense, when it is certain another (upon which that is built) is first intended. And so we are to take his exposition upon these words which secundum mysticos intellectus (as he speaks, xxxviii. 16), "according to the hidden interpretations," are to be understood of the resurrection of the dead at the second coming of Christ ; but relate, in the first place, to Job's resurrection out of that miserable condition wherein he lay, which was a figure of the other. "They, therefore, who interpret these words otherways (to speak with that father in his commentaries upon Ezekiel, xxxvii. 1, &c.), ought not to make me ill thought of, as if, by expounding them in the literal sense only, I took away a proof of the resurrection from the dead. For I know there are far stronger testimonies (of which there can be no doubt nor dispute) to be found for the confirmation of that truth. On those let us rely, on the plain words of Him who is the truth (and of whom Job was but a figure), which are abundantly sufficient to support our faith ; and let none imagine that we give occasion to heretics (as he speaks presently after) if we deny these words to be meant of the general resurrection."

The second thing of which I am to give an account is, that I have not expounded behemoth to signify the elephant, nor leviathan to signify the whale ; because many of their characters do not agree to them ; but every one of them to the description which the writers of natural history have given of two other creatures. And therefore I have herein followed the guidance of that excellent critic Bochartus, who takes the former for the river-horse, and the latter for the crocodile ; as I have expressed it in the margin, but put neither of them in the text : for I leave every one, as our translators have done, to apply the words to any other creatures, if they can find any besides those now mentioned, which have all the qualities that are here ascribed to them.

I have adventured also in the beginning to add a few words, as the manner of paraphrasts is, to give an account of the time when Job lived, which seems to have been before the children of Israel came out of Egypt. For though there be plain mention of the drowning of the old world, and the burning of Sodom, in this book, yet there is no allusion to the drowning of Pharaoh, and other miraculous works which attended their deliverance. Nor is there any notice taken of that revelation of God's will to Moses, when Elihu reckons up those ways whereby God was wont to discover himself to men. Suchlike reasons moved Origen to say (lib. i. contra Celsum, p. 305), that Job was ἀρχαιότερος καὶ Μωϋσῆος αὐτοῦ, "more ancient than even Moses himself ;" and Eusebius (lib. i. Demonstr. Evangel. cap. 6), to pronounce that he was before Moses two whole ages. Which is conformable to the opinion of many of the Hebrew writers, who, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. vii. De Jure Nat. &c., cap. 11), think Job lived in the days of Isaac and Jacob. The judgment of other eastern people is not much different from this, as may be seen in Hottinger's Smegma Orientale (p. 381, 452, 453).

And therefore one use we may make of this book is, to inform ourselves what are the true natural dictates of human reason, which teaches greater chastity than many Christians are now willing to observe ; strict justice, both private and public ; compassionate charity to those who are in need ; together with a pious care to please God, and to worship and confide in him alone ; as we may learn here better than from any other book in the world. For in the twenty-first chapter, Job gives such a character of his life, with respect to all these, as declares both that there is a law written in our hearts, and what instructions it gives us if we will attend to it. There is not the least syllable that we read concerning his being circumcised, or observing the sabbath, or suchlike parts of the Mosaical discipline, which assures us he was neither a natural Israelite, nor a proselyte, as St. Austin speaks (lib. xviii. cap. 47, De Civit. Dei) ; and yet he found such a rule of life in himself, that, by the assistance of the divine grace, he ordered not only his outward actions, but the inward motions of his mind, after such a manner, as is "not unsuitable to the evangelical doctrine of our Saviour." They are the words of Eusebius in the place forenamed ; where he doth not fear to add, that the "word of Christ hath published to all nations that most ancient manner of godliness which was among the first fathers ; so that the new covenant is no other than that old godly polity which was before the times of Moses." I may add, before the time that Abraham was circumcised ; when, as St. Chrysostom speaks very significantly (upon Rom. ii. 14), ἀρχὴ ἀντὶ τοῦ νόμου τὸ συνειδὸς καὶ λογισμὸς, "their conscience and the use of reason sufficed instead of the law."

The Hebrew books, indeed, are full of discourses concerning certain precepts, which all mankind after the flood observed, but cannot all of them be deduced from the principles of reason. They call them the seven precepts of the sons of Noah ; who delivered them, they say, to all his children, by whom the world was peopled ; and therefore the Israelites ever exacted the observance of them from all those gentiles whom they admitted as proselytes at large to their religion. Two of these precepts concerned their duty towards the blessed Creator ; the next four respected their duty towards their neighbours ; the last forbade cruelty towards other creatures. They are reckoned up commonly in this order ; 1. Concerning strange worship, or idolatry. 2. About blaspheming the name of God. 3. About murder. 4. About the uncovering of nakedness, or all filthy mixtures. 5. About theft and rapine. 6. About judicatures and civil government ; to make the other precepts more carefully observed. 7. About not eating of any flesh which is cut off from any animal alive. The authors that treat of these are innumerable : among whom I shall only mention Maimonides, who thus delivers his opinion of them in his treatise of Kings, ch. ix.—

"Adam, the first man, received commands about six (things which are those first above mentioned) ; from whence it is, that the mind of man inclines more prone to them, than to the rest of the commands which we have received from our master Moses. Besides these, it is manifest, Noah received another, according to what we read Gen. ix. 4, 'Flesh with the life thereof you shall not eat.' And thus things stood throughout the whole world until the days of Abraham; to whom there was superadded the precept of circumcision."

But, as there is not the least sign that circumcision was part of Job's religion, so there is no footstep at all remaining of his observance of the last of those seven precepts, which they say all the sons of Noah, who were pious, carefully obeyed. A great man of our own nation (Mr. Selden, lib. ult. De Jure Naturali, &c. cap. 2), hath sifted this business with as much diligence as is possible; but after all this search, he is fain to stop at those first six precepts delivered to Adam. For though this general character be given by Job in the beginning of the book, that he was a perfect, or simple and upright man, fearing God, and eschewing evil; and in the thirty-first chapter, and other places, there are particular instances given of his abhorring strange worship (ver. 26), blasphemy (i. 5), murder (xxxi. 29, 31), adultery, and other filthiness (ver. 1, 9), theft, rapine, and deceit (ver. 5—7), for the punishment of which he mentions judges in his days (ver. 11, 25), and was himself one of the chief (xxix. 11), yet here is not so much as one word to be found, that I can discern, concerning the seventh precept: whether we understand thereby eating flesh with the blood in it; or, which is more likely (because other nations, that were not Jews, might lawfully eat that which died of itself, Deut. xiv. 21), eating that which was cut alive from any living creature.

Which makes me think that it was not so generally known as the Jews now pretend; till the memory of it was revived by Moses, among whose ancestors the tradition was more carefully preserved than in other nations. For Job, and such like pious persons, seem to have been governed by those precepts only which the first man received; that is, dictates of natural reason. According to those words of Tertullian, in his book against the Jews: where he contends (ch. 2), that "before the law of Moses, written in tables of stone, there was a law not written, which was naturally understood, and observed by the fathers:" which he elsewhere calls the "common law, which we meet withal in publico mundi 'in the streets and highways of the world,' in the natural tables;" which mankind having broken, our Saviour came to repair and renew; abrogating the law of Moses, in which the Jews had placed too much confidence, while they neglected these natural precepts. Or rather, he hath not only engaged us by his holy sacraments to observe those more strictly, but raised them also to a greater height of purity; according to that of St. Chrysostom in his book of virginity; "We are to show greater virtue, because now there is an abundant grace poured out; and great is the gift of the coming of Christ."

But the principal benefit (to omit the naming of many other whereby I might recommend this work) which I hope pious souls, especially the afflicted, will reap by this book, is, to be persuaded thereby, that all things are ordered and disposed by almighty God; without whose command or permission, neither good angels, nor the devil, nor men, nor any other creature, can do any thing. And that, as his power is infinite, so is his wisdom and goodness; which is able to bring good out of evil. And therefore we ought not to complain of him in any condition, as if he neglected us, or dealt hardly with us; but rather cheerfully submit ourselves to his blessed will; which never doth any thing without reason, though we cannot always comprehend it. To that issue God himself at last brings all the dispute between Job and his friends; representing his works throughout the world to be so wonderful and unaccountable, that it is fit for us to acknowledge our ignorance, but never accuse his providence; if we cannot see the cause why he sends any affliction, or continues it long upon us; instead of murmuring and complaining, in such a case, this book effectually teaches us to resign ourselves absolutely to him; silently to adore and reverence the unsearchable depth of his wise counsels; contentedly to bear what he inflicts upon us: still to assert his righteousness, in the midst of the calamities which befall the good, and in the most prosperous successes of the wicked; and steadfastly to believe that all at last shall turn to our advantage, if, like his servant Job, we persevere in faith, and hope, and patience.

To which this book gives so high an encouragement, and contains such powerful comforts for the afflicted; that the old tradition is, Moses could not find any thing like it for the support and satisfaction of the Israelites in their Egyptian bondage; and therefore took the pains to translate it into their language, out of the Syriac, wherein it was first written. Thus he who writes the commentaries upon this book under the name of Origen tells us, "That he found in antiquorum dictis, 'in the sayings of the ancients,' that when the great Moses was sent by God into Egypt, and beheld the affliction of the children of Israel to be so grievous, that nothing he could say was able to comfort them in that lamentable condition; he declared to them the terrible sufferings of Job, with his happy deliverance; and setting them down in writing also, gave this book to that distressed people. That reading these things in their several tribes and families and hearing how sorely this blessed man suffered, they might comfort and exhort one another to endure with patience and thanksgiving the evils which encompassed them; and hearing withal how bountifully God rewarded Job for his patience, they might hope for deliverance, and expect the benefit of a blessed reward of their labours.

"Be ye constant, O children of Israel (said Moses, with a pleasing countenance, when he delivered this book into their hands), do not faint in your minds, O ye posterity of Abraham; but suffer grief, and bear these evils patiently, as that man in the land of Uz did, whose name was Job; who though he was a righteous and faithful person, in whom was no fault, yet suffered the sorest torments by the malice of the devil; as you do now most unjustly from Pharaoh and the Egyptians. They treat you indeed very basely, and have enslaved you without any fault of yours, &c. But do not despair of a better condition; you shall be delivered as Job was, and have a reward of your tribulations, like that which God gave to him."

There follows a great deal more to the same purpose in that writer, which I shall not transcribe. But only add, that the church of Christ, as he observes, was wont, after this example, to read this passion of Job publicly in all their assemblies; upon holydays (when they commemorated the martyrs), and upon fasting-days, and days of abstinence; and upon the days of our Saviour's passion; of which they thought they saw a figure in the sufferings of Job; as of our Saviour's resurrection and exaltation, in Job's wonderful recovery and advancement to a greater height of prosperity. And, as they read this history in the church publicly; so, when they went to visit any one privately that was in grief, mourning, or sorrow, they read a lesson of the patience of Job for their comfort or support under their troubles; and to take away the distress and anguish of their heart.

I pray God it may have that effect upon all afflicted persons, who shall read it; and that others also, considering the instability of all worldly things (which is here also lively represented), may use their prosperity with such moderation, that they may bear a change of their condition, if it come, with an equal mind.

I am sure there is no man, of whatsoever rank, or in whatsoever condition he be, but may learn very much, if he please, from this admirable pattern. Which is the very first that is left us upon record, of a virtuous life, both in prosperity and adversity, and that not only as a private man, but as a prince, "In whom it is the greater commendation to obey the will of God; because he hath more means and temptations to fulfil his own."

That therefore shall conclude the character of Job; who, when he had no superior to control him (as you may read ch. xxix. xxxi.), gave such an example of piety and devotion, humility and moderation, chastity and purity, justice and equity, charity and compassion, as few have done in a private condition. This is as admirable, and will be praised as much to all generations, as his generous patience. Which was so much famed in ancient times, that (from a passage, which some editions of the LXX. have added to the conclusion of this book) it went as a common tradition οὐδὲν ἀπίστον ἔχων (as Theophanes speaks), "having nothing incredible in it," that Job was one of those who had the honour to rise out of his grave at our Saviour's resurrection; when, as St. Matthew assures us, xxvii. 51, "many bodies of saints which slept arose, and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many."

"Behold, we count them happy which endure. Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord" (James v. 7, 11).

CHAPTER I.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter is a plain narration of the flourishing condition wherein Job lived, before the envy and malice of the devil brought upon him the sorest calamities; which are particularly described, with the occasion of them, and his admirable constancy under them; whereby he became as eminent an example of patience in adversity, as he had been of piety and all manner of virtue in his prosperity.

1 THERE was a man in the land of Uz, whose name was Job; and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil.

2 And there were born unto him seven sons and three daughters.

3 His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a very great household; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the east.

4 And his sons went and feasted in their houses, every one his day; and sent and called for their three sisters to eat and to drink with them.

5 And it was so, when the days of their feast-

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1.] In the time of the ancient patriarchs, before the giving of the law of Moses, there lived in Arabia a person of great eminence whose name was Job: a man not more illustrious for his birth or place, than for the height of his virtue, which appeared in a most unblamable life, void of all hypocrisy, both in his piety towards God, and in his dealings with men, and all other ways.

Ver. 2.] Whom God therefore had so wonderfully blessed, that his outward prosperity was equal to the perfections of his mind. For, first, he had given him the sweet fruits of marriage, in a numerous issue of seven sons and three daughters:

Ver. 3.] And then enriched him abundantly with the wealth of that country; which consisted in seven thousand sheep, three thousand camels, five hundred yoke of oxen, as many she-asses; with such a very great tillage, and so many servants, that in those eastern parts he had neither superior nor equal.

Ver. 4.] And together with all this happiness, he had the pleasure to see his children live in love and unity. For it was the custom of his sons to meet at each other's houses, and to make a feast every one upon his birth-day (iii. 1): and he whose turn it was to treat the rest, always invited their three sisters to come and be merry with them.

Ver. 5.] This feast was wont to last seven days; at ing were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them, and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

6 ¶ Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them.

7 And the Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

8 And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?

9 Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, Doth Job fear God for nought?

10 Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land.

the end of which their good father never failed to send a messenger to them, to call upon them to prepare themselves, by fasting and prayer, for the sacrifice he meant to offer for them: and when they were assembled, he rose up early in the morning (the fittest time for devotion), and prayed to God, by offering burnt-offerings for every one of them, because he was afraid they might have done or spoken something that was profane, and misbecoming their religion, when their minds, loosened by mirth, were less upon their guard. And thus he did constantly after every feast.

Ver. 6.] But this great piety was not sufficient to preserve him from false accusations. For as Job set a time for his children to examine themselves, so there are certain seasons when the angels come and stand in the divine presence, to give an account of their ministry, and to receive commands from God, the judge and governor of the world: and Satan, that subtle adversary of mankind, came one day, and thrust in himself among them.

Ver. 7.] And the Lord (to make him sensible he was not an absolute prince, but his subject) called to him, and demanded an account of him, where he had been, and from whence he came? To which he gave an answer, which expressed, as the great restlessness of his mind, and his unwearied diligence, so the limitation of his power, which extends only to this lower world; for he told him he came from going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

Ver. 8.] Then the Lord said to him again; After all thy inquisitiveness and busy search, thou hast nothing to object against the integrity of my servant Job; a man that excels in piety and justice, and all other virtues, which he practises exactly and sincerely.

Ver. 9.] Yes, said Satan; he serves himself rather than thee: it is not thy pleasure which he regards, but his own profit.

Ver. 10.] Hast thou not paid him well for his pains? and so envired him and his family, and all belonging to him in every place, that no harm can come to them? Whereby all his business prospers, and his flocks and his herds are so increased that the country can scarce hold them.

Ver. 11.] But I am confident, if thou wilt employ 11 But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face.

12 And the Lord said unto Satan, Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only upon himself put not forth thine hand. So Satan went forth from the presence of the Lord.

13 ¶ And there was a day when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house:

14 And there came a messenger unto Job, and said, The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding beside them:

15 And the Sabeans fell upon them, and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

16 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The fire of God is fallen from heaven, and hath burned up the sheep, and the servants, and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

17 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The Chaldeans made out that power to plague him, which hath so long preserved him, he will not only in his heart, but openly, deny thy providence.

Ver. 12.] Then the Lord (who was willing to prove the virtue of his servant in an afflicted estate, as he had done in a prosperous) withdrew the protection he had given him, and granted Satan a commission to dispose of all belonging to Job according as he pleased excepting only his person, which he commanded him not to touch. This was joyful news to that malicious spirit, who went immediately to do what he had long desired.

Ver. 13.] And within a short time found an opportunity to try the constancy of Job, by doing him all the mischief possible, in one and the same day: which was the birth-day of his eldest son, when all his children (far from fearing any evil) were met, according to their custom, at his house, to feast and rejoice together.

Ver. 14.] Then it was that Satan put in execution what he had designed; and first of all stirred up a thievish sort of people in Arabia, to fall upon that part of his land which was next to them. Of which tidings were presently brought to Job by a messenger saying,

Ver. 15.] As the oxen were at plough, and the asses in a pasture hard by them, the Sabeans made an inroad into thy country, and carried them all away: having slain, by an unexpected assault, all those who should have preserved them, except myself alone, who made an escape to acquaint thee with it.

Ver. 16.] He had not quite delivered his message before another of his servants arrived (as evils seldom come single), to tell him that there had been a very great lightning in those parts, where his sheep were feeding, which had consumed both them and the shepherds, and left none surviving, but himself alone, to give him notice of this disaster.

Ver. 17.] He had not finished his narration before another messenger was at the door, saying, Our neighbours the Chaldeans, seeking for booty, divided themselves into three parties, who set upon us all at once; and they have carried away the camels, and killed all the servants that looked after them, except myself, who made a shift to save myself by flight to bring the news of this invasion.

three bands, and fell upon the camels, and have carried them away, yea, and slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

18 While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house:

19 And, behold, there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men,

Ver. 18.] Before he had concluded, came in another, the most doleful messenger of all, saying, Thy children, as thou knowest, were feasting with their elder brother:

Ver. 19.] And, behold, on a sudden there arose a violent wind, which coming from the desert, and whirling about the house, took away the four corners of it, and buried them all in its ruins; and there is not one of the guests escaped, that I know of, but only myself, to be the messenger of this great calamity.

Ver. 20.] Then Job (who had heard all the rest without disturbance) was overcome with grief at this last word, and laying aside all other thoughts, gave up himself to the most lamentable sorrow: for he rent his upper garment, cut off the hair of his head, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

20 Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped, 21 And said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the LORD gave, and the LORD hath taken away; blessed be the name of the LORD.

22 In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

and threw himself upon the ground. Where he deceived the devil's expectation; for he most reverently adored, as became his piety, the divine majesty, and submitted himself to his will, saying,

Ver. 21.] I am but what I was at first, and what I must have been again at last; and he that hath stripped me of all before I die, hath taken away nothing but what he gave. Let him therefore be praised who is the donor of all good things, and the disposer of all events.

Ver. 22.] This was the worst word that he spake, when all these evils came upon him so unexpectedly, and so thick together: all the rest was like this; and nothing dropped from his mouth which in the least accused or questioned the providence of God.

CHAPTER II.

ARGUMENT.—The first part of this chapter is a continuation of the narration, which was begun in the foregoing, of the calamities which befell this good man; whom God suffered the devil to afflict in his body, as he had already done in his goods and children. And then follows a farther testimony of his constancy, notwithstanding his wife's angry and profane accusation of the divine providence: though, it is true, he was so much dejected to see himself reduced to this extremity of misery, that neither he, nor his friends that came to visit him, were able for several days to speak a word.

1 AGAIN there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the LORD, and Satan came also among them to present himself before the LORD.

2 And the LORD said unto Satan, From whence comest thou? And Satan answered the LORD, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it.

3 And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil?

and still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause.

4 And Satan answered the LORD, and said, Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life.

5 But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face.

6 And the LORD said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life.

7 ¶ So went Satan forth from the presence

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1.] After these things the angels going again to attend the pleasure of the divine majesty, and to give an account of their several charges, Satan also openly appeared among them, and presented himself as ready and desirous to be examined about his management.

Ver. 2.] But not daring to speak before he was called, he waited till the divine majesty asked where he had been, and what he had done. To which he answered, as he had done before, that he had not lost his time, but had fetched a circuit round about the earth, to find opportunity for the exercise of his power.

Ver. 3.] Well then, said the Lord, art not thou convinced how true a character I gave of my servant

Job, and how much thou hast calumniated him? for he still resolutely continues as perfectly virtuous as he was in his prosperity, though I have consented to these miserable calamities which he suffers undeservedly.

Ver. 4.] To which Satan answered again and said, that his constancy was not so wonderful, since a man hath reason to think himself rich who is in health. Who is there that will not give another's skin to save his own; nay, part with his children, as well as his goods, to save his life?

Ver. 5.] But enlarge now my commission a little farther, and let me afflict his body, so that it touch him to the very quick, and he will openly renounce thee, and deny thy providence.

Ver. 6.] To which the divine majesty (knowing the fidelity of Job, which hereby would become more of the LORD, and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown.

8 And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal; and he sat down among the ashes.

9 ¶ Then said his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? curse God, and die.

10 But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

11 ¶ Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar, the Naamathite: for they had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him and to comfort him.

12 And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice, and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven.

13 So they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him: for they saw that his grief was very great.

illustrious) was pleased to yield; and said, Behold, I give thee the same power over his person which thou hadst over his family and goods: inflict what diseases thou wilt upon him, so they do not kill him.

Ver. 7.] No sooner had Satan obtained this new grant, but, withdrawing himself from the presence of the divine majesty, he went to pursue his mischievous desires; and smote Job from top to toe with a fiery ulcer, whose sharp humour was extremely grievous and painful, and pricked him (according to his wish) to the very bone.

Ver. 8.] The filthiness of the disease also increased that sorrow and heaviness which before had seized on him, and made him sit down in the ashes; where he laid hold on what came next to hand, a piece of a broken pot, to wipe away the foul matter which issued out of his biles.

Ver. 9.] And it was a further addition to his grief, to hear his dear consort (whom the divine goodness he thought had still left to help him to bear his affliction) utter this profane speech, What a folly it is still to persist in the service of God, when all thou gettest by it is to give him thanks and perish.

Ver. 10.] These words struck him to the very heart: but instead of being angry with God, he only severely reproved her, telling her that she talked like one of the wicked women; and then piously represented to her, that we ought to take nothing ill which comes from the hand of God (as all evil things do as well as good), and the more good we have received from him, the less reason we have to complain when we suffer any evil. No discourse but such as this was heard to come from his mouth.

Ver. 11.] Now there dwelt in the neighbouring provinces three great men, with whom Job had long maintained a particular friendship, who, hearing the sad tidings of his sufferings, came every one from his country to visit him. Their names were Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite; who all three met at his house on the same day, according to an appointment they had made, to come and condole with him, and comfort him.

Ver. 12.] But as soon as ever they entered into the place where he lay, they were surprised with so miserable a spectacle of deformity, that they shrieked aloud, as men affrighted, and burst out into tears, and rent their garments, and threw dust into the air, which, falling on their heads, expressed the confusion they were in, to find him so covered over with ulcers that they could not know him.

Ver. 13.] And when they approached nearer him, they only sat down upon the earth, in the same mournful posture wherein they found him, but were not able (so much were they astonished) for seven days and nights to say one word of the business about which they were come to him. And indeed his grief was so exceedingly great, that they did not well know what to say, ill time, which alters all things, had assuaged a little both his grief and theirs.

CHAPTER III.

ARGUMENT.—Here begin the discourses which Job and his friends had about his affliction; which are all represented, by the author of this book, poetically; not as hitherto, in a plain simple narration, but in most elegant verse. And being overcharged with grief (without the least word of comfort from his friends), he that had for some time borne the weight of his afflictions with an admirable constancy, could not contain himself any longer, but bursts out (to such a degree was the anguish of his spirit increased) into the most passionate complaints of the miseries of human life. The consideration of which made him prefer death much before it, and wish that either he had never come into the world, or gone presently out of it again, or at least might now forthwith be dismissed.

1 AFTER this opened Job his mouth, and cursed his day.

2 And Job spake, and said,

3 Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, There is a man child conceived.

4 Let that day be darkness; let not God regard it from above, neither let the light shine upon it.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1.] And at the end of seven days Job himself began by complaints to give some vent to his grief, which had stupefied him thus long: but he burst out into such bitter lamentations, that he wished a thousand times he had never been born.

Ver. 2.] That which he said was to this effect:

Ver. 3.] Let the day and the night of my birth be never more mentioned, but be quite forgotten, as if it had never been.

Ver. 4.] Let that day be turned into night, and not be counted among the days: let the sun then withdraw its light, and never shine upon it.

5 Let darkness and the shadow of death stain it; let a cloud dwell upon it; let the blackness of the day terrify it.

6 As for that night, let darkness seize upon it; let it not be joined unto the days of the year, let it not come into the number of the months.

7 Lo, let that night be solitary, let no joyful voice come therein.

8 Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up their mourning.

9 Let the stars of the twilight thereof be dark; let it look for light, but have none; neither let it see the dawning of the day:

10 Because it shut not up the doors of my mother's womb, nor hid sorrow from mine eyes.

11 Why died I not from the womb? why did I not give up the ghost when I came out of the belly?

12 Why did the knees prevent me? or why the breast that I should suck?

13 For now should I have lain still and been quiet, I should have slept: then had I been at rest, 14 With kings and counsellors of the earth, which built desolate places for themselves;

Ver. 5.] Let the most dismal darkness and the thickest clouds wholly possess it, and render it terrible to men.

Ver. 6.] And let the night be of the same sort, and both of them quite blotted out of the calendar.

Ver. 7.] Let nobody meet together on that night, to feast or make merry.

Ver. 8.] Let it be as a day wherein men bewail the greatest misfortune, or the time wherein they see the most dreadful apparitions.

Ver. 9.] Let there not so much as a star appear in that night, nor so much light as we see at peep of day.

Ver. 10.] Because it did not bury me in my mother's womb, and thereby secure me from all these miseries.

Ver. 11. What a misfortune was it, that I did not die before I was born, or at least as soon as I came into the world.

Ver. 12.] That they who received me from the womb did not let me fall on the ground, or my nurse refuse to give me suck.

Ver. 13.] Then should I have felt none of these miseries which I now endure, but lain quiet and undisturbed.

Ver. 14.] Equal to kings and the greatest persons, who lie alone in the tombs which they built themselves.

Ver. 15.] Having gold and silver in abundance, whereof now they are bereaved.

15 Or with princes that had gold, who filled their houses with silver:

16 Or as a hidden untimely birth I had not been; as infants which never saw light.

17 There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest.

18 There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor.

19 The small and great are there; and the servant is free from his master.

20 Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life unto the bitter in soul;

21 Which long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more than for hid treasures;

22 Which rejoice exceedingly, and are glad, when they can find the grave?

23 Why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in?

24 For my sighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like the waters.

25 For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me, and that which I was afraid of is come unto me.

26 I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came.

Ver. 16.] Or like an abortive, which was never numbered among men.

Ver. 17.] There are none can hurt us in the grave, though they be never so malicious, nor shall we toil any more when we come thither.

Ver. 18.] The captives, and they who are condemned to hard servitude, take no pains there, and do not dread the voice of the exactor of their labours.

Ver. 19.] There none are greater than other; but the servant in that place is as free as his master.

Ver. 20.] Is it not strange, that a man should be forced to live when he hath no mind to it?

Ver. 21.] But wishes for death though in vain, and seeks it more eagerly than the greatest riches?

Ver. 22.] Leaping for joy when he can meet with his grave, as far more welcome to him than a mine of silver?

Ver. 23.] Not knowing which way to turn himself, but only thither?

Ver. 24.] This is my condition, whose meat merely sustains a miserable life, which is all sighs and sobs, as loud as the roarings of the lion.

Ver. 25.] For the very thing which I dreaded is fallen upon me, notwithstanding all my care to prevent it.

Ver. 26.] I did not confide in my riches, nor in the least lull myself in security (ch. i. 5), and yet that did not preserve me from being miserable.

CHAPTER IV.

ARGUMENT.—Eliphaz, incensed at this complaint of Job, instead of condoling with him, and pitying the miseries which had put him into this agony, and applying fitting lenitives to his anguish, bluntly rebukes him for not following the good advice that he used to give to others in their adversity: and tells him he had reason to suspect his piety, because the innocent were not wont to suffer such things, but only wicked oppressors, whom, though never so mighty, God had always humbled. Witness the Horims, who dwell in Seir (Deut. ii. 12), whom the ancestors of Eliphaz (Gen xxxvi. 11) had overcome, though they were as fierce as lions. To those beasts of prey, of all sorts, he compares the tyrants whom he speaks of in this chapter (ver. 10, 11), intending, it is likely, to remember him also of the destruction of the Emims by the children of Moab (Deut. ii. 10, 11), and of the Zuzimmins (ver. 20, 21), who were rooted out by the children of Ammon, as the Horims by the children of Esau: from whose grandchild Eliphaz seems to have been descended, and called by the name of the eldest son of Esau. He tells Job also of a vision, he had to confirm the same truth, that man's wickedness is the cause of his destruction.

1 THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said,

2 If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? but who can withhold himself from speaking?

3 Behold, thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands.

4 Thy words have upholden him that was falling, and thou hast strengthened the feeble knees.

5 But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled.

6 Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways?

7 Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off?

8 Even as I have seen, they that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same.

9 By the blast of God they perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed.

10 The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the fierce lion, and the teeth of the young lions, are broken.

11 The old lion perisheth for lack of prey, and the stout lion's whelps are scattered abroad.

12 Now a thing was secretly brought to me, and mine ear received a little thereof.

13 In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, 14 Fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake.

15 Then a spirit passed before my face; the hair of my flesh stood up:

16 It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof: an image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a voice, saying,

17 Shall mortal man be more just than God?

shall a man be more pure than his maker?

18 Behold, he put no trust in his servants; and his angels he charged with folly:

19 How much less in them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth?

20 They are destroyed from morning to evening:

they perish for ever without any regarding it.

21 Doth not their excellency which is in them go away? they die, even without wisdom.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1.] Then Eliphaz (one of his most ancient friends, descended from Teman), replied to him and said;

Ver. 2.] We must either still keep silence, or speak what will not please thee. But truth surely is more to be regarded than friendship: and therefore I must remember thee.

Ver. 3.] That thou, it is well known, hast given good counsel unto others (and perhaps reproved their impatience): thou hast encouraged those who were dispirited.

Ver. 4.] And by thy discourse hast supported those whose hearts were ready to sink, and settled those who trembled under their burthen.

Ver. 5.] And now that thou art fallen into the same condition, thou canst not practise thy own lessons; but faintest, and art struck with consternation.

Ver. 6.] Is not this the time to exercise thy piety (so much famed), thy confidence in God, thy hope, thine integrity?

Ver. 7.] Consult thine own observation, and tell me when thou ever sawest a righteous man forsaken by God.

Ver. 8.] Quite contrary, I have seen the wicked reaping the fruit of their doings.

Ver. 9.] God blasts and consumes them, as the nipping wind, or the fire doth the corn in the field.

Ver. 10.] Though they be as fierce as the lions, and as strong, their power is broken.

Ver. 11.] The greatest tyrants and their posterity, after they have long enjoyed their power, are deprived of all their riches gotten by oppression, and come to nothing.

Ver. 12.] If these observations be not sufficient to convince thee, hear what God himself secretly whispered to me.

Ver. 13.] As I was ruminating one night, when all were asleep, of some visions which I had had.

Ver. 14.] I was on a sudden seized with such a fear, that it made every joint in my body tremble.

Ver. 15.] Whereupon I saw a spirit pass by me, which made my hair stand on end.

Ver. 16.] I am not able to describe what it was like; for though it stood still, and I saw an image of something, yet I can only tell what I heard in a still voice, saying,

Ver. 17.] Can any one think that a miserable man is more righteous than God his judge? or that it is possible for any body to be more unprovable than he that made him?

Ver. 18.] The heavenly ministers themselves may fail; for they are not perfectly wise, though they have no flesh and blood as we have.

Ver. 19.] How can we then pretend to perfection who dwell in bodies of dirt; which stand upon no firm foundation, but are as subject to be destroyed as a garment to be fretted with moths?

Ver. 20.] We see continual examples of those that are cut off: they are quite taken away when nobody thinks of it.

Ver. 21.] Though their dignities be never so great, and their posterity never so numerous, all go away with them, and they die like so many beasts, who have no understanding of their latter end.

CHAPTER V.

ARGUMENT.—Eliphaz still prosecutes the very same argument; endeavouring to confirm it from the opinion and observation of other men, as well as from his own. And thereupon exhorts him to repentance, as the surest way to find mercy with God: and to be not only restored to his former prosperity, but to be preserved hereafter from the incursions of savage people, or of wild beasts, and from all the rest of the disasters which had befallen him. Of this he bids him, in the conclusion, be assured, for it was a point he had studied.

1 CALL NOW, if there be any that will answer thee; and to which of the saints wilt thou turn?

2 For wrath killeth the foolish man, and envy slayeth the silly one.

3 I have seen the foolish taking root: but suddenly I cursed his habitation.

4 His children are far from safety, and they are crushed in the gate, neither is there any to deliver them.

5 Whose harvest the hungry eateth up, and taketh it even out of the thorns, and the robber swalloweth up their substance.

6 Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground;

7 Yet man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward.

8 I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause:

9 Which doeth great things and unsearchable; marvellous things without number:

10 Who giveth rain upon the earth, and sendeth waters upon the fields:

11 To set up on high those that be low; that those which mourn may be exalted to safety.

12 He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise.

13 He taketh the wise in their own craftiness:

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1.] If thou dost not believe me, thou mayest inquire of others. There is no good man but is of this opinion: and if an angel should appear to thee (as there did to me), thou wouldst have no other information but this:

Ver. 2.] That God in his anger and indignation destroys the wicked, and him that errs from his precepts.

Ver. 3.] This is so certain, that I have predicted his downfall, when he seemed most firmly settled in his prosperity.

Ver. 4.] His children also fell with him; justice took hold of them, and would not let them escape.

Ver. 5.] The hungry soldier devoured their harvest, there was no fence could secure it; but the rest of their riches became a prey to the robber.

Ver. 6.] For we are not to ascribe the trouble and misery of mankind merely to earthly causes, which are but the instruments of God's justice.

Ver. 7.] Who hath made it as natural to man to suffer (having offended him), as it is for the sparks to fly upward.

Ver. 8.] Wherefore, if I were in his case, I would humbly address myself to God, and desire him to order all things as he pleases.

Ver. 9.] For he is the author of all those wonderful things, whose causes we can no more find out than we can count their number.

Ver. 10.] Of the rain, for instance, in its season: and of the springs which run in the fields:

Ver. 11.] Whereby men of low condition are enriched and grow great; as the plants and corn shoot out of the earth, after they are moistened with show-ers.

Ver. 12.] And, on the contrary, he defeats the craftiest designs of subtle men to raise themselves; and it is not in their power to effect that which they have most wisely contrived.

and the counsel of the froward is carried head-long.

14 They meet with darkness in the day time, and grope in the noonday as in the night.

15 But he saveth the poor from the sword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty.

16 So the poor hath hope, and iniquity stoppeth her mouth.

17 Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth: therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty:

18 For he maketh sore, and bindeth up: he woundeth, and his hands make whole.

19 He shall deliver thee in six troubles: yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee.

20 In famine he shall redeem thee from death: and in war from the power of the sword.

21 Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue: neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh.

22 At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh: neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth.

23 For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field: and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee.

24 And thou shalt know that thy tabernacle shall be in peace; and thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shall not sin.

Ver. 13.] Nay, they produce that which they studied to avoid; and when they think themselves sure, make too much haste to their ruin.

Ver. 14.] They trip in the plainest way, and see not their danger, when it is visible to every body but themselves.

Ver. 15.] Whereby many a helpless man is delivered, both from the open force, and from the treacherous flatteries or calumnies of those that are too strong for them.

Ver. 16.] And therefore he that is oppressed should not despair, nor should the oppressors boast themselves; for there is hope that God will save the one to the utter destruction of the other.

Ver. 17.] Behold then, how little reason there is to complain of God's chastisements, which if thou dost not refuse he is able to turn to thy good.

Ver. 18.] For he doth not merely wound, but, like a wise chirurgeon, by that very means he cures and heals.

Ver. 19.] Thy troubles cannot be so many, but, if thou submissively accept them, he will free thee from them.

Ver. 20.] He will feed thee in the best barren years, and defend thee in the day of battle.

Ver. 21.] False accusers shall not be able to hurt thee; and when whole countries are depopulated, thou shalt be secure.

Ver. 22.] When nothing is to be seen but wild beasts, whom famine forces from their dens, thou shalt be cheerful and undaunted.

Ver. 23.] For the stony parts of the country shall not fail to bring forth its fruits plentifully; and the beasts of the field shall not devour them.

Ver. 24.] Whosoever thou pitchest thy tent, thou shalt find it in safety: and when thou takest an account of thine estate, all things shall answer thine expectation.

25 Thou shalt know also that thy seed shall be great, and thine offspring as the grass of the earth.

26 Thou shalt come to thy grave in a

Ver. 25.] Thou shalt find thy posterity also very great and numerous, like the grass; though now thou art as bare as the earth in winter.

Ver. 26.] Thou shalt not die a violent and untimely death; but be carried to thy grave as corn full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season.

27 Lo this, we have searched it, so it is; hear it, and know thou it for thy good.

is to the barn when it is full ripe and fit to be gathered.

Ver. 27.] Doubt not of this, for we have thoroughly considered it, and find it so: receive it therefore, and keep it in memory.

CHAPTER VI.

ARGUMENT.—Job, not at all convinced by these discourses, justifies the complaint he had made (chap. iii.), which Eliphaz had now accused, maintaining that his grief was not equal to the cause of it. And therefore he renews his wishes of death: at which, though they might wonder who felt nothing to make them weary of life, yet he had reason, he shows, for what he did; and one more than before, which was their unkindness, who pretended to be friends, but by this rude reproof of him at the very first, without so much as one compassionate word, or the least syllable of consolation, showed how little sympathy they had with him in his sufferings. These things he desires them to consider, and weigh the cause of his complaint a little better before they passed any farther judgment on it.

1 But Job answered and said,
2 Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed and my calamity laid in the balances together!

3 For now it would be heavier than the sand of the sea: therefore my words are swallowed up.

4 For the arrows of the Almighty are within me, the poison whereof drinketh up my spirit: the terrors of God do set themselves in array against me.

5 Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or loweth the ox over his fodder?

6 Can that which is unsavoury be eaten without salt? or is there any taste in the white of an egg?

7 The things that my soul refused to touch are as my sorrowful meat.

8 O that I might have my request; and that God would grant me the thing that I long for!

9 Even that it would please God to destroy me; that he would let loose his hand, and cut me off!

10 Then should I yet have comfort; yea, I would harden myself in sorrow: let him not spare; for I have not concealed the words of the Holy One.

11 What is my strength, that I should hope? and what is mine end, that I should prolong my life?

12 Is my strength the strength of stones? or is my flesh of brass?

13 Is not my help in me? and is wisdom driven quite from me?

14 To him that is afflicted pity should be shewed from his friend; but he forsaketh the fear of the Almighty.

15 My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away;

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1.] Here Job replied to Eliphaz, and spake in these terms to him.

Ver. 2.] Would to God some more equal person than you would lay my complaint and my sufferings in against the other, and judge sincerely which is the heaviest!

Ver. 3.] He would soon find, that the sand of the sea is not so heavy as my misery; and that I am not able to complain enough.

Ver. 4.] The Almighty himself hath given me such a wound, that I am dispirited: for nothing but dreadful spectacles present themselves ready armed against me.

Ver. 5.] It is easy for you who feel no pain nor want to forbear complaints; which is no more than the very ass and other brute creatures do.

Ver. 6.] But may not he who eats insipid things call for a little salt to make them go down better? (How much more then may we call for something to qualify that which is bitter?)

Ver. 7.] As I do now, who have nothing afforded me for my support, but such discourses as yours, which my very soul loathes.

Ver. 8.] I cannot but cry unto God, and beseech him to grant me my heart's desire.

Ver. 9.] Which is, that he would be pleased not to let me languish in this miserable condition, but with one stroke more quite cut me off.

Ver. 10.] It would be a great comfort to me to hope for this, and would strengthen me to endure the severest pains: for I would receive the sentence of death with acclamations of praise, if God would pronounce it against me.

Ver. 11.] For I have not strength enough to endure any longer, nor any hope of better days in the conclusion, which should make me willing to have my life prolonged.

Ver. 12.] God hath not made me insensible, and therefore do not wonder that I desire to be released from the sharpest pains.

Ver. 13.] Do not think my reason hath forsaken me, and that I do not understand myself.

Ver. 14.] Were it so, a friend should show me the more pity: as you would do, but that you fear not God, nor remember that he can afflict you as he doth me.

Ver. 15.] My dearest friends prove as deceitful as the torrents, which make a great noise, and run with a violent stream.

16 Which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid :

17 What time they wax warm, they vanish : when it is hot, they are consumed out of their place.

18 The paths of their way are turned aside ; they go to nothing, and perish.

19 The troops of Tema looked, the companies of Sheba waited for them.

20 They were confounded because they had hoped ; they came thither, and were ashamed.

21 For now ye are nothing ; ye see my casting down, and are afraid.

22 Did I say, Bring unto me, or, Give a reward for me of your substance ?

23 Or, Deliver me from the enemy's hand ? or, Redeem me from the hand of the mighty ?

Ver. 16.] When the melted ice and snow fall thick into them.

Ver. 17.] They promise water, but in the summer-time are dried up.

Ver. 18.] So that you can scarce find any mark of the course wherein they ran, they are so perfectly vanished.

Ver. 19.] They that travel into our neighbouring countries expected to quench thirst there, where they had sometimes seen so much water.

Ver. 20.] But were shamefully disappointed, and blushed to think they should seek relief from such uncertain streams.

Ver. 21.] Just such are you, good for nothing ; who, seeing my calamity, shrink from me.

Ver. 22.] And yet I never sent for you, nor do I ask, now you are come, any relief from you.

Ver. 23.] I do not expect you should deliver me from these calamities, which as so many mighty enemies, oppress me.

24 Teach me, and I will hold my tongue : and cause me to understand wherein I have erred.

25 How forcible are right words ! but what doth your arguing reprove ?

26 Do ye imagine to reprove words, and the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind ?

27 Yea, ye overwhelm the fatherless, and ye dig a pit for your friend.

28 Now therefore be content, look upon me ; for it is evident unto you if I lie.

29 Return, I pray you, let it not be iniquity ; yea, return again, my righteousness is in it.

30 Is there iniquity in my tongue ? cannot my taste discern perverse things ?

Ver. 24.] Do not mistake me, nor think that I despise the assistance of your counsel and advice : no, I am ready to receive your reproofs, and humbly to submit to them, if you can better inform me.

Ver. 25.] Oh what power is there in truth ! but your reprehensions are ineffectual.

Ver. 26.] You only study to show your eloquence, and in vain use words to drive me to desperation.

Ver. 27.] You fall upon him who is already depressed, and without defence, and in a barbarous manner devise counsel against your friend.

Ver. 28.] But let it please you to consider my case a little better, and then judge if I be in the wrong.

Ver. 29.] Discussa things over again, I beseech you, and do it fairly. I say, let me have a second hearing, it will but the more show my innocence.

Ver. 30.] Have I said anything hitherto that is faulty ? I do not think my judgment is so corrupted, but that I can discern what is bad, though spoken by myself.

CHAPTER VII.

ARGUMENT.—Job proceeds still in the defence of his complaint, and of his wishes to see an end of so miserable a life, which at the best is full of toil and trouble. And, since his friends had so little consideration of him, he addresses himself to God, and hopes he will not be angry; if he ease his grief by representing to him the dolfulness of his condition, and expostulating a little with him about the continuance of it, and his release from it.

1 Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth ? are not his days also like days of a hireling ?

2 As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow, and as a hireling looketh for the reward of his work :

3 So am I made to possess months of vanity, and wearisome nights are appointed to me.

4 When I lie down, I say, When shall I arise, and the night be gone ? and I am full of tossings to and fro unto the dawning of the day.

5 My flesh is clothed with worms and clods of dust ; my skin is broken, and become loathsome.

6 My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle, and are spent without hope.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1.] Is not the whole life of miserable man a perpetual conflict with various troubles ? And must he not at best undergo much toil, labour, and weariness ?

Ver. 2.] Why may I not then as passionately wish to see an end of it, as the slave in a hot day gasps for the refreshment of the shade ? or the labourer longs for the evening, when he may rest, and be paid for his pains ?

Ver. 3.] I am sure my days are no less void of contentment than theirs ; and in the night, when men are wont to forget their sorrows, I can do nothing but restlessly increase them.

Ver. 4.] I no sooner am laid down but I wish to be up again ; and the night seems very tedious while I toss up and down, in inquiet and tormenting thoughts calling for the morning.

Ver. 5.] How can I do otherways, when my body is nothing but ulcers, full of worms, and crusted over with scabs ; which have made such clefts in my skin, that I am loathsome to myself.

Ver. 6.] All my happy days are run away in a moment, and there is no hope I should recover them.

7 O remember that my life is wind : mine eye shall no more see good.

8 The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more : thine eyes are upon me, and I am not.

9 As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away : so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more.

10 He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more.

11 Therefore I will not refrain my mouth ; I will speak in the anguish of my spirit ; I will complain in the bitterness of my soul.

12 Am I a sea, or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me ?

13 When I say, My bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint ;

14 Then thou scarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me through visions :

Ver. 7.] O my God, remember how short the most pleasant life is, which when it is gone I cannot live over again.

Ver. 8.] I can never return to my friends after I have left them : thou dost but frown upon me, and I vanish quite out of the world.

Ver. 9.] Just as a cloud dissolves on a sudden before the sun, so doth man sink down into his grave, and appear no more.

Ver. 10.] He shall make his habitation there, for hither he cannot return ; but others shall take his place, which will no longer acknowledge him the owner of it.

Ver. 11.] Suffer me then to speak freely, and to give vent to my grief, by complaining a little of the inexpressible miseries which oppress me.

Ver. 12.] Am I like a sea, or a whale (or wild beast), that must be shut up and confined under these insupportable sufferings, and by no means break through them ?

Ver. 13.] If death may not come and put an end to them, one would have hoped at least to have found some intermission of them by sleep.

Ver. 14.] But then I am haunted with such frightful dreams, and such horrid apparitions.

15 So that my soul chooseth strangling, and death rather than my life.

16 I loathe it ; I would not live alway : let me alone ; for my days are vanity.

17 What is man, that thou shouldest magnify him ? and that thou shouldest set thy heart upon him ?

18 And that thou shouldest visit him every morning, and try him every moment ?

19 How long wilt thou not depart from me, nor let me alone till I swallow down my spittle ?

20 I have sinned ; what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men ? why hast thou set me as a mark against thee, so that I am a burden to myself ?

21 And why dost thou not pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity ? for now shall I sleep in the dust ; and thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall not be.

Ver. 15.] That I had much rather die the most violent death, than carry this carcase any longer about with me.

Ver. 16.] It is loathsome to me : I would not, if I might, live always in it. Dismiss me, therefore, since I have no pleasure in life, which of itself will end shortly.

Ver. 17.] Is mortal man so considerable, that thou shouldest honour him so much as to contend with him, and set thyself against him.

Ver. 18.] That thou shouldest send new afflictions on him every morning ; nay, try his strength and courage every moment ?

Ver. 19.] It is time to turn away thy displeasure from me ; at least for so short a space, as to give me leave to breathe.

Ver. 20.] I am not able to give thee satisfaction for my offences against thee, O thou Observer of men. But why dost thou not remove me quite out of thy sight, if I be a burden to thee ?

Ver. 21.] Or else forgive my sin, and so far release me from its punishment, as to let me die ; which I shall do presently, and not be found to-morrow to endure these afflictions, if thou dost not still hold me under them.

CHAPTER VIII.

ARGUMENT.—The foregoing apologies of Job, it seems, made little impression on his friends : for he had no sooner done, but another of them, called Bildad, continued the dispute, with as little intermission as there was between the messengers that brought him (ch. i.) the sad tidings of his calamities. And it doth not appear by his discourse, that he differed at all in his principles from Eliphaz. For, though he give him very good counsel, yet he still presses this as the sense of all antiquity (ver. 8), that God ever prospers the just, and roots out the wicked, be they never so flourishing for a season. And he being descended from Shuah, one of Abraham's sons by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2), seems to me to have a particular respect, in this appeal to history, unto the records which then remained of God's blessing upon that faithful man's posterity, who hitherto, and long after, continued in his religion ; and of the extirpation of those eastern people (neighbours to Job) in whose country they were settled, because of their wickedness.

1 THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,

2 How long wilt thou speak these things, and how long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind ?

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1.] When Job had made an end of this discourse, Bildad (another great friend of his, descended from Shuah, one of Abraham's sons by Keturah), reprehended him in the same manner as Eliphaz had done, saying ;

Ver. 2.] Why doth thou persist to talk on this fashion, and with such vehemence expostulate with God ?

3 Doth God pervert judgment? or doth the Almighty pervert justice?

4 If thy children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away for their transgression;

5 If thou wouldest seek unto God betimes, and make thy supplication to the Almighty;

6 If thou wert pure and upright; surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous.

7 Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase.

8 For inquire, I pray thee, of the former age, and prepare thyself to the search of their fathers:

9 (For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, because our days upon earth are a shadow:)

10 Shall not they teach thee, and tell thee, and utter words out of their heart?

11 Can the rush grow up without mire? can the flag grow without water?

12 Whilst it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb.

13 So are the paths of all that forget God; and the hypocrite's hope shall perish:

14 Whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be a spider's web.

15 He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand: he shall hold it fast, but it shall not endure.

16 He is green before the sun, and his branch shooteth forth in his garden.

17 His roots are wrapped about the heap, and seeth the place of stones.

18 If he destroy him from his place, then it shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee.

19 Behold this is the joy of his way, and out of the earth shall others grow.

20 Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evil doer:

21 Till he fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoicing.

22 They that hate thee shall be clothed with shame; and the dwelling place of the wicked shall come to nought.

Ver. 3.] Dost thou imagine the supreme judge will not do thee right? or that he who needs nothing will swerve from the rules of equity?

Ver. 4.] Is it not now reasonable to think that thy children had highly offended him; for which cause he took a sudden and hasty vengeance on them?

Ver. 5.] And that if thou didst now (instead of complaining) implore his grace and favour with humble supplication;

Ver. 6.] And wert thyself sincere in heart and upright in thine actions, he would certainly have a regard to thee, and restore thy family to its former splendour.

Ver. 7.] I am confident, thou art not now so low, but in time he would make thee as high, nay, far more eminent, than thou wast before.

Ver. 8.] I do not desire thee to take my word for it; but let those who are gone before us instruct thee, and search diligently into the histories of the most ancient times.

Ver. 9.] (For, alas! we are not old enough to understand much: being able to make but few observations, by reason of the exceeding shortness of our lives).

Ver. 10.] They will not fail to inform thee aright; and out of their long experience, and the prudent observations of many ages, justify the truth of my words.

Ver. 11.] The rushes and flags we see can shoot up no higher, when they want their mud and moisture.

Ver. 12.] There is no need to stop their growth by cutting them down; for they will wither of themselves, even while they are fresh and green; while smaller herbs, which want not water, continue their beauty.

Ver. 13.] Just such is the condition of all those who neglect God (without whose blessing none can flourish): who knows him also that counterfeits piety, and will defeat him of the happiness he expects.

Ver. 14.] He may flatter himself with vain hopes, and be so much the more miserable; for the things wherein he trusts are as weak as a spider's web.

Ver. 15.] He may fancy his family to be so great and potent that it will support him; but it shall fall as well as himself: he may endeavour to keep it up by strong alliances, but to no purpose.

Ver. 16.] Nay, he may seem to all the world, as well as to himself, to be like a flourishing tree, which spreads its branches in a fair garden.

Ver. 17.] Whose roots have wreathed themselves thick about the earth, and whose head lifts up itself above the highest edifices.

Ver. 18.] But when God blasts him, and plucks him up by the roots, there shall remain no remembrance that such a man ever lived in that place.

Ver. 19.] Believe it, the pleasure such men take in their prosperous estate is no better than this; and out of the dust shall others spring up, and flourish in their stead.

Ver. 20.] It is a certain truth, that God will not desert the upright, nor will he uphold the wicked.

Ver. 21.] 'Thou thyself (if thou art upright' shalt still be so blessed by him, that thou shalt not be able to contain thy joy within thy heart; but it shall appear in thy countenance, and burst out into joyful songs.

Ver. 22.] They that rejoiced at thy fall shall be perfectly confounded at thy happy restoration, and never recover themselves, but utterly perish.

CHAPTER IX.

ARGUMENT.—Job allows what Bildad had well spoken in the beginning of his speech: and very religiously adores the justice, wisdom, and sovereignty of the Almighty, with whom he protests he had no intention to quarrel or dispute, but only to assert the contrary maxim to that which they maintained, that piety will not secure us from all calamities, which do not ever fall upon those that deserve them. Witness, on one hand, the prosperous estate of wicked princes, ver. 24 (particularly of one great prince, who then somewhere reigned in their neighbouring countries); and, on the other hand, his own infelicity, notwithstanding his known integrity, ver. 25. About this he confesses he was very much unsatisfied; though he knew it was in vain to argue with God about it, nor would his affliction suffer him to do it.

1 THEN Job answered and said,
 2 I know it is so of a truth : but how should man be just with God ?
 3 If he will contend with him, he cannot answer him one of a thousand.
 4 He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength : who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered ?
 5 Which removeth the mountains, and they know not : which overturneth them in his anger.
 6 Which shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble.
 7 Which commandeth the sun, and it riseth not ; and sealeth up the stars.
 8 Which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea.
 9 Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south.
 10 Which doeth great things past finding out ; yea, and wonders without number.
 11 Lo, he goeth by me, and I see him not : he passeth on also, but I perceive him not.
 12 Behold, he taketh away, who can hinder him ? who will say unto him, What doest thou ?
 13 If God will not withdraw his anger, the proud helpers do stoop under him.
 14 How much less shall I answer him, and choose out my words to reason with him ?

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1.] When he had done, Job began again, and replied in this manner ;

Ver. 2.] There need not so many words to prove what thou saidst in the entrance of thy speech ; for I know very well that God never perverts judgment, and that frail man cannot justify himself before him.

Ver. 3.] If he should go about to answer to a thousand things which may be objected to him, he would hardly clear himself in one.

Ver. 4.] I adore also his wisdom and power as well as his justice : and am sensible that no men can be safe who obstinately oppose him.

Ver. 5.] Though they were as big and as strong as the mountains, he can hastily overturn them in a moment before they think of it.

Ver. 6.] For he is able to remove the whole earth out of its place, and shatter the very foundations of it.

Ver. 7.] Nor are the heavens less subject to his power : for neither sun nor stars can shine if he forbid them.

Ver. 8.] He alone commands the clouds to cover them, and makes the sea swell and lift up its waves.

Ver. 9.] All the constellations of heaven obey him in their several seasons : both those which we see, and those in the other hemisphere.

Ver. 10.] In short, I agree with Eliphaz (v. 9), that the wonders he doeth are innumerable, and past my comprehension.

Ver. 11.] He sets them before my eyes continually, and yet I am not able to understand them.

Ver. 12.] If he snatch away anything suddenly, who can make him restore it, or cause him to give an account why he did it ?

Ver. 13.] If he will continue his displeasure, there is no remedy ; but the proudest undertakers must confess their inability to relieve us.

Ver. 14.] What am I then, poor wretch, that I should contend with his anger ? or where shall I find out words choice enough to plead with him ?

15 Whom, though I were righteous, yet would I not answer, but I would make supplication to my judge.

16 If I had called, and he had answered me : yet would I not believe that he had hearkened unto my voice.

17 For he breaketh me with a tempest, and multiplieth my wounds without cause.

18 He will not suffer me to take my breath, but fillet me with bitterness.

19 If I speak of strength, lo, he is strong : and if of judgment, who shall set me a time to plead ?

20 If I justify myself, mine own mouth shall condemn me : if I say, I am perfect, it shall also prove me perverse.

21 Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my soul : I would despise my life.

22 This is one thing, therefore I said it, He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked.

23 If the scourge slay suddenly, he will laugh at the trial of the innocent.

24 The earth is given into the hand of the wicked : he covereth the faces of the judges thereof ; if not, where, and who is he ?

25 Now my days are swifter than a post : they flee away, they see no good.

26 They are passed away as the swift ships : as the eagle that hasteth to the prey.

Ver. 15.] It is not fit for me to open my mouth before him in the justest cause, unless it be to supplicate his favour when he judges me.

Ver. 16.] And if I had made supplication, and he had granted my desire, I would not think my prayer had done the business (or believe myself to be out of all danger).

Ver. 17.] For I am not conscious of any guilt ; and yet you see with what violent blasts he hath shattered me and my family in pieces, and given me one wound after another.

Ver. 18.] No sooner was one past, but another immediately followed ; which have left me not the least pleasure in life.

Ver. 19.] If I stand upon my might, alas ! it is not to be named with his : if upon my right ; what judge is there above him to appoint us a day of hearing ?

Ver. 20.] If I should justify myself, there would be something in my very plea to condemn me : it will render my cause worse to pretend I am innocent.

Ver. 21.] Though I were so, yet I would not be mine own judge in the case ; I do not value my life so much as to contend about it.

Ver. 22.] All that I affirm is this, and I persist in that opinion, that he lets the innocent suffer sad things as well as the guilty.

Ver. 23.] When a plague comes which kills in a moment, he regards not though it fall on the innocent.

Ver. 24.] And, on the other side (so false is your discourse), we see the government of the earth given into the hands of a wicked prince, who blinds the eyes of his judges. If you deny this, tell me, where is the man, and what is his name, who administers things uprightly ?

Ver. 25.] I myself was in prosperity, but it is fled away swifter than a post, and there is not the least footstep of it remaining.

Ver. 26.] The ships that are carried with the most rapid stream, or the hungry eagle in chase of her prey, do not make more haste away.

27 If I say, I will forget my complaint, I will leave off my heaviness, and comfort myself :

28 I am afraid of all my sorrows, I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent.

29 If I be wicked, why then labour I in vain ?

30 If I wash myself with snow water, and make my hands never so clean ;

31 Yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes shall abhor me.

Ver. 27.] I think sometime with myself, that I will forget the miseries of which I complain, and be more cheerful and courageous :

Ver. 28.] But then my grief frights away that resolution ; knowing thou wilt not release me, but make me still groan under them.

Ver. 29.] I am wicked in thine account, and therefore it is to no purpose to vindicate mine innocence.

Ver. 30.] Were I never so pure and clean from all filthiness in heart and life ;

Ver. 31.] Thou wouldest notwithstanding cover me

32 For he is not a man, as I am, that I should answer him, and we should come together in judgment.

33 Neither is there any daysman betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both.

34 Let him take his rod away from me, and let not his fear terrify me :

35 Then would I speak, and not fear him ; but it is not so with me.

with filthy ulcers, and make my nearest relations abhor to approach me.

Ver. 32.] For God is not like me, that we should dispute upon even terms.

Ver. 33.] Nor is there any body above us both to compose our differences and command silence, when either of us exceeds our bounds.

Ver. 34.] As for myself, his rod, which is upon me, keeps me in such awe, that I cannot speak freely.

Ver. 35.] Let him remove that, and then I shall utter my mind with less dread ; for I am not so bad as you imagine.

CHAPTER X.

ARGUMENT.—In this chapter the passionate complaints and expostulations with God, from which Job tells us (in the foregoing chapter) he intended hereafter to refrain, break out afresh ; and he earnestly desires to know what his guilt is : which God who made him, he was sure, could not but perfectly understand, if there was any, and needed not for the discovery of it, to expose him to these severe torments. Which, he still is of the opinion, may justify his wishes of never being born, or of dying presently after. Though, those wishes being vain, he acknowledges it is more rational to desire that God would be pleased to intermit his pain awhile, if he did not think fit quite to remove it.

1 My soul is weary of my life ; I will leave my complaint upon myself ; I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

2 I will say unto God, do not condemn me ; shew me wherefore thou contendest with me.

3 Is it good unto thee that thou shouldst oppress, that thou shouldst despise the work of thy hands, and shine upon the counsel of the wicked ?

4 Hast thou eyes of flesh ? or seest thou as man seeth ?

5 Are thy days as the days of man ? are thy years as man's days,

6 That thou inquest after my iniquity, and searchest after my sin ?

7 Thou knowest that I am not wicked ; and there is none that can deliver out of thy hand.

8 Thy hands have made me and fashioned me together round about ; yet thou dost destroy me.

9 Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me as the clay ; and wilt thou bring me into dust again ?

10 Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and curdled me like cheese ?

11 Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh, and hast fenced me with bones and sinews.

12 Thou hast granted me life and favour, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1.] And since life is a burden to me, which can find no ease but only in complaining, I will take that liberty (for it is in vain to contend against it, ix. 27), though no words can express my anguish and misery.

Ver. 2.] O thou supreme judge of all, do not pronounce thy final sentence against me, till thou hast first shown me what the crimes are for which I suffer.

Ver. 3.] What benefit wilt thou receive by my spoils ? or is it agreeable to thee to slight thine own workmanship, and to countenance the reasonings and designs of evil men ?

Ver. 4.] Dost thou judge of things as men do, who can see no farther than the outside, or are led by their affections ?

Ver. 5.] Must thou take time as we do to find out the truth, and understand the bottom of a business ?

Ver. 6.] Is that the reason thou usest me thus severely, and hast laid me upon a rack, and as it were examinest what I have done amiss ?

Ver. 7.] Surely thou (whose vengeance none can escape) knowest, without the help of such torments, that I am not guilty.

Ver. 8.] There is no part of me but was most elaborately made and fashioned by thee (and therefore thou canst not be ignorant of me) ; though now thou art about to ruin me.

Ver. 9.] Need I put thee in mind that I was formed by thee, as the potter works the clay into what shape he pleases, and now thou art crumbling me into pieces again ?

Ver. 10.] Didst not thou gather all the scattered parts together, and compact them in my mother's womb ?

Ver. 11.] And first cover them with skin, and then with flesh, and at last strengthen them with bones and sinews ;

Ver. 12.] And in due time bring me into the world,

13 And these things hast thou hid in thy heart: I know that this is with thee.

14 If I sin, then thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.

15 If I be wicked, wo unto me; and if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head. I am full of confusion; therefore see thou mine affliction;

16 For it increaseth. Thou huntest me as a fierce lion: and again thou shewest thyself marvellous upon me.

17 Thou renewest thy witnesses against me, and increasest thine indignation upon me; changes and war are against me.

and give me all the comforts of life, and by thy constant care preserve both it and them?

Ver. 13.] Thou canst not have forgotten these things; and I am sure that this misery I now endure is not without thy order.

Ver. 14.] I cannot offend thee in the least, but thou (by whom I was thus formed) must needs know and observe it, and I cannot avoid thy punishment for it.

Ver. 15.] If I be wicked, I am undone; and if I be righteous, I am so oppressed that I cannot look upon what a lamentable confusion I am in, beholding nothing but misery which way soever I cast mine eyes.

Ver. 16.] For it grows greater and greater, while thou pursuest me as a lion doth his prey; and when I hope there is an end of my troubles, sendest more to fill me with new astonishment and horror.

Ver. 17.] Fresh witnesses of thine anger rise up

18 Wherefore then hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? O that I had given up the ghost, and no eye had seen me!

19 I should have been as though I had not been; I should have been carried from the womb to the grave.

20 Are not my days few? cease then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little,

21 Before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death;

22 A land of darkness, as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness.

against me: thou multiplieth thy plagues upon me so that there is no end but only a change of my conflicts.

Ver. 18.] And therefore I cannot but wish, as I did at the first, that my mother's womb had been my grave: happy had it been for me if I had died there, and never come into this miserable world:

Ver. 19.] Or that I had died as soon as I was born, and been carried from the womb to the grave;

Ver. 20.] To which I am now very near. May I beg therefore but this one favour, that since thou wilt not quite remove thy hand, thou wilt forbear awhile to strike, and let me breathe and refresh myself a little;

Ver. 21.] Before I depart thither from whence I shall not return (to ask any more favours); be laid, I mean, in my grave, the place of dismal darkness:

Ver. 22.] Where it is as dark as dark can be; and there is no succession of day and night, as we have here, but one perpetual night.

CHAPTER XI.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter gives an account of the sense of Zophar about the business in dispute. It is uncertain whence he was descended; but probably he dwelt upon the borders of Idumea, for there we find an ancient city called Naamah (Josh. xv. 41), and from thence came to visit Job in his affliction. But instead of joining with him in his prayer for a little respite from his pain (with which Job had concluded his discourse), he calls him an idle talker, and accuses him of irreverence towards God. Concerning whose incomprehensible counsels, and irresistible power, &c. he discourses with great sense, and gives Job exceeding good advice; but still follows the opinion of the other two friends, that he would not have been so miserable if he had not been wicked.

1 THEN answered Zophar the Naamathite, and said,

2 Should not the multitude of words be answered? and should a man full of talk be justified?

3 Should thy lies make men hold their peace? and when thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed?

4 For thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1.] Here a third friend of Job's (Zophar of Naamah) began to speak, with no small passion;

Ver. 2.] Dost thou think to stop our mouths with abundance of words; and by thy talkativeness to persuade us thou art innocent?

Ver. 3.] Must we not confute thy false allegations, but suffer thee to be insolent, because thou art miserable.

Ver. 4.] For thou pretendest not to have offended either in word or deed, and that God himself can find no reason to condemn thee.

5 But oh that God would speak, and open his lips against thee;

6 And that he would show thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to that which is! Know therefore that God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth.

7 Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?

8 It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? deeper than hell; what canst thou know?

Ver. 5.] Oh that he would vouchsafe to show thee thine error, and with his own mouth confute thee!

Ver. 6.] That he would show thee the secret reasons of his wise counsels (which far surpass thine) in this affliction; and make thee know that he would be just, if he should punish thy sin more severely.

Ver. 7.] Art thou able, after all thy busy inquiries, to give an account of God's judgments, and perfectly comprehend the reasons of his providence?

Ver. 8.] Thou mayest as well take a measure of the height of heaven, or of the depth of hell.

9 The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea.

10 If he eut off, and shut up, or gather together, then who can hinder him?

11 For he knoweth vain men: he seeth wickedness also; will he not then consider it?

12 For vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt.

13 If thou prepare thy heart, and stretch out thy hands toward him;

14 If iniquity be in thy hand, put it far away, and let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles.

15 For then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot; yea, thou shalt be steadfast, and shalt not fear:

Ver. 9.] The earth and the sea, as long and as broad as they are, have their bounds; but that hath none.

Ver. 10.] If he seize upon anything, and shut it up (as a hunter doth his prey in a net), he will gather it, and who shall force him to restore it?

Ver. 11.] For he knows vain men (who mind not what they say or do), he sees their most hidden wickedness, and will not he punish it?

Ver. 12.] Shall man, void of understanding, take the confidence to dispute with God? man, who is naturally as rude and blockish as a wild ass's colt?

Ver. 13.] If thou art truly wise, cease disputing, and fall to prayer.

Ver. 14.] If thou art guilty of any sin, banish it quite away, and reform thyself and thy family.

Ver. 15.] For then shalt thou look cheerfully again, and be perfectly freed from this loathsome condition; yea, thou shalt be settled without any fear of losing thy happiness.

16 Because thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it as waters that pass away:

17 And thy age shall be clearer than the noonday; thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning.

18 And thou shalt be secure, because there is hope; yea, thou shalt dig about thee, and thou shalt take thy rest in safety.

19 Also thou shalt lie down, and none shall make thee afraid; yea, many shall make suit unto thee.

20 But the eyes of the wicked shall fail, and they shall not escape, and their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

Ver. 16.] Which shall be so great, that it shall blot out the remembrance of thy past miseries; or thou shalt think of them as of waters that are run away, and will return no more.

Ver. 17.] The rest of thy life shall be more glorious than the sun at noon: even thy darkness shall be like the morning-light.

Ver. 18.] Thou shalt be confident, though any evil threaten thee, because there is hope God will deliver thee: thou shalt dig wells of water, and none shall disturb thy tents or thy flocks.

Ver. 19.] Thou shalt be in perfect peace, and none shall disquiet thee: yea, the multitude shall sue to thee for thy favour, and the greatest persons shall desire thy friendship.

Ver. 20.] But the wicked shall in vain look for happiness: they shall not escape their deserved punishment, but their hope of deliverance shall faint away.

CHAPTER XII.

ARGUMENT.—In this chapter Job taxes all his three friends with too great a conceit of their own wisdom, which had not, as yet, taught them common humanity to the miserable. And lets them understand, that he needs not come to them to learn, but might rather teach them the falseness of that proposition, where-with Zophar had concluded his speech, concerning the infelicity of the wicked. For the contrary, he tells them, was obvious to sense, ver. 7, 8, &c. And as for what Zophar had discoursed of the wisdom and power of God, he would have them know, that he was as well skilled in those points as the best of them, and understood as much of the history of ancient times; particularly of the vain attempt at the tower of Babel, unto which it is probable he hath respect in the fourteenth verse; as, in all the following, he seems to have to what you read in Gen. xiv. 5—8, of the rooting out of those fierce giants the Rephaim, and other such-like barbarous and rapacious people, of the particulars of which we have now no records remaining.

1 AND Job answered and said,
2 No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you.

3 But I have understanding as well as you; I am not inferior to you: yea, who knoweth not such things as these?

4 I am as one mocked of his neighbour, who calleth upon God, and he answereth him: the just upright man is laughed to scorn.

5 He that is ready to slip with his feet is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at ease.

6 The tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure; into whose hand God bringeth abundantly.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1.] To this Job replied in such words as these:

Ver. 2.] You believe then there are no men of sense in the world besides yourselves: so that if you were dead, there would be no wisdom left among us.

Ver. 3.] Let not your vanity abuse you; I have understanding as well and as much as you: and so hath every body else: for I see nothing singular in all you have said.

Ver. 4.] I am not so simple but I see how you deride your friend, when you bid him call upon God that he may answer him. But this is no new thing, the best of men have been mocked at on this fashion.

Ver. 5.] Though he be as a lamp, yet they who are dazzled with the splendour of worldly prosperity despise him: the upright is never acceptable to him who is not steadfast in his goings.

Ver. 6.] For they thrive and flourish, though they rob the just; and even such men live without disturbance, as provoke God with those very things which he bestows upon them with his own hand.

7 But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee; and the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee:

8 Or speak to the earth, and it shall teach thee: and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee.

9 Who knoweth not in all these that the hand of the LORD hath wrought this?

10 In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind.

11 Doth not the ear try words? and the mouth taste his meat?

12 With the ancient is wisdom; and in length of days understanding.

13 With him is wisdom and strength, he hath counsel and understanding.

14 Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again: he shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening.

15 Behold, he withholdeth the waters, and they dry up: also he sendeth them out, and they overturn the earth.

Ver. 7.] Thou needest not go any farther than to the beasts or birds, to learn how well the wicked fare.

Ver. 8.] The earth brings forth her fruit to them abundantly; and the fishes of the sea deny them not their service.

Ver. 9.] Who is so stupid as not to understand by all these that God hath ordered it should be thus?

Ver. 10.] Whose right it is to dispose of all creatures, as well as of mankind.

Ver. 11.] Cannot the mind distinguish truth from falsehood, as exactly as the palate sweet from bitter?

Ver. 12.] And the older we grow, the wiser one would think we should be.

Ver. 13.] But what is all our wisdom to God's? who (as he knows, so) can do all things; and he never errs in his understanding, or miscarries in his designs.

Ver. 14.] It is not in the power of any creature to repair that which he throws down; nor to extricate that man whom he casts into difficulties and straits.

Ver. 15.] If he deny us rain, the waters themselves dry up: and he sends such floods as break the strongest banks.

Ver. 16.] Nor is his wisdom, as I said, inferior to his power: but the subtlety of those who deceive is as well known to him as the silliness of those who are deceived.

16 With him is strength and wisdom: the deceived and the deceiver are his.

17 He leadeth counsellors away spoiled, and maketh the judges fools.

18 He looseth the bond of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle.

19 He leadeth princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty.

20 He removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged.

21 He poureth contempt upon princes, and weakeneth the strength of the mighty.

22 He discovereth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death.

23 He increaseth the nations, and destroyeth them: he enlargeth the nations, and straiteneth them again.

24 He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way.

25 They grope in the dark without light, and he maketh them to stagger like a drunken man.

Ver. 17.] He defeats the wisest statesmen, and infatuates the ablest senators.

Ver. 18.] So that they are not able to keep the crown on the head of their kings; but they are stripped of their royal ornaments, and bound in chains.

Ver. 19.] Their great ministers are carried captives with them; nor are the most powerful forces they can raise able to defend them.

Ver. 20.] Eloquence, fidelity, and the prudence which hath been gained by long experience, signify as little for their preservation.

Ver. 21.] The nobleness of their birth or their munificence is not at all regarded: and he dissolves the strongest confederacies, into which their friends enter for their support.

Ver. 22.] No plot can be so secretly carried but he discovers it; and brings to light that which hath been contrived in the greatest obscurity.

Ver. 23.] Whole nations (as well as their princes) are perfectly under his power; whom he sometimes multiplies, and again diminishes by war, famine, or pestilence. He enlarges their bounds, and, when he pleases, reduces them into narrower limits.

Ver. 24.] He deprives their leaders both of courage and judgment; and brings them into such confusion, that they know not which way to turn themselves.

Ver. 25.] Blind men see as much as they; and their counsels and motions are as uncertain as those of a man in drink.

CHAPTER XIII.

ARGUMENT.—From the foregoing observations, Job still continues to assert, first, his own understanding to be equal, or rather superior, to theirs: who had better therefore learn of him, and know that God was not pleased to have his providence defended by untruths, nor to see men partial, though it was in his behalf; and, secondly, his own integrity to be such, that he would ever defend it against all accusers, even before God himself: whom he desires to take cognizance of the cause, and to let him understand what the crimes were for which he was thus severely handled. For he protests that he was ignorant of them: though the punishments he had endured were more than sufficient to awaken the sense of his guilt, he being almost consumed by them.

1 Lo, mine eye hath seen all this, mine ear hath heard and understood it.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1.] I have said nothing, I would have you know, but what I myself have observed; or received

2 What ye know, the same do I know also: I am not inferior unto you.

from credible reports, which I have found to be certainly true.

Ver. 2.] Whereby you may see I had reason to 3 Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to reason with God.

4 But ye are forgers of lies, ye are all physicians of no value.

5 O that ye would altogether hold your peace! and it should be your wisdom.

6 Hear now my reasoning, and hearken to the pleading of my lips.

7 Will ye speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him?

8 Will ye accept his person? will ye contend for God?

9 Is it good that he should search you out? or as one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him?

10 He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons.

11 Shall not his excellency make you afraid? and his dread fall upon you?

12 Your remembrances are like unto ashes, your bodies to bodies of clay.

13 Hold your peace, let me alone, that I may speak, and let come on me what will.

14 Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, and put my life in my hand?

15 Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him: but I will maintain mine own ways before him.

say, that I know as much as you, and am not to learn of you.

Ver. 3.] Would to God I might speak with him, and lay my reasons open before him; and be troubled with your discourses no longer.

Ver. 4.] For your conclusions are false; and, like unskilful physicians, you exasperate the diseases which you cannot cure.

Ver. 5.] The best proof of your wisdom would be to say never a word more of these matters.

Ver. 6.] But, listen a little to me, I beseech you, and hear by what reasons I will defend myself.

Ver. 7.] Doth God stand in need of untruths to justify his proceedings? cannot he be righteous unless I be wicked?

Ver. 8.] Hath he so little right on his side, that you must show him favour? or do you think to oblige his majesty by doing me wrong?

Ver. 9.] Will it be to your advantage, think you, that God should strictly examine all you have said? or can he be deceived with your flatteries, as frail men may be?

Ver. 10.] No; he will severely chastise you, for designing to gratify him by condemning me.

Ver. 11.] The incomparable excellence of God, one would think, should have frightened away such a thought; and his dreadful majesty made you not presume to imagine he wanted your patronage.

Ver. 12.] Whose remonstrances, on his behalf, are no better than dust; and the arguments you accumulate but like so many heaps of dirt.

Ver. 13.] Keep silence, therefore, and do not disturb me in my speech; for I will omit nothing.

Ver. 14.] And I am so conscious to myself of my innocence, that I must still wonder why I suffer such enraging miseries, and am exposed to so many dangers.

Ver. 15.] Assure yourselves I will never forego this plea; but still maintain mine innocence, though I were at the last gasp, and had no hope of life.

Ver. 16.] And I am confident God himself would 16 He also shall be my salvation: for a hypocrite shall not come before him.

17 Hear diligently my speech, and my declaration with your ears.

18 Behold now, I have ordered my cause; I know that I shall be justified.

19 Who is he that will plead with me? for now, if I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost.

20 Only do not two things unto me: then will I not hide myself from thee.

21 Withdraw thy hand far from me: and let not thy dread make me afraid.

22 Then call thou, and I will answer: or let me speak, and answer thou me.

23 How many are mine iniquities and sins? make me to know my transgression and my sin.

24 Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdst me for thy enemy?

25 Wilt thou break a loaf driven to and fro? and wilt thou pursue the dry stubble?

26 For thou writest bitter things against me, and makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth.

27 Thou putttest my feet also in the stocks, and lookest narrowly unto all my paths; thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet.

28 And he, as a rotten thing, consumeth, as a garment that is moth eaten.

vindicate it; for I am no hypocrite, nor shall false accusations be admitted at his tribunal.

Ver. 17.] Do not interrupt me, but give due attention to what I am about to say.

Ver. 18.] See, I beseech you, I refuse not to be tried, but have framed a process against myself; and am so sure of the goodness of my cause, that I know I shall be acquitted.

Ver. 19.] Let who will come and accuse me, I am ready to answer: for to hold my peace, on so just an occasion, is death to me.

Ver. 20.] Let me only beg, O great judge of all, that thou wilt forbear to make use of two things against me; and then I will appear confidently, to plead my cause before thee.

Ver. 21.] Do not continue my pain: and let not the sight of thy majesty put me in disorder.

Ver. 22.] Then summon me to thy bar, and charge me, and I will defend myself; or let me question thee, and do thou clear thy proceedings against me.

Ver. 23.] Tell me what, and how many, are mine iniquities and sins, for I am ignorant of them: I desire to know them all, great and small, against thee, or against my neighbour.

Ver. 24.] For what cause am I thus afflicted, and used as if I was thine enemy?

Ver. 25.] What honour wilt thou get by employing thy power against one, who is no more able to stand before thee, than the leaf to resist the wind which sports with it, or the dry stubble the fire which instantly consumes it?

Ver. 26.] For thou hast passed severe decrees against me, and punishest me for the crimes which were committed before I well knew what I did.

Ver. 27.] And thou dost execute them as severely; for I can no more escape than a malefactor whose feet are in the stocks, who is encompassed with a vigilant guard, and cannot stir a foot from the place where he is.

Ver. 28.] But there he rots and wastes away, as I do, like a garment that is eaten by the moths.

CHAPTER XIV.

ARGUMENT.—The good man proceeds to plead with God for some mitigation of his miseries, from the consideration of the shortness of life, and the trouble that naturally belongs to it; which he thought might move him not to add any greater burden of suffering; especially considering, that when he is dead he cannot come into the world again (as the plants do) to receive the marks of his favour. Which he hopes therefore he will bestow upon him here, notwithstanding the depth of his misery (which tempted him to the borders of impatience, ver. 13); it being very easy for him to remove his affliction, though never so heavy, whose power is so great, that he removed mountains out of their place, and brought a deluge, as we may say, of sand (as they saw sometimes in their neighbouring countries) to overflow the most fruitful regions.

1 MAN that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble.

2 He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not.

3 And dost thou open thine eyes upon such a one, and bringest me into judgment with thee?

4 Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one.

5 Seeing his days are determined, the number of his months are with thee, thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass;

6 Turn from him, that he may rest, till he shall accomplish as a hireling, his day.

7 For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease.

8 Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground;

9 Yet through the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant.

10 But man dieth, and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?

11 As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up:

12 So man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep.

13 O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me secret, until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me!

14 If a man die, shall he live again? all the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come.

15 Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee: thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hands.

16 For now thou numberest my steps, dost thou not watch over my sin?

16 My transgression is sealed up in a bag, and thou sewest up mine iniquity.

18 And surely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place.

19 The waters wear the stones: thou wastest away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth; and thou destroyest the hope of man.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1.] Man is born to die: and as he cannot live long, so his short life is subject to many cares.

Ver. 2.] He may be compared to a flower, which is beautiful indeed, but suddenly cropped; or to the shadow on a dial, which never stands still, but is hastening away apace.

Ver. 3.] And dost thou concern thyself so far about such a wretch, as to summon him before thy tribunal, and there pass dreadful sentences against him, as thou dost against me?

Ver. 4.] The common frailty of humanity might make thee overlook him; for nothing, thou knowest, can be better than the original from whence it comes.

Ver. 5.] Or if he were more considerable than he is, yet, since he can live but to such a time as thou hast prefixed, beyond which he cannot prolong his days one moment:

Ver. 6.] That I should think might move thee not to torment him in this manner; but to let him alone till that appointed time come, which will be as welcome to him as the end of his labour is to the hireling.

Ver. 7.] And after that, there is more hope of a tree than of him; for if it be cut down to the very ground, the body of it will grow again, and thrust out new branches:

Ver. 8.] Nay, though it hath been so long cut down that the roots of it are grown old, and the trunk seems quite dead;

Ver. 9.] Yet when it is well moistened it will shoot up again, and bring forth boughs, as if it were but newly planted.

Ver. 10.] But when man dies, he crumbles into dust; and none can set it together to make him live again.

Ver. 11.] As lakes and great rivers are dried up, when their waters find a new channel:

Ver. 12.] So man laid down in his grave shall come no more hither; but in that bed of dust shall sleep perpetually.

Ver. 13.] I wish I were buried alive, rather than suffer such things; or that I could take sanctuary somewhere till this storm be over; or at least thou wouldest set me a certain time when thou wilt deliver me.

Ver. 14.] Then (though there be no hope of living here again after I am dead) thou shalt see I will patiently wait all the days of that appointed time, till that happy change come.

Ver. 15.] Do thou speak the word, and it shall be done; show thou hast some love to thy own workmanship.

Ver. 16.] Though now thou seemest to number every step I have trod in all my life, and dost not spare to punish every fault;

Ver. 17.] Having taken as great care the memory of them should not be lost, as if they had been sealed up in a bag, and added one punishment to another:

Ver. 18.] Yet notwithstanding the highest mountains may fall like a leaf, and the rock be removed from his place.

Ver. 19.] The waters, though soft, wear away the hard stones, and the very dust or sand sometimes overflows the fruitful fields: why, therefore (since such strange and unexpected things come to pass), may there not be some hope for miserable man?

20 Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth: thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away.

21 His sons come to honour, and he knoweth

Ver. 20.] Who is not able to stand before thee; but must yield and be gone for ever when thou requirest; thou spoilest his beauty, and sendest him away into another world.

Ver. 21.] And then, whether his children, whom he leaves behind, be rich, or whether they be poor, it it not; and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them.

22 But his flesh upon him shall have pain, and his soul within him shall mourn.

is indifferent to him; for he knows not what passes here.

Ver. 22.] But while he is in flesh he cannot but be in pain for them, and his soul is inwardly grieved to see their misery.

CHAPTER XV.

ARGUMENT.—In this chapter Eliphaz renews the dispute with more eagerness and fierceness than before; being very angry that Job slighted them so much, and thought himself so wise (as he interpreted it), that he disdained their exhortations, and would not follow the counsel they had given him, of confessing his sins, and praying to God for forgiveness (ver. 8. viii. 4—6): but except this one argument (that he need not be ashamed to confess his guilt, when he considered how prone all men are to sin), there is nothing new in his discourse; but he merely urges what he had asserted at first, from his own and the wisest men's observations, that they are not the good, but the wicked, whom God punishes with such calamities as now were fallen upon Job. And with great ornaments of speech, he most admirably describes the vengeance which God is wont to take upon impious tyrants: having his eye, I suppose, upon Nimrod, or some such mighty oppressor.

1 THEN answered Eliphaz the Temanite, and said,

2 Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the east wind?

3 Should he reason with unprofitable talk? or with speeches wherewith he can do no good?

4 Yea, thou castest off fear, and restrainest prayer before God.

5 For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, and thou choosest the tongue of the crafty.

6 Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I: yea, thine own lips testify against thee.

7 Art thou the first man that was born? or wast thou made before the hills?

8 Hast thou heard the secret of God? and dost thou restrain wisdom to thyself?

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1.] Then Eliphaz, incensed with these reproaches, rose up again, and said;

Ver. 2.] Dost thou pretend to be wise, who answerest us with such empty discourses; and whose heart is swollen with such pernicious opinions, and vents them with so much vehemence?

Ver. 3.] Is this thy wisdom, which teaches thee to wrangle to no purpose, and to pour out words for which one is never the better?

Ver. 4.] The better did I say? They destroy all religion, and discourage men from pouring out their complaint in prayer to God.

Ver. 5.] Thou rather teachest them to dispute with him; whereby thou hast proclaimed thine iniquity, while with fallacious words thou seekest to dissemble it.

Ver. 6.] I need produce no farther testimony against thee; for thy own mouth hath done the business, and condemned thee of impiety.

Ver. 7.] Thou art but a man, why dost thou talk as if thou wert God, or at least wert made before the world?

Ver. 8.] Wast thou admitted into God's secret counsels, and thereby engrossedst all wisdom to thyself?

9 What knowest thou, that we know not? what understandest thou, which is not in us?

10 With us are both the grayheaded and very aged men, much elder than thy father.

11 Are the consolations of God small with thee? is there any secret thing with thee?

12 Why doth thy heart carry thee away? and what do thy eyes wink at, 13 That thou turnest thy spirit against God, and lettest such words go out of thy mouth?

14 What is man, that he should be clean? and he which is born of a woman, that he should be righteous?

15 Behold, he putteth no trust in his saints; yea, the heavens are not clean in his sight.

16 How much more abominable and filthy is man, which drinketh iniquity like water?

Ver. 9.] Wherein (to retort thy own words upon thee) doth thy knowledge exceed ours? Let us hear what secret thou hast learnt, which we do not understand.

Ver. 10.] If by age and long experience men acquire wisdom, there are some of us who are much elder than thy father.

Ver. 11.] Why dost thou slight then those divine consolations which we have given thee? Hast thou some secret ones which nobody else knows of?

Ver. 12.] What makes thee have such a high opinion of thyself, and in this manner condemn us?

Ver. 13.] Nay, oppose thyself to God, and take the boldness to argue with him!

Ver. 14.] Thou wilt maintain thy innocence, thou sayest; but thou forgettest, sure, what thou art and whence thou comest; else thou wouldest not stand upon thy justification, nor complain that thou art wronged.

Ver. 15.] Remember what I told thee before (iv. 18), that the angels are not immutably good; the heavenly inhabitants, I say, are not without their spots.

Ver. 16.] What a loathsome and filthy creature then is man, who is as prone to sin, as he is to drink when he is dry.

17 I will shew thee, hear me ; and that which I have seen I will declare ;

18 Which wise men have told from their fathers, and have not hid it :

19 Unto whom alone the earth was given, and no stranger passed among them.

20 The wicked man travaileth with pain all his days, and the number of years is hidden to the oppressor.

21 A dreadful sound is in his ears : in prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him.

22 He believeth not that he shall return out of darkness, and he is waited for of the sword.

23 He wandereth abroad for bread, saying, Where is it ? he knoweth that the day of darkness is ready at his hand.

24 Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid ; they shall prevail against him, as a king ready to the battle.

25 For he stretcheth out his hand against God, and strengtheneth himself against the Almighty.

26 He runneth upon him, even on his neck, upon the thick bosses of his bucklers :

27 Because he covereth his face with his fatness, and maketh collops of fat on his flanks.

28 And he dwelleth in desolate cities, and in houses which no man inhabiteth, which are ready to become heaps.

29 He shall not be rich, neither shall his substance continue, neither shall he prolong the perfection thereof upon the earth.

30 He shall not depart out of darkness ; the flame shall dry up his branches, and by the breath of his mouth shall he go away.

31 Let not him that is deceived trust in vanity : for vanity shall be his recompence.

32 It shall be accomplished before his time, and his branch shall not be green.

33 He shall shake off his unripe grape as the vine, and shall cast off his flower as the olive.

34 For the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery.

35 They conceive mischief, and bring forth vanity, and their belly prepareth deceit.

Ver. 17.] Do not stop thine ears whilst I show thee thine error, and I will say nothing but what mine own eyes have seen.

Ver. 18.] And which wise men have observed, and their fathers before them, who have reported it to their children :

Ver. 19.] And they no mean persons neither, but such as were alone thought worthy to be entrusted with the government of whole countries, which no foreign power could enter (as they have done thine) while they ruled.

Ver. 20.] The wicked tyrant (this is their and my observation) is never free from inward torment ; all his life long he is in dread of some greater oppressor than himself.

Ver. 21.] His guilt so pursues him, that it makes him fear some mischief or other is still falling on him ; and in the most peaceable time he doth not think himself in safety.

Ver. 22.] When he lies down he is afraid he shall be killed before the morning ; and he fancies nothing but naked swords round about him.

Ver. 23.] He shall wander to get a morsel of bread where he can find it ; and when he hath it, he shall imagine it will prove his poison.

Ver. 24.] The distress and anguish wherein he sees himself shall affright him ; they shall press upon him and overcome him, as a king doth his enemies whom he hath surrounded with his forces.

Ver. 25.] Which will be a just punishment of his audacious impiety ; because he defied God and resolutely set himself in opposition to the Almighty.

Ver. 26.] Who will suddenly lay fast hold on him and kill him, though he be never so well armed :

Ver. 27.] Because he minds nothing but his belly ; and, casting away all fear of God, nourishes up himself in luxury, pride, and haughtiness.

Ver. 28.] Possessing cities which he hath laid desolate ; and houses out of which he hath driven the owners, and which are running to ruin.

Ver. 29.] But the riches he hath gotten by such violence and oppression shall come to nothing : he may design great things, but shall leave them imperfect.

Ver. 30.] When his troubles begin, they shall not end till they have destroyed both him and his children : one word of God's mouth (so mad a thing it is to set himself against Heaven) will utterly consume him.

Ver. 31.] Let such examples teach him that is seduced into evil ways, not to trust to such uncertain greatness ; for vexatious disappointments shall be all that he will get by it.

Ver. 32.] He shall meet with them when he little thinks of it ; and see his children wither away as well as himself.

Ver. 33.] They shall die before their time, as the unripe grape, or the blossom of the vine or olive, are struck with hail, or bitten off by the frost.

Ver. 34.] The most numerous families of such ungodly men shall have none in them left : the divine vengeance shall destroy the house which was built with ill-gotten goods.

Ver. 35.] And they justly deserve to be thus punished, because all they design and do is nothing but the oppression and ruin of their subjects : against whom when one design miscarries, they conceive new arts to undo them.

CHAPTER XVI.

ARGUMENT.—Job reproves the vanity and obstinacy of Eliphaz, in repeating the same things over again, and still persisting in his inhumanity, though he saw his case so pitiable ; which he again describes, to make him sensible how unworthily he was treated by him and the rest of his friends ; who, in effect, joined with his enemies, who took this opportunity to rail at him. Whereas there was no crime of his appeared to justify their accusations, and to make good Eliphaz's argument : which signified nothing, unless he meant to say, that Job was like that wicked tyrant of whom he had discoursed. Which was so far from any show of truth, that he protests he never hurt any body, and was always a sincere lover of God, &c. (ver. 17, 18). The truth of which God knew, to whose bar he appeals from their unjust sentence.

1 THEN Job answered and said,
2 I have heard many such things : miserable comforters are ye all.

3 Shall vain words have an end ? or what emboldeneth thee that thou answerest ?

4 I also could speak as ye do : if your soul were in my soul's stead, I could heap up words against you, and shake my head at you.

5 But I would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

6 Though I speak, my grief is not assuaged : and though I forbear, what am I eased ?

7 But now he hath made me weary : thou hast made desolate all my company.

8 And thou hast filled me with wrinkles, which is a witness against me : and my leanness rising up in me beareth witness to my face.

9 He teareth me in his wrath, who hateth me : he gnasheth upon me with his teeth ; mine enemy sharpeneth his eyes upon me.

10 They have gaped upon me with their mouth ; they have smitten me upon the cheek reproachfully ; they have gathered themselves together against me.

11 God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and turned me over into the hands of the wicked.

12 I was at ease, but he hath broken me asunder : he hath also taken me by my neck, and shaken me to pieces, and set me up for his mark.

13 His archers compass me round about, he cleaveth my reins asunder, and doth not spare ; he poureth out my gall upon the ground.

14 He breaketh me with breach upon breach, he runneth upon me like a giant.

15 I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin, and defiled my horn in the dust.

16 My face is foul with weeping, and on my eyelids is the shadow of death ;

17 Not for any injustice in my hands : also my prayer is pure.

18 O earth, cover not thou my blood, and let my cry have no place.

19 Also now, behold, my witness is in heaven, and my record is on high.

20 My friends scorn me : but mine eye poureth out tears unto God.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. Here Job interrupted him, and said,

Ver. 2.] Thou dost but repeat what hath been often said already : such comforters as you are as troublesome as my sufferings.

Ver. 3.] May not one endlessly pour out such empty discourses ? (as I may with more reason call thine than thou didst mine, xv. 3). I wonder at thy confidence, that, having so little to say, thou shouldst take upon thee to answer.

Ver. 4.] I could insult as well as you ; and, if we could change conditions, let you see how easy it would be to oppress you with such words as these, in a grave fashion to mock at your calamities.

Ver. 5.] But I abhor the thought of such a guilt : I would not fail to fortify you, in that ease, with the best arguments I could invent ; and carefully abstain from the least word that should augment your grief.

Ver. 6.] Though as for myself, I find my misery admits of no consolation : for whether I defend my innocence, or silently suffer you to condemn me, it makes no difference.

Ver. 7.] God hath long since quite tired me with one trouble upon another. Thou hast not ceased, O God, till thou hast left me neither goods, nor children, nor a friend to comfort me.

Ver. 8.] The furrows in my face (which is not told) show the greatness of my affliction : which is extremely augmented by him, who rises up with false accusations to take away mine honour, as this consumption will do my life.

Ver. 9.] He rends my good name in pieces with a passion equal to his hatred : my enemy is enraged against me, and cruelly sets himself to spy out the least occasion to calumniate me.

Ver. 10.] There is no small number of such as these, who look like so many wild beasts coming to devour me ; having already most shamefully abused me, and joined themselves together to give full satisfaction to their wrath, wherewith they are filled against me.

Ver. 11.] So God will have it ; who hath abandoned the protection of me, and delivered me bound into the hands of the ungodly, to use me at their pleasure.

Ver. 12.] How happy was I heretofore ! and now I am crushed in pieces : from an eminent condition he hath thrown me down into the most despicable : and there I am exposed (as a butt to the arrow) to all manner of indignities and miseries.

Ver. 13.] He is not content to take away all my goods, and destroy my family, but, to the reproach of friends (which strike like so many darts to my very heart,) he hath added ulcers in every part of my body, with inward pains, which rack me without intermission ; and, in one word, hath so mortally wounded me, as if my bowels were already shed upon the ground.

Ver. 14.] Before one wound be closed he makes another, and in such violent a manner, that I can make no more resistance than a dwarf can do against a giant.

Ver. 15.] The sackcloth which I put on at the first now cleaves so fast to me, as if I had sewed it to my skin ; and all my authority and honour is changed into contempt.

Ver. 16.] My face is dirty, and mine eyes in a manner quite put out by the very tears which have fallen from thence.

Ver. 17.] And yet I must still say, I never offered such a violence as this to any man, and was always (so false is Eliphaz's accusation, xv. 14), a sincere worshipper of God.

Ver. 18.] If this be not true, let my blood be left to the dogs to lick, when I am dead, and let neither God nor man regard my complaint while I am alive.

Ver. 19.] But what need these imprecations ? The great God who rules over all is my witness, and can testify how just I have been towards my neighbours, and how pious towards himself.

Ver. 20.] From your judgment therefore (who instead of comforting my innocence, scornfully set yourselves to defame me) I appeal to his ; and beseech him with perpetual tears to vindicate me.

21 O that one might plead for a man with God, as a man pleadeth for his neighbour!

Ver. 21.] I am so assured of the goodness of my cause (as well as of his justice), that I wish for nothing more than to have it speedily heard and tried by him, in the same manner that pleas are held before earthly judges.

22 When a few years are come, then I shall go the way whence I shall not return.

Ver. 22.] For my life cannot last long; and I know that when I am gone I cannot return hither again, for him to do me justice.

CHAPTER XVII.

ARGUMENT.—Here Job desires that he may be tried presently before God's tribunal, his life being just upon the point to expire, as he had said in the end of the former chapter, and continues to urge again in this, because his friends were very unfit judges in this case, and had passed such a sentence upon him as upright men would never approve of. Whereby they had given him a new vocation, to hear them talk so idly, and put him in hope of recovering his happiness, if he would follow their admonitions, when they saw him just dropping into the grave, which, was the only thing, he saith, that he could hope for.

1 My breath is corrupt, my days are extinct, the graves are ready for me.

2 Are there not mockers with me? and doth not mine eye continue in their provocation?

3 Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee; who is he that will strike hands with me?

4 For thou hast hid thine heart from understanding: therefore shalt thou not exalt them.

5 He that speaketh flattery to his friends, even the eyes of his children shall fail.

6 He hath made me also a byword of the people; and aforetime I was as a tabret.

7 Mine eye also is dim by reason of sorrow, and all my members are as a shadow.

8 Upright men shall be astonished at this, and the innocent shall stir up himself against the hypocrite.

9 The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger.

10 But as for you all, do ye return and come now: for I cannot find one wise man among you.

11 My days are past, my purposes are broken off, even the thoughts of my heart.

12 They change the night into day: the light is short because of darkness.

13 If I wait, the grave is my house: I have made my bed in the darkness.

14 I have said to corruption, Thou art my father: to the worm, Thou art my mother, and my sister.

15 And where is now my hope? as for my hope, who shall see it?

16 They shall go down to the bars of the pit, when our rest together is in the dust.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1.] My vital spirits are spent, they give but a glimmering and dying light, whereby I can see nothing but graves on every side prepared for me.

Ver. 2.] How can I support my spirits, when my friends, who should comfort me, mock at all I say for myself? This so bitterly exasperates me, that I cannot take a wink of sleep, nor of anything else.

Ver. 3.] Once more therefore I beseech thee, O God, to assure me that thou wilt judge my cause thyself: let somebody undertake for thee: who is it that on thy behalf will engage to do me right?

Ver. 4.] Not these friends of mine: for they comprehend nothing of the way of thy judgments: therefore, thou shalt not confer this honour on them who talk so absurdly.

Ver. 5.] I must speak the truth of them (though it displease them), and not soothe them up in their errors: for he that flatters his friends, when he should reprove them, may look long enough before either he or his children find one that will deal sincerely with them.

Ver. 6.] This very person who spake last, hath made me a proverb in every body's mouth: and it is the vulgar pastime to talk of my calamities.

Ver. 7.] No wonder then that excessive sorrow hath darkened mine eyes; and that all the flesh of my body is so consumed, that I am but the shadow of a man.

Ver. 8.] Upright men hereafter will be astonished at the cruel sentence which my friends pass upon me; and the innocent will resolutely oppose the wicked, when he judges the worse of piety, because of my afflictions.

Ver. 9. The righteous will not be moved by such arguments to change his purpose of well-doing; much less will he do any evil action, but grow rather the better by adversity, and add perseverance to his piety.

Ver. 10.] And truly I wish that all you, who have charged me so heavily, would consider things better, and hearken to what I have said: for I must tell you again, there is not a man of you that judges truly of my case.

Ver. 11.] Repent of your harsh censures before I die, as I must speedily, my joys being quite gone, and all the hopeful designs, which had possessed my heart, being utterly subverted.

Ver. 12.] Instead whereof other thoughts are come to torment me; which will not let me sleep in the night, nor enjoy any pleasure in the day.

Ver. 13.] If I hope for anything now (as you would have me), it is for a grave: that is the only house I can promise myself; there I am going to rest in a bed where I shall not be disturbed.

Ver. 14.] I have already made so near an alliance with death, that my father and mother and nearest kindred are nothing so near me as worms and rottenness.

Ver. 15.] How vain then are all the hopes you would have me feed myself withal? (xi. 15, 16, &c.) Who shall see, when I am sure I shall not, the happiness you would have me look for here?

Ver. 16.] All these hopes you speak of shall sink down into the bottom of the grave; when you, my friends, as well as I, shall take up your lodging in the dust.

CHAPTER XVIII.

ARGUMENT.—In this chapter Bildad again takes up the dispute, and pretends to reply to what Job had said. But I do not see anything new, saving the description he makes (as Eliphaz had done before him) of the ruin which shall inevitably fall, according to the fixed rules of providence (so he fancied), upon the wicked and his family, notwithstanding all the assistance that his friends and allies can lend him for his preservation. And this he seems to imply was the fate of Job; whom he doth not so much as exhort to repentance (as he had done in his former discourse, ch. viii.), being very angry with him that he had no higher esteem of their wisdom.

1 THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,

2 How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? mark, and afterwards we will speak.

3 Wherefore are we counted as beasts, and reputed vile in your sight?

4 He teareth himself in his anger: shall the earth be forsaken for thee? and shall the rock be removed out of his place?

5 Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine.

6 The light shall be dark in his tabernacle, and his candle shall be put out with him.

7 The steps of his strength shall be straitened, and his own counsel shall cast him down.

8 For he is cast into a net by his own feet, and he walketh upon a snare.

9 The gin shall take him by the heel, and the robber shall prevail against him.

10 The snare is laid for him in the ground, and a trap for him in the way.

11 Terrors shall make him afraid on every side, and shall drive him to his feet.

12 His strength shall be hungerbitten, and destruction shall be ready at his side.

13 It shall devour the strength of his skin: even the firstborn of death shall devour his strength.

14 His confidence shall be rooted out of his tabernacle, and it shall bring him to the king of terrors.

15 It shall dwell in his tabernacle, because it is none of his: brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation.

16 His roots shall be dried up beneath, and above shall his branch be cut off.

17 His remembrance shall perish from the earth, and he shall have no name in the street.

18 He shall be driven from light into darkness, and chased out of the world.

19 He shall neither have son nor nephew among his people, nor any remaining in his dwellings.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1.] Then Bildad the Shuhite, seeing Job continue in his first opinion, rose up, and said,

Ver. 2.] How long shall we continue this dispute? Let us make an end of it, unless he will attend better to our reasons; then we will go on to argue with him.

Ver. 3.] To what purpose is it to talk with one who tells us we understand nothing (xvii. 4. 10), but looks upon us as a company of dull beasts, into whom nothing of wisdom will enter.

Ver. 4.] Such is his passion, which will not let him see how he himself, like a wild beast, tears his own soul in pieces with impatient anger. What art thou, that God for thy sake should cease to govern the world by his known laws, which are fixed and immutable?

Ver. 5.] Say what thou wilt, it is an everlasting truth, that the wicked shall not continue in the splendour wherein we sometimes see him: but though he seem to sit as by a great fire (warm in his wealth, and honour, and power), there shall not remain so much as a spark to comfort him.

Ver. 6.] The glory of his family shall be turned into contempt, and all their joy shall end in sorrow.

Ver. 7.] The attempts which his power makes to preserve his greatness shall but more perplex him: and his own devices shall prove his overthrow.

Ver. 8.] He shall entangle himself by his own wiles: and having contrived himself into danger, every step he takes in pursuance of his designs shall farther ensnare him.

Ver. 9.] Before he is aware he shall find it so impossible to disengage himself; that they who thirst after his blood, or wealth, or place, shall easily lay hold on him.

Ver. 10.] He shall not foresee his danger; but be caught as a bird or a beast in a snare or a trap, when he thinks himself secure in his proceedings.

Ver. 11.] Then he shall be surrounded with a thousand terrors; and which way soever he runs to save himself, he shall meet with them.

Ver. 12.] He shall pine away till he hath no strength remaining: for nothing but mischief shall attend and accompany him in every place.

Ver. 13.] Rottenness shall eat up his bones; I say, his very bones shall rot and be consumed.

Ver. 14.] Whatsoever he relies upon for the support of himself and family, it shall utterly fail him, nay, help to hasten his death, the most dreadful of all his enemies.

Ver. 15.] That man had best take heed, who shall have a mind to dwell in his house when he hath left it; for thunder and lightning shall destroy it.

Ver. 16.] And it shall never be built up again, nor shall his family be restored; but be like a tree, whose roots are so dried up in the earth that it shall never shoot forth any more branches.

Ver. 17.] His very memory shall perish, as well as himself; and his name never be mentioned among men, unless it be to make him infamous.

Ver. 18.] He shall be cast out of his splendid greatness into some obscure grave; and removed out of the world as some unclean thing.

Ver. 19.] None of his descendants shall survive him; nor any of his kindred remain to keep up his name.

20 They that come after him shall be astonished at his day, as they that went before were afflicted.

Ver. 20.] Future times shall read of this severe vengeance of God upon him with astonishment, as they who see it shall be seized with horror.

21 Surely such are the dwellings of the wicked, and this is the place of him that knoweth not God.

Ver. 21.] Certain it is, that this is a just description of the miserable condition of the wicked : they that do not honour God shall thus be abased.

CHAPTER XIX.

ARGUMENT.—The purpose of this chapter (in which Job replies to Bildad) is to show, that it would be sufficient for him also merely to repeat the same things as they had done in ten discourses ; but the more to aggravate their want of compassion, or rather cruelty, towards him, he represents several new things, which made his condition more deplorable than he had hitherto said. One of which was, that he could not tell the reason why God dealt thus with him ; who notwithstanding was so gracious, that, in the depth of this misery and anguish, he affords him a glimmering of a comfortable hope (which began now to appear in his soul, and which he had hitherto wanted), that God would at last take pity upon him, and show his friends their error, by restoring him to his former health and splendour. That seems to be the literal meaning of the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth verses, and of the next two that follow ; where, among other things, he says, he doubted not but his Redeemer should stand at last upon the earth (so it is in the Hebrew, the word day not being there), that is, quite overcome the devil, and deliver him from these distresses ; like a mighty conqueror, who keeps the field, when all his opposers are routed and fled away. But in this he was, as St. Austin calls him, "eximius prophetarum," and prophesied of the resurrection of the body at the last day.

1 THEN Job answered and said,

2 How long will ye vex my soul, and break me in pieces with words ?

3 These ten times have ye reproached me : ye are not ashamed that ye make yourselves strange to me.

4 And be it indeed that I have erred, mine error remaineth with myself.

5 If indeed ye will magnify yourselves against me, and plead against me my reproach :

6 Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with his net.

7 Behold, I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard : I cry aloud, but there is no judgment.

8 He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass, and he hath set darkness in my paths.

9 He hath stripped me of my glory, and taken the crown from my head.

10 He hath destroyed me on every side, and I am gone : and my hope hath he removed like a tree.

11 He hath also kindled his wrath against me, and he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies.

12 His troops come together, and raise up their way against me, and encamp round about my tabernacle.

13 He hath put my brethren far from me, and mine acquaintance are verily estranged from me.

14 My kinsfolk have failed, and my familiar friends have forgotten me.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1.] Then Job hearing him also repeat his former discourse (ch. viii.), wherein he reflected on him as a wicked man, burst out again into these words :

Ver. 2.] Will you never cease to torment me, and to break my very heart with your words, which grate upon me as sorely as all the miseries I endure ?

Ver. 3.] You have reproached me often enough, one would think, and yet you are not ashamed to continue your hard-hearted censures, as if I were a perfect stranger, and my manner of life utterly unknown to you.

Ver. 4.] Suppose that I have done amiss (which is more than you know), I suffer sufficiently for it ; and it doth not become you to increase my sufferings by your reproaches.

Ver. 5.] But if you will still proceed to lift up your voice to declaim against me, and allege my calamities, which have made me contemptible, as an argument to condemn me ;

Ver. 6.] Let this answer suffice you, that I am sensible it is God's doing ; who, having laid me thus low, and environed me with unavoidable miseries, calls upon you to compassionate, rather than reproach me.

Ver. 7.] And my case is the more pitiable, because I know not the cause of all this ; nor can have any audience or redress, though I appeal to God with the loudest cries, and protest to him that I am innocent.

Ver. 8.] There is no way open for my escape ; but his plagues surround me so on every side, that I am at my wit's end, and know not which way to turn myself.

Ver. 9.] He hath not merely stripped me of my ornaments, and taken that dignity and authority from me wherewith I was invested ;

Ver. 10.] But brought me to such utter ruin, that, like a tree plucked up by the very roots, I have not so much as hope remaining, which is the only comfort of the miserable.

Ver. 11.] For he hath done all this with such violence, as if he were extremely incensed against me, and looked upon me as his enemy.

Ver. 12.] Whole armies of evils, by his order, have at the same time invaded me, and laid such a strait siege to me, that not the smallest comfort I had could escape their fury.

Ver. 13.] I looked for some relief from my brethren, but they were so astonished at the number and dreadfulness of my calamities, that they durst not approach me ; and as for my neighbours, who formerly so much courted my acquaintance, they truly keep aloof off, as if they had never known me.

Ver. 14.] They whom nature inclined to it have failed to perform the duties of humanity towards me ;

15 They that dwell in my house, and my maids, count me for a stranger : I am an alien in their sight.

16 I called my servant, and he gave me no answer ; I intreated him with my mouth.

17 My breath is strange to my wife, though I intreated for the children's sake of mine own body.

18 Yea, young children despised me ; I arose, and they spake against me.

19 All my inward friends abhorred me : and they whom I loved are turned against me.

20 My bone cleaveth to my skin and to my flesh, and I am escaped with the skin of my teeth.

21 Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends ; for the hand of God hath touched me.

22 Why do ye persecute me as God, and are not satisfied with my flesh ?

23 Oh that my words were now written ! oh that they were printed in a book !

24 That they were graven with an iron pen, and lead in the rock for ever !

25 For I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth :

26 And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God :

27 Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another ; though my reins be consumed within me.

28 But ye should say, Why persecute we him, seeing the root of the matter is found in me ?

29 Be ye afraid of the sword : for wrath bringeth the punishments of the sword, that ye may know there is a judgment.

and they to whom I was tied by a stronger bond than nature, have forgotten the friendship there was between us.

Ver. 15.] They that have been kindly entertained at my house, nay, the people of my family, have forgot the respect they were wont to give me, and look upon me as if they had no relation to me.

Ver. 16.] I called to my slave, and he regarded not what I said : no, not when I besought him, as if he had been my master.

Ver. 17.] Which is the less wonder, since I am become so loathsome, that my wife will not come near me, though I have conjured her to do it by the dear memory of our children, those common pledges of our mutual love.

Ver. 18.] After these examples young children and fools despise me ; and when I rise up to invite them to me, abusive language is all the return they make to my courtesy.

Ver. 19.] And, which is worst of all, the men whom I entrusted with my greatest secrets, cannot endure me ; and they who have received so many tokens of my love are become mine enemies.

Ver. 20.] All these afflictions have so wasted me, that I am little more than skin and bone : a mouth to complain withal is all the flesh that is left me.

Ver. 21.] O ye my friends (if you still deserve that name), who are the only persons that undertake to comfort me, have pity, have pity, I beseech you, upon a miserable wretch, and consider what wounds the hand of God hath given me.

Ver. 22.] Will you assume the same prerogative, and think you have the same right to afflict me ? and doth it not suffice you to see my body all consumed, but you will vex my very soul also with your perverse reasonings ?

Ver. 23.] Oh that the protestations and appeals I have so often made might remain upon record, and be registered in the public acts and monuments !

Ver. 24.] May they be graven upon a plate of lead with an iron pen ; nay, cut into a rock or marble pillar, to continue to all posterity !

Ver. 25.] For my hope, which was as dead as myself (xvii. 13. 15. xix. 10), begins to revive ; because, though I seem for the present to be forsaken of God, yet I know that he can hereafter deliver me out of this miserable condition, since he lives for ever ; and will, I doubt not, at last appear victorious over all the enemies which now oppress me.

Ver. 26.] And though the worms which have eaten my skin should proceed to consume the rest of this wretched body, yet I feel my soul inspired with a comfortable belief, that before I die I shall see myself restored by the mercy of God, to a happy state.

Ver. 27.] He will not let me always lie under these reproaches ; but I begin to assure myself, that with these very eyes I shall see him vindicate my innocence ; not only others, but I myself shall live to see it : and I even faint away with vehement desire to behold that happy day.

Ver. 28.] Which will make you repent that you have thus persecuted me, who have not without ground thus long disputed this matter with you, but am sure the right lies on my side, and not on yours.

Ver. 29.] Take my advice therefore in good time, and dread the just displeasure of God against you for your perverse reasonings (for his wrath punishes men's iniquities with the sword, or some such sore vengeance), whereby you will know to your cost, that there is a more righteous judgment than yours.

CHAPTER XX.

ARGUMENT.—The abrupt beginning of this speech of Zophar shows that he was in a passion ; which, though he pretends to bridle it, would not let him calmly consider the protestation which Job had made of his innocence. But he goes on in the old common place of the certain downfall of the wicked, be he never so powerful and well supported. Which he illustrates, indeed, after an excellent fashion, with great variety of figures and remarks upon histories as old as the world. In some of which he had observed, that the wicked after their fall had made notable attempts to get up again ; but by the hand of God were so crushed that they could never rise more. All the flaw in his discourse is this (which was common to him with the rest), that he imagined God never varied from this method ; and therefore Job, without doubt, was a very bad man, though it did not appear he was so any other way, but by his infelicity.

1 THEN answered Zophar the Naamathite, and said,

2 Therefore do my thoughts cause me to answer, and for this I make haste.

3 I have heard the check of my reproach, and the spirit of my understanding causeth me to answer.

4 Knowest thou not this of old, since man was placed upon earth.

5 That the triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment?

6 Though his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the clouds;

7 Yet he shall perish for ever like his own dung: they which have seen him shall say, Where is he?

8 He shall fly away as a dream, and shall not be found: yea, he shall be chased away as a vision of the night.

9 The eye also which saw him shall see him no more; neither shall his place any more behold him.

10 His children shall seek to please the poor, and his hands shall restore their goods.

11 His bones are full of the sin of his youth, which shall lie down with him in the dust.

12 Though wickedness be sweet in his mouth, though he hide it under his tongue;

13 Though he spare it, and forsake it not; but keep it still within his mouth:

14 Yet his meat in his bowels is turned, it is the gall of asps within him.

15 He hath swallowed down riches, and he shall vomit them up again: God shall cast them out of his belly.

16 He shall suck the poison of asps: the viper's tongue shall slay him.

17 He shall not see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter.

18 That which he laboured for shall he restore, and shall not swallow it down: according to his substance shall the restitution be, and he shall not rejoice therein.

19 Because he hath oppressed and hath forsaken the poor; because he hath violently taken away a house which he builded not;

20 Surely he shall not feel quietness in his belly, he shall not save of that which he desired.

21 There shall none of his meat be left; therefore shall no man look for his goods.

22 In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1.] Here Zophar, though he had no new thing to produce, hastily interrupted Job, and said,

Ver. 2.] These words of thine make my former thoughts return again; and do so provoke me, that I am not able to forbear speaking any longer.

Ver. 3.] While thou pretendest to correct my errors, I have heard myself rather shamefully reproached; yet I will not suffer my passion to reply, but the clear light of my understanding shall answer for me.

Ver. 4.] It seems thou dost not yet understand, though it be a truth as old as the world,

Ver. 5.] That the happiness which the wicked, and he that counterfeits piety, so much boasts of, is of no long standing, and will continue but for a few moments.

Ver. 6.] Though he should be advanced to the highest pitch of human greatness, and overtop all mankind as much as the highest trees do the lowest shrubs:

Ver. 7.] Yet he shall fall as low as his dunghill; and, like it, be cast out for ever with contempt: they who saw him so flourishing shall be astonished at his ruin, and ask, with amazement, what is become of him?

Ver. 8.] For his happiness hath no firmer foundation than a dream, of which we have no remembrance in the morning; or, if we have, all the rich furniture and feasts which appear to us in our sleep vanish in an instant as soon as we awake.

Ver. 9.] Just so shall he pass away, and all his glory with him: those eyes that were wont to gaze upon it with envy shall lose the sight of it, and never behold it more.

Ver. 10.] His children shall have enough to do to pacify the rage of the poor, whom he hath oppressed; and he shall be forced with shame to restore with his own hands the goods he hath extorted from them.

Ver. 11.] His very bones are full of pain and anguish. All which punishments of his secret sins shall stick to him till they bring him to his grave.

Ver. 12.] Though wickedness, like some dangerous meats, be pleasant in the acting, as they are in the chewing; so that a man is as desirous to continue it, as a glutton is to keep a long relish of those sweet morsels upon his palate:

Ver. 13.] Though he will by no means part with it, when he is told the danger; but still retains it, as the other doth that meat in his mouth, which he is told is no better than poison:

Ver. 14.] Yet, after it is committed, it wrings and gripes the conscience, as those dainty bits, when they are swallowed, do the bowels: the pleasure is turned into pain, the sweetness into such bitterness as brings the most sudden destruction.

Ver. 15.] His ill-gotten goods, for instance, which he devoured with so much greediness and insatiable desire, shall never thrive with him; but he shall be forced to refund them with a torment far exceeding the pleasure wherewith he got them: God himself shall violently force them from him, and all his other riches together with them.

Ver. 16.] Which shall prove as great and as deadly a torture to him, as if, when he squeezed the poor, he had sucked the poison of asps, or been bitten with a viper.

Ver. 17.] This shall be his portion, instead of the pleasures of nature and art; which he flattered himself would flow in several streams to him perpetually.

Ver. 18.] He may endeavour again with new labour to repair his broken fortune; but it shall be in vain: though he should get as much riches as he had before his change, he shall have no joy in them.

Ver. 19.] When he hath with new oppressions ground the poor, and left them destitute, when he hath violently seized on a house, he shall not be able to build it.

Ver. 20.] When he hath turned, as we say, every stone, and been as restless as a woman in travail; all his pains shall bring forth nothing of that which he desired.

Ver. 21.] He shall have no more left him to eat, than he was wont to leave for others, which shall put him out of all hope of mending his condition.

in straits: every hand of the wicked shall come upon him.

23 When he is about to fill his belly, God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him, and shall rain it upon him while he is eating.

24 He shall flee from the iron weapon, and the bow of steel shall strike him through.

25 It is drawn, and cometh out of the body; yea, the glittering sword cometh out of his gall: terrors are upon him.

Ver. 22.] The greater fulness you can suppose him to regain of worldly goods, the more he shall be distressed; for the hand of every man whom he hath afflicted shall lay hold on him to demand satisfaction.

Ver. 23.] God himself also shall disturb him in his enjoyments, with the sorest effects of his divine vengeance, which shall come pouring down from heaven, when he thinks himself most secure.

Ver. 24.] He shall run from a lesser danger to fall into a greater; as if one, avoiding the weapon in a man's hand, should be shot through with a bow of steel.

Ver. 25.] And though he should draw the shaft out of his body, and the wound in his bowels should be healed, he shall not escape so, for terrors shall perpetually accompany him.

26 All darkness shall be hid in his secret places: a fire not blown shall consume him; it shall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle.

27 The heaven shall reveal his iniquity; and the earth shall rise up against him.

28 The increase of his house shall depart, and his goods shall flow away in the day of his wrath.

29 This is the portion of a wicked man from God, and the heritage appointed unto him by God.

Ver. 26.] Nothing but dreadful dangers shall wait for him in those places where he hoped for safety: a fire not kindled by man shall devour him, and the same pestilence or burning fever shall take hold of the rest of his family.

Ver. 27.] The heaven by thunder, lightning, or tempests, shall declare itself his enemy; and the earth, by wild beasts or serpents, or some other way, shall make war against him.

Ver. 28.] His whole revenue shall melt away as waters poured out, in the day when God intends to punish him.

Ver. 29.] This is the portion which God the righteous judge will allot to the wicked: thus will the Almighty reward his blasphemies, or his other proud and insolent works.

CHAPTER XXI.

ARGUMENT.—To bring the dispute to a speedier issue, Job (after a short preface, reproving their incivility) comes close to the business: and doth not content himself merely with denying what they had said, but shows them where the fallacy in their discourse lay: viz. in concluding an universal from some particulars. For he maintains from as good history and observations as they could produce, that though God do make some wicked men such examples of his vengeance, as they had said, yet he lets others, and they of the vilest sort, atheists and deriders of divine providence, live prosperously, and die peaceably, and have stately monuments built to perpetuate their memory. In brief, he shows there is great variety in God's proceedings about the punishment of the wicked; which makes them so bold as they are in their impiety. And seems to have respect to the history of Ishmael, who was a wild or barbarous man, grasping at all that he could lay his hands on, and persecuting Isaac: and yet had twelve princes descended from him, settled in their several fortresses, as we read Gen. xvi. 12, xvii. 20, xxv. 16. And it is possible, to the history of Eliphaz's own country; Esau's ancestors being very rich (Gen xxxvi. 6, 7) and having many dukes, whose posterity afterward advanced themselves to the title of kings, that sprang from him, before there was any king over the children of Israel (Gen. xxxvi. 15, 31).

1 But Job answered and said,

2 Hear diligently my speech, and let this be your consolations.

3 Suffer me that I may speak: and after that I have spoken, mock on.

4 As for me, is my complaint to man? and if it were so, why should not my spirit be troubled?

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1.] But Job, who knew the falseness of this assertion (in which Zophar secretly struck at him), that God always punishes sinners in this manner, would not let it pass without answer, and therefore said again unto them;

Ver. 2.] Let me prevail with you to attend better than you have done hitherto to my discourse: do me this kindness, and it shall serve instead of all the consolations I promised myself from you.

Ver. 3.] Hear me patiently, and do not so hastily interrupt me as Zophar just now did (xx. 2); who, after I have done, may begin, if he please, to deride me again.

Ver. 4.] Have I not all this while made my appeal to God? why then do you interrupt me, and take upon you to pronounce that sentence which I expect from him alone? but if my complaint had been to 5 Mark me, and be astonished, and lay your hand upon your mouth.

6 Even when I remember I am afraid, and trembling taketh hold on my flesh.

7 Wherefore do the wicked live, become old, yea, are mighty in power?

8 Their seed is established in their sight you, yet, seeing there is a just cause for it, can I choose but be vexed to see you will not hear me patiently?

Ver. 5.] Consider well my misery, and being astonished at the greatness of it, and of your rudeness, be so civil now as to impose silence on yourselves, while I am speaking to you.

Ver. 6.] I am sure I myself am astonished at the very remembrance of it: were I free from it, yet the thought of what is past makes every joint of my body tremble.

Ver. 7.] Let me therefore again desire you to answer me this question more leisurely; if what you have said be true, how come we to see so many wicked men, not only enjoy all the good things of this life, but grow old in their enjoyment, and want no honour nor power to which riches can advance them?

with them, and their offspring before their eyes.

9 Their houses are safe from fear, neither is the rod of God upon them.

10 Their bull gendereth, and faileth not; their cow calveth, and casteth not her calf.

11 They send forth their little ones like a flock, and their children dance.

12 They take the trimbrel and harp, and rejoice at the sound of the organ.

13 They spend their days in wealth, and in a moment go down to the grave.

14 Therefore they say unto God, Depart from us; for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways.

15 What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? and what profit should we have, if we pray unto him?

16 Lo, their good is not in their hand: the counsel of the wicked is far from me.

17 How oft is the candle of the wicked put out? and how oft cometh their destruction upon them? God distributeth sorrows in his anger.

18 They are as stubble before the wind, and as chaff that the storm carrieth away.

Ver. 8.] Nay, live to see their children settled in the world; yea, their children's children grow up like young plants before their eyes.

Ver. 9.] There is nobody disturbs their tranquillity in any of their habitations; nor doth God inflict any punishment on them for their sins.

Ver. 10.] But extends his care even to the herds of cattle; where the kine never fail to conceive, and in due time bring forth their calves, and do not miscarry.

Ver. 11.] And so do their flocks of sheep, with whom their wives may be compared: who bring forth their little ones as easily and as numerously: and their children dance about their houses, like the little lambs which skip about their fields.

Ver. 12.] They lift up their voice and sing to the timbrel and harp: they dance for joy at the sound of the pipe.

Ver. 13.] In a word, they prolong their days to a great old age, in all manner of pleasure; and then do not lie long languishing on a bed of sickness or pain, but go easily and suddenly to their grave.

Ver. 14.] And yet these are the men that never think of God; or if they do, presently bid those thoughts be gone; for they desire to have nothing to do with him or with his laws.

Ver. 15.] They know no such being, they say, as the Almighty; nor do they owe him any service: and if they should worship and serve him, they do not believe they shall be a whit the better for it.

Ver. 16.] Do not imagine that I am of their opinion; I know very well that they cannot make themselves rich and prosperous without God; and therefore, far be it from me to join with them in their impiety.

Ver. 17.] But yet, I say, how oft is it that we see the joy of these wicked men extinguished? Sometimes, indeed, God takes a speedy vengeance on them; but it is not his usual course to destroy them, and to give them such plagues and torments (as you speak of) for their portion.

Ver. 18.] We do not see them so frequently as you say, driven away like stubble before the wind, and all 19 God layeth up his iniquity for his children: he rewardeth him, and he shall know it.

20 His eyes shall see his destruction, and he shall drink of the wrath of the Almighty.

21 For what pleasure hath he in his house after him, when the number of his months is cut off in the midst.

22 Shall any teach God knowledge? seeing he judgeth those that are high.

23 One dieth in his full strength, being wholly at ease and quiet.

24 His breasts are full of milk, and his bones are moistened with marrow.

25 And another dieth in the bitterness of his soul, and never eateth with pleasure.

26 They shall lie down alike in the dust, and the worms shall cover them.

27 Behold, I know your thoughts, and the devices which ye wrongfully imagine against me.

28 For ye say, Where is the house of the prince? and where are the dwelling places of the wicked?

29 Have ye not asked them that go by the way? and do ye not know their tokens,

30 That the wicked is reserved to the day of their estates scattered like the chaff which is blown away with a storm.

Ver. 19.] And when doth God punish the iniquity of the wicked in his children (as you pretend he always doth, xx. 10), and that while he lives, and be-holds it himself?

Ver. 20.] It is not such a common thing as you make it, for him to see his own ruin, and to feel the effects of the dreadful wrath of the Almighty.

Ver. 21.] As for what befalls his children when he is dead, he concerns not himself; it is nothing to him though they be cut off in their most flourishing estate.

Ver. 22.] Shall we be so bold as to instruct God how to govern the world? and tell him he is not just, unless he punish the wicked when we expect it? He judges the highest beings, and therefore knows sure how to govern us.

Ver. 23.] Who must not think to tie him to our rules. For one man dies in the highest and firmest worldly prosperity, meeting with nothing all his days to disturb his quiet and tranquillity.

Ver. 24.] Health as well as riches accompany him to his grave; his ribs are fat, and his bones full of marrow, even in his old age.

Ver. 25.] When another man (who perhaps is better than he) dies in great pain and anguish; after a miserable life, in which he never enjoyed any pleasure.

Ver. 26.] They shall both alike have the dust for their bed, and worms for their covering; and no distinction, that we can see, be made between them.

Ver. 27.] I am sensible that in all this I very much contradict your thoughts; which are as well known to me as to yourselves: I see by what arguments you are studying to oppress me.

Ver. 28.] I hear you say within yourselves, What is become of the house of Job, who lived like a prince? what difference is there between him and those wicked men, whose dwelling places are destroyed?

Ver. 29.] But let me answer you; or rather go and ask the first passengers you meet with (for it is a thing vulgarly known), and they are not interested in our disputes, let them tell you their observations about God's providence:

destruction? they shall be brought forth to the day of wrath.

31 Who shall declare his way to his face? and who shall repay him what he hath done?

32 Yet shall he be brought to the grave and shall remain in the tomb.

Ver. 30.] Which all agree in this, that the wicked is spared very often in a common calamity; though it be very general as well as terrible, yet many of them escape it.

Ver. 31.] Which makes the wicked so bold, that none dare reprove him: much less is he in danger of being punished for his offences, since God spares him, and man dreads him.

Ver. 32.] The pomp of his funeral is answerable to the splendour wherein he lived; and a stately monument is raised to preserve his memory, and represent him as if he were still living.

33 The clods of the valley shall be sweet unto him, and every man shall draw after him, as there are innumerable before him.

34 How then comfort ye me in vain, seeing in your answers there remaineth falsehood?

Ver. 33.] There he lies quietly in the earth, and none disturbs his ashes: he suffers nothing but what all men shall do after him, as innumerable have done before him.

Ver. 34.] See then how ill you discharge the office of comforters, whose answers have so little truth in them. For you maintain that prosperity is the inseparable companion of piety; when every body can tell you, that none flourish more than the wicked, and that calamities are common to all mankind.

CHAPTER XXII.

ARGUMENT.—Though Job had clearly stated the controversy in the foregoing chapter, yet Eliphaz would not yield; but begins the combat a third time without any ground at all, but a pure mistake, as I have expressed it in the first verse. And to avoid the reproof which had been given him, of repeating merely the same things: he now brings in a catalogue, though without any proof (so much was his anger and bitterness increased), of the particular sins, both against God and against his neighbour, of which he supposes Job to have been guilty. Else, he still boldly concludes, God would not have punished him with such severity; that there was not a greater instance of his indignation to be found anywhere; unless it was in the old world, and in Sodom. Yet he hath so much moderation, that he invites him at last to repentance, and promises him the happy fruit of it; as he had done in his first speech, but not in his second. Nay, he tells him, in conclusion, for his encouragement, that he should be able to do as much for a nation, as ten righteous men, could they have been found there, might have done for Sodom.

1 THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said,

2 Can a man be profitable unto God, as he that is wise may be profitable unto himself?

3 Is it any pleasure to the Almighty, that thou art righteous? or is it gain to him, that thou makest thy ways perfect?

4 Will he reprove thee for fear of him? will he enter with thee into judgment?

5 Is not thy wickedness great? and thine iniquities infinite?

6 For thou hast taken a pledge from thy brother for nought, and stripped the naked of their clothing.

7 Thou hast not given water to the weary to drink, and thou hast withholden bread from the hungry.

8 But as for the mighty man, he had the earth; and the honourable man dwelt in it.

9 Thou hast sent widows away empty, and the arms of the fatherless have been broken.

10 Therefore snares are round about thee, and sudden fear troubleth thee;

11 Or darkness, that thou canst not see; and abundance of waters cover thee.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1.] Then Eliphaz, not being able to deny all this and yet not minding the scope of it (but imagining Job had accused the divine providence of injustice, in suffering the wicked to prosper and the righteous to be afflicted), grew very angry, and said,

Ver. 2.] Is God ever the better for anything that we do? because a wise man receives great benefit by his virtue, shall we think that God is a gainer by it too, and that he is bound to reward it?

Ver. 3.] Doth he, who needs nothing (being possessor of all things), desire thou shouldest be righteous for his own advantage? or will it turn to his profit, if thou livest never so unblameably?

Ver. 4.] Or, on the contrary, is he afraid thou shouldest hurt him by thy sins, and will therefore punish them? Is this the reason that he now afflicts thee, to prevent the damage they might do him?

Ver. 5.] Are not rather thy sins against God and against men so great and so numberless, that no other cause is to be sought of thy sore and multiplied punishments?

VOL. II.—97.

Ver. 6.] For (to begin with those against man) thou hast been a tyrant, and exacted pawns of thine own kindred for little or nothing: and hath stripped even those of their garments, who had no more but just to cover their nakedness.

Ver. 7.] Thou hast been hard-hearted to the weary traveller, when thou sawest him ready to die with thirst or with hunger.

Ver. 8.] But as for the great and the powerful, all thy estate was at his service: if he brought the title to any land in question, he was sure to carry the cause by thy favour to him.

Ver. 9.] When at the same time, the poor widow and orphans (whose protection God hath in a special manner commended to us) could not obtain the favour of having justice done them; but were crushed and broken by thee, and had all the means of defending themselves taken from them.

Ver. 10.] Thou art guilty, sure enough, of some such sins as these, which are the cause that now thou art beset with these calamities, and most dreadful plagues have on a sudden confounded thee.

Ver. 11.] Oh! thy blindness; dost thou not yet

12 Is not God in the height of heaven? and behold the height of the stars, how high they are!

13 And thou sayest, How doth God know? can he judge through the dark cloud?

14 Thick clouds are a covering to him, that he seeth not; and he walketh in the circuit of heaven.

15 Hast thou marked the old way which wicked men have trodden?

16 Which were cut down out of time, whose foundation was overflown with a flood:

17 Which said unto God, Depart from us: and what can the Almighty do for them?

18 Yet he filled their houses with good things: but the counsel of the wicked is far from me.

19 The righteous see it, and are glad: and the innocent laugh them to scorn.

20 Whereas our substance is not cut down, but the remnant of them the fire consumeth.

21 Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace: thereby good shall come unto thee.

see how God hath proportioned thy punishment to thy crimes? hath the depth of the afflictions wherein thou art plunged quite taken away all sense from thee?

Ver. 12.] Is not God above the heavens! behold, he is the head and governor of the stars, although they be so high; and therefore how shouldst thou think to escape his justice?

Ver. 13.] But, perhaps, thou fanciest (such is thy impiety against him, as well as cruelty to thy neighbour) that, because he is so high, he minds not what is done here below: or that he cannot discern the difference of things so very remote through such a mist as is between us.

Ver. 14.] He is wrapped, thou imaginest, in such thick clouds, that they obscure us from his sight: or he is confined to the heavens, and so busied in their affairs, that he hath no leisure to attend to ours.

Ver. 15.] But didst thou never observe, or hast thou forgotten, the course of the old atheistical world, who ran licentiously into all manner of wickedness?

Ver. 16.] To whom God therefore put a stop, by destroying them before their time, and carrying them quite away with the flood, when they thought themselves firmly settled in the earth;

Ver. 17.] And were saying (as thou wouldest have us believe the wicked now do, and yet prosper xxi. 14), We have nothing to do with God, nor he with us. Dost thou remember what God then did to them for their horrid ingratitude to him?

Ver. 18.] Who had filled their houses with all manner of good things: O, vile wretches! whose wicked thoughts I abhor as much as thou thyself (xxi. 16).

Ver. 19.] Whose overthrow Noah and his family beholding, rejoiced in God's righteous judgment: that innocent men derided their incredulity.

Ver. 20.] Whereas we, who believe God's care and providence, are untouched in our estates; when the relics of those impious men are devoured by fire from heaven.

22 Receive, I pray thee, the law from his mouth, and lay up his words in thy heart.

23 If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up, thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles.

24 Then thou shalt lay up gold as dust, and the gold of Ophir as the stones of the brooks.

25 Yea, the Almighty shall be thy defence, and thou shalt have plenty of silver.

26 For then shalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty, and shalt lift up thy face unto God.

27 Thou shalt make thy prayer unto him, and he shall hear thee, and thou shalt pay thy vows.

28 Thou shalt also decree a thing, and it shall be established unto thee: and the light shall shine upon thy ways.

29 When men are cast down, then thou shalt say, There is lifting up; and he shall save the humble person.

30 He shall deliver the island of the innocent; and it is delivered by the pureness of thy hands.

Ver. 21.] Let me advise thee therefore (whom God hath not yet quite consumed) to join thyself to the society of the righteous, and to become like Noah: then be secure, and doubt not but by that means all happiness shall return to thee.

Ver. 22.] Do not refuse the instruction which such men give thee from God, but heartily embrace it, and faithfully preserve it to be the rule of thy life.

Ver. 23.] Thou shalt soon feel the comfortable fruits of it; for if thou return to the Almighty, who hath laid thee thus low, he will return to thee, and raise thee up as high as ever: he will pardon thine iniquity, and remove the punishment of it far from thee and thine.

Ver. 24.] Thou shalt recover all thy losses with usury; and no more value gold than the dirt on which it shall lie, nor the purest gold more than the pebbles in the brook.

Ver. 25.] Thou shalt be at no pains to secure thy vast heaps of gold and silver; because thy Almighty Restorer, who gave them to thee, will defend them better than the strongest fortresses, and be himself thy treasure.

Ver. 26.] For then thou shalt be so far from doubting of his care over thee, that thou shalt delight to think how he loves thee: thou shalt not be dejected any more, but confidently and cheerfully expect his blessing on thee.

Ver. 27.] Thou shalt ask nothing of him but thou shalt obtain it; and have abundant cause to be continually giving thanks to him for his bounteous goodness in fulfilling thy desires.

Ver. 28.] Thou shalt accomplish whatsoever thou designest, and all thy undertakings shall be prosperous.

Ver. 29.] Thou shalt pray to God also to lift up others who are in a low condition; and he shall grant thy petitions, by delivering him that is depressed.

Ver. 30.] Yea, a whole country shall owe its safety to thine innocence: it shall be delivered by thy pious prayers and blameless actions.

CHAPTER XXIII.

ARGUMENT.—To the foregoing discourse of Eliphaz, Job thought at first to make no answer, but only by complaints of their injustice, and fresh appeals to God: by whom he desires, more earnestly than ever, to be tried, being assured that he would acquit him. And though for the present God was not pleased to give him audience (of which he complains with too much passion), yet he maintains that hope, which began to appear in his soul (in his last discourse with Bildad, ch. xix.) that God would at last clear him from all the aspersions which were cast upon him.

1 THEN Job answered and said,
 2 Even to-day is my complaint bitter: my stroke is heavier than my groaning.
 3 Oh that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat!
 4 I would order my cause before him, and fill my mouth with arguments.
 5 I would know the words which he would answer me, and understand what he would say unto me.
 6 Will he plead against me with his great power? No; but he would put strength in me.
 7 There the righteous might dispute with him; so should I be delivered for ever from my judge.
 8 Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him:
 9 On the left hand, where he doth work, but I cannot behold him: he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him:

10 But he knoweth the way that I take: when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.

11 My foot hath held his steps, his way have I kept, and not declined.

12 Neither have I gone back from the commandment of his lips; I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food.

13 But he is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth.

14 For he performeth the thing that is appointed for me: and many such things are with him.

15 Therefore am I troubled at his presence: when I consider, I am afraid of him.

16 For God maketh my heart soft, and the Almighty troubleth me.

17 Because I was not cut off before the darkness, neither hath he covered the darkness from my face.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1.] Then Job hearing his person thus defamed, and his discourse perverted, renewed his complaints, and said,

Ver. 2.] Still my just defence of myself, is judged to be rebellion against God: which renders my sufferings heavier than all my sighs and groans can express:

Ver. 3.] And makes me once more appeal to God, and wish I could be admitted into his presence (so free from the conscience of any guilt), and approach even to his judgment seat.

Ver. 4.] I would set before him the justice of my cause, and fill my mouth with confutations of your false accusations.

Ver. 5.] I would press to know his judgment of me, and diligently attend to the sentence which he would pass upon me.

Ver. 6.] Do you think he would make no other use of his absolute power than to oppress me? I cannot believe it; he would rather employ it to support me;

Ver. 7.] Till at his bar I had proved myself a righteous person, and been perfectly acquitted by him my righteous judge.

Ver. 8.] But all these, alas! are vain wishes; but which way soever I turn myself, whether to the east or to the west, I cannot see him appear to do me right.

Ver. 9.] He works and moves invisibly in all other quarters of the world; but I can discover nothing he does to clear my innocence.

Ver. 10.] My only comfort is, that though I cannot know all his ways, yet he being everywhere, knows the whole course of my life: and when he hath proved me by these afflictions, as gold is by the fire, I doubt not, I shall be cleared from these imputations which you lay upon me.

Ver. 11.] I am sure I have ever followed his guidance, and so steadfastly observed his commandments, that no temptation hath made me swerve from them.

Ver. 12.] I have prevented the advice you give me (xxii. 22), having never done otherwise than he bade me, and laid up his words more carefully than my necessary provision for this life.

Ver. 13.] But for the present this doth not at all move him to relieve me: he continues his purpose (whatever it may be), and none can alter it, no more than they can hinder the fulfilling of it.

Ver. 14.] For what he hath resolved to inflict upon me, that I find he will accomplish: and many such things as these he doth, of which he will not give us the reason.

Ver. 15.] This terrifies me when I reflect upon it, notwithstanding my innocence. I tremble at the thoughts of his absolute power and unsearchable wisdom, which may think fit still to continue these afflictions:

Ver. 16.] Which by the weight of them have broken my spirit, and made me so timorous, that I cannot but dread the danger I am in of suffering more from his almighty hand.

Ver. 17.] For still he keeps me alive under all these evils which I endure, and will not let me have the favour to die by that hand which strikes me so severely.

CHAPTER XXIV.

ARGUMENT.—Upon farther consideration, Job thought good again to confute their rash assertion, about the plagues which always befall the wicked, by an induction of particulars that prove the contrary. Among which the wild Arabs, he tells them, are a notorious instance; whose profession is rapine, and yet they thrive and prosper in it (ver. 5, &c.). And so do the more civilized oppressors, of whom he says something before, and again ver. 11, 12, where he seems to reflect upon hard landlords, and griping merchants and traffickers in cities; to whom he adds murderers, adulterers, pirates, with several other wicked villains (in the conclusion of the chapter), who notwithstanding die like other men, and are not called to an account for their enormous crimes in this present world.

1 WHY, seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty, do they that know him not see his days?

2 Some remove the landmarks; they violently take away flocks, and feed thereof.

3 They drive away the ass of the fatherless, they take the widow's ox for a pledge.

4 They turn the needy out of the way: the poor of the earth hide themselves together.

5 Behold, as wild asses in the desert, go they forth to their work; rising betimes for a prey: the wilderness yieldeth food for them and for their children.

6 They reap every one his corn in the field: and they gather the vintage of the wicked.

7 They cause the naked to lodge without clothing, that they have no covering in the cold.

8 They are wet with the showers of the mountains, and embrace the rock for want of a shelter.

9 They pluck the fatherless from the breast, and take a pledge of the poor.

10 They cause him to go naked without clothing, and they take away the sheaf from the hungry;

11 Which make oil within their walls, and tread their wine-presses, and suffer thirst.

12 Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out: yet God layeth not folly to them.

13 They are of those that rebel against the light; they know not the ways thereof, nor abide in the paths thereof.

14 The murderer rising with the light killeth the poor and needy, and in the night is as a thief.

15 The eye also of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, saying, No eye shall see me: and disguiseth his face.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1.] But to answer a little what you have so often asserted: if punishments from the Almighty be so apparent and visible upon the wicked, why do not they who are truly pious see the public and open judgments?

Ver. 2.] Especially when the wickedness of some of them is so notorious, that they violate all known rights; seizing on the lands of their neighbours, taking away their cattle, and (not content with that) owning it when they have none, by putting them openly into their pastures?

Ver. 3.] If a poor fatherless child have an ass left him to carry his burdens, they drive it away on some pretence or other; and have no more mercy than to take of the widow, for the security of her debt, the only ox she hath wherewith to plough her ground.

Ver. 4.] They offer abuses to helpless people upon the highway, so that the meaner sort dare not appear for fear of their insolence or their violence.

Ver. 5.] And you shall see others of them, who (making pillage their trade) leave the cities and towns, and go to skulk in forests and desert places; where, becoming wild and savage, they live on rapine and spoil; in which they are so diligent, that those wildernesses (where they neither plough nor sow) maintain their families.

Ver. 6.] For they make inroads out of those woods into the neighbouring fields and vineyards, and thence wickedly carry away the corn and the grapes, never regarding who is the owner of them.

Ver. 7.] They spare not the poor reapers and vintagers; but, stripping them to their very skin, leave them never a rag to defend them from the cold, when they go to rest after their wearisome labours.

Ver. 8.] They are exposed (poor wretches!) to the injury of the weather, as they lie asleep at the foot of mountains: they have not whither to run, but into caves and holes of rocks; where they endeavour to shroud themselves, when they see a tempest coming.

Ver. 9.] Nay, the persons of men are not safe from the violence of these outlaws; but they snatch away young children from their mother's breast, and carry away the poor (pretending they owe them something) to make them their slaves.

Ver. 10.] Whom when they have stolen, they will not allow so much as clothes to cover their nakedness, nor let him that is ready to starve eat of the sheaf which he hath gleaned.

Ver. 11.] They cause these miserable creatures to press out their oil and their wine in their cellars; but let them not taste a drop, though they be ready to die with thirst.

Ver. 12.] Whole cities groan under the oppression of some or other of these wicked men, and cry out like those that are dying of their wounds: and yet God, who knows all this, doth not make them examples of his displeasure, nor can we tell when he will punish them for their injustice and cruelty.

Ver. 13.] The world would be very empty, if he should destroy all such persons; for besides these open there are more secret sinners, who look upon the light as their enemy: they dare not be seen in the day-time; or if they be espied, they presently seek to hide themselves, that they may not be discovered.

Ver. 14.] The murderer, for instance, rises before the sun to kill those whose poverty calls them up to early labour; and then, lurking all day in the close thickets and woods, he turns robber, and rifles rich men's houses in the night.

Ver. 15.] The adulterer also, whose eye hath let unlawful love into his heart, waits for the dusk of the evening to favour his lewd desire: then he hopes nobody he meets withal will know him; but lest they should, he wraps his face in his cloak to prevent discovery.

16 In the dark they dig through houses, which they had marked for themselves in the day-time : they know not the light.

17 For the morning is to them even as the shadow of death : if one know them, they are in the terrors of the shadow of death.

18 He is as swift as the waters ; their portion is cursed in the earth : he beholdeth not the way of the vineyards.

19 Drought and heat consume the snow waters : so doth the grave those which have sinned.

20 The womb shall forget him ; the worm shall feed sweetly on him ; he shall be no more remembered ; and wickedness shall be broken as a tree.

21 He evil entreateth the barren that beareth not : and doeth not good to the widow.

22 He draweth also the mighty with his power : he riseth up, and no man is sure of life.

23 Though it be given him to be in safety, whereon he resteth ; yet his eyes are upon their ways.

24 They are exalted for a little while, but are gone and brought low ; they are taken out of the way as all other, and cut off as the tops of the ears of corn.

25 And if it be not so now, who will make me a liar, and make my speech nothing worth ?

Ver. 16.] And when all are at rest, he will dig through the walls of houses, if there be no other way to come at the adulteress : the assignment was made between them in the day-time, and the place then marked out, at which he may most easily enter ; but it is the night which brings them together to act the works of darkness.

Ver. 17.] These are their delight, and if they chance to sleep too long together, and the morning surprise them, they are ready to die with fear ; if any one know them, they are in the very agonies of death.

Ver. 18.] To this wicked crew you may add the pirate, who robs upon the sea, and runs from one little creek to another in swift ships : which brings him in so much riches, that he despises the employment of those who till the earth and plant vineyards, as poor and unprofitable.

Ver. 19.] And yet all these, after they have spent their life in such horrid villanies, do not die of lingering and tormenting diseases ; but go down to the grave as easily as snow-water sinks into the dry ground when it is melted by the sun.

Ver. 20.] God sets no such mark of his displeasure upon him, but that his mother may soon forget him : the hand of justice doth not hang him on a gibbet for the birds to feed on ; but he is carried to his grave like other men, to be the sweet food of worms. There he lies quietly, and neither he nor his wickedness are any more remembered than a tree which is broken all to shivers.

Ver. 21.] This is true even of him who, to hide his villany, kills the child in the womb of her whom he hath deflowered ; and when he hath abused a poor widow, makes her no satisfaction.

Ver. 22.] The greatest persons are not able to stand before him : when he riseth up to assassinate, there is no man, be he never so strong, is sure of his life.

Ver. 23.] Though he give you his hand, and promise you security so solemnly, that you think you may rely upon him, yet he watches all occasions, and lies in wait secretly to do you mischief.

Ver. 24.] Thus these impious men flourish, and are lifted up above all other ; and then they depart the world without any punishment : they are laid down and shut up in their graves like all other men ; nay, they die as easily (without those tedious pains which some endure) as the top of an ear of corn is cropped with your hand.

Ver. 25.] All this I know to be so true, that I challenge all the world to disprove me : I am sure it is not in any man's power to show that my discourse is frivolous.

CHAPTER XXV.

ARGUMENT.—The foregoing discourse of Job, in the twenty-fourth chapter, was so undeniable, that Bildad begins to break off the dispute. For he says not a word to it, but only advises him to speak more reverently of the majesty of God, than he imagined he had done in his appeal to him (ch. xxiii.).

1 THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,

2 Dominion and fear are with him, he maketh peace in his high places.

3 Is there any number of his armies ? and upon whom doth not his light arise ?

4 How then can man be justified with God ? or how can he be clean that is born of a woman ?

5 Behold even to the moon, and it shineth not ; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight.

6 How much less man, that is a worm ? and the son of man, which is a worm !

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1.] Then Bildad (whose turn it was to speak), being unable to refute what Job had said, only desired him in a few words, to beware how he reflected upon the justice of God, or imagined himself to be just if he examined him. The words were these :

Ver. 2.] Take heed what thou sayest of God, the sovereign of the world, who ought to be worshipped by thee with the most awful reverence ; as he is in the heavenly places, where they never rebel against his orders.

Ver. 3.] Hath he not innumerable troops of angels and other creatures, all ready to execute his pleasure ?

And where is the man that is out of the verge of his all-overspreading providence ?

Ver. 4.] Why then doth such a pitiful wretch as he talk of his righteousness before this glorious majesty ? He forgets sure the condition of his birth, who pretends to purity in his sight.

Ver. 5.] Let a man lift up his eyes as high as the moon ; nay, look as far as the sun, and the stars of heaven, he shall find that they have their spots ; nay, in his presence, have no lustre at all.

Ver. 6.] What can be expected then from miserable man or his posterity ; who, being full of corruption whilst they live, can be nothing but rotteness when they are dead ?

CHAPTER XXVI.

ARGUMENT.—Job, hearing Bildad wander so far from the business, derides his grave affectation of wisdom; and tells him, that though he talked as if he thought himself fit to be a coadjutor to God Almighty, yet, as his discourse was impertinent, so it was but mean and flat, in comparison with what he was able to speak himself, concerning the omnipotent wisdom of God: which he sets forth in a far more lively manner.

1 BUT Job answered and said,
 2 How hast thou helped him that is without power? how savest thou the arm that hath no strength?
 3 How hast thou counselled him that hath no wisdom? and how hast thou plentifully declared the thing as it is?
 4 To whom hast thou uttered words? and whose spirit came from thee?
 5 Dead things are formed from under the waters, and the inhabitants thereof.
 6 Hell is naked before him, and destruction hath no covering.
 7 He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1.] To this Job replied almost as briefly; saying,

Ver. 2.] O wonderful advocate! how excellently hast thou defended him who hath no need of thy help! dost thou think to do the Almighty any service by such discourses?

Ver. 3.] What admirable advice wouldest thou give him in his government of the world, if he would admit thee to be his counsellor, who imaginest, no doubt, thou aboundest with wisdom, and hast lit the very mark!

Ver. 4.] Dost thou think me ignorant of such things as these? or canst thou pretend to any extraordinary inspiration concerning them?

Ver. 5.] I know as well as thou canst inform me the power of God; which appears, not only in the heavens (to which thou biddest me look), but even in the lowest parts of the earth: where vast giant-like creatures are formed under the water, whose inhabitants are innumerable.

Ver. 6.] Nor is his knowledge, I am sensible, less than his power; but penetrates into the greatest depths: the very dead, who are quite removed out of our sight, being perfectly visible unto him.

Ver. 7.] Who by his wonderful power and wisdom stretches out the whole world from one pole to the other, which he alone sustains; as he doth this globe of earth hanging in the air, without anything to support it.

8 He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds; and the cloud is not rent under them.

9 He holdeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth his cloud upon it.

10 He hath compassed the waters with bounds, until the day and night come to an end.

11 The pillars of heaven tremble and are astonished at his reproof.

12 He divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth through the proud.

13 By his spirit he hath garnished the heavens; his hand hath formed the crooked serpent.

14 Lo, these are parts of his ways: but how little a portion is heard of him? but the thunder of his power who can understand?

Ver. 8.] It is he who binds up the fluid waters, as it were in bags, and keeps them a long time hanging in the clouds: through which they do not burst all at once, but distil by drops to moisten the earth in due season.

Ver. 9.] These clouds he spreads before the glorious face of heaven, to restrain the beams of the sun from scorching the earth.

Ver. 10.] He hath enclosed the waters of the sea in shores: and so exactly compassed them about, that as long as the world lasts they shall not be able (he they never so furious) to exceed those bounds, but shall break all their rage against them into froth.

Ver. 11.] And yet the highest mountains, which look as if they were the pillars and supporters of the heavens, quake and tremble, when he thunders and lightens upon them.

Ver. 12.] By his power he raises a tempest, which makes great furrows in the sea, and divideth, as it were, one part of it from another: and (such is his wisdom) he knows how to appease it again, and depress its proud waves into the dearest calm.

Ver. 13.] Finally, by his wise contrivance the heavens were adorned, and made thus beautiful, as we behold them: his power made the milky way (and other celestial signs), whose windings are so admirable.

Ver. 14.] And yet these are but very small parcels of his works: for, alas! it is very little that such as we can comprehend of him; but the utmost force of his power is past all understanding.

CHAPTER XXVII.

ARGUMENT.—As Bildad began to decline the dispute, so Zophar quite gives it over: either looking upon Job as incurably obstinate, or (as we might more charitably conceive, were it not for what we read xxxiii. 1), being convinced he had more reason on his side. Whose silence so raised the spirit of Job, that he now triumphs over his opponents: as the word mashal, which we render parable, may denote. For it signifies among the Hebrews an elegant ingenious kind of speech; excelling, and as it were, domineering over all other, in its pithiness, or neatness, or some other rare quality. Such is the following discourse of Job, which begins (in this chapter) with a vehement protestation that he would never desert his plea; nor yield to their doctrine, that a remarkable vengeance always attends upon wickedness in this world: though he grants, and largely here asserts, that sometimes there doth.

1 MOREOVER Job continued his parable, and said,

2 As God liveth, who hath taken away my judgment; and the Almighty, who hath vexed my soul;

3 All the while my breath is in me, and the spirit of God is in my nostrils;

4 My lips shall not speak wickedness, nor my tongue utter deceit.

5 God forbid that I should justify you: till I die, I will not remove mine integrity from me.

6 My righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go: my heart shall not reproach me so long as I live.

7 Let mine enemy be as the wicked, and he that riseth up against me as the unrighteous.

8 For what is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul?

9 Will God hear his cry when trouble cometh upon him?

10 Will he delight himself in the Almighty? will he always call upon God?

11 I will teach you by the hand of God: that which is with the Almighty will I not conceal.

12 Behold, all ye yourselves have seen it; why then are ye thus altogether vain?

13 This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage of oppressors, which they shall receive of the Almighty.

14 If his children be multiplied, it is for the sword: and his offspring shall not be satisfied with bread.

15 Those that remain of him shall be buried in death: and his widows shall not weep.

16 Though he heap up silver as the dust, and prepare raiment as the clay;

17 He may prepare it, but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver.

18 He buildeth his house as a moth, and as a booth that the keeper maketh.

19 The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered: he openeth his eyes and he is not.

20 Terrors take hold on him as waters, a tempest stealeth him away in the night.

21 The east wind carrieth him away, and he departeth: and as a storm hurleth him out of his place.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1.] After Job had made some pause, and Zophar (whose turn it was now to speak) had nothing at all to reply, he proceeded with greater eloquence than ever to assert his innocence; saying,

Ver. 2.] I protest by the eternal God, who, for the present, will not judge my cause; by the omnipotent Lord of the world, who hath loaded me with so many afflictions, that they have taken away all the pleasure of life from me:

Ver. 3.] I protest, I say, that as long as I have breath in my body, and he shall enable me to speak a word,

Ver. 4.] My tongue shall be the faithful interpreter of my heart, and I will never speak otherwise than I think.

Ver. 5.] Therefore never hope I will yield to your opinion, which I know to be false: no, I abhor the thought of it, and will sooner die than confess the guilt you charge me withal.

Ver. 6.] You shall never extort that from me, but I will resolutely maintain my righteousness, and not be persuaded by any reasons to desert its defence: my conscience doth not hitherto accuse me, and it shall never upbraid me hereafter, for betraying mine innocence.

Ver. 7.] And let me tell you, he that sets himself against me, and would have me thought wicked, shall be found so himself in the end: I say again, he shall prove himself unrighteous sooner than me;

Ver. 8.] Who knows very well it is madness for a man to counterfeit piety when he hath none: for though he may get riches by that pretence while he lives, yet what hope hath he when he dies?

Ver. 9.] Nay, before that, when any calamity comes upon him, will God give any regard to the cries of one who regarded him so little?

Ver. 10.] Or will he himself have the confidence to go to God, and expect any comfort from him? will he not rather despond in such a case, and cease to call upon him?

Ver. 11.] Do not disdain to learn of me, and I will make you understand what God doth with the wicked; and discover to you some of the secrets of his Almighty providence.

Ver. 12.] Behold, there is not one of you but hath by his own experience found what I am about to say to be certainly true; and yet, such is your vanity, you will defend an ungrounded opinion.

Ver. 13.] I grant that a wicked man (but not all wicked men, as you maintain) doth sometimes receive such punishment from God as he deserves: which might make other tyrannical oppressors fear to meet with the same vengeance.

Ver. 14.] We have seen, for instance, his numerous posterity fall by the sword of justice or war, or by the fury of a popular tumult: and they who escaped, were reserved to perish with cruel hunger;

Ver. 15.] Or else with such pestilential diseases, that none would adventure to bury them, nor did their widows survive to lament them.

Ver. 16.] So that if he have treasured up such heaps of riches, that he values silver no more than dust, nor costly apparel and furniture than the mire of the street;

Ver. 17.] He shall have only the trouble of gathering them together, but none of his shall enjoy them: God shall translate all these treasures to another family, who shall do more good with them.

Ver. 18.] He builds a goodly fabric, out of which he is as easily shaken as a moth out of a garment: and it shall not be more durable than the booth, which is made for him that keeps the fruits of a garden.

Ver. 19.] And when he dieth, he shall have no monument made for him: nay, while he lives, it so falls out, that he looks about him, and sees that every body hath deserted him.

Ver. 20.] Innumerable terrors then break in upon him, and surprise him like an inundation of waters; the divine vengeance, like a violent tempest, unexpectedly hurries him away.

Ver. 21.] Some pestilent vapour blasts him irrecoverably; and as certainly kills him, as a whirlwind hurls things out of their place.

22 For God shall cast upon him, and not spare :
ne would fain flee out of his hand.

Ver. 22.] Our God shall send some other mischiefs so fast upon him (without any pity to him, who had none for others), that all the attempts shall be in vain which he makes to escape the vengeance.

23 Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place.

Ver. 23.] At which the beholders shall rejoice, and applaud God's righteous judgment (which I confess he sometimes executes) : they shall hiss at his name when he is dead, in that very place where he hath been so much magnified.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—The connexion of this chapter with the foregoing, I hope I have truly expressed in the first verse. And that being found, it is not difficult to see at what it drives ; viz. to stop the busy inquiry of mankind, who are very wise, he shows, in other things, but have not wit enough to comprehend the reasons why God doth not inflict those punishments upon all wicked men which fall upon some. It is not needful to set down here how this argument is managed (with such admirable elegance of words, and such weightiness of matter, as make it deserve the name of mashal, parable, or proverb), because it will sufficiently appear in the paraphrase.

1 SURELY there is a vein for the silver, and a place for gold where they find it.

2 Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass is molten out of the stone.

3 He setteth an end to darkness, and searcheth out all perfection : the stones of darkness, and the shadow of death.

4 The flood breaketh out from the inhabitant ; even the waters forgotten of the foot : they are dried up, they are gone away from men.

5 As for the earth, out of it cometh bread : and under it is turned up as it were fire.

6 The stones of it are the place of sapphires : and it hath dust of gold.

7 There is a path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen :

8 The lion's whelps have not trodden it, nor the fierce lion passed by it.

9 He putteth forth his hand upon the rock ; he overturneth the mountains by the roots.

10 He cutteth out rivers among the rocks ; and his eye seeth every precious thing.

11 He bindeth the floods from overflowing ; and the thing that is hid bringeth he forth to light.

12 But where shall wisdom be found ? and where is the place of understanding ?

13 Man knoweth not the price thereof ; neither is it found in the land of the living.

14 The depth saith, It is not in me : and the sea saith, It is not with me.

15 It cannot be gotten for gold, neither shall silver be weighed for the price thereof.

16 It cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, with the precious onyx, or the sapphire.

17 The gold and the crystal cannot equal it :

approached, no, not the ravenous lions, whose hunger leads them everywhere to seek satisfaction.

Ver. 9.] He digs through the hardest rocks by his obstinate labour, and undermines mountains, that he may find the treasure hid in their bowels.

Ver. 10.] And if he meet with waters which hinder his work, he cuts a channel through the rock to convey them away, and never rests till he hath discovered everything that may requite his indefatigable pains.

Ver. 11.] Nay, more than this, he stops the course of rivers, and leaves not a drop remaining, that he may bring to light all that is hidden in the bottom of them.

Ver. 12.] But though he be so successful in these searches, he must not think to comprehend the reasons of wise providence. He may study as long as he pleases, and weary himself with busy inquiries, but never be able with all his labour to dive into the bottom of this secret, why God doth not punish all the wicked who so insolently contemn him.

Ver. 13.] Alas ! this wisdom is not to be purchased with all that wretched man hath to give for it : it is not a thing that any part of this world affords.

Ver. 14.] The miners, poor souls, dig they never so deep, are never like to come within the reach of it ; nor is it to be fetched by the mariner from any of those countries to which he sails.

Ver. 15.] All the gold and silver that men have heaped up by such long toil and labour, are too inconsiderable a price to be offered for it.

Ver. 16.] Though it be the purest gold which comes from Ophir, together with all the precious

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1.] You would have me give a reason, perhaps, why God punishes some wicked men and not all : but the wit and industry of mankind, which have discovered mines of silver and gold, must not think to find out this secret, which God hath reserved to himself.

Ver. 2.] They invent means to extract iron and brass out of the earth and out of stone.

Ver. 3.] There is no mine so dismally dark, but there some man or other sets things in order for his work ; he searches to the very bottom of it, and finds out those stones which lie in the most abstruse and hidden parts of the earth.

Ver. 4.] A flood breaks out from some neighbouring place, and disturbs the miners (for the waters seem as if they would stagnate there, and never stir a foot) : but by the hard labour of man they are drained, and leave the place dry again.

Ver. 5.] Out of the surface of the earth he gets herbs and corn for his food and sustenance, and underneath it he finds lime and brimstone, and such-like fiery stuff for other uses.

Ver. 6.] He goes into countries whose stones are the place where sapphires are lodged, and whose dust to him is as good as gold.

Ver. 7.] He treads in paths which no bird of prey knoweth, which the most quick-sighted among them hath never seen.

Ver. 8.] Where the wildest beasts, who search for solitary places, never made their den, or so much as and the exchange of it shall not be for jewels of fine gold.

18 No mention shall be made of coral, or of pearls: for the price of wisdom is above rubies.

19 The topaz of Ethiopia shall not equal it, neither shall it be valued with pure gold.

20 Whence then cometh wisdom? and where is the place of understanding?

21 Seeing it is hid from the eyes of all living, and kept close from the fowls of the air.

22 Destruction and death say, We have heard the fame thereof with our ears.

stones wherewith that rich country abounds, they are of so little value,

Ver. 17.] That if you should add the gold and the crystal which are brought from other places, with all the vessels made by the art of man of the most refined and massy gold, they could do nothing to obtain it.

Ver. 18.] The precious stones which are fetched out of the mountains of the east are not worthy to be named with it: men may dive into the sea, and fetch up pearls, but this wisdom lies a great deal deeper.

Ver. 19.] The Arabian topaz, which is so much esteemed for its wonderful lustre, doth not come near it; nor are all the golden ornaments, which they wear in those parts, proportionable to it.

Ver. 20.] By what means then shall we get this wisdom of which we are desirous? Who can show us where it lies, that we may go and search for it?

Ver. 21.] We may ask this question as often as we please, but none can resolve us; for it is concealed from all men living; the most soaring wits were never able to disclose it.

Ver. 22.] Death is the best informer, and the grave where we may learn something of it. But this is all that they can tell us (which is as far short of a full account as a rumour is from a certain knowledge), that they will shortly make all men equal, and then it will be of no great moment, whether we have been happy or miserable.

23 God understandeth the way thereof, and he knoweth the place thereof.

24 For he looketh to the ends of the earth, and seeth under the whole heaven;

25 To make the weight for the winds; and he weigheth the waters by measure.

26 When he made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunder:

27 Then did he see it, and declare it; he prepared it, yea, and searched it out.

28 And unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding.

Ver. 23.] None but God understands the way and method of his own providence: he alone knows the place of that wisdom we inquire after, which is nowhere else but in his own mind.

Ver. 24.] For who should govern the world but he, whose understanding is infinite, and sees the motions of all creatures, from one end of it to the other?

Ver. 25.] Which he hath set in such exact order, and given to them such just measures, that the wind cannot blow, nor the water flow, but in those proportions which he hath prescribed.

Ver. 26.] To the like laws he hath bound the rain, and appointed the course which the thundering cloud shall take.

Ver. 27.] And when he ordered all these things, he was pleased in the wisdom which he saw in his works; he made it visible and apparent; he fixed it therefore, and made these laws perpetual; because after all the search that could be made, he found no fault in it.

Ver. 28.] And making man at the same time, he imprinted this sense upon his heart, that he ought to be a humble adorer, not a censurer, of his secret wisdom, whereby he governs the world. For the highest wisdom and skill that man can attain, is to be possessed with such a religious fear of the great Lord of all, as not to dare to do anything which he knows will displease him.

CHAPTER XXIX.

ARGUMENT.—To such discourses as these, Job presumes his friends would have given greater attention than it seems they did, had not the vileness of his present condition made his speeches also contemptible. And therefore he puts them in mind with what reverence all his orations were formerly received, by great and small; wishing God would restore to him those happy days: and inserting all along so remarkable instances of his integrity (especially as a judge), in the height of his princely prosperity, when he had an uncontrollable power to do as he pleased, and yet not abused it; but employed it constantly for the defence and comfort of the meanest people in his province.

1 MOREOVER Job continued his parable, and said,

2 Oh that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me;

3 When his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness;

4 As I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle;

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1.] Here Job made another pause, to see if his friends would return any answer: but they continuing silent, he proceeded in his eloquent vindication of himself, saying,

Ver. 2.] Oh that God would re-establish me in that happy condition, wherein, some time ago, I was a principal part of his care! you would then give a greater regard to my words than you do now in my misfortune:

Ver. 3.] Which hath left me nothing but only wishes, that he would restore me those pleasant days when I saw nothing but continued tokens of his favour, by which I passed untouched through all the inconveniences and troubles of this life.

Ver. 4.] Oh, the flourishing season of that prosperous estate! would it were possible to recall the felicity of those days, when the divine providence treated me so kindly, and all my answers were held for oracles:

5 When the Almighty was yet with me, when my children were about me ;

6 When I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil ;

7 When I went out to the gate through the city, when I prepared my seat in the street !

8 The young men saw me, and hid themselves : and the aged arose, and stood up.

9 The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand on their mouth.

10 The nobles held their peace, and their tongue cleaved to the roof of their mouth.

11 When the ear heard me, then it blessed me ; and when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me :

12 Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him.

13 The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me : and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.

14 I put on righteousness, and it clothed me : my judgment was as a robe and a diadem.

15 I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame.

Ver. 5.] When the Almighty goodness had not ceased to be gracious to me ; but I saw myself surrounded with my children and servants, waiting to know my pleasure :

Ver. 6.] When my lands were so fertile, and were blessed with such plenty, as if the rivers had flowed with butter and oil :

Ver. 7.] When I went in state to the court of judgment, and sat on the bench in the open place, where the people are wont to have their causes heard.

Ver. 8.] And the youth, seeing me appear, were seized with such fear, that they durst not look me in the face ; and the aged no sooner perceived me, but they rose up from their seats, and, in token of reverence, stood in my presence.

Ver. 9.] Immediately ensued a general silence, the princes themselves breaking off their discourses, and not taking the liberty to speak a word.

Ver. 10.] The nobles and great commanders could not have heard me with greater attention and stillness, if they had quite lost their voices, or their tongues had been tied to the roof of their mouths.

Ver. 11.] And (so far was I from being a tyrant, as you have accused me, xxii. 5, 6), there was no ear heard the sentence I gave but prized my integrity ; no eye saw me after I had spoken, but you might have beheld therein the respect and honour which they all bare me.

Ver. 12.] Because I never failed to ease the poor when he complained of his oppressions ; the fatherless, and such as had none to take their parts, ever found me their defender.

Ver. 13.] I had his prayer for my prosperity, whose life and estate I preserved when he was in danger of utter undoing : and I made the sorrowful widow such a joyful woman, that she openly proclaimed my praise.

Ver. 14.] For in the morning I put on a resolution to do justly, together with my clothes, and I never swerved from it all the day after : but looked upon the righteous sentence which I pronounced as a greater ornament than the purple robe on my shoulder, and the diadem upon my head.

Ver. 15.] I instructed him who did not well understand his own business, and assisted him who wanted means to carry on his cause.

16 I was a father to the poor : and the cause which I knew not, I searched out.

17 And I broke the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth.

18 Then I said, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand.

19 My root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch.

20 My glory was fresh in me, and my bow was renewed in my hand.

21 Unto me men gave ear, and waited, and kept silence at my counsel.

22 After my words they spake not again ; and my speech dropped upon them.

23 And they waited for me as for the rain ; and they opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain.

23 If I laughed on them, they believed it not ; and the light of my countenance they cast not down.

25 I chose out their way, and sat chief, and dwelt as a king in the army, as one that comforteth the mourners.

Ver. 16.] For the poor I had such a paternal affection, that it made me his advocate as well as his judge : and I never left studying his cause (when there was an obscurity in it) till I had cleared the business, and done him right.

Ver. 17.] By which means I disabled the unjust to oppress them, and forced them to restore that which they had violently extorted from them.

Ver. 18.] And having done so many virtuous actions, and being in such high authority, I was apt to promise myself, that, after an exceeding long and happy life, I should die quietly in mine own house among my children and friends.

Ver. 19.] For, being like a tree, whose root spreadeth out itself by the waters, and whose boughs are perpetually moistened by the sweet dew of heaven, I thought I should never wither.

Ver. 20.] My esteem and reputation increased every day, and grew greater ; and so did my power, to defend the authority and dignity I had obtained.

Ver. 21.] Though there was no need I should so employ it ; for when I spake all men gave me the greatest attention, and my words were a law to them.

Ver. 22.] Which, when I had uttered, no man contradicted, or so much as corrected, but it sweetly instilled itself, and sunk into their hearts.

Ver. 23.] For they expected my opinion with the same eager desire that the husbandman doth the showers, after he hath sown his seed ; they gaped for it as the thirsty earth doth for the latter rain, to plump the corn.

Ver. 24.] The reverence they bare me was so great, that when I laid aside my gravity, and jested with them, they would not believe it, but still took all I said to be serious ; and whatsoever pleasantness I used with them, it did not diminish my authority among them.

Ver. 25.] But if I went to visit them, they still preserved their respect to me, and gave me the pre-eminence. And, as my condescension to them did not make them less honour me, so their submission to me did not make me less familiar with them ; for when I sat as a king, guarded with many troops of followers, I comforted the meanest, and would not suffer them to be dejected.

CHAPTER XXX.

ARGUMENT.—From the foregoing account of his ancient splendour, he takes occasion to annex a no less elegant description of the vileness of his present condition. Hoping that the consideration of such a prodigious change (which he represents in several particulars, and not without some touches still upon his integrity), might at last move his hard-hearted friends to some compassion towards him ; especially, when they saw how near he was to his grave, notwithstanding all his prayers to God for relief.

1 BUT now they that are younger than I have been in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to set with the dogs of my flock.

2 Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was perished ?

3 For want and famine they were solitary ; fleeing into the wilderness in former time desolate and waste.

4 Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper roots for their meat.

5 They were driven forth from among men, (they cried after them as after a thief ;)

6 To dwell in the cliffs of the valleys, in caves of the earth, and in the rocks.

7 Among the bushes they brayed ; under the nettles they were gathered together.

8 They were children of fools, yea, children of base men : they were viler than the earth.

9 And now am I their song, yea, I am their byword.

10 They abhor me, they flee far from me, and spare not to spit in my face.

11 Because he hath loosed my cord, and afflicted me, they have also let loose the bridle before me.

12 Upon my right hand rise the youth ; they push away my feet, and they raise up against me the ways of their destruction.

13 They mar my path, they set forward my calamity, they have no helper.

14 They came upon me as a wide breaking in of waters : in the desolation they rolled themselves upon me.

15 Terrors are turned upon me : they pursue my soul as the wind : and my welfare passeth away as a cloud.

16 And now my soul is poured out upon me ; the days of affliction have taken hold upon me.

17 My bones are pierced in me in the night season : and my sinews take no rest.

18 By the great force of my disease is my garment changed : it bindeth me about as the collar of my coat.

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1.] But now, alas ! there is so sad an alteration, that the youths, who durst not look me in the face, have the confidence to mock and jeer me ; even those youths, whose fathers were so mean, that I disdained to employ them in the vilest service.

Ver. 2.] Men whom, if I had had a mind to employ, were fit for nothing ; being so lazy, listless, and unable to do any business, that it was in vain to call them to it.

Ver. 3.] Beggary fellows, who, being ready to starve, were ashamed to be seen ; and sneaked into desert places to hide their poverty : it is but yesterday that they were most wretchedly miserable ;

Ver. 4.] Satisfying their hunger with those unsavoury herbs, which they cut up in the salt marshes ; and having no other bread but the roots of juniper-trees.

Ver. 5.] They were driven from the society of men ; and if ever they appeared, an outcry was raised against them, as there is against a thief when he is discovered.

Ver. 6.] They had no other habitation, but the clefts which the brooks sometimes make in the valleys ; or the caves which they found in other parts of the earth, or in the rocks.

Ver. 7.] Their sighs might be heard, like the braying of asses, among the thorn-bushes ; they lurked together under nettles or thistles :

Ver. 8.] Being lewd villains, the children of obscure parents ; viler than the earth upon which they trod.

Ver. 9.] And I now am become their pastime : they have made songs of my calamity ; and it is the common entertainment to discourse of my misery.

Ver. 10.] They express an abhorrence of me ; and, as vile as they are, will not come near me ; or if they do, it is only to show their extreme contempt of me.

Ver. 11.] God, they see, hath scattered all my estate, and, by sore afflictions, laid me very low ; which hath made them forget all respect to me, and take an unrestrained license in their insolent behaviour towards me.

Ver. 12.] They set up the very boys to accuse me ; they push me down, and then trample on me. I am become the beaten path, as I may call myself, of their pernicious reproaches.

Ver. 13.] They so disturb my thoughts, that I know not what course to take in this miserable condition : which they heighten by their calumnies ; and are so fruitful in them, that they need none to help to invent them.

Ver. 14.] They assault me with such a fury as soldiers do their enemies, when they have made a wide breach in the wall of a besieged city, and pour in all their forces to destroy them.

Ver. 15.] This dismal change hath fearfully astonished me ; to see all my wishes and hopes dispersed like the wind, and all the happiness I possessed passed away as swiftly as a cloud.

Ver. 16.] I can do nothing now but melt into tears ; my very soul is ready to faint away with grief, when I think how those joyful days are gone, and what distresses have seized on me, and come to take their place.

Ver. 17.] In the night (when sleep is wont to bury our grief) I feel such sharp pains, as penetrate through my very bones ; my blood boils so violently in my veins, that I can take no rest.

Ver. 18.] It requires a great deal of strength, when I would shift my clothes, to pull them off ; my outward garment, by the filthy matter of my sores, being glued as fast to me, as the collar of my shirt.

19 He hath cast me into the mire, and I am become like dust and ashes.

20 I cry unto thee, and thou dost not hear me : I stand up, and thou regardest me not.

21 Thou art become cruel to me : with thy strong hand thou opposest thyself against me.

22 Thou liftest me up to the wind ; thou causest me to ride upon it, and dissolvest my substance.

23 For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living.

24 Howbeit he will not stretch out his hand to the grave, though they cry in his destruction.

Ver. 19.] I look as if I had been thrown into the dirt : there is little difference between me and dust and ashes.

Ver. 20.] And, which is saddest of all, I call upon thee, O God, but cannot prevail with thee to relieve me ; I continue praying and waiting for thy help, and thou sufficiently understandest my miserable case.

Ver. 21.] But thy former kindness to me is turned into such severity, that it looks like cruelty : thou hast given me such deadly blows, as if thou hatedst me.

Ver. 22.] Thou didst lift me up on high, and madest me as it were, to ride upon the clouds ; but hast thrown me down with so much the sorer fall, which hath broken me all in pieces.

Ver. 23.] So that I can think of nothing but dying, and going to my grave ; the common sanctuary of all mankind.

Ver. 24.] Whither thy afflicting hand will not pursue me : for, though men cry when they are sent thither, yet when they are there, all their sufferings and complaints are ended.

Ver. 25.] Strange that I should be thus punished without any mercy ! was I wont to be so unmerciful

25 Did not I weep for him that was in trouble ? was not my soul grieved for the poor ?

26 When I looked for good, then evil came unto me : and when I waited for light, there came darkness.

27 My bowels boiled, and rested not : the days of affliction prevented me.

28 I went mourning without the sun : I stood up, and I cried in the congregation.

29 I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls.

30 My skin is black upon me, and my bones are burned with heat.

31 My harp also is turned to mourning, and my organ unto the voice of them that weep.

to others ? No, I never looked upon men under any hardship without tears ; and was so sensibly touched with the miseries of the poor, that I ever relieved them.

Ver. 26.] Which gave me good hope that I should be very happy : but, instead thereof, the saddest afflictions and troubles are befallen me.

Ver. 27.] Which have so suddenly surprised me, that they have put me into the greatest commotion and disorder : my bowels boil without the least intermission.

Ver. 28.] My affliction is so constant, without any glimpse of joy, that I am a perpetual mourner ; and am not able to lie still, nor to refrain from shrieks and cries in the greatest assemblies.

Ver. 29.] I can do nothing but lament myself, as if I were one of those mournful creatures which make such doleful noises in desert places.

Ver. 30.] The boiling heat of my body hath so parched me, that my skin looks black ; and the marrow in my bones, and all my vital moisture, is dried up.

Ver. 31.] And to say no more, all mirth is banished my house, the musical instruments are laid aside, and nothing but mourning and weeping come in their room.

CHAPTER XXXI.

ARGUMENT.—It was possible his friends might make quite another use than Job intended of the relation he had made of his miserable condition, in the chapter foregoing : and therefore, lest it should harden them in their old error, and they should take what he had said to be an argument of his guilt, he gives in this chapter a large and particular account of his integrity, which in general he had so often asserted ; laying his very soul, and the most secret inclinations of it open before them : together with the actions of his whole life, in his private capacity (for of his public he had spoken before, ch. xxix.), both in respect of his neighbours, of all sorts, and in respect of God : to whom he again most solemnly appeals, in the conclusion of this discourse, that he did not boast of more virtues than he had : but would most gladly be tried before him, by some impartial judge. I need not here enumerate his virtues, because they are plainly and distinctly expressed in the paraphrase : and I do not pretend to give the entire contents, but the design only, of each chapter.

I I MADE a covenant with mine eyes ; why then should I think upon a maid ?

2 For what portion of God is there from above ? and what inheritance of the Almighty from on high ?

CHAP. XXXI.

Ver. 1.] But do not, I beseech you, any longer look upon these sufferings as an argument that I am not innocent ; for I protest to you, I have been very resolute, and careful to avoid even the occasions of lasciviousness : and therefore how should I ever so much as deliberate to corrupt a virgin ?

Ver. 2.] For I know there is a God in Heaven, au

3 Is not destruction to the wicked ? and a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity ?

4 Doth not he see my ways, and count all my steps ?

almighty being, who rules over all : and what could I expect from him, as the reward of such impurity ?

Ver. 3.] Doth it not lead to destruction ? nay, do not strange and horrible punishments fall upon the workers of that iniquity ?

Ver. 4.] Is it possible to commit it so secretly that it shall not be known by him, who observes every motion, and tells every step I take ?

5 If I have walked with vanity, or if my foot hath hasted to deceit ;

6 Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity.

7 If my step hath turned out of the way, and my heart walked after mine eyes, and if any blot hath cleaved to my hands ;

8 Then let me sow, and let another eat ; yea, let my offspring be rooted out.

9 If my heart have been deceived by a woman, or if I have laid wait at my neighbour's door ;

10 Then let my wife grind unto another, and let others bow down upon her.

11 For this is a heinous crime ; yea, it is an iniquity to be punished by the judges.

12 For it is a fire that consumeth to destruction, and would root out all mine increase.

13 If I did despise the cause of my man-servant or of my maid-servant, when they contended with me ;

14 What then shall I do when God riseth up ? and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him ?

15 Did not he that made me in the womb make him ? and did not one fashion us in the womb ?

16 If I have withheld the poor from their desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail ;

17 Or have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof ;

18 (For from my youth he was brought up with me, as with a father, and I have guided her from my mother's womb ;)

19 If I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering ;

20 If his loins have not blessed me, and if he were not warmed with the fleece of my sheep ;

21 If I have lifted up my hand against the fatherless, when I saw my help in the gate :

22 Then let mine arm fall from my shoulder blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone.

23 For destruction from God was a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I could not endure.

24 If I have made gold my hope, or have said to the fine gold, Thou art my confidence ;

25 If I rejoiced because my wealth was great, and because my hand had gotten much ;

26 If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness ;

27 And my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand :

Ver. 5.] If I have broken my promises, or have been forward to deceive and cheat my neighbour :

Ver. 6.] I refuse not to be tried : but rather desire my actions may be scrupulously weighed and examined ; for God, I am sure, will approve of my upright dealing.

Ver. 7.] If I have turned aside from the rules of justice for fear or favour ; if I have coveted the goods of other men, or my hands have taken any bribes :

Ver. 8.] Let me be served in my kind, and let other men eat the corn which I have sowed, and pluck up the trees (roots and all) which I have planted.

Ver. 9.] If my heart hath been seduced to filthy desires after another man's wife ; if I have watched for his absence, or some fair opportunity to enter into his house and defile his bed ;

Ver. 10.] Then let others take away my wife from me, and make her the vilest slave, whom they may use at their pleasure.

Ver. 11.] I ever thought this a crime of the highest nature, an iniquity to be corrected by the severity of the public justice.

Ver. 12.] For it is a fire, which, if it be not extinguished, consumes men and their estates ; yea, destroys whole families and kingdoms ; and so incenses the divine displeasure, that, should it escape the magistrates' punishment, I could never hope that anything of mine (were I guilty of it) should thrive, but all come to utter ruin.

Ver. 13.] So far was I from doing such foul injuries to my neighbours, that I never extended my power to the oppression of my slaves : but was content to wave the privilege the law gave me, of using them as I pleased ; and to allow them a fair hearing when they had any difference with me.

Ver. 14.] For I thought with myself, that though men could not punish me for my rigour towards them, yet I should never be able to excuse it to God when he came to judge me ; nor tell what to answer when he called me to an account for my ill usage of them.

Ver. 15.] I often also called to mind that there was no such a difference in our estates as there was an equality in our births : and that we having one common creator, my slave was as nearly related to God as myself.

Ver. 16.] Nor have the poor any reason to complain of me : for if I ever denied to satisfy their desire, or let the widow in vain expect my relief ;

Ver. 17.] Or have sitten down at my table alone, without the company of fatherless children :

Ver. 18.] (For whom I have always had a natural compassion from my very youth ; I brought it into the world with me, and it hath been my companion ever since.)

Ver. 19.] If I have suffered any to perish for want of clothing, or let the poor go naked without a covering ;

Ver. 20.] If his loins did not admonish him to bless me as oft as he girded on his garment, and he were not kept warm with the cloth made of my wool :

Ver. 21.] If I have ever beaten the fatherless, because I knew I should be too strong for him in the court, in case he complained there of the injustice ;

Ver. 22.] Then let that guilty arm fall off from my shoulder, or be broken in two in the midst.

Ver. 23.] For I never thought I could escape the divine vengeance ; the dread of which affrighted me, when men could not, from all such inelence ; for I knew I could not support myself against his majesty :

Ver. 24.] Whose favour I do not desire, if I have put my trust in riches, and thought myself safe and secure, because I was furnished with the noblest treasures :

Ver. 25.] Or, if I was vainly elevated and puffed up with the large possessions left me by my ancestors, or with the great increase I had made to them by my own industry.

Ver. 26.] If when I beheld the sun arise, or the moon appear in her full lustre,

Ver. 27.] I ever entertained an opinion in my mind that they were gods, or kissed my hand in token of worship and reverence to them :

28 This also was an iniquity to be punished by the judge : for I should have denied the God that is above.

29 If I rejoiced at the destruction of him that hated me, or lifted up myself when evil found him :

30 Neither have I suffered my mouth to sin by wishing a curse to his soul.

31 If the men of my tabernacle said not, Oh that we had of his flesh ! we cannot be satisfied.

32 The stranger did not lodge in the street : but I opened my doors to the traveller.

33 If I covered my transgression as Adam, by hiding mine iniquity in my bosom :

34 Did I fear a great multitude, or did the contempt of families terrify me, that I kept silence, and went not out of the door ?

Ver. 28.] This also was a fearful crime, which God's vicegerents should punish ; because it were to put those stars in the place of him who is above all heavens.

Ver. 29.] Whom I do not wish to be my friend, if I ever was glad at the ruin of mine enemy, or insulted over him, when any mischief befell him :

Ver. 30.] (No, I was not so much as guilty of making any imprecations against him, nor was provoked by his malice to wish him dead :)

Ver. 31.] Though the people of my family were so enraged at him, that, if I would have yielded to their passion, they were ready to eat him up with an insatiable anger :

Ver. 32.] (Much less was I guilty of unkindness to strangers, whom I never suffered to lodge in the streets : for the door of my house stood open, that any traveller might turn in there if he pleased :)

Ver. 33.] If I have studied to seem better than I am, and have not now made a free confession ; but, like our first parent, have concealed or excused my faults, and out of self-love have hidden mine iniquity :

Ver. 34.] (Because I dread what the people will say of me, or am terrified by the contempt into which the knowledge of my guilt may bring me with the 35 Oh that one would hear me ! behold, my desire is, that the Almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book.

36 Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me.

37 I would declare unto him the number of my steps ; as a prince would I go near unto him.

38 If my land cry against me, or that the furrows likewise thereof complain ;

39 If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money, or have caused the owners thereof to lose their life :

40 Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley. The words of Job are ended.

neighbouring families : then I am content my mouth should be stopped, and that I never stir out of my door any more.

Ver. 35.] Oh that the truth of all this might be examined by some equal judge ! Behold, I continue still to desire of God this favour ; and let him that can excuse me, bring in his libel in writing against me.

Ver. 36.] Surely I would not endeavour to obscure it, but openly expose it to be read by all ; nay, wear it as a singular ornament, which would turn to my honour, when the world saw it disproved.

Ver. 37.] I myself would assist him to draw up his charge, by declaring to him freely every action of my life : I would approach him as undauntedly as a prince, who is assured of the goodness of his cause :

Ver. 38.] For if so much as a bit of my land was unjustly gotten, or I have defrauded those who ploughed it of their wages ;

Ver. 39.] If I have taken the fruits of it from my tenants, and paid nothing for them ; or let them such hard bargains, that it broke their heart :

Ver. 40.] Then let corn never grow there any more ; but let it be overrun with thistles and the most stinking weeds.

Here Job ended his defence.

CHAPTER XXXII.

ARGUMENT.—It appears by the fifteenth verse of this chapter, that there were several other persons present besides those that are named, when this dispute was held between Job and his three friends. Among whom there was a young man named Elihu ; and who was either a Syrian (in which language this book was first written, and translated by Moses into Hebrew, says the author of the commentaries under Origen's name), descended from the second son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, Gen. xxii. 20, or an Idumean, of the same country with Eliphaz the Temanite, Jer. xxv. 23. I have made him a Syrian in my paraphrase, because he is said to be of the kindred of Ram ; by whom we are to understand either Aram, or as the Hebrews think, Abraham, by whom such wisdom and piety might be promoted in his brother's family, as is apparent in Elihu ; who, though much inferior to the rest in years, (for which reason he had held his peace thus long), yet was much superior to them in knowledge. Which he discovers in the judicious censures he here passes, not only upon the three friends, but upon Job himself : whom he hath nothing to charge withal, relating to any crime committed before this affliction befell him : but thinks he had not managed the dispute about it with so much calmness and submission to God, as became his piety. In this he differs from those that spake before him : for I do not find that he blames him for any miscarriages, but those only which he observed in the heat of his disputation : and he spends his time rather in justifying God, than in carping at Job, as the other had done.

1 So these three men ceased to answer Job, because he was righteous in his own eyes.

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1.] And his three friends also left off disputing with him, because they saw him immovably fixed in the opinion of his innocence.

Ver. 2.] Which very much displeased a young

2 Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite, of the kindred of Ram :

man, who had stood by all this time, and heard what both sides said for themselves. His name was Elihu, descended from a brother of Abraham ; who was exceeding angry with Job, because he spent more time in justifying himself than in justifying God ; against Job was his wrath kindled, because he justified himself rather than God.

3 Also against his three friends was his wrath kindled, because they had found no answer, and yet had condemned Job.

4 Now Elihu had waited till Job had spoken, because they were elder than he.

5 When Elihu saw that there was no answer in the mouth of these three men, then his wrath was kindled.

6 And Elihu the son of Barachel the Buzite answered and said, I am young, and ye are very old; wherefore I was afraid, and durst not shew you mine opinion.

7 I said, Days should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom.

8 But there is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding.

9 Great men are not always wise: neither do the aged understand judgment.

10 Therefore I said, Hearken to me; I also will shew mine opinion.

11 Behold, I waited for your words; I gave ear to your reasons, whilst ye searched out what to say.

Ver. 3.] And with his three friends also, because they were not able to maintain their charge against Job, and yet had condemned him to be a wicked hypocrite.

Ver. 4.] Yet he moderated his passion so discreetly, that he said not a word, till he had waited, as well as Job, to see whether they would resume the debate: because it was not fit, he thought, for him to meddle, as long as his elders had anything to say.

Ver. 5.] But when he saw that none of the three offered to reply, but sat as men that knew not what to say, he was not able to hold his peace any longer.

Ver. 6.] But in this manner addressed himself unto them, saying, I have considered all this while mine own youth, and your aged experience, which have deterred me so much, that I have hitherto been afraid to interpose my opinion.

Ver. 7.] I thought with myself, that it was becoming one of my small standing to hear, rather than to speak; and to learn wisdom in such grave company as yours, rather than pretend to teach it.

Ver. 8.] But I see I was mistaken: man is a very wretched thing, though he live never so long, if God do not illuminate him. It is the divine inspiration which gives understanding.

Ver. 9.] They are not always the wisest who are in authority, and the teachers of others: nor do old men always so well employ their years as to understand the difference of things.

Ver. 10.] Therefore let me entreat you to lend your ears a little to me: I also will tell you what I think about this matter.

Ver. 11.] Do not think me too forward; for I have with great patience heard all your discourses, and observed your arguments; and let you proceed till you have searched as far as you could into the business:

Ver. 12.] And having duly considered and comprehended every word, I must needs pronounce, that there is none of you hath confuted Job, nor said any-

12 Yea, I attended unto you, and, behold, there was none of you that convinced Job, or that answered his words:

13 Lest ye should say, We have found out wisdom: God thrusteth him down, not man.

14 Now he hath not directed his words against me: neither will I answer him with your speeches:

15 They were amazed, they answered no more: they left off speaking.

16 When I had waited, (for they spake not, but stood still, and answered no more:)

17 I said, I will answer also my part, I also will shew mine opinion.

18 For I am full of matter, the spirit within me constraineth me.

19 Behold, my belly is as wine which hath no vent; it is ready to burst like new bottles.

20 I will speak, that I may be refreshed: I will open my lips and answer.

21 Let me not, I pray you, accept any man's person, neither let me give flattering titles unto man.

22 For I know not to give flattering titles; in so doing my maker would soon take me away.

thing to the purpose in answer to his defence of himself.

Ver. 13.] For it is not sufficient for you to say he is obstinate, and therefore it is wisely done of us to leave him to God: he shall confound him, by continuing his affliction; not we by our arguments.

Ver. 14.] Which truly are so weak, that I shall make no use of them; but, as Job hath directed none of his words against me, so I shall trouble him with none of your replies.

Ver. 15.] See, I beseech you all, you that hear us, how these disputants are amazed; how silent they are, as if their speech had forsaken them.

Ver. 16.] You are my witnesses, that I have waited for satisfaction: but after long expectation they bring forth nothing; they are at a stand, and furnished with no further answer.

Ver. 17.] Which made me resolve within myself, that I would have a share in this dispute; and show, as I have often told you, what my opinion is concerning it.

Ver. 18.] And indeed it is high time; for I am so full, by long thinking of what I have to say, that I am in pain till I have uttered my mind.

Ver. 19.] My thoughts work within me, like new wine in a vessel: and we are both alike in danger to burst, unless there be a vent.

Ver. 20.] I must speak, therefore, if it be but to ease myself: I will open my lips, as they do such vessels, and make an answer, because I cannot with safety hold my peace any longer.

Ver. 21.] And, I beseech you, let me speak with all freedom; with regard only to the cause, and not to the person: and do not expect that I should compliment, and give to man any glorious titles.

Ver. 22.] For I do not understand that art of soothing men into a great opinion of themselves: or if I did, I should not venture to use it; lest he that made me should presently stop my mouth for not dealing plainly.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

ARGUMENT.—Here Elihu addresses his speech to Job alone (for he rejected all that the three friends had said, as sufficiently confuted by Job in his dispute with them), and tells him, first, that he was the man who would now plead with him in God's behalf (as he had often desired), and that he was no equal match for him. And then begins to reprehend those passages which he thought were blameable in Job's speeches; particularly his insisting so much upon his integrity: which, though true, should not have been mentioned without due acknowledgment, that the Sovereign of the world had done him no wrong in thus afflicting him; and that it was not fit for him to question the wisdom and justice of God's providence, because he did not understand it. For the care of God over man, and his kindness to him, he shows, are so apparent, upon so many scores, that they ought not to be denied because of the unaccountable afflictions that may befall us; which we ought rather to think are one of the ways whereby he hath man good.

1 WHEREFORE, Job, I pray thee, hear my speeches, and hearken to all my words.

2 Behold, now I have opened my mouth, my tongue hath spoken in my mouth.

3 My words shall be of the uprightness of my heart: and my lips shall utter knowledge clearly.

4 The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life.

5 If thou canst answer me, set thy words in order before me, stand up.

6 Behold, I am according to thy wish in God's stead: I also am formed out of the clay.

7 Behold, my terror shall not make thee afraid, neither shall my hand be heavy upon thee.

8 Surely thou hast spoken in my hearing, and I have heard the voice of thy words, saying,

9 I am clean without transgression, I am innocent; neither is there any iniquity in me.

10 Behold, he findeth occasions against me, he counteth me for his enemy.

11 He putteth my feet in the stocks, he marketh all my paths.

12 Behold, in this thou art not just: I will answer thee, that God is greater than man.

13 Why dost thou strive against him? for he giveth not account of any of his matters.

14 For God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not.

15 In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in slumberings upon the bed;

16 Then he openeth the ears of men, and seal-eth their instruction.

17 That he may withdraw man from his purpose, and hide pride from man.

18 He keepeth back his soul from the pit, and his life from perishing by the sword.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1.] And truly I think I need not use any farther preface to persuade thee, O Job, to hear my discourse, and to give an attentive ear to all I have to say.

Ver. 2.] Behold, now I begin; the words are upon my tongue, if thou art ready to receive them.

Ver. 3.] And I assure thee they shall be the unfeigned language of my heart, which it shall not be hard for thee to understand; for the instructions they give thee shall be clearly and perspicuously delivered.

Ver. 4.] And first of all consider, that I am no other creature than what thou art; a man whom the power of God hath formed, and then inspired with life.

Ver. 5.] Thou needest not therefore decline the encounter; but if thou art able to answer, set thy forces in order against me, and stand up to oppose me.

Ver. 6.] Thou hast formerly desired (ix. 33. xiii. 3), that somebody would appear in God's stead, to reason the case with thee: behold, thou hast thy wish; I am the man that appears for him, who am made of the same matter with thyself.

Ver. 7.] Look upon me, the combat is not unequal (as thou complainedst when thou lookedst upon God, ix. 34. xiii. 21), thou seest no dreadful majesty in me to affright thee, nor any power to oppress thee.

Ver. 8.] I do not accuse thee neither, as thy three friends have done, of crimes uncertain or unknown, but of what I myself, with mine own ears, have heard thee utter.

Ver. 9.] For surely thou hast said more than once (x. 7. xiii. 23. xvi. 17. &c. xxxi.), I am pure and without any fault, in my heart and in my actions, both towards God and towards man.

Ver. 10.] Behold, he who I thought would have vindicated my innocence, seeks for occasions to fall out with me, and for slight matters declares himself mine enemy.

Ver. 11.] Whom he keeps so fast in prison, that I cannot stir, and watches so narrowly, that I can find no way to escape.

Ver. 12.] This is thy complaining language, and mark what I say to thee: though I cannot accuse thee, as thy friends have done, of other sins, yet in this thou dost offend; and I must reprehend thee for it, by remembering thee, that there is no comparison between God and man.

Ver. 13.] And therefore, why dost thou presume to dispute with him, and call him to an account for his actions, who will not reveal to us all the secrets of his providence?

Ver. 14.] Not that God envies knowledge to us, for he teaches man more ways than one, and a great deal more than he takes care to learn.

Ver. 15.] One way is by a dream (which you may call a night vision), when men fall into a deep sleep, or lie on their beds between sleeping and waking.

Ver. 16.] Then (when their minds are free from the business and cares of the day) he secretly whispers instruction in their ears, and imprints it upon their minds.

Ver. 17.] Not to make them understand, indeed, all the secret reasons of his providence, but to turn man from his evil way, and to dispose him with all humility to submit himself to his heavenly instructor.

Ver. 18.] Who by this means mercifully preserves him (if he obey his admonition) from running on to his own destruction, and rescues him from the violent death which the sword of justice, or of an enemy, would have inflicted on him.

19 He is chastened also with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain :

20 So that his life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat.

21 His flesh is consumed away, that it cannot be seen ; and his bones that were not seen stick out.

22 Yea, his soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers.

23 If there be a messenger with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to shew unto man his uprightness :

24 Then he is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit : I have found a ransom.

25 His flesh shall be fresher than a child's : he shall return to the days of his youth :

26 He shall pray unto God, and he will be favourable unto him : and he shall see his face with joy : for he will render unto man his righteousness.

27 He looketh upon men, and if any say, I have sinned, and perverted that which was right, and it profited me not ;

28 He will deliver his soul from going into the pit, and his life shall see the light.

29 Lo, all these things worketh God oftentimes with man.

30 To bring back his soul from the pit, to be enlightened with the light of the living.

31 Mark well, O Job, hearken unto me : hold thy peace, and I will speak.

32 If thou hast any thing to say, answer me : speak, for I desire to justify thee.

33 If not, hearken unto me : hold thy peace, and I shall teach thee wisdom.

Ver. 19.] Another way (and more common than this by dreams) is the painful diseases wherewith he chastises man, and lays him low on his bed, though his constitution of body be never so firm and strong.

Ver. 20.] In which languishing state he loathes his food : yea, nauseates that very meat which formerly was his greatest delight.

Ver. 21.] Which makes so great a change in him, that his flesh, which formerly appeared plump and fair, cannot be seen ; and his bones stick out, which formerly did not appear.

Ver. 22.] There is but a step between him and his grave ; the pangs of death being ready to seize on him.

Ver. 23.] If then (which is a third way whereby God teaches men) there come a divine messenger unto him, a rare person that can expound the mind of God, and persuade the sick man to repent and amend his life :

Ver. 24.] He shall beseech God to be gracious to him, saying, Spare him, good Lord, and rescue him from going down to the grave ; let it satisfy thee that thou hast corrected him, and that I have found him a penitent.

Ver. 25.] Presently the sick man shall begin to recover, and become a new man in his body as well as in his mind : his flesh shall look as fresh as when he was a child ; and he shall be restored to the vigour and strength of his youthful age.

Ver. 26.] His prayer also shall be acceptable to God, and prevail for the blessings he asks ; he shall go into the house of God, and with the most joyful voice give thanks unto him and praise his goodness ; who will then acquit him, and restore this poor man to his favour.

Ver. 27.] And he (as becomes a true penitent), casting his eyes upon his neighbours, shall openly confess and say, I have offended God, and he hath justly chastised me ; I have done wickedly, and he hath punished me according to my desert :

Ver. 28.] But hath redeemed me from that death into which I was going : and not only made me live, but given me hope that I shall enjoy prosperous days.

Ver. 29.] Behold, in all this, the wonderful goodness of God ; who by so many means very often admonishes man :

Ver. 30.] To reduce him from those evil courses which had just brought him to his grave, and to raise him up again to live in all true happiness and pleasure.

Ver. 31.] Mark this well, O Job, for it may very much concern thee : consider what I have said ; and if thou pleasest to hear me patiently, I will still instruct thee more fully.

Ver. 32.] Or if thou hast anything to object to what I have said, I am willing to hear it : speak before I go any further ; for I heartily desire that thou mayest clear thyself, and appear a righteous person.

Ver. 33.] If thou hast no exception against my discourse, then continue thy attentions, and silently listen to me, and I will teach thee more wisdom.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

ARGUMENT.—Here Job shows himself a far more humble and teachable person than his three friends ; for though Elihu had invited him to make what exceptions he pleased to his discourse in the former chapter, he would not open his mouth, because he plainly saw that Elihu had hit upon the thing wherein he was defective. And so this young man proceeds to carry the charge a little higher, and tells him, with more sharpness than before, that there were some words in his discourses which sounded in his ears as if he accused God's justice and goodness. For what else did he mean when he complained that God did not do him right, and that he destroyed alike both good and bad ? which rash assertions he overthrows, from the consideration of the sovereign dominion, power, righteousness, and wisdom of God ; and represents to him what behaviour and discourse would have better become him than that which he had used.

1 FURTHERMORE Elihu answered and said,

CHAP. XXXIV.

Ver. 1.] To this last motion Job consented ; and replying never a word, Elihu proceeded in his discourse, and said,

VOL. II.—99

2 Hear my words, O ye wise men ; and give ear unto me, ye that have knowledge.

Ver. 2.] I do not desire to be judge alone in this cause, but I appeal to them that are wise ; and beseech all those (among you that hear me) who are intelligent, to mark and consider what I now deliver.

3 For the ear trieth words, as the mouth tasteth meat.

4 Let us choose to us judgment : let us know among ourselves what is good.

5 For Job hath said, I am righteous : and God hath taken away my judgment.

6 Should I lie against my right ? my wound is incurable without transgression.

7 What man is like Job, who drinketh up scorning like water ?

8 Which goeth in company with the workers of iniquity, and walketh with wicked men.

9 For he hath said, It profiteth a man nothing that he should delight himself with God.

10 Therefore hearken unto me, ye men of understanding : far be it from God, that he should do wickedness ; and from the Almighty, that he should commit iniquity.

11 For the work of a man shall he render unto him, and cause every man to find according to his ways.

12 Yea, surely God will not do wickedly, neither will the Almighty pervert judgment.

13 Who hath given him a charge over the earth ? or who hath disposed the whole world ?

Ver. 3.] You can discern whether it be true or false ; for the mind is as proper a judge of discourse, as the palate is of meat.

Ver. 4.] Let us agree to examine the business, that we may be able to pronounce a righteous judgment : let us debate among ourselves, and resolve whether Job have a good cause or not.

Ver. 5.] For he hath said, I am innocent ; and God (who knows I do not deserve to suffer in this manner, xxvii. 2. 6), will not do me right :

Ver. 6.] I scorn to defend myself with lies ; but I must still maintain, that this deadly wound is given me for no crime of mine.

Ver. 7.] Did you ever know such a man as Job, who instead of adoring the Almighty (as becomes his wisdom and piety), takes the liberty to pour out abundance of contemptuous language concerning his judgments ?

Ver. 8.] He associates himself with evil-doers ; and talks after the same rate that the wicked are wont to do.

Ver. 9.] For he seems to me to be of this opinion, that though a man study to please God, he shall get nothing by it (ix. 22).

Ver. 10.] What think you of this, ye men of wisdom ? Do you not abhor such a thought as much as I, that he who is almighty should wrong any man, and he who is all-sufficient should swerve from the rule of righteousness ?

Ver. 11.] He will never be charged with such weakness, but always deals with men according as they deserve : for he that doth well never fails to find a reward ; and he that doth ill meets with a just punishment.

Ver. 12.] Surely I need not fear to affirm this with the greatest confidence, that the supreme judge of the world will never condemn an innocent person ; nor will he that possesses all things be corrupted to pronounce an unrighteous sentence.

Ver. 13.] For he did not receive the government of the world from any above himself ; nor is there any higher being whose authority he may be thought to dread, and for fear of whom he may be tempted to do unjustly.

14 If he set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath ;

15 All flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again unto dust.

16 If now thou hast understanding, hear this : hearken to the voice of my words.

17 Shall even he that hateth right govern ? and wilt thou condemn him that is most just ?

18 Is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked ? and to princes, Ye are ungodly ?

19 How much less to him that accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor ? for they all are the work of his hands.

20 In a moment shall they die, and the people shall be troubled at midnight, and pass away : and the mighty shall be taken away without hand.

21 For his eyes are upon the ways of man, and he seeth all his goings.

22 There is no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves.

23 For he will not lay upon man more than right ; that he should enter into judgment with God.

Ver. 14.] No, he made and he sustains all creatures ; so that if he should contain his goodness within himself, and recall that spirit and life which he hath infused into them ;

Ver. 15.] Nothing could subsist one moment : but all mankind would expire together, and return unto their dust.

Ver. 16.] If thou art wise, mind what I say ; and consider also what follows :

Ver. 17.] Can he be an enemy to justice himself, who binds us so fast to the practice of it ? and wilt thou condemn his actions, who is most powerful, as well as just ; and therefore need not serve himself by any wrongful dealing ?

Ver. 18.] There is no king on earth but looks upon it as a great and insufferable reproach to be called a tyrant ; nor will inferior rulers endure you should say that they have no regard to equity.

Ver. 19.] Shall we impute then any such thing to him, before whom a prince or a rich man is no more than the meanest and poorest persons ? who shall have the same justice from him with the greatest, because they are all alike the work of his hands.

Ver. 20.] How should he stand in awe of the power of kings, or be bribed with the gifts of the rich, who can strike them all dead in a moment ? Whole nations tremble before him, and in their deepest security are destroyed. He needs not the help of any force on earth to put down a mighty tyrant ; but invisible powers carry him away.

Ver. 21.] For there is no one passage of man's life but he is acquainted with it : and therefore cannot be suspected through ignorance of their actions (no more than through fear of their persons), to overlook their crimes, or to do them any injustice.

Ver. 22.] They may seek to hide their wickedness, when they have committed it ; and may make excuses and subtle pretences : but they cannot cast a mist before his eyes, who sees into the thickest darkness, and the deepest secrets.

Ver. 23.] And therefore as he will never charge man with that of which he is not guilty ; so, when he calls him to an account, he will not delay, nor put off his judgment, to hear what man can say for himself.

24 He shall break in pieces mighty men without number, and set others in their stead.

25 Therefore he knoweth their works, and he overturneth them in the night, so that they are destroyed.

26 He striketh them as wicked men in the open sight of others ;

27 Because they turned back from him, and would not consider any of his ways :

28 So that they cause the cry of the poor to come unto him, and he heareth the cry of the afflicted.

29 When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble ? and when he hideth his face, who then can behold him ? whether it be done against a nation, or against a man only :

30 That the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be ensnared.

Ver. 24.] For he needs not be informed how matters stand ; and therefore breaks in pieces mighty men, without inquiry or examination of witnesses against them, and confers their dignity upon others.

Ver. 25.] And by this means shows that he knows their works : when he so suddenly overturns them, that they are crushed in pieces.

Ver. 26.] He punishes them as men in his eyes are apparently wicked ; and therefore makes them public examples for the terror of their neighbours ;

Ver. 27.] Because they would not follow his counsels, nor regard any of his commands :

Ver. 28.] But went on in their oppression of the poor, till they cried to heaven for vengeance upon them : and the cry of such afflicted people God never fails to answer.

Ver. 29.] And if he will grant such poor wretches rest and ease, who can disturb them ? or if he be angry with their oppressor, who can show him favour ? (which is as true of whole nations, as one single person).

Ver. 30.] He will not let the wicked tyrant reign always, though he pretend piety and the public good never so much, lest the people should be ensnared into sin by his example.

Ver. 31.] Wherefore it is best for an afflicted person not to complain, but to suspect himself (though he be never so good), and presently to say to God, I

31 Surely it is meet to be said unto God, I have borne chastisement, I will not offend any more :

32 That which I see not teach thou me : if I have done iniquity, I will do no more.

33 Should it be according to thy mind ? he will recompense it, whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose ; and not I : therefore speak what thou knowest.

34 Let men of understanding tell me, and let a wise man hearken unto me.

35 Job hath spoken without knowledge, and his words were without wisdom.

36 My desire is that Job may be tried unto the end because of his answers for wicked men.

37 For he addeth rebellion unto his sin, he clappeth his hands among us, and multiplieth his words against God.

confess this suffering is just ; I will not offend by pleading my innocence.

Ver. 32.] If I have overlooked anything that I should have observed, do thou show it me ; if I have committed any fault, I will take care to do so no more.

Ver. 33.] Hast thou addressed thyself to God in this manner ? Answer that question ; for God will recompense it, if thou dost despise such good counsel ; which perhaps thou wilt choose to do, but so would not I. Speak therefore what thy opinion is.

Ver. 34.] Or let any understanding persons tell us what is their opinion ; for such as I said before, would I have to judge between us.

Ver. 35.] Job seems to be very much mistaken ; and his discourses to be inconsiderate and without reason.

Ver. 36.] And therefore I am so far from wishing he may be presently released from his afflictions, that I take it to be more desirable he should be still tried and proved by them, till he recant the answers in which he hath complained of divine providence, after the manner of wicked men.

Ver. 37.] For otherwise he will add greater offences to those lesser he hath already committed : he will defend what he hath inconsiderately spoken ; nay, triumph, as if he had got the better of us ; and, instead of making the confession to which I have exhorted him, continue to multiply his complaints against God.

CHAPTER XXXV.

ARGUMENT.—Job still keeps silence, notwithstanding that Elihu had made the harshest construction of his words ; because he was sensible he meant him well, and had now, in the conclusion of his discourse, given him very wholesome counsel ; and, allowing his integrity, had only charged him with some unhappy expressions, which had fallen from him when he was in great anguish of spirit. Which, I suppose, was the reason he doth not contradict him, though he continue here in this chapter to fasten the very same harsh sense upon his words, ver. 2, 3, which he refutes from the consideration of the infinite disproportion there is between man and God : who is never the worse, indeed, for any evil, nor at all the better for any good that we do ; and yet hath such a love to mankind, that it is certain he would not have them miserable, but takes care for their relief when they are oppressed, if they address themselves, as they ought, to him.

1 ELIHU spake moreover, and said,
2 Thinkest thou this to be right, that thou saidst, My righteousness is more than God's ?

CHAP. XXXV.

Ver. 1.] To this Job making no answer, Elihu pressed him again, and said,

3 For thou saidst, What advantage will it be unto thee ? and, What profit shall I have, if I be cleansed from my sin ?

Ver. 2.] Let me appeal to thy own conscience : Dost thou think this to be right, that thou saidst God is not so righteous as I am ?

Ver. 3.] What else could be thy meaning, when 4 I will answer thee, and thy companions with thee.

5 Look unto the heavens, and see; and behold the clouds which are higher than thou.

6 If thou sinnest, what doest thou against him? or if thy transgressions be multiplied, what doest thou unto him?

7 If thou be righteous, what givest thou him? or what receiveth he of thy hand?

8 Thy wickedness may hurt a man as thou art; and thy righteousness may profit the son of man.

9 By reason of the multitude of oppressions they make the oppressed to cry: they cry out by reason of the arm of the mighty.

10 But none saith, Where is God my maker, who giveth songs in the night:

thou utterest such words as these, What doth God care whether I be innocent or not? or what benefit shall I have by it if I be?

Ver. 4.] I will answer thee, and such as thou art, in a few words.

Ver. 5.] Cast up thine eyes to the heavens, look upon the clouds and the sky, and consider, that as high as they are they are not so much above thee as God is above them.

Ver. 6.] And therefore it is true, that he is never the worse for the sins which thou hast committed, nor will be the worse, though thou should proceed to commit more and greater:

Ver. 7.] And that he is never the better for thy being righteous, which can confer nothing upon him, which he hath not already, nor add anything to his greatness.

Ver. 8.] But thou shouldst not conclude from thence, that it is all one whether a man be good or bad: for thy wickedness will prove hurtful to thyself and to the rest of mankind; and thy righteousness will do thee and them great service.

Ver. 9.] The cries of the oppressed tell us what mischief injustice doth, and how miserable it makes them: the tyranny of the mighty forces them to cry aloud to God for vengeance; who, though he be not hurt himself by it, is touched with a sense of their affliction.

Ver. 10.] The greatest mischief is, that not one of these miserable wretches inquires seriously after God, who gave him his being; and is able therefore not 11 Who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven?

12 There they cry, but none giveth answer, because of the pride of evil men.

13 Surely God will not hear vanity, neither will the Almighty regard it.

14 Although thou sayest thou shalt not see him, yet judgment is before him; therefore trust thou in him.

15 But now, because it is not so, he hath visited in his anger; yet he knoweth it not in great extremity:

16 Therefore doth Job open his mouth in vain; he multiplieth words without knowledge.

only to relieve him, but to comfort, yea, to fill him with joy in the midst of the saddest affliction.

Ver. 11.] Having endued us with reason and wisdom to consider, that he, who takes care of the beasts and the birds, will not neglect us, if we do not merely cry and groan under our oppressions (as those brute creatures do); but, with hearty repentance, and a thankful sense of his benefits, and humble confidence in his goodness, piously address ourselves unto him.

Ver. 12.] This is the reason that God doth not deliver them; because they lie crying, indeed, under their afflictions; but it is not a sense of him, but only the haughty violence of their oppressors, which extorts it from them.

Ver. 13.] For we must not think that God (though he be inclined to relieve the afflicted) will give ear to men so void of piety: he will not regard those who have so little regard to him; even for this reason, because he stands in need of nobody.

Ver. 14.] Therefore, although thou complainest that thou dost not see him appear for thy deliverance (xxiii. 8), yet do not conclude from thence that he is unrighteous; but go and condemn thyself before him, and then patiently wait for his mercy.

Ver. 15.] But now, because there is nothing of this in thee, God hath thus severely afflicted thee; and not at all regarded the exceeding great prosperity wherein thou hast hitherto lived.

Ver. 16.] And Job may spare his complaints hereafter, for they are to no purpose; he heapeth up words without reason.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

ARGUMENT.—Having reprehended some of the unwarrantable expressions in Job's discourses (which he himself would not justify), Elihu comes closer to the business, and speaks to the very cause itself. Showing, from the nature of God, and the methods of his providence, that if Job had, instead of disputing, submitted himself humbly to God's corrections, he would have delivered him (it being as easy for him to lift up as to cast down): and that his not discerning the reason of his corrections (which Job had made a great cause of his grief, xix. 7), ought not to have hindered his humble submission; because we are not able to comprehend any of the works of God, which we see every day, and acknowledge to be most excellently contrived.

1 ELIHU also proceeded, and said,
2 Suffer me a little, and I will shew thee that I have yet to speak on God's behalf.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Ver. 1.] Job still keeping silence, Elihu proceeded in his discourse, and said,

Ver. 2.] Be not weary, and I will open my mind

3 I will fetch my knowledge from afar, and will ascribe righteousness to my maker.

more fully; for thou hast not yet heard all that God hath to say for himself by my mouth;

Ver. 3.] Which shall now, from the most sublime contemplations, assert the righteousness of my Maker.

4 For truly my words shall not be false : he that is perfect in knowledge is with thee.

5 Behold, God is mighty, and despiseth not any : he is mighty in strength and wisdom.

6 He preserveth not the life of the wicked : but giveth right to the poor.

7 He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous : but with kings are they on the throne ; yea, he doth establish them for ever, and they are exalted.

8 And if they be bound in fetters, and be holden in cords of affliction ;

9 Then he sheweth them their work, and their transgressions that they have exceeded.

10 He openeth also their ear to discipline, and commandeth that they return from iniquity.

11 If they obey and serve him, they shall spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasures.

12 But if they obey not, they shall perish by the sword, and they shall die without knowledge.

13 But the hypocrites in heart heap up wrath : they cry not when he bindeth them.

14 They die in youth, and their life is among the unclean.

Ver. 4.] For assure thyself I would not seek to baffle thee with sophistical arguments : he that discourses with thee is none of those subtle disputers, but loves sincere and solid reason.

Ver. 5.] Know then that God is most mighty, but despiseth not the meanest : the excellence of his power, and the greatness of his mind, will not suffer him to wrong any body.

Ver. 6.] When men are extremely wicked, and fit to be punished, he will let them live no longer ; but the poor at last shall recover their right, and be delivered out of their affliction.

Ver. 7.] For whatsoever affliction the righteous suffer, God never ceases to take a special care of them ; and sometimes raises them to the highest offices that kings can confer upon them : in which they are settled as long as they live, and exalted above the power of their enemies that would pull them down.

Ver. 8.] Or if they should fall into any trouble, which lies as heavy on them, and holds them fast, as if they were bound with chains and with cords ;

Ver. 9.] It is only to make them reflect upon their lives, and to show them their sins ; because they grow strong, and begin to prevail over them.

Ver. 10.] He disposeth them hereby to listen to instruction, and admonishes them to forsake their sins, and return to their duty.

Ver. 11.] And if they profit so much by their affliction, as to obey his counsel, and devoutly serve him, they shall regain their former splendour ; and pass the rest of their life in prosperity and pleasure.

Ver. 12.] But if they be disobedient, they shall be utterly cut off, and die in their folly.

Ver. 13.] And they that are false-hearted, do but heap up wrath to themselves by their counterfeit piety : which surprises them so suddenly, that it gives them no time so much as to cry to God, when his punishments seize on them.

Ver. 14.] They die before their time, in the flower of their age ; and perish like the impure Sodomites, with a hasty and unexpected destruction.

Ver. 15.] Whereas he delivers the poor humble

15 He delivereth the poor in his affliction, and openeth their ears in oppression.

16 Even so would he have removed thee out of the strait into a broad place, where there is no straitness ; and that which should be set on thy table, should be full of fatness.

17 But thou hast fulfilled the judgment of the wicked : judgment and justice take hold on thee.

18 Because there is wrath, beware lest he take thee away with his stroke : then a great ransom cannot deliver thee.

19 Will he esteem thy riches ? no, not gold, nor all the forces of strength.

20 Desire not the night, when people are cut off in their place.

21 Take heed, regard not iniquity : for this hast thou chosen rather than affliction.

22 Behold, God exalteth by his power : who teacheth like him ?

23 Who hath enjoined him his way ? or who can say, Thou hast wrought iniquity ?

24 Remember that thou magnify his work, which men behold.

25 Every man may see it ; man may behold it afar off.

26 Behold, God is great, and we know him man in his affliction ; and makes his oppression the means of giving him wholesome counsel :

Ver. 16.] Even so would he have rescued thee (if thou hadst humbly submitted to his correction) out of these miserable straits to which thou art reduced : and not only enlarged thee, but set thee so far from all danger of falling again into them, that peace and plenty should have been thy portion.

Ver. 17.] But thou hast maintained the cause of the wicked : and such as a man's cause is, such will the judgment of God be upon him.

Ver. 18.] And because God is angry with thee, take heed lest thou farther incense him to punish thee so heavily, that upon no terms he will deliver thee.

Ver. 19.] Dost thou think he will have any regard to thy riches ? no, not if thou hadst all the treasure and all the force which all the power on earth can muster up.

Ver. 20.] Do not dream that they can do thee any service ; nor entertain thyself with vain hopes, as thou art musing on thy bed in the night : when God sometimes destroys whole nations on a sudden.

Ver. 21.] But let thy sufferings teach thee caution, and make thee afraid to go on to provoke offended justice : for thou hast done it too much already, in choosing rather to accuse divine providence, than to submit patiently to his chastisements.

Ver. 22.] Consider the vast extent of God's power, which lifts men up as well as casts them down. What lord is there so absolute as he ! or who shall teach him how to govern his dominions ?

Ver. 23.] What visitor is there over him, to examine and take an account of his actions ? or who may presume to say, this or that is not well done ?

Ver. 24.] See that thou leave off this carping at his providence, and remember to extol and magnify it, as well as the wonderful fabric of the world, which men behold with admiration and praise.

Ver. 25.] All mankind contemplate it with astonishment : there are none so dull, but in the farthest parts of the earth they behold, if they open their eyes, the majesty of God ;

Ver. 26.] And must confess that he is great in wis-not, neither can the number of his years be searched out.

27 For he maketh small the drops of water : they pour down rain according to the vapour thereof.

28 Which the clouds do drop and distil upon man abundantly.

29 Also can any understand the spreadings of the clouds, or the noise of his tabernacle ?

dom and power, and cannot be comprehended by our shallow understandings ; which are presently confounded, when they enter into the search of his eternal being.

Ver. 27.] For it is he who dissolves the clouds into water, and doth not pour it down all at once ; but by small drops sweetly restores to the earth the vapour which was exhaled from thence :

Ver. 28.] For he hath made the clouds to be fluid bodies ; which distil their showers in so many places, that there are multitudes of spectators and admirers of this wonderful contrivance.

Ver. 29.] And can any one understand how he spreads those clouds, and makes them hang in the air, when they are full of water ? or give an account of the dreadful sounds which are heard from thence, and which tells us that he dwells in those celestial places ?

30 Behold, he spreadeth his light upon it, and covereth the bottom of the sea.

31 For by them judgeth he the people ; he giveth meat in abundance.

32 With clouds he covereth the light ; and commandeth it not to shine by the cloud that cometh betwixt.

33 The noise thereof sheweth concerning it, the cattle also concerning the vapour.

Ver. 30.] Observe also how he spreads the beams of the sun upon the sea, and covers it all over with light ; which raises new vapours and clouds in the room of those which are exhausted.

Ver. 31.] Which he uses for quite contrary ends : both to punish mankind by storms, and tempests, and floods, and to make a plentiful provision for them by fruitful showers.

Ver. 32.] By those clouds also he sometimes quite hideth the sun from us, that it cannot ripen the fruits ; and sometimes only intercepts its beams awhile, that it may not burn them up by immoderate heat.

Ver. 33.] The very cattle perceive the cloud as soon as it rises, and declare what God intends to do with it ; whether to turn it into storms and tempests, or into fruitful rain and showers.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

ARGUMENT.—Elihu continues his speech, which he had begun before, concerning the incomprehensible works of God : and limits himself chiefly, as he had in the foregoing chapter, to the wonders God doth in the clouds. To which, at last, he subjoins the amazing extent, brightness, and firmness of the sky ; in which the sun shines with a lustre which we are not able to behold. And thence concludes, that the splendour of the divine majesty is infinitely more dazzling, and that we must not pretend to give an account of his counsels.

1 At this also my heart trembleth, and is moved out of his place.

2 Hear attentively the noise of his voice, and the sound that goeth out of his mouth.

3 He directeth it under the whole heaven, and his lightning unto the ends of the earth.

4 After it a voice roareth : he thundereth with the voice of his excellency ; and he will not stay them when his voice is heard.

5 God thundereth marvellously with his voice ; great things doeth he, which we cannot comprehend.

6 For he saith to the snow, be thou on the earth ; likewise to the small rain, and to the great rain of his strength.

7 He sealeth up the hand of every man ; that all men may know his work.

8 Then the beasts go into dens, and remain in their places.

9 Out of the south cometh the whirlwind : and cold out of the north.

10 By the breath of God frost is given : and the breadth of the waters is straitened.

11 Also by watering he wearieth the thick cloud : he scattereth his bright cloud :

CHAP. XXXVII.

Ver. 1.] These are a few of the works of God ; and though there be innumerable more, yet this one single effect of his power strikes terror into me, and makes my heart tremble, as if it would leap out of my body, and leave me dead.

Ver. 2.] Hearken, I beseech you, seriously to the horrible noise which comes out of some of those clouds, and it will astonish you also. The smallest murmurs are so dreadful, that it may be fitly styled the voice of God, calling men to stand in awe of him.

Ver. 3.] It is heard far and near, for he darts it through the whole region of the air ; accompanied with his flashes of lightning, which shoot to the ends of the earth.

Ver. 4.] After them follow the claps of thunder, more terrible than the roarings of a lion : which grow louder and louder till they conclude in a violent rain, or hail, or tempest.

Ver. 5.] And he who thunders thus with his most wonderful voice, doth other great things which the wit of man cannot comprehend.

Ver. 6.] For in those clouds, which I have so often mentioned, he makes the snow, and commands it to cover the earth ; and on a sudden they turn into rain, which sometimes falls in gentle showers, and sometimes in impetuous spouts of water :

Ver. 7.] Which stop the labour of all those whose business is in the fields ; and make the husbandmen know that he disposes of them as he pleases.

Ver. 8.] The very beasts also are driven at that season into their lurking-places, and are forced to stay in their dens.

Ver. 9.] From one quarter of the heavens blow turbulent winds : and from the opposite quarter those cold blasts which clear and purify the air again.

Ver. 10.] By the like sharp blasts God sends the frost ; and binds up the waters so fast that they cannot flow.

Ver. 11.] In serene evenings also he presses the 12 And it is turned round about by his counsels : that they may do whatsoever he commandeth them upon the face of the world in the earth.

13 He causeth it to come, whether for correction, or for his land, or for mercy.

14 Hearken unto this, O Job : stand still, and consider the wondrous works of God.

15 Dost thou know when God disposed them, and caused the light of his cloud to shine ?

16 Dost thou know the balancing of the clouds, the wondrous works of him which is perfect in knowledge ?

17 How thy garments are warm, when he quieteth the earth by the south wind ?

18 Hast thou with him spread out the sky, cloud into drops of dew upon the earth ; or the dewy cloud, receiving the sunbeams, by a dispersed and various light, makes the beautiful rainbow in the heavens.

Ver. 12.] For it is turned about and whirled several ways, according to the orders of his wise counsel ; and so are all the rest that I have mentioned, which execute his commands upon the face of the whole earth.

Ver. 13.] Being sent either to bring a dearth, and to scourge our sins with plagues and pestilential diseases ; or to produce the wanted crop of the earth for the necessary sustenance of man and beast ; or to reward our obedience with extraordinary plenty, and very healthful seasons.

Ver. 14.] Listen diligently to these things, O Job ; do not dispute any more with God, but silently consider these his wonderful works.

Ver. 15.] Canst thou tell beforehand what orders God will give about them ? Art thou able to tell so much as when a rainbow will appear in the clouds ?

Ver. 16.] What canst thou tell us then of the hanging of the clouds in the air, as in an equal balance, and such-like stupendous works of his most absolute wisdom ?

Ver. 17.] Whence comes the violent heat which we sometimes feel ? or how do calms come out of the same quarter from whence comes whirlwinds ? (ver. 9).

Ver. 18.] Lift up thy thoughts still higher, and tell us, Didst thou join with him when he stretched out the sky, in which, as in a mirror, we behold the admirable power and wisdom of him, who, though it be so wide and vast, made it as firm as it is clear and bright ?

19 Teach us what we shall say unto him ; for we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness.

20 Shall it be told him that I speak ? if a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up.

21 And now men see not the bright light which is in the clouds : but the wind passeth, and cleanseth them.

22 Fair weather cometh out of the north : with God is terrible majesty.

23 Touching the Almighty, we cannot find him out : he is excellent in power, and in judgment, and in plenty of justice : he will not afflict.

24 Men do therefore fear him : he respecteth not any that are wise of heart.

Ver. 19.] Teach us (if thou art so well skilled) what we shall say to him of his power and wisdom ; for we must confess our ignorance is so great, that our thoughts are confounded when we attempt it.

Ver. 20.] Is any thing that I have said of him worth his hearing ! Whoever he be that goes about to describe him shall lose himself, and be dazzled with the brightness of his glory.

Ver. 21.] For, alas ! men are not able to look upon the brightness of the sun when it shines in the heavens, after a wind hath swept and cleansed them ;

Ver. 22.] And brought pure and serene weather out of the northern parts : how then shall they look upon God, whose majesty is most dreadful, and therefore not to be pried into with curiosity, but worshipped and praised with the humblest reverence !

Ver. 23.] For when we have done all we can, we must acknowledge, that the Almighty cannot be comprehended by our understanding : his power is so excellent, his judgment so exact, his justice so abundant, that he ought not to be questioned by us for what he doth ; but if he be, he will not give an account of his actions.

Ver. 24.] Which should make all men stand in awe of him, and lowly adore, rather than boldly dispute with him : for he despiseth all those who are wise in their own conceit.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—What Elihu had said concerning the divine majesty, in the twenty-second verse of the foregoing, God declares to be true, by a sensible demonstration, as I have expressed it in the first verse of this chapter. In which God himself appears as a judge (according to Job's repeated desires) to decide this great controversy. And taking up the argument begun by Elihu (who came nearest to the truth), and prosecuting it in inimitable words (excelling his and all other men's in the loftiness of the style, as much as thunder doth a whisper), he convinces Job of his ignorance and weakness, by showing him how little he understood of the most obvious things in this world. Intending from thence, at last, to infer, that he who found himself puzzled, when he went about to give an account of the meanest of God's visible works, should not presume to penetrate into his secret counsels, nor question his goodness, no more than he could his wisdom and power, though he knew not why he was afflicted. One instance had been sufficient to bring Job to a nonplus ; but he heaps up abundance, to humble him the more when he saw how much cause there was for it ; whether he considered the earth, or the heavens, the sea, or the sun, things contained in the bosom of the sea, or in the bowels of the earth, especially all the meteors (as we call them) which are formed in the clouds, and the constellations in the higher regions ; together with the beasts upon the earth, and the birds which fly in the air ; one of each of which he mentions in the end of this chapter.

1 THEN the LORD answered Job out of the whirlwind, and said,

2 Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge ?

3 Gird up now thy loins like a man ; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me.

4 Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth ? declare, if thou hast understanding.

5 Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest ? or who hath stretched the line upon it ?

6 Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened ? or who laid the corner-stone thereof ;

7 When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy ?

8 Or who shut up the sea with doors, when it brake forth, as if it had issued out of the womb ?

9 When I made the cloud the garment thereof, and thick darkness a swaddlingband for it,

10 And brake up for it my decreed place, and set bars and doors, 11 And said, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further : and here shall thy proud waves be stayed ?

12 Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days ; and caused the dayspring to know his place ;

13 That it might take hold of the ends of the earth, that the wicked might be shaken out of it ?

14 It is turned as clay to the seal ; and they stand as a garment.

15 And from the wicked their light is withholden, and the high arm shall be broken.

16 Hast thou entered into the springs of the sea ? or hast thou walked in the search of the depth ?

17 Have the gates of death been opened unto thee ? or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death ?

18 Hast thou perceived the breadth of the earth ? declare if thou knowest it all.

19 Where is the way where light dwelleth ? and as for darkness, where is the place thereof, 20 That thou shouldest take it to the bound thereof, and that thou shouldest know the paths to the house thereof ?

21 Knowest thou it, because thou wast then born ? or because the number of thy days is great ?

22 Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow ? or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail,

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Ver. 1.] No sooner had Elihu spoken these words, but there was a sensible token of the presence of that most dreadful majesty of God (xxxvii. 22) among them. For there arose an unusual cloud (after the manner of God's appearing in those days), and a voice came out of it, as loud as a tempest, which called to Job, saying,

Ver. 2.] Who is this that disparages my counsels with his ignorant discourses about them ?

Ver. 3.] If thou hast the courage to argue the case with me (as thou hast often desired), make thyself ready for the debate, and answer me the questions I shall ask thee.

Ver. 4.] Where wast thou when I founded the earth ? Speak, man, and relate how I went about that work, if thou art so skilful as thou pretendest.

Ver. 5.] How came it to have these dimensions ? (For thou, sure, who presumest to censure my providence, canst not be ignorant of such matters). After what manner was the line and the rule applied, to give it these exact proportions ?

Ver. 6.] Canst thou tell how it was fixed and settled upon its centre, or what it is that holds all the parts of it so firmly together ?

Ver. 7.] Where wast thou when the bright stars first appeared to proclaim my praise with one consent ; and all the angelical powers expressed their joy, but did not assist at the birth of the world ?

Ver. 8.] What midwife had the sea to bring it forth, when it burst out of the confused abyss, like an infant out of the womb ?

Ver. 9.] And I covered it with clouds as with a garment, and wrapped its boisterous waves in a thick mist, with as much ease as a nurse swaddles a newborn child ;

Ver. 10.] And laid it in that bed, which I had appointed to be broken up for it in the earth ? Where, though it be tossed to and fro, as an infant in a cradle, yet it keeps within its shores, which cannot be overturned ?

Ver. 11.] For I have fixed its bounds, and resolved, Thus far shalt thou flow, but no farther : these sands and these cliffs shall stop thy swelling waves, be they lifted up never so tempestuously.

Ver. 12.] Raise up thy thoughts still higher, and tell me, dost thou remember since the morning-light was made ? Or was it thou who ordered the sun, in what part of the heaven it should every day arise ?

Ver. 13.] And spread its beams to the ends of the earth ; that the wicked, who delight in works of darkness, may be detected and dragged to their deserved punishment ?

Ver. 14.] For they are daunted at its approach, and change colour as oft as the clay doth its form under different seals ; they are no more consistent with themselves than a changeable garment :

Ver. 15.] And at last lose the use of that light, which innocent persons enjoy with so much pleasure ; their insolent power, which in the night was so audacious, being broken in pieces in the morning.

Ver. 16.] O thou who adventured to enter into the abyss of my judgments, didst thou ever penetrate into the spring of the sea ? or hast thou perfectly discovered all that lies at the bottom of that great deep ?

Ver. 17.] Hath the earth opened all her dark caverns to thee ? or hast thou gone down to the very centre of it ?

Ver. 18.] Nay, dost thou so much as understand all that grows upon the surface of the earth ? show thy skill, if it be so comprehensive.

Ver. 19.] Tell me, which is the way that leads to the place where light takes up its dwelling when the sun goes down ? Or what becomes of the darkness when the sun rises again ?

Ver. 20.] Art thou able to go and bring either of them hither ? or to carry them back again away from hence, and prescribe them their limits at thy pleasure ?

Ver. 21.] Art thou acquainted with these things, because thou wast then born when I made them ? How comest thou to discourse so confidently of my government of mankind, who canst neither tell that thou shouldest be born, nor art able now to say when thou shalt die ?

Ver. 22.] And when wast thou in the clouds, to see how the snow or the hail is made in such abundance ;

23 Which I have reserved against the time of trouble, against the day of battle and war?

24 By what way is the light parted, which scattereth the east wind upon the earth?

25 Who hath divided a watercourse for the overflowing of waters, or a way for the lightning of thunder;

26 To cause it to rain on the earth, where no man is; on the wilderness, wherein there is no man;

27 To satisfy the desolate and waste ground; and to cause the bud of the tender herb to spring forth?

28 Hath the rain a father? or who hath begotten the drops of dew?

29 Out of whose womb came the ice? and the hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it?

30 The waters are hid as with a stone, and the face of the deep is frozen.

31 Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?

32 Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season? or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?

33 Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven? canst thou set the dominion thereof in the earth?

34 Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds, that abundance of waters may cover thee?

35 Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are?

36 Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts? or who hath given understanding to the heart?

37 Who can number the clouds in wisdom? or who can stay the bottles of heaven, 38 When the dust groweth into hardness, and the clods cleave fast together?

39 Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lion? or fill the appetite of the young lions, 40 When they couch in their dens? and abide in the covert to lie in wait?

41 Who provideth for the raven his food? when his young ones cry unto God, they wander for lack of meat.

Ver. 23.] That I need no other weapon than those, if I please to use them, for the destruction of mine enemies?

Ver. 24.] Art thou able to give an account how the light diffuses itself all over in an instant? or what makes the east wind blow so violently upon the earth?

Ver. 25.] Didst thou make a channel in heaven for the conveyance of overflowing showers? or open the way for the breaking out of lightning and thunder?

Ver. 26.] Is it by thy direction that these showers go, and fall upon the desert places, where there are no inhabitants to employ their art to provide them with water?

Ver. 27.] And that they satisfy the dry and rotten parts of the earth, where all the labour of man is unprofitable, without such plentiful rains to make them fruitful?

Ver. 28.] What is more common than the rain and the dew? but who is able to produce one drop of either?

Ver. 29.] In whose womb was the ice formed? or who can make so small a thing as the hoary frost?

Ver. 30.] Whence comes the cold that turns the waters into stone, and fetters the raging waves of the sea?

Ver. 31.] Canst thou forbid the sweet flowers to come forth when the seven stars arise in the spring? or open the earth for the husbandman's labour, when the winter season, at the rising of Orion, ties up their hands?

Ver. 32.] Is it by thy power that the rest of the stars, great and small, appear in the southern and the northern signs, in their proper seasons?

Ver. 33.] Dost thou understand the orders and the laws which I have established among the heavenly bodies? or couldest thou tell what to do, if it were referred to thee here on earth, to settle the government of them?

Ver. 34.] Let me see an instance of thy power and skill; lift up thy voice to the clouds, and command them to pour out abundance of waters upon the place where thou now art.

Ver. 35.] Or call to the lightnings, and bid them go whither thou hast a mind to send them? and let me hear them answer, Behold, we are ready to obey thee.

Ver. 36.] Didst thou give thyself understanding? how comes it then to be so small, that thou canst not tell how a thought is made?

Ver. 37.] Nor, with all the wisdom thou hast, so much as count the number of the clouds, whose showers thou art as unable to stop, as to make them run?

Ver. 38.] Though they have fallen so long, that the earth is abundantly satisfied, and fit for the plough or for the seed?

Ver. 39.] Or dost thou pretend to have great power upon earth, though none in heaven? wilt thou undertake then to provide food for a lion and all his whelps.

Ver. 40.] And that in a desert; where they lie lurking in their dens, and greedily watch for a prey in close and shady places?

Ver. 41.] Or, which is less, wilt thou take upon thee to feed the young ravens? who, expelled by the old ones out of their nest, complain to me of their cruelty, but know not where to get a bit of meat.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter continues the discourse begun in the latter end of the foregoing, concerning God's providence about beasts and birds: and to the two before mentioned he adds seven more. First, the wild goat, or hind, whose hard labour among the rocks God is wont to help and promote (as the Psalmist observes, XXIX. 9, and other authors agree) by a clap of thunder; the terror of which puts her into such an agony, that she presently excludes her young one, which sticks in the birth. Then he mentions the wild ass; and after that a tall creature in those countries called reem, which we render a unicorn; but Bochartus hath proved to be a two-horned goat, in Arabia, of great strength, with an erected head and ears. Of the rest I need say nothing here, they are so well known.

1 KNOWEST thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve?

2 Canst thou number the months that they fulfil? or knowest thou the time when they bring forth?

3 They bow themselves, they bring forth their young ones, they cast out their sorrows.

4 Their young ones are in good liking, they grow up with corn; they go forth, and return not unto them.

5 Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass?

6 Whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings.

7 He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver.

8 The range of the mountain is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing.

9 Will the unicorn be willing to serve thee, or abide by thy crib?

10 Canst thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow? or will he harrow the valleys after thee?

11 Wilt thou trust him, because his strength is great? or wilt thou leave thy labour to him?

CHAP. XXXIX.

Ver. 1.] Vain man, who wouldest so fain pry into my secrets! didst thou ever climb the rocks to see the wild goats bring forth? or hast thou assisted at the hard labour of the hinds, and helped to ease them of their burden.

Ver. 2.] Dost thou know the moment of their conception? or keepest an account when they will be delivered?

Ver. 3.] Hast thou seen how they bow themselves; with what pain they bring forth, and with how much difficulty they are freed from their sorrow?

Ver. 4.] And yet their young ones are lusty and strong; they grow up in the open fields; they leave their mothers, and return to them no more.

Ver. 5.] Was it thou that gave the wild ass his liberty, and made him so free from their servitude, in which you keep other creatures?

Ver. 6.] Who but I made that difference between him and them; and laying no burden on him, assigned him the wilderness and barren countries for his habitation?

Ver. 7.] Where he laughs at those that live in the tumult and bustle of cities; and hears none of the cries of him that drives other asses to their labour.

Ver. 8.] Nor is confined in small enclosures, but hath whole mountains to range in for his pasture: where he finds sufficient food to appease his hunger.

Ver. 9.] Go to the unicorn (thou who wouldest have all things conformable to thy will), and see if thou canst persuade him to serve thee: will he be content to be tied to thy crib all night?

Ver. 10.] Or submit his proud neck to thy yoke all day? Canst thou make him go to plough? or will he draw the harrow over thy land?

Ver. 11.] Wilt thou rely upon him (because his strength is great) to do all the rest of thy work in the field?

Ver. 12.] Or leave thy harvest out of doors, till thou hast prevailed with him to bring it home, and lay it in thy barn?

Ver. 13.] Have other birds any reason to complain that they are not so goodly as the ostrich! whose 12 Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy barn?

13 Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings and feathers unto the ostrich?

14 Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in the dust.

15 And forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them.

16 She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers: her labour is in vain without fear;

17 Because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding.

18 What time she lifteth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider.

19 Hast thou given the horse strength? hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?

20 Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper? the glory of his nostrils is terrible.

21 He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men.

22 He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted; neither turneth he back from the sword.

23 The quiver rattlenth against him, the glittering spear and the shield.

wing is triumphant, if it be compared with the wing and the feather of the stork;

Ver. 14.] But her inward qualities are not so beautiful as her plumes: for she doth not seek for solitary places wherein to lay her eggs; but drops them anywhere upon the ground, and negligently leaves them to be corrupted by the heat of the sand and of the sun.

Ver. 15.] She doth not secure them from the foot of travellers or of wild beasts; who frequently tread upon them and crush them in pieces;

Ver. 16.] But is hardened against the fruit of her own womb, as if it were not hers; and so she loses all her labour, because she hath no fear it may be lost.

Ver. 17.] For God hath not given her that wisdom which he hath bestowed upon other creatures; but made her of a stupid and careless nature.

Ver. 18.] Though he hath imparted so much as is necessary for her preservation: for when she raises herself, and lifts up her wings, she runs so fast, that she despises a man on horseback, who cannot overtake her.

Ver. 19.] And now I speak of the horse, let me ask thee again, Who was it that made him so much superior to other creatures in strength and in courage? didst thou give him his valiant spirit, or clothe his neck with such a stately mane?

Ver. 20.] Or put that vigour and mettle into him, which make him leap and bound in the air like a grasshopper? there is a majesty in his looks; and when he snorts vehemently, it is terrible.

Ver. 21.] He stamps impatiently on the ground, and breaks it up with his feet: he glories in his strength, and goes out boldly to meet the arms that oppose him.

Ver. 22.] He derides all the dreadful instruments of war, and cannot be dismayed by them: he runs upon naked swords;

Ver. 23.] And is not daunted at the noise of arrows which come whizzing by his ears, nor at the sharp points of spears and lances which are thrust at his breast.

24 He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage : neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet.

25 He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha ; and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting.

26 Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings towards the south ?

Ver. 24.] He makes the earth quake and tremble as he gallops over it, and rides abundance of ground in a moment : neither can he stand still, when he hears the sound of the trumpet :

Ver. 25.] But the louder it is, the more he neighs and dances for joy. He perceiveth the battle before it begins, by the thundering voice of the captains, and the shouting of the soldiers.

Ver. 26.] Behold, also, how the hawk mounts up aloft. Didst thou give her those swift wings ; or teach her, when the winter comes, to fly into the southern parts, that she may still enjoy the warmth of the sun ?

Ver. 27.] But what bird soars so high as the eagle ?

27 Doth the eagle mount up at thy command, and make her nest on high ?

28 She dwelleth and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock, and the strong place.

29 From thence she seeketh the prey, and her eyes behold afar off.

30 Her young ones also suck up blood : and where the slain are, there is she.

Is she beholden to thee for that strength which carries her into the clouds ? or was it by thy direction that she builds her nest quite out of all men's reach ?

Ver. 28.] She dwells on the top of high rocks ; in the steep and craggy rock, as in an inaccessible fortress, she settles her abode.

Ver. 29.] There she leaves her young ones safely, while she goes to provide them food ; from thence (so sharp is her sight) she spies her prey a vast way off.

Ver. 30.] Which when she hath seized and torn she brings to her nest, that they may suck its blood : she looks down to the very earth ; and where the carcasses lie, there may she be found.

CHAPTER XL.

ARGUMENT.—Job modestly declining to say one word in his own defence (though he was graciously invited by God to speak, if he had any plea remaining), is still more humbled by a plain declaration from the divine majesty, that Elihu had reason to prove him for his immoderate complaints (which some might look upon as an accusation of God's providence), and for maintaining his own righteousness so much, and God's righteousness so little, in the dispute he had had with his friends. Showing him withal, that he was not sensible enough of the infinite distance and inequality between him and God ; when he desired so vehemently to argue his case with him, that he forgot to make those submissions to the divine majesty, which had better become him. This disproportion is most lively represented and illustrated, by an admirable description of the strength of the behemoth, a word of Egyptian termination ; signifying, not the elephant (which seldom lies down, and never among reeds, as this doth, ver. 21, but a creature in that country, called by the Greek writers hippopotamus, i. e., river-horse. For it appears by the second book of Esdras, ch. vi. 49, that the Hebrews reckon behemoth, not among the land-creatures, but among those belonging to the water, which were created on the fifth day. And there is none, that we know, of that sort, to whom the characters here mentioned belong, but the creature now named.

1 MOREOVER the LORD answered Job, and said,

2 Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him ? he that reproveth God, let him answer it.

3 ¶ Then Job answered the LORD, and said,

4 Behold, I am vile ; what shall I answer thee ? I will lay my hand upon my mouth.

5 Once have I spoken ; but I will not answer : yea, twice ; but I will proceed no further.

CHAP. XL.

Ver. 1.] After a short silence, to see what Job would reply to this long discourse, the Lord proceeded, and said ;

Ver. 2.] Why dost thou not speak ? Hath not the Almighty brought arguments enough to convince thee ? Let him that will argue with God about his providence, first make an answer to these questions.

Ver. 3.] Then Job, whose confusion had made him silent, answered with great humility and said :

Ver. 4.] Behold, I am a wretched creature, and not worthy to speak unto thy majesty : nor do I know what to answer : and therefore I will hold my peace.

Ver. 5.] I have said too much already, in speaking only these two words to thee : but I have done ; I will add no more.

6 ¶ Then answered the LORD unto Job out of the whirlwind, and said,

7 Gird up thy loins now like a man : I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

8 Wilt thou also disannul my judgment ? wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous ?

9 Hast thou an arm like God ? or canst thou thunder with a voice like him ?

10 Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency ; and array thyself with glory and beauty.

Ver. 6.] Then the divine majesty spake again, after the same manner as before, saying,

Ver. 7.] What, hast thou (who desiredst so much to plead with me) lost thy courage ? pluck up thy spirit, man, and prepare thyself (as I said at first) to answer the questions I shall farther ask thee.

Ver. 8.] Is there any reason to suspect my care of mankind, who have shown it so much about other creatures ? Canst thou not defend thyself, but thou must also complain of me ! must I be condemned that thou mayest be justified ?

Ver. 9.] Who art thou, that talketh so much of thine own innocence, that thou forgettest to maintain my righteousness ? hast thou a power equal to mine ; or canst thou speak with a voice like this ; or imitate the thunder thou hearest in the clouds ?

Ver. 10.] Lift up thyself then ; and let me see thee

11 Cast abroad the rage of thy wrath : and behold every one that is proud, and abase him.

12 Look on every one that is proud, and bring him low ; and tread down the wicked in their place.

13 Hide them in the dust together ; and bind their faces in secret.

14 Then will I also confess unto thee that thine own right hand can save thee.

15 ¶ Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee ; he eateth grass as an ox.

16 Lo now, his strength is in his loins, and his force is in the navel of his belly.

17 He moveth his tail like a cedar : the sinews of his stones are wrapped together.

18 His bones are as strong pieces of brass ; his bones are like bars of iron.

appear in the highest majesty : put on thy robes, and show thyself in such royal state, that all may honour and reverence thy excellent greatness.

Ver. 11.] Let all thine adversaries round about thee (as becomes a mighty prince) feel the fierceness of thy wrath ; frown upon all the haughty, and make them hang down their heads.

Ver. 12.] Look, I say, upon every proud oppressor, and make him cringe and throw himself at thy feet : tread down all the wicked, wheresoever thou shalt find them.

Ver. 13.] Cast them all into one grave, that the world may be no more troubled with them : cover those faces with perpetual shame and confusion, which now bear themselves so high, and overlook all others.

Ver. 14.] When I see thee do such things as these, then will I myself also magnify thy power, and acknowledge that thou needest none of my help to deliver thee.

Ver. 15.] But consider awhile (if thou art not yet humble enough) a creature [Behemoth, i. e. river-horse,] which I have made in a country not far from thee : he lives among the fishes in the great river of Egypt, but he feeds upon the earth and eateth grass like an ox.

Ver. 16.] Consider, I say, the greatness of his strength, and the firmness of his flesh, not only in his loins, but even in the navel of his belly, where other creatures are wont to be weak and tender.

19 He is the chief of the ways of God : he that made him can make his sword to approach unto him.

20 Surely the mountains bring him forth food, where all the beasts of the field play.

21 He lieth under the shady trees, in the covert of the reed, and fens.

22 The shady trees cover him with their shadow ; the willows of the brook compass him about.

23 Behold, he drinketh up a river, and hasteth not : he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth.

24 He taketh it with his eyes : his nose pierceth through snares.

Ver. 17.] He hath a tail as thick and as stiff as a cedar, but he bends and throws it back at his pleasure : the nerves of his thighs are so many, that they are intricate and perplexed one within another.

Ver. 18.] His bones (for so they are rather than gristles) are as strong as bars of brass, and as hard and firm as rods of iron.

Ver. 19.] He is one of the principal works of God, a very singular instance of his power : he that made him hath fastened such crooked teeth in his jaws, exceeding sharp, that therewith he mows the grass and the corn as with a scythe.

Ver. 20.] For he goes in the night to graze upon the hills, in the company of the rest of the beasts of the field ; who sport themselves in those rich pastures :

Ver. 21.] But (in the day) he lies down in shady and close places, under the covert of the reeds, and in the fenny mud.

Ver. 22.] The bushy trees, which are there very numerous, afford him a shelter ; he is encompassed with the willows and the osiers, which grow in abundance on the banks of Nile.

Ver. 23.] Nay, behold, he dives to the very bottom of the river, and there takes his repose without fear : he will be secure though Jordan also should break out, and be poured upon his mouth.

Ver. 24.] Who dare come in his sight, or attempt to take him by open force ? Where is he that will undertake to fasten hooks in his nose ?

CHAPTER XLI.

ARGUMENT.—In this chapter another creature of vast bigness and strength is described, called in the Arabian language leviathan. By which we are not, in this place, to understand the whale ; because that fish is not armed with such scales as the leviathan is here said to have (ver. 15) : nor is impenetrable, as every body knows ; and, to say no more, never creeps upon the earth, which is part of the description of this leviathan (ver. 3). Whereby we are therefore to understand the crocodile (to whom every part of this description exactly belongs), a creature as big again as a man of the greatest stature, and in some places vastly greater : there having been crocodiles seen of twenty, nay, forty feet long ; and in some places of a hundred. To this fierce and untamable creature God sends Job, that he might learn more humility than to contend with his majesty, when he saw how unable he was to stand before one of his creatures. That use he himself teaches Job to make of this description (ver. 10—12.)

1 CANST thou draw out leviathan with a hook ? or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down ?

CHAP. XLI.

Ver. 1.] There is another creature also in the same river, which I would have thee consider ; and behold therein the divine power and human weakness. Canst thou catch the leviathan [crocodile] as you do other fishes ? Canst thou let down a line, and draw him out by the tongue with a hook ?

2 Canst thou put a hook into his nose ? or bore his jaw through with a thorn ?

Ver. 2.] When thou hast made a cord of the rushes of the river, canst thou put it about his nose ; canst thou strike an iron, as sharp as a thorn, into his jaw ?

3 Will he make many supplications unto thee? will he speak soft words unto thee?

4 Will he make a covenant with thee? wilt thou take him for a servant for ever?

5 Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?

6 Shall thy companions make a banquet of him? shall they part him among the merchants?

7 Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons? or his head with fish spears?

8 Lay thy hand upon him, remember the battle, do no more.

9 Behold, the hope of him is in vain: shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him?

10 None is so fierce that dare stir him up: who then is able to stand before me?

11 Who hath prevented me, that I should repay him? whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine.

12 I will not conceal his parts, nor his power, nor his comely proportion.

13 Who can discover the face of his garment? or who can come to him with his double bridle?

14 Who can open the doors of his face? his teeth are terrible round about.

16 His scales are his pride, shut up together as with a close seal.

16 One is so near to another, that no air can come between them.

17 They are joined one to another, they stick together, that they cannot be sundered.

18 By his neesings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning.

19 Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out.

20 Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething pot or caldron.

21 His breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth.

22 In his neck remaineth strength, and sorrow is turned into joy before him.

23 The flakes of his flesh are joined together: they are firm in themselves; they cannot be moved.

24 His heart is as firm as a stone; yea, as hard as a piece of the nether millstone.

25 When he raiseth up himself, the mighty are afraid: by reason of breakings they purify themselves.

26 The sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold: the spear, the dart, nor the habergeon.

Ver. 3.] Will he importune thy favour, and with many prayers beseech thee to spare him? will he sue for his liberty with submissive words, and speak thee fair to let him go?

Ver. 4.] Will he enter into bonds, and make a solemn covenant with thee, never to do thee hurt, but be thy slave, and serve thee for ever?

Ver. 5.] Wilt thou adventure to play with him, as with a sparrow? or tie him by the leg, for the sport and pastime of thy daughters?

Ver. 6.] Shall the society of fishermen make a feast for joy they have taken him, and sell their share in him among the merchants?

Ver. 7.] Where is the dart wherewith thou canst hope to penetrate his skin? or the fish-spear that is able to wound his head?

Ver. 8.] Go, and touch him, if thou darest: the battle will be soon ended; for thou shalt not do it the second time.

Ver. 9.] Mark what I say: he will be sorely disappointed that thinks to take him: for he will be ready to sink down with fear at the very sight of him.

Ver. 10.] Though he lie asleep on the shore, there is none so hardy as to dare to awake him. Who is he then that takes upon him to contend with me? If one of my creatures be so terrible, how dangerous is it to provoke my majesty?

Ver. 11.] And where is the man to whom I am a debtor? How came I, that made the whole world, to be obliged to thee, or any one else? Did you first begin to do me kindnesses, that I should owe you a requital?

Ver. 12.] What insolence is this to dispute with me, when thou art not able to stand before this single work of my hands? None of those limbs or joints I will conceal, nor forbear to speak of his strength, and of the comely disposition of all his parts.

Ver. 13.] And first take a view of his scaly skin, wherewith he is covered; who hath ever stripped him of that upper garment? or who dare come within his doubled snout?

Ver. 14.] Who will venture to open his wide jaws, and so much as look into his mouth, in which his long rows of teeth are very dreadful?

Ver. 15.] The scales of his back are like the plates of a shield, which I have provided for his defence: every one of them is closely compacted, and strictly sealed to the next.

Ver. 16.] They are knit so close, that the air, which presses into all things else, cannot come between them.

Ver. 17.] They cleave one to another, they hold so fast together that no art or violence can make a separation.

Ver. 18.] When he sneezeth, as he lies gaping in the sun, the spirits break forth with such a force that they seem to sparkle: and when he riseth up out of the river, his eyes appear before the rest of his body, as the morning light before the sun.

Ver. 19.] The steam also which then comes out of his mouth is as vehement as if it were full of burning torches; or there were a fire in him that sends forth sparks.

Ver. 20.] Out of his nostrils goes a smoke, like the reek of a seething-pot or a boiling caldron.

Ver. 21.] His breath is so hot, though he come out of the water, that it is sufficient to kindle coals; and may be called a flame, which issues out of his mouth.

Ver. 22.] His neck is exceeding strong, as if it were the very seat of strength: sadness and terror march before him, and seize on all those that meet him.

Ver. 23.] The muscles of his flesh are glued together; every one of them is compact and solid; they are not easily moved.

Ver. 24.] He is as far from fear as he is from pity: for his heart is as firm as a stone; as hard as an anvil, or a piece of the nether millstone.

Ver. 25.] But the stoutest hearts tremble when he lifts himself up above the water: they are seized with such a fright, that they are at their wits' end, and know not which way to turn themselves.

Ver. 26.] Though they assault him with the sword, it will do them no service; for the hardness of his skin will break it in pieces: the spear, also the dart and the javelin, are altogether as feeble, and cannot enter into him.

27 He esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood.

28 The arrow cannot make him flee : sling-stones are turned with him into stubble.

29 Darts are counted as stubble : he laugheth at the shaking of a spear.

30 Sharp stones are under him : he spreadeth sharp pointed things upon the mire.

Ver. 27.] All the other weapons of iron (which the wit of man can devise) he values no more than a straw ; and those of brass no more than rotten wood.

Ver. 28.] The arrow shot out of the strongest bow cannot make him flee : and these stones which are thrown out of a sling with so much force, move him no more than a little chaff.

Ver. 29.] Lay at him with heavy clubs, and he regards them no more than if they were stubble : shake the lance at him, and he contemns its most violent thrusts.

Ver. 30.] For instead of him it meets only with the rough shells wherewith he is armed ; which are so hard, that he beats back the sharpest weapon, and throws it into the mire.

Ver. 31.] When he tumbles about in the bottom of 31 He maketh the deep to boil like a pot : he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment.

32 He maketh a path to shine after him ; one would think the deep to be hoary.

33 Upon earth there is not his like, who is made without fear.

34 He beholdeth all high things : he is a king over all the children of pride.

the river, he raises bubbles on the top ; and the water of the lake is so troubled with the slimy mud which he stirreth up, that it looks like a pot of ointment.

Ver. 32.] When he swims, he makes furrows in the face of the deep ; and leaves a path behind him so covered with a froth and foam, that it looks as if it were grown old, and were full of grey hairs.

Ver. 33.] His fellow is not to be found upon the earth ; where he creeps indeed in the dust, but is so made that he cannot be trodden under foot and bruised.

Ver. 34.] No, though he lie so low, yet he despises the tallest beast ; and reigns over the oxen and camels, and all those creatures whose long legs raise them to the loftiest height ; whom he masters and rends in pieces at his pleasure.

CHAPTER XLII.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter concludes the book, with an account how Job completed the submission which he had begun before to make to God : whose pardon he sorrowfully begs : confessing and repenting of his fault : resigning himself entirely to be instructed by him : but resolving never hereafter to complain, nor to move any questions about his providence. This repentance God accepts : and for his sake grants a pardon also to his friends, whom he condemns as more faulty than Job. Who after this receives extraordinary marks of God's favour : and hath such an ample recompense made him for his losses, as may encourage all posterity to persevere in well-doing and patient suffering : believing steadfastly that nothing can be done or permitted by God, without much reason (whose wisdom shines so gloriously in all his works), and humbly expecting a comfortable issue out of all our troubles.

1 THEN Job answered the LORD, and said,
2 I know that thou canst do every thing, and that no thought can be withholden from thee.

3 Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge ? therefore have I uttered that I understood not ; things too wonderful for me, which I knew not.

4 Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak : I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

5 I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear : but now mine eye seeth thee.

6 Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.

7 ¶ And it was so, that after the LORD had spoken these words unto Job, the LORD said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends : for ye have not spoken of me, the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath.

CHAP. XLII.

Ver. 1.] These words so lively represented the power and wisdom of God in his works, that Job, seeing his error more clearly than ever, submitted himself unto the great Lord of all ; and said,

Ver. 2.] I am abundantly satisfied that thy power is as large as thy will ; and that nothing can hinder thee from effecting everything which thou designest : but as thou hadst reason to cast me down, so thou canst restore me and lift me up again.

Ver. 3.] I am sensible also of the justice of the reproof which thou hast given me (xxxviii. 2), and do confess I very much forgot myself, when I ventured to talk so ignorantly of thy wise administrations. It was that which made me so rash as to discourse of things far above my reach ; wonderful things, which I ought humbly to admire, not arrogantly censure.

Ver. 4.] Be not angry with me, I beseech thee, but graciously hear me speaking in thy own words. I do not pretend to give an account of thy wonderful works, and of thy providence ; and therefore ask me no more questions (xxxviii. 3), but let me learn of thee, and do thou instruct my ignorance.

Ver. 5.] Something I did know before of thy greatness, and mightiness, and wisdom ; but nothing so clearly as I do now, by this revelation and visible appearance of thy dreadful majesty.

Ver. 6.] Which touches me with a sensible displeasure against myself for my indecent complaints, and vehement expostulations, and eager desires to die, or to be delivered : I condemn them all (together with whatsoever I have spoken too boldly about thy government), and in the most sorrowful manner repent, that I have justified myself so much, and thee so little.

Ver. 7.] Which ingenuous confession pleased the Lord so much, that he did not chide Job any farther : but turning his voice to Eliphaz (his principal accu-

8 Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering; and my servant Job shall pray for you: for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job.

9 So Eliphaz the Temanite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite went, and did according as the Lord commanded them: the Lord also accepted Job.

10 And the Lord turned the captivity of Job, when he prayed for his friends: also the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before.

11 Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his sisters, and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house: and they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the Lord had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an earring of gold.

12 So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses.

13 He had also seven sons and three daughters.

14 And he called the name of the first, Jemima; and the name of the second, Kezia; and the name of the third, Keren-happuch.

15 And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job: and their father gave them inheritance among their brethren.

16 After this lived Job a hundred and forty years, and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations.

17 So Job died, being old and full of days.

ser), he said, I am angry with thee and with thy two friends: for you have made a perverse construction of the afflictions I sent upon Job; whom, notwithstanding all his errors, I acknowledge to be my servant, and to have spoken better of me than you have done.

Ver. 8.] And therefore take no less than seven bullocks, and as many rams, and carry them to my servant Job; whom I appoint to be your priest, to offer for you a burnt-offering, in token of my absolute dominion over all creatures. And that faithful servant of mine shall pray for you, and obtain your pardon: for I have a great love to him, and will be favourable to you for his sake. Do not fail to go about this, lest I inflict some grievous punishment upon you; because, as I said, you have made an ill representation of my providence, and repeated those things confidently which my servant Job showed you to be false.

Ver. 9.] So Eliphaz and his two companions submitted themselves also unto God, and went, as he commanded them, and desired Job to intercede for them. And the Lord heard his prayer, and was reconciled to them.

Ver. 10.] And at that very time when Job was performing this charitable office to his friends, the Lord was pleased to begin to restore to him all those things which had been taken away from him: and never ceased, till he had not only established him in his former splendour, but made him twice as rich as he was before.

Ver. 11.] All his kindred likewise, and his familiar acquaintance (whom his unusual affliction had estranged from him, xix. 3), when they heard of the wonders the Lord had done for him, came to visit him and feast with him: and after they had condoled his misery, and testified their sorrow for all that had befallen him, they congratulated his happy recovery; and, in token of their joy, every one of them presented him with a piece of money and a pendant of gold.

Ver. 12.] Thus the Lord impoverished this good man only to make him richer. For, instead of seven thousand sheep which he had before his troubles, he found he had fourteen thousand when they were ended; and for three thousand camels which were taken from him, the Lord gave him six thousand; and multiplied his yokes of oxen, which were but five hundred, into a thousand; and his she-asses in the same proportion.

Ver. 13.] His wife also became very fruitful, and brought him as many children as he had lost; seven sons and three daughters.

Ver. 14.] And to preserve the memory of so marvellous a deliverance (of which they were so many living monuments), he called the name of the first Jemima, that is, the day; because of the felicity wherein he now shone, after a sad night of affliction, wherein he had lain; and the second Kezia (a spice of an excellent smell), because God had healed his filthy stinking ulcers, which made even his wife refuse to come near him (xix. 17), and the last he called Keren-happuch, i. e. plenty restored, or a horn of varnish, because God had wiped away the tears which fouled his face (as he complains, xvi. 16).

Ver. 15.] The beauty also of these women proved as bright as their names; for there were none so amiable in all that country: and their father did not (as the manner was) endow them with a small portion of his goods, but (having a large estate, and a great affection to them) he made them coheirs with their brethren, in the inheritance which he left them.

Ver. 16.] After which glorious restitution of him and his family, his years were multiplied as well as his estate: for the Lord added almost an age and a half (no less than a hundred and forty years) to those he had lived before; so that he had the pleasure to see his children's children to the fourth generation.

Ver. 17.] And departed not out of the world till he was so fully satisfied, that he desired not to live any longer.

APPENDIX.

HERE ends the book of Job; whose short sufferings (for the space of twelve months, as the Hebrews reckon in Seder Olam) were recompensed with a very long life in great prosperity. If we could rely upon all their traditions, this might have been added to the paraphrase upon the last words, That the whole time of his life was two hundred and ten years. For in the Jerusalem Targum upon Exod. xii. 40, and in Bereschith Rabba upon Gen. xlii. 2, they make account that the Israelites stayed just so long in Egypt: and in the Chronicle forenamed, and in Bava Bathra, and other books, they tell us, that Job was born that very year when Jacob went with his family down thither to sojourn; and died that same year when they were delivered from thence by the hand of Moses. But this agrees neither with what other of their authors say, whom I mentioned in my preface; nor with the LXX. who, in the last verse but one in this book, insert this clause, "All the days of his life were two hundred and forty years."

This, indeed, might be easily reconciled with the account before mentioned, if we did but rectify their numbers in the beginning of that verse by the Hebrew truth, and cut off the thirty years which they have added to the true time that he lived after his recovery from his sickness; for then this passage also must be corrected, and instead of two hundred and forty we must set down two hundred and ten. Which we might also prove in this manner (out of Seder Olam, cap. 3) to be the right account of his age; because it is said (ver. 10 of the last chapter) that the Lord added to Job the double of what he had before; and therefore, if a hundred and forty years were added, he had seventy before, which in all make two hundred and ten. But it is not worth our while to trouble ourselves with such uncertainties; much less is it safe to rely upon any thing which is supported by no stronger authority than the Hebrew tradition: the vanity of which appears most notoriously in this, that Manasseh ben Israel saith (lib. i. De Resurrect. cap. ult.), it is evidently certain, by tradition, that the Mahometans at this day pay a great reverence to this holy man's sepulchre, and honour it at Constantinople with much religion and devotion; when all men that have any considerable acquaintance with other authors, besides those of their own nation (upon which the Hebrews dote), may easily know, that the Job whom the Turks honour was a captain of the Saracens, who was slain when they besieged that city, in the year of Christ 675.

It will be to better purpose if I take notice of an observation of theirs, which hath more certainty in it, because clearly founded upon the holy scriptures; which is, that Job was a prophet among the gentiles, and a prophet of very eminent quality and decree: who deserved to have been at least mentioned by Josephus in his book of Antiquities, where he hath not vouchsafed to name him; nay, to have been praised by the son of Sirach, in his catalogue of famous men (Ecclus. xlv. &c.), who were honoured in their generations, and were the glory of their times. But, according to the humour of the Jews, he magnifies only those of their own country, or such from whom they were directly descended: not considering, how much it was for their honour, that, by the care of their noble ancestors, the history of Job, and his excellent virtues, had been preserved: which he ought not therefore to have omitted, but to have celebrated him among the chief of those worthy persons, "by whom God wrought great glory; such as did bear rule in their kingdoms, men renowned for their power, giving counsel by their understanding, and declaring prophecies," &c. (Ecclus. xlv. 2, 3).

Nay, his friends deserved a short remembrance, who seem nothing inferior to the wise men among the Jews (though they mistook in the application of many excellent truths), but are acknowledged by themselves to have been prophets among the gentiles. And not without reason; for Eliphaz, we read (iv. 13, &c.), had night-visions, an apparition of an angel, and secret whispers, like the still small voice which Elijah heard (1 Kings xix. 12), which made R. Sol. Jarchi not fear to say, that the Shechinah was upon him. And Elihu, it is easy to discern, felt a divine power working in him mightily (xxxii. 8, 18, 19), which was not altogether a stranger, he shows (xxxiii. 15, 16), to other men; whom God in those days instructed by dreams, amongst other ways that he had of communicating his mind to them. But there was none equal to that wherein he made himself known to Job, who in three things seems to have had the pre-eminence among all the gentile prophets. First, in that God was pleased to speak to him aloud by a voice from heaven, xxxi. 1 (which the Jews call the bath col), and not merely in such silent whispers as he did to Eliphaz. Secondly, that this voice was attended with a notable token of a divine presence, from whence it came, viz. a whirlwind, which I take to have been something like that sound as of a rushing mighty wind, wherein the Holy Ghost came upon the day of Pentecost. And lastly, he saw likewise, in all probability, the appearance of some visible majesty (xlii. 5), suppose in a glorious cloud (as the LXX. seem to understand it, xxxviii. 1), or something like that which Moses beheld in the bush, when God first called unto him out of the midst of it (Exod. iii. 4).

Which need not at all puzzle our belief; when we consider that the church in those days was catholic, and not as yet confined to any one family or nation. God was pleased, indeed, to show an extraordinary grace to Abraham, in calling him out of his own country and father's house, where idolatry had taken a deep root, or had been long growing without any hope of amendment. For if we may give any credit to Kesszus, a Mahometan writer, or to Elmacinus, a Christian, they were infected with it in the days of Heber, who stoutly opposed it, but with so little effect, that though God sent a whirlwind, which threw down all their idols, and broke them in pieces, that false worship still prevailed. But this doth not warrant us to imagine that God utterly rejected and neglected all other people; to whom he revealed himself in a very familiar manner, and gave many demonstrations of his divine presence among them, till they corrupted themselves by such abominable idolatries, that they became altogether unprofitable, and unfit for the society of that Holy Spirit which oft-times moved them. Even among the Canaanites, into whose country God led Abraham, we find Melchisedec was then a priest of the most high God; a greater person than that prophet, and the minister of that oracle (some fancy) which Rebekah went to consult when she felt the twins struggling in her womb, Gen. xxv. 22. To whom I might add several others, if I had a mind to prolong this discourse.

And though the book before mentioned (Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 21) is pleased to say, that the Holy Ghost ceased to inspire men of any other nation, after the giving of the law; yet it is easy to show, that therein it contradicts even its own affirmation elsewhere, which is grounded on good reason, that Balaam was a prophet divinely moved among the Syrians in Mesopotamia. He was a man, indeed, of naughty affections, and inclined to superstition, but still had many illuminations and motions from the Most High: as appears, not only by his predictions, but by the express words of Moses, who says, "the Spirit of God came upon him," Numb. xxiv. 2. To which, if I should add his own testimony concerning himself, that he heard the words of God, and saw the vision of the Almighty, and that in an extraordinary manner, having his eyes open in his ecstasy, I see no reason why it should be rejected; especially since he declared at the first, when the princes of Midian importuned him to go with them, that he would be wholly guided by the Lord in the business; and when he was come to Balak, constantly went to meet the Lord, to ask him what he should say, and professed his care to speak what the Lord had put in his mouth (xxii. 8. xxiii. 3. 12. 15, &c.). These considerations, to which many more might be added, are sufficient to show, that there is little, if any, ground for the opinion of Theodoret; who resolves (Quest. 39. in Num.), that Balaam did not inquire of the true God, though the answer was given by him of whom he was ignorant, not by him whom he invoked: and that the conclusion of St. Basil (Epist. 80, ad Eustath.), or Greg. Nyssen (Lib. de Trinitate; it is uncertain whose work it is wherein we find it), is more remote from truth, who determines, that when the scripture saith he went to consult with God, we are thereby to understand the devil. For should we allow the word Elohim, or God, to be so equivocal, that it may be applied not only to other excellent things besides the Divinity, but to the devil himself (which is the foundation there laid for that conclusion), yet the word Jehovah or Lord is never so used; and Balaam always says that he would go and meet with him. And accordingly, the Lord is said to put a word in his mouth, even then when just before we read that God met him, xxiii. 4, 5. When it is most reasonable by God to understand the angel mentioned xxii. 35, whom the Lord employed to deliver his mind unto him.

All which I have said to show, that God did not quite desert the gentile world, as long as there were any considerable relics of the ancient religion remaining among them; and they did not only divert to fables, and deliver up themselves to the guidance of evil spirits, against the apparent testimony of the Holy Spirit of God; who spake to them by such good men as Job, in whose days those sinners were not only reprov'd, but punished also by the judges, who worshipped the sun, moon, and stars; which seems to have been the oldest idolatry of all other, as not only Maimonides, but Diodorus Siculus observes. And if they had listened to such instructions, and not suffered themselves to be led merely by sense, to which those heavenly bodies appeared in such an amazing brightness that struck with admiration (as the last named author speaks, they fancied them to be θεοί; αἰδιούς τε καὶ ἀνώτους, "both eternal and the first Gods"); we cannot conceive that they would have sunk so low, as to fall into image worship; which in Job's country doth not seem to have obtained in his days.

But the chiefest part of the wisdom of this prophet consisted in his piety; of which he proved a rare example, as I have said already; especially in adversity: wherein he behaved himself with such admirable virtue, that though the apostle to the Hebrews does not mention him among those who were famous for their faith (he not being of their race to whom the promises were made), yet St. James in the next epistle highly magnifies and applauds his patience. And not only propounds him, together with the prophets and holy men, "who had spoken to them in the name of the Lord" (ver. 10), as a pattern of well-doing, and contented suffering, to the Christian Hebrews; but numbers him among those blessed souls whose worthy deeds we praise, and whose happiness we admire (ver. 11); or rather he names him alone, as an example of a happy man; who endured more than we read of in ancient times, and in the end found the Lord so mercifully gracious and bountiful to him, that it may encourage all pious men to endure with such a wonderful submission as he did.

Who, when he lost his goods, his house, his children, his health, nay, was all over ulcerous, and in great pain; and, moreover, was solicited by his wife to speak irreverently, if not irreligiously, of God, and to deny his providence; and by his friends was upbraided as a hypocrite, nay, accused in their passion as a tyrannical oppressor; whereby they endeavoured to bereave him, as St. Ambrose observes (lib. i. De Interpel. cap. 4), of that great comfort in afflictions, culpa vacare, "to be conscious of no enormous crime," and to make him appear to himself as the author of his calamity; at which his inferiors mocked and scoffed, who had formerly had him in great veneration: nay, it exposed him to the scorn of those who were not worthy to be set with the dogs of his flock; so that he looked as if he had been deserted by God, and made an example of his heaviest displeasure: yet he bare all at the very first (when men are wont to be shaken, nay overthrown, by the sudden news of such dreadful disasters), not only with much resolution and resignation, but with hearty thanksgiving; and, through the whole course of his calamity, committed no error that I can discern, but what the indiscreet and uncharitable censures of his friends provoked him unto: which put him upon too frequent and long justifications of himself, and perplexed him extremely (which seems his greatest trouble), that he could not find out the reason why God afflicted him so severely.

But in the issue God revealed to him what it was fit for him to think in this matter also: and thereby hath given us such satisfaction in that great controversy, and difficult question about God's providence, as is nowhere to be met withal but in the gospel of Jesus Christ. Even prudent men, as St. Ambrose observes (lib. ii. De Interpellatione, cap. 1), 'n a book he hath written about Job, are apt to be extremely moved when they see the wicked abound with good things, and the just very much afflicted: and truly, says he, it is lubricus locus, "a slippery place," in which the saints have scarce been able to tread in the path of a true opinion, as we see in David, and Job, who maintained a long conflict with his three ancient friends who came to comfort him upon this subject. And God himself brought the dispute at last to such a conclusion, as may fully settle the minds of all those who meet with this book, and preserve them from being scandalized, or in the least offended, on such occasions. The Mahometans themselves seem to be fully satisfied, as we read in the Lives of the Fathers, written in the Arabian language by Kessæus; who brings in the Most High, speaking to Job's friends after this manner (Hotting. Hist. Orientalis, lib. i. cap. 3), "Do you not know that Job is a prophet of God, whom he hath chosen to his apostleship, and to whom he hath committed his inspiration? God would not have you think that he is angry with him; as you seem to gather from this afflicted state wherein he lies. For you know that God is wont to prove the prophets, the just, the martyrs, and other good men; wherein notwithstanding there is no indignation, or contempt of them, but honour rather with God most high."

Thus St. Chrysostom I find most elegantly represents him as a far more glorious spectacle when he sat on the dunghill, than the greatest prince, without his virtue, is when he sits upon a throne. "His ulcers (says he, Hom. v. ad Populum Antiochenum) were far more valuable in my account than all their precious stones. For what profit do we receive by them? What necessity, what want do they supply? But these ulcers of his are the comfort of all manner of heaviness that can seize upon us. You may know this to be true, if, when a man hath lost his genuine and only son, you show him a thousand jewels and precious stones, which give no comfort at all to his grief, nor in the least assuage his trouble and pain. But in this case, if you remember him of the wounds of Job, he presently finds some ease: when you ask him, saying, Why dost thou weep and lament, O man, on this fashion? Thou hast lost one son, but that blessed man lost all the children he had: and, together with that blow, received a stroke in his flesh, and sat naked in the dung, besmeared all over with the filth that ran out his wounds: in a deep consumption, which by little and little wasted that just, that true, that devout man, who abstained from all manner of evil, and had God himself for the witness of his virtue. If thou dost but speak these words, instantly thou extinguishest the heaviness of the mourner, and riddest him out of all his grief; and so the ulcers of that righteous man become more profitable to him than jewels.

"Do you therefore conceive now that you have that champion before your eyes; and that you see the dung and him sitting in it; a statue of gold, of diamonds, I am not able to say of what: for there is nothing so precious as to be worthy to be compared with that ulcerated body, whose sores shine more brightly than the beams of the sun; which enlighten only the eyes of the body, but these illuminate the eyes of the mind. They make us see, and they made the devil quite blind: for after he had given those wounds in his body, he fled and appeared no more. See here, beloved, how great the gain of affliction is! For when that righteous man was rich, and enjoyed his ease, the devil had something to say against him: though falsely, indeed, yet this he had to say; 'Doth Job serve God for naught!' But after he had stripped him naked, and made him a beggar, he had not a word to say; he durst not so much as open his mouth against him. When he was rich then he adventured to wrestle with him, and threatened to supplant him; but after he had made him poor, deprived him of all he had, and reduced him to the extremest grief and sorrow, he ran away, and durst not renew the assault. When his body was sound then he laid violent hands on him; but when he had filled it with wounds, he was routed and fled away vanquished. By this thou seest how much poverty may prove better than riches, weakness than health, temptation than ease and quiet, to those that are vigilant and watchful: who make a profit of all these; and by fighting grow more illustrious and courageous. Who ever saw, who ever heard, such noble combats?"

But there is none, that I have met withal, who represents him in such lively colours, as the great St. Basil; who, in a sermon of his (tom. i. Homil. xxiii. p. 565, &c. the latter part of which was occasioned by a lamentable fire, that happened near their church, and put it in danger), exhorts all the rich, who were untouched by the flames, to relieve their poor neighbours, whose goods were consumed in them; and then addressing himself to those, who had saved themselves, but nothing else, beseeches them, "Not to take their loss too heavily, nor to let their minds be disturbed; but to shake off the misty cloud of sorrow, and to strengthen their souls with such generous and manly thoughts, as might turn this accident into an occasion of crowns. For which end, he advises them to put themselves in mind of the constancy of Job; and to say to themselves, as he did, 'The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; as it seemed good to the Lord, so it is come to pass.' And by no means (says he) let any of you be moved with what hath happened, either to say, or think, there is no Providence which rules our affairs; or presume to accuse the dispensation and judgment of the Lord; but let him fix his eyes on that champion, and make him his counsellor, who will advise him to better thoughts.

"Let him recount in order all the agonies he endured, and then observe how bravely he came off; and how the devil threw all his darts at him in vain; not one of them giving him a deadly wound. First he set upon his goods, and endeavoured to overwhelm him with doleful news of various calamities, which came tumbling like the waves of the sea, one upon the neck of another; but all to no purpose, for the just man received them as a rock doth the fury of the tempest; turning the rage of the waves into froth, and standing itself immovable. He said not a word that we read of; he made no complaints of these disasters; or if he said anything, we may well presume, it was those decent and becoming words which we read in the conclusion, 'The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; as it pleased the Lord, so it is come to pass.' But he did not think any of those calamities that befell him to be worth his lamenting with his tears.

"Well, but there comes one afterward that tells him a most dismal story, of the death of all his children by the fall of the house wherein they were making merry. At this, it is true, he rent his garments; and it is the first expression of his grief that we meet withal, in compliance with the passions of nature, and to declare himself a most tender father. But he set some bounds to his grief, and adorned what had happened with those pious words, 'The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away,' &c. As if he should have said, I was called their father, as long as he that made me so pleased. But now he hath taken off this crown of children from my head, and it is not fit for me to contend and dispute with him about his own. Let that be which seemeth best to the Lord. He it was that formed them, I was but the instrument. Why should I, who am but a servant, foolishly complain of my master; and repine at that decree which I cannot alter?"

"With such words as these that righteous man wounded the devil; and, as one would say, shot a dart quite through his heart, which so enraged him, that, seeing him still a conqueror, he made an assault upon his body; which he turned into corruption, and made it become such a hag of worms, that from a throne it was cast upon a dunghill. And yet the good man remained immovable: and when his body was torn, preserved still the hidden treasure of piety in his soul, of which the devil could not rob him. And therefore, not knowing what to do more, he betook himself to his old stratagem; and instigating his wife to entertain irreligious and blasphemous thoughts, attempted that way to overthrow this champion. For she, tired with the long continuance of his calamities, came to him, and clapping her hands at what she beheld, upbraided him with these lamentable fruits of his piety, and rehearsing his former prosperity, and then pointing at this present misery, asked him, if this was the reward which he received from the Lord for all his sacrifices? With abundance of such-like words, which were enough to disturb the most composed, and subvert the most steady and resolved mind. I am a vagabond, said she, and am forced to crouch to others like a slave; I, who was a queen, am constrained to depend upon my servants for relief; I, who maintained many liberally, am now nourished myself out of other folks' charity. Adding, that it would be far better for him, to provoke his angry Creator, by impious words, to cut him off, than by an unprofitable patience thus to prolong both his and her misery.

"But he, more offended with these words than any of his former sufferings, with eyes full of indignation, looked upon her as an enemy, and asked what ailed her to talk thus like one of the foolish women? Lay aside, said he, these thoughts, and let me hear no more of this advice, which makes me appear to myself as if one half of me were wicked and irreligious. 'What, shall we receive good at the hands of the Lord, and shall we not suffer evil?' Remember all the past happiness thou hast enjoyed, and oppose better unto worse. No man's life is entirely and thoroughly happy. Τὸ οὐδ' αὐτὸς εὖ πράττειν, μόνου Θεοῦ, "To be always as well as we can wish, belongs to God alone." If thou art grieved at what is present, fetch thy comfort from what thou hast received before. Now thou weapest, but formerly thou didst laugh; now thou art poor, but there was a time when thou wantedst nothing. Then thou drankest of the pure fountain of life; be content, and drink now the more patiently of the troubled waters. Behold the rivers, their streams are not clear in all places; and our life thou knowest is like to one of them, which slides away continually, and is oftentimes full of waves, which come rolling one upon another: one part of this river is passed by, and another is running on its course. This part of it is gushing out from the fountain, and the next is ready to follow it as soon as it is gone. And thus we are all making great haste to the common sea; death, I mean, which swallows up all at last.

"If we receive good from the hands of the Lord, shall we not bear evil? Think of that again. Shall we go about to compel the Judge to afford us just the very same things for ever? Shall we presume to instruct our Lord and Master how he ought to conduct our life? He hath the power of his own decrees and orders as he pleases, so he appoints our portion for us. And we know that he is wise, and that he dispenses to his servants what is most profitable for them. Do not then curiously pry into the counsels and resolutions of thy Lord and Governor; only take in good part, and affectionately embrace, whatsoever is ordered by his wisdom. Love his administration; and whatsoever he is pleased to give, receive it with pleasure. Demonstrate now in a sorrowful condition, that thou wast worthy of all the joy which thou hadst formerly in a better.

"Thus Job discoursing, he baffled the devil once more; and gave him such a repulse, that he made him perfectly ashamed to see himself thus vanquished. And what ensued after this? why, when the devil was beaten, his disease fled away too, having assaulted him in vain, and got no ground of him. His flesh began to recover into a second youth; he flourished also in his estate, which was restored to him with increase. For riches flowed so plentifully into his house, that they were double to what he had before: first, that he might be no loser by his affliction; and, secondly, that he might have a merciful reward of his patience under it. Therefore it was that his horses, mules, and camels, and sheep, and all the rest of his revenue, were doubled, only his children were no more than equal to the number he had before, seven sons and three daughters. The reason was because his beasts, indeed, perished entirely; but the better part of his children still survived, when they were taken from him. And therefore being again adorned with as many sons and daughters as formerly he enjoyed, he had a double portion of them also; those who are present with him here, and those who expected him in the other world. Behold then what good things this just man, Job, heaped up to himself, by his patient submission to God. And do thou, therefore, if thou hast suffered grievously in this fire, which the malice of the devil kindled, bear it constantly, and lenify the affliction with these better thoughts; according to that which is written, 'Cast all thy care upon the Lord, and he will sustain thee.'"

To this purpose that great person, St. Basil, discourses, when he represents how Job received the first assaults of his affliction, and how happily it ended. And there is great reason to think that he did not, in the progress of it, swerve from those good beginnings, which had so blessed a conclusion; but whatsoever expressions fell from him, when he was engaged in the heat of disputation, he still preserved such a religious temper of mind, as made him not cease to submit himself reverently to God's will, and to thank him for all the benefits he had formerly received from his bounty. Nor do I find any cause for the censures which Maimonides (More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 23. and out of him Manasseh ben Israel, lib. i. De Resurrectione, cap. 16) hath passed upon the disputation between him and his friends, about divine providence, which he hath thus stated:

"Job (saith he) maintains that mankind is so vile a sort of being, that God doth not regard the best of them any more than he doth the worst; but it is all one to him, when a calamity comes, whether it light upon the offenders, or upon the innocent. Nay, more than this, he affirms that there is no expectation after death, and consequently no hope remaining for him." Which are such blasphemies, that Maimonides is fain to seek excuses for him; and for that end, alleges a common saying among their wise men, that "A man is not apprehended, or seized on, because of his grief;" that is, what he says in extremity of pain is not imputed to him for sin. But there is no need of this apology; for the places he alleges do not prove him guilty of uttering such things, as (to speak in his words) are evil in the highest degree. Though Manasseh ben Israel is so presumptuous, as to charge him with such a profane denial of divine providence, at least here below the moon, that he makes him impute all his misery to the malignant aspect of the planets, under which he was conceived and born.

To which opinion of Job, say they, every one of his friends opposed a particular opinion of his own, differing each of them from the other. And, first, Eliphaz endeavours to establish this for a certain truth, "That as afflictions do not come by chance, but by the providence of God, so they are sent for the sins of men;" and therefore, without all doubt, Job was a great offender, which was the cause he was handled in this manner. "This opinion (says Maimonides) he held to the last; only was fain to add, in conclusion, that all the ways whereby we deserve punishment do not appear."

Then after him (when Job had argued against this) comes Bildad, who produces a new opinion, grounded upon the doctrine of permutation, or recompense, as they speak; that is, "He believed the evils which Job endured here, should, if he proved innocent, be changed into good things; and, in the issue, be highly serviceable to him in another world."

After whom succeeds Zophar, with a different resolution from all these; which was, "That God acts according to his own pleasure, and that we are not to search for any cause of his actions out of his own will; nor to say, why doth he this, and not that? In short, we are not to seek the way of equity, and the decree of wisdom in his doings; for it necessarily belongs to his essence that he do what he will; and our understanding is too shallow to comprehend the secrets of his wisdom, whose right and property it is that he may do according to his pleasure, and for no other cause."

And these four opinions about providence, Maimonides undertakes to show have had their several assertors since, who have propagated them among their scholars. Job's opinion, he saith, is the same with Aristotle's, who attributed all to accident. Bildad was followed by the sect of Mutazali (a kind of pharisees among the Ishmaelites), who ascribed all to wisdom. Zophar, by the sect of Assaria, who attributed all to will and pleasure. And Eliphaz, he fancies, held the opinion of the law; which is, that God deals with men according to their works.

But when that all these men had disputed, nothing moved Job, there stands up another, whose name was Elihu, "who first proves the providence of God from prophetic dreams (xxxiii. 15), and to those things which Eliphaz had said, adds, according to the imagination of Manasseh ben Israel, the doctrine of the transmigration of souls (which he labours to find in ver. 14), and thereby, in a wonderful way, says he, resolves all the doubt, by determining that Job, and other just men, may be punished for sins which they committed in a former body."

But as there is no footstep, that I can see, for this fond conceit, which he honours with the name of a mystery; so it is evident that these men follow their own vain inventions in all this discourse, directly contrary to the book itself. For they make Job's opinion the very worst of all the rest; when the Lord himself tells Eliphaz, in the conclusion of the book (xlii. 7), that he was angry with him and his two other friends, because they had not spoken of him so rightly as Job had. And it doth not appear by their speeches, that they held several opinions about providence and took every one of them a different way (that is a mere rabbinical subtlety) to solve the doubt, wherein Job's unusual sufferings had perplexed them.

But they seem to have harped all of them upon one and the same string, as I have represented in the arguments before each chapter.

From whence the conclusion of Maimonides will be very evident (which is the best thing he says), that "The scope of the book is, to establish the great article of providence; and thereby to preserve us from error, in thinking that God's knowledge is like our knowledge,—or his intention, providence, and government like our intention, providence, and government. Which foundation being laid, nothing will seem hard to a man whatsoever happens: nor will he fall into dubious thoughts concerning God, whether he knows what is befallen us or not, and whether he takes any care of us. But rather he will be inflamed the more vehemently in the love of God; as it is said in the end of this prophecy, 'Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.' So say our wise men, 'They that act out of love, will rejoice in chastisements.'"

DAILY PRAYERS OF THE CHURCH,

THE AUTHOR DEDICATETH THIS

PARAPHRASE OF THE BOOK OF PSALMS:

Wishing them increase of grace and comfort, by "singing praises unto God with understanding" (Ps. xlvii. 7).

PREFACE.

THE work itself proves so long, that I must make the preface the shorter; which shall be confined to these two heads: First, A brief account of the Book of Psalms; Secondly, of my paraphrase upon it.

I. For the first, The book is a most admirable piece of poetry, which moves more powerfully, and touches the mind more sensibly, than sentences in prose; especially when it is in such perfection as we find it in these divine inspirations.—For, as Melancthon truly speaks, this is the most elegant work extant in the world; and hath performed that, I may add, which Plato himself wished for, but confessed was above the reach of mere men. There was no more efficacious way, that philosopher clearly saw, of instructing youth, than by odes and songs; about which he discourses at large, and gives a great many cautions in his second book of Laws; but, after all, concludes at last (p. 657, edit. Serran.) τοῦτο δὲ θεοῦ, ἢ δαίμονος τινός, ἂν εἴη. "This must be the work of God, or of some divine man:" wherein he plainly acknowledges the defect of their institution (though certain poems were pretended then to have been anciently made by their goddess Isis,) and marvellously justifies the Hebrew discipline, who taught their children or scholars by hymns.

Which Moses, the man of God, began to compose (Exod. xv. Deut. xxxii.), and other inspired persons afterward imitated (Judges v. 1 Sam. ii.), but was brought to perfection by David; who, as he was an admirable artist in music (1 Sam. xvi. 18), and himself invented some musical instruments, as we learn from the prophet Amos, vi. 5, so was an incomparable poet (2 Sam. xxiii. 1, 2), and took all occasions to exercise this faculty, not on such low subjects as those to which it is commonly debased, but in abundance of divine meditations, which are gathered together in this book; wherein he calls upon them to listen unto him, saying, "Come, ye children, hearken unto me, and I will teach you the fear of the Lord" (Ps. xxxiv. 11).

It is called, in their language, Sepher Tehillem, The Book of Psalms or Hymns; i. e. Praises of the Lord: because, though there are many complaints, and imprecations, and prayers in it, yet the greatest part are praises or thanksgivings unto God: and in those other, there are many mixtures of acknowledgments what God had formerly done for him, or of confidence what he would still do, or of resolutions how thankful he would be when God granted him deliverance. Which gave them such a strange power "to cure heaviness, to extirpate grief, to wipe away sorrow, to lay asleep troublesome thoughts and passions, to ease us of our cares, to recreate those who are oppressed with any sort of pains (they are the words of Proclus, Archbishop of Constantinople, Serm. de Incarn. Dom.), as well as to move compunction for sin, and to stimulate unto piety;" that no book in the world is to be compared with it for these purposes.

And as it is called the Book of Psalms, or Praises, from the major part, so they are called David's Psalms, because he made the most of them; though it must be confessed there were several other authors, by whom some of them were composed.

In the Hebrew they are divided, like Moses's law, into five books, as I shall show in due place, and so may be called a second Pentateuch: which seem to have been collected by several persons (as will appear in the preface to each of them); for no other reason but that can be given why all that belong to one subject were not put together; or, at least, all those composed by David placed by themselves, and not so mixed as they are with those made by other authors.

Some think they were gathered together by the friends of Hezekiah, before the captivity. But if they had been so, they would, in all probability, have been disposed in such order as they were penned; all the sacred books being preserved in the temple, as Josephus witnesses (Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 1), with great care; from whence they might have taken the copies of them, with the names of all their authors, which now, in many of them, are wanting. Which makes it more likely that, after the temple and the sacred records were burnt by the king of Babylon's army, some pious persons collected as many as they could find, by inquiring among their friends, in those good men's hands who had transcribed them heretofore for their own private use, every one as he had most need. For the songs of Zion the people were very well acquainted withal, though it lay desolate, as it appears by the hundred and thirty-seventh Psalm, where the Babylonians desire to hear one of them sung by the mournful captives.—Who preserved them, no doubt, to their comfort in that sad condition, and added to them such as were made by divine men, during its continuance, and after their return from captivity.

When, as St. Athanasius (tom. ii. p. 86) resolves in his Synopsis (following the Hebrew tradition), Ezra put them together in one volume, as we now have them, which is not affirmed without reason: for we find that the foundation of the second temple was no sooner laid, but Ezra (as the Hebrews call him) restored the ancient custom of psalmody, or singing psalms of praise (Ezra iii. 10, 11), which David had appointed to accompany the sacrifices as soon as the ark was settled (1 Chron. vi. 31, xvi. 17; Eccles. 1. 15, 16, &c.) and which Solomon continued after he had built the temple, and brought the ark into it (2 Chron. v. 12, 13).

Now, when all those bloody sacrifices were abolished, by the offering which Christ made of himself, the sacrifice of praise alone remained, as the principal service of the christian church; several persons being inspired, not only to pray divinely, but to prophesy also, or to sing psalms and hymns of praise; as we read in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, xi. 5, xiv. 15. 26. And in the book of the Revelations, we find the apostles and elders thus employed, Rev. iv. 9—11, in which the people bare a part; as we learn from the next chapter, v. 9, 13, xiv. 1—3. So that St. Austin might tell Januarius (Epist. cxix. cap. 18), that "concerning singing hymns and psalms, we have instructions, and examples, and precepts, both of our Lord himself, and of his apostles." According to which, the churches of Africa sang divina cantica prophetarum, "the divine songs of the prophets," while the drunken Donatists sang the composes of human wit. Nor can I see, saith he, what Christians can do more profitably, and more holily than this, when they meet together, and are not reading, preaching, or praying.

Those divina cantica, no doubt, were principally the Psalms of David, in singing of which Christian people delighted above all other exercises of devotion.

The manner of their singing, also, was like that in Ezra's time (Ezra iii. 11); one beginning the hymn, and the rest answering the τὰ ἀποσπείρια, "extremes, or last words of it," as the author of the Apostolical Constitutions tells us (lib. ii. cap. 57), which Eusebius calls the Ἀποσπείρια τῶν ὕμνων, "the last part of the hymns," which he expressly says were sung by the whole company, who hearkened in silence to him that sang the rest, till he came to the close, which they all repeated together (lib. ii. Eccles. Hist. cap. 17). And when that manner of singing the Psalms, which we now use in our choirs, was brought in by Flavianus and Diodorus, who at Antioch divided the choir into two parts (singing the Psalms of David ἐκ διαδοχῆς, alternately, one verse by this half of the choir, and the next by the other), it thence spread itself, as it were by a joint consent, all the world over. Thus Theodoret informs us in his Eccles. Hist. book ii. ch. 19.

By which means the people came to be so well acquainted with them, that (as the same Theodoret tells us in his preface to this book of Psalms) both in city and country this was the employment of Christian people. They that minded no other book of the scriptures, yet had this so by heart, that both in their houses, and in the streets, and in the highways, they were wont to recreate themselves with the singing of these holy songs.

But I must not enlarge any further on this subject, nor fill this preface with the high commendations which the ancients give both of psalmody and of this book of Psalms; which St. Basil (who alone would furnish me with the sense of all the rest, if it were fit to transcribe his preface to it) calls the "common treasure of all good precepts" (containing the perfections of all the rest of the scriptures), ἐκκλησίας φωνή, "the voice of the church," in which may be found θεολογία τέλεια, "a complete body of theology."

Which will make this paraphrase, I hope, the more acceptable; of which it is time now that I give an account.

II. There being two ways of paraphrasing—one which keeps to the metaphors, and pursues them in more words of the like kind; another which puts those borrowed forms of speech into proper and common expressions,—I have chosen the latter, and endeavoured, by giving a clear interpretation, and expressing as well as I could the true force and just value of every phrase, to make the original words plain and easy in our language; as may be seen particularly, xviii. 2, xix. 8, 9. In which endeavour, it is likely, I may sometimes meet with the censures of those who do not consider the import of the Hebrew words; but not be thought much faulty, I hope, by such as can and will consult them; for they will find I have carefully weighed them, and taken some pains rightly to expound them; not largely, nor making discourses upon them, but in a few words representing the mind and spirit of the psalmist in his own way, which is devotion. And where there are two senses of which a word is capable, they will find likewise that I have endeavoured to express them both, if the matter would bear it. As, for example (to name one place for all) in Ps. cxix. 126, where we read, "It is time for thee, O Lord, to work: for they have made void thy law:" I have expounded it thus, "It is time to work to the Lord," or "for the Lord," &c.; because all the ancient interpreters, except one, have so understood it; yet I have not neglected the other sense, which we follow, but made them agree well together. I have preferred, indeed, the first interpretation, not only for the reason now named, but because the words run most currently so in the Hebrew: and the best of the Jews have expounded them in that manner. Maimonides, for instance, who says this was one argument that moved him to write his famous book, called More Nevochim; which some might account an audacious attempt, because never undertaken, he saith (Præfat. pag. penult.), by any of their nation since this long captivity (as he calls it); but he supported himself with this principle—that it is said concerning such sort of matters, "It is time to do something for the Lord: they having made void thy law." And in like manner, David Ganz, in his Chronology, says (ad an. 3978), that R. Judah Hakodesh, observing their oral law, or traditional religion, in danger to be lost, set it down in writing, though there was a prohibition against it: for כסדר על הבתור the rabbi relied upon this scripture (thinking it would bear him out), "It is time to work to the Lord," &c. which he expounded to this sense; Now that the law by word of mouth is like to be forgotten, and utterly lost, there must be something extraordinary done to uphold it; and so he wrote the Mishna.

I have sometimes also followed Theodoret in the explication of some phrases; which I think good to signify, that none may be too forward to censure that for which I have a good authority at least, if not a weighty reason. As, for example, Ps. lxxxix. ver. 13. I have grounded my paraphrase upon his notion, That as the hand of God denotes the divine energy, so his right hand signifies his energy for good; and therefore, they then needing a double energy, the psalmist remembers both his hand and his right hand; desiring to see their enemies destroyed and themselves delivered.

And if the readers will please to take the pains to compare the text with the references I have made (and enclosed) in the paraphrase to other scriptures, they will easily see (especially if they have any understanding in the original language) that I have not followed my own fancy in my interpretation, but had good reason for expounding the text as I have done in such places; and that this paraphrase may serve, in many places, instead of a larger commentary upon the words. As, for example, Ps. cxlvii. 19, his words, I think, plainly relate to the ten words spoken on mount Sinai, as I might have shown if I intended to write annotations.

Which if I had undertaken, it would not, perhaps, have been wholly a superfluous labour; but I might have produced something new, as I think I have done in this paraphrase; else I should not have attempted it, especially after such an excellent person as Dr. Hammond. For therein I have interpreted some phrases otherwise than they have been understood; of which I think good here to give one example. The son of man and the sons of men (ben Adam and bene isch) are phrases which often occur; which I have good ground to think belong in the scripture language to princes; and sometimes the greatest of princes. So I have expounded that known place, Ps. lxxx. 17, "the man of thy right hand, the son of man, whom thou madest strong for thyself;" and Ps. iv. 2, "O ye sons of men," i. e. rulers of people; and viii. 3, "What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man (i. e. the greatest of men), that thou visitest him?" cxlvi. 3. "Put not your confidence in princes, nor in the son of man (how great a prince, that is, soever he may be, though of never such dignity and power), in whom there is no help."

And thus the counsellors of Saul are called "the sons of men," lviii. 1, and so I understand those words in Isa. li. 12, "Who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the son of man (that is, a prince), who shall be as grass?" where, upon the words that go before, "I am he that comforteth you," Theodoret hath this note: "I am he that cast Pharaoh and his army into the sea; he who killed many thousands of the Assyrians by one angel." From which I conclude, that he understood the following words thus: Why dost thou then fear any man, though he be never so great a tyrant, and armed with never so much power ! as the king of Babylon then was, whom he calls an oppressor presently after, who carried them captive from their own land.

Thus, in the title of the ninth Psalm, the Septuagint, for labben read τῷ νόῳ; and so do Symmachus Aquila and Theodoret, as Theodoret there observes : the former of whom makes it a triumphal song for the death of that son ; which most interpreters, as I have there observed, conclude to have been that great man Goliath. The original of which language, I conceive, is to be fetched from the common manner of speech among the Hebrews, who call the chief of any kind by the name of the whole kind. As they call man creature, Mark xvi. 15, because the prime creature here below : so a king, or eminent person, they call the son of man, because the prime among the sons of men. Thus St. Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 13, calls magistrates human creatures ; where the Syriac translates sons of men, i. e. great men, or governors. And so man is used, Gen. ix. 6, for a man in authority. But all this is to be understood of that expression, ben Adam ; as for ben Enosh, which we also render son of man (Ps. cxlv. 3), it hath another signification, importing the wretchedness of any man's condition. And if that had been the name whereby the angel salutes Ezekiel, it might have been to put him in mind of his mean condition, though conversing with heavenly ministers ; but he constantly calling him ben Adam, I see no reason why we should not think it denotes him to be a great man, highly esteemed by God, and appointed by him to judge and pass sentence upon his people (Ezek. xx. 4). And, in like manner, Daniel is called son of man, Dan. viii. 17, who in the next chapters hath the title of a "man greatly beloved" (ix. 23. x. 11).

And, by the way, I may observe, that from hence we may learn what to understand by that title which our blessed Saviour so often gives himself, of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, "the Son of man," or rather "that Son of man ;" that is, the Messiah, the Lord's anointed, that great Prince God promised to bless them withal. It can have no other meaning in John v. 22, 27 (where he saith, God hath committed all judgment unto him, and given him authority to execute it, because he is the Son, or that Son, of man) than this ; that he is that great person whom God designed to be the Lord and governor of all things. So he appeared to be when he sent the Holy Ghost ; which seems to be called "the coming of the Son of man," Matt. x. 23, where he says, they "shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of man come ;" by the power, that is, of the Holy Ghost, to enable them, and give them authority, to go and preach him in all other countries, as well as there, to be the great lord of all.

But instead of such annotations as these, which the world is already well furnished withal (particularly by the learned Dr. Hammond upon this book), I have only, in the argument to each Psalm, given a brief account now and then of some difficulties ; and both there, and in the paraphrase itself, pointed to such parts of the history of David, or others, as I thought the Psalms have a respect unto. Which I have followed so closely as to wave other expositions, when I thought I saw clear warrant to accommodate them to that. For in my judgment (to use the words of that good man Musculus, upon the hundred and thirty-second Psalm, ver. 9), "It is the duty of every pious person, as much as he is able, to prefer that exposition which is approved by most testimonies of the holy scriptures, before all others whatsoever, though in show and appearance never so plausible."

For this reason I have forborne a great many mystical and allegorical senses of the words, and rather adhered to the literal meaning, though accounted trivial and vulgar by many men ; who had rather indulge to their own fancies, than be at the pains of making a diligent inquiry after the truth. For, whatsoever is pretended, it is not the easiness and meanness of the literal sense which have made it be despised, and been the cause of allegorizing the scriptures ; but the great difficulty and labour that are required to the finding of it out in many places. St. Jerome and St. Austin confess as much, who spent their younger years in mystical interpretations, as more easy studies ; but when they grew old, applied themselves to historical explanations. Which St. Jerome, in his preface to the prophet Obadiah, confesses he did not understand when he wrote upon that book in his youth ; and in plain terms ingenuously acknowledges those mystical expositions were the work, puerilis ingenii, "of his childish wit," at which he blushed and hung down his head, even when others cried them up to the skies ; but the historical explanations (which then he set out), the work maturæ senectutis, "of his mature age ;" when he had at least profited thus far, as to know, with Socrates, that he was ignorant. In short, he begins that preface with the words of the apostle. "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child ; but when I became a man, I put away childish things ;" and hopes this would excuse him for interpreting that prophet allegorically in the heat of his youth, whose history he did not know. St. Austin acknowledges as much, in his first volume of Retractions, ch. 18, which I will not transcribe, but only set down the words of Martin Bucer, one of the first reformers, upon the sixth of St. Matthew ; where he says, that "it would be worth a great deal to the church, if, forsaking allegories and other frivolous devices, which are not only empty, but derogate very much from the majesty of the doctrine of Christ, we would all simply and soberly prosecute that which our Lord intends to say to us."

This hath been my rule, though I have not so followed (I must add) the strict literal sense as to make a mere Judaical paraphrase (which Theodoret complains, in his preface to this book, was the fault of some that went before him), but have improved the words in all places to a sublimer sense, where I had any direction from our Saviour or his apostles to apply them to the things belonging to Christ's kingdom. But where I wanted their guidance, I have not taken upon me to do it (unless it be very sparingly, where the church hath thought it probable there was something intended beyond the letter), because I did not know whether the Holy Ghost, which indited the words, had respect to these times, as well as to those histories, to which I thought I saw a clear warrant to apply them.

And where there is no title to the Psalm (which St. Jerome, or one under his name, calls the key, to let us into the sense of it), it is not easy to tell to what history it relates: but must be acknowledged to be ἔργον μέγιστον, &c. (as Origen upon the first Psalm speaks, Philocalia, cap. 2, from some learned Hebrew), a work of very great labour, to find the keys which lie scattered up and down in several parts of the scripture, and then to fit them to the places which they are to open. In this I have taken some pains, as may be seen in the arguments to the several Psalms; in some of which, if I differ from those that have gone before me, I hope none will be so perverse as to make it a fault; for (as the true St. Jerome speaks in his preface to the Psalms, according to the Hebrew verity) since they are still desiring new pleasures, and the neighbouring seas cannot satisfy men's gluttony, cur in solo studio scripturarum, veteri sapore contenti sunt? "why in the study of the scriptures alone can they relish nothing that is new, but content themselves merely with that which tastes of antiquity?" Which I do not speak, as he proceeds, to reflect upon my predecessors, or detract from their excellent labours (to which I thankfully acknowledge I am exceedingly beholden), but only to give an account to the readers of what I have done, that they may not think I have only transcribed what I found before said in this argument, and brought no further light to it.

Why, may some be forward to say, do you pretend, after so many monuments of learning, both ancient and modern, to bring forth anything which hath not been said before, and said better? I answer, as Muculus doth in the like case (Præfat. ad Lectorum), if the treasure of the holy scriptures be such that it can be drawn so dry by the diligent searches of pious and learned men, as nothing shall remain to exercise the studies of those that succeed them; if there be at any time such an effusion of God's Holy Spirit that after that time it is in vain to labour in finding out its mind in the holy scriptures; if there have been in the church, after the prophets, Christ, and his apostles, men of such perfect accomplishments, that to them was imparted such a universal fullness of divine knowledge as to make their writings absolutely complete, so that we need do nothing but night and day study them alone; then truly I refuse not the censure of folly, nay, of madness, for attempting anything new in the holy scriptures after such absolute writers. But if that most rich fountain of the divine oracles be altogether inexhaustible, and no age can be assigned to which alone the grace of the Holy Spirit was confined, and there were never any doctors at any time in the church, after Christ, the apostles, and prophets, of such esteem, that nothing is wanting in their writings, nothing can be rightly added to them, nothing is in them which may be justly taken away, or changed for the better; then I do not see why we may not profitably travel in the same way that others have done, with hopes of adding more light to that which they have left us.

It is better, indeed, if a man only consults his own worldly ease and tranquillity, not to trouble himself at all about such studies, but to get a reputation merely by censuring those that are thus employed. But if a man look upon himself as consecrated to the service of Christ, and seek not what he thinks will please himself, so much as what will please his master Christ, and from him alone expect his reward, he will not think fit to be discouraged in such endeavours by the hatred or the unkind censures which they may procure him; no, nor by the sense neither of his own infirmities, and the lapses he may have in such writings: which all truly good men will pardon, when they see an honest diligence in us to do as well as we can; and when they remember that no one man can do all things, nor nothing so as to need no correction.

Submitting therefore this work, such as it is, to the correction and amendment of those that are better able, and shall hereafter labour in this argument, I commend it to the perusal of devout Christians; hoping that the light I have given to this admirable book is so clear, if not great, that they will, by God's blessing, receive no small benefit by it. For there is nothing which David or any of the rest say of themselves and their condition, but by an easy accommodation may be made to serve every one of our occasions when we are in any strait, public or private, or when we have received any remarkable deliverance. Athanasius hath said much on this subject, which I must not transcribe, nor show how they are fitted (as Gregory Nyssen observes, lib. i. De Inscript. Psal. tom. i. p. 261.) to all persons and ages, to all conditions of life, and all manner of employments, to the state both of sickness and of health, when we are upon the land or upon the water, so wonderful is their useful variety. But I shall conclude this preface, as Theodoret doth his commentaries upon this book:—

"I beseech the readers, if I seem to have expounded it well and aptly, that they would reap the profit of it; and if I have not attained the secret mysteries of the Spirit, that they would not find fault too much; for what I could find I have freely propounded, and what I have learnt of those gone before I endeavour to transmit to posterity; and I have taken the pains, of which others may receive the benefit without any labour. Whom I beseech and entreat to make some compensation for my pains with their prayers, by the help of which I may to words add deeds, and reap the blessedness which belongs to both. For he that doeth and teacheth shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. v. 19).

"And let us praise the Lord (as St. Chrysostom also concludes) perpetually (as this book instructs us); let us never cease to give thanks in all things, both by our words and by our deeds. For this is our sacrifice, this is our oblation, this is the best liturgy, or divine service, resembling the angelical manner of living. If we continue thus singing hymns unto him, we shall finish this life inoffensively, and enjoy those good things also which are to come. Of which, may we all be so happy as to be partakers, through the grace and loving kindness of our Lord Jesus Christ; to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be glory, dominion, and honour, now and for ever. Amen."

PART I.

PSALM I.

1 BLESSED is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.

2 But his delight is in the law of the LORD; and in his law doth he meditate day and night.

3 And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season: his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

4 The ungodly are not so; but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.

5 Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

6 For the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish.

PSALM I.

ARGUMENT.—The collector of these five books of Psalms, or David himself (as Apollinarius and others think), prefaces them by a short discourse about the last end of man; just as the philosophers were wont to do in their books of morality: and as Christ himself doth in the beginning of his sermon on the mount. The end of man is blessedness; and the way to it, observance of God's law; which he lays down here as the foundation (so St. Basil conceives it) of the whole ensuing work. So that we may bestow upon this Psalm the title of ΜΑΚΑΡΙΣΜΟΣ, i. e. Blessedness, out of Athanasius's epistle to Marcellinus, and Theodoret's preface to this Psalm.

Ver. 1.] Great is the happiness of that man, unspeakably great, who hath not trod in the steps of the ungodly (who have no other rule of their actions but their own lusts and passions); or, if he hath at any time been seduced by them, timely retracted his folly, and did not persist, like those obdurate wretches, in evil courses; much less persevered so long, and proceeded so far in his impiety, as to resolve to be one of that pestilent company, who deride and scoff at all religion!

Ver. 2.] But his pleasure is to do the will of God, by following his counsels which he hath given in his holy laws; with which he advises and consults continually, and with unwearied study endeavours to be thoroughly acquainted with them.

Ver. 3.] You may behold an emblem of this man's happiness, in those trees which are planted by such trenches as derive their water from a perpetual fountain. As they are green and flourishing all the year, and never fail to reward the gardener's pains at the time he expects to receive their fruit; so shall this pious man be ever prosperous, and in the issue reap a plentiful fruit of his labours; for there are none of his enterprises but shall succeed, according to his heart's desire.

Ver. 4.] Oh, how miserably will those men be deceived, who hope to thrive as well, or better, by their impiety! it is too little to say, that they shall be like trees without any moisture; the light and useless chaff, which is blown away with the wind, is a fitter resemblance of them: for so shall all their counsels, designs, and endeavours, to root themselves in the earth, be scattered and come to nothing.

Ver. 5.] Therefore let them not think to defend themselves when God comes to judge men according to their works: for whatsoever plea they make, or power they have, they shall certainly be overthrown. It is possible, for the present, they may seem to equal or overtop the prosperity of the righteous: but there will be a time when God will make a difference, and give the righteous a happiness wherein they shall have no share at all.

Ver. 6.] For he approves and highly esteems the obedience of the righteous to his holy laws, and therefore will certainly reward it: but that lewd course of life which the wicked lead, he utterly hates, and they shall infallibly perish in it.

PSALM II.

1 WHY do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing ?

2 The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the LORD, and against his anointed, saying,

3 Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us.

4 He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh : the LORD shall have them in derision.

5 Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure.

6 Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion.

7 I will declare the decree : the LORD hath said unto me, Thou art my Son ; this day have I begotten thee.

8 Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.

9 Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron ; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.

10 Be wise now therefore, O ye kings : be instructed, ye judges of the earth.

11 Serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with trembling.

12 Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.

PSALM II.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, under the history of David, whom, from a low and afflicted condition, God raised to a throne, and notwithstanding all the opposition made against it first by Saul, and then by others, settled him in it, contains a most illustrious prophecy of the kingdom of Christ, whom God raised even from the dead, made the King of glory, and, notwithstanding all the scribes and pharisees, Herod and other princes, could do to hinder it, enlarged his kingdom to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Ver. 1.] What frenzy is this, which makes the Philistines, and other neighbouring nations (2 Sam. v. 17, &c. viii. 1, &c.), as I foresee the pharisees and their partakers will do hereafter, storm thus furiously, and bandy together with so much noise and tumult ? why do they contrive to hinder that which the power of God will irresistibly bring to pass ?

Ver. 2.] Their kings and governors are risen up, and lay their heads together, to oppose the design of God, who hath anointed me king over his people : just as Herod, and Pontius Pilate, and the rulers of Israel (Acts iv. 27), will conspire against Christ, and seek to dethrone him, when he is made, by God the Father, King of all the world.

Ver. 3.] Let us not submit, say they, to this new king, who pretends to reign by divine authority ; but resolutely deny to be bound to his obedience, and throw off the yoke which he and his ministers would impose upon us.

Ver. 4.] As if they were stronger than he, whose throne is in heaven : who, as he contemns their vain attempts, so will expose them to the scorn and derision of all those who shall behold their folly.

Ver. 5.] Even then, when they think they have done their business, they shall find the tokens of the divine vengeance against them ; and if they will not desist from their opposition to him, he will utterly confound them with a destruction so terrible and so remarkable, as if he had called to them from heaven, and said,

Ver. 6.] See how madly you set yourselves against my will ; for in spite of all that you can do, I have anointed and set up David, who rules by my authority in the hill of Zion, where I have a peculiar residence ; as in time to come (let all his enemies do what they can to hinder it) I will anoint one of his posterity to sit upon the throne of glory at the right hand of the majesty on high.

Ver. 7.] Such I am sure is the decree of heaven, which I here promulgate to all the world : for, from a low and poor condition, the Lord hath raised me to the highest dignity. This very day, by his order, I begin to reign, and may call it the birth-day of my kingdom : which is but a slender type of a far more strange and greater exaltation of his son Christ, whom he hath determined to raise again to life after he is dead and buried (Acts xiii. 33. Rom. i. 4), and then to crown with glory and honour in the heavens.

Ver. 8.] If you will not believe this royal edict, you shall shortly see not only this nation of the Jews, but the Philistines, the Edomites, Moabites, Syrians, and other remoter countries as far as Euphrates (whom God, according to his ancient grant, Exod. xxiii. 31, Ezra iv. 16. 20, hath at my request given unto me), subdued under my feet (Ps. lx. 6, &c. 2 Sam. viii.) as all the nations of the earth shall be under his son Christ.

Ver. 9.] They shall never be able to stand before me (much less before him) : for he hath given me a sceptre so powerful (and to him, one infinitely more irresistible), that they who will not bow unto it, and be ruled by it, shall be broken in pieces as easily and irreparably as an earthen pot is with a rod of iron.

Ver. 10.] And therefore let all kings and governors of the earth be advised by me ; take heed what you do, and understand your own interest so well, as not to oppose the decree of Heaven ; or if you have begun to set yourselves against the Lord's anointed, be not so vain as to continue in that folly, but repent, and correct your error.

Ver. 11.] If you would be safe, surrender up yourselves to become his subjects, and be afraid to incur his displeasure by any disobedience. You ought indeed to rejoice, that you may be so happy as to be under the government of so great and so gracious a prince ; but that very thing should make you the more fearful to offend his majesty.

Ver. 12.] To whom I counsel you to go and do your homage, and to pay him all the honour that is due to God's vicegerent ; lest he grow angry at your obstinate refusal to submit unto him, and you perish in that rebellious course, when his wrath breaks out suddenly, like an unquenchable fire, against you. Blessed are all they that follow this advice, and fly to him as their mighty protector and deliverer.

PSALM III.

A Psalm of David, when he fled from Absalom his son.

1 LORD, how are they increased that trouble me? many are they that rise up against me.

2 Many there be which say of my soul, There is no help for him in God. Selah.

3 But thou, O LORD, art a shield for me; my glory, and the lifter up of my head.

4 I cried unto the LORD with my voice, and he heard me out of his holy hill. Selah.

5 I laid me down and slept; I awaked; for the LORD sustained me.

6 I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that have set themselves against me round about.

7 Arise, O LORD; save me, O my God: for thou hast smitten all mine enemies upon the cheek bone; thou hast broken the teeth of the ungodly.

8 Salvation belongeth unto the LORD: thy blessing is upon thy people. Selah

PSALM III.

ARGUMENT.—Appollinaris calls this Ἀνθρον μέλος, “a mournful or lamentable song.” And so it is, if compared with the preceding; otherwise there are in it far greater expressions of faith and triumphant confidence in God, than there are of trouble and dejection of spirit, though David’s condition when he wrote it was very sad and dangerous. For the title, which St. Jerome truly calls the key of the Psalm (whereby we are let into the sense), informs us, that it is a meditation composed in his flight from Jerusalem, when his son Absalom conspired against him, and most of the kingdom fell off from him (2 Sam. xv. &c.). Which after his return thither he commanded to be sung in the tabernacle, in commemoration of that disconsolate condition.

And here I must note, once for all, that it cannot be certainly known what is meant by the word Selah, which we meet withal thrice in this short Psalm. The most probable opinion is, that it was a note in music. In which David (as Theodoret observes upon this word) being a very great master, he set some of his Psalms himself to be sung to such instruments as he thought were most agreeable to the notes. But that music being now lost, some interpreters have wholly omitted this word Selah as I shall also do.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, who changeest not, what an amazing change is this! I who in a divine manner was set by thee upon thy throne, and lately triumphed over so many foreign countries (Ps. ii. 6–8), now see great armies of my own subjects raised against me; and conspiring with my son, not only to pull the crown from my head, but to take away my life.

Ver. 2.] The general cry is, that I am lost, and that thou, who wast wont to be my helper, and in whom I always made my boast, hast quite forsaken me, as my people have done universally.

Ver. 3.] But this (how sad soever it be) shall never shake my confidence in thee, O Lord, whom I still behold surrounding me with thy almighty protection: and therefore I will not cease to glory, and make my boast in thee; but hope (though now I am in a sorrowful condition) that thou wilt make me joyful again, and raise me out of this dejected estate to my former dignity.

Ver. 4.] Why should I doubt of it when I never yet cried unto the Lord, either in this or any former distress, but he sent me relief from that place, where he, having made his special residence, would have us thither direct our prayers.

Ver. 5.] He hath already so quieted and composed my mind, that in the midst of this dreadful danger I laid me down securely, and slept profoundly, and awaked, as I slept, without any fear, or any disturbance: for the Lord supported and upheld my spirit, in a firm confidence of his careful providence over me.

Ver. 6.] And therefore, were I beset with as many nations, as I see men now encamp themselves on all sides against me, I should not be at all daunted at it.

Ver. 7. But only address myself to thee, saying, Deliver me no longer, O Lord, but let them see thou hast not forsaken me. Deliver me, O my God, from these rebellious subjects, whom I beseech thee to discomfit and put to shame, as thou hast done many other powerful enemies, who most impiously have sought with eager desire to devour me.

Ver. 8.] Thou alone art the author of all happiness, and therefore unto thee I flee to save and preserve me from this conspiracy: not that I may live to be revenged, but to do good unto thy people, whose prosperity I wish and will seek, though never so ungrateful and undutiful to me their sovereign.

PSALM IV.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth. A Psalm of David.

1 HEAR me when I call, O God of my righteousness: thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress; have mercy upon me, and hear my prayer.

PSALM IV.

ARGUMENT.—We can learn no more from this title, but that David was the author of this Psalm; and that he delivered it to the master of music in the tabernacle, to be sung to the stringed instruments. But when or upon what occasion he penned it, is not certainly known, though the matter of it makes it probable, it was in the same (or the like) distress wherein he made the foregoing Psalm.

Ver. 1.] O my God the most righteous judge who knowest the justice of my cause, and art the protector of oppressed innocence, vouchsafe to give me a gracious answer now that I cry unto thee for help against my enemies. Thou hast heretofore made an open

2 O ye sons of men, how long will ye turn my glory into shame ? how long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing ? Selah.

3 But know that the LORD hath set apart him that is godly for himself: the LORD will hear when I call unto him.

4 Stand in awe, and sin not : commune with your own heart upon your hed, and he still. Selah.

way for my escape out of the sorest straits and greatest dangers ; which makes me hope thou wilt still take pity upon me, and hear the humble petition which I put up unto thee.

Ver. 2.] I am confident my desire is granted ; and therefore do you hearken unto me, O ye rulers of the people, by whose authority such multitudes are drawn into this conspiracy : cease to defame my government (2 Sam. xv. 3, &c.), and break off your vain endeavours to dethrone me. Why do you delight to weary yourselves in the pursuit of such fallacious counsels, and to employ so much industry in inventing calumnies, and spreading lies to draw the people from me ?

Ver. 3.] Know that it is not in your power by all these arts to depose me ; for I did not come to my kingdom by chance, nor by your choice, but by the special appointment of God ; who, having so highly favoured me, that he hath selected me out of all other men, and in a wonderful manner advanced me to be his vicegerent : he will no doubt maintain me in my place, and graciously preserve me when I implore his help from all the enemies that can assault me.

Ver. 4.] Dread his displeasure, I beseech you, though you fear not my power ; and let not your anger at me make you any longer offend him, by persisting in this rebellion, into which you have run rashly : but if you will debate the matter calmly within your-

5 Offer the sacrifices of righteousness, and put your trust in the LORD.

6 There be many that say, Who will shew us any good ? LORD, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us.

7 Thou hast put gladness in my heart, more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased.

8 I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep : for thou, LORD, only makest me dwell in safety.

selves, and when all the bustle and tumult of the day are over, ask yourselves at night what ground there is for it ; I doubt not you will find reason to lay down your arms and be quiet.

Ver. 5.] As for you, my friends, that adhere still to me, though you are driven with me from God's holy place, yet fear nothing : but only take care to observe strictly all the rules of righteousness, which are the most acceptable sacrifices you can offer to the Lord ; and then confide in him ; and though your forces be few, doubt not of the victory.

Ver. 6.] You are desirous, I know, to see peace and settlement restored ; of which many are apt to despair, saying, Who shall make us so happy ? But do thou, O Lord, look favourably upon us, and bless us, and then I am surer of it, than if I saw the most powerful armies appear, with banners displayed, for my succour.

Ver. 7.] The very thoughts of it, this small glimpse of thy love, hath already filled my heart with such joy, that it far exceeds all the pleasure my enemies can take in seeing their barns full of corn, and their presses overflow with wine.

Ver. 8.] Nor can they take their rest more securely than I ; for though encompassed with these dangers, I no sooner lay me down, but I fall asleep ; because when I have no other guard about me, thou, Lord, alone art a sufficient defence unto me.

PSALM V.

To the chief Musician upon Nehiloth. A Psalm of David.

1 GIVE ear to my words, O LORD, consider my meditation.

2 Hearken unto the voice of my cry, my King, and my God : for unto thee will I pray.

3 My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O LORD ; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up.

PSALM V.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by David (but whether when he was persecuted by Saul or by Absalom, I cannot certainly determine), and delivered to the master of music in the tabernacle, after his troubles were over, to be sung in parts to the organ ; in commemoration of that sad condition, and the devout confidence he placed in God of deliverance out of it.

Ver. 1.] Thou seest, O Lord, unto what grievous straits I am reduced : let them move thee to grant me my request, and to have regard to the silent groans and sighs, whereby I call upon thee for relief.

Ver. 2.] To thee I appeal as my sovereign Lord and supreme judge ; from whose almighty power I earnestly beg protection, and from whose justice I humbly implore the vindication of my innocence.

4 For thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness : neither shall evil dwell with thee.

5 The foolish shall not stand in thy sight : thou hatest all workers of iniquity.

6 Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing : the LORD will abhor the bloody and deceitful man.

Ver. 3.] And thou wilt be as speedy, I hope, in thy help and succour, as I am early in my prayer : for the first thing I do, is to address myself to thee. I no sooner awake, but I dispose myself to wait on thee (as an humble suitor at the gate of thy mercy), and expect what thou wilt be pleased to do for me.

Ver. 4.] Who wilt not fail, I am confident, to answer my expectations ; for thou art a most righteous judge, who art so far from approving this unjust persecution of me (or rebellion against me), that thou abhorrest such wicked practices. They may prosper for a little time in these evil courses, but shall have no place in thy favour.

Ver. 5.] Thou wilt condemn them to suffer the punishment of their folly and madness ; and banish those from thy presence, who in their blind rage have driven me from my habitation : for all such wicked doers are odious to thee.

Ver. 6.] Thou wilt utterly destroy those that abuse

7 But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy : and in thy fear will I worship toward thy holy temple.

8 Lead me, O LORD, in thy righteousness because of mine enemies ; make thy way straight before my face.

9 For there is no faithfulness in their mouth ; their inward part is very wickedness ; their throat is an open sepulchre ; they flatter with their tongue.

10 Destroy thou them, O God ; let them fall their tongues to tell lies, whereby they defame and calumniate my government : their bloody designs which they seek to compass by fraud and treachery, make them abominable to the divine majesty.

Ver. 7.] But I, whom they have driven not only from my own house, but (which is far worse) from thine, hope, by thine infinite goodness towards me to be restored again to go into thy courts ; and there, with the humblest reverence, to worship thee, towards the place where thou hast set the monument of thy presence with us.

Ver. 8.] And in the mean time, thou wilt be my guide and conductor in the way of thy commandments, which are the rule of righteousness ; that my enemies, who seek for something to colour their hatred to me, may have nothing to object against me. They would gladly see me trip, and they watch for my halting : and therefore do thou make thy way so plain before me, and order my goings so steadfastly, that I may never stumble, much less fall, and give them any advantage over me.

Ver. 9.] For with what triumph would they blaze abroad my real faults, who now stick not to tell all manner of lies of me ! their hearts are perpetually hatching the most malicious and mischievous stories, which they utter with open mouth, gaping for the by their own counsels ; cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions ; for they have rebelled against thee.

11 But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice : let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them ; let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee.

12 For thou, LORD, wilt bless the righteous ; with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield.

destruction of the innocent : to whom, when they speak fair, and put on a guise of friendship, it is with an intent to devour them.

Ver. 10.] O thou most righteous judge, pronounce that sentence of condemnation against them which they deserve. Let their own devices, whereby they seek to ruin me, destroy themselves and disperse them, because of their multiplied impieties. For it is thy cause more than mine that is now disputed, while they reject him whom thou hast appointed the king of thy people.

Ver. 11.] This will excite all those who are faithful to thee, and confide in nothing but thy merciful protection, to rejoice and triumph perpetually in thy praise. They will be encouraged by thy wonderful goodness and power appearing in my deliverance, to hope thou wilt protect and succour them also ; and never fail to fill the hearts of all those that truly love thee, with the highest joy in thee.

Ver. 12.] For thou, Lord, who art faithful and true, hast engaged thyself, by thy gracious promise, to do good unto the righteous, whom thou lovest and delightest in, and therefore wilt crown with thy favour, and encircle him, as with an impenetrable shield, against all the darts of his enemies.

PSALM VI.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth upon Sheminith. A Psalm of David.

1 O LORD, rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.

2 Have mercy upon me, O LORD ; for I am weak : O LORD, heal me ; for my bones are vexed.

3 My soul is also sore vexed : but thou, O LORD, how long ?

4 Return, O LORD, deliver my soul : oh save me for thy mercies' sake.

5 For in death there is no remembrance of

PSALM VI.

ARGUMENT.—When David laboured under some grievous disease, he made his complaints to God, and deprecated his displeasure, according to the sense of this Psalm ; which he composed, it is likely, after his recovery, and ordered the master of music in the tabernacle to cause it to be sung to the harp of eight strings. That seems to be the best interpretation of Sheminith, which the Chaldee follows ; and it may be justified from what we read 1 Chron. xv. 21. Of Neginoth, see Psalm iv. By way of accommodation, the words of this Psalm have been applied to the sickness of the mind ; but, upon the former account also, it may be called one of the penitential Psalms.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, who delightest in mercy, moderate, I beseech thee, thy sharp correction ; and do not proceed to inflict upon me the severest marks of thy displeasure.

Ver. 2.] I am brought very low already, my strength faileth me, and every joint in my body trembles ; and therefore now, O Lord, thy mercy will come very seasonably. Good Lord, from whom alone I expect a cure, let it be sufficient that I have suffered so much already, and vouchsafe to heal me.

Ver. 3.] For this sore affliction, and the dread of thy farther displeasure, have struck into my soul also an exceeding great consternation ; and how long it will continue, thou, Lord alone knowest.

Ver. 4.] My enemies think thou hast quite forsaken me : convince them of their error, O Lord, by being reconciled, and restoring to me the kindness thou wast wont to show me. Deliver me from this anguish and fear, and (though not for my merits, yet) for thy mercy save me from going down into the grave.

Ver. 5.] For there I can have no opportunity to do thee service ; the dead being utterly unable to commemorate thy wonderful works, and propagate the memory of them to posterity. As long as I live I will show forth thy praise ; but who can celebrate thy name, and instruct thy people, in the grave ?

thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?

6 I am weary with my groaning; all the night make I my bed to swim; I water my couch with my tears.

7 Mine eye is consumed because of grief; it waxeth old because of all mine enemies.

Ver. 6.] To that silent place I shall soon descend, unless thou makest haste to deliver me; for I am tired out with these pains under which I groan. The night which is wont to quiet all men's grief, and lay their troubles asleep, is to me so restless and uneasy, that the incessant agonies I am in dissolve me into sweat, and I do nothing but pour out floods of tears.

Ver. 7.] Which have made such furrows in my face, that my countenance hath lost all its beauty, and looks like that of a consumptive man, who is dropping into his grave. I am worn away with the mere grief and indignation of seeing all mine enemies insulting over me, and with joy waiting for my death.

Ver. 8.] But why am I thus concerned at their behaviour, and torment myself as if my life depended on their pleasure, which is in the hand of God alone,

8 Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity; for the Lord hath heard the voice of my weeping.

9 The Lord hath heard my supplication; the Lord will receive my prayer.

10 Let all mine enemies be ashamed and sore vexed: let them return and be ashamed suddenly.

who pities my mournful condition, and will grant me that which I have sought with so many tears? And therefore go your way, ye evil-doers, and stay no longer here expecting my death. Desist from all your wicked contrivances against me, and be not so vain as to hope to triumph over me.

Ver. 9.] The Lord hath not rejected me, as you imagine; but is graciously pleased both with my deprecation of his displeasure, and with my petitions to him for his favour.

Ver. 10.] And therefore I tell my enemies once more, that they shall all be ashamed of their vain hopes to see me dead. I shall live to disappoint them, and make them terribly afraid: nay, they shall make a sudden retreat, and be confounded to see themselves so shamefully defeated.

PSALM VII.

Shiggaion of David, which he sang unto the Lord, concerning the words (or business) of Cush the Benjamite.

1 O LORD my God, in thee do I put my trust: save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver me:

2 Lest he tear my soul like a lion, rending it in pieces, while there is none to deliver.

3 O LORD my God, if I have done this; if there be iniquity in my hands;

4 If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me; (yea, I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy:)

5 Let the enemy persecute my soul, and take it; yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust. Selah.

6 Arise, O LORD, in thine anger, lift up thy-

PSALM VII.

ARGUMENT.—An excellent Psalm, composed by David to commemorate the loving-kindness of the Lord upon occasion of some calumnies and false accusations; wherein Cush, one of the same tribe with Saul (and probably one of his courtiers or captains, if not one of his kinsmen), had charged David with some very great crime; of treason, it is likely, and conspiracy against Saul. Athanasius, indeed (as we find in some fragments of his upon the Psalms), thinks that David made this χαριστήριον ᾠδὴν, as he calls it, when Hushai (whom he takes for Cush) had defeated the good counsel of Ahithophel, by a discourse he made to show it was not safe to set upon so warlike a prince as David, without a greater force than Absalom had at present; whereby he saved David from certain ruin. But I see nothing in the Psalm to give a colour to this conjecture; for the words therein mentioned were against David, not in his favour. The name of Hushai also is otherways written, and he is called an Archite, not a Benjamite; which St. Basil (whose opinion this was) endeavours to solve, by saying he was called Benjameni, because he managed his matters so dexterously in overthrowing the counsel of Ahithophel. But that is only a piece of wit; and the conjecture of Valentine Schindler seems to me more probable; that by Cush, he secretly notes (by a change of letters) Saul himself, the son of Kish; who could no more alter his mind, full of hatred to David, than a man of Cush, or an Ethiopian, could his skin or complexion.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, who hast hitherto been my most gracious God, and defended my innocence against those that have falsely accused me, I ought not to doubt of thy continued care and love towards me; and therefore fly unto thee, with an humble confidence in thy almighty goodness, that thou wilt preserve and deliver me from this new persecution which is raised against me.

Ver. 2.] For if thou dost not protect me, I am no more able to stand before Saul than a lamb before a lion: so great is his power, and so implacable his rage, that if thou sufferest me to fall into his hands, there is no creature can rescue me, but he will infallibly destroy me.

Ver. 3.] And let him destroy me, O Lord, if I be guilty of that whereof I am accused. Thou art the most righteous judge of all, and to thee I here again most solemnly appeal, as I have done before him (1 Sam. xxiv. 12. 15), desiring that thou wilt judge between us. If I have conspired against him, or had any design to do him hurt (as he was made to believe, 1 Sam. xxiv. 9), if any such thing hath so much as entered into my thoughts.

Ver. 4.] If I have either injured him when he was kind to me, or sought to be revenged of him since he has injured me: (no, I abhorred to take revenge, so far was I from seeking it, when he fell into my hand, and spared him twice when it was in my power to have killed him, who causelessly endeavoured to kill me, 1 Sam. xxiv. xxvi.)

Ver. 5.] Then I beg no mercy; let him go on to be my enemy; let him pursue me till he apprehend me, and execute his desire upon me. I refuse not to die; nay, to be trodden under foot like dirt with the greatest contempt; and to be as much reproached when I am dead, as I have been honoured alive.

self because of the rage of mine enemies : and awake for me to the judgment that thou hast commanded.

7 So shall the congregation of the people compass thee about : for their sakes therefore return thou on high.

8 The LORD shall judge the people : judge me, O LORD, according to my righteousness, and according to mine integrity that is in me.

9 Oh let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end ; but establish the just : for the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins.

10 My defence is of God, which saveth the upright in heart.

11 God judgeth the righteous, and God is angry with the wicked every day.

Ver. 6.] But if I be innocent in this matter (as thou, Lord, knowest I am), then I beseech thee to show thy displeasure at this unjust proceeding. Let my enemies know that thou art the sovereign Lord of all, by suppressing them now that they rage thus furiously. Thou hast appointed judges upon earth to distribute justice and relieve the oppressed ; but hast reserved the supreme judgment to thyself, even over them as well as others : and therefore I beseech thee to take cognizance of my cause, and issue out thy orders speedily for my deliverance from this persecution.

Ver. 7.] Which will draw all the people to make their resort to thee, and wait upon thee, till thou dost them justice. For that reason ascend thy judgment-seat again, and, as thou hast done formerly, vindicate me from these calumnies, and assert my innocence.

Ver. 8.] The sovereign of the world will not fail to dispense equal justice unto all, according to their works. Of which I beseech thee, O Lord, to give an example in me, who desire no greater favour than to be disposed of according to my innocence in this matter. Thou hast designed indeed a kingdom for me, but let me lose it, if ever I entertain a disloyal thought against him who now enjoys it.

Ver. 9.] I leave it to thee to perform thy own purposes, who hast long borne with the wicked in their unjust proceedings, but wilt at last put a stop to them, and settle the righteous, whom they injuriously persecute from place to place, in a peaceable possession of what thou hast promised. For thou, Lord, discernest the most secret thoughts and desires of them both ; and as thou canst not be deceived with specious shows, so thou wilt not be corrupted, either by fear or favour, to pronounce an unrighteous sentence.

Ver. 10.] That is my comfort, none but God, the judge of all, can either absolve or condemn me ; and he knows so well the sincerity of my heart, that I assure myself from him of protection and deliverance.

12 If he turn not, he will whet his sword ; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready.

13 He hath also prepared for him the instruments of death ; he ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors.

14 Behold, he travaileth with iniquity, and hath conceived mischief, and brought forth falsehood.

15 He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made.

16 His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate.

17 I will praise the LORD according to his righteousness : and will sing praise to the name of the LORD most high.

Ver. 11.] For he is so just a judge, that he will defend the cause of the righteous, and never be persuaded to take part with the wicked ; with whom he is highly displeased all the time that he forbears to strike him, and cut him off in his evil courses.

Ver. 12.] And if he will not repent, as he is invited by that forbearance, he shall be punished at last with so much the greater severity ; because he would take no warning, but went on confidently, notwithstanding the vengeance he was told was preparing for him.

Ver. 13.] Vengeance, which will certainly come, though it stay long, and not fail to do execution : for it is decreed in heaven (if they do not repent), and will pierce through the very heart of Saul, and all the rest of my fierce and outrageous persecutors.

Ver. 14.] See here the folly of this calumniator, who wickedly plots my ruin, and hath formed most mischievous designs against my life ; which shall all miscarry, and deceive his expectation.

Ver. 15.] And he shall not escape so neither ; for beside the shame of not being able to compass his design, he shall suffer that himself which he laboured to do to me. Just as you see sometimes a man fall into the pit which was digged with his own hands ; so shall he fall upon the sword which himself hath drawn (1 Sam. xxxi. 4).

Ver. 16.] The mischief which with so much pains he contrived against me, shall be retorted upon that head which projected it : all his violence and cruel persecutions, wherewith he thought to oppress me, shall fall down (like a stone thrown into the air) upon himself, and crush him to pieces.

Ver. 17.] Which shall afford matter of perpetual praise to me ; who will most thankfully acknowledge not only the power, but the just judgment of God, and his faithfulness to his word. With the greatest delight and joy shall my songs celebrate the glorious majesty of the Lord, which far surmounts our highest thoughts and thanksgivings.

PSALM VIII.

To the chief Musician upon Gittith. A Psalm of David.

1 O LORD our Lord how excellent is thy name in all the earth ! who hast set thy glory above the heavens.

PSALM VIII.

ARGUMENT.—The Targum takes the word Gittith to denote that this Psalm was to be sung to a harp

2 Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength because of thine enemies, that thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger.

which David brought with him from Gath. Others think it to be only a note in music, or to have relation to the time of vintage. But Theodoret look-

3 When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained;

4 What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man that thou visitest him?

5 For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour.

6 Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet:

7 All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field;

8 The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.

9 O LORD our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!

ing upon it (as indeed it seems to be) as ᾠδὴ νικητικὴ, "a psalm of triumph to God;" the author of some great victory he had gotten, I take it to have been composed by David, and delivered to the master of the music in the tabernacle, after he had overthrown that naughty insolent giant, Goliath of Gath; which is very agreeable to the matter of the Psalm, and a lively emblem of Christ's conquest over our great enemy the devil.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, the sovereign of the world, who art graciously pleased to own us in a peculiar manner to be thy subjects, who can behold the wonders of thy works, and the wisdom of thy providence, and not be astonished at the incomparable greatness and splendour of thy majesty? which all the earth proclaims with the highest praises, but cannot be contained within the spacious bounds of the heavens, whose glorious brightness it far surpasses.

Ver. 2.] What an amazing wonder is it, that thou shouldst enable the weakest of men to do the greatest and most praiseworthy things! and particularly hast now assisted me (who, in comparison with Goliath, am but an infant) with power and strength to subdue that mighty giant! It is enough to confound all the enemies, and to stop the mouths of the most pernicious opposers of thee and of thy people: as the far more to be celebrated works of the Messiah and his disciples, when they shall but speak the word, shall confound even the devil himself, that great enemy of thine, and tormentor of mankind.

Ver. 3.] Who are extremely stupid if they do not most thankfully acknowledge thy singular love to them. For when I seriously look up to thy celestial habitation, and consider the vastness of that admirable structure, and behold also those lights which thou hast placed there in beautiful order.

Ver. 4.] I know not what to say, but am perfectly astonished to think that thou, whose greatness I see so visibly in the heavens, shouldst condescend so far as to show such grace and favour as thou dost to this wretched creature man: particularly to me, who am the meanest of my brethren. Lord, what am I, that thou shouldst work such salvation by my hands? Nay, what is the greatest prince in the world, that thou shouldst thus honour him? But that thou shouldst advance our mortal nature so highly in that Son of man, the Lord Christ, whom the world will vilify and despise, exceeds all wonder, and ought to be the matter of our perpetual admiration.

Ver. 5.] Thou hast raised man to such a dignity, and honoured him so highly (particularly me, whom thou hast used as thy minister to punish that insulting giant who defied thy armies, 1 Sam. xvii.), that he is not much inferior to the celestial hosts: as shall be more clearly seen in thy Son Christ, whom thou hast determined to advance far above the highest angels in heaven, after he hath for a short space been much beneath them, by submitting himself to a poor condition in our flesh, that he might lay down his life for man (Heb. xi. 6, 7, &c.).

Ver. 6.] Whose glory is great, even in the dominion thou hast given him over all thy creatures in this lower world (though this be nothing comparable to the exaltation of the great Son of man, under whose feet thou hast put in subjection all creatures whatsoever, even those in the highest heavens). There is nothing here but he hath a power over it, and finds means to make it subject to his pleasure.

Ver. 7.] Not only the beasts that are tame, such as sheep and oxen, but those that are wild, even tigers, bears, and lions.

Ver. 8.] Yea, and the fowls of the air cannot fly so high but he hath ways to reach them; nor can the fishes in lakes or rivers, or those in the deepest ocean, exempt themselves from his dominion.

Ver. 9.] All which moves me again to cry out, and conclude as I began, in the highest admiration of thy most powerful wisdom and goodness, saying, O mighty Lord, our most gracious governor, who can comprehend the excellent greatness of thy majesty? O how transcendent is thy loving-kindness in all thou hast done, and wilt do for man! How loudly ought the whole world to sound forth thy praise!

PSALM IX.

To the chief Musician upon Muth-labben. A Psalm of David.

1 I WILL praise thee, O LORD, with my whole heart; I will shew forth all thy marvellous works.

PSALM. IX.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm which David composed and delivered to the master of music in the tabernacle, when he was in some great distress (ver. 13): wherein he commemorates God's former deliverance of him; both when he killed Goliath, and got frequent victories afterward over the Philistines, and other enemies of Israel (ver. 11. 15). I mention Goliath, because, among the various opinions about Muth-labben, I find none so probable as theirs

2 I will be glad and rejoice in thee: I will sing praise to thy name, O thou most high.

who think it hath some relation to him: to whom there are three ways of applying those Hebrew words. All of them by almuth, understand to be meant upon the death: and then labben, some think, signifies the son, that is, a great man, as I have expounded in my preface to this work. Others render it the white; that is, an illustrious, noble person, or one famous in arms, as Goliath was. Others render it intermediate; which agrees also to that champion, who came out and stood between the two armies, and defied Israel (1 Sam. xvii. 4, 3 When mine enemies are turned back, they shall fall and perish at thy presence.

4 For thou hast maintained my right and my cause; thou satest in the throne judging right.

5 Thou hast rebuked the heathen, thou hast destroyed the wicked, thou hast put out their name for ever and ever.

6 O thou enemy, destructions are come to a perpetual end: and thou hast destroyed cities; their memorial is perished with them.

7 But the Lord shall endure for ever: he hath prepared his throne for judgment.

8 And he shall judge the world in righteousness, he shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness.

9 The Lord also will be a refuge for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble.

&c.). Thus the Chaldee paraphrase here interprets. But that this Psalm was not made just after David's victory over him, with respect merely to his death, is apparent from the mention of Zion, ver. 11. 14, which was not then in the hands of Israel; and therefore he only calls to mind (as I said in the beginning) this deliverance upon some fresh occasion he had to implore the mighty assistance of the Divine power, which then first began to appear to him.

Ver. 1.] I will acknowledge, O Lord of heaven and earth, thy omnipotent goodness, with the heartiest devotion and entire affection to thee. Nor will I content myself to praise thee for this last victory alone, but on this occasion commemorate all the wonders thou hast formerly done for me.

Ver. 2.] The thoughts of which are so pleasing and delightful to me, that I cannot but be exceeding glad and leap for joy, while I celebrate with my songs thy supreme majesty, whose power infinitely excels the united force of all creatures upon earth.

Ver. 3.] It was thou who madest my enemies turn their backs, and seek for safety in flight (1 Sam. xvii. 51): and the dread of thee so pursued them, that they stumbled and fell down wounded (ver. 52), and were destroyed, because they saw thee appear against them.

Ver. 4.] For in that great controversy between us and the Philistines (1 Sam. xvii. 9), wherein I stood up against Goliath, thou didst take my part (as thou hast done since in many other battles), asserting the cause which I defended, and openly giving judgment on my side.

Ver. 5.] Thou hast given a terrible rebuke to the audacious insolence of those nations; thou hast cut off their daring champion, who so impiously defied thy armies, and cursed me by his gods: thou hast put them to shame, and made their names infamous to all generations.

Ver. 6.] O thou insulting enemy, who in thy own thoughts hadst completely devoured us, where are the utter desolations thou threatenedst to our country, and the cities which thou intendest to lay even with the ground? how vain were thy hopes of leaving no remembrance of them but in their ruins.

Ver. 7.] Such shall be the end of all the rest of my enemies, who can never prevail against the Lord. For though earthly thrones may tumble down, he and his throne cannot possibly be disturbed, but remain fixed for ever; and his justice is as immutable, which he will equally dispense to all.

Ver. 8.] For his jurisdiction is not limited, nor can

10 And they that know thy name will put their trust in thee: for thou, Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek thee.

11 Sing praises to the Lord, which dwelleth in Zion: declare among the people his doings.

12 When he maketh inquisition for blood, he remembereth them: he forgetteth not the cry of the humble.

13 Have mercy upon me, O Lord; consider my trouble which I suffer of them that hate me, thou that liftest me up from the gates of death:

14 That I may shew forth all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion: I will rejoice in thy salvation.

his justice be corrupted; but the whole world is under his government, and no wicked man is so powerful that he should be able to escape his vengeance, which shall pursue every one of them, and render to him exactly according as he deserves.

Ver. 9.] And as he will punish the wicked, be their authority never so great, so he will preserve the righteous, be they never so helpless. They may safely fly unto him for sanctuary against the unjust persecutions of their mighty oppressors, and he will give them seasonable relief in all their distresses.

Ver. 10.] All they that are acquainted with thee, and with the merciful and just methods of thy providence, will consent to this; and, abhorring all undue ways of saving themselves in troublesome times will heartily confide in thee: for it was never known that thou, Lord, hast left any man destitute of thy help, who hath piously made his constant addresses to thee.

Ver. 11.] Let them join, therefore, their songs with mine, and praise the Lord, who dwells among us by his special presence in the sanctuary. Let us make all the world know what wonderful things he hath done for us, that they may also learn to trust in him.

Ver. 12.] Who, though he may seem to wink for a time at the cruelty of violent men, yet will call them at last to a strict account for all the innocent blood they have shed, and for their unjust and unmerciful usage of meek and humble persons; whose cry he never forgets (though he doth not presently answer it), but takes a fit time to be avenged of their oppressors.

Ver. 13.] In confidence of this, I cry unto thee now, O Lord, for my seasonable relief, in this necessitous condition to which my enemies have reduced me. O merciful God, who hast delivered me from the greatest dangers, from the lion and the bear, from Goliath, who thought to give my flesh to the birds and the beasts (1 Sam. xvii. 44), from Saul, and all others who were ready to swallow me up; cast a gracious eye upon my present distress, and bring me out of it.

Ver. 14.] That I may go into thy sanctuary (which now thou hast placed in Zion), and there, in the most frequent assemblies of thy people, add this to all the rest of thy praises, that thou hast heard my cry. O how joyful shall I be! how shall I triumph, when I magnify thy power in my deliverance!

Ver. 15.] Which the experience I have had of thy goodness makes me comfortably expect: for I have often seen, all the designs and contrivances of the Philistines and other nations against thy people, to conclude in nothing but their own utter ruin; their engines recoil upon themselves, as Goliath was slain by his own sword.

Ver. 16.] This is a thing notorious to all, and for which thou art renowned. By this thou convincest the minds of those that deny thy providence. Nor is there anything more admirable, and worthy of our meditation, than this thy righteous judgment upon the ungodly; when they are entangled in their own devices, and, contrary to all expectation, bring upon themselves that destruction which they had prepared for others.

Ver. 17.] This makes me confident that I am not deceived, when I look to see these wicked men, who now seek my ruin, precipitate themselves into the pit of destruction. Nay, so shall all those people perish (though never so numerous), who, forgetting what God had done to others, proceed on in the same impious designs against the innocent.

the expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever.

19 Arise, O LORD: let not man prevail: let the heathen be judged in thy sight.

20 Put them in fear, O LORD: that the nations may know themselves to be but men. Selah.

Ver. 18.] For the Lord, in due time, will show that he doth not neglect them when they are poor and helpless, though for the present he defer to relieve them. Let them patiently wait upon him under their affliction, and he will not fail their expectation.

Ver. 19.] And may I desire thee, O Lord, to delay no longer! O suffer not weak and wretched man to domineer on this fashion, nay, boast of his victories; but call all those nations that oppose thee to an account, and condemn them to that punishment which they deserve.

Ver. 20.] Strike a terror into them, O Lord, by some sharp vengeance inflicted on them. Shake out of their mind the vain opinion they have of themselves and of their power; and make the nations sensible they are but frail and miserable men.

PSALM X.

1 WHY standest thou afar off, O LORD? why hidest thou thyself in times of trouble?

2 The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor: let them be taken in the devices that they have imagined.

3 For the wicked boasteth of his heart's desire, and blesseth the covetous, whom the LORD abhorreth.

4 The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God: God is not in all his thoughts.

5 His ways are always grievous; thy judgments are far above out of his sight: as for all his enemies, he puffeth at them.

6 He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved: for I shall never be in adversity.

7 His mouth is full of cursing and deceit and fraud: under his tongue is mischief and vanity.

PSALM X.

ARGUMENT.—It is not known by whom, or on what occasion, this Psalm was composed: but it is a most lively description of the insolency of wicked atheistical men, when they have power, and are in authority; which they abuse to the oppression of the meaner or weaker sort, and make no conscience by what arts they bring their designs about. Against whom the Psalmist humbly beseeches the divine vengeance, and rests confident they shall be suppressed.

Ver. 1.] It is strange, O Lord, to see thee, who hast done us the peculiar honour to say we have thee nigh unto us on all occasions (Dent. iv. 7), now withdraw thyself to such a distance from us, that there is no sign of thy coming to our relief. It perplexes our thoughts, and we cannot find the reason of it, that now, in these grievous straits, which seem to us the fittest opportunity, thou dost not appear for our deliverance.

Ver. 2.] If our great affliction do not move thy pity towards us, yet the intolerable pride and insolent rage of the wicked, we are prone to expect, should meet with a rebuke from thy just indignation. Especially since he oppresses the poor, who have no friend but thee alone; whose glory also it is to humble arrogant men, by making those very devices cast them down, whereby they thought to ruin others, and exalt themselves. O that we might see them fall in this remarkable manner!

Ver. 3.] For whilst the wicked prospers thus in all his designs, he is not only encouraged in those evil courses, but glories in them, and brags that he can do what he lists. Nay, it doth not suffice him to do evil himself, but he commends and praises the unjust extortions and rapines of other violent men; whom he accounts happy, though the Lord abhors them.

Ver. 4.] But it is to no purpose to tell him how the Lord abhors them; for, scornfully rejecting all such good admonitions, he will not do so much as inquire and consider whether there be a God or not; but rather boldly concludes there is no God, or, if there be, that he cares not what we do.

Ver. 5.] And therefore, though all his business be to molest and torment his neighbours, and he is always bringing forth some mischief or other, yet that thou wilt judge him for it is the farthest thing from his thoughts: and as for those men that are his adversaries, he contemns them all, and values them not a straw.

Ver. 6.] He confidently promises himself that none shall be able to disturb him, and rests secure he shall always be thus prosperous, which makes him resolve he will never alter his wicked course of life, let God or man do what they can against him.

Ver. 7.] Nor sticks at anything that may serve his ends; for he makes no conscience to call for one curse after another upon himself, to confirm those oaths or promises which he never intends to keep; but by this impious means to deceive and cheat those that rely upon his word. He speaks very fair; but it is only 8 He sitteth in the lurking places of the villages; in the secret places doth he murder the innocent: his eyes are privily set against the poor.

9 He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den; he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth them into his net.

10 He croucheth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones.

11 He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten: he hideth his face; he will never see it.

12 Arise, O Lord; O God, lift up thy hand: forget not the humble.

13 Wherefore doth the wicked contemn God?

to hide the mischievous wickedness which lurks in his heart.

Ver. 8.] And if he cannot this way compass all his designs, he makes no scruple to rob and kill upon the highway; near unto which he lurks, and in covert places, where nobody sees him, shoots at the innocent traveller: especially when he sees he is defenceless, and hath none to help him.

Ver. 9.] He lies as close as a lion in his den; and is as cruel when he hath caught his prey. A fowler is not more cunning to draw the birds to his net, than he to get poor helpless men into his power, that he may devour them.

Ver. 10.] For he can counterfeit himself (if occasion serve) to be a harmless traveller: and look so humbly and innocently, that the poor man, on whom he intends to seize, suspecting no danger, will lie the more open to his sudden and violent assault.

Ver. 11.] From which God himself, he thinks will not protect him. They call him (saith he within his heart) the omnipotent, and the poor commit themselves unto him: but what cares he for them? he regards them not, and will never call me to any account for what I have done against them.

Ver. 12.] Confute these blasphemies, O Lord; and delay no longer, O thou omnipotent judge of the world, to appear in just displeasure against them. Stretch forth thy hand to confound these violent oppressors, and to relieve all thy afflicted servants.

Ver. 13.] What is it, but thy long-suffering, and bearing so much with them, that makes the wicked thus insolently despise thee? He concludes, thou he hath said in his heart thou wilt not require it.

14 Thou hast seen it; for thou beholdest mischief and spite, to requite it with thy hand; thou poor committeth himself unto thee; thou art the helper of the fatherless.

15 Break thou the arm of the wicked and the evil man: seek out his wickedness till thou find none.

16 The Lord is King for ever and ever: the heathen are perished out of his land.

17 Lord, thou hast heard the desire of the humble: thou wilt prepare their heart, thou wilt cause thine ear to hear:

18 To judge the fatherless and the oppressed, that the man of the earth may no more oppress.

wilt never punish him, because thou art so patient with him.

Ver. 14.] I doubt not, indeed, that thou takest notice of their villany, and that thou wilt requite them in their kind, for all the mischief and vexation of which they have been the authors. The poor have reason to commend their cause to thee; and to expect that thou wilt do them right, who art the protector of the weak and friendless, who have nothing to rely upon but thy goodness.

Ver. 15.] But the wicked will never believe this, as long as they are able to do mischief; and therefore I beseech thee to despoil them of all their power to hurt and oppress thy people. Be avenged on them for their wickedness, after which they fancy thou wilt not inquire, and let there be no footsteps of it remaining.

Ver. 16.] Thou canst easily do it, being the same everlasting King, by whose authority and power the seven impious nations were expelled out of this land.

Ver. 17.] And I believe thou wilt do it, O Lord, who hast so often since granted the desire of the afflicted. Thou wilt dispose their heart humbly to wait upon thee, and then vouchsafe them a favourable audience:

Ver. 18.] When they pray thee to assert the right of the fatherless, and other poor helpless people, and to punish their insolent oppressors: that those tyrants sprung out of the earth, and who deserve to be tumbled down thither again, may be no longer terrible to them.

PSALM XI.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 In the Lord put I my trust: how say ye to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain?

2 For, lo, the wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string, that they may privily shoot at the upright in heart.

PSALM XI.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, the title tells us, was composed by David: and very likely (as Theodoret and others conjecture) when Saul persecuted him, and some advised him to seek his safety in flight: or rather, when Saul began to have evil designs against him; and he was invited by some, who pretended friendship to him, to a place of safety in the mountainous country of Judea. When he came to the crown, he delivered it to the master of music in the tabernacle, to be sung there in remembrance of what then passed between his friends, him, and God Almighty, in whom he placed his hope.

Ver. 1.] It is not in fortresses or friends that I place my confidence, and hope for safety, but only in the Lord, who hath anointed me his king. On him I rely; and therefore do not put me in fear, and bid me fly away thus speedily, like a timorous bird before the fowler, to your place of security.

Ver. 2.] Behold, say you, the danger wherein thou art is no less imminent, than when a fowler hath bent his bow, and fitted his arrow upon the string, and, ly-

3 If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?

4 The LORD is in his holy temple, the LORD's throne is in heaven: his eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men.

5 The LORD trieth the righteous: but the ing close, hath the bird in his eye, whom he means to shoot: for just so have Saul and his wicked counselors laid their plot on a sudden to destroy thee.

Ver. 3.] And if men have no regard to laws and public decrees, which are the foundation of human society, but will boldly violate all known and standing rules of justice and truth, what security can an honest man have? or what should he do, but make haste away from this court, where they act so arbitrarily, and are so perfidious?

Ver. 4.] My answer is, that the world is not governed by chance, nor can men carry things just as they please: but the Lord, into whose holy palace no unjust counsels can possibly enter, and whose throne is infinitely above that of the highest king on earth: he, I say, is the supreme and most righteous ruler of all affairs; and no mischief can be so secretly contrived, no wicked design so artificially dissembled, but it lies open before his eyes, and he sees through it; nor need he take any pains to discover it; for at the first glance, as we speak, he perfectly discerns how all men are inclined, and looks to the very bottom of their hearts.

Ver. 5.] And he may think fit to try the fidelity of him whom he knows to be upright, by many adversiwicked and him that loveth violence his soul hateth.

6 Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup.

7 For the righteous LORD loveth righteousness; his countenance doth behold the upright.

ties; that he may afterward give him the more illustrious testimonies of his approbation and love. But whatsoever success the wicked, and he that delights in doing mischief, may have for the present, he is most hateful to God; and he will without fail severely punish him, for abusing his power to oppression and violent dealing.

Ver. 6.] The wicked may think themselves very secure, because they are so cunning and so strong; but how can they defend themselves against the Lord, who hath innumerable ways to ensnare them when they least think of it; and can as unexpectedly overthrow all their forces, as, when the heavens are most serene, a sudden storm of thunder, and lightning, and tempestuous blasts arises, and tears up the trees by the roots? Thus the Sodomites, thus the Egyptians perished; and such measure will the wise Dispenser of all punishments mete to these violent oppressors.

Ver. 7.] For the Lord, who is just in his own nature, and in all his ways, loves none but those who are like himself; and therefore he will plague all injurious persons, but with special favour defend and reward all upright men, who steadfastly keep (notwithstanding all the injuries they receive) in the paths of righteousness.

PSALM XII.

To the chief Musician upon Sheminith. A Psalm of David.

1 HELP, LORD; for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men.

2 They speak vanity every one with his neighbour: with flattering lips and with a double heart do they speak.

3 The LORD shall cut off all flattering lips, and the tongue that speaketh proud things:

4 Who have said, With our tongue will we prevail; our lips are our own: who is lord over us?

5 For the oppression of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the LORD; I will set him in safety from him that puffeth at him.

6 The words of the LORD are pure words: as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times.

PSALM XII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm was composed by David, and delivered to the master of music in the tabernacle, to be sung as the sixth psalm, upon the harp with eight strings. The occasion of it is not expressed, but it is a sad complaint of the corrupt manners of that age (especially of the court of Saul, ver. 3), in which it was hard to find an honest, plain-dealing man, in whom one might confide. Some think it aims partly at Doeg, and such like courtiers; partly at the Ziphites, and such perfidious people in the country, who, promising him their friendship (as Theodore understands it), would have most basely betrayed him unto Saul, his declared enemy.

Ver. 1.] Lord, be thou my safeguard, for there is no such thing as kindness and friendship to be found among men: I dare trust myself with none of them; for there is not so much as any truth and honesty left in the world.

Ver. 2.] One neighbour cannot with safety believe another; they are all liars and dissemblers, pretending fair in words, but meaning quite otherways.

Ver. 3.] This vice hath spread itself so universally among us, that it cannot be rooted up, but only by the hand of Heaven: which will destroy these pestilent deceivers; who speak also big and blasphemous words, whereby they daunt those that are below them.

Ver. 4.] We will have the better, say they, of all those that oppose us; and our tongues are the weapons whereby we will get the victory. They are our own; who shall hinder us from employing them to supplant whom we please! whether it be true or false which we say, what is that to anybody; or who shall call us to an account for it?

Ver. 5.] That will the Lord; whom the sighs, and tears, and miserable groans of those poor wretches who are oppressed by your calumnies, have moved to resolve to take a speedy vengeance on you. He hath absolutely determined to rescue and deliver them from your snares and fraudulent practices: you may puff and storm as much as you please, but shall not be able to hinder it.

Ver. 6.] For the promises of God are not deceitful like yours, but sincere, and void of all guile: the purest silver, refined to the greatest perfection, is not more free from dross than they are from all mixture of falsehood.

7 Thou shalt keep them, O LORD, thou shalt preserve them from this generation for ever.

Ver. 7.] I am confident, O Lord, thou wilt perform them, and not suffer thy words to fail. Thou wilt ever preserve him that confides in thee from this perverse generation, how oft soever they renew their attempts against him.

Ver. 8.] Which will make the wicked not know which way to turn themselves; but be ready to burst with anger and vexation, when they see those poor men whom they contemned and vilified not only preserved, but exalted by thy favour to dignity and honour.

PSALM XIII.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 How long wilt thou forget me, O LORD? for ever? how long wilt thou hide thy face from me?

2 How long shall I take counsel in my soul, having sorrow in my heart daily? how long shall mine enemy be exalted over me?

3 Consider and hear me, O LORD my God: lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death;

PSALM. XIII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm was composed by David, and delivered to the master of music in the tabernacle. It is not known to what time it relates, but by the matter of it we understand he was in some great distress when he indited it, either by the persecution of Saul or of Absalom. Theodoret thinks the latter, and gives this reason for it: that the trouble which Saul gave him was before his great sin, and so he was full of confidence; but that of Absalom was after it, which made him cry out in this doleful manner.

Ver. 1.] What a sad condition is this, O Lord, into which I am fallen, and in which thou seemest to neglect me! I have waited a long time for some glimpse of thy favour, but can see no sign of deliverance, nor tell how long thou intendest to delay it.

Ver. 2.] O how afflictive is it, that there is no end of my anxious thoughts! but I am always casting in my mind, with a heavy heart, where I shall shift for my life, and can think myself in no place secure. The power of my enemy is very great, and threatens, like a tempest hanging over my head, every moment to fall upon me. O when shall I see it dispersed!

4 Lest mine enemy say, I have prevailed against him; and those that trouble me rejoice when I am moved.

5 But I have trusted in thy mercy; my heart shall rejoice in thy salvation.

6 I will sing unto the LORD, because he hath dealt bountifully with me.

Ver. 3.] Thus I sigh perpetually to thee, O Lord, the omnipotent ruler and just judge of the world; beseeching thee to commiserate my affliction, and, as thou hast done often, to answer my prayer. Thou seest with what dangers I am encompassed, and how forlorn and dismal my condition is: endure me with wisdom and circumspection, that I may escape these dangers; and revive and cheer me under these sad afflictions, lest my spirit sink within me, or the enemy destroy me.

Ver. 4.] Let not him that persecutes me boast of his success, as he certainly will, unless thou affordest me thy conduct and comfort; which I humbly again implore, that they who join with him may not have the pleasure to see me fall, and insult over my misery.

Ver. 5.] I am unworthy, indeed, of thy favour; but hope thou wilt magnify thine own mercy, in which I have placed such an entire confidence, that I persuade myself I shall have the joy to see thee deliver me out of all these distresses.

Ver. 6.] Which shall be acknowledged with the most cheerful hymns of praise and thanksgiving to the Lord, who hath dealt so well with me, as to render to me not according to my merits, but according to my hope and trust in his inconceivable mercy.

PSALM XIV.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 THE fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. They are corrupt, they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good.

PSALM XIV.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm (which was composed, as the foregoing, by David, and delivered by him to the master of music in the tabernacle) may probably refer, though it be not in the title expressed, to the universal apostasy of the people, in the rebellion of Absalom, from the allegiance they owed to him, and from the duty they owed to God.

Ver. 1.] Though the wicked are not yet so impu-

2 The LORD looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God.

3 They are all gone aside, they are all together

ident as openly to deny God with their mouths, yet such is their abominable filthiness, so shameless are they in their wickedness, so universally depraved, that their secret thoughts sure are, God takes no notice what they do, or that he will not judge them for it.

Ver. 2.] But let them know that he exactly observes them; and that all the ways of the sons of men are naked and bare before his eyes: though, alas! there is nothing now to be seen but ignorance and contempt of his majesty.

become filthy : there is none that doeth good, no, not one.

4 Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread, and call not upon the LORD.

5 There were they in great fear : for God is in the generation of the righteous.

Ver. 3.] The whole nation hath lost all sense of their duty; and, like a body without a spirit, is so rotten and putrefied, that it is hard to find so much as one that hath any sense of goodness in him.

Ver. 4.] Strange! that they should all be thus senseless; as not only to injure and oppress my poor innocent people, but to be cruel and void of all pity towards them, and to throw off likewise all religion.

Ver. 5.] What a terror will it be to them to see the divine vengeance seize on them when they think themselves most secure! for he who is the righteous judge will not desert those who are faithful to him, but graciously deliver them.

Ver. 6.] Your confusion, O ye atheistical fools,

6 Ye have shamed the counsel of the poor, because the LORD is his refuge.

7 Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! when the LORD bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad.

will be the greater, because you mocked and jeered at that poor despicable party of men who resolved to adhere to piety and virtuous loyalty, and to wait patiently upon God, and trust in him alone for safety:

Ver. 7.] Who is mighty to save, whatsoever you think, and resides by a special token of his presence in mount Zion. O that it might please him to send us deliverance from thence, and to restore us again to the happy enjoyment of that place from whence we are banished! it would turn our sad lamentations into the most cheerful thanksgivings, and fill not only Judah, but all the tribes of Israel, with joy and gladness (2 Sam. xix. 9, &c.).

PSALM XV.

A Psalm of David.

1 LORD, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?

2 He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart.

3 He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour.

4 In whose eyes a vile person is contemned; but he honoureth them that fear the LORD. He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not.

5 He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent. He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

PSALM XV.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, in which he excites the people to the study of solid virtue, was composed by David, either when he brought the ark to mount Zion (2 Sam. vi.), or when he was restored thither again (as he desired in the conclusion of the foregoing Psalm), after the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. xix.). Then it was very seasonable to admonish them to live better, as became those who were under the government of God (as Theodoret excellently speaks), and had received such a great deliverance from him.

Ver. 1.] Lord, what a happiness is it, that thou wilt be pleased to dwell among us in this mountain wherein thou hast pitched thy tabernacle! but who shall have the honour to be admitted into thy society, and enjoy all the privileges of a true worshipper of thee?

Ver. 2.] I hear thee answer (methinks) as if a voice came from thy holy oracle, saying, Not all that are descended of Abraham, nor every one that offers me sacrifices and observes my appointed rites; but he who completely endeavours to please me in all the parts of a holy life, exercising justice and mercy to his neighbour, as well as piety to me; and taking care he wrong not his neighbour in words no more than in deeds.

Ver. 3.] He that doth not abuse his tongue to calumny and detraction, nor is any other way injurious to his neighbour; who neither reproaches his neighbour himself, nor lightly believes, increases, or spreads the reproaches which are begun by others.

Ver. 4.] Who never courts men for their riches and power, if their wickedness makes them despicable; but honours those who are truly pious, though never so poor: and who hath such a respect to religion, that whatsoever he promises by oath he will perform, though he loses never so much by keeping his faith.

Ver. 5.] He who orders his private affairs so exactly, that he makes no gain of the money he lends to his poor brethren (Exod. xxii. 25. Deut. xxiii. 19, 20), and behaves himself so well, when he is in public office, that no gift can corrupt him to condemn the innocent or absolve the guilty. He that lives after this manner need never fear to fall from my favour.

PSALM XVI.

Michtam of David.

1 PRESERVE me, O God: for in thee do I put my trust.

PSALM XVI.

ARGUMENT.—A most excellent Psalm of David, more precious than any jewel, and worthy to be inscribed

2 O my soul, thou hast said unto the LORD, Thou art my LORD: my goodness extendeth not to thee; on a marble pillar, to endure to all posterity. For beside admirable expressions of his faith and confidence in God (though he was most violently perse-

3 But to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight.

4 Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another god: their drink offerings of blood will I not offer, nor take up their names into my lips.

5 The LORD is the portion of mine inheritance and of my cup: thou maintainest my lot.

6 The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage.

7 I will bless the LORD, who hath given me counsel: my reins also instruct me in the night seasons.

cuted by Saul, and forced to fly into foreign countries), it contains a prophecy of the resurrection of our Lord Christ from the dead.

Ver. 1.] Thou seest, O most mighty God, with what dangers I am encompassed: defend and protect me, I beseech thee, for I depend upon thee alone for safety.

Ver. 2.] I ever did so, as my conscience testifies; and therefore I hope thou wilt still continue my gracious God. Not that I can merit any favour of thee, or by any good that I can do requite thy kindness to me:

Ver. 3.] But if thou wilt be pleased to protect me, I will employ all my power, (when I come to the throne) to protect the pious in the land: worthy men, who excel in virtue, shall be preferred and honoured; for they are the persons who are most dear to me, and in whose company alone I delight.

Ver. 4.] They multiply idols (here in this place whither I am driven, 1 Sam. xxvi. 19), and are zealous in the service of another god: but I will never forsake thee, by partaking with them in their abominable sacrifices, in which the blood of men is offered, nor by swearing by the name of any of their false gods.

Ver. 5.] The Lord of heaven and earth is the God whom I serve: he who is the supreme dispenser of all things hath given me a kingdom for my portion, where he himself is worshipped; and he will defend and maintain my title to it while I adhere to him:

Ver. 6.] As I am resolved to do: for there is no place so pleasant as that where he is worshipped, no country comparable to that (for all manner of good things) which he hath settled upon me, though I am not yet possessed of it.

8 I have set the LORD always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved.

9 Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth: my flesh also shall rest in hope.

10 For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption.

11 Thou wilt shew me the path of life: in thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.

Ver. 7.] I will therefore praise the Lord, and acknowledge his love; who hath hitherto guided me to behave myself so prudently, that my enemies have not been able to surprise me. In the darkest night of affliction, when I could not see my way, he hath secretly inspired my mind with wise thoughts, and admonished me what course to take for my preservation.

Ver. 8.] This hath ever been my practice, to conceive God always present to me: and since he is still nigh to support and defend me, the fiercest assaults of my enemies shall never be able to deject me from that dignity which he has designed for me.

Ver. 9.] In confidence of which, I feel not only a perfect satisfaction, but joy and triumph of heart. My tongue cannot but boast of it, and he my condition never so weak and low, I shall rest in hope to be raised up again.

Ver. 10.] For thou wilt not suffer me to remain always in this forlorn condition, nor let him whom thou hast anointed to be thy king be destroyed by Saul: "much less let that great king perish (whom thou hast promised of my seed); but though they kill him and lay him in his grave, thou wilt take him from thence, and raise him from the dead, before his body be in the least corrupted."

Ver. 11.] Thou wilt show me the way to escape out of all these dangers ("and do much more for the Messiah, who, being raised from the dead, shall live eternally"); and not only preserve my life, but satiate me with joy, when thy favour hath settled me on the throne, by that almighty power which is able to dispense everlasting happiness; "and will certainly exalt the Messiah to reign at thy right hand in endless joy and pleasure, after all his grievous sufferings."

PSALM XVII.

A Prayer of David.

1 I HEAR the right, O LORD, attend unto my cry, give ear unto my prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips.

2 Let my sentence come forth from thy presence; let thine eyes behold the things that are equal.

3 Thou hast proved my heart; thou hast visited me in the night; thou hast tried me, and who art the righteous judge of the world; beseeching thee to deal with me according to the justice of my cause. It is my most earnest request to thee; and I desire no favour of thee if these lips have spoken any deceitful words against Saul, or do now dissemble with thy majesty.

Ver. 2.] Who hast long suspended thy sentence and let my enemies pursue me as if I was guilty: but I humbly entreat thee at last openly to acquit me, and to show that thou regardest the greatness of no man's person, but only his uprightness and integrity.

Ver. 3.] Thou art privy to the inmost thoughts of my heart; in the greatest retirements thou seest what

PSALM XVII.

ARGUMENT.—A prayer of David; wherein he humbly represents to God his innocence in those things whereof he was accused (of affecting the kingdom, I suppose, and seeking the life of Saul, 1 Sam. xxiv. 9); and therefore beseeches him to grant him deliverance from his persecutors and calumniators (Saul, it is most likely, and those that set him on). See Theodoret.

Ver. 1.] I am oppressed, O Lord, with such false accusations, that I have no way but to appeal to thee, shalt find nothing ; I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress.

4 Concerning the works of men, by the word of thy lips I have kept me from the paths of the destroyer.

5 Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not.

6 I have called upon thee, for thou wilt hear me, O God : incline thine ear unto me, and hear my speech.

7 Shew thy marvellous lovingkindness, O thou that savest by thy right hand them which put their trust in thee from those that rise up against them.

8 Keep me as the apple of the eye, hide me under the shadow of thy wings, 9 From the wicked that oppress me, from my deadly enemies, who compass me about.

I design ; and hast tried me also (as gold in the fire) by many afflictions, which thou didst never find to make me think of any unlawful courses for my preservation ; but still I have been what I pretended, and my words and secret thoughts have always agreed together.

Ver. 4.] I know what men are apt to do in such circumstances ; but the respect I bear to thy commandments hath preserved me from those murderous practices which the violent man would have boldly attempted (1 Sam. xxvi. 8).

Ver. 5.] And I beseech thee, still confirm me in this resolution, that no temptation may make me forsake that track of virtue in which I have hitherto persisted ;

Ver. 6.] And in which I doubt not to be safe : for I have never yet cried unto thee but thou hast granted my request, and wilt not now, I hope, refuse to condescend unto it ; but admit of this appeal which I make to thee, and do me right.

Ver. 7.] Thy mercy will appear most wonderful in my preservation from this imminent danger wherein I am. Magnify it, therefore, O thou whose property it is to interpose thy mighty power, for the deliverance of such as confide in nothing but thy omnipotent goodness, from those who rise up against them to destroy them.

Ver. 8.] I commend myself to thy watchful providence, beseeching thee to defend me with the same care that we do that tender part in the midst of our eye. As a hen covers her chickens under her wings, from the ravenous bird that hovers over them to devour them :

Ver. 9.] So do thou, O Lord, protect me (who fly unto thee for safety) from the wicked that are about to seize on me and spoil me ; from those deadly enemies which have beset me round with eager desires and hopes to destroy me.

10 They are inclosed in their own fat : with their mouth they speak proudly.

11 They have now compassed us in our steps : they have set their eyes bowing down to the earth ;

12 Like as a lion that is greedy of his prey, and as it were a young lion lurking in secret places.

13 Arise, O LORD, disappoint him, cast him down : deliver my soul from the wicked, which is thy sword :

14 From men which are thy hand, O LORD, from men of the world, which have their portion in this life, and whose belly thou fillest with thy hid treasure : they are full of children, and leave the rest of their substance to their babes.

15 As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness : I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness.

Ver. 10.] Who are so stuffed with worldly goods, and have thriven so long in their ungodly courses, that they are grown extremely proud of their power : and not only haughtily threaten my destruction, but presumptuously brag as if they had already accomplished their desire.

Ver. 11.] And, indeed, they have now gotten me and my followers into a very great strait (1 Sam. xxiii. 26) : and which way soever we turn ourselves, we are in danger to fall into the hands of those who have stedfastly resolved our utter ruin.

Ver. 12.] No lion can be more desirous to tear a lamb in pieces, than Saul is to make a prey of me. Like a young lion in his den, he watches when an opportunity will offer itself that he may fall upon me (1 Sam. xxiii. 7, 8. xxiv. 2, &c.).

Ver. 13.] Delay no longer, therefore, O Lord, but speedily appear to defeat him. Throw him down to the ground, when he thinks to fall upon me ; and though thou hast suffered the wicked to wound me sorely, yet let him not kill me, who depended upon thy power, which is able to deliver me.

Ver. 14.] He hath many, I know, that join with him to destroy me ; but they are only mortal men, O Lord, who can do nothing but what thou permittest them for my correction : worldly men, who look no farther than this present life ; and desire no other satisfaction but to be very rich, to have a numerous posterity, and to leave them great estates when they can enjoy them no longer.

Ver. 15.] Which prosperity I do in no wise envy them, but think myself happy that I can approach into thy presence, and, with a good conscience, wait for thy favour ; nothing doubting, but when thou shalt show thyself in thy majesty and power, it will be abundantly to my satisfaction.

PSALM XVIII.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David, the servant of the Lord, who spake unto the Lord the words of this song, in the day that the Lord delivered him from the hand of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul : and he said,

1 I WILL love thee, O LORD, my strength.

2 The LORD is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer ; my God, my strength, in whom I will trust ; my buckler, and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower.

3 I will call upon the LORD, who is worthy to

PSALM XVIII.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by David (whom the Lord chose to serve him in governing the children of Israel), and delivered by him to the master of the music in the tabernacle, for a perpetual commemoration of God's gracious care over him, and be praised : so shall I be saved from mine enemies.

4 The sorrows of death compassed me, and the floods of ungodly men made me afraid.

5 The sorrows of hell compassed me about : the snares of death prevented me.

6 In my distress I called upon the Lord, and cried unto my God : he heard my voice out of his temple, and my cry came before him, even into his ears.

7 Then the earth shook and trembled ; the foundations also of the hills moved and were shaken, because he was wroth.

8 There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured : coals were kindled by it.

9 He bowed the heavens also, and came down : and darkness was under his feet.

10 And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly : yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind.

preservation of him, through the whole course of the long persecution and opposition he met withal, before he could get the kingdom. For which singular providence, he still gave particular thanks to God after every deliverance or victory which he vouchsafed him : but, at last (so great was his piety), he made one general acknowledgment of God's goodness to him, when he was peaceably settled upon his throne, in delivering him from the Philistines, the Syrians, and other nations, who rose up against him (and that in a miraculous manner, as he describes it, ver. 13, 14, &c. where Theodoret observes, that, in his time, God scattered the enemies of Christians by the like dreadful tempests) ; but especially from Saul who (as he was the first, so) was the most violent, implacable, and dangerous of all his enemies.

The sense of the Psalm is this :

Ver. 1.] I love thee, O Lord, to whom I owe my safety and preferment, with the most passionate and ardent affection : and I will never cease to love thee thus, as long as ever I live :

Ver. 2.] For it was not the caves and lurking-places (1 Sam. xxii. 1. 5. xxiii. 23), nor the fortresses and strong holds (xxiii. 14. 19. 29), the rocks and impregnable forts (xxiv. 2), the high mountains and steep hills to which I fled (xxvi. 1), that preserved me from my enemies ; but the Lord Almighty, whom I made my refuge, and whom I acknowledge for my deliverer : to his gracious providence, and powerful protection, I ascribe my safety, and will never confide in any other security ; he defended me in the most dangerous assaults of my enemies, he repelled all their forces, and placed me out of the reach of their violence.

Ver. 3.] Praised therefore be the Lord, unto whom I humbly commended myself by prayer (as I mean to do always) in my distresses, and he delivered me from all my enemies.

Ver. 4.] When there appeared no way for my escape, but they thought they had me as sure as a bird taken in a net ; when whole troops of ungodly men came pouring in upon me as a torrent, that threatened to sweep me quite away ;

Ver. 5.] When I had no more power to help myself than a dead man bound hand and foot in his grave ; (so suddenly was I entangled in their deadly snares, 1 Sam. xxiii. 26).

Ver. 6.] This was my belief in such grievous straits :
VOL. II.—104.

11 He made darkness his secret place ; his pavilion round about him were dark waters and thick clouds of the skies.

12 At the brightness that was before him his thick clouds passed, hail stones, and coals of fire.

13 The Lord also thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave his voice ; hail stones and coals of fire.

14 Yea, he sent out his arrows, and scattered them ; and he shot out lightnings, and discomfited them.

15 Then the channels of waters were seen, and the foundations of the world were discovered at thy rebuke, O Lord, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.

16 He sent from above, he took me, he drew me out of many waters.

17 He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them which hated me : for they were too strong for me.

I made my usual addresses to the Lord, and with great earnestness supplicated my most merciful God, who had so often delivered me : and, though he be so infinitely above us in his heavenly palace, he did not despise my petition, but it was admitted into his presence, and found a gracious audience.

Ver. 7.] For he instantly appeared in a sensible manner to confound my enemies ; who saw his wrathful displeasure in the dreadful tempest which fell upon them, and made the very earth tremble under them.

Ver. 8.] There was nothing to be seen but fuming smoke and devouring fire ; which, at his command, shot out burning coals among them.

Ver. 9.] His glorious majesty also visibly showed itself, bowing the heavens (the place of its residence), and coming down in a thick cloud, which was spread as a carpet under it.

Ver. 10.] Some of the principal angels were its chariot, wherein it rode very swiftly ; and a rapid wind was a token of their presence (2 Sam. v. 24).

Ver. 11.] A great darkness obscured it ; for round about it were the rest of the heavenly ministers disposed to attend upon it in watery vapours and thick clouds of the sky.

Ver. 12.] Who, going forth from his glorious presence, sent hail-stones and coals of fire (as in the days of Joshua, x. 11), in the face of my enemies.

Ver. 13.] Which were followed with such terrible thunder (like that in the days of Samuel, 1 Sam. vii. 10), mixed with more hail-stones and fiery exhalations, as declared the greatness of his majesty, and the mightiness of his power.

Ver. 14.] These were the arrows wherewith he scattered them : there needed no other darts to discomfit them.

Ver. 15.] For even the earth itself was rent and torn by them ; they cleft it asunder, and penetrated so deep, that the secret abysses of it were discovered through the breaches that were made ; when thou, O Lord, in great indignation didst rebuke my enemies.

Ver. 16.] Nothing but such a power from above could have preserved me, which the Lord was pleased graciously to extend to me : he laid hold on me, and kept me from sinking ; he snatched me out of many and great dangers, which, like a deluge, were ready to overwhelm me.

Ver. 17.] He delivered me first from that mighty giant Goliath, and then from Saul, whose power I 18 They prevented me in the day of my calamity : but the LORD was my stay.

19 He brought me forth also into a large place ; he delivered me, because he delighted in me.

20 The LORD rewarded me according to my righteousness ; according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me.

21 For I have kept the ways of the LORD, and have not wickedly departed from my God.

22 For all his judgments were before me, and I did not put away his statutes from me.

23 I was also upright before him, and I kept myself from mine iniquity.

24 Therefore hath the LORD recompensed me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands in his eyesight.

25 With the merciful thou wilt shew thyself merciful ; with an upright man thou wilt shew thyself upright ;

26 With the pure thou wilt shew thyself pure ; and with the froward thou wilt shew thyself froward.

was not able to withstand ; and afterward from the Philistines and Syrians, and many other nations, whose forces were far superior unto mine, and whose hatred instigated them to do all they could to destroy me.

Ver. 18.] When I was weak and unable to resist, they suddenly invaded me ; but the Lord would not suffer them to overthrow me (1 Sam. xxiii. xxiv. &c.).

Ver. 19.] But brought me out of those straits into a state of perfect liberty. He delivered me (when they thought they had pent me up so close that I could not escape them) because he had a kindness for me.

Ver. 20.] He knew also that I was unjustly persecuted ; and therefore rewarded me according to the integrity of my heart, and the purity of my actions ; which were never guilty of that whereof they accused me.

Ver. 21.] For I never took any unlawful courses for my deliverance ; but when Saul fell into my hands, I would not kill him, because he was the Lord's anointed (1 Sam. xxiv. 10).

Ver. 22.] For I laid his precepts before me, as the rule of my actions ; and did not bid them stand aside, when it seemed to be my interest not to observe them :

Ver. 23.] But chose rather to suffer anything than lose my integrity : and how unjustly soever my enemies dealt with me, I would not imitate them ; but, though I could not hinder theirs, kept myself from mine iniquity.

Ver. 24.] And therefore hath the Lord, who administers all things with the exactest justice, and the greatest goodness, heard my prayer (1 Sam. xxvi. 23) : and dealt with me according to my innocent intentions, which would not let me defile my hands with the blood of Saul, when it was in my power to be revenged of him.

Ver. 25.] Such is the gracious method of thy providence, O Lord, who wilt do good to those who do good to others, and do them justice also (against their oppressors and calumniators) who preserve their integrity.

Ver. 26.] And keep thy promises faithfully with those whose piety is unfeigned and who immovably keep their fidelity to thee. But if any will take crooked ways to obtain their ends, thou wilt ensnare them 27 For thou wilt save the afflicted people ; but wilt bring down high looks.

28 For thou wilt light my candle : the LORD my God will enlighten my darkness.

29 For by thee I have run through a troop ; and by my God have I leaped over a wall.

30 As for God, his way is perfect : the word of the LORD is tried : he is a buckler to all those that trust in him.

31 For who is God save the LORD ? or who is a rock save our God ?

32 It is God that girdeth me with strength, and maketh my way perfect.

33 He maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and setteth me upon my high places.

34 He teacheth my hands to war, so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms.

35 Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation : and thy right hand hath holden me up, and thy gentleness hath made me great.

36 Thou hast enlarged my steps under me, that my feet did not slip.

in their own devices ; and by such means as they least think of, lead them to destruction.

Ver. 27.] For thou art wont to deliver those who are poor and miserable, when they humbly wait on thee ; and to lay those low, who (proud of their power) insolently oppress them.

Ver.] 28. I myself am an instance of it, who owe all my prosperity and joy to thee ; by whom (when my hopes were ready to expire, 1 Sam. xxvii. 1), I was brought out of a calamitous estate into this splendour and royal greatness which now I enjoy.

Ver. 29.] For the strongest and most numerous enemies were not able to stand before me : I easily scaled the highest walls, wherein they thought themselves most securely defended against me (2 Sam. v. 7, &c.).

Ver. 30.] God is not like to men, for he never deserts his servants (as men are wont to do those that depend upon them) in difficult and dangerous affairs : his promises are freer from deceit, than the most refined gold from dross ; and none shall be able to hurt those that rely upon them.

Ver. 31.] For who is there that can frustrate his intentions, or resist his will ? What power is there above or equal to his whom we worship, that can injure those whom he will protect, or defend those whom he will destroy ?

Ver. 32.] It was this mighty Lord that inspired me with courage, and removed all obstacles out of my way, to the completing my conquests (2 Sam. v. 10).

Ver. 33.] If swiftness was necessary, he made me as nimble as a hind, to pursue mine enemies even into those places, which, for their height and craginess, were thought inaccessible.

Ver. 34.] If there was need of dexterity or strength, he bestowed it on me to such a degree, that I was able to wrest the strongest bow out of my enemy's hand, and break it in pieces.

Ver. 35.] If at any time I fell into the thickest troops of them, I was safely protected by thee and delivered. Thy mighty power upheld me from being oppressed by their numbers ; and by thy goodness, with a handful of men, I got great victories.

Ver. 36.] Thou didst open a wide passage to me in my greatest straits, and in the most uneven and difficult ways I never stumbled :

37 I have pursued mine enemies, and overtaken them: neither did I turn again till they were consumed.

38 I have wounded them that they were not able to rise: they are fallen under my feet.

39 For thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle: thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me.

40 Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies; that I might destroy them that hate me.

41 They cried, but there was none to save them: even unto the Lord, but he answered them not.

42 Then did I beat them small as the dust before the wind: I did cast them out as the dirt in the streets.

43 Thou hast delivered me from the strivings of the people; and thou hast made me the head of the heathen: a people whom I have not known shall serve me.

Ver. 37.] But having routed my enemies, I pursued them so closely, that I overtook them in their flight, and did not return to my camp till I had destroyed them.

Ver. 38.] I gave them such a blow, that they were not able to renew the fight, but were so perfectly subdued that they lay at my feet.

Ver. 39.] Which is all to be ascribed to thy mighty power, O God; who gavest me both the courage to fight, and success in the encounter, with such numerous enemies as hoped to destroy me.

Ver. 40.] To thy praise I again mention it (not to magnify my own prowess), that they who hated me submitted their very necks to me, that I might kill them, or impose what yoke I pleased on them.

Ver. 41.] They sought for help of their allies and confederates; but it was beyond their power to deliver them; for they were deserted by the Lord, who regarded not their cries unto him;

Ver. 42.] But left them to be beaten and dispersed by me, till they were as weak as the small dust, which is tossed up and down with every wind; and as contemptible as the dirt in the street, which every body tramples under foot.

Ver. 43.] Thus hast thou continued thy kindness to me, till thou seatedst me on the throne, both of Israel and Judah; whose contentions are ceased, and both united in me (2 Sam. v. 1). And, since that time, thou hast not only delivered me from those dangerous rebellions (2 Sam. xviii.), and seditious motions (2 Sam. xx.), which have been raised among my own people to dethrone me; but made foreign nations subject to me, and people whom I had no knowledge of to become my tributaries.

Ver. 44.] The very report of me and of my victories made some of them heartily submit themselves

44 As soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me: the strangers shall submit themselves unto me.

45 The strangers shall fade away, and be afraid out of their close places.

46 The Lord liveth; and blessed be my rock; and let the God of my salvation be exalted.

47 It is God that avengeth me, and subdueth the people unto me.

48 He delivereth me from mine enemies: yea, thou liftest me up above those that rise up against me: thou hast delivered me from the violent man.

49 Therefore will I give thanks unto thee, O Lord, among the heathen, and sing praises unto thy name.

50 Great deliverance giveth he to his king; and sheweth mercy to his anointed, to David, and to his seed for evermore.

to me; and others dissemble their hostility, and offer me their service.

Ver. 45.] They trembled and fell, like withered leaves, at the sound of my name: and, distrusting their strong holds, came creeping out with fear, to surrender them into my hands.

Ver. 46.] Blessed be the Lord (to whose eternal glory and honour I speak all this): let him be everlastingly praised, who hath preserved me in so many dangers: let him, who not only preserved but exalted me, be magnified and exalted with the highest praises.

Ver. 47.] For he is that mighty God (I can never say it often enough), who hath many and many a time executed vengeance for me on those who were injurious to me; and hath brought many nations under my empire.

Ver. 48.] It is he to whom I owe my life (which my enemies, if he had not rescued me, would have taken from me): and, which is more, thou hast made me superior to them all, and set me on a throne, in spite of the fierce and violent persecution of Saul; from which thou didst mercifully deliver me.

Ver. 49.] And therefore I will everywhere make my thankful acknowledgments unto thee, O Lord: those strange nations shall know that I ascribe my victories unto thee; in honour of whose great name I will sing this perpetual song.

Ver. 50.] The Lord hath granted wonderful and manifold deliverances to me; who reign not by usurpation, but by his special appointment; and the same mercy, by which alone I was advanced to this dignity, shall be continued to me, and to my posterity, till the coming of that great King, whose kingdom shall have no end.

PSALM XIX.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 THE heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork.

CHAP. XIX.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by David (and delivered by him to the master of the music in the tabernacle), declaring that no man could be ignorant of God who would consider his admirable works; much less could the Jews, whom he had instructed by his law, and therefore justly expected their greater care not wilfully to offend him.

3 There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard.

4 Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun,

5 Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.

6 His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it: and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.

7 The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple.

8 The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes.

Ver. 1.] There is no part of this great fabric of the world which doth not direct us to a most mighty being, by whom it was made: but above all the rest, the heavens, which are so vastly extended, and wherein we see so many glorious bodies, proclaim aloud to all mankind the immense greatness, and power, and wisdom, and goodness of God; which shine most brightly there.

Ver. 2.] By their settled and orderly revolution the day and the night are made; from whose constant succession, and commodious variations, there issues forth (as water from a fountain) perpetual instruction, and matter of praise and thanks to his most wise goodness.

Ver. 3.] They cannot speak, indeed, as we can do; nor do we hear any words they utter: and yet, without these, they are understood by all nations; even by the most barbarous, who understand not a word of any other language.

Ver. 4.] They all read here, as in a book, the wonderful art and skill of that almighty being, who framed this regular structure; though they be never so remote, they hear them preach (as the apostles hereafter shall preach more fully) how great and how good he is: especially if they hearken to that universal minister of his, the sun, which hath its habitation fixed for it here;

Ver. 5.] And comes forth every morning decked with such a radiant light, that no bridegroom looks so cheerfully, or is so adorned, on his marriage-day. Its swiftness also is as admirable as its beauty, for the mightiest champion can but weakly imitate it, in the speediness, evenness, and unweariedness of its course.

Ver. 6.] It runs from the east to the west every day; and, in its yearly revolution, visits the southern and northern parts: so that all the earth feels the benefit of its quickening heat.

Ver. 7.] Thus is God visible to all the world in the face of the heavens; but to us he is conspicuous in a more excellent manner, by the revelation he hath made of himself in the law of Moses: which is a more perfect light to guide us, than the sun itself; restoring and comforting the most drooping souls, more than the sun cheers our bodily spirits. For it is a sure testimony of God's will and of his love, and preserves ignorant souls from being seduced to worship the sun as a god: for it makes them, at the first word, so wise, as to understand that "the Lord created the heavens, as well as the earth."

9 The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever: the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.

10 More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.

11 Moreover by them is thy servant warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward.

12 Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults.

13 Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression.

14 Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my redeemer.

Ver. 8.] And from thence delivered to us a complete rule of life for all sorts of men among us: who see with great joy all officers and rulers, both sacred and civil, directed how to manage all for the public good; and every private man taught to keep himself pure from all manner of wickedness: it being as clear as the sun what he ought to do, and what to avoid.

Ver. 9.] The true worship of God is here unalterably settled (Deut. xii. 32), free from all profane mixtures of superstition: and all our transactions with men are prescribed to be in perfect truth and righteousness.

Ver. 10.] We are happier in this than in all the gold and precious treasures which are brought from other countries; or in the most delicious pleasures which he hath provided for us in our own.

Ver. 11.] I say nothing but what I have tried: for, by following the admonitions of thy holy laws, both in my private and my public capacity, thy servant is become thus illustrious: and in their observance there is not only much satisfaction at present, but a far greater reward in the conclusion.

Ver. 12.] All our unhappiness is, that we do not observe them so strictly as we ought. They are a perfect rule; but our obedience, alas! is so exceedingly imperfect, that we cannot so much as number our wanderings from it: many of which we never observed; and therefore are so far from meriting any reward for obedience, that I must humbly beg thy pardon for the demerits of my negligence:

Ver. 13.] And the assistance of thy grace likewise (without which I shall still farther swerve from thy law), to preserve me from all wilful sins against thee. I am devoted to thy service, O Lord; therefore I beseech thee so to strengthen my will to please thee, that no temptation may prevail with me to consent deliberately to offend thee. Then shall I (notwithstanding my infirmities and ignorances) be accounted upright before thee; and be free from a great deal of guilt, which otherways, by manifold transgressions, I shall draw upon me.

Ver. 14.] And I shall have the confidence also then to address myself unto thee, both openly and in secret, with hopes that all my sacrifices (offered from a heart that sincerely studies to be obedient to thee) shall be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord; to whom I fly for safety and deliverance, in all the assaults which the enemies, either of my body or my soul, make upon me.

PSALM XX.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 THE LORD hear thee in the day of trouble ; the name of the God of Jacob defend thee.

2 Send thee help from the sanctuary, and strengthen thee out of Zion.

3 Remember all thy offerings, and accept thy burnt sacrifice. Selah.

4 Grant thee according to thine own heart, and fulfil all thy counsel.

5 We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners : the LORD fulfil all thy petitions.

6 Now know I that the LORD savoth his anointed ; he will hear him from his holy heaven with the saving strength of his right hand.

7 Some trust in chariots, and some in horses : but we will remember the name of the LORD our God.

8 They are brought down and fallen : but we are risen, and stand upright.

9 Save, LORD : let the king hear us when we call.

PSALM XX.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by David (and by him delivered to the master of the music in the tabernacle), wherein the people are taught to pray for his good success in some great expedition : it is probable (from ver. 7) against the Ammonites and Syrians, who came, with great numbers of horsemen and chariots, to fight with him (2 Sam. x. 6. 8. 1 Chron. xix. 7).

Ver. 1.] The Lord, who never fails those that seek him, hear thy prayer, when the enemy distresseth thee in the day of battle (2 Sam. x. 9, &c.) : the mighty God, who hath made a gracious covenant with Jacob and his posterity, protect thee, and make thee victorious.

Ver. 2.] O God, who hast pitched thy tabernacle among us, and dwellest in mount Zion by a visible token of thy presence, succour our sovereign in the time of need, and support him in all assaults of such numerous enemies as are combined against him.

Ver. 3.] Show, by some signal token from heaven, that thou art pleased with all his oblations and burnt-sacrifices, whereby he made his supplication to thee, for thy blessing on him in this undertaking.

Ver. 4.] Make me as prosperous as he himself wishes ; and enable him to accomplish whatsoever he designs.

Ver. 5.] In confidence of thy help we will shout when we set upon our enemies ; in thy power and might we will advance courageously against them : for the Lord will not fail to grant the petitions of our sovereign ; whose cause is so just, and who hath been so insolently treated by them (2 Sam. x. 3, 4).

Ver. 6.] This is the assured hope of every soul of us ; we are as certain as if he had already obtained it, that the Lord will make him victorious : for he reigns by his special appointment : who as he infinitely excels in strength, and commands all the host of heaven ; so will declare the exceeding greatness of his power, in giving him an illustrious deliverance.

Ver. 7.] We are not daunted at the vast numbers of our confederate enemies ; some of which boast of their chariots, others of their horses : but to all these we oppose the mighty power of the Lord, who hath heretofore done such great things for us.

Ver. 8.] And we triumph beforehand, saying, they are thrown down from their chariots and fallen from their horses, wherein they trusted : but we, whom they despised, are erect and stand unmoveable, merely by our confidence in the Lord.

Ver. 9.] Let it be unto us, O Lord, according to our desires and our hopes : preserve our king : and, in the day when we cry unto thee for help, make our armies victorious.

PSALM XXI.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 THE king shall joy in thy strength, O LORD ; and in thy salvation how greatly shall he rejoice !

2 Thou hast given him his heart's desire, and hast not withholden the request of his lips. Selah.

PSALM XXI.

ARGUMENT.—Theodoret truly observes, that in this Psalm as well as the former, David (who was the author of it, and delivered it to the master of the music in the tabernacle) speaks in the person of the people : whom he instructs how to give God, thanks (not for Hezekiah's recovery from his great sickness, and the lengthening of his days, as Theodoret takes it, but) for granting him those victories which they prayed for in the Psalm foregoing. And it is generally looked upon as describing, under that figure, the exaltation, glory, and majesty of Christ, which he obtained by his bloody death and passion. Many of the Hebrews themselves apply it to the Messiah. So that it may be called a Psalm of triumph, after the victories which David got over his enemies ; which were a type of Christ's victory over death, and of the triumph that ensued. And truly there are some things in it which are more literally fulfilled in Christ than in David, as ver. 4—6.

Ver. 1.] Thou hast heard the prayers of thy people, O Lord, when they cried unto thee, saying, Lord, save the king (xx. 9) : who will never cease, therefore to thank thee with the greatest joy and gladness, for that extraordinary strength and courage wherewith thou didst endue him. O how much beyond all expression are his joy and thankfulness for thy wonderful deliverance of him !

Ver. 2.] Thou hast granted all that his heart de-

3 For thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness; thou settest a crown of pure gold on his head.

4 He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever.

5 His glory is great in thy salvation: honour and majesty hast thou laid upon him.

6 For thou hast made him most blessed for ever: thou hast made him exceeding glad with thy countenance.

7 For the king trusteth in the LORD, and through the mercy of the most High he shall not be moved.

8 Thy hand shall find out all thine enemies: thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee.

sired (xx. 4), as well as that which he openly requested with his lips.

Ver. 3.] Yea, more than his heart desired. For when he thought of no such thing, thou wast graciously pleased to anoint him to a kingdom: in which having settled him, thou hast added a new glory to him, and set an illustrious crown upon his head (1 Chron. xx. 2).

Ver. 4.] He desired only to escape with his life, when he was encompassed with inevitable dangers: and thou moreover didst promise to prolong his days (2 Sam. vii. 12); and to continue the crown to his posterity for many generations (2 Sam. vii. 16. 19), as thou wilt do to his Son Christ for ever and ever.

Ver. 5.] Great is the fame, also, which he hath won by the many victories thou hast given him (2 Sam. vii. 9): all nations honour him (as they shall much more do the Messiah), and reverence that royal majesty to which thou hast exalted him (1 Chron. xiv. 2. 17).

Ver. 6.] And, which is a far greater glory, thou hast not only bestowed extraordinary benefits upon himself; but made him a blessing to future generations, whom thou wilt bless for his sake (1 Kings viii. 15. 20. 56). By which special favour and token of thy love to him, thou hast raised him to the highest pitch of joy as well as of greatness.

Ver. 7.] Which shall never cease to cheer and refresh his spirit, because he confides in him who never fails to perform his promises: through his kindness, who is superior to all, the throne of David shall stand

9 Thou shalt make them as a fiery oven in the time of thine anger: the LORD shall swallow them up in his wrath, and the fire shall devour them.

10 Their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth, and their seed from among the children of men.

11 For they intended evil against thee: they imagined a mischievous device, which they are not able to perform.

12 Therefore shalt thou make them turn their back, when thou shalt make ready thine arrows upon thy strings against the face of them.

13 Be thou exalted, LORD, in thine own strength: so will we sing and praise thy power.

fast, though all the power on earth shall combine to overturn it.

Ver. 8.] They are thy enemies, O Most High, as well as his, who endeavour to disturb him; and they shall never escape thy vengeance: wheresoever they skulk or fly for safety, thy vengeance shall pursue them, and punish their spiteful opposition to thee.

Ver. 9.] Wo be to them, when the time comes wherein thou wilt call them to an account for their hatred to thee. They shall as certainly perish, as if they were cast into a fiery oven: the Lord who is justly incensed against them, shall utterly consume them with a sharp and unavoidable destruction.

Ver. 10.] They shall be so far from finding any favour, that thou shalt quite extinguish their families, and wholly abolish such a wicked generation:

Ver. 11.] Who intended to destroy thy anointed, and root out thy religion. Their design was so mischievous, and therefore they deserve to be thus punished; though they were not able to effect it.

Ver. 12.] It may most justly provoke thee to set thyself against them: and, as their aim, and the bent of their heart, was to throw him down whom thou hast advanced; so to make them the mark of thy severest displeasure, till they fall down wounded, and rise no more.

Ver. 13.] Whereby all good men shall be excited to extol thy power; and therefore show the greatness of it, O Lord, and magnify thyself before their eyes: and then, whatsoever others do, we, who are delivered by thee, will set forth thy mightiness in our songs, and celebrate it with perpetual praises.

PSALM XXII.

To the chief Musician upon Aijeleth Shahar (hind of the Morning). A Psalm of David.

1 My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? why art thou so far from helping me, and from the words of my roaring?

2 O my God, I cry in the daytime, but thou hearest not; and in the night season, and am not silent.

PSALM XXII.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by David and (directed to the master of music in the tabernacle), wherein, under his own person (who was persecuted as a hind is by the hunters early in the morning, ver. 16), he makes a large description of the sufferings of Christ; and, in conclusion, of his exaltation, and the propagation of his kingdom to the utmost ends of the earth. Some of which things are delivered in such expressions, that they are more literally fulfilled in our Saviour, than ever they were in David: to whom they belong, but in a metaphorical sense. I shall note the particulars in their proper places, underneath the paraphrase, which I would not too much enlarge, or interrupt, by inserting them here.

Ver. 1.] O my God, my most gracious God, whose power no creature can resist, how strange doth it seem, that I, who have been thy care so long, am now left without any visible means of escaping those that seek my life; and that the loudest cries which I pour out of a heart laden with sorrow and grief, are far from prevailing for any relief (Mat. xxvi. 46).

3 But thou art holy, O thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel.

4 Our fathers trusted in thee: they trusted, and thou didst deliver them.

5 They cried unto thee, and were delivered: they trusted in thee, and were not confounded.

6 But I am a worm, and no man; a reproach of men, and despised of the people.

7 All they that see me laugh me to scorn; they shoot out the lip, they shake the head, saying,

8 He trusted on the LORD that he would deliver him: let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him.

9 But thou art he that took me out of the womb: thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mother's breasts.

10 I was cast upon thee from the womb: thou art my God from my mother's belly.

Ver. 2.] O my God (for so I will still call thee, even in the greatest distresses), there is no day, no night, passes, wherein I do not, with incessant cries, most importunately call upon thee; but can obtain no rest from thy persecutions.

Ver. 3.] Yet thou art he that hateth all those who unjustly persecute thy servant; and keepest thy word most faithfully with them that depend upon thee: as appears by the many deliverances thou hast sent them from thy holy place, where they celebrate thy name with their perpetual praises.

Ver. 4.] They that are gone before us have left us many remembrances of thy mercy to those that piously relied on thee: in all their straits they applied themselves unto thee as their only deliverer; and by thy help they escaped the greatest dangers.

Ver. 5.] Their fervent prayers prevailed with thee (though mine can now obtain no audience): they were confident thou wouldest preserve them in safety, and their hope did not make them ashamed.

Ver. 6.] Whereas I, who have waited on thee also after their example, am so disappointed in my expectation, that my adversaries are ready to tread me under their feet: so weak I am, and thereby so contemptible, that not only the great men, but the baser sort and dregs of the people, publicly reproach and despise me.

Ver. 7.] All that see the straits to which I am reduced openly deride me: they make mouths at me, and, in a scornful manner, shake their heads, and jest upon me, saying,

[This was most exactly and literally fulfilled in our Saviour Christ, Matt. xxvii. 39. 43.]

Ver. 8.] This is he that talked so much of the favour of God to him, and depended upon him that he would deliver him: let us see now what he will do for him: let him deliver him out of our hands, and show thereby that he is so dear, as he pretends, unto him.

Ver. 9.] This insolent language is very grievous to my soul, but it shall not cast me into utter despair of thy mercy: I will rather continue to wait upon thee, who, without my knowledge, and when I could not call upon thee, didst grant me a greater deliverance than this which I now ask of thee: for thou broughtest me out of my mother's womb, and then providedst nourishment for me; tookest a singular care of me while I hung upon her breast.

Ver. 10.] In my infancy thou didst preserve me from all the mischiefs to which that weak estate is incident; and ever since has been my gracious protector: for, from my first coming into the world

11 Be not far from me; for trouble is near; for there is none to help.

12 Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round.

13 They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and a roaring lion.

14 I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint: my heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels.

15 My strength is dried up like a potsherd; and my tongue cleaveth to my jaws; and thou hast brought me into the dust of death.

16 For dogs have compassed me: the assembly of the wicked have enclosed me: they pierced my hands and my feet.

17 I may tell all my bones: they look and stare upon me.

till this moment, I have had nothing to trust unto but only thy good providence; which all along declared (though I was the youngest of my brethren) what a large share I had in thy loving-kindness.

Ver. 11.] And shall I think thou wilt now forsake me, when I call upon thee, and acknowledge thy former care, and hope for thy future? Go on, O God, to conclude as thou hast begun, and continue to do me good. And now that there is an appearance of the sorest distress, and I am no more able to help myself than when I was an infant, and have less help and succour from others; be thou pleased to exert thy power, as thou hast ever done, for my deliverance.

Ver. 12.] It must be thy work alone; for my enemies are not only very numerous, but so mighty and formidable in their power, so insolent also and furious, and have enclosed and hemmed me in so strictly, that it is impossible without thy miraculous providence to escape them.

Ver. 13.] A hungry lion is not more fierce nor more dreadful, when he is just ready to seize on his trembling prey, than these my persecutors; whom I hear roaring and thundering out their threats, and see coming with open mouth to fall upon me, greedily desiring and aiming to devour me:

Ver. 14.] Which have struck me with such consternation, that I am as weak as water; my bones are so loosed, that they are not able to support my body; my heart fails me, and my spirit dissolves and faints away, as wax melts before the fire.

Ver. 15.] Fear, sadness, and sorrow, have quite dried up my vital moisture: I have scarce strength enough left to complain: but am just upon the point to expire, and to be laid in my grave.

Ver. 16.] For that malicious company which have combined together to persecute me, are as greedy and as cruel as the hungry dogs, who have hunted down a hind (see the title), and are all gathered about her to tear her in pieces: they use me most shamefully, as well as cruelly, and have bored through my hands and my feet.

[There is nothing like this in the history of David; of whom it can be only spoken poetically by a hyperbole.]

Ver. 17.] Grief and sorrow have so consumed my flesh, that my bones stick out through my skin, and may be distinctly numbered: and they that behold my misery are so far from having compassion on me, that they feed their eyes, and are exceedingly satisfied with this lamentable sight.

18 They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture.

19 But be not thou far from me, O LORD: O my strength, haste thee to help me.

20 Deliver my soul from the sword; my darling from the power of the dog.

21 Save me from the lion's mouth: for thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns.

22 I will declare thy name unto my brethren: in the midst of the congregation will I praise thee.

23 Ye that fear the LORD, praise him; all ye the seed of Jacob, glorify him; and fear him, all ye the seed of Israel.

24 For he hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted; neither hath he hid his face from him; but when he cried unto him, he heard.

25 My praise shall be of thee in the great congregation: I will pay my vows before them that fear him.

26 The meek shall eat and be satisfied: they shall praise the LORD that seek him: your heart shall live for ever.

27 All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the LORD: and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee.

28 For the kingdom is the LORD's: and he is the governor among the nations.

29 All they that be fat upon earth shall eat and worship: all they that go down to the dust shall bow before him: and none can keep alive his own soul.

30 A seed shall serve him; it shall be accounted to the LORD for a generation.

31 They shall come, and shall declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born, that he hath done this.

Ver. 18.] They make themselves sure I shall never recover; no more than the poor hind, whose skin the hunters have divided, or cast lots to whose share it shall fall. For so have they parted my upper garments among them, and cast lots who shall have my inner.

[This also was more literally fulfilled in Christ than in David; in whose story we find nothing like it: and therefore it can signify nothing more (if applied to him) than that they looked upon him as utterly undone; and rifled his house, and despoiled him of all when he fled from Saul, 1 Sam. xix.]

Ver. 19.] Once more, therefore, I humbly beseech thee, O Lord, to interpose, by thy power, in this grievous strait, for my deliverance: it is easy for thee to effect it, who art almighty, and I depend merely on thy aid: which I entreat thee to send speedily for my relief, or else it will come too late.

Ver. 20.] Rescue my life from the sword, which the enemy hath drawn to despatch me: it is all I have left, and it is left without all defence but thine; who, I hope, wilt preserve it from the power of him, that, with the rage and fury of a dog, maliciously persecutes me.

Ver. 21.] Thou hast done as great things heretofore, and sent me relief when the fiercest and strongest enemies were pushing at me, and insulting over me: which makes me presume of thy favour now in this sore exigence, when the most violent men are ready to fall upon me, and tear me in pieces, if thou dost not save me.

Ver. 22.] Save me, O Lord, and it will redound to thy praise, and not merely to my own satisfaction: for I will tell all my brethren how good and gracious thou art; and publicly proclaim the greatness of thy power, and wisdom, and justice (as well as of thy love), in the midst of thy faithful people.

[This David did in the eighteenth Psalm; and this our Saviour did by his apostles, Heb. ii. 12, who preached his resurrection, &c. everywhere to the praise and glory of God's grace, Eph. i. 6.]

Ver. 23.] I will call upon all the devout worshippers of the Lord to join with me in praising and giving thanks unto him (1 Chron. xvi.). Let the whole posterity of Jacob (and whosoever hath anything of his spirit in him) set forth the glory of his most excellent perfections, which shine in his marvellous works: let them all, I say, whom he hath chosen to be his peculiar people, most humbly worship and adore his majesty, and learn to give him faithful obedience.

[All that follows is as applicable to Christ as to David; and some passages more fulfilled in him.]

Ver. 24.] For that poor despicable person (whom men contemned and scorned, ver. 6, 7), he hath not disdained to look graciously upon, in his lowest and vilest condition. But, though he seemed to neglect him for a time, hath seasonably appeared in his favour, and granted the earnest prayers which he put up unto him in his distress.

Ver. 25.] Which shall be openly acknowledged, when I return to thy house with the heartiest praises to thee; from whom, I am sensible, I receive all the blessings I enjoy. And as I have been forward in my trouble to vow thee many sacrifices, if thou wouldest restore me; so I will certainly offer them in the presence of those that devoutly worship the divine majesty.

Ver. 26.] I will invite also those poor people, who were partakers with me in my sufferings, to come and feast with me on that plentiful provision I will make for them; and thereby encourage all those that seek the Lord sincerely, and depend upon him, to hope that they shall also praise him. Let me assure all such faithful souls, your hearts shall be always full of comfort and joy, which nothing shall be able to take away from you.

Ver. 27.] Nor shall the fame of thy wonderful works, O Lord, be confined within the narrow bounds of this one country; but spread itself to the farthest parts of the earth; where they shall, with thankful commemorations of thy goodness, universally prostrate themselves before thee, and become thy subjects.

Ver. 28.] For the Lord is the sovereign of the whole world: and therefore as all nations are under his dominion, so they shall all submit unto his government.

Ver. 29.] All they that are rich and powerful shall partake of his altar, and humbly worship him that bestows such benefits upon them [as they that ate of the sacrifices did, 1 Cor. x. 18]: and so shall all the poor and miserable also think themselves happy in his service. For he is the protector of them all; and the greatest, as well as the meanest, must acknowledge, that of him alone cometh their salvation.

Ver. 30.] Their posterity likewise shall devote themselves unto him, and propagate his religion unto future generations; whom the Lord shall adopt into his family.

Ver. 31.] They shall join themselves to the society of his people; and publish to those that shall succeed them the loving-kindness and the faithfulness of the Lord, in this wonderful deliverance, which he alone hath wrought for me.

PSALM XXIII.

A Psalm of David.

1 THE LORD is my shepherd; I shall not want.

2 He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.

3 He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.

4 Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.

5 Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.

6 Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the LORD for ever.

PSALM XXIII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm seems to have been composed by David, after God had brought him out of that great distress, of which he complained in the foregoing, and settled him in a prosperous condition: wherein he was confident God would continue him.

Ver. 1.] There is no shepherd exercises a more tender and constant care over his flock than the Lord doth over me: and therefore I am confident I shall not want anything that is necessary, either for my sustenance or for my defence, against those who would bereave me of my happiness.

Ver. 2.] For, as a good shepherd leads his sheep in the violent heat to shady places, where they may lie down and feed (not in parched, but) in fresh and green pastures; and in the evening leads them (not to muddy and troubled waters, but) to pure and quiet streams: so hath he already made a fair and plentiful provision for me; which I enjoy in peace without any disturbance.

Ver. 3.] And lest I should lose so great a happiness, his goodness is pleased (for to nothing else can I ascribe it) both to direct and guide me in the right course of pious living, and to reduce me when I go astray; just as a shepherd brings back his wandering sheep from those craggy, untrodden paths, wherein they would lose themselves; and leads them into plain and easy ways, wherein they find rest and safety.

Ver. 4.] Which makes me resolve to take a good courage, though I should fall again into the most dismal dangers (as a poor sheep sometimes doth into a deep pit): it shall not terrify me, when I remember that thou art present with me, to protect and defend me: thy royal power and pastoral care shall be my support and comfort.

Ver. 5.] But (such is thy extraordinary kindness to me) thou hast not merely provided food, but a feast for me; a most sumptuous feast, which, with great care and order, thou hast set before me, to the astonishment of my enemies: who with shame and grief behold me, whom they lately despised, rejoicing in thy royal bounty towards me, which entertains me even with superfluity of all good things.

Ver. 6.] And therefore I am bold to hope, that the same bounteous goodness and tender mercy which hath without my desert done all this for me, and pursues me as zealously with its favour as my enemies do with their malice, will still most graciously attend me to the end of my days, and settle me in a quiet enjoyment of his house (as well as my own); where I will never cease to praise his wonderful love towards me, and to give him thanks for all the benefits he hath bestowed upon his unworthy servant.

PSALM XXIV.

A Psalm of David.

1 THE earth is the LORD's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.

2 For he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods.

PSALM XXIV.

ARGUMENT.—As the foregoing Psalm seems to have been made by David presently after his settlement in his kingdom, so this, it is most likely, was penned by him, when he brought the ark from the house of Obed-edom, and settled it (after many flittings and removals) in mount Zion. Which place, upon that account, he prefers before all the rest of the world; and excites the people, who attended the ark thither with extraordinary pomp and solemnity, not to content themselves merely with that sort of piety, but to add the practice of all moral virtue; that so they might enjoy the blessings which might be expected from the divine presence with them, and comfortably wait for the coming of the Messiah. Whose ascension to heaven is represented by the carrying of the ark up into mount Zion; which was a type of heaven, as the ark was of the Lord Christ.

The Hebrews (from whom some copies of the LXX. VOL. II.—105.

add in the title, τῆς μῆς τῶν σαββάτων) were wont to sing this Psalm on the first day of the week; (see the Argument of Psalm xciii.), because, as some fancy, there is mention in the beginning of it of the creation of the earth; which Moses says was on that day; but rather, I should think, because therein their prophets and wise men saw a prophecy of Christ: whose first step to the throne of his glory was upon the first day of the week, when we constantly commemorate his resurrection. And there is so remarkable a difference between the eighth verse and the tenth, that we may justly think some new thing is intended in the ninth and tenth verses, which are a repetition of the seventh and eighth; viz. the ascension of our Lord Christ: for, in the beginning of the verse, the question is put with great emphasis, Who is this king of glory? and in the latter end, the words, mighty in battle, are omitted: because, in the days of Christ, as Aben Ezra himself gives the account, “Men are to turn their swords into ploughshares,” &c.

3 Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? or who shall stand in his holy place?

4 He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully.

5 He shall receive the blessing from the Lord, and righteousness from the God of his salvation.

6 This is the generation of them that seek him, that seek thy face, O JACOB. Selah.

Ver. 1.] What a favour is this, that the divine majesty will vouchsafe to take up his special residence here among us! when the whole earth is his, and all the creatures wherewith it is filled, this great world, and all the people that inhabit it.

Ver. 2.] For by his almighty power it was formed, and therefore he hath a just propriety in it. He hath settled it also so firmly, that, though the seas and the rivers beat against it, they cannot overwhelm it; but, together with it, make a convenient dwelling for those that live in every part of it.

Ver. 3.] And blessed be God, we dwell in that part of the earth where he himself hath fixed his royal palace. (For this is the mountain that he hath chosen and separated from all other, to be the place of his special presence.) But who is worthy to appear before him? Who may hope to be admitted to a gracious audience with him.

Ver. 4.] Not every one that lives in this happy country (though chosen to be his peculiar people), but he that carefully keeps his commands in thought, and deed, and word. He, I say, who not only preserves his hands pure from murder and theft, and such-like injurious actions, but his heart also from so much as designing them; who uses no lies, much less false oaths, to deceive his neighbour, and enrich himself; but religiously observes all his promises, especially those that are made in God's presence, though it be to his own detriment.

Ver. 5.] This is the worshipper, and he alone, who shall receive a blessing, not only from the priest (when he comes out of the sanctuary), but from the Lord

7 Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.

8 Who is this King of glory? The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle.

9 Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.

10 Who is this King of glory? The Lord of host, he is the King of glory. Selah.

himself; who will faithfully keep his promises with them, and amply reward them, who are thus faithful to him.

Ver. 6.] This is the genuine people of God, whose prayers are like to prevail with him. Such should all those proselytes be, who seek the favour of being received into your communion, O ye children of Jacob.

Ver. 7.] And let all those who thus follow the Lord (not merely with their bodies, but with their hearts), in this solemn entrance he now makes into the holy place, join with me, and say, Be ye open, O ye gates of the sanctuary; stand wide open, ye durable doors: and the king of incomparable majesty will enter, and, by the special token of his presence, dwell among us.

Ver. 8.] And if any ask, who this king is, whose majesty we proclaim to be so transcendent, let them know it is the Lord, who made and governs the world: that most mighty and invincible Lord, by whose presence with me I have been victorious in so many battles.

Ver. 9.] Therefore make no delay, O ye gates of the [heavenly] sanctuary; be ye open, wide open, O ye doors, which never shall decay; and the king of incomparable majesty, as I said, shall enter, and fix his seat in this holy place.

Ver. 10.] And if you ask again (as there is reason) with greater admiration, Who is this (see the argument), the king of incomparable majesty? know that the Lord of the sun, moon, and stars, yea, of all the angelical powers; he is the king, whose transcendent majesty is come to make his residence here.

PSALM XXV.

A Psalm of David.

1 UNTO thee, O LORD, do I lift up my soul.

2 O my God, I trust in thee: let me not be ashamed, let not mine enemies triumph over me.

PSALM XXV.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm seems to have been penned by David after the commission of some great sin (ver. 11), and in some great distress, whereinto he was fallen (ver. 15, 16), probably after the matter of Uriah, and when Absalom rebelled against him. Which brought to mind all the offences of his youth (ver. 7), and made him an earnest supplicant for the pardon of them, and for deliverance from his enemies. He began to make this petition with an extraordinary art; but the method is presently disturbed, by the ardency of his desires, and his passionate sorrow, which would not let him follow exactly the order of the letters of the alphabet, in the beginning of every verse, as he first designed.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, my constant and only refuge in 3 Yea, let none that wait on thee be ashamed: let them be ashamed which transgress without cause.

all my troubles, I look up unto thee in this distress; most humbly waiting on thee, and hoping in thee that thou wilt deliver me.

Ver. 2.] Thou knowest, O my God, that I place no confidence in anything but thine almighty goodness, upon which I profess entirely to depend: and therefore do not fail to relieve me, lest I hang down my head in confusion of face, and my enemies insult over me, when they see me disappointed of the help which I have so often declared I expect from thee.

Ver. 3.] Yea, for their sakes, who, by my example, wait upon thee, do not deny me: let not those who take my part, and place the same confidence in thee that I do, be disappointed of their hopes; but let them be utterly defeated, who, against all law and all obligations, have broken their faith with me, and without any provocation vainly labour to destroy me.

4 Shew me thy ways, O LORD; teach me thy paths.

5 Lead me in thy truth, and teach me: for thou art the God of my salvation; on thee do I wait all the day.

6 Remember, O LORD, thy tender mercies and thy lovingkindnesses; for they have been ever of old.

7 Remember not the sins of my youth, nor my transgressions: according to thy mercy remember thou me for thy goodness' sake, O LORD.

8 Good and upright is the LORD: therefore will he teach sinners in the way.

9 The meek will he guide in judgment: and the meek will he teach his way.

10 All the paths of the LORD are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies.

11 For thy name's sake, O LORD, pardon mine iniquity; for it is great.

Ver. 4.] It is hard to know what to do in these difficult times, especially in this great agitation of thoughts wherein my troubled mind is tossed up and down, therefore do thou be pleased, O Lord, to show me the course thou wouldest have me take; and govern my actions so, that they may be pleasing unto thee.

Ver. 5.] I have as much need of thy guidance, as a little child hath of its parents'; and I cry as earnestly to thee, that thou wilt direct me in every step: and especially that thou wilt preserve me as faithful to thee, as I doubt not thou wilt be to me; for thou art the author of all the deliverances I have received, and on thee I have, with a constant and perseverant hope, depended in all my trials.

Ver. 6.] Who art so ready to help the miserable, when they humbly seek thee, that all ages have left us remembrances of thy most compassionate bounty towards them. And therefore I beseech thee to do to me as thou hast ever done: I beg no new thing of thee, but implore that clemency and mercy which thou never yet deniedst to any pious suppliant.

Ver. 7.] I am a sinner indeed, and began to be so very early; for in my youth I childishly and foolishly went astray from thee, and since that time have committed much more grievous offences. But thy goodness is so great, that thou art not wont to punish us according to our deserts, but to pardon us according to thy tender mercies; to which I now betake myself, beseeching thee not to consider the greatness of my sins, but only the largeness and freeness of thy mercy, which gives me hope thou wilt be graciously reconciled to me.

Ver. 8.] For such is the loving-kindness of the LORD, such is his love to rectitude and holiness; that he will rather choose to reduce sinners, and instruct them in the way of virtue, than destroy them because they have wandered from it.

Ver. 9.] If they repent, that is, and, being troubled for what they have done amiss, meekly submit to his will and pleasure; he will sweetly direct them to discern what is acceptable to him. Such humble souls will be apt to learn, and therefore he will not fail to teach them the way to recover his favour.

Ver. 10.] And when they carefully observe the covenant wherein they stand engaged to him (by obeying his laws, which testify what his will and pleasure are), he will order and dispose all things for their good, and faithfully perform the promises he hath made to such dutiful servants.

Ver. 11.] I beseech thee therefore again, by this 12 What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose.

13 His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth.

14 The secret of the LORD is with them that fear him; and he will shew them his covenant.

15 Mine eyes are ever towards the LORD; for he shall pluck my feet out of the net.

16 Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me; for I am desolate and afflicted.

17 The troubles of my heart are enlarged: O bring thou me out of my distresses.

18 Look upon mine affliction and my pain; and forgive all my sins.

19 Consider mine enemies; for they are many; and they hate me with cruel hatred.

20 O keep my soul, and deliver me: let me not be ashamed; for I put my trust in thee.

mercy and faithfulness of thine, which shall be always celebrated and praised by me, to grant me a gracious pardon; for which I am the more earnest, because my sin is so foul, so heinous, and such a multiplied wickedness, that I can have no rest till thou art reconciled to me.

Ver. 12.] Which if thou wilt be, O how happy shall I think myself! For he that fears to offend thy majesty (as I in all reason ought hereafter to do, both because I on no other terms expect thy merciful pardon, and have felt also the sad burden of being a sinner), him will the Lord instruct, and lead into those ways which are conformable to his blessed will, and which will prove most grateful to him that walks in them.

Ver. 13.] He shall be at ease within himself, or rather filled with joy, and all manner of satisfaction: none of the blessings of this life shall be wanting to him, and he shall leave them as an inheritance to his posterity after him.

Ver. 14.] Or if he fall into any straits and difficulties, the greatest comfort of all is, that the Lord is present to them that fear to do anything displeasing to him (though it were to deliver themselves from danger), to counsel and secretly suggest good advice unto them; for he hath engaged himself to show them what is best for their safety and preservation.

Ver. 15.] In confidence of which my mind is fixed in a constant dependence upon the LORD: I expect no help from any one else, but on him will I patiently wait; for I believe he will wind me out of these perplexities, and deliver me from the snares which my enemies have laid for me.

Ver. 16.] Behold, O Lord, how entirely I trust in thee; have a respect to my faith, and hope, and patience, and take pity upon me, now that thou seest I am in a manner forsaken by all, and reduced from the estate of a king to the condition of a beggar.

Ver. 17.] Great are the oppressions that lie upon my heart, and they are still growing into new cares, and fears, and vexatious thoughts: O deliver me out of such grievous straits, which press so sore upon me.

Ver. 18.] Have compassion upon the miserable and toilsome life which I lead, and remove all my sins out of thy sight, which I know are the cause of it.

Ver. 19.] Discountenance my enemies, who (as they are very numerous, so) bear an implacable hatred to me; which disposes them to do all the mischief imaginable, though I have not been in the least injurious to them.

Ver. 20.] O preserve me from falling into their hands, for they seek my life, and rescue me from the danger I am now in of losing it : and let not (I again most humbly beseech thee) the trust and confidence which I repose in thee be turned into shame and confusion, as they will be if thou dost not deliver me.

21 Let integrity and uprightness preserve me ; for I wait on thee.

Ver. 21.] I have grievously offended thy majesty, it is true, and I have sorrowfully bewailed it ; but as for them that rise up against me, they have so little reason to accuse me, that I desire thee to deal with me according to my uprightness and integrity, in all my administrations . let my innocence be my guard, and my honest dealing my protection ; for I depend on nothing but thy favour in such courses.

Ver. 22.] Nor do I plead my own private cause alone, but beseech thee to have mercy upon the whole nation, who are lamentably distracted by these divisions, and to restore them to peace and quietness, by delivering me from this rebellion that is raised against me.

PSALM XXVI.

A Psalm of David.

I JUDGE me, O LORD ; for I have walked in mine integrity : I have trusted also in the LORD ; therefore I shall not slide.

2 Examine me, O LORD, and prove me ; try my reins and my heart.

3 For thy lovingkindness is before mine eyes : and I have walked in thy truth.

4 I have not sat with vain persons, neither will I go in with dissemblers.

5 I have hated the congregation of evil doers ; and will not sit with the wicked.

6 I will wash mine hands in innocency : so will I compass thine altar, O LORD :

7 That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works.

8 LORD, I have loved the habitation of thy house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth.

9 Gather not my soul with sinners, nor my life with bloody men :

10 In whose hands is mischief, and their right hand is full of bribes.

11 But as for me, I will walk in mine integrity : redeem me, and be merciful unto me.

12 My foot standeth in an even place : in the congregations will I bless the LORD.

PSALM XXVI.

ARGUMENT.—In this Psalm David asserts that uprightness and integrity, to which he pretended in the twenty-first verse of the foregoing Psalm ; and appeals to God as the judge of his sincerity, who was privy to his most secret intentions. But it seems to relate to former times, when he was persecuted by Saul, and looked upon as a public enemy (1 Sam. xxiv. 9). Thus Theodoret understands it : and thinks he was now among the Philistines, or in some other strange country, into which he was some time forced by that persecution.

Ver. 1.] I am accused of grievous crimes by those that persecute me ; but I am not afraid to appeal to thee, O Lord, as the judge of that matter : nothing doubting that thou wilt acquit me, and punish my false accusers and persecutors. For, thou knowest, I kept a good conscience when I was at court (1 Sam. xix. 4), and since I have been banished thence, have taken no wicked course to deliver myself (1 Sam. xxiv. 11, 12,) but entirely depended upon thee alone for safety : in which resolution nothing shall shake me.

Ver. 2.] Thou seest into the secret thoughts of my mind, and inclinations of my will : if I have not sufficiently approved myself, to have not so much as designed any such evil as I am charged withal, go on, good Lord, to make a farther search ; and if thou wilt still expose me to the fiery trial of sorer afflictions, I hope it will only still discover more of my integrity.

Ver. 3.] For I trust to nothing but thy loving-kindness, which is the pattern I have set before my eyes to imitate : I ever designed good, not hurt, to them ; and have ever kept my faith, and punctually performed my promises to them ; after the example of thy truth, by which I have squared all my actions.

Ver. 4.] I never loved the company of false and treacherous persons ; nor have had anything to do with those, who, under specious shows, cover ungodly designs.

Ver. 5.] No, I perfectly hated their meetings, where they laid their heads together to contrive some evil thing or other ; I never did, nor ever will, sit in consultation with those unquiet and turbulent spirits, who are restlessly hatching mischief.

Ver. 6.] I never satisfied myself with the mere ceremony of washing my hands, before I went to offer thee any sacrifice : but sincerely endeavoured, O Lord, to keep myself free from all impurity (as by that token I testified), and so presented myself, with due reverence, at thy altar :

Ver. 7.] Not merely to pray to thee, when I was in any distress ; but to praise thee also, and to give thee thanks ; proclaiming to all thy people those stupendous things which thy admirable goodness hath done for me.

Ver. 8.] And thou knowest, O Lord, with what affection I attended upon this employment ; and how glad I was to go into thy tabernacle, (which thou hast been pleased to make the place where thy glory dwells among us), to offer those devout sacrifices unto thee.

Ver. 9.] And therefore, I hope, thou wilt not let me suffer with those, from whose society I have always separated myself ; O let me not perish, as if I was a murderer ;

Ver. 10.] Or a companion of those that live by rapine and spoil of others (1 Sam. xxv. 15, 16), or obtain their ends by bribery and corruption of justice.

Ver. 11.] For I am none of that number ; but have always preserved, and will still continue, an upright endeavour to keep myself pure in all things : therefore, I beseech thee, to deliver me, now that they seek to destroy me as an evil-doer ; and show that thou judgest otherways of me.

Ver. 12.] Why should I doubt of it, when, notwithstanding all the assaults of mine enemies, I stand firm and unshaken ? Surely the time will come when I shall publicly praise the Lord, my protector and deliverer, in the assemblies of his people ; from whence this unjust persecution hath driven me (1 Sam. xxvi. 19).

PSALM XXVII.

A Psalm of David.

1 THE LORD is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the LORD is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?

2 When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell.

3 Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear: though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident.

4 One thing have I desired of the LORD, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the LORD, and to inquire in his temple.

5 For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion: in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me; he shall set me up upon a rock.

6 And now shall mine head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me: therefore will I offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy; I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the LORD.

7 Hear, O LORD, when I cry with my voice: have mercy also upon me, and answer me.

8 When thou saidst, Seek ye my face; my heart said unto thee, Thy face, LORD, will I seek.

9 Hide not thy face far from me; put not thy servant away in anger: thou hast been my help; leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation.

10 When my father and my mother forsake me, then the LORD will take me up.

11 Teach me thy way, O LORD, and lead me in a plain path, because of mine enemies.

PSALM XXVII.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by David, when he was, or had been lately, in some great distress. It is not easy to resolve, whether it were when he was persecuted by Saul before he was crowned (as the LXX. now say, though Theodoret could find no such thing in the Hexaplus); or when he was forced to fly from Absalom; or, as some of the Jews think (which seems most probable, because it agrees very well with several passages in the Psalm), when, in fight with the Philistines, he had engaged himself so far among the enemies, that he was in danger of being killed by a giant, if Abishai had not seasonably stepped in and relieved him. This was in his declining years, when the same courage remained, but not the same strength, which he had in his youth. And therefore the people came and swore to him, saying, "Thou shalt go out no more with us to battle, that thou quench not the lamp of Israel" (2 Sam. xxi. 17).

Ver. 1.] The Lord still bears a favour to me, and fills me with joy by his wonderful preservation of me. What enemy then is so terrible, that I should not dare to engage him? He defends my life in the most dangerous assaults; of whom then, though he be never so great a giant, should I stand in fear?

Ver. 2.] When malicious men, full of hatred and rage, made their approaches so near me, that they hoped, like so many savage beasts, to tear me in pieces and devour me; they quite missed their aim, and fell down dead at my feet.

Ver. 3.] And therefore, though I should see myself besieged with a great army of enemies, it shall not dismay me; though I were to fight a battle with the most numerous forces, I shall not, after such a demonstration of God's love and careful providence over me, despair of victory.

Ver. 4.] Not that I am greedy of glory and fame by such marvellous successes: no, I can stay at home, as my people desire me (2 Sam. xxi. 17), and give God thanks for what he hath done for me. Nothing in the world agrees so much with my desires: this is the only thing I have sought (even by my wars), and will still make the end of all my endeavours, that I may perpetually attend upon the service of God in the holy assemblies; and enjoy the sweet pleasure the Lord is pleased there to impart to his people, and receive directions from him when I wait upon him every morning in his tabernacle.

Ver. 5.] For there I shall think myself as secure in troublesome times as if I were environed with the strongest bulwarks, or lay obscured in the most secret hiding-places: the most impregnable rock I should not take to be a place of greater safety.

Ver. 6.] And now I have felt the happy fruit of my love towards it; for the Lord hath given me a glorious victory, and made me triumph over all my enemies on every side. For which cause I will go thither, and offer sacrifices of thanksgivings with the highest expressions of joy: I will compose songs of praise, and therein set forth the power and loving-kindness of the Lord.

Ver. 7.] On whom I still depend for my future preservation; beseeching thee, O Lord, to give me a gracious audience: whensoever I address myself unto thee, show then the kindness thou hast for me by granting my desire.

Ver. 8.] Which I do not presume to offer to thee without thy invitation; but have still thy own words in my mind, whereby thou exhortest us to come unto thee, saying, Seek ye my face: to which my heart answers, Behold, O Lord, in obedience to thy command, and by thy gracious motion, I will never cease to seek it.

Ver. 9.] And thou, I hope, will look favourably upon me; and not withdraw thy presence from me, when I beg thy protection or assistance. Do not then in anger reject my suits, because I am a sinner; but accept them because I am thy servant: whom in former times thou hast so often relieved, that from thence also I am emboldened to beseech thee not to desert me, O Lord; but (as thou hast begun, so) continue to give me deliverance and safety.

Ver. 10.] The indulgence of my parents is not to be compared with thy most tender affection; but though they, and all the friends I have, should abandon me, I would hope the Lord would take me into his care, and not suffer me to perish:

Ver. 11.] As I certainly shall, if thou leavest me to myself. For, alas! I know not what course it is best for me to take for my safety: and therefore beseech thee to vouchsafe me thy direction; and en-

12 Deliver me not over unto the will of mine enemies : for false witnesses are risen up against me, and such as breathe out cruelty.

13 I had fainted, unless I had believed to see able me to walk so circumspectly and evenly, that they who narrowly pry into all my actions, and watch for my halting, may have no advantage against me.

Ver. 12.] Let not those have their will of me, who love to trouble me, and give me perpetual disturbance ; as too many still do, notwithstanding all the wonderful things thou hast wrought for me. They cease not to calumniate and defame my government ; and he that heads them, and sets them on, speaks of open force and violence, if he had opportunity.

Ver. 13.] Good God ! how had it been possible for me to support myself under so many troubles and fears, which follow one upon another ; if I had not the goodness of the LORD in the land of the living.

14 Wait on the LORD : be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy heart : wait, I say, on the LORD.

firmly trusted in thee, that, notwithstanding the restless malice of my enemies, I shall enjoy thee, in a prosperous and happy condition, even here in this present life ?

Ver. 14.] And let me admonish thee, whosoever thou art that shalt hereafter fall into any such straits, to learn, by my example not to be impatient, nor despond presently, much less despair of relief, if the LORD do not send it just when thou expectest it : but wait upon him still with a steadfast hope, and fortify thyself with a strong faith in him. Let not thy heart fail thee in the greatest danger ; but, as I said, wait upon the LORD, and confidently expect that in his good time he will relieve thee.

PSALM XXVIII.

A Psalm of David.

1 UNTO thee will I cry, O LORD my rock ; be not silent to me : lest, if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit.

2 Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto thee, when I lift up my hands toward thy holy oracle.

3 Draw me not away with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity, which speak peace to their neighbours, but mischief is in their hearts.

4 Give them according to their deeds, and according to the wickedness of their endeavours ; give them after the work of their hands ; render to them their desert.

5 Because they regard not the works of the LORD, nor the operation of his hands, he shall destroy them, and not build them up.

6 Blessed be the LORD, because he hath heard the voice of my supplications.

7 The LORD is my strength and my shield ; my heart trusted in him, and I am helped : therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth ; and with my song will I praise him.

PSALM XXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—Theodoret thinks this Psalm was composed by David during Saul's persecution, when he was betrayed by those whom he took for friends, or not for his enemies : such as Doeg, the Ziphites, and many others. But the matter of this Psalm inclines me to consider it as a meditation on some such occasion as moved him to pen the foregoing. For he blesses God in the latter part of it (ver. 7, 8), for the victories he had got over his enemies, and for the peace he enjoyed : and yet complains in the beginning of it, of some men who molested him, and sought an occasion to do him a mischief. See 2 Sam. xxi. 18—20, where we read of three battles between his forces and the Philistines, after that mentioned in the argument of Psalm xxvii. when, it is likely, some of his own subjects took an opportunity to give him some disturbance.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, to whom alone I betake myself for safety, and under whose protection nothing can hurt me ; I make my most earnest prayer unto thee, that thou wilt defend me. Do not deny me, I most humbly beseech thee ; lest while I am so importunate with thee, and confide so entirely in thee, and yet thou takest no notice of me, I look like one that is abandoned by thee to destruction.

Ver. 2.] Grant my desires, therefore, when with ardent affection I seek thy favour, and, renouncing all dependence on human succour, implore thy help ; which thou art wont to send from thy holy place.

Ver. 3.] Let not that destruction seize on me, which is the portion of the wicked : nor suffer me to be involved in the same punishment with those pernicious wretches, who make no conscience what villainies they commit ; and yet pretend the greatest friendship to their neighbours, when they design and are contriving their ruin.

Ver. 4.] It is fit that they suffer as they have done, and reap the fruit of their manifold wickedness : dispense a reward to them according to their works ; and deal with them (which is the measure whereby I desire thou wilt proceed with me) as they have dealt with others.

Ver. 5.] I know thou wilt : because they regard not the wonderful things thou hast done for me, and by me ; particularly that great work (which is to be ascribed to thy power alone) of making me their king ; thou wilt utterly overturn them without any hope of their being raised up again.

Ver. 6.] And I ought never to forget (that which they neglect) the singular providence of the LORD over me ; whom I therefore bless and praise, because he heard my prayer when I was in distress ; and desire all ages may ever praise him.

Ver. 7.] The LORD is to me instead of a fortress and shield, when my enemies assault me : I heartily confided in him, that he would defend me ; and, behold, he sent seasonable succour to me (2 Sam. xxi. 17), which fills my heart with such exceeding joy, that (as I cannot express it, so) I am not able to contain myself ; but I must compose a hymn in his praise, and say, 8 The LORD is their strength, and he is the saving strength of his anointed.

Ver. 8.] It is the Lord that gives courage and strength to those that are on my side : he is the fortress that preserves in safety him whom he hath appointed to be the king of his people :

Ver. 9.] Whose good and happiness I seek ; beseeching thee, O Lord, to preserve thy people, and 9 Save thy people, and bless thine inheritance : feed them also, and lift them up for ever.

to pour down thy blessings upon those whom thou hast appropriated to thyself, out of all other nations : take care of them, as a shepherd doth of his flock ; and make them victorious over all their enemies, both now and in all future generations.

PSALM XXIX.

A Psalm of David.

1 Give unto the LORD, O ye mighty, give unto the LORD glory and strength.

2 Give unto the LORD the glory due unto his name ; worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness.

3 The voice of the LORD is upon the waters : the God of glory thundereth : the LORD is upon many waters.

4 The voice of the LORD is powerful ; the voice of the LORD is full of majesty.

5 The voice of the LORD breaketh the cedars ; yea, the LORD breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.

6 He maketh them also to skip like a calf ; Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn.

7 The voice of the LORD divideth the flames of fire.

8 The voice of the LORD shaketh the wilderness ; the LORD shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh.

9 The voice of the LORD maketh the hinds to calve, and discovereth the forests : and in his temple doth every one speak of his glory.

10 The LORD sitteth upon the flood ; yea, the LORD sitteth King for ever.

11 The LORD will give strength unto his people ; the LORD will bless his people with peace.

PSALM XXIX.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm seems to have been composed by David after some extraordinary great thunder, lightning, and rain ; whereby (it is probable) God had so discomfited his enemies, and put their forces into such disorder, that he easily got the victory over them. Whereupon he exhorts them in this Psalm to submit to that glorious majesty, from whom that thunder came : and who can so easily strike a sudden terror into the heart of his stoutest and most resolved opposers. Theodoret applies it to the destruction of Sennacherib's army, in Hezekiah's time ; for which I see no foundation : nor for the title which is now in the LXX. (but Theodoret could not find in the Hexaplus) ; which makes the occasion of it to be David's bringing the ark to the place he had prepared for it.

Ver. 1.] O ye princes and rulers of the world, who so readily receive the lowest prostrations from your subjects ; give unto the Lord of all that honour which he justly expects from you : acknowledge his supreme power, which you have so lately felt ; and submit to his authority.

Ver. 2.] Do him honour suitable to the excellence of his majesty : and, as a sign you have him in great veneration, come and cast down yourselves before him in the sanctuary ; where he hath fixed his glorious residence among us.

Ver. 3.] Whose voice was it but his, which you heard in the clouds ? (whether the voice of no earthly monarch can reach). From thence his glorious majesty thunders : and makes not only the earth, but the great ocean, tremble, at that token of his presence.

Ver. 4.] You think there is great power in your words : but as they can be heard but a little way, so they are of little force, in comparison with this mighty voice ; wherein the Lord expresses how potent he is ; and strikes a dread and horror into all that hear it.

Ver. 5.] It makes the strongest trees of the forest quake ; nay, breaks them into shivers : the cedars, as hard and tall as they are ; even the cedars of Libanus, which are famed for their durableness and goodly bulk, are thrown down and shattered by it.

Ver. 6.] It lifts them up into the air when it hath torn them in pieces ; and makes the mountains themselves leap like the young creatures which live upon them.

Ver. 7.] Flashes of fire break out together with it ; and, cutting their way through the clouds, are scattered, with a wonderful swiftness, into all quarters.

Ver. 8.] The force of it is felt in the most desert places, even in that vast and horrid wilderness of Kadesh : which, by overthrowing trees and rocks, it renders still more horrid.

Ver. 9.] It opens the wombs of hinds, which otherwise bring forth with the greatest difficulty : and it lays bare the covers of the wild beasts in the forest, whom it frightens into their dens, while his temple remains unshaken by these tempestuous blasts, and all his pious worshippers there securely sing the praises of his glorious majesty and power, saying,

Ver. 10.] The Lord is the great king, who governs even the clouds, and orders the thunder-showers to do what execution he pleases. When all other monarchs fail, the Lord still remains the same throughout all generations ; and the thunder doth not more easily tear the trees and rocks, than he can break in pieces the proudest princes ; who ought therefore to tremble before him, and to dread his judgment.

Ver. 11.] But as for all those that are sincerely devoted to his service, though never so weak and feeble, the Lord will be their support : they may depend upon his power to defend them in the greatest dangers, and against the mightiest enemies : the Lord will not only preserve them from evil, but bless and prosper them with all manner of happiness.

PSALM XXX.

A Psalm and Song at the dedication of the house of David.

1 I WILL extol thee, O LORD; for thou hast lifted me up, and hast not made my foes to rejoice over me.

2 O LORD my God, I cried unto thee, and thou hast healed me.

3 O LORD, thou hast brought up my soul from the grave: thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit.

4 Sing unto the LORD, O ye saints of his, and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

5 For his anger endureth but a moment; in his favour is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

6 And in my prosperity I said, I shall never be moved.

7 LORD, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to stand strong: thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled.

8 I cried to thee, O LORD; and unto the LORD I made supplication.

9 What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? shall it declare thy truth?

10 Hear, O LORD, and have mercy upon me: LORD, be thou my helper.

11 Thou hast turned for me my mourning into

PSALM XXX.

ARGUMENT.—The title of this Psalm differs from all the foregoing; it being the first that is called a Psalm and Song, or a Psalm-song: as others, we shall see in due place, are called a Song and Psalm, or a Song-psalm. The difference of which it is hard to find out (see argument of Ps. lxxvii.). But here the words may be otherwise construed; for they run currently enough in the Hebrew; thus, "A Psalm, A Song of Dedication of the House made by David;" who would not eat in his house till he had first in a solemn manner, addressed himself to God, at his entrance into it; either after it was newly built (2 Sam. v. 11), or (which agrees best with a great part of the Psalm) when he returned to it again, after he had been driven from it by the rebellion of Absalom, who defiled it (2 Sam. xvi. 21). Then he gave God thanks for his being restored to a peaceable possession of his palace; and made a feast for his friends (as the manner was, at their coming to dwell in a new-built house), with extraordinary piety and devotion, acknowledging God's goodness, who had graciously reinstated him in his throne. The Talmudists generally understand by the house here mentioned, the house of the sanctuary (see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 13); but I see no ground for it: for David did not build God a house, nor do the words of the Psalm (as Theodoret observes), agree to that matter.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, to whose powerful providence I ascribe my late wonderful deliverance, I will give thee the highest praises, and never cease to magnify thy name; who hast drawn me up out of that depth of misery into which I was plunged, and filled me with that joy which my enemies hoped to have had in my destruction.

Ver. 2.] O Lord, my gracious God, I was in a most forlorn and languishing condition; like a sick man who cannot help himself: but I addressed myself in earnest prayer to thee; and thou hast restored me to my former estate again.

Ver. 3.] Which mercy is the more to be admired, because there seemed to be no more hope of my restoration, than there is of the resurrection of a dead man out of his grave; or, at best, of a sick man's recovery, that is just at the point of death.

Ver. 4.] Join with me then, all ye that are sensible of the divine benefits, in this duty of praise to him who hath called me from death unto life again: give thanks together with me (for my single praises and thanksgivings are not sufficient), and gratefully commemorate his power, and goodness, and wisdom, and truth, which he has shown in my restitution.

Ver. 5.] Wherein you may see his clemency towards his faithful servants: whom he may correct very sharply, for a little time; but is soon reconciled, and then extends his favour to them without any end, and sends them deliverance so unexpectedly and suddenly, as well as seasonably, that where nothing but lamentations were heard over night, there nothing but shouts of joy are heard in the morning.

Ver. 6.] Yet that must not make them secure, nor confident in anything but his goodness alone. For therein I was to blame, that when I was delivered from the persecution of Saul, and settled peaceably in my kingdom, I fancied vainly that now I should never be any more disturbed.

Ver. 7.] But I soon found that that was more than I could promise myself; and that it depended solely on thy favour, O Lord, by whom my throne was established in the strong fortress of Zion (2 Sam. v. 7. 9). For thou, being offended with me, didst withdraw thy gracious presence from me; and presently I was involved in new troubles and dangers.

Ver. 8.] And had no way to relieve myself, but by making my addresses to thee, O Lord; and earnestly beseeching thee to pardon me, and restore me to thy favour.

Ver. 9.] For what service, said I, can I do thee when I am dead? shall my ashes be able so much as to praise thy goodness, or declare thy faithfulness to thy promises? Will they not rather seem to fail, and lose their credit, together with me? Spare me therefore, O Lord, and deliver me from those that seek my life: let me live to tell how good and how true thou art.

Ver. 10.] Do not deny me, O Lord, but take compassion upon my sad estate. Lord, be thou my helper; who art able to restore me to my former happiness, without any other assistance; as thou alone, I am sensible, not the strongest guards, canst preserve me in it.

Ver. 11.] In this manner I humbly besought thy mercy, and obtained a gracious answer: for joy and gladness are returned again, after a short time of sadness and sorrow.

most gracious God, I will be as good as my resolution ; and spend my whole life in giving thanks unto thee, for thy faithful mercy towards me.

PSALM XXXI.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 IN thee, O LORD, do I put my trust ; let me never be ashamed : deliver me in thy righteousness.

2 Bow down thine ear to me ; deliver me speedily : be thou my strong rock, for a house of defence to save me.

3 For thou art my rock and my fortress ; therefore for thy name's sake lead me, and guide me.

4 Pull me out of the net that they have laid privily for me : for thou art my strength.

5 Into thy hand I commit my spirit : thou hast redeemed me, O LORD God of truth.

6 I have hated them that regard lying vanities : but I trust in the LORD.

7 I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy : for thou hast considered my trouble ; thou hast known my soul in adversities ;

8 And hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy : thou hast set my foot in a large room.

9 Have mercy upon me, O LORD, for I am in trouble : mine eye is consumed with grief, yea, my soul and my belly.

10 For my life is spent with grief, and my years with sighing : my strength faileth because of mine iniquity, and my bones are consumed.

PSALM XXXI.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by David, and delivered to the master of music in the tabernacle : wherein he describes his confidence in God, notwithstanding a grievous strait, wherein he was ; when (as I understand it), after his escape from Keilah, Saul, with three battalions (as we now speak) pursued him so close in the wilderness of Maon, that without an extraordinary providence of God over him, he had certainly fallen into his hands. To that strange deliverance, and not that from Absalom (to which Theodoret refers it), it is the more probable he hath a respect in this Psalm (in the latter end of which it is thankfully commemorated), because the haste, which the Psalmist here saith (ver. 23), he made in that sore distress, is expressed by the very same word (and used nowhere else in any other part of David's history), when the great fright he was in, and his sudden speedy flight from one place to another, is described, 1 Sam. xxiii. 26.

Ver. 1.] Thou seest, O Lord, that in all these persecutions which I endure, I have no confidence in anything, but only thy power and goodness ; which if they should fail me, I should be lamentably ashamed ; prevent that confusion, O Lord, and magnify thy own mercy and fidelity, by preserving me in and delivering me out of these dangers which now encompass me.

Ver. 2.] Graciously incline to favour my request, now that I am so sorely pressed by my enemies, that they are ready to seize on me ; haste thy relief, for it is not this rock or strong hold wherein I am (1 Sam. xxiii. 25), that can protect me, but only thou, O Lord ; to whom I resort as a more sure defence, than the most impregnable fortress in the world :

Ver. 3.] For so I have hitherto found thee, in all my distresses, and therefore I still flee to thee for safety ; beseeching thee to glorify thyself (I have no other argument whereby to move thee) in leading me out of this strait, and guiding my steps so, that I may not fall into the hands of my enemies :

Ver. 4.] Who have now so circumvented me, and, by the secret treachery of the Ziphites, brought me into such perplexities (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, 20, &c.), that I am undone, unless thou extricate me : as I hope thou wilt ; for I profess again, that I depend on thee alone for help and deliverance.

Ver. 5.] Unto thy care and custody I commit myself, and deposit my very life with thee.* Who hast so often rescued me, when I was like to lose it ; and wilt still, I doubt not, show thyself my most gracious God, as well as powerful Lord ; who never deceivest those that rely upon thy faithful word.

* Our Saviour used these words in a more proper and literal sense than they can be applied to David.]

Ver. 6.] There is nothing else that I rely upon, for I never inquired of diviners, wizards, soothsayers, or fortune-tellers ; nor consulted the necromancers (or any of those vanities wherewith the gentile world is cheated), which way I should flee, or how I should provide for my safety : no, I have hated all such practices, and those that observe them ; confiding entirely in the Lord, and his directions.

Ver. 7.] In whose merciful providence over me I will be glad and rejoice, even when I am in straits : for it is most delightful to remember how thou hast taken care of me in my afflictions ; and never neglected, but still owned me, and provided for my security, in the greatest distresses.

Ver. 8.] And very lately did not suffer me to be shut up in Keilah (1 Sam. xxiii. 7), whose inhabitants would have delivered me into the hand of Saul : but admonished me by thy oracles, at which only I inquired (ver. 9, &c.), to depart from thence, where I was in danger to be enclosed : and gavest me a larger compass, to seek the means of my preservation.

Ver. 9.] Go on, good Lord, to perfect thy mercy to me ; and now that I am fallen into a new difficulty, and closely begirt on every side by my enemy, take some pity upon me, and speedily deliver me : for the continual anguish and vexation which these returning dangers give me, together with the hunger and thirst which at present sorely pinch me, have in a manner quite dispirited me.

11 I was a reproach among all mine enemies, but especially among my neighbours, and a fear to mine acquaintance : they that did see me with-out fled from me.

12 I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind : I am like a broken vessel.

13 For I have heard the slander of many : fear was on every side : while they took counsel together against me, they devised to take away my life.

14 But I trusted in thee, O LORD : I said, Thou art my God.

15 My times are in thy hand : deliver me from the hand of mine enemies, and from them that persecute me.

16 Make thy face to shine upon thy servant : save me for thy mercies' sake.

17 Let me not be ashamed, O LORD : for I have called upon thee : let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent in the grave.

18 Let the lying lips be put to silence ; which speak grievous things proudly and contemptuously against the righteous.

19 Oh how great is thy goodness, which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee ; which thou hast wrought for them that trust in thee before the sons of men !

20 Thou shalt hide me in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man : thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues.

21 Blessed be the LORD, for he hath shewed me his marvellous kindness in a strong city.

22 For I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes : nevertheless thou heardest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee.

23 O love the LORD, all ye his saints : for the

Ver. 10.] I cannot subsist long, unless thou relieve me ; for I am wasted away with sorrow and sighing ; the punishments of my sins are so heavy, and I am so weak, that I cannot support myself under their burdens.

Ver. 11.] My enemies also mock at my confidence in thee, now that they have thus distressed me : and my neighbours, who have been witnesses of my integrity in all my actions, are too prone to join with them in those reproaches ; and, which is still sadder, my familiar friends are afraid to be seen in my company, or to send me the least relief : they dare not entertain me into their houses ; for when they have met me in the highway, they fled, and would not come nigh me.

Ver. 12.] They look upon me as a man utterly lost, and so never think of me no more than if I were in my grave : they despair of my restitution, and despise me as much as an earthen vessel when it is broken in pieces, which nobody minds, because it cannot be repaired.

Ver. 13.] The calumnies and slanders also whereby the greatest persons defame me are come to my ears. They say I am a seditious fellow ; that the life of the king cannot be in safety till I be destroyed : and so they have held consultation together against me ; wherein they have debated nothing else but how to find a way to take away my life.

Ver. 14.] But how great soever their cunning and their power be, and how dejecting soever my fears, I do not quite despond : but still repose a sure confidence in thee, O Lord, saying, Thou art a judge of my innocence ; thou art my defender and protector, who hath hitherto always done me right.

Ver. 15.] It is not in their power to dispose of my life at their pleasure ; no more than it is mine to appoint the time of my deliverance, which I leave to thy wisdom, O Lord, to whom it belongs : only beseeching thee, at present, to rescue me from falling into the hands of my enemies ; and at last, when thou judgest it most fit, to free me from their persecution.

Ver. 16.] Disperse these black clouds of affliction, which have so long kept me in such a mournful condition, that my enemies fancy thou hast abandoned me ; and show the favour thou bearest to me, who am faithfully devoted to thy service ; and therefore, though I am unworthy of it, yet hope thou wilt magnify thy own mercy in delivering me from these dangers, and making me as happy as now I am miserable.

Ver. 17.] Let not thy humble supplicant, O Lord, who testifies by his daily prayers that he wholly depends upon thy favour, be shamefully disappointed in his expectation of relief from thee : but let the wicked be confounded, to see all their contrivances against me come to nothing ; let them be laid in their graves and give me no farther disturbance.

Ver. 18.] Stop the mouths of those bold calumniators who insolently threaten utter ruin to the innocent : whom they charge with the most grievous crimes, and deride all that he can say or do in his own defence.

Ver. 19.] Oh what a comfort is it, when they thus insult, to think of thy kind intentions towards those that fear to offend thee, though for the present they are most miserably abused ! How great are the blessings thou hast treasured up in store (as shall in time appear openly before all the world), and prepared for those that religiously avoid all unjust ways of preserving themselves, and trust to thee alone !

Ver. 20.] They are forced to hide themselves sometimes in caves and dens of the earth, (1 Sam. xxiii. 14. 19. 23. xxiv. 2. 3. 8), but there thou art present with them ; and it is thy gracious providence that preserves them from him that furiously persecutes them : thou dost keep them as safe as if they were in thy dwelling-place, from the mischiefs which contentious men, by their false accusations, seek to bring upon them.

Ver. 21.] Of which I myself (for ever praised be the Lord) am a remarkable instance : for he hath magnified his mercy to me in assisting my escape, when I was shut up in a fortified city that had gates and bars (1 Sam. xxiii. 7. 13.)

Ver. 22.] And presently after that, when I fell into such a strait, that I had no hope of evading it, but (so vehement was my fear) said in my precipitous flight (1 Sam. xxiii. 26), I am lost ; I shall never be able to save myself, though I make never so much haste : yet even then, upon my humble supplication to thee, thou didst instantly send a most seasonable and wonderful deliverance to me, (ver. 27).

Ver. 23.] What an encouragement is this to all truly pious souls ! Let them love the Lord, and steadfastly cleave unto him : for the Lord taketh care of their safety, who continue faithful to him in all their troubles : and plagueth those who proudly insult over them, till he hath left none of their race remaining.

Ver. 24.] Be not dejected, therefore, much less disheartened in the course of piety, all ye that place to adhere to him, and never shrink from your duty under the sorest afflictions.

PSALM XXXII.

A Psalm of David. Maschil.

1 BLESSED is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered.

2 Blessed is the man unto whom the LORD imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile.

3 When I kept silence, my bones waxed old through my roaring all the day long.

4 For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me: my moisture is turned into the drought of summer. Selah.

5 I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the LORD; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. Selah.

6 For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee in a time when thou mayest be found: surely in the floods of great waters they shall not come nigh unto him.

7 Thou art my hiding-place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance. Selah.

8 I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with mine eye.

PSALM XXXII.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by David, when the calamities into which he fell by his son's rebellion taught him how evil and bitter a thing it was to offend God; and how infinitely he was beholden to him, that he was so merciful as not to take such a vengeance on him as his sins deserved. There are those who think it was intended for public use, upon the great day of expiation, when the whole nation made a general confession of their sins: and called Maschil, either because it contains an excellent instruction (as that word signifies), concerning the means to obtain true blessedness; or because it was set to the tune of a song, in vulgar use in those days, which began with the word Maschil. This is the more probable of the two, because there are twelve Psalms besides this that have the same title, to all of which the former reason cannot be applied.

wherewith I was struck, that I could find no means to throw it off, either by business or diversions in the day: nor would it suffer me to take my rest in the night, but still pressed down my spirit, and scorched me so vehemently with its raging heat, that my body (which heretofore was fat and fresh) was consumed and parched like the grass of the earth in the midst of the driest summer.

Ver. 5.] But at last I bethought myself of that remedy which I had too long neglected; and humbled myself before thee in a sorrowful confession of all my sins, both great and small: I laid open all those wounds which were so full of anguish, and acknowledged I deserved to be still far more miserable. I resolved I would never hereafter palliate or excuse my sins; but ingenuously charge myself home with them, and condemn myself before thee for them. And straightway thou (who sawest the sincerity of my repentance) was pleased to grant me a gracious pardon, and to release me from all my pain; though my guilt, which was the cause of it, was exceeding great.

Ver. 6.] Which should encourage every one that hath any sense of God, and of the blessedness of being in his favour, and the misery of lying under his displeasure, to apply himself speedily to him, by unfeigned repentance, as soon as ever he hath offended him: for that is the surest way of finding mercy with him; and the way of preventing those great calamities, which otherwise may overtake him, when the Lord sends a deluge of miseries, as he did in the days of Noah, upon the world of the ungodly.

Ver. 7.] Then he may say, Thou, Lord, art my refuge, to whom I fly for safety; and I trust that thou wilt preserve me (though I have been a grievous sinner) from those distresses which surround me; and thereby give abundant cause to me, and all that are about me, to bless and praise thee for thy merciful deliverance of me.

Ver. 8.] Harken therefore unto me, whosoever thou art who hast any care of thy salvation; and I will bestow some good advice upon thee, and direct thee into the wisest and safest course of life: trust thyself with me to be thy guide, and I from my own experience will give thee faithful counsel, and take care thou do not go amiss.

Ver. 1.] Happy is that man, thrice happy, to whom God will be pleased, out of his own free grace and mercy (for no man can merit such a favour by any services that he can do him), to remit not only his common errors and weaknesses, but also his grosser sins, whether committed against the divine majesty, or against his neighbour.

Ver. 2.] It is impossible to express the happiness of that man, to whom the Lord will be so gracious, as not to exact the punishment due to his former offences, for which he is most heartily afflicted (for to none else this happiness belongs): and doth not only seem, by his sorrowful confessions, to hate and abhor them, but is unfeignedly resolved to forsake them.

Ver. 3.] He that hath felt the smart of them, as I have done, will be sensible what a pleasure it is to be eased of such a sting. For when I seriously reflected upon the grievous sin I had committed, but not bewailed it as I ought, it filled me with such anguish and horror, that I lost all appetite to my meat, and pined away till I was not able to go or stand; but lay roaring perpetually (like a lion that hath received a deadly wound), under the miserable torture of my mind.

Ver. 4.] So heavy was the sense of thy displeasure, 9 Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding: whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee.

10 Many sorrows shall be to the wicked: but

Ver. 9.] God hath endued you with reason, both to tell you what you ought to do, and to check you when you do not as you ought; and hath made you capable also of receiving good admonitions from others: do not therefore follow your own unbridled lusts and appetites, much less be refractory and untractable, when God would reduce you from the error of your ways, as if you were not men, but headstrong horses and mules, who can by no means be curbed, nor made to come near thee, that thou mayest manage them at thy pleasure.

Ver. 10.] Let such ungovernable, obdurate sinners, expect to be handled like those brutes, for they shall he that trusteth in the LORD, mercy shall compass him about.

11 Be glad in the LORD, and rejoice, ye righteous: and shout for joy, all ye that are upright in heart.

receive many and grievous strokes, which shall make their hearts to ache. But he that entirely commits himself to the Lord, to be ruled and disposed of according to his will, shall be not only secured by his good providence, but enriched with abundance of his blessings.

Ver. 11.] And therefore whatsoever your present troubles may be, let your heart be glad, O ye that are obediently led and governed by him: rejoice in the confidence you ought to have of his favour towards you: triumph in his loving-kindness, all ye that sincerely study to do his will; and shout for joy, as if you were already victorious over all your enemies.

PSALM XXXIII.

1 REJOICE in the LORD, O ye righteous: for praise is comely for the upright.

2 Praise the LORD with harp: sing unto him with the psalter and an instrument of ten strings.

3 Sing unto him a new song; play skilfully with a loud noise.

4 For the word of the LORD is right; and all his works are done in truth.

5 He loveth righteousness and judgment: the earth is full of the goodness of the LORD.

6 By the word of the LORD were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth.

7 He gathereth the waters of the sea together as a heap: he layeth up the depth in storehouses.

PSALM XXXIII.

ARGUMENT.—It is not recorded by whom this Psalm was composed, nor upon what occasion. But there is little question it was a pious meditation of David (of whose spirit it savours), and, as we may guess, upon occasion of some special benefit received from God (though not particularly mentioned); which makes him call it (ver. 3), a new song. (Of which see more Ps. cxlix.) Wherein he desires all the faithful to join with him in joyful praises of the Lord; considering his excellent nature, and his admirable works, both of creation and providence; especially over good men, who piously trust in him, and expect all good from him; and therefore ought to think themselves blessed that they have relation to him.

Ver. 1.] Bless the Lord with joyful hearts, triumph in his praise, all ye that are just and good: for nothing is more becoming them that sincerely do the will of God, than to praise him, from whom they have received, and hope for, so many benefits; and nothing is more desired than to have your hearts perpetually filled with delightful thoughts of him.

Ver. 2.] Extol therefore his glorious perfections in psalms and hymns, composed in praise of him: and let all the instruments of music accompany the voices, to express and excite your joy in him.

Ver. 3.] Let not the ancient songs of praise suffice you, but indite a new hymn, to testify your singular love and gratitude to him: employ your best skill to make the sweetest music; and sing as cheerfully as you are wont to do at your most solemn feasts.

Ver. 4.] For the Lord hath graciously revealed his will unto you, and shown you the right way, in which, if you walk, you cannot miss of being happy; and whatever he doeth, hath the same scope with what he saith; for in all that befalls you, he faithfully designs your good.

Ver. 5.] Let this therefore be part of your song, The Lord governs the world with perfect justice and equity; these he loves, and in these he delights: his goodness and mercy also are so conspicuous, that we can look nowhere but we see innumerable proofs of his bounty towards us; which spreads itself over the face of the whole earth.

Ver. 6.] And who can doubt of the greatness of his power, when he beholds the spacious heavens; with the sun, moon, and all the stars, which are placed there like an army in excellent order; and considers that all these he made with the same ease that we speak a word, only by commanding them to be?

Ver. 7.] Nay, the earth itself declares how mighty he is: for when it lay covered with the waters, being far heavier than they, he commanded it to appear (Gen. i. 9, 10), and, cutting a deep channel for them, he laid them up there as in cellars; where they swell and rise up in round heaps, higher than the shore, but cannot overflow the earth.

Ver. 8.] Let all mankind, therefore, in whatsoever part of the world they dwell, dread this almighty Lord: let them not dare to disobey him, who thus tamed even the raging sea.

Ver. 9.] For as then he did but signify his pleasure, and the thing was done, and remained fixed and firm according to his appointment: so, whatsoever he will have now to be done (whether for a blessing on those that submit to him, or a punishment of the disobedient) it shall certainly come to pass; and none can resist or alter his orders.

Ver. 10.] Let men lay their designs never so deep, let whole nations combine together, and in their then to nought: he maketh the devices of the people of none effect.

11 The counsel of the LORD standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations.

12 Blessed is the nation whose God is the LORD; and the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance.

13 The LORD looketh from heaven; he be- holdeth all the sons of men.

14 From the place of his habitation he look- eth upon all the inhabitants of the earth.

15 He fashioneth their hearts alike; he con- sidereth all their works.

16 There is no king saved by the multitude of gravest assemblies consult how to compass their ends; the LORD (such is his wisdom, as well as his power) easily disappoints them all: and makes the most likely contrivances, which oppose his will, to be in vain and without success.

Ver. 11.] Whereas that which he resolves none can defeat; but shall certainly obtain its effect. One generation passes away and another comes in its stead; but his purposes are still immovably the same, and can no more in future ages than now be over- thrown.

Ver. 12.] Most happy then is that nation which worships this Lord, the creator of heaven and earth; unspeakably happy are they who live under the care of so just, so good, so powerful, and wise a being, and are so highly in his favour, that he hath chosen them (though all mankind be his) to be a peculiar people to himself; among whom, in a special man- ner, he will reside, and hath engaged himself by a gracious covenant to do them good.

Ver. 13.] How careful ought they to be to please him, and approve their very hearts unto him! for though he be in heaven, as the place of his most special and most glorious presence, yet there is not a man upon earth but he sees and observes him.

Ver. 14.] They are all exposed to his view; and from thence he takes a strict and exact account, not only of all their open actions, but of their most secret designs and contrivances.

Ver. 15.] For they are every one of them, without exception, his creatures: and as he is equally the for- mer of them all, so he formed their souls as well as their bodies; and therefore must needs see into their very hearts, and be perfectly acquainted with every one of their thoughts.

Ver. 16.] And to him a king is no more than ana host: a mighty man is not delivered by much strength.

17 A horse is a vain thing for safety: neither shall he deliver any by his great strength.

18 Behold, the eye of the LORD is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy;

19 To deliver their soul from death, and to keep them alive in famine.

20 Our soul waiteth for the LORD: he is our help and our shield.

21 For our heart shall rejoice in him, because we have trusted in his holy name.

22 Let thy mercy, O LORD, be upon us, ac- cording as we hope in thee.

other man; but if he sees that he regards not his ma- jesty, nor depends upon him, he will make him find, that it is not in the power of the greatest army he can raise to secure and defend him: nor shall the might- iest and most valiant man in that army be able to de- liver so much as himself, though he hath a giant-like strength.

Ver. 17.] Though he should be mounted upon the stoutest horse (which is a most warlike creature), he will but deceive himself, if he rely either upon his courage, or his strength, or his agility, or his swift- ness, for preservation.

Ver. 18.] It is the Lord only from whom comes salvation; and he hath regard to none but those that fear to offend his majesty, and placing their confi- dence and hope in his love, more than all human force, look up to him for safety. Over such he will watch with a very careful providence.

Ver. 19.] To rescue them when they are in danger by the sword or the plague; and to supply their ne- cessities in time of scarcity and dearth.

Ver. 20.] What shall we do therefore in all straits, but desire him to take care of us? For this is our peculiar privilege, that we may confidently expect and wait for his seasonable relief, who is our only helper and defender.

Ver. 21.] For we may be sure he will not fail our expectations, but at the last fill our hearts with joy, as a reward of the pious trust we have reposed in him; whose unspotted purity and faithfulness shall be ever famed.

Ver. 22.] O Lord, thou seest we depend upon thee alone, and have placed all our hope, all our comfort and contentment, in thy care and good providence over us: let us prosper accordingly; deal with us according as we trust in thee, and not in any strength, wisdom, or contrivance, of our own.

PSALM XXXIV.

A Psalm of David, when he changed his behaviour before Abimelech: who drove him away, and he departed.

1 I WILL bless the LORD at all times: his praise shall continually be in my mouth.

PSALM XXXIV.

ARGUMENT.—The title tells us this Psalm was penned by David, after the escape he made from Achish, king of Gath (in which country all their kings were called by the common name of Abimelech, i. e. My father the king; as in Egypt, anciently, they were all called Pharaoh, and afterward Ptolemy), who he was afraid would seize on him, when he heard it commonly reported that he was the person that killed Goliath, and pretended to the sovereignty over all those countries (1 Sam. xxi. 11): and there- fore he put on the behaviour of a man beside him- self; hoping that when Achish saw this he would despise him: and looking upon him as a useless man, that could do neither good nor harm, think fit to thrust him out of his court, where he had been entertained, and send him packing from thence. And accordingly it succeeded (1 Sam. xxi. 14, 15). But though he was preserved by this artifice, the 3 O magnify the LORD with me, and let us exalt his name together.

2 My soul shall make her boast in the LORD: the humble shall hear thereof, and be glad.

4 I sought the LORD, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears.

5 They looked unto him, and were lightened : and their faces were not ashamed.

6 This poor man cried, and the LORD heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles.

7 The angel of the LORD encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them.

8 O taste and see that the LORD is good : blessed is the man that trusteth in him.

9 O fear the LORD, ye his saints : for there is no want to them that fear him.

10 The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger : but they that seek the LORD shall not want any good thing.

11 Come, ye children, hearken unto me : I will teach you the fear of the LORD.

12 What man is he that desireth life, and loveth many days, that he may see good ?

13 Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile.

14 Depart from evil, and do good ; seek peace, and pursue it.

15 The eyes of the LORD are upon the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry.

16 The face of the LORD is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth.

17 The righteous cry, and the LORD hearth, deliverance notwithstanding is piously ascribed unto God's great mercy, who prospered the device. To whom therefore he would have all pious men commit themselves, and depend upon his favour in well-doing : which he declares is the sure course to be happy. The Psalm is curiously composed, according to the number and order of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, in the beginning of every verse ; which shows it was contrived, when he reflected upon his escape, in some place of safety.

Ver. 1.] I will never forget how gracious the Lord hath been to me in this remarkable deliverance ; but, whatsoever my condition be, will still have my mind and my mouth perpetually filled with his praise.

Ver. 2.] This shall be my glory ; in this I will think myself happy, that the Lord is with me, where-soever I am, to guide and defend me : and I will let all those that humbly depend on him know what he hath done for me ; that they may likewise joyfully hope for his mercy.

Ver. 3.] Oh that they would all join with me in declaring the greatness of his goodness, in this miraculous providence over me ! Let them with the same devout affection extol him in all his glorious attributes ; who hath given me such a deliverance, and them such hope in the greatest danger.

Ver. 4.] I was sore afraid (1 Sam. xxi. 12), when I found they had discovered me in the court of Achish who I was ; and many a sad thought and dreadful apprehension began then to trouble my mind : but committing myself to thee by hearty prayer, and desiring thee to be my guide and my protector ; thou wast pleased presently to rid me of them, by inclining his heart to look upon me as I appeared, and to make no stricter inquiry after me.

Ver. 5.] From which all pious men should take courage in all their straits, and when their hearts are ready to sink, look up unto God : who will revive and comfort them, and never suffer them to be ashamed of the hope they repose in him.

Ver. 6.] Let them fix their eyes on me, and excite one another to a cheerful dependence on him, saying, Behold that man : he was in a miserably poor condition, destitute of all human help ; but commending himself to the Lord by earnest prayer, the Lord took care of him, and delivered him out of all his distresses.

Ver. 7.] Why should we then despair of his mercy, who sends an invisible host (as appeared to Elisha), to guard those who fear nothing so much as to offend his majesty ; and to preserve them as securely as if they were surrounded with an invincible army from all the assaults of their enemies ?

Ver. 8.] Oh that men would not be so negligent, but seriously consider this, and make a trial, by steadfast fidelity to God in all their troubles, how gracious and kind he is ! They shall soon find that there is no man so happy as he that piously confides in him.

Ver. 9.] Continue therefore, O ye devout worshippers of the Lord (whatsoever other men do), to fear nothing, but lest you be false to him. Never betake yourselves to any sinful ways to provide for your safety, or to supply any of your necessities : but religiously observe his command ; and you shall never be reduced to such straits, as to be utterly destitute of what is needful for your preservation.

Ver. 10.] The young lions (an emblem of those that seek to enrich themselves by rapine, or by injurious practices), who are most ravenous in their appetites, as well as swift to pursue, and bold to seize, and strong to tear in pieces, their prey, are many times disappointed, and cannot meet with satisfaction to their hungry desires ; but they that seek their food from the Lord in pious and honest ways, shall certainly be blessed with everything that is good for them.

Ver. 11.] Come hither then, all ye that are disposed to learn, and hearken to the instruction which, out of a most tender affection to your welfare, I shall give you concerning the fear of the Lord.

Ver. 12.] Who is there among you that desires to live happily ? that would fain prolong his life to a great number of years, and have them all prosperous and pleasant ?

Ver. 13.] Let him be very careful, in the first place, to bridle his tongue ; and never employ it to speak evil of others, or to deceive them with fair words and false promises.

Ver. 14.] Let him in all his actions also eschew what God hath prohibited, and do what he hath commanded : and, more particularly, avoiding all hatreds and enmities, strife and contention, study to maintain love and friendship with all his neighbours, and to make peace among them when they quarrel ; and though they be averse to it, not to cease his importunities, till, if it be possible, he hath reconciled them.

Ver. 15.] Such men will feel great contentment in their own hearts, and be exceedingly beloved by others : and (which is the greatest happiness of all) the Lord will have a special care of them ; and, when they are in distress, most readily hear their cry, and help them.

Ver. 16.] But as for all those that take the contrary course (besides that they are ill at ease in themselves, and hated by their neighbours), the Lord is their enemy, and in his heavy displeasure will utterly destroy both them and theirs.

Ver. 17.] Experience hath taught us this (and and delivereth them out of all their troubles.

18 The LORD is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart; and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit.

19 Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the LORD delivereth him out of them all.

therefore let them not be disheartened if they fall into any trouble, but still expect good days), that the Lord graciously answers the prayers of those who adhere unto him in the ways of piety and peaceableness, and sends them seasonable relief and deliverance.

Ver. 18.] Though he may seem to absent himself, by suffering them to be sorely bruised and crushed under their burdens: yet he is really present to them to support and comfort their drooping spirits; and at last to ease them of their burdens after they have humbly and patiently submitted to them.

Ver. 19.] Many of these afflictions there may be (for such prosperity they must not promise themselves, as will exempt them from troubles, for a trial of their fidelity): but in this they ought to think themselves happy, that they know the Lord will put an end to them when he hath sufficiently proved them.

20 He keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken.

21 Evil shall slay the wicked: and they that hate the righteous shall be desolate.

22 The LORD redeemeth the soul of his servants: and none of them that trust in him shall be desolate.

Ver. 20.] And while they lie under them, he sustains, upholds, and defends them: so that they receive not the least hurt by any of those sufferings, which otherwise would crush them in pieces.

Ver. 21.] Whereas the wicked, who for the present flourish, shall at last be seized by some calamity or other, which shall stick to them, till it hath destroyed them: they that spitefully persecute the righteous bring such a guilt upon themselves, that they shall not escape without their justly-deserved punishment.

Ver. 22.] And by that very means the Lord oft-times rescues his faithful servants from those mischiefs which their enemies intended to them; and, you may be sure, will not suffer any of them, since they rely entirely upon him, to perish, like those ungodly wretches.

PSALM XXXV.

A Psalm of David.

1 PLEAD my cause, O LORD, with them that strive with me: fight against them that fight against me.

2 Take hold of shield and buckler, and stand up for my help.

3 Draw out also the spear, and stop the way against them that persecute me: say unto my soul, I am thy salvation.

PSALM XXXV.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, we are sufficiently informed by the matter of it, was penned by David, when he was fiercely persecuted by Saul. Whose forces, which were unjustly raised against him, he beseeches the Lord to dissipate; and especially to stop the mouth of his false accusers (such as Doeg and the Ziphites), of whom he most heavily complains, in the middle of the Psalm: vowing to God that he should be ever mindful of the benefit, and never cease to give him thanks and praise for his loving-kindness, if he would be pleased to confound them, and deliver him.

There may seem to be here, as in other Psalms, such horrid imprecations against his enemies, as do not become the mouth of a good man. But they must be considered as an appeal to God in a particular case; for justice against those whom no court on earth could or would punish: which made it fit, he thought, to desire the divine majesty to execute the judgment he had enacted in his law against obstinate and incurable offenders, who else would escape the hand of justice; whereby, also, others would be hardened in their wickedness.

Besides, the words may be interpreted, not as a prayer, but as a prediction; and rendered, not let them be, but they shall be, &c.

Ver. 1.] Take my part, O Lord, and maintain my cause against those that contend with me, and have 4 Let them be confounded and put to shame that seek after my soul: let them be turned back and brought to confusion that devise my hurt.

5 Let them be as chaff before the wind: and let the angel of the LORD chase them.

6 Let their way be dark and slippery: and let the angel of the LORD persecute them.

7 For without cause have they hid for me raised a war against me: for I am not able to defend myself, and have none else to appear for me.

Ver. 2.] Be thou my protector, and preserve me under the shield of thy almighty providence! I oppose myself unto them, and keep off all the assaults of my enemies.

Ver. 3.] Strike through them, as well as defend me; let them run upon the spear and the sword, if they continue to pursue me: and confirm my soul in this belief, that thou wilt at last deliver me from this persecution.

Ver. 4.] Disappoint them [or, they shall be disappointed] of their hope, which they have to destroy me; and make them blush to see all their warlike preparation against me come to nothing: let them all be put to flight, and make a confused retreat with shame and dishonour, who design my ruin.

Ver. 5.] Let them be dispersed [or, they shall be dispersed, and so of the rest] as the chaff, when it is blown about by a mighty wind: and let the invisible powers, which thou usest as ministers of thy displeasure (especially when thy ministers on earth do not their duty), drive them forward, and thrust them on in that disorder.

Ver. 6.] Let them not know where they are in their flight; but wander, as men in the dark, up and down in slippery and dangerous ways; and there let the ministers of thy vengeance still pursue them, and press them on with restless fears, till they tumble headlong into destruction.

Ver. 7.] For though I have done them no wrong, their net in a pit, which without cause they have digged for my soul.

8 Let destruction come upon him at un-awares; and let his net that he hath hid catch himself: into that very destruction let him fall.

9 And my soul shall be joyful in the Lord: it shall rejoice in his salvation.

10 All my bones shall say, Lord, who is like unto thee, which deliverest the poor from him that is too strong for him, yea, the poor and the needy from him that spoileth him?

11 False witnesses did rise up; they laid to my charge things that I knew not.

12 They rewarded me evil for good to the spoiling of my soul.

13 But as for me, when they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth: I humbled my soul with fasting; and my prayer returned into mine own bosom.

14 I behaved myself as though he had been nor given them any provocation, they hunt and pursue me as if I were some wild beast; and by treachery, as well as open force, endeavour to take away my life.

Ver. 8.] Let him, whose hatred hath armed so many against me (and, when I suspected no danger, sought my ruin, 1 Sam. xviii. 10, 11, 21. xix. 10), meet with unexpected destruction: let him be caught in his own wiles; and, according to the rules of thy righteous judgment, suffer that himself which he thought to do to me.

Ver. 9.] Then shall my soul conceive the highest joy in the love the Lord bears to me, and in his care over me: to him will I give thanks as the author of my deliverance, and rejoice in what he hath done for me.

Ver. 10.] The joy shall spread all over me, and from the inmost sense of my heart, with all the power and strength I have, both of body and soul, I will burst forth in thy praise, and say, Lord, who is comparable to thee in mercy, and wisdom, and power? who rescuest the poor helpless man, in wonderful ways, from him whom he cannot resist; the man who is miserably in want, and hath none to relieve him, from him who by violence and oppression hath undone him.

Ver. 11.] For which they have no pretence at all, but what is founded on calumnies and lies, forged by men of no conscience, who have accused me of the highest crime, and laid to my charge such things as never entered into my mind (1 Sam. xxiv. 9).

Ver. 12.] And (which adds to the sharpness of my persecution) they are men whom I have obliged; who are so detestably ungrateful, as, for all the good I did them when I was in power, to make me no other requital, but to endeavour to deprive me of my life.

Ver. 13.] O how unlike is this to the kindness that I showed to them in their troubles! when they were sick, for instance, I sympathised most heartily with them; and testified my unfeigned grief and sorrow for them, by putting on sackcloth; in which I humbled myself before God, with prayer and fasting, for their recovery: which I often repeated: and in such an affectionate manner poured out my soul to God on their behalf, in my most secret retirements, that I wish myself no better than I desired God to do for them.

Ver. 14.] I walked mournfully; and went to visit them with the same diligence as if I had been in danger to lose a friend or brother; I could not have looked more dejectedly if I had bewailed the death of the dearest mother my friend or brother: I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother.

15 But in mine adversity they rejoiced, and gathered themselves together: yea, the abjects gathered themselves together against me, and I knew it not; they did tear me, and ceased not:

16 With hypocritical mockers in feasts, they gnashed upon me with their teeth.

17 Lord, how long wilt thou look on? rescue my soul from their destructions, my darling from the lions.

18 I will give thee thanks in the great congregation: I will praise thee among much people.

19 Let not them that are mine enemies wrongfully rejoice over me: neither let them wink with the eye that hate me without a cause.

20 For they speak not peace: but they devise deceitful matters against them that are quiet in the land.

21 Yea, they opened their mouth wide against me, and said, Aha, aha, our eye hath seen it.

Ver. 15.] But these very men (such was their inhumanity) could not dissemble the joy they conceived, when the news was brought of any evil that befell me; but ran to tell one another, and assembled themselves together, that they might publicly testify how glad they were to hear it. The very scum of the people, who were so vile, that I did not so much as know there were such men in the world, met together, by their example, to revile me; and there was no end of their reproaches.

Ver. 16.] They joined themselves to the profane flatterers and trencher-buffoons; who, maintaining themselves by saying anything which they think will please their lords and masters, made me the subject of their abusive jests, ridiculous sayings, and scoffs, in their table-talk; which they accompanied with such rage, as if they could have eaten me up.

Ver. 17.] Lord! thou seest all this. I know very well; but how long wilt thou bear with it, and be a spectator only? be pleased at length to vindicate my innocence, and deliver me (who am desolate, and have none to relieve me, but thee alone) from those that have already despoiled me of my goods and good name; and now seek, like so many rapacious lions, to devour me, and take away my life.

Ver. 18.] I will ever preserve a grateful remembrance of it, if thou wilt vouchsafe this mercy to me; it shall be acknowledged with the most hearty thanks before all thy people, as soon as thou shalt restore me to thy tabernacle; in the most frequent assemblies, when the whole nation meet at thy solemn feasts, I will celebrate thy power and goodness with my praises.

Ver. 19.] Let not those, therefore, that unjustly persecute me, have the pleasure of getting any advantage of me: let them no longer make signs one to another with their eyes and their heads, as if they had done their business, and should satisfy their causeless hatred of me.

Ver. 20.] For they are men of a turbulent spirit, that give not their sovereign peaceable counsel, but devise false stories, to incense him against those that would gladly serve God quietly under his government, without doing the least harm to any body.

Ver. 21.] Nor are they content to do this secretly; but now they bawl against me with open mouth, and boldly accuse me as a traitor, rejoicing at any colour they can meet withal for their calumnies; and saying, So, so, we have found him out; his treasonable practices.

22 This thou hast seen, O LORD : keep not silence : O LORD, be not far from me.

23 Stir up thyself, and awake to my judgment, even unto my cause, my God and my Lord.

24 Judge me, O LORD my God, according to thy righteousness ; and let them not rejoice over me.

25 Let them not say in their hearts, Ah, so would we have it : let them not say, We have swallowed him up.

are discovered ; we ourselves are eye-witnesses of it.

Ver. 22.] But thou knowest me better than they, O Lord ; to whom I appeal as a witness of the wrong they do me ; beseeching thee to declare my innocence, by affording me thy help, and delivering me from their hands now that they hope to seize on me.

Ver. 23.] Thou hast seemed hitherto to neglect me, though I have so often made my appeal to thee ; but I beseech thee at length, O my God and my Lord, who art the only judge that can give me relief, the only sovereign that can protect an injured subject, to take cognizance of my cause ; and pass sentence on me according to my doings.

Ver. 24.] I desire only that thou wilt do me right ; and not that thou shouldst, in favour of me, forbear to condemn and punish me, if I be guilty of what they accuse me. Deal with me according to thy unspotted justice, O Lord (whom the fear of none can overawe) my God, who art a judge whom none can corrupt ; and then I know they shall never have the better of me.

Ver. 25.] Prevent so great a mischief, O Lord, lest they should applaud themselves in their wickedness. Let them have no occasion to think within themselves they shall prevail ; saying to their souls, So now all 26 Let them be ashamed and brought to confusion together that rejoice at my hurt : let them be clothed with shame and dishonour that magnify themselves against me.

27 Let them shout for joy, and be glad, that favour my righteous cause : yea, let them say continually, Let the LORD be magnified, which hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant.

28 And my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness and of thy praise all the day long.

goes well ; cheer up, we shall have our desires : much less let them prevail so far, that they should triumph in my ruin, and say, We have obtained our end, we have utterly destroyed him.

Ver. 26.] Let them all be shamefully disappointed ; and, as they have combined together insolently to deride and mock me ; so let them who rejoice at my present forlorn condition, look upon one another with amazement and confusion. Let them not only be put to the blush, but perfectly confounded, and never be able to lift up their heads again, who proudly traduce me, and seek to raise themselves upon my ruin.

Ver. 27.] And thereby fill all their hearts with joy, and their mouths with the voice of triumph, who, believing my innocence, have wished well to me : and let them see me so victorious, that this may be their perpetual song ; The Lord be extolled with the highest praises, who favoured his servant David so much, that he delivered him out of all his troubles, and settled him in peace and prosperity.

Ver. 28.] As for my tongue, that sure shall never rest ; but be declaring thy justice, and goodness, and fidelity to me ; on which I shall ever think ; and be giving thee the praise which is due unto them perpetually.

PSALM XXXVI.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David, the servant of the Lord.

1 THE transgression of the wicked saith within my heart, that there is no fear of God before his eyes.

2 For he flattereth himself in his own

PSALM XXXVI.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, composed by David, and delivered by him to the chief master of music in the tabernacle, seems to have been penned, as the former and many others were, during the persecution he suffered from Saul. It is hard to say, to what part of that time it peculiarly belongs. The most probable opinion is, that it hath respect to the beginning of it : when Saul had a jealousy of him, and a hatred to him ; but hid it secretly in his heart, and counterfeited friendship to him, and desire of his alliance (as you read 1 Sam. xviii.) ; and yet could not carry the matter so cunningly, and so wholly suppress and conceal his intentions to destroy him, but that they broke out in some fits (as you find there, ver. 11, and in the next chapter, ver. 10) ; and by the very preferment he gave him, made it plainly appear he designed his ruin. This treachery David here describes (without naming Saul, to whom he preserved a due reverence) ; and opposes thereunto the fidelity and goodness of God, who rules the whole world, and takes care of beasts as well as men ; and therefore would not, he hoped, eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful.

3 The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit : he hath left off to be wise, and to do good.

4 He deviseth mischief upon his bed ; he set- desert him, nor any else that depend on him, and are his faithful servants ; as he in a special manner, professed himself, and was obliged to be.

Ver. 1.] The wicked may use many arts to disguise and cloak his evil intentions ; but his actions, directly contrary to all the laws of humanity, as well as the law of God, discover what he is, and make me resolve not to trust him ; because, without all doubt, he hath no regard to God, nor will be restrained by the fear of him from doing me still more mischief.

Ver. 2.] Though he flatter and soothe up himself in his own conceit, imagining he carries things so cunningly and smoothly, that none can accuse him ; yet at length his iniquity shall be found out, and make him odious to all the world.

Ver. 3.] When he pretends great kindness to me, and professes I am dear to him, his meaning is to do me mischief, and to cheat and ensnare me into danger. He was once a better man, and better affected towards me ; but now his passions have so blinded his judgment, and perverted his will, that he knows not what belongs to justice and equity, much less to goodness and charity.

teth himself in a way that is not good; he abhorreth not evil.

5 Thy mercy, O LORD, is in the heavens; and thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds.

6 Thy righteousness is like the great mountains; thy judgments are a great deep: O LORD, thou preservest man and beast.

7 How excellent is thy lovingkindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.

8 They shall be abundantly satisfied with the

Ver. 4.] For whatsoever he may say in public of his affection to me, when he is retired he is contriving how to ruin me. He muses of nothing else when he lies down to sleep, and when he awakes; and is not transported merely by a sudden fit of jealousy and anger against me; but hath set himself (with an obstinate resolution to persist in it) in a course so void of all piety, justice, or charity, that there is no wickedness, though never so abominable, at which he sticks, to compass his design to destroy me.

Ver. 5.] My comfort is, that his hatred and falsehood cannot be so great, but thy goodness and lovingkindness, O LORD, and thy faithfulness to thy word, are infinitely greater; on these I rely, which I know will not deceive me; being no less conspicuous and constant (as well as unmeasurable) than the heavens.

Ver. 6.] Thy justice, also, in the administrations of all affairs, appears as visibly, and is as unmovable, as the highest mountains; which the greatest power on earth cannot shake, nor make to bend to their inclinations. The deepest plots they can lay are shallow, and easily disappointed by thee; whose orders and decrees shall be executed and brought to pass, by ways and means that we cannot fathom: and therefore I will trust in thee, O LORD; whose careful providence extends not only to men, but to beasts also, which have no sense of thee.

Ver. 7.] For if thou hast such care of their well-being, O God, thy lovingkindness, sure, and tender mercy, are incomparably greater to those that know thee, and depend upon thee. It is impossible to express the value of them: and to know how rich, how safe, and secure, they are, who, in all troubles and dangers, can confide in thee for thy powerful protection.

fatness of thy house; and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures.

9 For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light.

10 O continue thy lovingkindness unto them that know thee; and thy righteousness to the upright in heart.

11 Let not the foot of pride come against me, and let not the hand of the wicked remove me.

12 There are the workers of iniquity fallen: they are cast down, and shall not be able to rise.

Ver. 8.] They shall not only be well contented in that condition wherein they are; but have abundant satisfaction in thy love to them; and, at length, bring thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, for thy merciful preservation of them, and feast with thee in thy house; where thou shalt pour into them the sweetest joys, and give them an earnest of the greatest plenty of all divine blessings, that shall continually flow in upon them.

Ver. 9.] For thou art the spring from whence all our happiness comes, which thou art able to communicate for ever: and if thou wilt be favourable to us, nothing shall hinder our joy; but we shall think ourselves happy in the most disconsolate condition.

Ver. 10.] Vouchsafe then, O most gracious God, to extend thy lovingkindness (which is so precious, that it excels all worldly things) not only unto me, but unto all that obediently acknowledge their dependence on thee; never withdraw thy favour from them, but perform thy promises to thy faithful servants, and defend them from all the mischievous devices of their enemies to destroy them.

Ver. 11.] Make me an example of it; and, whatsoever is secretly designed and plotted against me, let not my proud enemy prevail, and tread me under his feet; let not all the power of the wicked, that may join with him, be able to subvert me.

Ver. 12.] In this attempt I am confident they shall fail: I plainly see them baffled in this wicked design. It is as certain, as if I already beheld it with mine eyes, that where they thought to overthrow me, they shall fall themselves: with so powerful a hand shall they be thrown down, that they shall never recover themselves, to renew their attempts against me any more.

PSALM XXXVII.

A Psalm of David.

1 FRET not thyself because of evildoers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.

PSALM XXXVII.

ARGUMENT.—In this Psalm (which is composed so artificially, that the order of the letters of the alphabet is observed, in the first letter of every other verse) David seems to intend to prevent the scandal which some might take when they saw the wicked in prosperity, and the godly under affliction (as they did sometimes); quite contrary to the law, which promised all good things to those that kept it, and threatened all evils to those that broke it. He bids them be patient, and stay awhile; and they should see both verified. For the prosperity of the wicked shall be short (as he over and over again

2 For they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb.

3 Trust in the LORD, and do good; so shalt bids them consider): and the just, if they would but wait awhile, should see themselves not only delivered out of trouble, but made very flourishing. And therefore he advises, in the first place, that no man by any means suffer himself to be tempted, by the splendid condition of the wicked, to imitate them in their ungodly courses; but stick close to the principles of piety and virtue, trusting in God, and committing himself to him; who will give great satisfaction to such honest men, in what they have at present, though never so little; and at last, put them in possession of all that their hearts can desire. And, to preserve themselves in this pious temper, he shows nothing could be more available thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed.

4 Delight thyself also in the LORD; and he shall give thee the desires of thy heart.

5 Commit thy way unto the LORD; trust also in him; and he shall bring it to pass.

6 And he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday.

7 Rest in the LORD, and wait patiently for him: fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass.

8 Cease from anger, and forsake wrath: fret not thyself in any wise to do evil.

than meekness and humility (which procure us, as Theodoret here notes, abundance of good things), and to reflect on the lamentable end of the proud and haughty, who take unjust courses (as was apparent in what befell Saul and Absalom, and such-like persons). Which sufficiently admonishes all men to bear their present troubles decently and well: and not to envy the prosperous successes of the wicked, nor to call them blessed: but rather account them unhappy and miserable.

The son of Sirach seems to have summed up this Psalm in those few words (Ecclus. i. 23, &c.), "A patient man will bear for a time, and afterward joy shall spring up unto him. For the fear of the Lord is wisdom; and faith and meekness are his delight."

Ver. 1.] Let it not vex thee to see the evil-doers in great prosperity: nor be provoked thereby either to accuse God's providence, or to think the worse of virtue; or to imitate them in their wickedness; or to wish thyself to be what they are.

Ver. 2.] For this prosperity, which thou art apt to look upon with admiration, envy, or anger, is so far from lasting always, that it is but of short continuance: they shall be cut down on a sudden, as the grass is by the hand of the mower, when it is most flourishing; or they shall fade away as the green herb doth, which in a little time withers, and of itself falls to decay.

Ver. 3.] If you would have a firm and stable happiness, confide in God (and not in riches, shouldst thou have them in the greatest abundance), doing all the good thou art able in that condition wherein his providence hath placed thee: so shalt thou be settled in the good land God hath given us (when the wicked are cut off from it), and shalt enjoy securely all those blessings which he, according to his faithful promise, will provide for thee.

Ver. 4.] Be not discouraged, therefore, nor too much dejected, if thou art for the present afflicted; but rest contented with what thou hast: or rather so-lace thyself in the Lord, and take a greater delight in his promises, than the wicked can do in their present possessions: and, commending thyself unto him by constant prayer, be confident he will answer thee, according to thy heart's desire.

Ver. 5.] When thou hast any difficult business in hand, and art doubtful of the success; or when thou knowest not what course to take, for the accomplishing of thy honest designs; leave all to the Lord, and trust to him in pious and upright courses, that he will direct and assist thee, and bring things to a good issue.

Ver. 6.] And if thou shouldst be accused as a man of evil designs; let not that trouble thee neither: for though thy fame may be obscured for a time by calumnies and slanders, as the sun is by mists and clouds;

9 For evildoers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth.

10 For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be.

11 But the meek shall inherit the earth; and delight themselves in the abundance of peace.

12 The wicked plotteth against the just, and gnasheth upon him with his teeth.

13 The LORD shall laugh at him: for he seeth that his day is coming.

14 The wicked have drawn out their sword, and have bent their bow, to cast down the poor and yet, as that scatters them all at last, so shall thy integrity appear, and shine as bright as the sun at noon-day.

Ver. 7.] And in the mean time rest satisfied in this, that the Lord knows thy innocency: and do not murmur and complain if he do not presently vindicate it; but think it becomes thee to wait upon him, with humble submission to his will, and to stay as long as he pleases. And be sure thou be not so impatient, as to be irritated by the thriving wickedness of the ungodly, and the strange success they have in their dishonest contrivances, to do as they do; and to follow them in their calumnies, fraud, injustice, and oppression, or any such like courses, whereby they craftily compass all their designs.

Ver. 8.] If thou perceive thy indignation begin to arise, to see such vile people so successful, suppress it presently; let it not vex and afflict thee, much less boil up to wrath and furious displeasure; or, if on a sudden thou art surprised with such a passion, take care, however, that it proceed no farther; and by no means be so incensed (I must repeat that caution, it is so weighty) as to follow their example in evil-doing.

Ver. 9.] For how prosperous soever it may prove in the beginning, the end, assure thyself, shall be lamentable. And let those evil-doers expect also to meet with an untimely end, and to be cut off by the hand of justice in a remarkable manner from the land of the living: when they that follow my advice, and wait patiently till the Lord will do them right, shall possess those good things that he hath promised, in this land which he hath given them for their inheritance.

Ver. 10.] And do not think he stays too long before he doth it; but if that thought come into thy mind, resolve to expect yet a while longer; and still believe that after a very short time the wicked, who seem to stand so fast, shall be utterly destroyed. When thou hast made a strict search after him, thou shalt find nothing of him remaining in the place where thou sawest him so flourishing.

Ver. 11.] Whereas they that meekly submit to their present afflictions, and patiently wait upon God till he be pleased to relieve them, shall be settled at last in their possessions, and lead a most pleasant life, in the greatest plenty of all manner of good things: in the enjoyment of which nothing shall disturb them.

Ver. 12.] The wicked, indeed, hope to hinder this; being so furiously enraged at the just, that he is always contriving some mischief against him.

Ver. 13.] But all his plots and crafty devices are ridiculous in the eyes of the Lord, who sees the day of his ruin approaching: which will inevitably seize on him before his designs can take effect.

Ver. 14.] He hath numerous partakers, indeed, who have added open force to their secret practices, needy, and to slay such as be of upright conversation.

15 Their sword shall enter into their own heart, and their bows shall be broken.

16 A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked.

17 For the arms of the wicked shall be broken : but the Lord upholdeth the righteous.

18 The Lord knoweth the days of the upright : and their inheritance shall be for ever.

19 They shall not be ashamed in the evil time, and in the days of famine they shall be satisfied.

20 But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs : they shall consume ; into smoke shall they consume away.

21 The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again : but the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth.

and armed themselves in a warlike manner for the just man's utter destruction ; which they hope may be the more easily compassed because he is destitute of human help, and will not take any crooked ways for his own preservation.

Ver. 15.] But all these endeavours also shall prove in vain ; and, which is more, they shall not only miss their aim, but their sword, as we say, shall cut their own throat ; and the evil they intended against the just shall fall upon themselves.

Ver. 16.] And as there is more satisfaction in the little pittance a righteous man hath, than in all the abundance which the greatest potentates have gotten by extortion, oppression, and violence ; so that small power he hath shall be of more force to protect and preserve him, than all the multitudes which attend upon those violent men to guard them.

Ver. 17.] For the Lord is against the wicked ; and be their power never so great, which they have to oppress and destroy the righteous, he will break it in pieces ; but good men will he support, be they never so weak ; and both maintain them in what they enjoy, and increase their stock, notwithstanding all that their enemies can do against them.

Ver. 18.] He may seem to neglect them, but there is no day passes wherein he doth not take care of them, and exercise a most gracious providence over them ; observing not only all their afflictions, but their patience under them, which shall be rewarded with the blessings he hath promised to them, and to their children after them.

Ver. 19.] In calamitous times, when God punishes the world by war or pestilence, they shall not be ashamed of the hope they have placed in God that he will preserve them ; when a famine comes and pinches others, they shall be sure to have enough.

Ver. 20.] But the wicked shall perish in those evil days, for the Lord looks upon them as his enemies ; who, when they grow rich and great, are but fattened up as beasts for the slaughter, and on a sudden melt away, as fast as the fat of lambs that is burnt upon the altar : just so shall the divine vengeance seize on them, when they are in the fulness of their prosperity ; and, like that fat, they shall vanish into smoke, and come to nothing.

Ver. 21.] You see a man now, perhaps, grow rich by wicked arts : but he shall in time be reduced to such straits as shall put him to double shame ; first of borrowing, and then of not being able to pay at his day : when the righteous shall be so far from borrow-22 For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth ; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off.

23 The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord : and he delighteth in his way.

24 Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down : for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand.

25 I have been young, and now am old ; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread.

26 He is ever merciful, and lendeth ; and his seed is blessed.

27 Depart from evil, and do good ; and dwell for evermore.

28 For the Lord loveth judgment, and forsaketh not his saints ; they are preserved for ever : but the seed of the wicked shall be cut off.

29 The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever.

ing of any, that he shall be able to lend ; nay, to exercise mercy, and give freely to him that needeth.

Ver. 22.] For upon these God hath entailed a blessing by his gracious promises (which shall certainly be fulfilled), that they and theirs shall enjoy the good things of the land ; and against the other he hath denounced a curse (which they shall no ways avoid), that they shall be rooted out.

Ver. 23.] Let a man but take care that his ways be pleasing to the Lord, by doing what he approves, and he will prosper him in all his undertakings, and guide his counsels and actions so that he shall meet with good success.

Ver. 24.] Or if he fail sometime of his end, he shall not be undone : the Lord still supports him by his power, that he be not discouraged ; and relieves him by his good providence, that he be not utterly ruined.

Ver. 25.] I say nothing but what I can confirm by my own long observation : when I was young I began to take notice of it, and I continued so to do till now that I am grown old ; and I cannot remember that in all my life I ever saw a truly pious, just, and charitable man, left destitute of necessary things ; or his children after him reduced to such poverty, that they were constrained to beg from door to door.

Ver. 26.] No, he rather hath not only enough to supply his own wants, but to spare also for the relief of others, to whom he freely gives, or at least lends ; and is so unwearied in these acts of charity, that God rewards it with blessings upon his posterity.

Ver. 27.] Take my advice, therefore, if thou wouldst be happy : never do any evil, though it be to gain the greatest advantage this world can afford ; but constantly employ thyself in good works, especially in acts of mercy, though thereby thou mayest seem to impoverish thyself for the present ; be assured this is the way to live a long and prosperous life in great tranquillity and peace.

Ver. 28.] For the Lord loveth that which is just and right, and upon that account will not forsake those that are merciful, but be very merciful to them ; and continue his mercy to their children after them, when the posterity of injurious and hard-hearted men shall be destroyed.

Ver. 29.] Such wretches may flourish for a time : but they that shall be settled and fixed in the land of promise, and leave it as an inheritance to those that succeed them, are only (as I have often said) the godly, just, and merciful men.

30 The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom, and his tongue talketh of judgment.

31 The law of his God is in his heart; none of his steps shall slide.

32 The wicked watcheth the righteous, and seeketh to slay him.

33 The Lord will not leave him in his hand, nor condemn him when he is judged.

34 Wait on the Lord, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land: when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it.

35 I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree.

Ver. 30.] Who do good not only to men's bodies, but to their souls also; imparting to them (especially to their own children) such precepts of virtuous wisdom as teach them how to behave themselves aright in every action of their life, and naturally tend to make them prosperous.

Ver. 31.] As appears by this righteous man himself: who, making the law of God (which he hath continually before his eyes), the rule of his life, proceeds steadily to the obtaining of his end; and happily finishes his course without falling into those mischiefs into which wickedness leads those who have no regard unto that rule.

Ver. 32.] His greatest danger is from such lawless men who (as I have said before) watch for an opportunity, and leave no means unattempted (though it be by falseness and treachery) not only to give him trouble and disturbance, but to take away his life.

Ver. 33.] But the Lord will not let them have power to do what they design. He will rescue him from their violence. Or if they seek to undo him in a form of law, by false accusations before the public judges, he will find a means to clear his innocence, and reverse even the sentence they have pronounced against him.

Ver. 34.] Therefore, if I should study never so long, I can give a good man no better advice than I did at first: hope in God (when any of these troubles happen) and patiently wait for his mercy, in a steadfast observance of all his commands. Be not moved by any mischiefs that men can threaten to go out of that way into which thou art directed by God's law, but believe that he will at last, if thou persevere in it, advance thee to the possession of all the blessings it promiseth; and thou shalt see those that thought to depress thee utterly destroyed.

Ver. 35.] There wants not public examples of this in our own days. For I myself have seen the wicked (such as Saul, Doeg, and Ahithophel) in such power, that he was in no fear that any body could hurt him; but, quite contrary, struck terror into all: his off-36 Yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found.

37 Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace.

38 But the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off.

39 But the salvation of the righteous is of the Lord: he is their strength in the time of trouble.

40 And the Lord shall help them, and deliver them: he shall deliver them from the wicked, and save them, because they trust in him.

spring was numerous, his possessions large, his revenue exceeding great; being like a tree never yet transplanted, that hath taken root, and sucked abundance of the earth, and spreads juice out of its branches every way.

Ver. 36.] And yet, as firm as he seemed to stand, he was gone on a sudden; he vanished (it is very wonderful) just as you see a cloud pass away and disappear. I looked about me to see what was become of him, and whether he might not be removed (as a tree sometimes is) to another place; but there was no such man, nor any remainder of him to be found.

Ver. 37.] Do you mark then and make it your own observation, as I have made it mine, and you will find there is this great difference between him that makes the laws of God the rule of his life, and those that transgress them; that though the former may meet with some troubles for a time, yet, if they do not make him forsake his integrity, nor in any thing swerve from his duty, he shall in the issue be very prosperous and happy.

Ver. 38.] But the other shall be utterly destroyed; none of them shall escape by any of their cunning tricks and devices, but shall all alike perish; though for the present they may thrive in their wickedness, yet in the conclusion they shall be cut off both root and branch.

Ver. 39.] For the Lord, whom none can resist, undertakes to be the defender, deliverer, and benefactor of just and good men: they may safely depend on him for power and strength to support and protect them, whensoever they fall into any distress.

Ver. 40.] He will not fail to help them during their troubles, and at last to deliver them out of them: the wicked shall not be able to hinder it; but he will deliver them from all their secret plots, or open attempts to destroy them: he will therefore deliver them, because they entirely rely on him for safety, and will not take any other course but such as he allows to save themselves from danger.

PSALM XXXVIII.

A Psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

1 O LORD, rebuke me not in thy wrath: neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.

PSALM XXXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm was composed by David, either during his affliction, to desire God graciously to remember him (as the title of it is), and send him deliverance, or afterward, to put himself in remembrance of the moans he made when he was in that sad condition; and how earnest he then was with God, to pardon all the sins which had brought him into it, and to release him out of it; and what hope and confidence he then had in God, which might encourage him and all others to place the like humble trust in his goodness for the time to come.

2 For thine arrows stick fast in me, and thy hand presseth me sore.

3 There is no soundness in my flesh because of thine anger; neither is there any rest in my bones because of my sin.

4 For mine iniquities are gone over my head: as a heavy burden they are too heavy for me.

5 My wounds stink and are corrupt because of my foolishness.

6 I am troubled; I am bowed down greatly; I go mourning all the day long.

7 For my loins are filled with a loathsome disease: and there is no soundness in my flesh.

8 I am feeble and sore broken: I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart.

9 LORD, all my desire is before thee; and my groaning is not hid from thee.

What the affliction was, is not so certain as it may seem at first sight. It is generally thought he was sick, and that of some noisome, ulcerous disease; as, in the beginning of the Psalm, several expressions, if they be taken literally, plainly enough denote. But he presently falling into a doleful complaint of the malignity of his enemies, and the coldness of his friends' affection towards him, it is thought not improbable by others, that he describes the crazy condition he was in (under the persecution of Saul) by the languishment of a sick man under some dangerous disease. And thus Theodoret understands it; only he supposes that he reflects upon the disastrous things that befell him after he came to the crown; by the murder of his son Amnon, the rebellion of Absalom, the falseness of Abithophel, the abusive reproaches of Shimei, and all the other afflictions mentioned in his history, which were sent by God upon him for the cure of his sins. And this sense we must follow, or else say he was at the very same time sick of a grievous disease, when he laboured under one of those persecutions. And since the Psalm will be of larger use if we so interpret it, I shall follow that conjecture. So I call it, because we do not read of any sickness David had, nor are we certain what the particular sins were which he bewails in so sad a manner, that it hath made this be called one of the penitential Psalms, beginning just as the first of them doth, Ps. vi.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, I am sorely afflicted; and it is but just I should be so. Yet let me prevail with thee for so much mercy as not to proceed to any farther severity; or if thou dost, yet still to mitigate it with some favour, that I may not suffer in the utmost extremity.

Ver. 2.] For (beside the trouble which my enemies give me without) the pains I already endure in my body are exceeding sharp, and touch me to the very quick: thou hast inflicted on me a heavy punishment, which presses me down to the ground.

Ver. 3.] There is no part of my body but feels the sad effects of thy displeasure, which my sins have so provoked, that I am in perpetual pain, without any intermission.

Ver. 4.] They have brought a great number of evils upon me, which like a deluge have overwhelmed me; and lie upon me as an intolerable burden, under which I am ready to sink, unless thou support me.

Ver. 5.] I am full of ulcers, and they are full of putrefied matter, which grows noisome and offensive to me; as a just reward of my folly, whereby, to satisfy my unreasonable desires, I have inconsiderately offended thee (2 Sam. xi. 2—4).

10 My heart panteth, my strength faileth me: as for the light of mine eyes, it also is gone from me.

11 My lovers and my friends stand aloof from my sore; and my kinsmen stand afar off.

12 They also that seek after my life lay snares for me: and they that seek my hurt speak mischievous things, and imagine deceits all the day long.

13 But I, as a deaf man, heard not; and I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth.

14 Thus I was as a man that heareth not, and in whose mouth are no reproofs.

15 For in thee, O LORD, do I hope: thou wilt hear, O LORD my God.

Ver. 6.] I am not able to go upright, being grown crooked beyond measure: the posture of a mourner, who goes, or rather creeps, softly, and bowed down, is mine continually.

Ver. 7.] Fiery biles break out in the parts about my loins: and though there be so many of them that one would think all the ill humours were run thither, yet in the rest of my body, as I said before, there is no part but is out of order.

Ver. 8.] I am exceedingly weak, and worn away with pain and grief; wherewith my heart is so perpetually tormented, that I roar, rather than sigh, and groan and cry under the apparent anguish of it.

Ver. 9.] But why do I complain in this manner, and make such a particular enumeration of my sufferings? thou, Lord, understandest what I want, and what I would have: though I should say never a word, all my miseries, and the sighs they have cost me, are not unknown to thee.

Ver. 10.] Thou seest the great agitation of my mind, which wanders up and down in restless thought, but all to no purpose; for my strength hath forsaken me: the light of my eyes is so weak that I can scarce make any use of them.

Ver. 11.] And if I could, I should see none of those whom one would expect in such a condition to come and comfort me (2 Sam. xv. 31). For I am deserted by those who professed great love to me: yea, they with whom I contracted a friendship and intimate familiarity neglect me: and such whom nature hath inclined to pity and relieve me keep at a distance, and give me no assistance in my affliction.

Ver. 12.] Meanwhile my enemies are very busy, and employ all their subtilty to find a way how to make an end of this miserable life of mine: they discourse of nothing else but what mischief they may do me; and what they cannot do by force, they are continually contriving how to compass by fraud and deceit.

Ver. 13.] I wanted not information how they calumniated me, but was so oppressed with the weight of my other afflictions, and of those sins which have brought them upon me, that I took no notice of it, but lay as if I were deaf, and heard not what they said; or dumb, and could not make an answer.

Ver. 14.] I was as silent, I say, as if I knew nothing of their false accusations, or as if I were not able to confute them.

Ver. 15.] For notwithstanding all my sins, and thy sore displeasure which I feel against them, I have a good hope in thee, O Lord, that thou wilt plead my cause. I leave them therefore to thee, O Lord, who art the righteous judge; and as thou hast in justice afflicted me, so wilt thou, I doubt not, make them know that they have wrongfully charged me.

16 For I said, Hear me, lest otherwise they should rejoice over me: when my foot slippeth, they magnify themselves against me.

17 For I am ready to halt, and my sorrow is continually before me.

18 For I will declare mine iniquity; I will be sorry for my sin.

19 But mine enemies are lively, and they are

Ver. 16.] I still conclude with myself, that, as bad as I am, and as low as thou hast laid me, thou wilt not think fit to let them insult over me, and brag that they have got the better of me:

Ver. 17.] As they are in danger now to do; for I am so weak every way that I am ready to fall, and have nothing but a sad prospect of ruin before mine eyes.

Ver. 18.] I know, and do confess, that I have deserved it by my iniquity; which when I consider (and nothing else), I have reason to fear the worst that they can do unto me.

Ver. 19.] And what cannot they do, who, while I lie in this weak and miserable condition, are flourishing and prosperous, strong and mighty? and by false rumours make me still more odious to the multitude, and increase their forces against me.

Ver. 20.] With which are joined even those whom strong; and they that hate me wrongfully are multiplied.

20 They also that render evil for good are mine adversaries; because I follow the thing that good is.

21 Forsake me not, O LORD: O my God, be not far from me.

22 Make haste to help me, O LORD my salvation.

I have highly obliged; who do not think it bad enough not to be my friends, but are become my adversaries; for no other reason, that I can find, but because I make a conscience of what I do, and faithfully study and earnestly seek the good of all this kingdom.

Ver. 21.] I humbly therefore betake myself to thee, O Lord, beseeching thee that thou wilt not desert me as they have done. O my God, who hast been very gracious to me on sundry occasions, and seest that I still depend entirely upon thee, let not my sins make thee to abandon me.

Ver. 22.] But rather let my misery, and the imminent danger I am in, move thee speedily to relieve me. Defer no longer, O Lord, whose property it is to deliver those who have none to help them, and trust in thee alone, as I now do, for safety and preservation.

PSALM XXXIX.

To the chief. Musician to Jeduthun. A Psalm of David.

1 I SAID, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue: I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me.

2 I was dumb with silence, I held my peace, even from good; and my sorrow was stirred.

3 My heart was hot within me, while I was musing the fire burned: then spake I with my tongue,

4 LORD, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how frail I am.

PSALM XXXIX.

ARGUMENT.—It is thought by some, that this Psalm (which David delivered afterward to Jeduthun, an excellent musician, and governor of the music in the tabernacle, 1 Chron. xxv.) was made upon the same occasion with the foregoing. And so in part it was; for though there is little reason to think that he was still sick when he composed it (as they imagine), yet his enemies, it is manifest, pressed him sorely. And the consideration of the flourishing condition wherein they were, though very wicked (whilst he, a pious servant of God, was lamentably afflicted), put him into some commotion, notwithstanding his resolution to the contrary; till the thoughts of the shortness of man's life, and consequently of his sufferings, and how easy it was for God to cut off his enemies, composed his spirit again, and made him patient and contented with his present condition.

So that this Psalm seems to me to be rather of the same kind with the thirty-seventh than the thirty-eighth. Only there David gives counsel to others, after God had delivered him from many persecutions, to be patient by his example; but here he himself puts that counsel in practice (perhaps when the rebellion of Absalom renewed his trouble, which is the opinion of Theodoret); though he shows it is very difficult on some occasions not to be very much disturbed at wicked men's prosperity and good men's afflictions, especially when it comes to be a man's own ease under some grievous calamity.

Ver. 1.] It is a very great provocation to anger and discontent to see the wicked still continue prosperous, and to hear how they abuse and calumniate me. But I resolved with myself not to be vexed at it, but rather to take care, as I have exhorted others (Psalm xxxvii.) to be more inoffensive in all my actions; and especially to watch over my tongue, and to lay the strictest restraint upon it, that no indecent complaint, no irreverent discourse about God's providence, no, nor any intemperate speeches against my adversaries, should proceed out of my mouth (2 Sam. xvi. 8. 13).

Ver. 2.] And this purpose I kept for some time so steadfastly, that I spake not a word, either good or bad, but remained, like a dumb man, in perfect silence; being so afraid of breaking out into impatient language against my unjust accusers, that I would not so much as vindicate myself, and clear my innocence. Though the truth is, while I thus denied all vent to my inward grief (which I could not quite suppress), it was the more increased.

Ver. 3.] For though I said nothing, yet I could not choose but have many sad thoughts of the injuries I suffered; and musing long upon them, and upon the impunity of those who committed them, my sorrow grew so great at last, that it could no longer be pent up; but, burning like a fire, with vehement heat in my breast, it broke forth into such expressions as these:

Ver. 4.] Lord, I do not murmur nor repine at my sufferings: but that I may be able to bear them still patiently, make me sensible, I humbly beseech thee, how short this frail life is, and how soon it will have

5 Behold, thou hast made my days as a hand-breadth; and mine age is as nothing before thee: verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity. Selah.

6 Surely every man walketh in a vain shew: surely they are disquieted in vain: he heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them.

7 And now, Lord, what wait I for? my hope is in thee.

8 Deliver me from all my transgressions: make me not the reproach of the foolish.

9 I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; because thou didst it.

an end; that, duly considering this, I may be the less concerned about the miseries I endure, which will end together with it.

Ver. 5.] And it is strange I should forget it, seeing it is so apparent thou hast circumscribed my days within a very narrow compass, and that, compared with thy eternal duration, they are just nothing. Besides, there is no man so strong, so firm, but he may die in an instant (as my enemies may do), in the height of his prosperity, and most flourishing condition: for be he never so settled as he thinks in his greatness, it is certain he is mere emptiness and vanity.

Ver. 6.] What an imaginary thing then is the life of man! who promises himself mighty matters, but hath no more than the image and shadow of them in his brain; for on a sudden he himself vanishes, and is gone: yet for these he makes a lamentable bustle and stir, whereby, if he get anything, alas! it is to very small purpose; for after all the pains he hath taken to heap up wealth, he hath no certainty whether he shall live to enjoy it; no, nor whether his son or his kindred (for perhaps a stranger, nay, his enemy) shall possess it.

Ver. 7.] And therefore I am resolved, O Lord, with thy gracious assistance, not to trouble myself so much as I have done about these vain and uncertain things: for what is there even in a kingdom, that I should desire and expect it impatiently, which may so soon be lost again? I have done with all these empty hopes, and content myself with this alone; that thou wilt not forsake me, but be my gracious God, and choose what is best for me.

Ver. 8.] And first, I hope thou wilt forgive me all those sins, which have justly deserved these heavy punishments; and then show me so much favour, that wicked men, who are so foolish, that they understand not thy meaning in these afflictions which have befallen me, but imagine thou hast cast me off, may not make me their laughing-stock, nor mock 10 Remove thy stroke away from me: I am consumed by the blow of thy hand.

11 When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth: surely every man is vanity. Selah.

12 Hear my prayer, O Lord, and give ear unto my cry; hold not thy peace at my tears: for I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were.

13 O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more.

at my reliance on thee, and patient submission to thee.

Ver. 9.] For I did not complain, but silently endure their insolent and scurrilous language, together with all my other sufferings; reverencing thy justice, by whom everything is ordered (2 Sam. xvi. 10), and this they interpreted to be yielding the cause, and justifying their proceedings against me.

Ver. 10.] May it please thee, therefore, who hath inflicted sore judgments on me, at length to remove them: put a speedy end to them (if thou intendest to confute their foolish reproaches); because I cannot long subsist under such a burden, as hath already taken away all my strength from me.

Ver. 11.] And, indeed, who is able to contend with thee, if thou wilt not graciously remit the punishment we deserve? For when thou chastisest man (in any of those ways whereby thou hast threatened to rebuke his extravagance), his wealth, his power, and whatsoever else he hath that is valuable, moulders away like a garment that is moth-eaten: and it is no wonder; for the greatest of men, as well as the meanest, are but mere vanity.

Ver. 12.] But let even this move thee, O Lord, to grant my petition, which I make for pardon and release from this chastisement. Because I am so frail (as all my forefathers were), and our time here is so very short, that I am more like a stranger and sojourner in this country, than an inhabitant or lord of it (as I lately thought myself); therefore grant my earnest request: and when I say nothing, but silently submit to thy correction, let my tears speak for me, and prevail with thee for some mercy.

Ver. 13.] Forbear me, I beseech thee, and do not proceed thus to afflict me: but repair the decays that are in my strength, and let the very few days I have to live be more peaceable; that, free from the disturbance my enemies give me, I may do thee some small service before I leave the world, and have nothing to do in it any more.

PSALM XL.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 I WAITED patiently for the Lord; and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry.

2 He brought me up also out of a horrible

PSALM XL.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm of David, directed to the chief master of music, for the use of the tabernacle. Wherein he thankfully acknowledges God's goodness to him in delivering him from some great danger (it is not certain what: but may be applied either to the distress he was reduced into by his pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings.

3 And he hath put a new song in my mouth, enemies, as we read in the Psalm foregoing; or to the sickness God had inflicted on him: or to both, mentioned Ps. xxxviii.): and then declares his resolution to serve God faithfully and cheerfully, in such words as may be better applied to Christ's readiness to do the will of God, though it were by dying for us.

even praise unto our God : many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord.

4 Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust, and respecteth not the proud, nor such as turn aside to lies.

5 Many, O Lord my God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done, and thy thoughts which are to us-ward : they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee : if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered.

6 Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire ; mine ears hast thou opened : burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required.

7 Then said I, Lo, I come : in the volume of the book it is written of me,

8 I delight to do thy will, O my God : yea, thy law is within my heart.

But it seems this deliverance was not so complete, but that still he was infested with many enemies ; and therefore, in the latter part of this Psalm, he commends himself still to God's merciful providence : beseeching him to finish what he had begun, by continuing to be his deliverer.

Ver. 1.] It is good, I see, to persevere in prayer, and with constancy and patience to wait upon the Lord ; for though he hath made me expect very long, yet at last he hath been graciously pleased to condescend unto me, and to grant my desire.

Ver. 2.] For when I was in the greatest distress, and no more able to help myself than a man who is fallen into a very deep pit, where he sticks fast also in the stiffest clay ; he not only delivered me from that present danger, which was very dreadful ; but brought me into a place of safety, and withal confirmed me in it, that I might not fall again into the like extremity :

Ver. 3.] But have liberty in quiet and peace to meditate his praises, and to indite a new song in honour of our God ; who hath, to all other benefits, added this late wonderful preservation : which shall excite many others, when they duly consider it, to join together with me in his worship and service : and patiently to depend upon him, and hope in his mercy, as I have done.

Ver. 4.] And happy is that man, notwithstanding all the troubles he may endure, who reposes his confidence in the Lord alone : and neither envies the success of insolent and deceitful men ; nor is tempted thereby to imitate them in their pride, and in their perfidiousness.

Ver. 5.] Many are the benefits, O mighty Lord, and my most gracious God, which thou hast bestowed upon such faithful servants ; for whom thou hast done wonders, and still designest great and many kindnesses, which cannot be comprehended, much less expressed, by our weakness. Whensoever I attempt to make thee some acknowledgment for such inestimable favours, I find it is beyond my power so much as to tell the number of them.

Ver. 6.] There are no peace-offerings (whereby we are wont to testify our thankfulness for thy mercies), nor any oblations, which attend upon them that are worthy to be presented unto thee ; or are a fit expression of our gratitude for so many, and so great, benefits as I have received from thee. A ready and constant obedience to thee, in thy faithful service, is far more acceptable ; to which, as I am by nature tied, and thou hast by thy mercies strongly engaged 9 I have preached righteousness in the great congregation : lo, I have not refrained my lips, O Lord, thou knowest.

10 I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart ; I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation : I have not concealed thy loving-kindness and thy truth from the great congregation.

11 Withhold not thou thy tender mercies from me, O Lord : let thy lovingkindness and thy truth continually preserve me.

12 For innumerable evils have compassed me about : mine iniquities have taken hold upon me, so that I am not able to look up ; they are more than the hairs of my head : therefore my heart faileth me.

13 Be pleased, O Lord, to deliver me : O Lord, make haste to help me.

me, so I do freely consent, and cheerfully devote myself (as the Lord Christ hereafter will do entirely) : if I should add all other kinds of sacrifice, whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin, I see of how little value they are with thee.

Ver. 7.] And therefore, when I thought what thou mightest justly expect from me, after this great deliverance, immediately I said (as if I had heard thee calling upon me, to do thee some extraordinary service), Behold, I come to make an offering of myself unto thee (as the Lord Christ will do, even of his very blood). For so the book of the law requires (wherein this sacrifice of Christ is more plainly described) :

Ver. 8.] That I should do what is pleasing and acceptable to thee, O my God (as the Lord Christ will do more perfectly), though it be never so difficult and troublesome to me : and so I will most gladly, with all my soul : for there thy law is written, and not only in my book (Dent. xvii. 18, 19).

Ver. 9.] And as an earnest of it, I have already proclaimed to all thy people, in their full assemblies, what great obligations I have unto thee : behold, O Lord, I appeal to thee, who canst not be deceived how forward I have been to offer to thee, on all occasions, this public sacrifice of praise, for all thy benefits bestowed upon me.

Ver. 10.] I have not thought it sufficient to meditate alone by myself upon thy loving-kindness, which hath mightily affected my heart ; but I have made known to others how faithfully thou hast performed thy promises in the wonderful deliverance thou hast lately given me : this singular kindness and fidelity I have openly published to all thy people, in their most frequent assemblies, at the solemn festivals.

Ver. 11.] Be thou pleased, O mighty Lord, as readily, openly, and abundantly, to express thy tender mercy towards me : let that loving-kindness and faithfulness, which I have so much magnified, be ever seen in my continued preservation and deliverance from all future dangers.

Ver. 12.] For I am not yet so completely happy, but that I see mine enemies are so busy in contriving more mischief against me, that dangers without number surround me. And indeed my sins are so many, that it is but just I should feel the fruit of them in multiplied punishments ; which have suddenly seized on me, and grown to such a number, that, as I may sooner tell how many hairs I have on my head, than how many troubles I suffer, so I am ready to faint under the burden of them :

Ver. 13.] Till I think of thee, O Lord, who, I hope,

14 Let them be ashamed and confounded together that seek after my soul to destroy it; let them be driven backward and put to shame that wish me evil.

15 Let them be desolate for a reward of their shame that say unto me, Aha, aha.

wilt be still pleased to deliver me; yea, thou hast been so very good to me, that I take the humble boldness to beseech thee, O Lord, to deliver me speedily.

Ver. 14.] Let them all be alike most shamefully disappointed, that restlessly endeavour to take away my life: defeat them, and put them to flight, with open disgrace, whoever they be that study to do me any mischief.

Ver. 15.] Let utter desolation be the recompense of all their shameful deeds, whereby they thought to have exposed me to shame: when they insulted over me, and made a mock both of my affliction and of my trust in thee.

16 Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee: let such as love thy salvation say continually, The Lord be magnified.

17 But I am poor and needy; yet the Lord thinketh upon me: thou art my help and my deliverer; make no tarrying, O my God.

Ver. 16.] But let all those that depend on thee alone, and seek for safety by no other means but those which thou allowest, have perpetual cause to rejoice in thee exceedingly: let such as expect and delight to see thee appear for the deliverance of thy people, never cease to say, The Lord be praised: let the glory of his wonderful works be everywhere published and extolled.

Ver. 17.] As for myself, this is my never-failing comfort, though I am stripped of all, and quite destitute of human help, yet the Lord takes care of me, and consults my good: and it is sufficient, that thou Lord art my God, on whom I depend for relief and deliverance; O delay not to send it to me.

PSALM XLI.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 BLESSED is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble.

2 The Lord will preserve him, and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed upon the earth: and thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies.

3 The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing: thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness.

4 I said, Lord, be merciful unto me: heal my soul; for I have sinned against thee.

5 Mine enemies speak evil of me, When shall he die, and his name perish?

6 And if he come to see me, he speaketh

PSALM XLI.

ARGUMENT.—Though some will have this Psalm to have been composed by David, and delivered to the chief master of music, only upon occasion of that great strait, into which he was brought by the rebellion of his son Absalom; yet it is the more common opinion, and seems more probable, that he had been also lately very sick. And then finding, by sad experience, what an aggravation it was of his affliction, to see his enemies so barbarous as to rejoice at it, and with his death, nay, his friends, especially some one particular friend (who was a type of the traitor Judas), not only to take no pity on him, but prove false and perfidious to him; he, in the first place, highly commends and blesses that temper of mind which inclines men to be pitiful and compassionate to those that are sick, and assures such persons that they shall feel the happy fruits of it; and then complains most heavily of their inhumanity, who insulted over him in his calamity, and with reproachful words and vile calumnies, exasperated the grief of his mind. On which he hoped God, who loves merciful men, would take compassion, and put him into a condition to chastise their insolence.

Ver. 1.] Happy is that tender-hearted man, who, prudently considering it may be his own condition, doth not despise, but visit the sick, especially such as are poor, and takes care to comfort and relieve them. The Lord will requite his kindness, and send him the like succour and relief when he falls into any danger.

Ver. 2.] In sickly times, or other public calamity, the Lord will preserve his life; and more than that, will make him live in prosperity upon the earth; which when the envy and hatred of his enemies endeavour to destroy, the Lord will disappoint them, and not suffer them to have their will on him.

Ver. 3.] Or if any sickness (as no man can expect always to be in health) bring him into such a languishing condition, that he cannot help himself, the Lord will support him, and give him patience: then thou wilt remarkably requite his officious care about the sick (whose bed he was wont to turn and smooth for his softer repose), by giving him ease and refreshment during his weakness, till thou change it again into health and strength.

Ver. 4.] In confidence of this, I myself, when I was sick, addressed my prayer unto the Lord, and implored his mercy, saying, Take pity upon me (who have not been negligent in this duty, Ps. xxxv. 13, 14), and do not deal in strict justice with me; but, though I have been a grievous offender, and so deserved a heavier stroke, graciously pardon all that I have done amiss, and restore me again to my former health.

Ver. 5.] I am the fitter object of thy compassion, because my enemies have none at all; but, to the affliction which thou hast laid upon me, add their defamations, and imprecate more evils to befall me: for nothing will satisfy them but my death; which they impatiently long to see, and hope to bury my reputation together with me.

Ver. 6.] If any of them, indeed, come to see me, he seems to be sorry for me, and condoles with me; but there is nothing but fraud and deceit under these fair words, which he bestows upon me: for all the time that he either counsels or comforts me, or makes any promises of what he will do for me, he is hatching some mischief in his heart against me, from what he can gather out of my words, or actions, or discourse: and as soon as he is out of my doors, he spreads vanity: his heart gathereth iniquity to itself; when he goeth abroad he telleth it.

7 All that hate me whisper together against me: against me do they devise my hurt.

8 An evil disease, say they, cleaveth fast unto him: and now that he lieth he shall rise up no more.

9 Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me.

it abroad among his companions, to increase their hatred, or their contempt of me:

Ver. 7.] Which discovers itself in their private assemblies, where they secretly confer together how to undo me: they have no other business there, but to contrive what use they shall make of his information for my ruin.

Ver. 8.] This is the time, say they; for now God hath met with him, and punished his heinous sins with a grievous disease; which sticks as fast to him as our reports (which the people believe, and he will never be able to confute), and hath laid him so low, that he cannot possibly recover.

Ver. 9.] And, which is still more afflictive, the man with whom I never had any quarrel, but rather used as a friend; he in whom I reposed the greatest confidence (2 Sam. xvi. 23), who was one of my family, and was maintained by my service, hath, in a brutish manner, not only forsaken me, but (like a horse that kicks at him that feeds him) contemptuously lifted up himself against me.

Ver. 10.] But all this doth not discourage me when I think of thy mercy, O Lord: which as I most humbly implore, so thou art wont to show to those that are merciful. I am not so low (ver. 8), but, contrary to their expectation, thou art able 10 But thou, O Lord, be merciful unto me, and raise me up, that I may requite them.

11 By this I know that thou favourest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me.

12 And as for me, thou upholdest me in mine integrity, and settest me before thy face for ever.

13 Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting, and to everlasting. Amen, and Amen.

to raise me up, and restore me to my throne, from whence they have driven me; and then I shall punish them, according as my office and their wickedness require.

Ver. 11.] And truly I take this to be an argument of thy kind intentions towards me, that hitherto thou hast marvellously preserved me, both in this sickness and in all other danger; so that my enemy hath missed the triumph he hoped for in my ruin.

Ver. 12.] The triumph belongs to me, who thankfully acknowledge that thou hast supported me, and defended my innocence: thou hast taken such a special care of me, that I hope I shall serve thee all my days, without interruption, in that office thou hast committed to me.

Ver. 13.] For which and all other his benefits, let the great Lord of all the world, the God of Israel, whom he hath chosen for his own peculiar people, be most heartily blessed and praised; let him be blessed throughout all generations, as long as the world shall last, and unto all eternity: let him be blessed; let him be blessed (again and again I repeat it with most fervent affection); and let all his people concur with me in these desires, and with one consent accompany me with their joyful acclamations, saying, The Lord be praised, the Lord be praised.

PART II.

PSALM XLII.

To the chief Musician. Maschil. For the sons of Korah.

1 As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God.

PSALM XLII.

ARGUMENT.—Here begins the second of the five books of Psalms, according to the Hebrew division. All those of the former book, except four, have the name of David prefixed to them, as the author of them; and so were put together, by him that collected them, into one volume. But in this second book, the first part of it consists of Psalms entitled to the sons of Korah; as several learned men understand the inscriptions; who imagine that some holy men among them composed these Psalms, in the time of the captivity. But I shall follow our English translation, and take this Psalm (as the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin do) to be directed to the sons of Korah, to be set or sung by them, under the chief master of music in the tabernacle. And then there is little question to be made, but David indited

2 My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?

this and some of the Psalms which have this title; as it is certain he did most, if not all, of those that are contained in the latter part of this second book, from Psalm the fiftieth to the end of the seventy-second. And this present Psalm, with that which follows, seems to have been penned, either when he was under the persecution of Saul, or (which is more probable) when he was driven again from the house of God by Absalom. Which sad condition he bewails: with a great mixture of grief for his banishment from those sweet enjoyments he had there, and of hope to be restored to them again.

This Psalm is the second of those thirteen which are called Maschil (see Ps. xxxii.); by some here taken to be an epithet of the master of music, who taught or instructed the sons of Korah very skillfully.

3 My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?

4 When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me: for I had gone with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with the multitude that kept holiday.

5 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance.

6 O my God, my soul is cast down within me: therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermonites, from the hill Mizar.

7 Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy

Ver. 1.] The hunted deer doth not long more earnestly, and cry more loudly, for the brooks of water to quench her thirst, than my soul doth for the happy enjoyment of thee, my God, in the public solemnities; from whence I am driven by those that seek my life.

Ver. 2.] It is not my throne of which I am so desirous, as the place where thou my God dwellest; who art the eternal spring of life and comfort, which no other God can communicate. O how vehemently doth my soul long for thee; and how tedious doth the time of my banishment from thee seem! O when shall I see that happy day, wherein I shall be restored to the liberty again of presenting myself before thee in thy tabernacle?

Ver. 3.] There I was wont with great delight to feast with thee; but now my appetite fails me to my daily food: instead of which, my only satisfaction is in tears; to which I have wholly abandoned myself. For what can be more grievous than to hear them say, I am abandoned by thee (2 Sam. xvi. 7, 8)? and to be continually reproached and derided with this taunting question, What is become of thy God, of whose favour thou wast wont to boast?

Ver. 4.] O what a sad thought is it, to call to mind those pleasant days which are past and gone! particularly when I brought the ark to thy dwelling-place, with the joyful shout of all thy people; who in a pompous manner accompanied me with their praises and thanksgivings at that festival solemnity (1 Chron. xv. 25. 28). It even breaks my heart with grief to remember this thing, and all the other sacred times, when before this banishment we met together at thy house, to worship and acknowledge thee for all thy benefits.

Ver. 5.] And why may I not expect the like again? It is true, my soul, these are very sad and melancholy reflections; but must I therefore be utterly dejected? Is there any cause that anxiety of mind should make thee so tumultuous, as if all hopes of this felicity were lost forever? Trust in God, and patiently wait upon him; for the time will come when I shall go to his house, and praise him still for his favour towards me; in delivering me from this as well as all my former afflictions.

Ver. 6.] O my most gracious God, thou seest how I hide myself for it; and yet I am overcome with grief, and should be quite oppressed, while I am waterspouts: all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me.

8 Yet the Lord will command his lovingkindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life.

9 I will say unto God my rock, Why hast thou forgotten me? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?

10 As with a sword in my bones, mine enemies reproach me; while they say daily unto me, Where is thy God?

11 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

forced to hide myself in this wilderness beyond Jordan (2 Sam. xvii. 22. 29), and wander up and down in the solitary mountains, far distant from thy tabernacle, did I not comfort myself with the thoughts of thy goodness and power; whom I have served there.

Ver. 7.] I am fallen into a bottomless depth of miseries; which follow one upon another, as if the former invited the next to succeed it; they gush in upon me by thy appointment with such violence, as spouts of water do out of a cloud. I am tossed like one upon a tempestuous sea, where the waves rage and swell so high, that every billow threatens to overwhelm and bury me in the deep.

Ver. 8.] Yet I do not distrust the loving-kindness of the Lord, by whose authority this tempest shall be appeased. He will in much mercy order and dispose things so, that night and day I shall have perpetual cause to sing his praise; and therefore I will commend myself to him continually, who is the author of my life, and beseech him to preserve it.

Ver. 9.] I will take the boldness also to expostulate with him, saying, O God, I have always made thee my refuge; and thought myself safer under thy protection, than if I had been in the strongest fortress: why then dost thou delay thy help, as if thou tookest no farther care of me? why do I still continue in that mournful condition wherein I left Jerusalem (2 Sam. xv. 30), and have no relief from this grievous oppression of the enemy?

Ver. 10.] O how cutting are their reproaches! how deeply do they wound my soul! It is like a stab to the very heart, to hear them say, in their daily jeers, What is become of thy God, in whom thou trustedst? why doth he make no more haste to send thee deliverance?

Ver. 11.] But it better becomes me to expostulate with myself, than with thy majesty. And therefore I ask myself again; O my soul, why art thou thus sadly afflicted? why do these things so miserably torment thee, and disturb thy quiet? since there is hope in God, that I am not utterly banished from his presence; but shall return to his house again to praise him: on whom I fix my eyes as my only saviour (for hitherto he hath been my most gracious God), who will pull off my mourning apparel; and make joy and gladness take place of sorrow and sadness in my countenance.

PSALM XLIII.

1 JUDGE me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation : O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man.

2 For thou art the God of my strength ; why dost thou cast me off ? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy ?

3 O send out thy light and thy truth : let them lead me ; let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles.

4 Then will I go unto the altar of God, unto God my exceeding joy : yea, upon the harp will I praise thee, O God my God.

5 Why art thou cast down, O my soul ? and why art thou disquieted within me ? hope in God : for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

PSALM XLIII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, in all probability, was composed by the same author with the former (and accordingly the LXX. expressly ascribe it to David) ; and upon the same occasion, when he was driven by Absalom (who drew the whole kingdom into his conspiracy, 2 Sam. xv. 10. 13, &c.), from the house of God, which he loved more than his own palace. Thither, therefore, he desires to be restored, and expresses his hope of it, in the very same words that he did in the Psalm foregoing.

Ver. 1.] O God, the supreme judge of the whole world, I appeal to thee, in this contest between me and a seditious people ; who, void of piety and humanity, are risen up in rebellion against me : beseeching thee to vindicate my innocence, and defend me from their violence. O deliver me from that deceitful man, who pretended devotion, when he went to make an insurrection (2 Sam. xv. 7. 10), deliver me from the crafty counsel which Ahithophel gives him ; and from the open force, whereby he seeks injuriously to take away my life (2 Sam. xvii. 1, 2).

Ver. 2.] For I have none to flee unto for safety and protection, but thee alone ; who hast ever hitherto been my mighty deliverer, and art now my only support : and therefore I hope thou wilt make haste to help me ; because it puts me into the sorest agonies to see myself for the present so deserted by thee, that I can do nothing but bewail the forlorn condition and the miserable straits into which the enemy hath reduced me (see Ps. xlii. 9).

Ver. 3.] I am beset with mighty armies, and have nothing to oppose to them but thy favour and thy faithfulness : O send forth the blessed effects of them, and, according to thy promises to those that depend on thee, let thy almighty power, in much mercy, lead and conduct me : let it go along with me, and give me the victory over them ; and bring me back again unto thy holy mountain, where thou hast fixed thy dwelling-place.

Ver. 4.] Then will I faithfully perform my promises unto thee ; and the first thing I do, shall be to go to thy altar, with sacrifices of thanksgiving to thee, the author of my joy and triumph : which shall not cease with that public service ; but when I am alone, entertaining myself with my harp, I will praise thy mercy, and faithfulness, and power, O God, my righteous judge ; who graciously protectest the innocent, and defendest those that cannot right themselves.

Ver. 5.] I doubt not of it ; and therefore be no longer dejected, O my soul : why shouldst thou give thyself any farther disquiet, and trouble thyself with tumultuous thoughts ? Hope in God to see better days ; and believe the enemy hath not so blocked up the way to his tabernacle, but God will open it again, and give me liberty to go and sing praises there unto him ; from whom alone as I expect deliverance, so he (who hath always been my most gracious God) will turn my mourning into joy, and let my countenance be dejected no more.

PSALM XLIV.

To the chief Musician, for the sons of Korah. Maschil.

1 We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what work thou didst in their days, in the times of old.

PSALM XLIV.

ARGUMENT.—This is the third of those Psalms called maschil (see Ps. xxxii.), and the second of those directed to the sons of Korah (see Ps. xlii.), but doth not seem to have been composed by David, as the two foregoing were : for in his days they were not oppressed by foreign enemies, as the Psalmist here complains, in the name of the whole church, they were to such a degree, that some of them were made slaves, others killed, and all of them became a reproach. Yet I do not think it was composed in the captivity of Babylon (much less in the persecution by Antiochus, as Theodoret thinks, when these inspirations were ceased), but before that time, though long after David's days, while their kingdom was as yet standing, and they had some forces remaining, though God did not bless them with success (ver. 9).

And if we will fix upon any particular time, and not content ourselves to know, in general, that it was penned when the whole nation was in great distress, I can find none so likely as the days of Hezekiah, who was a pious reformer of that church, and had restored the divine service, according to the law of Moses, and the ordinances of David (2 Chron. xxix. 3, 4. 12. 25) ; and taken care the priests and Levites should not only do their duty, but have their tithes paid them punctually, &c. (2 Chron. xxx. xxxi.), and yet, notwithstanding, was invaded by the king of Assyria. Who did not merely make some inroads upon them, and carry away a great many people (as had been done before his time, 2 Chron. xxix. 9), but took all the fenced cities, and

3 For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them: but thy right hand, and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour unto them.

4 Thou art my King, O God: command deliverances for Jacob.

5 Through thee will we push down our enemies: through thy name will we tread them under that rise up against us.

6 For I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me.

7 But thou hast saved us from our enemies, and hast put them to shame that hated us.

came before Jerusalem with a great army (2 Kings xviii. 13. 17. Isa. xxxvi. 1). In this strait, that good king (or some other divine person, 2 Chron. xxix. 25), indited this Psalm; wherein he remembers what God had done for their ancestors; and, considering he was still their king, thought they might have hoped for the like victories, of which they could not but still boast and glory. But, alas, it fell out quite contrary; for when they expected his help, he delivered them up into their enemies' hands, and that when they were the true worshippers of him, and for his sake were slain all the day long. The consideration of which, he hoped, would move God at length to take compassion upon them, and arise for their deliverance.

This is the best account I can give of this Psalm, which I shall follow in my paraphrase. And we need not scruple to think there were psalmodists in Hezekiah's days; for after that we find this gift remained with the prophets. For instance, it is visible in Habakkuk; who composed a prayer after the manner of David's Psalms, as we read in the last chapter of his prophecy: where there are several words, which are to be met withal nowhere but in the book of Psalms; such as Sigionoth, Selah, and Niginoth.

Ver. 1.] We have been certainly informed, O Lord, by our fathers, and we believe what they have told us, not only concerning the wonderful works thou didst in their times, but in the ages long before them; as our ancestors that lived in those days have recorded.

Ver. 2.] How thou didst by thy power expel the seven nations^s out of the land of Canaan, and settle in their stead thy people Israel, whom thou didst transplant thither from among the Egyptians; upon whom thou inflictedst the sorest plagues, till they were forced themselves to thrust them out (Exod. vi. 1. xii. 33).

Ver. 3.] This is to be ascribed to thee alone, and not to their strength and valour; such a speedy conquest was not gained by the force of arms, but by thy mighty power and glorious presence; which thou wast pleased to afford them; not because they had obliged thee by their meritorious services (for they were a murmuring and refractory people), but merely out of thy love and good-will towards them.

Ver. 4.] And thou, O God, who didst such astonishing things for them, art still the very same almighty being; whom I honour as my sovereign, my governor, and protector; and humbly beseech thee that thou wilt now in this sore distress vouchsafe to deliver (for, alas! it is not in my power, though thou canst as easily as speak a word deliver) the posterity of those, for whom thou hadst so great a favour.

Ver. 5.] If thou wouldest but appear for us, the 8 In God we boast all the day long, and praise thy name for ever. Selah.

9 But thou hast cast off, and put us to shame; and goest not forth with our armies.

10 Thou makest us to turn back from the enemy; and they which hate us spoil for themselves.

11 Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat; and hast scattered us among the heathen.

12 Thou sellest thy people for nought, and dost not increase thy wealth by their price.

13 Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us.

14 Thou makest us a byword among the most powerful enemies should not be able to stand before us: but (as thy servant Moses foretold, Deut. xxxiii. 17, O fulfil that gracious promise!) we should overthrow and trample under foot all that oppose us.

Ver. 6.] It is thou alone must do it, as thou didst for our forefathers, when thou broughtest them into Canaan: for I have not the least confidence (as they slander me, 2 Kings xviii. 20), in my arms; no hope to be delivered from this dreadful invasion by any forces that I can raise:

Ver. 7.] But by thee, O Lord, of whose goodness we ourselves, as well as those before us, have had experience; for thou hast often rescued us from our enemies, and shamefully disappointed those whose hatred armed them against us.

Ver. 8.] In this we glory, and make our boast continually, that we have such a king, such a mighty saviour and deliverer, who hath wrought wonderful things for us, and for our forefathers; this is our only comfort and security, which gives us hope that we shall praise thee for relieving us in this distress, and that all posterity shall praise thy power and goodness.

Ver. 9.] But for the present thou art so far from being our defender, that thou hast exposed us to the will of our enemies: the shame which was wont to fall on them (ver. 7), is now our portion; and thou hast withdrawn that gracious presence (ver. 3) wherewith thou wast wont to conduct and accompany our armies.

Ver. 10.] We have lost the courage wherewith thou didst formerly inspire us, and cannot defend our cities and fortresses: but, instead of pushing down our enemies (ver. 5), are forced to flee before them, and shamefully leave our camp to be a spoil to them that hate us.

Ver. 11.] And some of us they kill in the pursuit without any mercy, like sheep appointed for the shambles: others they carry captive, and disperse them among strange people (2 Chron. xxix. 9).

Ver. 12.] Where being disowned by thee, they are become so contemptible, that they are sold as the vilest slaves, who are nothing worth: thou hast parted with them very easily, and their lords look upon them as unprofitable wretches; by whose sale they do not enrich themselves, but only seek to be rid of a useless burden.

Ver. 13.] This hath made us that remain to be so cheap in the eyes of all our neighbours, who do not only despise, but reproach and vilify us: for we are grown ridiculous to them that are round about us, and they make a scoff of us.

Ver. 14.] Thou hast brought upon us the curse pronounced by thy servant Moses, (Deut. xxviii. 37), for we are become a by-word among the heathen; who, when they would express the wretchedness of any person, say, he is viler or more miserable than a Jew; and when they say nothing they signify, by the scornheathen, a shaking of the head among the people.

15 My confusion is continually before me, and the shame of my face hath covered me.

16 For the voice of him that reproacheth and blasphemeth; by reason of the enemy and avenger.

17 All this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant.

18 Our heart is not turned back, neither have our steps declined from thy way;

19 Though thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons, and covered us with the shadow of death.

fol motion of their heads, their contempt and derision of us.

Ver. 15.] I cannot open my eyes but the tokens of our disgrace present themselves before me; which hath made me so ashamed, that, to hide it, I do not willingly show my face.

Ver. 16.] For I can hear nothing neither but reproachful words against us, and blasphemous words against thee (2 Kings xix. 3. 23), from that insolent enemy, whose very countenance is full of disdain and scorn, and threatens farther mischief to us.

Ver. 17.] This great heap of calamities is fallen upon us, and certainly we have deserved them all: though this comfort is still remaining, that we are not so wicked as to be moved by all this to desert thee, and violate that covenant whereby we are engaged to worship thee alone.

Ver. 18.] We adhere still to thy religion, though both it and we thus vilified and persecuted (2 Kings xviii. 22), we have such a hearty affection to it, that we have not hitherto proved apostates from it.

Ver. 19.] No, though thou hast so shattered and broken in pieces all our forces, that we are in the most dismal and forlorn condition: little short of utter destruction.

Ver. 20.] Thou knowest the truth of this: for if there have been so much as a design in our hearts to revolt from thee; or we have made prayers when we spread out our hands towards heaven unto any other god, whose worshippers we saw so prosperous;

Ver. 21.] How is it possible for us to conceal it from thee? or how should we escape thy vengeance for it, who art privy to the most secret motions that are in our souls?

20 If we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god;

21 Shall not God search this out? for he knoweth the secrets of the heart.

22 Yea, for thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter.

23 Awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord? arise, cast us not off for ever.

24 Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and forgettest our affliction and our oppression?

25 For our soul is bowed down to the dust: our belly cleaveth unto the earth.

26 Arise for our help, and redeem us for thy mercies' sake.

Ver. 22.] And that which thou seest in secret, our sufferings testify openly to all others: for our constancy to thee exposes us to continual slaughters; we prefer a shameful death before prosperous impiety; and, rather than sacrifice to any other god, choose to fall ourselves a sacrifice to thee.

Ver. 23.] And therefore we hope at last thou wilt take notice of our fidelity; and no longer seem to neglect those that have not deserted thee. Give us leave, O God, to beg this of thee most earnestly, and to ask why thou dost not send relief to thy afflicted servants. Make no farther delay; but, though for our sins we have been exposed to the cruel contempt of our enemies (ver. 9), own us now at length for thy people: and show that we are not such objects as they account us.

Ver. 24.] It is very grievous to us to think that they look upon us as deserted by thee; which provokes us to expostulate with thee, and to demand (in an humble manner) wherefore is it that thou givest us no countenance; nor expressest the least regard to our intolerable affliction, wherewith we are oppressed?

Ver. 25.] For the load of it is so great that it hath sunk us into the most dejected condition: wherein we lie dismayed, as men without life and soul, having no strength at all to help ourselves.

Ver. 26.] Therefore do thou appear for our deliverance, now that we can neither do any thing for ourselves, nor deserve anything of thee: let not thy goodness, which hath been so famed, suffer together with us; but, for the sake of that which we and our fathers have so often experimented, rescue us from our miseries.

PSALM XLV.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim, for the sons of Korah. Maschil. A song of loves.

I My heart is inditing a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the king: my tongue is the pen of a ready writer.

PSALM XLV.

ARGUMENT.—The foregoing Psalm is not more sad and mournful, than this (as Theodoret observes) is joyful and comfortable: promising the most glorious things to them. The author of it is not named: but it was delivered, as the former, to the master of music, for the use of God's service in the tabernacle; to be sung upon Shoshannim (by which we may understand all those instruments that had six strings) by the sons of Korah, to the known tune of Maschil (see Ps. xxxii.). And being a Song of 2 Thou art fairer than the children of men: grace is poured into thy lips: therefore God hath blessed thee for ever.

loves, as the title tells us (alluding plainly to the name of Jedidiah, given to Solomon by Nathan the prophet, 2 Sam. xii. 25), most interpreters conclude it was composed upon the occasion, at least, of Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter: who, it is most probable, was a proselyte to the Jewish religion.

Some few, indeed, will not allow so much as this, that there is any respect to Solomon at all in this Psalm, but only to Christ. And the truth is, many of the expressions in it are so magnificent, that they can but in a very poor and low sense be applied to So-

3 Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty.

4 And in thy majesty ride prosperously because of truth and meekness and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things.

5 Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies; whereby the people fall under thee.

6 Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre.

7 Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

8 All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad.

9 Kings' daughters were among thy honourable women: upon thy right hand did stand the queen in gold of Ophir.

10 Hearken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear; forget also thine own people, and thy father's house;

11 So shall the king greatly desire thy beauty: for he is thy Lord; and worship thou him.

12 And the daughter of Tyre shall be there lomon and his bride: and some of them scarce at all. Though, on the contrary side, other expressions seem so plainly to belong to him, that they can no other way, but by allegory, be applied to our Saviour. Therefore I believe that I ought not wholly to admit all respect to Solomon and his marriage in my paraphrase; though principally I shall direct the Psalm to Christ. It being so apparent, that no Christian can deny it, that the mind of the prophet, while he was writing some part of this Psalm, was carried quite beyond king Solomon, to the great king, the Lord Christ. Or, at least, he was guided to use words so high, that they proved too big for Solomon: and we must say, as our Saviour doth in another case, Behold, a greater than Solomon is here. And so the best of the Jewish interpreters acknowledge.

Ver. 1.] My heart is full of a festival song, which I have meditated and am ready to utter in praise of king Solomon; who is but a shadow of that great king which we expect: in honour of whom chiefly I will recite what I have composed, with such fluency, as shall equal the style of the most skillful writer.

Ver. 2.] Thou, O king, art lovely above all other persons, thy speech is most acceptable and persuasive because the Lord loves thee (2 Sam. xii. 24), and hath therefore promised long blessings to thee; which yet do but faintly represent the truly eternal blessings, which he hath bestowed on that great king, who when he comes it shall be said that he is in favour with God as well as man (Luke ii. ult.); and speaks as never man spake (John vii. 46), so that all wonder at the gracious words which proceed out of his mouth (Luke iv. 22).

Ver. 3.] Put on thy royal ornaments, and the ensigns of thy power, O most mighty prince; and appear like thyself in such splendour and majesty, as may serve for an emblem of that most illustrious power and sovereign authority, wherein the omnipotent Lord of all the world shall show himself among men.

Ver. 4.] And may thy kingdom so prosper every way, in the planting all virtue among thy subjects, and terrifying thy enemies; that it may prove a lively type of the happy government of the Lord Christ: whose kingdom shall prevail over all, when he goes forth like a great conqueror (Rev. xix. 11), not to enslave men's persons, or to spoil them of their goods, but to settle the true faith among them, to make them humble and meek, just and charitable; and for the furtherance of this glorious work, thy mighty power, O Lord, shall instruct thee to do miraculous and amazing things (Luke iv. 36. v. 26).

Ver. 5.] Which shall make thy words pierce, like sharp arrows, into the hearts of all those that oppose thy royal authority; and make the nations of the earth (far more than shall obey king Solomon, though he should reign over many kingdoms, 1 Kings iv. 21), humble themselves, and become subject to thee.

Ver. 6.] O great Lord, the God of king Solomon, and of all those that are called gods in heaven or earth; the judge of the whole world: how weak and tottering are the thrones of all other princes in comparison with thine, which shall never be subverted! It is the glory of king Solomon, that God hath promised his kingdom shall continue many ages (2 Sam. vii. 13.): but thou shalt reign for ever and ever; and of thy kingdom there shall be no end (Luke i. 33), thy laws are so just and so good, thy government so equal and fit, that they shall be subject to no alteration.

Ver. 7.] For thou thyself also immutably lovest all righteousness and goodness (from which other princes may swerve, and so bring their kingdoms to ruin, 1 Kings ix. 4—6), and perfectly hatest all impiety and wickedness: for which cause, God the Father hath highly exalted thee, O God, above all others whom he calls his sons; and conferred on thee such supereminent gifts, as make a joy among thy subjects far exceeding that by whose sound the very earth was rent, when Solomon was anointed king, and preferred above all his brethren (1 Kings i. 39, 40).

Ver. 8.] That, indeed, was a joyful day; and so is this, wherein thou didst appear with great gladness in thy wedding garments, brought out of the stately wardrobes; the odour of which is so fragrant as if they were made of the richest perfumes among us, and yet nothing so grateful as the knowledge of Christ, which shall be spread as a sweet odour in every place, when he goes to espouse a church unto himself (2 Cor. ii. 14—16).

Ver. 9.] Thou wast most honourably attended by many princely virgins, the daughters of kings (though far inferior in their descent to the true disciples of Christ, who are all born of God), and next to thyself was placed the royal bride, in a vesture of the purest gold; as an image of the church of Christ, which shall sit with him in heavenly places (Eph. ii. 6), having the glory of God upon her (Rev. xxi. 9. 11).

Ver. 10.] O royal bride, understand and consider seriously the happiness to which thou art advanced by being married to such a prince, and never think more of the religion of thy country in which thou wast born and bred; but become a true proselyte, and consent to the law of God (as we ourselves and all the world must do to Christ, when he calls us to incline our ears to his heavenly doctrine; and not only renounce all our former rites, but father and mother, and all things else that are dearest to us for his sake, Luke xix. 26. Eph. v. 31, 32).

Ver. 11.] So shalt thou be most beautiful and amiable in the eyes of the king thy husband (as Christ by that means shall present to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, Eph. v. 27), who is now become thy lord: and therefore see thou be subject unto him (as the church must be to Christ, whom God will highly exalt, that at his name every knee shall be bound to bow, and with a gift; even the rich among the people shall intreat thy favour.

13 The king's daughter is all glorious within: her clothing is of wrought gold.

14 She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needlework: the virgins her companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee.

15 With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought: and shall enter into the king's palace.

16 Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom they mayest make princes in all the earth.

17 I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations: therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever.

every tongue confess that he is the Lord (Phil. ii. 9, 10).

Ver. 12.] The people of Tyre, as rich and as proud as they are, shall come, with their neighbouring countries, and bring thee presents; the most powerful among them shall make suit unto thee for thy friendship (as the kings of the earth shall bring their glory and their honour into the church, Rev. xxi. 24).

Ver. 13.] For king Pharaoh's daughter, the wife of our prince, is no less adorned with all excellent qualities of mind, than her body is with rich attire; wherein she now appears in a splendid manner (as the ornaments of those that are born of God in the Christian church shall not be so much the outward adorning of wearing of gold, as the hidden man of the heart, which is in the sight of God of great price, 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4).

Ver. 14.] She shall be brought home unto the king with magnificent pomp, in embroidered raiment; and the virgins, her maids of honour that attend upon her, shall come along with her (as the church being owned by Christ for his spouse in a solemn manner, and being pure and holy, Rev. xix. 7, 8, there shall be many chaste virgins among us, who shall make a part of it, and follow Christ whithersoever he goes, Rev. xiv. 1, 4).

Ver. 5.] They shall express their inward gladness by all the outward tokens of joy, as they go along in that pomp; and so shall enter into the royal palace (a figure of the church, into which men shall enter with far greater joy, and say, Hallelujah, let us rejoice and be glad, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth, Rev. xix. 6, 7; Acts ii. 46).

Ver. 16.] And may this be the happy fruit of this marriage, that instead of thy royal ancestors, in Egypt, whom thou hast forsaken, thou mayest be the mother of children, whom thou mayest make rulers in all the countries which are subject to king Solomon (2 Kings iv. 21, 24). As, instead of the patriarchs, of our descent from whom we are apt to boast, shall be the twelve apostles and their successors, sitting upon thrones, and judging the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt. xix. 28), by whose means the church shall bring forth children unto Christ, whom he shall make kings and priests unto God, and they shall reign upon the earth (Rev. v. 10).

Ver. 17.] By this very song I will make thy name to be mentioned with honour throughout all ages, who shall learn from hence to give thee thy deserved praises as long as the world shall last: and, much more, to propagate the Christian name (propesied of so long before) to the latest posterity, and celebrate their worth with perpetual praises, who forsook all to follow Christ, and rather chose to lose their life than quit his service (Jam. v. 11. Μακάριον, "We call them blessed," &c.).

PSALM XLVI.

To the chief Musician, for the sons of Korah. A Song upon Alamoth.

1 God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.

2 Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea;

3 Though the waters thereof roar and be trou-

PSALM XLVI.

ARGUMENT.—It is not known to what time this Psalm belongs (about which there are several conjectures), nor who was the author of it. I shall suppose it to have been made by David, or some of the sons of Korah, after those great victories which he won over several nations, mentioned 2 Sam. viii. 10. For any one may see that it is a pious triumph in God after some remarkable deliverance from very powerful enemies; and there are none we can find in the historical books to whom it can more probably relate than to those there recorded. Of which great victories it was very fit there should be some thankful monument left to posterity, whereby they might be encouraged to hope in God, and not suffer themselves to be dismayed at the sight of the most numerous armies that might be gathered against them, if they adhered faithfully to their duty. And therefore this Psalm was delivered to the master of music, to be sung in the tabernacle upon Alamoth; of which mention is made, 1 Chron. xv. 20, and is thought to be either some tune then in common use, or some kind of musical instrument unknown to us, in which young virgins, as some fancy, took a peculiar delight, and were wont to learn to play upon it; which they make the reason and original of its name.

Ver. 1.] God is the most powerful protector, in whom we may safely confide: he inspires us with courage, and gives us strength to meet our enemies; we were in great danger, but found him exceeding ready to send us help, and give us a safe deliverance when we were sorely distressed.

Ver. 2.] For which cause we will never hereafter be dismayed, but steadfastly hope in God in the midst of the greatest tumults and dangerous commotions: though we should see the most dreadful confusions (such as there are in an earthquake), and all things tumbled upside down, as if the earth and sea were blended together, we will still immovably trust in him.

Ver. 3.] Though the times should prove very tempestuous, and our enemies should storm like the troubled sea; though they should threaten utter destruction to us, and rush upon us with such a violence as its raging waves do (when it is swollen to the greatest height) against the shore; the mountainous cliffs shall sooner shake than we be disturbed, bled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah.

4 There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the most high.

5 God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and that right early.

6 The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved: he uttered his voice, the earth melted.

7 The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.

Ver. 4.] Our hearts shall be quiet and still, like the river that runs through our city, from whence the inhabitants draw, by trenches, delightful streams to water their gardens. The small forces that guard this place, which make no more noise than those waters (Isa. viii. 6, 7), shall, by the help of the most high God, who in a special manner dwelleth here, be too hard for the greatest armies, which in their number and their boasts imitate the waves of the roaring sea.

Ver. 5.] Let them not think to prevail against him, who, by a singular token of his presence, is in the midst of this city: other mountains may be shaken, but mount Zion is immovable; because God, when there is any danger, will send us seasonable and speedy relief against those that invade us.

Ver. 6.] So we have lately seen, that when many nations combined against us (2 Sam. x. 6), they only showed their rage and fury, but could not hurt us; for they were remarkably overthrown by the power of God, who declared himself against them, and utterly discomfited them; as he did the Philistines, sometimes by thunder and lightning from heaven, 1 Sam. vii. 10 (see Ps. xviii. 13, 14).

Ver. 7.] Why then should we be afraid, since it is apparent the Lord, who commands all the armies of heaven as well as earth, is on our side? That God who preserved our forefather Jacob in all his distresses, and hath made a gracious covenant with his posterity, defends us as in an impregnable fortress, where we need never fear any danger.

Ver. 8.] Draw near all ye that doubt of it, and con-

8 Come, behold the works of the LORD, what desolations he hath made in the earth.

9 He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire.

10 Be still, and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth.

11 The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.

consider seriously the wonderful victories, which it had been impossible for us to win without the help of God: mark, I beseech you, how many cities we have taken, and what desolation we have made by his assistance in the enemies' country, who thought to have laid us waste (2 Sam. viii. 1, 2; 1 Chron. xviii. 1).

Ver. 9.] It is he that hath given us this peace which we now enjoy, by disenabling all the people of Canaan and the neighbouring nations to make any wars upon us: he hath broken their bows, and cut their spears in pieces, and cast their chariots, wherein they trusted, into the fire (2 Sam. vii. 4).

Ver. 10.] Showing them as plainly by these glorious victories how vain it is to oppose him, as if he had called unto them by a voice from heaven, saying, Lay down your arms, and no longer molest my people; know that I am the supreme governor of all the world, who have defeated all your designs, and destroyed your forces: and my power is not confined to one country, but shall be magnified every where as well as here, by confounding all those that will not desist from their hostile opposition to my will and pleasure.

Ver. 11.] This is our comfort and support; in this we continue still to glory, and say as we did before, We will not fear the most potent enemies, since the Lord, who commands all the host of heaven and earth, is on our side: he preserved our forefather Jacob in all his distresses, and made a gracious covenant with him to be the God of his posterity; in him we are safe, as in an impregnable fortress, where no danger can approach us.

PSALM XLVII.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

O CLAP your hands, all ye people; shout unto God with the voice of triumph.

2 For the LORD most high is terrible; he is a great King over all the earth.

PSALM XLVII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm is thought by some to have been composed by David (though his name be not in the title), when he translated the ark (which was the token of the divine presence with them) either from Kirjath-jearim, with the most solemn pomp and all sorts of music (2 Sam. vi. 5), or from the house of Obed-edom unto mount Zion (ver. 14, 15). Others think it was composed by some of the sons of Korah, when the ark was again translated by Solomon with the like rejoicing (2 Chron. v. 2, 12, 13), from mount Zion to the house which he had built for it upon the neighbouring mountain. And there may be a third conjecture allowed, that it was made after some great victory which God had given them over their enemies, and sung as they followed the ark back to its dwelling-place, from whence it had been carried before them to the battle. There is no doubt but one or other of these triumphs gave occasion to it; and the ark being a figure of Christ, as that mountain was of the heavens, the translation or carrying back of the ark thither may be looked upon as a figure of Christ's ascension (after he had dwelt here awhile in a meaner place, and conquered death) unto the high and holy place, where he is now at God's right hand in the heavens. And with relation to this alone the ancient fathers expound the Psalm, which may easily be applied in the mystical sense unto that business.

Ver. 1.] O be joyful all ye people, who are now assembled at this festival; let your hearts overflow with joy, and express how exceeding glad they are by clapping your hands, and lifting up your voices, and shouting after a triumphant manner, in honour of the great God who dwells among us.

Ver. 2.] For his majesty is most sublime, his dominion absolute, his power dreadful; being the sovereign Lord of the whole world, the King of kings, and the Lord of lords:

Ver. 3.] By whom the people of these countries, though warlike and strong, were anciently subdued; and other nations since have been made our subjects.

Ver. 4.] He who is the supreme disposer of all things hath of his mere good will chosen this good land to be our inheritance, and therein chosen a place for his own dwelling; which is an honour wherein we excel all other people, and a most singular token of his love towards us.

Ver. 5.] God is gone up, by the special token of his presence, into that holy place, with shouts of joy and praise: the Lord is gone up in a triumphant pomp, with the sound of the trumpet and all other instruments of music (2 Sam. vi. 5, 15).

Ver. 6.] Let us never cease to sing his praises, who hath chosen us to be his people; let it be our constant employment to praise our king, who hath subdued the nations to us: O sing praises to him, sing praises to him: it cannot be too oft repeated, that he alone is to be praised.

7 For God is the King of all the earth: sing ye praises with understanding.

Ver. 7.] For our king is the sovereign of all the nations upon earth; sing ye praises therefore skilfully to his most excellent majesty: it is your wisdom to praise him in the best manner you are able, who alone is wise enough to govern all the world.

Ver. 8.] He hath made those heathens who dwell in Zion to feel his power, and submit themselves unto him (2 Sam. v. 7). And there he hath seated himself upon the ark of his presence as on his holy throne.

Ver. 9.] Before which the heads of the tribes, with all the people that worship him, who promised to give this country unto Abraham, are assembled together at their solemn feasts, without any fear of invasion from their foreign neighbours: for God (when to attend his service they have left their own houses unguarded) hath undertaken their protection (Exod. xxxiv. 23, 25), and he is infinitely superior to all other gods which pretend to be defenders of the earth.

PSALM XLVIII.

A Song and Psalm for the sons of Korah.

1 GREAT is the LORD, and greatly to be praised in the city of our God, in the mountain of his holiness.

2 Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King.

3 God is known in her palaces for a refuge.

4 For, lo, the kings were assembled, they passed by together.

5 They saw it, and so they marvelled; they were troubled, and hasted away.

PSALM XLVIII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm seems to have been composed after the repulse of some army which invaded them, and intended to have destroyed Jerusalem. If all things else would agree, it might not unfitly be applied to the defeating of Sennacherib the king of Assyria's army, which actually begirt that city; but by a sudden pestilence, which in one night killed a vast number, was forced to quit the siege and retreat with shame (2 Kings xviii. 19). But the fourth verse of this Psalm speaks of a combination of kings, who had joined their forces together upon this design: which makes it most applicable, in my judgment, to that history in 2 Chron. xx. where we read (ver. 1, 2, 10) that Moab, and Ammon, and they of mount Seir, came against Jehoshaphat, with an intention, I suppose, to fall upon Jerusalem. And though Jehoshaphat went out to oppose them, yet he acknowledges (ver. 12) their multitude was so great that he had no power to resist them, but they might do what they pleased with him: for he knew not which way to turn himself, but only depended upon God, who in a marvellous manner dispersed them, as he told Jehoshaphat he would, without their striking one stroke against them. For which gracious message, sent him by a prophet (ver. 14), the Levites, and among others those descended from Korah, immediately praised the Lord beforehand (ver. 19), and after the victory gave solemn thanks before they left the field, in the Valley of Blessing (ver. 26); and then returned to Jerusalem with psalters, and harps, and trumpets, unto the house of the Lord (ver. 28). At which time it is probable this Psalm was sung, and called a song and psalm; that is, a psalm of triumph, or of great joy; composed perhaps by some of the sons of Korah. But of a song and psalm, see Psalm lxvii.

Ver. 1.] Great is the majesty and the power of the Lord, who is therefore to be celebrated with the highest praises; and nowhere so much as in his own city, by the inhabitants of Jerusalem, in that mountain which he hath long ago set apart for the place of his worship, and hath now so marvellously defended.

Ver. 2.] And a beautiful place it is which he hath chosen for his habitation, the very situation of mount Zion being most delightful, the pleasantest in all the country, for it lies on the north side of Jerusalem, the city of the great king, the Lord of heaven and earth:

Ver. 3.] Who is the principal glory of that place, as that is of the country: for mount Zion is not so beautiful for its situation, as for his divine presence in that magnificent palace which is built for him there, and makes that city an impregnable fortress.

Ver. 4.] For behold a fresh instance of it; the 6 Fear took hold upon them there, and pain, as of a woman in travail.

7 Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish with an east wind.

8 As we have heard, so have we seen in the city of the LORD of hosts, in the city of our God: God will establish it for ever. Selah.

9 We have thought of thy lovingkindness, O God, in the midst of thy temple.

kings of several neighbouring countries entered into confederacy to cast us out of our possession (2 Chron. xx. 11), and made a great progress in their design; marching together from beyond the Dead sea (ver. 2) till they came nigh to Jerusalem (ver. 16, 20, 24).

Ver. 5.] But then they only had a sight of it, and that was all; for a sudden amazement seized on them, and such a panic fear, that they fell into confusion; and, taking one another for enemies, were destroyed by the ambush which one nation laid for the other (2 Chron. xx. 22).

Ver. 6.] There was nothing but terror and trembling to be seen throughout all the host: which surprised them so suddenly, and cast them into so great anguish, that it may be compared to the hasty and violent pangs of a travailing woman:

Ver. 7.] Or to the consternation and confusion which the mariners are in, when a fleet of ships richly laden from Tarshish is broken in pieces by the furious blasts of the east wind, one against another.

[As a fleet of Jehoshaphat's was shortly after, 2 Chron. xx. 37.]

Ver. 8.] We have heard of such things heretofore, which our fathers have reported to us; but now our eyes see the wonderful works of God, who told us by his prophet that he would save us from this great army which invaded us (2 Chron. xx. 14, 15, &c.). And we have seen his word verified in this city, from whence God, whose city it is, and who is the Lord of all the host of heaven and earth, sent invisible powers to terrify and disperse them (ver. 22); and will, we hope, defend and protect it from being subverted by the assaults of our enemies in future ages.

Ver. 9.] O God, we had no confidence in our fortifications, or in our army; but we assembled ourselves together in thy temple to ask help of thee (2 Chron. xx. 3-5), and meditating on thy wonted mercy to praise unto the ends of the earth: thy right hand is full of righteousness.

11 Let mount Zion rejoice, let the daughters of Judah be glad, because of thy judgments.

12 Walk about Zion, and go round about her: tell the towers thereof.

14 For this God is our God for ever and ever. he will be our guide even unto death.

those that seek thee, we quietly expected what thy loving-kindness would do for us.

Ver. 10.] And as thou art called, O God, by the name of the Lord of hosts, so thou hast demonstrated thyself in the glorious victory thou hast given us (2 Chron. xx. 15). For which not we alone praise thee, but the most distant people who hear the fame of it shall acknowledge and magnify thy power (ver. 29), which thou hast abundantly declared in the just destruction of our enemies, and the gracious protection of us thy faithful servants.

Ver. 11.] Let the inhabitants of Jerusalem then, which is the mother-city, give an example of joy and thankfulness to all the rest of the cities and towns of Judah; and let them unanimously join together with the greatest gladness, to express how sensible they are of thy power and goodness in this wonderful deliverance.

Ver. 12.] Make a solemn procession, and go round about the city, blessing and praising God with thankful hearts, who hath preserved you from being begirt by the enemy: tell all the towers as you go along, and see if there be so much as one wanting, or the least hurt done to any of them.

Ver. 13.] Observe the outworks, and attentively consider them; take a distinct survey of all the sumptuous buildings also, and mark how entire they are, and untouched by the enemies' batteries, that you may keep a record of it, and preserve the memory of so great a wonder for the benefit of succeeding generations.

Ver. 14.] For this is the God who alone can protect us, and will be our defender, if we depend upon him, for ever and ever: he will not content himself with having preserved us once, but be our conductor, and exercise a most tender providence over us, as a shepherd doth over his sheep all the days of our life.

PSALM XLIX.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

1 HEAR this, all ye people; give ear, all ye inhabitants of the world:

2 Both low and high, rich and poor, together.

PSALM XLIX.

ARGUMENT.—The author of this Psalm is not known: not can we find whether there was any particular occasion of it. But whosoever composed it (whether some of the sons of Korah, or any other), it is likely that he had in his eye the unreasonable thirst of mankind after riches, and their insolence and haughtiness when they have acquired them; which, it is possible, was a great discouragement to some pious but poor people in those times; and therefore, after the example of David (Ps. xxxvii. xxxix.) he indited this Psalm to check that vanity, by setting death before their eyes; the serious meditation of which he knew would both pull down the plumes of the proud and scornful, and preserve those upon whom they trampled from being dejected at their prosperous impiety.

Ver. 1.] Listen to me all ye people, in what part of the world soever you dwell; for that which I am going to deliver is of such common concernment that it belongs to all countries, as much as any one, upon the face of the earth.

Ver. 2.] Whether you be men of obscure birth and meaner rank, or persons nobly descended and in great

3 My mouth shall speak of wisdom ; and the meditation of my heart shall be of understanding.

4 I will incline mine ear to a parable : I will open my dark saying upon the harp.

5 Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil, when the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about ?

6 They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches ;

7 None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him :

8 (For the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever :)

9 That he should still live for ever, and not see corruption.

10 For he seeth that wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish, and leave their wealth to others.

authority ; whether you abound in wealth or are of a poor estate, you are all alike concerned to attend to my instruction.

Ver. 3.] Which is neither about trivial things, nor slightly considered, but about the most weighty matters, which my mind hath deeply pondered : I will enrich your souls with wisdom, which is better than all the worldly wealth you covet ; and teach you how to direct all your actions aright unto that scope at which you aim of being happy.

Ver. 4.] It is not vulgar instruction, but most excellent advice, which I have to give you ; more to be desired than the skill of resolving the darkest riddles : to which I myself will diligently attend, while it is sung, as I play upon my harp.

Ver. 5.] I intend not to neglect the counsel I give to others ; and therefore shall ask myself the question I mean to answer : What cause is there that I should be troubled with fears, and cares, and anxiety of mind, in calamitous times, when the iniquity of those that endeavour to supplant me hath surrounded me on all sides, and left me no way to escape them ?

Ver. 6.] They are confident their strength and power are such, that none can resist them ; and the high conceit they have of their vast treasures makes them so proud, that they insult over others, and brag what they can do to ruin them.

Ver. 7.] Alas ! poor men, their weakness is apparent ; there is not a man among them that, by all the power he hath, can find a means to save the dearest friend alive when God calls for him : he alone can dispose of mens' lives ; and the richest of them hath not wealth enough to purchase a reprieve, when he pronounces the sentence of death upon him.

Ver. 8.] That is a business too difficult and costly for him, to redeem the life of a man ; or to respite for a time his departure, whose soul is leaving his body : he must let that alone ; for, as long as the world lasts, it will be a vain endeavour.

Ver. 9.] Let him attempt it, if he please, upon himself : can he prolong his own life, from time to time, so that it shall be perpetuated and never dissolved ?

Ver. 10.] No such matter ; the wisdom I speak of (ver. 3), promises no exemption to the best of men, but they must die as well as others : and therefore those wicked sots, whose life differs little from that of beasts, may justly expect not merely to die, but to be destroyed and cut off like the beasts that perish. And then what becomes of all their wealth, which they are forced to leave to others ; perhaps to strangers ?

Ver. 11.] They imagined, indeed, and secretly

11 Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations ; they call their lands after their own names.

12 Nevertheless man being in honour abideth not : he is like the beasts that perish.

13 This their way is their folly : yet their posterity approve their sayings. Selah.

14 Like sheep they are laid in the grave ; death shall feed on them ; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning ; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling.

15 But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave : for he shall receive me. Selah.

16 Be not thou afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house is increased ;

17 For when he dieth he shall carry nothing pleased themselves in this fancy, that when they could stay no longer in the world, their goodly houses, which they had built, should stand for ever, and the places of their abode continue in their family from age to age : though they could not be immortal themselves, yet they hoped their names, which they imposed upon their lands, should never die.

Ver. 12.] But, alas ! the thoughts of man are vain : for whatsoever esteem or reputation one of these worldlings gets here, it lasts not at all, but dies together with him ; he is in this also like to his fellow-beasts, whom, when they are dead, nobody remembers.

Ver. 13.] Thus their life concludes, as it was spent, in folly (for they have no security that the names they impose on their lands shall last ; or if they do, that men shall think of them ; or if they should, what are they the better for it ?) ; and yet, so close doth this folly stick to mankind, that they that succeed in their possessions make no benefit of this observation, but are as very fools as themselves, and tread in the steps of those that went before them.

Ver. 14.] They go in droves to their graves, when death seizes on them ; thither it drives them in the close of their days, just as the shepherd doth his sheep to the fold in the evening : and then the just, over whom they insulted, shall quickly trample upon, and triumph over them (as they shall do much more when they awake out of the dust at the resurrection) ; all their power and splendour wherein they formerly appeared, though they seem as firm as a rock, shall moulder away ; for the grave is their utmost bound, beyond which they cannot go.

Ver. 15.] And doubtless God will rescue me from that imminent danger wherein I am (ver. 5), of being destroyed, and not let me descend into the grave, but live to have dominion over them ; for he hath graciously received me into his favour (so that if I die I shall still have this comfort remaining, that he will one day raise me out of my grave again).

Ver. 16.] Be not thou then troubled, nor dismayed (no more than I, ver. 5), whosever thou art that hearest or readest this, when thou seest a worldly man grow very rich, and great honours heaped on his family ; which enable and embolden him, perhaps, to use the meaner sort contemptuously :

Ver. 17.] For he can, by no means, as I told thee, purchase the privilege of living one moment longer than God pleases ; and when he dies, he is no greater than other men : for he can carry none of his wealth along with him ; nor shall he that was so terrible here be at all regarded in the other world.

away: his glory shall not descend after him.

18 Though while he lived he blessed his soul: and men will praise thee, when thou doest well to thyself.

Ver. 18.] For all his happiness ends with this life (why shouldst thou then be troubled at his prosperity?), which he spends in luxury and riot, pride and vanity, applauding himself in his riches and in his pleasures, and having a company of flatterers about him; who will commend thee too, if thou wilt imitate him in indulging thine own appetite, and denying nothing to thyself and companions, but doing no good to any body else.

Ver. 19.] And he arrives, perhaps, at the age of his 19 He shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light.

20 Man that is in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish.

forefathers, whose steps he follows; but after that shall all be alike miserable, and never more partake of the least joy or consolation.

Ver. 20.] So true it is, which was said before (and so little cause there is to envy such mens' greatness), that a man raised to great dignity in this world, and never considers how short his honour is (ver. 15), behaves himself like a brute while he lives; and thinking of no such thing, is cut off like a brute, whom nobody regards when he is dead.

PSALM L.

A Psalm of Asaph.

1 THE mighty God, even the LORD, hath spoken, and called the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof.

2 Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined.

3 Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him.

4 He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people.

5 Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice.

PSALM L.

ARGUMENT.—The author of this Psalm, the title tells us (as we translate it), was Asaph, who composed several songs, as well as David, for the use of the tabernacle, as we read in 2 Chron. xxix. 30. But whether he was Asaph the Levite, who lived in the same age with David, or some other prophet in aftertimes, cannot be certainly resolved. It seems to me that it was not the former; because he is never, that I remember, called Asaph the seer, as the other is; whose psalms Hezekiah caused to be sung together with those of king David. And therefore I judge it most likely that he lived in aftertimes, in the reign of some pious prince, such as Jehoshaphat; or, which is most probable, in the days of Hezekiah himself (see Ps. xlv.); who, though he had reformed the worship of God, yet could not amend mens' minds; but there still remained, this prophet observed, abundance of hypocrisy among them: both among the people, who placed all religion in sacrifices, and other external rites and ceremonies; and among the doctors of the law and the judges, who taught the people their duty, but observed none of those precepts themselves which they expounded to others.

Both these this holy man awakens, by this Psalm, to a consideration of the danger they were in; representing God as the supreme judge of the world, coming in an amazing manner to call them all to a strict account, and to take a severe vengeance on them, unless they amended; which began to come upon them by Sennacherib: whom God threatened to send "against the hypocritical nation," (Isa. x. 6): and calls that time, "the day of his visitation," (ver. 3), when Sennacherib overran all the country (as Isaiah prophesied, viii. 7, 8), till he came to Jerusalem: upon which city Nebuchadnezzar completely executed the judgment here threatened when he destroyed Jerusalem and the temple itself; unto which it was to no purpose to bring a multitude of sacrifices, while they continued the evil of their doings (Isa. i. 13, 16).

In both which days of visitation, first by the king of Assyria, and then by the king of Babylon, the Psalmist here represents the divine majesty, after the manner of men, like to a king coming out of his palace, attended by his ministers, with the ensigns of terror carried before him; and issuing out his orders to summon all his subjects to appear at his tribunal, and hear their accusation read, with the sentence he would pronounce upon them.

Ver. 1.] The omnipotent majesty, the supreme judge of heaven and earth, to whom the greatest kings and potentates are but subjects: the eternal Lord, who changes not, hath given out his orders, that all the people of the land, from east to west, be summoned to appear before him.

Ver. 2.] He will go forth in the greatest splendour out of his magnificent palace, where he dwells in Zion; and let you see how much his incomparable excellencies and perfections are to be revered.

Ver. 3.] Our God will undoubtedly come and reckon with you, though now he seems to take no notice of your impiety: and he will not come like earthly princes, before whom there marches an armed multitude, but in a far more terrible and irresistible manner, which shall make you as sensible of his dreadful presence, as your ancestors were at Mount Sinai, when the devouring flames, and thunder, and lightning, which attended on him, made the very mountain to quake and tremble (Exod. xix. 16, 18; Isa. ix. 18, 19).

Ver. 4.] He shall call heaven and earth to be witnesses of the equity of his proceedings (Isa. i. 2); and you may as soon move them out of their place, as avoid appearing before his tribunal.

Ver. 5.] He will send out his officers, with a peremptory charge, saying, Bring those men before me, whom I have obliged above all other people and separated to myself to be a holy nation (Deut. xiv. 2); and who have engaged themselves to me in such a solemn covenant, confirmed by the blood of sacrifices, that they wish they might perish, in like manner, if they did not observe it (Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19).

6 And the heavens shall declare his righteousness : for God is judge himself. Selah.

7 Hear, O my people, and I will speak ; O Israel, and I will testify against thee : I am God, even thy God.

8 I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices or thy burnt offerings, to have been continually before me.

9 I will take no bullock out of thy house, nor he goats out of thy folds.

10 For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills.

11 I know all the fowls of the mountains : and the wild beasts of the field are mine.

12 If I were hungry, I would not tell thee : for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof.

13 Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats ?

14 Offer unto God thanksgiving ; and pay thy vows unto the most high :

15 And call upon me in the day of trouble : I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.

16 But unto the wicked God saith, What hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldst take my covenant in thy mouth ?

17 Seeing thou hastest instruction, and eatest my words behind thee.

18 When thou sawest a thief, then thou consentedst with him, and hast been partaker with adulterers.

19 Thou givest thy mouth to evil, and thy tongue frameth deceit.

20 Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother ; thou slanderest thine own mother's son.

21 These things hast thou done, and I kept silence ; thou thoughtest that I was altogether

Ver. 6.] They shall have a fair trial, whether they have so done or not : for the justice of his judgment shall be as conspicuous as the heavens ; because God himself, who cannot do unrighteously, will examine the cause, and pronounce the sentence.

Ver. 7.] Imagine then, that all things being thus prepared, you hear him calling to you, saying, Harken, O my people, for I have something to say to thee. O Israel, my beloved people, harken ; for I must admonish and convince thee of the breach of those laws, which I, the supreme lawgiver, and thy most gracious God, have given to thee (Exod. xx. 2).

Ver. 8.] I do not mean those concerning sacrifices ; I have no complaint to make about that matter : thy burnt-offerings, I acknowledge, never fail to be brought both morning and evening to my altar ; and I see how busy thou art in that employment :

Ver. 9.] But is this all that I require of thee ? do not mistake myself, nor think that I will be content that all the rest of my laws should be broken, if you do but multiply sacrifices, of which I have no need ; or if I had, need not be beholden unto thee, for the very best of them.

Ver. 10.] For I could be supplied out of my own folds and herds, which thou hast nothing to do withal ; having all the beasts of the forest at my command, with the cattle that graze on more hills than thou hast ever seen.

Ver. 11.] I know also where the fowls of the mountains build their nests, which thou canst not reach ; and the wild beasts in the open fields, whom thou canst not enclose, are all ready at hand to do me service.

Ver. 12.] If I were hungry, I would not come to acquaint thee with it, that thou mightest provide me food : why should I be beholden to thy poverty, when I am so rich : for the whole world is mine and all that it contains.

Ver. 13.] Canst thou be so absurd as to imagine that I need meat or drink ? and for that reason call daily for the flesh of bulls, and the blood of goats, to satisfy my hunger, and to quench my thirst ? or that my nature is such, that I can be pleased merely with the smoke of those upon my altar ?

Ver. 14.] They have their use : but if thou wilt bring me acceptable sacrifices, know that I value, in the first place, a truly thankful heart, which gratefully acknowledges my benefits, above all the peace-offerings in the world ; and next that I expect thou shouldst faithfully perform all the vows and promises thou makest, when thou berigest any blessing of me ; and not think to put me off (who am too great to be dallied withal) with sin-offerings for the breach of them.

Ver. 15.] And, thirdly, devoutly commend thyself unto me, when thou art in any trouble, by ardent prayer : piously confiding in me, and thou shalt find it more powerful than all burnt-offerings : for I will certainly deliver thee, that thou mayest honour me with thy praises, and proclaim my power and goodness, to invite others unto my service.

Ver. 16.] Not that this is all that I require of thee ; for if thou leadest a wicked life, and art injurious to thy neighbours, what care I for thy praises, or for thy zeal to boot, in pressing my commands upon others, which thou dost not observe thyself ? thou braggest thou art a doctor of the law, and thou declarest to the people my will and pleasure, and makest often mention of my covenant, whereby they stand bound to be obedient to me ; but to what purpose is it ? or with what face canst thou do it ?

Ver. 17.] Since, by thy example, thou teachest them to condemn all those instructions to which thou hastest to be bound thyself ; and by thy actions declarest thou hast no regard at all to any thing, either that I have bidden thee do, or threatened I will do to those that violate my precepts.

Ver. 18.] When thou hast observed a man thrive by stealth and robbery, instead of having him punished, thou hast greedily accepted the proffer of being a sharer with him ; and, which is worse, the adulterers find favour with thee, and thou art partaker with them in their filthiness.

Ver. 19.] Thou lettest thy tongue loose to slanders ; and backbitest those who are not present to answer for themselves ; and dost not stick to contrive artificial lies and deceits, to cheat those that have any dealing with thee.

Ver. 20.] Nay, when thou sittest in open court, solemnly to judge men according to the law, thou makest bold to speak falsely (for a reward) ; and that not against a stranger, but thy own brother : yea, thou wilt not spare him that lay in the same womb with thee ; but load him with calumnies and reproaches.

Ver. 21.] All this wickedness thou hast committed, and I have forbore to punish thee : but instead of amending thy life, to which my patience should have invited thee, thou hast presumed so much upon my lenity, as to add another sin to all the rest ; and imagined that I am ignorant of what is done in secret, or am altogether as well pleased with these things as thyself : and therefore now I have sharply rebuked thee for them (so hateful they are to me) and set them all in order (that thou mayest see nothing can escape my knowledge) distinctly before thy eyes.

such an one as thyself: but I will reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes.

22 Now consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver.

Ver. 22.] Let this be a warning to you, and to all those that abuse the patience and long-suffering of God; never thinking of his just severity against such wicked doers. Consider this seriously, and repent in time, lest my patience be turned into indignation and wrath; and I lay hold on you, and snatch you away, to suffer your deserved punishment: and none of your companions, whom you have served in their sins, shall be able to give you any relief; but all perish together with you.

23 Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me: and to him that ordereth his conversation aright will I shew the salvation of God.

Ver. 23.] Remember I have told you what sacrifices I am well pleased with; not with those of beasts, but with the sacrifice of praise and hearty thanksgiving for all my benefits; which doth me more honour than all the lifeless sacrifices of bulls and goats: but he that thus devoutly worships me, must take care withal to dispose his life into a conformity with all my precepts; for this is the man whom I will make partaker of the blessings which I have promised.

PSALM LI.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David, when Nathan the prophet came unto him, after he had gone in to Bath-sheba.

1 HAVE mercy upon me, O God, according to thy lovingkindness: according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions.

2 Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin.

3 For I acknowledge my transgressions: and my sin is ever before me.

4 Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight: that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest.

5 Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me.

6 Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward

PSALM LI.

ARGUMENT.—Here now begins a new collection of some Psalms, whereof David was the author: which, I suppose, were found after the first book was published, and this second begun; to the end of which from this place they continue: as we read expressly, Ps. lxxii. ult. For though the author of the last two before that be not mentioned in the title, yet the very matter of them, as well as the conclusion of the book, assures us they were composed by David; who, in this fifty-first Psalm (as the title tells us), most sadly bewails the sin which he had committed with Bath-sheba, and those that followed it. In which he had also continued for some time, till Nathan the prophet came with a message from God to reprove him, and to pronounce a very sore judgment against him and his family for his crimes.

After this divine reprehension and threatening, he was very much humbled, and to make himself as notorious an example of true repentance as he had been of foul wickedness, he composed this penitential hymn: and sent it to the master of the music in the tabernacle, to be used perpetually there; as a testimony of his unfeigned sorrow for what he had done, and of the miserable condition he thought himself in, without the infinite mercy of God to him. Which he begs with the greatest earnestness, together with the assistances of his grace; which he promises to employ for the reducing other sinners, beseeching him withal to be favourable to his people, especially to the city of Jerusalem; and not let them and that suffer for his offences.

Ver. 1.] O God, the supreme judge of the world, whom I have most highly offended many ways, and therefore may most justly be condemned to suffer the effects of thy severest displeasure; I cast down myself before thee, and humbly supplicate for mercy: unto which I am encouraged by thy known clemency, and thy infinite compassions; which will move thee,

I hope, to take pity upon a grievous sinner, and to pardon the adultery and bloodshed, accompanied with a number of foul circumstances, which I have committed.

Ver. 2.] I have made myself indeed exceeding loathsome by my repeated wickedness, which, like a stain that hath long stuck to a garment, is not easily got out: but do not therefore, I beseech thee, abhor me, but rather magnify thy mercy in purifying me perfectly, and cleansing me so thoroughly, that there may be no spot remaining in me.

Ver. 3.] For how stupid soever I was, before thou sentest thy prophet to awaken me, I am now deeply touched with a sense of my horrid transgressions: which I both sorrowfully confess and bewail in thy presence, and in the face of the public congregation; and carry also a sad and amazing remembrance thereof continually before my eyes.

Ver. 4.] Not because I stand in fear of punishment from men, who have no power over me; but because I am so obnoxious to thee, whose judgments I ought to dread the more, the less I am liable to give an account of my actions unto others. O how it afflicts me, that I presumed, because I had none to control me here on earth, to offend thy majesty,—thy all-seeing majesty, at whose tribunal the highest must be judged: and if thou shouldest pronounce the heaviest sentence upon me for my crimes, and execute it also with the greatest severity, I could not accuse thee of too much rigour: but must still justify thee in thy proceedings, and clear thee from all such unjust imputations!

Ver. 5.] It is true, indeed, and thou, O Lord, knowest it better than I, that there is in me an innate proneness to evil; but I am so far from representing this as an excuse for what I have done, that I confess the consideration of it ought to have made me the more watchful and diligent to suppress those bad inclinations; which I knew to be so natural, that I brought them into the world with me.

Ver. 6.] I am amazed at my folly, that I should be so careless; when I was not ignorant that thou re-parts: and in the hidden part thou shalt make me to know wisdom.

7 Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.

8 Make me to hear joy and gladness; that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice.

9 Hide thy face from my sins, and blot out all mine iniquities.

10 Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me.

11 Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy holy spirit from me.

12 Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with thy free spirit.

13 Then will I teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee.

quirest us not to entertain, with the least kindness, those first motions which we find in our thoughts and desires after any evil, but uprightly to oppose them; for which end thou hast put a principle of better motions into us, and endued me with wisdom, which secretly checks and corrects those brutish inclinations.

Ver. 7.] I have nothing therefore to say in my own behalf, but wholly betake myself to thee for a gracious pardon of my sin, which every thing I can think of sadly aggravates. I am as impure as a leper, and deserve to be banished from thy presence, and shut out from among thy people; far more impure by touching Bath-sheba, than he is that toucheth a dead body; yet I am not so foul, but, if thou pleasest, thou canst purify me, and make me as clean and white as snow: vouchsafe me that grace, O Lord; expiate me, I beseech thee (Lev. xiv. 6; Numb. xix. 17, 18), and restore me perfectly unto thy favour, and the happy fruits of it, which I have justly forfeited and lost.

Ver. 8.] Raise me out of this wofully dejected state wherein I lie; and as the terrible message I received by thy prophet, hath cast me into such insufferable anguish and pain, as if my bones were crushed in pieces by my fall; so send me the most comfortable news of my reconciliation with thee; to ease me of the torment I endure under the weight of my guilt, and the sense of thy heavy displeasure: and to turn it into the height of joy and gladness.

Ver. 9.] Remember not any longer how wicked I have been; nor lay any sin to my charge: but pass by all my transgressions, and acquit me from the punishment they deserve.

Ver. 10.] And bestow upon me withal such purity of heart (which, alas! I have lost, and am not able to recover without thy grace), that I may utterly hereafter detest all such filthy motions: and, because we are apt to revolt from our good resolutions, do thou daily supply me with fresh strength from above, to confirm and settle them, that I may never return to folly.

Ver. 11.] I deserve, I confess, to be rejected by thee, as my predecessor was, (1 Sam. xv. 25, 26), and to be admitted no more into thy favour: but I humbly beseech thee, deal not so severely with me, nor deprive me (as thou didst him, compare 1 Sam. x. 6 with xvi. 14), of the gift of thy Holy Spirit, wherewith thou hast anointed me (ver. 13).

Ver. 12.] Let not that evil spirit which troubled him seize on me; but restore to me the joy which I was wont to have, when I saw myself so much in thy favour as to be delivered by thee out of the greatest danger (Ps. xxi. 1): support me and my authority, with such a cheerful, free, and generous spirit, as becomes him whom thou hast appointed to be the governor of thy people:

14 Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God thou God of my salvation: and my tongue shall sing aloud of thy righteousness.

15 O LORD, open thou my lips; and my mouth shall shew forth thy praise.

16 For thou desirest not sacrifice; else would I give it: thou delightest not in burnt offering.

17 The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.

18 Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion: build thou the walls of Jerusalem.

19 Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness, with burnt offering and whole burnt offering: then shall they offer bullocks upon thine altar.

Ver. 13.] That I may have the confidence to admonish those of their duty that transgress thy laws (as I will not fail to do), and they may not take the boldness to despise my instructions: but the very worst of them may, by my authority and my example, be reclaimed from their sinful lives, and become, like me, thy faithful servants.

Ver. 14.] Though I have added the sin of murder to that of adultery, the murder of a trusty servant, of several of my servants (2 Sam. xi. 17), who, by my order, were exposed to that danger wherein they lost their lives; let it not hinder this grace which I beg of thee; but, O God, the God from whom I have received so many deliverances and blessings, vouchsafe this one favour more, to deliver me from the punishment due to this crying sin: and I will not spare to proclaim, as loud as ever I can, thy infinite goodness and clemency; together with thy truth and faithfulness in thy promises to returning sinners: it shall be my joy to speak of these, though therewithal I publish my own most horrid wickedness.

Ver. 15.] Try me, O God, and let the sense of thy gracious pardon give me the boldness and liberty to open my lips (which shame, confusion, and fear, have closed and shut up), and my mouth shall every where declare thy mercy to thy perpetual praise and renown.

Ver. 16.] This shall be the sacrifice I will offer to thee, as an acknowledgment of thy kindness; but that of beasts, I know, thou desirest not I should bring thee: the whole burnt-offerings being no pleasure at all to thee, but only as they are tokens of a grateful mind.

Ver. 17.] With which I will also join that divine sacrifice of an humble, sorrowful, and penitent heart: for a soul that is truly contrite, and entirely submits its will to thine, is such an acceptable sacrifice, that thou canst not possibly reject it.

Ver. 18.] And the same mercy I desire for myself, I beg also for all thy people. Spare them, good Lord, and let not my folly be the occasion of bringing upon them any calamity; or upon that city, which is called after my name, where I have set both thy throne and mine (2 Sam. v. 7, 9; vi. 16): but be favourable to that place, and do it good; let the walls of Jerusalem, which I have begun to build (2 Sam. v. 9), be perfectly finished (1 Kings iii. 1; xi. 27).

Ver. 19.] Then shall the righteous be very thankful to thee: and express it by bringing peace-offerings in abundance, and all other sacrifices: they shall offer thee the choicest sacrifices upon thy altar (1 Kings iii. 5; viii. 63, 64), which from such pious persons shall be acceptable to thy majesty.

PSALMS.

PSALM LII.

To the chief Musician. Maschil. A Psalm of David, when Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul, and said unto him, David is come to the house of Ahimelech.

1 WHY boastest thou thyself in mischief, O mighty man? the goodness of God endureth continually.

2 Thy tongue deviseth mischiefs; like a sharp razor, working deceitfully.

3 Thou lovest evil more than good; and lying rather than to speak righteousness. Selah.

4 Thou lovest all devouring words, O thou deceitful tongue.

5 God shall likewise destroy thee forever, he shall take thee away, and pluck thee out of thy dwelling place, and root thee out of the land of the living. Selah.

6 The righteous also shall see, and fear, and shall laugh at him:

7 Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength; but trusted in the abundance of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness.

8 But I am like a green olive tree in the house of God: I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever.

9 I will praise thee for ever, because thou hast done it: and I will wait on thy name; for it is good before thy saints.

PSALM LII.

ARGUMENT.—The title sufficiently instructs every one about the author, and in the occasion of this Psalm, if they will but read the history to which it directs them in 1 Sam. xxii. where Doeg (one of the seed of Esau, or that had lived so long among them, that he had got the name, as well as the savage manners, of the Edomites), to ingratiate himself with Saul, pretended to discover those who were confederate with David, particularly Ahimelech; whom he undertook also to kill, together with all his family, when others refused that bloody charge which Saul would have imposed on them. And when he had done, it should seem he bragged of it, as if it had been some gallant action, or famous achievement; as it is intimated, I take it, in the first verse of the Psalm. Which David penned when Ahithair (who was the only person that escaped in that slaughter, whereby they thought to terrify others from harbouring David, or showing any kindness to him) came and brought him the sad tidings of what was befallen their city. And it was afterward delivered to the master of the music in the tabernacle, to be sung in perpetual memory of the thing, to the vulgar tune called Maschil (see Ps. xxxii.); or, as Theodoret seems here to expound the word, to fortify those with patience and constancy who unjustly suffer, by instructing them in the justice of the divine sentence in the issue.

Ver. 1.] A goodly feat, indeed, for a man to boast of! that he hath killed eighty-five innocent and unarmed priests, together with a company of women, children, and sucklings (1 Sam. xxii. 19). A mighty champion thou art, who vapourest, no doubt, that thou wilt do the like execution upon me: but know, vain man, that the goodness of God, whereby I have been hitherto preserved (1 Sam. xxii. 1. 3. 5), will still defend me: for it is not a thing of short continuance, like our prince's favour, but lasts for ever.

Ver. 2.] O thou contriver of false stories! who pretendest to be the only or most loyal person in the court of Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 8, 9), but art an egregious hypocrite; a mere designer of mischief to others, thereby to advance thyself: thy tongue was the first instrument in this butchery, being sharpened by thy malice on purpose like a razor newly set, to cut the throats of the guiltless, that thou mightest seem to be the most zealous of all others for the safety of the king's person and government.

Ver. 3.] To have told the plain truth would not have served thy ambition and thy malice, which make thee love to do mischief rather than good offices unto others, and to devise lies against Ahimelech, rather than to declare his innocence.

Ver. 4.] Thou carest not whom thou destroyest, but can swallow up a whole city at a morsel: O thou false tongue, who, to curry favour with thy prince, devisest the most impudent lies against those that never offended him.

Ver. 5.] The great God, whose priests thou hast slain, shall avenge their cause, and pull thee from that greatness and honour, to which thou seekest, by this vile means, to raise thyself: and more than that, he will pay thee in the same coin thou hast dealt to them; for he will utterly destroy thee, and snatch thee away as hastily as thou didst those innocents; just so will he pluck thee from the tabernacle of God (where thou wast wont to pretend devotion, 1 Sam. xxi. 7), and root out, not only thee, but all thy family, from the face of the earth.

Ver. 6.] Which just judgment of God upon thee all good men shall mark, and be confirmed thereby in their pious fear of offending him; and, reflecting upon thy vain devices to greatness thyself and family, shall deride thy folly, saying as I do;

Ver. 7.] Behold that mighty man, that principal favourite, who regarded not God, nor sought to support himself by his favour, but laid the foundation of his fortune (as we speak) merely in abundance of riches, and the favour of his prince; in which also he endeavoured to establish himself, not by honest means, but by the most perfidious arts, and cruel enterprises: what now is become of him? and where is his greatness? Lo, his ambitious hopes are all vanished and come to nothing,

Ver. 8.] Whilst I, at whom he principally aimed in his murderous design, am still, blessed be God, in safety; nay, compared with that destruction which shall fall on him, in a flourishing condition: for he shall drop away like a withered leaf; but I grow and increase in strength, like a green olive-tree planted in the courts of God's house; whose mercy, I trust, will preserve me to my life's end from all the mischiefs they devised against me, and make me more and more flourishing, both in my person and in my posterity.

Ver. 9.] For which I will never cease to praise thee, because I owe it entirely to thee that I am not destroyed; and I will patiently expect the accomplishment of thy promises to me: for all thy pious servants have ever found this to be the best and wisest course, to depend upon thy omnipotent goodness and faithful promises, and not to imitate those wicked men, who study to advance or preserve themselves by flattery, or other viler practices.

PSALM LIII.

To the chief Musician upon Mahalath. Maschil. A Psalm of David.

1 THE fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. Corrupt are they, and have done abominable iniquity: there is none that doeth good.

2 God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, that did seek God.

3 Every one of them is gone back: they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one.

4 Have the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread: they have not called upon God.

5 There were they in great fear, where no fear was: for God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee: thou hast put

PSALM LIII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm and the fourteenth differ so little, that it hath troubled interpreters to give a reason for the repetition of the same thing, almost in the same words. There is some variation, indeed, in every verse, but it is merely the change of one word for another of the same import (as, for example, God for Lord, ver. 2. 4. 9): except only verse the fifth, where there is a much greater alteration; and the sixth wholly omitted; which makes it probable there was some new occasion for the using this hymn again, though an occasion exceeding like the former. What it was writers do but guess; and if I take the liberty also to interpose my conjecture, it will be nothing so remote as all those I have met withal seem to be.

If we suppose the defection of the people in the rebellion of Absalom, to have been the matter of his complaint in the fourteenth Psalm, then it looks like a probability, that the new revolt which the Israelites generally made, immediately after the other, before David had quite recovered Jerusalem, and his settlement there, was the occasion of this. For you read, that upon the quarrel which arose between the men of Judah and the men of Israel, about precedency in bringing back the king, Sheba blew the trumpet of rebellion afresh; and it is said, that every man of Israel left David, and followed after him (2 Sam. xx. 2). This is the revolt, I apprehend, here spoken of, ver. 3, where the Psalmist says, Every one of them is gone back. And a dangerous revolt it was, as David apprehended, more dangerous than the former, unless timely checked (2 Sam. xx. 6): which made him, before all his army could be assembled (ver. 5), send his guards to pursue him speedily (ver. 7): as they did through all the tribes of Israel (ver. 14). Who being afraid of the issue (ver. 5, of this Psalm), fell off from Sheba more and more, the farther he went, and left him at last to shift for himself, so that he was shut up in the city of Abel, there taken, and beheaded (ver. 22). After which, his body, it is likely, was exposed to the fowls of the air, or the wild beasts; inasmuch that his bones were, indeed, at last scattered (as the Psalmist here speaks, ver. 5), and all his adherents made contemptible.

This David desired should be commemorated together with his deliverance from Absalom's rebellion; and therefore, making a review of the fourteenth Psalm (wherein that distress is described), he delivered it again to the master of the music (as appeared after the first collection of the book of Psalms was finished), with some small alterations, relating to this new business; desiring God, for instance, to give them still some farther and new salvation (ver. 6). For the word here is in the plural number, but in the fourteenth Psalm in the singular; which hath made me render it here complete salvation, which he implores with the same earnestness he had done before, and orders also how the Psalm shall be sung upon Mahalath, or the hollow instrument (flute or pipe) to the tune of Maschil (or as a caveat against rebellion, see Ps. xxxii.).

If any be not satisfied with this account of the Psalm, because of the word captivity, in the last verse, which they may think ought to be taken properly; then they may suppose this Psalm to have been reviewed by Asaph the seer, in the days of Hezekiah, when abundance of the people had been indeed carried captive (Isa. v. 13). But there is no need to have recourse to this; for the word captivity imports no more, in some places, but only great desolation; such as was made of Job's estate and family (xlii. 10), and by the Philistines, when Shiloh was destroyed (Judg. xviii. 30, 31).

Ver. 1.] Though the wicked are not yet so impudent as openly to deny God with their mouths; yet such is their abominable filthiness, so shameless are they in their wickedness, so universally depraved, that their secret thoughts sure are, God takes no notice of what they do, or that he will not judge them for it.

Ver. 2.] But let them know that he exactly observes them, and all the ways of the sons of men, which are naked and bare before his eyes; though, alas! there is nothing now to be seen but ignorance and contempt of his majesty.

Ver. 3.] The Israelites have made a new separation, and are entirely revolted; being like a body without spirit, so rotten and putrefied, that it is hard to find so much as one that hath any kind of goodness in him.

Ver. 4.] Strange that they should still be thus senseless! and (after such a defeat as they have lately received) continue to work iniquity; nay, to be cruel and void of all pity and compassion to my poor people; the reason is, they have no religion.

Ver. 5.] And none more cowardly than such atheistical wretches; whose courage so soon failed them, that a panic fear seized them before my forces could approach them: for they ran away, and dispersed themselves, when I sent but a small party after them. God, O my soul, hath broken him in pieces, and his bones lie scattered on the ground, who thought to oppress thee; thou has obtained this favour of him, to put them to shame; for he despised those who had so little regard to his majesty.

Ver. 6.] And he is mighty to save (whatsoever such wicked people think), and resides, by a special token of his presence there, on mount Zion: O that it might please him to complete our deliverance from thence; and restore us all again to the happy enjoyment of that place, from whence we have been ba-them to shame, because God hath despised them.

6 Oh that the salvation of Israel were come nished! it would turn our sad lamentations into the most cheerful thanksgivings; and fill not only out of Zion! When God bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad.

Judah, but all the tribes of Israel, with joy and gladness.

PSALM LIV.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth. Maschil. A Psalm of David, when the Ziphites came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us?

1 SAVE me, O God; by thy name, and judge me by thy strength.

2 Hear my prayer, O God; give ear to the words of my mouth.

3 For strangers are risen up against me, and oppressors seek after my soul: they have not set God before them. Selah.

4 Behold, God is mine helper: the LORD is with them that uphold my soul.

5 He shall reward evil unto mine enemies: cut them off in thy truth.

6 I will freely sacrifice unto thee: I will praise thy name, O LORD; for it is good.

7 For he hath delivered me out of all trouble: and mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies.

PSALM LIV.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, the title tells us, was composed, when (not long after the butchery of Doeg) the Ziphites, a false people, void of humanity, and that sought nothing but how to raise themselves, though by another's ruin, endeavoured to ingratiate themselves with Saul, by discovering to him where David lurked in their neighbourhood (1 Sam. xxxiii. 14. 19): and undertook to guide the king to the very place, and assist the forces he should send to take him (ver. 20, &c.). By which means David was brought into such a great strait (ver. 26), that if Saul had not been diverted by a sudden invasion which the Philistines made, he could not have escaped him. In this distress he made his address to God by prayer, in the words of the first three verses of this Psalm. But on a sudden (hearing, I suppose, how Saul himself was alarmed with the news of an invasion) he breaks out (ver. 4, 5) into admiration of God's goodness. And when the danger was quite over, added, I suppose, the last two verses; wherein he expresses with what joy he took a view, from the mountain where he lay hid, of Saul's forces as they retreated. Which was a thing so memorable, that, when he came to the kingdom, he delivered the whole to the master of music in the tabernacle, to be sung as the fourth Psalm, to the tune of Maschil.

Ver. 1.] O God, whose name imports that thou art the supreme judge, and therefore the defender and protector of all injured and oppressed persons, I humbly implore thy aid in this great distress; beseeching thee, who can easily do it, to deliver me from my enemies, and, by thy almighty power, vindicate my innocence; and maintain my righteous cause against those that are too strong for me, and wrongfully seek to destroy me.

Ver. 2.] Deny me not this request, O God, I most earnestly entreat thee; but grant the petitions of thy poor servant, who hath nothing but his prayers to oppose to all those forces that surround him.

Ver. 3.] And they are conducted by barbarous people, whom I have no way disobliged, for I never had any thing to do with them; and yet they have undertaken to deliver me into the hand of Saul, and those formidable enemies that are come to seek my life (1 Sam. xxiii. 20): having no regard to God at all; but only studying, right or wrong, to gain the favour of their prince.

Ver. 4.] O the wonderful goodness of God! who in this deplorable condition sends me, in a strange and unexpected manner, most seasonable relief! Behold, how he takes my part, the Lord preserves my life; for, alas! the small forces I have with me, are unable to secure it; and can by no means support me against those numerous enemies that thought to destroy me.

Ver. 5.] And as for those spies that undertook to find out all my hiding places (1 Sam. xxiii. 22, 23), he shall bring the mischief they intended to me upon themselves: take a just vengeance on them, and execute thy threatenings, O Lord, against such treacherous persons.

Ver. 6.] In the mean time I will not be sparing in expressing my thankfulness for what thou hast done already, but make thee my grateful acknowledgments both in word and deed. First, I will offer thee liberal sacrifices; and then I will accompany them with my praises of thy wisdom, power, and goodness, O Lord; which is the most pleasing sacrifice, I know, unto thee, and the most delightful employment.

Ver. 7.] Who, by his special providence, as marvelously delivered out of that distress wherein I was, and all the dangers which it threatened: for my eyes now dare look upon those enemies in their retreat, from whom I lately fled for fear (1 Sam. xxiii. 26—28).

PSALM LV.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth. Maschil. A Psalm of David.

1 GIVE ear to my prayer, O God; and hide not myself from my supplication.

2 Attend unto me, and hear me: I mourn in my complaint, and make a noise;

3 Because of the voice of the enemy, because of the oppression of the wicked: for they cast iniquity upon me, and in wrath they hate me.

4 My heart is sore pained within me: and the terrors of death are fallen upon me.

5 Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me, and horror hath overwhelmed me.

6 And I said, O that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest.

7 Lo, then would I wander far off, and remain in the wilderness. Selah.

8 I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest.

9 Destroy, O Lord, and divide their tongues: for I have seen violence and strife in the city.

10 Day and night they go about it upon the walls thereof: mischief also and sorrow are in the midst of it.

11 Wickedness is in the midst thereof: deceit and guile depart not from her streets.

12 For it was not an enemy that reproached me; then I could have borne it: neither was it he that hated me that did magnify himself

PSALM LV.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm was sent to the master of the music to be sung as the former: having an occasion something like it. For the complaint which he makes in the middle of the Psalm, that his greatest confidant proved treacherous to him, makes it probable that it was composed when Absalom's rebellion broke out, and he was forced to flee suddenly from Jerusalem: and, as he was going barefoot upon mount Olivet (he and all his company weeping), to increase his sorrow, met the news that Ahithophel also was among the conspirators, 2 Sam. xv. 31. Upon which, we read there, he presently fell to his prayers; and as soon as he came to a place where he could rest, and retire himself, he represented, it is likely, the sadness of his condition more largely in this Psalm: beseeching God to disappoint the conspirators (ver. 9). First, because of the violence they had committed at Jerusalem, ver. 9—11: and, secondly, because of the vile treachery of Ahithophel, from the twelfth to the fifteenth, which seems to me ought to be connected with the beginning of the ninth verse; for he goes on, in the fifteenth, to beseech God to defeat them all, which he had begun in the ninth, but breaks off to insert his reasons why he was so earnest; and then, in the conclusion, he exhorts all those that adhered to him not to be discouraged, but to cast their care upon the Lord; who would reward their pious confidence in him, by protecting and delivering them, and destroying their and his enemies.

Ver. 1.] O God, the supreme judge of all the world, I most humbly address myself to thee, who art inclined to relieve those that are oppressed; beseeching thee not to reject a poor supplicant, but graciously to receive his petition which he puts up unto thee.

Ver. 2.] Let the sadness of my condition move thee to consider and relieve me; which I am not able to represent in my prayer, without shrieks and lamentable cries: so great is the perturbation of my mind.

Ver. 3.] Because my own son is become my enemy, and hath blown the trumpet of rebellion against me (2 Sam. xv. 10), and because of the sore straits to which he hath wickedly reduced me: for which, that there might be some colour, he and his associates load me with false accusations, and say I am unjust, and take no care of my people (ver. 3, 4), and therefore furiously set themselves against me to dethrone me.

Ver. 4.] This is a sore grief unto my heart, and puts me into the very agonies of death: which, without thy mercy, I must suddenly expect (2 Sam. xvii. 2).

Ver. 5.] The suddenness and strength of this conspiracy have struck me into such a fear, as makes me tremble: I am involved in such difficulties, that, which way soever I look, horror and consternation seize upon me.

Ver. 6.] In this confusion I rather wished than hoped to escape (2 Sam. xv. 15), saying, Who will lend me wings as swift as those of a dove, that I may flee away to some place of safety and repose?

Ver. 7.] Lo, then would I go to some far-distant country, though I wandered I knew not whither (2 Sam. xv. 20); I would hide myself in some desert place, remote from all society.

Ver. 8.] And I would make all the haste imaginable to escape this fierce persecution (2 Sam. xvii. 16, 21), which is risen like a sudden storm of wind, or violent tempest, and threatens utterly to subvert me.

Ver. 9.] O Lord, let that speedy destruction swallow up them which they design against me (2 Sam. xvii. 19), divide their counsels, and raise dissensions among them (2 Sam. xv. 34; xvii. 14, 15), for I am certainly informed, that, by rapine and cruelty, brawling and contention, they have filled the whole city of Jerusalem with tumult and confusion.

Ver. 10.] There is nothing else to be seen, either by day or by night: for they that guard the gates, or go the rounds, make it their business to ravage and spoil, to pick quarrels, and fall out with every body they meet: withal: and such as run to the main guards, in hope to meet with some relief, are miserably deceived; for there the same iniquity, oppression, and injurious dealing, keep their station.

Ver. 11.] There is no place free either from their open violence, or secret fraud and deceit; but they barbarously abuse, or cunningly circumvent, the inhabitants, both within doors and without.

Ver. 12.] And there is one most notorious traitor, whose ingratitude deserves to be severely punished; for he hath maliciously reproached and calumniated me and my government, when I thought of no such treachery: for we never had any quarrel (then his treason would not have been so strange, but far more tolerable) nor did he give any sign of hatred to me; for then I could have secured myself, by withdrawing from his familiarity.

against me; then I would have hid myself from him:

13 But it was thou, a man mine equal, my guide, and mine acquaintance.

14 We took sweet counsel together, and walked unto the house of God in company.

15 Let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell: for wickedness is in their dwellings, and among them.

16 As for me, I will call upon God; and the LORD shall save me.

17 Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud: and he shall hear my voice.

18 He hath delivered my soul in peace from the battle that was against me: for there were many with me.

Ver. 13.] No; thou, O most perfidious of all mankind, who contrivest this mischief against me, wast the person whom I esteemed above all others; whom I loved as myself; whose counsel I ever followed; and to whom, as my friend, I unbosomed all my secrets.

Ver. 14.] Whose conversation was most delightful to me, and to whom I thought I had been tied, not only by the bond of civil friendship, but (which is far stronger) of religion.

Ver. 15.] Let death seize on them as unexpectedly as this treason broke out against me: let them sink on a sudden into the grave, when they think of nothing less; for whosoever they go, all manner of mischief marches along with them.

Ver. 16.] As for me, I will injure nobody to preserve myself, but only commend myself and my cause to God, the righteous judge: and the almighty Lord, who changes not, will deliver me as he hath done formerly.

Ver. 17.] For this I will not cease to solicit him when I go to bed, and when I rise, and before I take my repast; both in my inward thoughts, and with my mouth, in silent desires and lamentable moans, I will never give over my importunity, till he graciously grant my petition, and send me relief.

Ver. 18.] He will rescue me from the hand of this rebellious army which comes against me, and restore me to my throne in peace: for be they never so numerous, there is a far greater power on my side, to defend me, and to fight for me.

Ver. 19.] God himself, who hath so long governed the world most justly, and never alters nor changes, 19 God shall hear, and afflict them, even he that abideth of old. Selah. Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God.

20 He hath put forth his hands against such as be at peace with him: he hath broken his covenant.

21 The words of his month were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart: his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords.

22 Cast thy burden upon the LORD, and he shall sustain thee: he shall never suffer the righteous to be moved.

23 But thou, O God, shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction: bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days; but I will trust in thee.

will hear my prayer, and bring down their pride: for having prospered hitherto in their villany, there is not one of them that repents; but they all pertinaciously persist in their rebellion, without any fear of the divine vengeance.

Ver. 20.] Especially that perfidious person, who hath not only violated all the laws of friendship, but profanely broken his promise and oath of fidelity, wherein he was engaged to me.

Ver. 21.] Nothing can be falser than he; who entertained me with the fairest and smoothest language, when, at the same time, he was contriving this rebellion in his heart: all his soft words and tender professions of kindness to me, served only to hide his design of giving me a mortal wound.

Ver. 22.] But why do I trouble myself any farther with him? he not dejected, O my soul (and let me give this counsel to every one that adheres to me), but, reposing thy humble trust in God, cast all the burdens of thy cares upon him, who will certainly support thee under any troubles that he is pleased to impose upon thee. Preserve thy integrity; and, though thou mayest be shaken and disturbed for a time, he will not suffer thee to be moved out of thy place, but quietly settle thee there again.

Ver. 23.] But as for those that have given me this disturbance, thou, O God, wilt bring them to an untimely end, and throw them headlong into the pit of destruction. They are men that thirst after blood, and by all manner of fraud and treachery endeavour to compass their ends; and such shall perish in the flower of their age, when I trust to spend my days in prosperity and peace.

PSALM LVI.

To the chief Musician, upon Jonath-elem-rechokim. Michtam of David, when the Philistines took him in Gath.

1 BE merciful unto me, O God: for man would swallow me up; he fighting daily oppresseth me.

2 Mine enemies would daily swallow me up: for they be many that fight against me, O thou most high.

PSALM LVI.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by David, when, for fear of Saul, he fled like an innocent dove into remote countries. More particularly when he was forced to take shelter among the Philistines in Gath (1 Sam. xxi.), where the lords of the court brought him to king Achish, with such high commendations of his valour, as he thought might endanger his life. And therefore he put on the guise of a man beside himself; silently bewailing the sadness of his condition, which constrained him to make use of such artifices; and complaining to God of the cruelty of his enemies, who had driven him into this and many other straits: but making no remonstrances to Achish how he was used, nor begging his assistance against them. Not a word of this; which is the reason, possibly, why he compares himself here in the title to a silent or dumb dove, if interpreters rightly understand the words jonath-elem, which

3 What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee.

4 In God I will praise his word, in God I have put my trust; I will not fear what flesh can do unto me.

5 Every day they wrest my words: all their thoughts are against me for evil.

6 They gather themselves together, they hide themselves, they mark my steps, when they wait for my soul.

7 Shall they escape by iniquity? in thine anger cast down the people, O God.

8 Thou tellest my wanderings: put thou my tears into thy bottle: are they not in thy book?

he expound in that manner. And Kimchi thinks, he the rather compares himself to a dove, because that is accounted a silly creature (Hos. vii. 11); and David now seemed no better.

And this is the reason that this Psalm is also called Michtam (see Ps. xvi.), because it is a commemoration of God's singular care over him, in many great dangers, especially at Gath; when he entirely depended upon his favour and love alone; supporting himself (and seeking no farther for help) by his gracious promise to him; which he thankfully acknowledges, especially in the conclusion of this Psalm.

Which was penned, it appears from ver. 8, after many wanderings of this good man; first, to Samuel in Naioth (1 Sam. xix. 18), then to Jonathan (xx. 1), then to Nob (xxi. 1), after that to Gath (ver. 10), from thence to Adullam (xxii. 1), and then into the country of Moab (ver. 3): from whence he was admonished by the prophet Gad, to go to a place of greater security (ver. 6), which he found in the forest of Hareth (1 Sam. xxii. 5); where, I suppose he might have a little repose and leisure, to reflect upon what was past, and to compose this Psalm: and from that forest, I fancy, he might call himself (if we admit of Bochartus's change of one point, lib. i. De Animal. cap. 3. par. ii.), Jonath-elim-rechokim, "a dove in the remote woods." Where he made this Psalm before the rest of his wanderings to other places, which afterward followed. And when he came to the kingdom, he delivered it to the chief master of music, to be sung after the tune of a song which began with those words (as Aben Ezra takes it), Jonath-elim-rechokim.

Ver. 1.] O God, the supreme, and therefore impartial, judge of all the world, take pity upon me, I beseech thee, and rescue me from the violence of my enemies: for Saul, forgetting his own mortality, and how unseemly it is for frail man to continue his enmities for ever, most eagerly pursues me, with an insatiable desire to take away my life: he never intermits his persecutions, but presses me so closely, that he gives me no time to breathe.

Ver. 2.] He sends abroad his spies, to watch all opportunities to ensnare me; for which they gape as greedily as ravenous beasts do for their prey: and great multitudes there are, O thou Most High, (who alone canst disappoint them) that, proud of their numbers, and of their power, have insolently set themselves against me to destroy me.

Ver. 3.] As I have just reason to fear they will, unless I be defended by thee, with whom I have entrusted myself and all my concerns: which is the only thing whereby I overcome those fears when they seize upon me.

Ver. 4.] By the help of God, I will be so far from being dismayed, that I will rejoice in the faithful promise he hath made to me by his prophet (1 Sam. xvi.

9 When I cry unto thee, then shall mine enemies turn back: this I know; for God is for me.

10 In God will I praise his word: in the Lord will I praise his word.

11 In God have I put my trust: I will not be afraid what man can do unto me.

12 Thy vows are upon me, O God: I will render praises unto thee.

13 For thou hast delivered my soul from death: wilt not thou deliver my feet from falling, that I may walk before God in the light of the living?

13; 2 Sam. iii. 9; v. 2). Though it be not fulfilled presently, yet by his assistance I will depend, as I have done hitherto, upon his fidelity for the performance of it, and never fear what frail man can do to hinder it.

Ver. 5.] I know what an ill construction my enemies would put upon these words, if they could hear what I say: for they do nothing but wrest the most innocent speeches; and because I profess to confide in God, pretend that I conspire against the king (1 Sam. xxiv. 9), their whole business being nothing else but to contrive how to do me mischief.

Ver. 6.] For this end they hold many consultations among themselves, and lay snares privily for me; curiously observing all my motions, and still expecting an opportunity to take away my life.

Ver. 7.] Shall this iniquity always go unpunished? Orby their subtlety and craft shall they, who thus unjustly persecute the innocent, escape thy vengeance? O God, the righteous judge, throw down those insolent people, who have so long provoked thy patience, and make them feel the effects of thy just displeasure.

Ver. 8.] Thou art perfectly acquainted, I am sure, how often I have been forced to fly, like a vagabond, from place to place; which hath cost me many a tear; good Lord, preserve a kind remembrance of them; and let them not perish as things thou nothing regardest. But why am I so importunate for this, since I know thou art so far from despising my misery, that thou art as mindful of it, as if thou kept a register of every tear, and all my troubles?

Ver. 9.] My prayer therefore shall prevail when my enemies oppress me, and obtain a glorious victory over them; of this I am assured, because the mighty God, who rules all the world, is on my side.

Ver. 10.] By his gracious assistance I will continue my resolution to rejoice in the faithful promise I before mentioned: he is the eternal Lord, who never alters nor changes, and I will be like him, immutably rejoicing in that faithful promise.

Ver. 11.] Nothing shall shake the confidence I have reposed in him; nor will I fear what the greatest man can do, were he more powerful than he is, to hinder the accomplishment of what the Lord designs for me.

Ver. 12.] Nor will I ever be unmindful of the promises I have made to thee, O God; to whom, when I was in distress, I vowed the most grateful acknowledgments, if thou wouldest deliver me; though I am not able to requite thy kindness, yet I will not cease to magnify and extol it with my highest praises.

Ver. 13.] For thou hast so remarkably rescued me from death (to thy goodness I ascribe it, not to my policy) when I was in the power of the Philistines, that I ought not to doubt of thy continued preservation of me, from the snares my enemies lay to entrap me, or from the open violence they use to overthrow me: thou wilt support me still to praise thee, and to perform further service to thee here in this world, as I intend to do most sincerely.

PSALM LVII.

To the chief Musician. Al-taschith. Michtam of David, when he fled from Saul in the cave.

1 Be merciful unto me, O God, be merciful unto me: for my soul trusteth in thee: yea, in the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until these calamities be overpast.

2 I will cry unto God most high; unto God that performeth all things for me.

3 He shall send from heaven, and save me from the reproach of him that would swallow me up. Selah. God shall send forth his mercy and his truth.

4 My soul is among lions: and I lie even among them that are set on fire, even the sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword.

5 Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens; let thy glory be above all the earth.

6 They have prepared a net for my steps; my soul is bowed down: they have digged a pit before me, into the midst whereof they are fallen themselves. Selah.

7 My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed: I will sing and give praise.

8 Awake up, my glory; awake, psaltery and harp: I myself will awake early.

PSALM LVII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, the title informs us, was penned upon the like occasion with the former. For after several other wanderings (besides those he speaks of in the foregoing Psalm, ver. 8), or removes from place to place, mentioned 1 Sam. xxiii. you find David in the strong hold of Engedi (ver. 29), where there was a cave among the rocks (xxiv. 2, 3), in which David and his men lurked and hid themselves for fear of Saul. Who, in his pursuit of them, came to ease himself in this very place where they skulked; and thereby presented David with as fair an opportunity, as could be desired, to kill him. Which he might have done without any noise, if his piety and religious resolution to do nothing that was sinful, no, not to gain a kingdom, but (trusting to the faithful promise he speaks of, Ps. lvi. 4. 10), to wait wholly upon God, to prefer him when and as he pleased to the throne, had not hindered him. For some of his men, observing the advantage, would fain have despatched him, if David had not forbidden the person who was ready to strike the blow, saying, Al-taschith, “thou shalt not destroy him;” or “destroy him not.” So some expound that word, which we find in the title of the Psalm; though others (observing the same word to be in the title of the two following Psalms, and of the seventy-fifth, which belongeth not to this matter) judge it more probable that Al-taschith was the beginning of some song, according to which this Psalm was to be sung. To which, notwithstanding, in my opinion, it may be replied, that those three Psalms which follow after this had that title prefixed, only to show that they were to be sung like this.

In which David commemorates God's great mercy in mollifying the heart of Saul, at that time, by the kindness and piety which he expressed towards him: remembering, in the first place, what kind of thoughts he had when he was in the cave, and saw himself in manifest danger of being taken by Saul's forces: and then blessing God for the sudden change which was made in his condition, by Saul's falling into his hand, to do what he pleased with him, by the demonstration he gave him, that he had no traitorous thoughts in his heart; but bare still a due reverence to him, notwithstanding the ill usage he received from him.

It is called Michtam, for the same reason that the former was, because of the singular favour which God showed him in this deliverance; more precious to him than any jewel, and that deserved an everlasting remembrance (see Ps. xvi.)

Ver. 1.] O God, the ruler and governor of all the world, I most earnestly beseech thee to be merciful and gracious to me; O take some pity upon me, who rely solely on thy mercy, having no confidence in these fortresses, or secret places, where I hide myself; but trusting merely to thy almighty protection, on which I will still depend, as I have done hitherto, for defence and preservation, till this danger be past, which is now impendent over me, and threatens to destroy me.

Ver. 2.] There is none superior, or equal, to him, unto whom I will continually commend myself: unto that mighty God, who will finish, I hope, what he hath begun to do for me.

Ver. 3.] There are greater armies in heaven, than those that here surround me; which, rather than I shall perish, he will send for my deliverance; he will expose him to shame and reproach, that gapes like a ravenous beast to devour me: I doubt not of it; for, besides his infinite mercy, I have his promise for my security; in the performance of which, he will visibly declare his fidelity.

Ver. 4.] And now there is a fit opportunity, when my life is in extreme danger; for here I lie close, and dare not stir, being encompassed with enemies picked out on purpose to destroy me (1 Sam. xxiv. 2), who are as fierce and cruel as lions, and enraged against me so furiously, that they are continually incensing Saul to pursue me; tearing my good name (as they hope to do me) in pieces, and giving the most deadly wound to my reputation (1 Sam. xxiv. 9.)

Ver. 5.] Confute them, O God, the most righteous judge of men's actions and intentions; and by delivering me from this imminent danger, raise to thyself the highest praises: and spread the fame of thy glorious power, goodness, wisdom, and truth, throughout all the earth.

Ver. 6.] And how ready art thou to hear the prayers of thy faithful servant! For, after all their projects and devices to entrap me, when I was just falling into their hands, I am miraculously preserved; and they themselves precipitously run into that very danger, wherein they thought to have caught me (1 Sam. xxiv. 3—5, &c.).

Ver. 7.] My heart also is ready, O God, my heart is prepared, and firmly resolved to pay thee the vows which I made in my distress; my song shall be of thee; and, with all the joy I can express, I will set forth thy praise.

Ver. 8.] My tongue, wherewith I ought to glorify thee, shall be no longer silent, or merely full of complaints; nor shall any instrument of music be wanting to accompany my hymns: which I will sing unto thee so early, that I will prevent the rising sun.

9 I will praise thee, O LORD, among the people: I will sing unto thee among the nations.

10 For thy mercy is great unto the heavens and thy truth unto the clouds.

Ver. 9.] Nor will I content myself with my private acknowledgments of thy goodness; but I will publish thy praise in the greatest assemblies of thy people, among whom this song shall be sung; yea, other nations shall read therein, how thankful I am to thee for what thou hast done.

Ver. 10.] For it is fit my thankfulness should be as boundless as thy mercy; which transcends all my expressions; and hath nothing equal to it, but thy faithfulness and truth.

11 Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens: let thy glory be above all the earth.

Ver. 11.] Be thou still exalted in these, O God, and raise to thyself thereby the highest praise: spread the fame of them everywhere, that thou mayest be glorified throughout all the world.

PSALM LVIII.

To the chief Musician. Al-taschith. Michtam of David.

I Do ye indeed speak righteousness, O congregation? do ye judge uprightly, O ye sons of men?

2 Yea, in heart ye work wickedness; ye weigh the violence of your hands in the earth.

3 The wicked are estranged from the womb: they go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies.

4 Their poison is like the poison of a serpent: they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear;

5 Which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely.

6 Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth: break out the great teeth of the young lions, O LORD.

PSALM LVIII.

ARGUMENT.—This, and the next Psalm, in order of time, precede the foregoing. But it is an ordinary method among the Hebrews to go backward from the last to the first; as they seem to me to do very plainly in these three Psalms, which have the title of Al-taschith. For David's first escape, when Saul sent to kill him, was certainly the occasion of Ps. lix. And then Saul calling his privy-council together, who, without any more ado, pronounced him guilty of high-treason; it is the subject of this present Psalm. And after that Saul persecuted him with the greater colour and show of justice, accusing him of the worst of crimes; as he complains in many places, particularly in the Psalm foregoing: which being called Al-taschith, for a peculiar reason (see there), this, when it was delivered to the chief musician, was appointed to be sung after the same manner with that, and had the same name given it, with the title of Michtam also; because it contains a memorable reproof of those evil counsellors, who, against their conscience, had condemned David, merely to please the king, and give him a pretence to destroy him. And therefore he prophesies a signal vengeance should overtake them (which he would have every body observe); and that so suddenly and dreadfully, that he compares it to the mischief which a whirlwind doth, when it carries all before it in a moment: and particularly, he remembers the pots and caldrons over the fire, which should suffer by it; to intimate, I suppose, that these men were great oppressors, and devoured the people; as the prophets often complain, in that very language, particularly Micah iii. 2, 3, where you read how the senators of Israel broke the very bones of the poor, and chopped them in pieces, as for the pot, and as flesh within the caldron. Which place affords the best explication that I can find of the ninth verse of this Psalm. Where I take hai and haron to refer to thorns, and render the former green, or alive, the other dry, or scorched and burnt. But whatsoever these words signify, the repetition of chemo before each of them plainly denotes (to any one that understands the Hebrew language), that the things meant by those words should be served both alike.

Ver. 1.] From whom may we expect justice, if not from the princes and rulers of the people met together in council? But let me ask that grave assembly, Do you verily think that you have pronounced a righteous sentence against me? Did you judge according to your consciences, uprightly and sincerely; and not suffer yourselves to be biassed by your affections?

Ver. 2.] You know the contrary to be true; and that you are not only disposed to do as the king would have you; but have hearts fraught with malice and wicked devices against me: you that ought to weigh things in an even balance, and judge a cause according to its merits, suffer yourselves to be inclined by base respects, to do an open violence to your country, and to oppress the innocent.

Ver. 3.] But it is no wonder I am thus used by a wicked brood, who never had any sense of God and goodness; but were depraved from the very womb: going astray as soon as they could go; and telling lies as soon as they could speak.

Ver. 4.] And such is the malignity of their venomous nature, they tell the most malicious and destructive lies of me; which strike at my life as plainly as if they were the poison of a serpent: whom they resemble in this also, that they will not be better instructed, nor, as becomes good judges, keep an ear open to farther information; but are as obstinate as the deaf adder (so much spoken of in our neighbouring countries), which can hear well enough, but stops both her ears.

Ver. 5.] And will not listen to the magical song, wherewith their cunning men are wont to charm those serpents; and draw them together out of their holes.

Ver. 6.] I appeal, therefore, from them unto thee. O God, the most righteous judge; beseeching thee to disable those men's forces, whose wickedness is incorrigible: though they be as strong and terrible, as fierce and ravenous, as the young lions, thou, O

7 Let them melt away as waters which run continually: when he bendeth his bow to shoot his arrows, let them be as cut in pieces.

8 As a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away: like the untimely birth of a woman, that they may not see the sun.

9 Before your pots can feel the thorns, he shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath.

10 The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance: he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked.

11 So that a man shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous: verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth.

Lord, who art superior to all, canst easily disarm them, and leave them a desire, without any power, to do me mischief.

Ver. 7.] Or if they have any strength remaining, let their courage fail them when they would attempt anything against me; let them be dissipated like waters which slide away: when Saul bends his mind to do me any harm, let him miss his aim; like him that shoots a broken arrow out of his bow.

Ver. 8.] Or be like a snail, that appears with a threatening look when it puts forth its horns; but the farther it goes, the more it wastes and spends itself: whatsoever designs he and his followers may have to destroy me, let them all miscarry and prove like an abortive child, which dies in the womb, and never sees the light of this world.

Ver. 9.] O ye unrighteous judges; who, instead of preserving the people, devour and eat them up: God shall hurry you away suddenly, as in a furious tempest; which, before your flesh-pots can feel the thorns, carries them all away, both the green thorns and the dry.

Ver. 10.] Which just judgment of God, when innocent people, whom you have oppressed, shall behold, it will fill them with joy; yea, they shall triumph over these wicked men, like a great conqueror; who, returning with an absolute and complete victory from the slaughter of his enemies, dips his feet in their blood, as he passes over their carcasses.

Ver. 11.] And the most vulgar people, who observe little, seeing so remarkable a vengeance, shall confess and say, Surely it is best to be just and pious: surely there is a supreme judge, whatsoever profane men imagine, who takes notice of all that is done upon earth, and punishes or rewards men according to their desires.

PSALM LIX.

To the chief Musician. Al-taschith. Michtam of David; when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him.

1 DELIVER me from mine enemies, O my God: defend me from them that rise up against me.

2 Deliver me from the workers of iniquity, and save me from bloody men.

3 For, lo, they lie in wait for my soul: the mighty are gathered against me; nor for my transgressions, nor for my sin, O LORD.

4 They run and prepare themselves without my fault: awake to help me, and behold.

5 Thou therefore, O LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel, awake to visit all the heathen: be not merciful to any wicked transgressors. Selah.

PSALM LIX.

ARGUMENT.—The title sufficiently informs us of the occasion of this Psalm, wherein David expresses what his thoughts and affections were, when Saul sent officers to watch his house all night; and to slay him when he came out of his doors in the morning: as you may read 1 Sam. xix. 11—18. He represents his danger; beseeches God's protection; describes the wickedness of his enemies, and their diligence to destroy him; commends himself to God: expresses his confidence in him; and at last gratefully acknowledges God's goodness, who, by the kindness of his wife, preserved him from this danger. Which was so great, and the deliverance from it so remarkable, that he would have it commemorated in this Psalm: which is therefore called Michtam (see Ps. xvi.): and was sent to the master of music in the tabernacle, to be sung as the two former, which have the name Al-taschith (see Ps. lvii.).

Ver. 1.] O God, who hast hitherto graciously preserved me (see 1 Sam. xix. 10), take me now into thy protection, and deliver me from this great danger: thou seest the number and the power of my enemies, who are risen up to destroy me; be thou my defence, I beseech thee; and bring me into some place of safety, where they may not be able to reach me.

Ver. 2.] Rescue me from the malice of men, whose business and constant employment it is to do wickedly: save me from the cruelty of those, whom nothing but my blood will satisfy.

Ver. 3.] For, lo, a strong guard hath beset my house, and lies in wait to apprehend me, and take away my life: though I have committed no offence against them, either great or less, as thou, O LORD, from whom nothing can be hid, very well knowest.

Ver. 4.] Unprovoked by me (I dare again repeat it, so great is my innocence) they very busily run to and fro, and with all diligence dispose their watch in every place to hinder my escape: O that thou wouldst therefore seasonably interpose for my succour, and consider the danger of my condition!

Ver. 5.] What is all their power and force to thine? who art the sovereign Lord of the world, and commandest all the hosts in heaven and earth; and hast made also a gracious covenant with thy people, to protect and defend them: appear now for my relief, and punish all those wicked men who call themselves thy people, but are as barbarous and cruel, as false and perfidious, as the heathen: do not spare them, therefore, nor show any favour to such as violate all the laws of justice and charity, and keep no faith with their neighbours.

Ver. 6.] After I had escaped the fury of Saul in 6 They return at evening : they make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city.

7 Behold, they belch out with their mouth : swords are in their lips : for who, say they, doth hear ?

8 But thou, O LORD, shalt laugh at them ; thou shalt have all the heathen in derision.

9 Because of his strength will I wait upon thee : for God is my defence.

10 The God of my mercy shall prevent me : God shall let me see my desire upon mine enemies.

11 Slay them not, lest my people forget : scatter them by thy power ; and bring them down, O LORD our shield.

12 For the sin of their mouth and the words of their lips let them even be taken in their

the day, he renews his attempts in the evening ; and sends armed men to apprehend me (1 Sam. xix. 10, 11) : some of which lie about my house, ready, like a growling dog, to seize upon me ; and others (should they miss me there) go round about the city to way-lay me in every corner.

Ver. 7.] Behold, how full their hearts are of malice ! which bursts out at their mouth : they openly threaten to kill me (1 Sam. xix. 15) : for who, say they, shall call them to any account for it, when they have despatched me ?

Ver. 8.] Thou, O Lord, art not in their thoughts, who wilt so disappoint them in their designs, as to make them very ridiculous : thou wilt expose all those paganish people to the scorn and derision of those who see how they are defeated (1 Sam. xix. 15).

Ver. 9.] For what is the strength of Saul to thee ? on whom I will wait with the same diligence, that they watch for me : knowing that I am safer under God's protection, than if my house were an impregnable tower.

Ver. 10.] He who hath given me so many demonstrations of his love, will not now desert me ; but make way for my timely escape, notwithstanding all their diligence to apprehend me : let them observe me as closely as they can, God will let me behold their disappointment.

Ver. 11.] Not that I desire they should all be slain at one stroke, which, though a terrible vengeance, might soon slip out of my countrymen's mind ; whose profit I desire, more than my own private revenge : and therefore wish rather that thou wouldest employ thy power, O Lord our protector, first to depose them from their honour and high place ; and having laid them low, and made them contemptible, then to disperse them here and there, and make them wander up and down as vagabonds ; that they may remain everywhere public spectacles of thy just displeasure.

Ver. 12.] The falsehoods and calumnies which their mouths continually utter deserve this vengeance :

pride : and for cursing and lying which they speak.

13 Consume them in wrath, consume them that they may not be : and let them know that God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth. Selah.

14 And at evening let them return ; and let them make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city.

15 Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied.

16 But I will sing of thy power ; yea, I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning : for thou hast been my defence and refuge in the day of my trouble.

17 Unto thee, O my strength, will I sing : for God is my defence, and the God of my mercy.

which shall certainly come upon them : for, though they may thrive by this means for the present, yet at last these very artifices shall prove their ruin : especially since they are so arrogant and audacious, as to dare to forswear themselves, and to confirm their forgeries with oaths and horrid execrations.

Ver. 13.] Let such vile wretches as these, who incense thy just displeasure against them after this manner, be utterly consumed : let them waste away by degrees in their dispersions, till there be none of them found : that they may be convinced there is a supreme being, and most righteous judge, who governs all things, and controls even kings themselves, not only among us, but throughout the world.

Ver. 14.] Let them therefore watch me now, as narrowly as they please (ver. 7) ; lying near my house, like a dog, ready to seize upon me ; or hunting about the city everywhere to apprehend me.

Ver. 15.] They shall be punished in their kind, and go up and down the city and country hereafter, upon another design : wandering, like a hungry dog, from door to door, to get something to eat ; and forced to pass whole nights in complaints for want of satisfaction.

Ver. 16.] Whilst I (whom they thought to have devoured) am praising thy power, as I intend to do continually ; I will get up early, to give thee the highest praises for thy mercy, (as I did that morning when I had escaped the hands of those that watched for me), because thou didst so mightily defend me, and take me into thy gracious protection ; when I was in such a strait, that without thy miraculous mercy I must have perished.

Ver. 17.] It is but just that I should praise thee (who didst inspire me with strength and courage) with the same diligence that I prayed to thee, against the power of Saul (ver. 9). For, whosoever was the instrument, it was God that brought me to a place of safety ; that God, who hath been most merciful to me, and tied me unto him by innumerable benefits.

PSALM LX.

To the chief Musician upon Shushan-eduth, Michtam of David, to teach ; when he strove with Aram-naharaim, and with Aram-zobah ; when Joab returned, and smote of Edom in the valley of salt twelve thousand.

1 O God, thou hast cast us off, thou hast scattered us, thou hast been displeased ; O turn thyself to us again.

PSALM LX.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, we learn by the title, was 2 Thou hast made the earth to tremble ; thou hast broken it : heal the breaches thereof ; for it shaketh.

penned by David after Saul's persecution was ended by death ; and David not only ruled over Judah, 3 Thou hast shewed thy people hard things: thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment.

4 Thou hast given a banner to them that feared thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth. Selah.

5 That thy beloved may be delivered; save with thy right hand, and hear me.

6 God hath spoken in his holiness; I will rejoice, I will divide Shechem, and mete out the valley of Succoth.

7 Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine; Ephraim also is the strength of mine head; Judah is my lawgiver;

8 Moab is my washpot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe: Philistia, triumph thou because of me.

9 Who will bring me into the strong city? who will lead me into Edom?

10 Wilt not thou, O God, which hadst cast us off? and thou, O God, which didst not go out with our armies?

but Israel also. Till which time the Philistines and other nations afflicted the country very much, by reason of the divisions there were between the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah: as they had done also all the days of Saul, while he was busying himself in pursuing his hated against David; and neglected his foreign enemies so much, that the Philistines were too hard for him, and at last overthrew him in that great battle wherein he and his sons were slain (1 Sam. xxxi.). But when David was come to the crown, and both kingdoms also united in him, God himself seemed to lift up an ensign to them (as he speaks here, ver. 4), to call them to resort with one consent unto David, in assured hope of victory over their enemies. Accordingly he subdued the Philistines, as you read 2 Sam. viii. 1 (which chapter must be read for the understanding of this Psalm), and after that smote the Moabites, ver. 2 of that chapter; and then, in a memorable battle (particularly taken notice of in the title of this Psalm), overthrew the Syrians, called here and in other places Aram: both those that lived between the two rivers Tigris and Euphrates, called Naharaim: and those that adjoined to them, in that part of Syria, called Zobah (ver. 3, &c.).

And returning from this victory, after his lieutenant-general Abishai had slain of the Edomites eighteen thousand (2 Sam. viii. 13; 1 Chron. xviii. 12), Joab, the general of all his forces, fell upon them again, and killed in the same place, the valley of salt, twelve thousand more (as the title of this Psalm informs us), and afterwards destroyed them entirely, leaving never a male-child, that he could find, remaining (1 Kings xi. 15, 16).

For all which expeditions, when David was preparing himself, he composed this Psalm, and delivered it to the master of music in the tabernacle to be sung upon an instrument of six strings which was wont to be used in solemn thanksgivings (and therefore called Shushan-eduth). For he nothing doubted, but God would prosper his arms better than he had done Saul's; and both give him the victory over their forces in the field, and bring him also into their fortified cities (ver. 9), as we read he did, 2 Sam. viii. 14. Which made this Psalm also be called Michtam of David (see Ps. xvi.); being a most precious memorial, worthy to be ever preserved, of his faith in God, and of the admirable success of it, whereby posterity should learn to trust in him.

Ver. 1.] O God, the judge of all the world, who hast lately rejected us, and refused to go out with our armies; who hast broken and scattered our forces (1 Sam. xxxi. 1. 7), so highly had our sins provoked thy displeasure; I most humbly beseech thee to return to us with thy favour, and make us as prosperous as we have been unsuccessful.

Ver. 2.] There have been dreadful commotions among ourselves, and miserable rents and divisions

(2 Sam. ii. 9, 10, 17, iii. 1), the woful effects of which remain to this day, and call for thy help; who alone canst repair the breaches our folly hath made, and perfect the union which is begun.

Ver. 3.] Thou hast made us feel what it is to offend thee, by inflicting grievous punishments upon us, wherein thou hast fulfilled the words of thy servant Moses (Deut. xxviii. 18, 34); for we have been like to men bereft of the use of their reason by some intoxicating potion, and have madly destroyed one another.

Ver. 4.] But now thou hast granted the desires of those that devoutly worship thee, and according to thy faithful promise (2 Sam. iii. 9, 18), given me to them to be their king; to whom they should all repair, as soldiers do to their ensign when it is lifted up, and unanimously fight against their enemies under my conduct.

Ver. 5.] Which I beseech thee to bless and prosper; that by the mighty power accompanying my arms, I may be an instrument of delivering thy beloved people from those that have oppressed them.

Ver. 6.] Why should I doubt of it? And not rather rejoice in assured hope of victory; since God, who is most holy, and cannot lie, hath said, He will deliver them by my hand (2 Sam. iii. 18), and hath already put me in possession (as he also promised, ver. 2) of all the country about Samaria, which I will distribute under such officers as I think fit to set over them.

Ver. 7.] Gilead also and Manasseh, who were lately under another king (2 Sam. ii. 9), have submitted themselves unto me; and so hath the tribe of Ephraim, which is a main support of my authority: these, and all the rest of the tribes of Israel, are now united to the royal tribe of Judah, which (according to the word of our forefather, Gen. xlix. 10) supplies me with wise and able men to administer the laws, and order the affairs of my kingdom.

Ver. 8.] Which shall now extend itself beyond the bounds of this country; for I will tread Moab under my feet, and reduce them to the vilest servitude (2 Sam. viii. 2); I will trample also upon the Edomites, and make them my slaves (ver. 14). The Philistines likewise, whom I have begun to smite (2 Sam. v. 17, &c. 22, &c.), shall add to my triumphs, and be forced to meet me as their conquering lord (2 Sam. viii. 1).

Ver. 9.] These are difficult things indeed; and I may well ask, when I consider how potent these nations are, By what power or force shall I enter that strongly-fenced city, in the frontiers of their country? who is it that will conduct me into Idumea, and make me master of it?

Ver. 10.] But I can soon answer myself; for why should I despair of thy presence with us, O God of all power and might? who formerly indeed didst reject us, and forsake the conduct of our armies; but now, I hope, will graciously aid us, and make us victorious.

11 Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man.

Ver. 11.] Do not frustrate these hopes; but afford us thy help against the Syrians also (2 Sam. viii. 5), now that they distress us; for no human force is able to deliver us, nor have we any confidence in it, but in thee alone.

12 Through God we shall do valiantly: for he it is that shall tread down our enemies.

Ver. 12.] By whose assistance we will behave ourselves courageously, and do valiant acts; for God will utterly rout our enemies, and tread them down like mire in the streets.

PSALM LXI.

To the chief Musician upon Neginah. A Psalm of David.

1 HEAR my cry, O God; attend unto my prayer.

2 From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed: lead me to the rock that is higher than I.

3 For thou hast been a shelter for me, and a strong tower from the enemy.

4 I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever: I will trust in the covert of thy wings. Selah.

PSALM LXI.

ARGUMENT.—All agree that, in the beginning of this Psalm, David relates what his thoughts were, when he fled either from Saul or from his son Absalom; who drove him over Jordan, as far as Mahanaim, the very extremity of Judea. Of this latter, it is most probable, he complains here (ver. 2); because afterwards he calls himself king (ver. 6), which he would not have done during the life of Saul, though he was anointed, and designed by God to that high dignity; because nothing could have justified Saul's persecution of him so much as his taking upon him that title.

It may be said, indeed, that he kept this Psalm private till he was possessed of the kingdom, and then delivered it to the chief musician, to be sung as Psalm iv. But that will not seem so likely, when we consider that his danger was over before he had finished this Psalm, and called himself a king, as appears from the latter part of it, beginning ver. 5; where, after a pause, he begins to acknowledge how God had granted the desires he made when he was in distress; and thankfully commemorates his mercy in bringing him back again to his tabernacle: hoping he would prolong his life in the throne (ver. 6), to which he was newly either advanced, or restored by God's goodness. I shall suppose the latter in my paraphrase.

Ver. 1.] O God, the supreme governor and judge of all the world, graciously vouchsafe to admit and answer the petitions of a poor suppliant, who, in a most lamentable condition, cries unto thee most earnestly for relief.

5 For thou, O God, hast heard my vows: thou hast given me the heritage of those that fear thy name.

6 Thou wilt prolong the king's life: and his years as many generations.

7 He shall abide before God for ever: O prepare mercy and truth, which may preserve him.

8 So will I sing praise unto thy name for ever, that I may daily perform my vows.

Ver. 2.] Of which I will not despair, though I am upon the brink of being thrust out of my kingdom (2 Sam. xvii. 22. 24), and in such anxiety of mind, that I am even overwhelmed with fear, and grief, and care; still I cry unto thee, saying, Secure me, I beseech thee, and bring me into a place of safety; which as without thee I am not able to reach, so there my enemies may not be able to approach me.

Ver. 3.] For in all my distresses hitherto, thou hast been pleased wonderfully to preserve me: I fled to thee, and was protected, as in an impregnable fortress, when Saul sought to destroy me.

Ver. 4.] Which makes me hope thou wilt restore me again to the place where thou dwellest; and that I shall never be thus banished from it any more, but remain in safety under thy almighty protection, in which I will put my entire confidence.

Ver. 5.] And since thou, O God, hast heard the prayers, which with these vows I made unto thee; and hast given me again the possession of that country, which is the inheritance of thy faithful people:

Ver. 6.] I doubt not but thou wilt grant their king a long and prosperous reign over them, and add so many years to those which his enemies would have cut off: as if thou hadst given him a new life, and added another age unto the former.

Ver. 7.] He shall sit upon his throne, and ever govern in the fear of God: O that thy goodness and faithfulness, which are a stronger guard than all his military forces, may be ever ready at hand to defend him!

Ver. 8.] So will I perpetually sing psalms in praise of thee; and learn thereby to be faithful to my promises: and day by day perform the vows which I made unto thee when I was in trouble.

PSALM XLII.

To the chief Musician, to Jeduthun. A Psalm of David.

1 TRULY my soul waiteth upon God: from him cometh my salvation.

PSALM XLII.

ARGUMENT.—There are no petitions at all in this Psalm nor any thanksgivings, but only expressions

2 He only is my rock and my salvation; he is my defence; I shall not be greatly moved.

of David's faith and confidence in God. Which (notwithstanding the straits he was in, as appears from ver. 3, 4), grew greater and stronger (compare ver. 2 with ver. 6), and moved him to earnest ex-

3 How long will ye imagine mischief against a man? ye shall be slain all of you: as a bowing wall shall ye be, and as a tottering fence.

4 They only consult to cast him down from his excellency: they delight in lies: they bless with their mouth, but they curse inwardly. Selah.

5 My soul, wait thou only upon God; for my expectation is from him.

6 He only is my rock and my salvation: he is my defence; I shall not be moved.

7 In God is my salvation and my glory: the rock of my strength, and my refuge, is in God.

8 Trust in him at all times; ye people, pour out your heart before him: God is a refuge for us. Selah.

9 Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie: to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity.

10 Trust not in oppression, and become not vain in robbery: if riches increase, set not your heart upon them.

11 God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this; that power belongeth unto God.

12 Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy: for thou renderest to every man according to his work.

hortations of all other persons, never to trust in men; much less in those wicked arts of fraudulent dealing and robbery, whereby men are wont to advance themselves to great estates; hoping thereby to be so strong, that nobody dare meddle with them: but to place all their confidence in God alone, who can and will make those supports fail those that rely upon them, and bless the piety of such men as depend wholly upon him.

Which would make one think this Psalm was penned by him when he had overcome all the fears into which the rebellion of Absalom at first put him; but yet was not restored to his kingdom. Unto which, when he returned, he committed this meditation to the master of the music, to be sung according to the tune to which Jeduthun, a famous artist, had set the thirty-ninth Psalm.

Ver. 1.] Let the dangers be never so great which threaten my destruction, I am resolved quietly and patiently to submit myself to God; expecting what he will be pleased to do for me, who alone is able to deliver me.

Ver. 2.] Be my enemies never so powerful, I doubt not by his providence to be safe; so secure that though they give me some disturbance, they shall not be able to do it long, much less to throw me quite out of my throne.

Ver. 3.] I wonder at your obstinacy, who continue thus to contrive the ruin of a man, whom God hath so visibly declared that he favours: to what purpose are all your conspiracies, but only to bring sudden destruction upon yourselves? for you shall all perish in this enterprise, and fall to the ground like a wall that is not evenly built; or like a partition made only of loose stones, that have no mortar to cement and hold them fast together.

Ver. 4.] It is plain what they design, and whither all their consultations tend; to dethrone him whom God hath been pleased to advance to the highest dignity: this they hope now to effect by lies and calumnies; in which they please themselves, as formerly they did in fawning and flattery: speaking fairly to me with their mouth, when in their heart they wished my utter ruin (see Ps. lv. 21).

Ver. 5.] But let not this discourage thee, O my soul; resolve still to wait upon God with quietness and patience: for from him I expect my deliverance.

Ver. 6.] By his providence, as I said before, I doubt not I shall be so safe, so secure, that, do what they can, they shall not be able to take one step more to throw me out of my throne.

Ver. 7.] Both my safety, and my honour, and dignity, depend upon God alone; and not upon their will and pleasure: and I trust not either in fortresses or armies, but make him my confidence, on whom I rely for defence and protection against the strongest enemies.

Ver. 8.] And so I would advise all my people to do continually, in whatsoever condition you be, repose a pious confidence in him; be not fearful, nor too solicitous; but commit yourselves to God by earnest prayer, and implore his help: for he will never fail us.

Ver. 9.] But do not place any confidence in man; for as the multitude are vain, giddy, and unconstant, so the greater sort are false, deceitful, and treacherous: take them altogether, they are no more to be depended on than the vainest thing in the world; which, thrown into the balance against them, will prove more solid and ponderous.

Ver. 10.] And do not by any means, when all human helps may fail you, betake yourselves to frauds, cheating, and calumnies, for support; much less endeavour to enrich yourselves by rapine, spoil, and robbery. Be not so vain as to trust to ill-gotten goods; for if your riches increase by honest means, they are not things wherein to place either your confidence and hope, or your love and joy.

Ver. 11.] For God hath frequently declared, in the course of his providence, as well as in his word; I myself have been witness of it more than once; that by his power he disposes things quite otherways than men project; dashing all their worldly confidences in pieces, and especially defeating the hopes of those that think to prosper in evil courses.

Ver. 12.] And that thou, O Lord, art also exceeding gracious to those that piously trust in thee; preserving and providing for them, when they are destitute of human succour: for thou art not an idle spectator of men's actions, nor acceptest any man's person; but an exact dispenser of rewards and punishments, to every man according to his work.

PSALM LXIII.

A Psalm of David, when he was in the wilderness of Judah.

1 O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee: my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is;

PSALM LXIII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, the title informs us, represents the thoughts which David had when he was in the wilderness of Judah. But whether by that he meant the forest of Hareth, wherein, after other places, he secured himself when he fled from Saul

2 To see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary.

3 Because thy lovingkindness is better than life, my lips shall praise thee.

4 Thus will I bless thee while I live: I will lift up mine hands in thy name.

5 My soul shall be satisfied with marrow and fatness; and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips:

6 When I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate on thee in the night watches.

7 Because thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice.

8 My soul followeth hard after thee: thy right hand upholdeth me.

9 But those that seek my soul, to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth.

10 They shall fall by the sword: they shall be a portion for foxes.

11 But the king shall rejoice in God; every one that sweareth by him shall glory: but the mouth of them that speak lies shall be stopped.

(1 Sam. xxii. 5); or the wilderness he went through, when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 29), may be questioned. Theodoret takes it for the former; but I incline to the latter, for the same reason I gave before; because he calls himself a king (ver. 11), which he would not have done, as I said (upon Ps. lxi.), during the reign of Saul; because it would have given him too just cause to persecute him; and made the people look upon him as a traitor. Unless we say that he did not publish this Psalm, but reserved it for his own private use, till he came to the kingdom. When he delivered it to the chief musician, for the service of the tabernacle: where he longed very much to be, when he was in his banishment. As appears by this Psalm; in which he expresses exceeding great love to God (as Theodoret notes), and predicts the destruction of his enemies.

Ver. 1.] O God, the governor of the world, who hast ever been my gracious God, and art my only confidence; to thee I early direct my morning thoughts, most earnestly beseeching thee to take pity upon me, in this desolate condition: wherein I languish, and am ready to faint, as I travel through this dry and tiresome wilderness (2 Sam. xvii. 29), where there is no water to refresh me.

Ver. 2.] It is not so much some satisfaction to my hunger and thirst that I desire, as to be restored again to worship thee before the ark of thy presence (2 Sam. xv. 25); which is the token of thy power and majesty residing among us: and there to enjoy thee, as I have done heretofore; when I had the liberty to go into thy sanctuary.

Ver. 3.] My lips shall then praise thee with the same devotion that I now pray unto thee: for nothing is so dear unto me as thy favour and love, without which, life itself, and all the pleasures of my court, would be of little value.

Ver. 4.] The greatest pleasure of my life shall be continually to bless thee for such a happy restoration; and with the most thankful acknowledgments for what thou hast done for me, to implore thy future kindness towards me.

Ver. 5.] My hungry appetite would not now receive greater satisfaction, if the best cheer in the world were presented to me; than my soul shall be filled withal in that sweet employment: when, with the highest expressions of joy, my mouth shall, with a loud voice, sing thy praises.

Ver. 6.] Meantime, I comfort myself with the hope of that happiness; calling to mind, as I lie upon my bed, and seriously considering, as oft as I awake, how gracious thou hast been unto me.

Ver. 7.] From whence I conclude, that since thou hast relieved me in my greatest straits, I shall be safe under thy almighty protection; and at last triumph over all my enemies.

Ver. 8.] Though thou seemest to cast me off, my soul notwithstanding cleaveth fast unto thee, and will not part with its hope in thee: and I feel the happy fruit of it; for by thy mighty aid I am supported and preserved from sinking under these sore calamities that have lain upon me.

Ver. 9.] Which now shall fall upon those that endeavour to destroy me: who, seeking to take away my life, shall lose their own (2 Sam. xviii. 7, 8, &c.).

Ver. 10.] They shall perish by the sword; and their carcases have no other sepulchres but in the bowels of foxes, and other such-like ravenous creatures, who live as they do, by stealth and deceit.

Ver. 11.] But I, their sovereign, shall be filled with joy; and so shall all pious men, who preserved their loyalty, and would by no means violate their oath, wherein they stood engaged to me: they shall triumph when my calumniators (2 Sam. xv. 2, 3), and all perfidious persons, shall be so silenced, and they shall not have a word to say for themselves.

PSALM LXIV.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 HEAR my voice, O God, in my prayer: preserve my life from fear of the enemy.

2 Hide me from the secret counsel of the wicked; from the insurrection of the workers of iniquity:

3 Who whet their tongue like a sword, and

PSALM LXIV.

ARGUMENT.—The enemy of whom David here complains, it is most probable, was Saul: whose hatred to him was very much heightened, and made more malignant, by the calumnies and false stories which were told of him by some ill men in his court: who were always plotting and contriving in their cabals (as we speak), how to compass his destruction (and found no means more effectual for that end than lies and calumnies); though, in truth, they were all that time (as he foretold) devising their own. In memory of which he delivered this Psalm, together with several other (which he made on the same subject), to the master of music, to be sung in the tabernacle.

Ver. 1.] O God, the governor of all the world, who seest the danger I am in by a dreadful enemy; be thou my friend, I humbly beseech thee; and preserve band their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words:

4 That they may shoot in secret at the perfect: suddenly do they shoot at him, and fear not.

5 They encourage themselves in an evil matter: they commune of laying snares privily; they say, Who shall see them?

6 They search out iniquities; they accomplish a diligent search: both the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart, is deep.

the life of thy persecuted servant, who by earnest prayer commends himself unto thy custody.

Ver. 2.] Protect me from the secret plots, and the open violence of those wicked men who make a great stir against me, and unjustly seek my ruin.

Ver. 3.] Their tongue is their principal weapon; which they have in readiness (as soldiers have their swords) upon all occasions, to wound my reputation: calumnies, and slanders, like so many poisoned arrows, are ever at their tongues' end:

Ver. 4.] Which, when they are in private with Saul, they shoot at me; who never did him or them any wrong; but am perfectly guiltless of that which they charge me withal: yet I find these false accusations, which I never expected, spread abroad by those who have no fear of God to restrain them from doing mischief to their innocent neighbours.

Ver. 5.] They use their utmost endeavours to make their calumnies be believed, and confirm one another in their resolved prosecution of their wicked designs: which they consult how to effect, though it be by falsehood and treachery, or by wiles and crafty practices, so subtly contrived, that nobody, they hope, shall be able to discover them.

Ver. 6.] They employ all their wit and diligence in 7 But God shall shoot at them with an arrow: suddenly shall they be wounded.

8 So they shall make their own tongue to fall upon themselves: all that see them shall flee away.

9 And all men shall fear, and shall declare the work of God; for they shall wisely consider of his doing.

10 The righteous shall be glad in the Lord, and shall trust in him; and all the upright in heart shall glory.

these wicked devices: and leave nothing unattempted to produce the most exquisite and absolute piece of villany than can be invented by men of the deepest reach and policy.

Ver. 7.] But all to no purpose; for, when they little think of it, they and all their projects shall perish, by a sudden stroke of the divine vengeance.

Ver. 8.] Their slanders shall reflect upon themselves; and their wicked counsels prove so pernicious to those that gave them, that they shall be forsaken even of their friends; and they that were wont to visit them, shall fly away from them.

Ver. 9.] And all other men shall be afraid to imitate them; not being able to deny the just vengeance of God, the judge of all, upon them: for they shall be convinced that it was not by chance, but by his counsel, that they were not only defeated, but ensnared in their own contrivances.

Ver. 10.] Which shall both fill my heart, whom they unjustly maligned, with such joy in the Lord, as shall encourage me to commit myself unto him for ever in well-doing; and make all true lovers of piety triumph in the victory, which integrity and simplicity have gotten over falsehood and subtily.

PSALM LXV.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm and Song of David.

1 PRAISE waiteth for thee, O God, in Sion: and unto thee shall the vow be performed.

2 O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come.

PSALM LXV.

ARGUMENT.—The latter part of this excellent Hymn of Praise (as the title calls it; see more, Ps. lxxvii.) hath moved some judicious interpreters to think, that it was delivered by David to the master of the music after some great drought; which had brought, or threatened to bring, a dearth upon the land: and there are those who imagine it relates to the three years' famine after the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. xxi.), which being removed by plentiful showers of rain, the Psalmist gives God public thanks in this Hymn for sending them seasonably to his people; whom he had formerly obliged by several other great benefits, as he doth all other nations; which David here first of all commemorates.

I can find nothing more probable than this. For as to the title which we find in the Vulgar Latin, out of some Greek copies, that it is a Psalm sung by Jeremy and Ezekiel, with the people of the captivity, when they were about to go into, or come out of it (I know not well which they mean); there is no sense that I can see to be made of it. For Jeremiah was not carried captive, as Theodoret observes, but left at liberty to go whither he pleased; and Ezekiel was gone long before: nor are there any such words, as the same Theodoret notes, to be found either in the Hebrew, or in other interpreters; no, not in the LXX. which was in the Hexaplaus. But somebody, who neither attended to the sense of the Psalm (as he passes his censure), nor understood the history, added this inscription. Yet he himself thinks it was spoken by them in captivity, when, far from their own land, they longed to sing God's praises; but could not do it publicly in Babylon; and therefore prayed God, in the words of this Hymn, to turn their captivity, and to bring them again to Zion; which I know not how to contradict: but seeing no proof of it, I shall not meddle with that sense in my paraphrase.

Ver. 1.] It becomes us, O God, above all other people, to praise thee in thy sanctuary (though we cannot worthily express, but must rather silently adore, thy incomparable excellences), and to pay the vows which we made unto thee in the time of our distress.

Ver. 2.] And more especially to magnify thy clemency in hearing my prayer (2 Sam. xxi. 1), which may invite all mankind, even those that are most miserable, to make their addresses unto thee.

3 Iniquities prevail against me: as for our transgressions, thou shalt purge them away.

4 Blessed is the man whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts: we shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house, even of thy holy temple.

5 By terrible things in righteousness wilt thou answer us, O God of our salvation; who art the confidence of all the ends of the earth, and of them that are afar off upon the sea:

6 Which by his strength setteth fast the mountains; being girded with power:

7 Which stilleth the noise of the seas, the noise of their waves, and the tumult of the people.

8 They also that dwell in the uttermost parts are afraid at thy tokens: thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice.

9 Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it: thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God, which is full of water: thou preparest them corn, when thou hast so provided for it.

10 Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly: thou settlest the furrows thereof: thou makest it soft with showers: thou blessest the springing thereof.

11 Thou crownest the year with thy goodness; and thy paths drop fatness.

12 They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness: and the little hills rejoice on every side.

13 The pastures are clothed with flocks; the valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy, they also sing.

Ver. 3.] Nor need their sins discourage them; for thou hadst matter enough of that kind against me to have hindered the prevalency of my prayer, if thou hadst charged my iniquities upon me: but thou hast been graciously pleased to forgive not only me, but all thy people their transgressions, whereby they have provoked thee.

Ver. 4.] O how happy is the condition of a priest, or a Levite, whom thou hast chosen to minister before thee, and hath the privilege to be continually employed in thy service! Though we cannot all be so blessed, yet, such is thy goodness, we enjoy most sweet refreshments in thy house, when we offer our prayers and praises to thee, and taste of the sacrifices of thanksgiving which we there present for the benefits we have received from thee.

Ver. 5.] Who hast done wonderful and astonishing things for us out of thy mere mercy and bounty, when in our necessity we implored thy help, O God; who not only marvellously savest and deliverest us in this nation from destruction, but art the support and safeguard of all mankind in the remotest parts of the earth or islands of the sea.

Ver. 6.] For God's power, which is ready at all times to execute his pleasure, is not inferior to his mercy; but hath settled the mountains in their places, and sustains their vast weight from sinking down into the earth.

Ver. 7.] Against which, when the sea beats tempestuously, he composes and silences its swelling and roaring waves: as he doth with the same ease the rage and fury of the people, when by the breath of unquiet seditious spirits they rise up tumultuously, and break out into rebellion.

Ver. 8.] The most barbarous people who live in the remotest corners of the earth, behold with wonder and amazement the heavenly bodies, which thou hast appointed for sign and tokens (Gen. i. 14); by the rising of the sun, the moon, and stars in the morning and evening, thou fillest them with joy as well as admiration.

Ver. 9.] But we are more particularly bound unto thee, whose land, which was lately visited with drought, thou hast now refreshed and enriched with such liberal showers out of the clouds (which like a vast river are never exhausted), as have made it exceeding fruitful; for from thence thou hast ordained it should be constantly replenished.

Ver. 10.] And accordingly, when the ground is ploughed up, thou sendest abundance of rain upon its ridges, which settle the clods, and make them sink down upon the seed that is newly sown: and when the ground grows too hard, and hinders its sprouting forth, thou softenest and openest it with gentle showers, which bring up the blade; and that thy blessing makes to prosper and thrive till it grow up into corn.

Ver. 11.] Thus thy goodness hath made this a most plentiful year, and magnificently adorned it with variety of fruits: for thy clouds have wheeled about, and everywhere distilled a fattening juice into the earth.

Ver. 12.] They have made green pastures even in desolate places; and the little hills, which before looked ruefully, appear now most beautiful; and have, as it were, put on the garments of joy and gladness.

Ver. 13.] The pastures, which were bare before, are clothed now with flocks, as they are with grass; the fields also are so covered with corn, that the face of the earth cannot be seen: they keep a kind of festival, which hath filled us all with a universal mirth, and made us triumph in thy goodness.

PSALM LXVI.

To the chief Musician. A Song or Psalm.

1 MAKE a joyful noise unto God, all ye lands:

2 Sing forth the honour of his name: make his praise glorious.

PSALM LXVI.

ARGUMENT.—The Vulgar Latin here again (so little trust is to be given to it) hath an inscription, which, as Theodoret witnesses, is not to be found in other interpreters, no more than in the Hebrew; no, not in the Septuagint translation, which was in the famous Hexaplus. Nor can any good reason be given why they call it A Song-psalm concerning the Resurrection; unless thereby we understand the resurrection of the dry bones, of which Ezekiel prophesied, ch. xxxvii. which was the bringing the 3 Say unto God, How terrible art thou in thy works! through the greatness of thy power shall thine enemies submit themselves unto thee.

4 All the earth shall worship thee, and shall sing unto thee; they shall sing to thy name. Selah.

5 Come and see the works of God: he is terrible in his doing toward the children of men.

people in Babylon, where they seem to be buried, to their own land again, ver. 12. And so Theodoret himself takes it for a Psalm which David, by a prophetic spirit, composed for the people in captivity, not praying for their return (as he fancies they do in the Psalm foregoing), but upon their way home, and praising God for their liberty.

Certain it is this Psalm was made after a very remarkable deliverance from some sore calamity under which the nation had groaned. And it not being said by whom it was penned, nor who the enemies were that oppressed them, it is generally thought not to be David's, whose name it doth not bear in the title, as the foregoing does; but to have been made by some holy man after, or in their return from the forementioned captivity. But he that collected the Psalms contained in this second book, though he did not find David's name in the front of it, yet took him I believe to be the author both of this and of the next Psalm, as well as of the foregoing: otherwise he would not have placed them between those on both sides which certainly belong to him, when he intended, it appears by the conclusion of this book (lxxii. 20), to put together all the prayers that he had then met withal of David's. He that considers also that the seventy-first and seventy-second Psalms have not David's name in the title, and yet are generally thought to be of his composing, will not take the want of the usual inscription here to be a sufficient argument why we should seek for some other author of this Psalm.

Which was penned, I judge, after God had advanced David to the throne, and peaceably settled him in his kingdom. Till which time they had been in a very unsettled condition, not only during the rule of the judges (when, as he speaks here, ver. 12, many of their neighbours rode over their heads, or, as we now speak, domineered over them as they pleased), but also in the reign of Saul, when the Philistines were so powerful that the Israelites durst not look them in the face, but hid themselves in caves and thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits (1 Sam. xiii. 6). For they had disarmed them, so that when they came to fight, there was not a man had a sword or a spear but only Saul and Jonathan (ver. 22). And though they prevailed over the Philistines afterward in several battles (ch. xiv. xvii.), yet they grew so strong again, that they penetrated into the country as far as mount Gilboa, where Saul and his sons were slain (ch. xxxi.); and the people thereupon were so dismayed, that they about Jordan forsook their cities, and the Philistines came and dwelt in them (ver. 7). To these things the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth verses of this Psalm may have respect. And then the freeing the country from that oppression, and forcing those insolent enemies to submit to David (ver. 3, where there is the same expression in substance with that which he uses Ps. xviii. 45, after he had overcome all his enemies), may be the thing for which he here gives praise to God: exciting all the country to join with him in blessing

6 He turned the sea into dry land: they went through the flood on foot: there did we rejoice in him.

7 He ruleth by his power for ever; his eyes behold the nations: let not the rebellious exalt themselves. Selah.

8 O bless our God, ye people, and make the voice of his praise to be heard:

his divine majesty, not only for this, but for former deliverances he had vouchsafed to that nation. Which he would have acknowledged with their most cheerful thanksgiving (which may be the meaning of a Song-psalm, see lxxvii.), especially in the public service of God at the tabernacle. Into which he promises to go, ver. 13, 14 (a sign the Psalm was not made at their coming out of Babylon, when there was no house to go unto) and pay his vows, which he had made before these victories. But at their return from Babylon it is likely they might use this Psalm, and apply it to that purpose, going to the place where the house of God formerly stood.

Ver. 1.] Let all the people of this land shout aloud, and triumph in the liberty which God hath restored unto us.

Ver. 2.] Sing psalms in honour of his most glorious majesty, and do not merely praise him, but do it in the most splendid manner; and place your principal glory in this, that you have the honour to sing his praises.

Ver. 3.] Saying, O God, thy stupendous works fill us with wonder and amazement, but we are not able to express the greatness of them: they strike terror into the hearts of thy enemies, who, feeling the dreadful effects of thy power, dare not oppose thee any longer, but, dissembling their hostility, shall come and offer thee their service (2 Sam. viii. 1).

Ver. 4.] For which be thou adored by all the inhabitants of this country: let them all sing joyful hymns unto thee; let them sing the praise of thy power, which hath thus daunted our enemies, and delivered us.

Ver. 5.] Approach, I beseech you, and attentively consider what our God hath done, and then I need not exhort you to praise his name: for the works and counsels of his providence over all mankind are very astonishing.

Ver. 6.] Especially over us, for whose fathers, to their unspeakable joy (Exod. xv.), he opened a passage through the Red sea, when they were so shut up between that before, and the army of Pharaoh behind, that there was no way left for their escape (Exod. xiv. 16). And also led them dryshod through the river Jordan, when it was so full of water that it overflowed its banks (Josh. iii. 15—17), which created a new joy in the hearts of our nation.

Ver. 7.] And it ought to continue still in succeeding ages, since the same divine power which did those wonders governs the world throughout all generations: he sees and observes the motions of all nations, who may learn, by the Egyptians and Canaanites, that they who condemn his authority in vain endeavour to exalt themselves to greater eminence, for they shall certainly be abased.

Ver. 8.] We have reason to say that he is our God, and takes care of us, as well as of those before us; and therefore let all the tribes of Israel agree together to bless him and proclaim his praises; that it may be for ever known how good he is, and how grateful they are.

9 Which holdeth our soul in life, and suffereth not our feet to be moved.

10 For thou, O God, hast proved us: thou hast tried us, as silver is tried.

11 Thou broughtest us into the net; thou laidst affliction upon our loins.

12 Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads; we went through fire and through water: but thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place.

13 I will go into thy house with burnt offerings: I will pay thee my vows, 14 Which my lips have uttered, and my mouth hath spoken, when I was in trouble.

Ver. 9.] For he hath wonderfully preserved us from perishing in our affliction: and not suffered our enemies to pursue their advantages to our utter overthrow and ruin.

Ver. 10.] Thou hast proved our constancy, indeed, O God, by most severe chastisements; and as a refiner tries his silver by throwing it into the fire, so thou hast dealt with us as well as with our forefathers, whose labours in the iron furnace of Egypt we have been forced to imitate under our oppressors.

Ver. 11.] Our enemies have pursued us, and brought us (like to wild beasts taken by the hunter) into most grievous straits (1 Sam. xiii. 6). They have used us like beasts of burden, and laid sore loads upon us, which they have fast bound upon our backs (ver. 19, 20).

Ver. 12.] Thou hast made us slaves to the vilest of men, who exercise the most insolent tyranny over us: we have endured variety of the sorest miseries; and yet, such is thy goodness, thou hast carried us through them all; and at last brought us into a state of perfect liberty, ease, and plenteous prosperity.

Ver. 13.] I will go therefore into thy house, and give a good example to all my people: for I will not present myself before thee with empty praises; but acknowledge thy benefits with burnt-offerings, and faithfully discharge the vows wherein I stand engaged.

Ver. 14.] Which I was not more forward to make 15 I will offer unto thee burnt sacrifices of fatnings, with the incense of rams; I will offer bullocks with goats. Selah.

16 Come and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul.

17 I cried unto him with my mouth, and he was extolled with my tongue.

18 If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me:

19 But verily God hath heard me; he hath attended to the voice of my prayer.

20 Blessed be God, which hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me.

with open mouth when I was in distress, than I will be to perform with all solemnity now that thou hast graciously delivered me out of it.

Ver. 15.] For as I will not come empty into thy house, so I will not bring thee a niggardly present; but offer sacrifices of all sorts, and the best and choicest in every kind.

Ver. 16.] And together therewith I will make a thankful commemoration of his loving-kindness (which is the most acceptable sacrifice), and let all pious men know (O that they would come and hearken to me while I relate!) how good God hath been unto me.

Ver. 17.] For the ardent prayers which I made unto him in a very low condition, are now turned into the highest praises of his powerful goodness, whereby I am advanced unto a throne.

Ver. 18.] Which hath brought along with it a testimony of my sincerity, far more valuable than my kingdom: for if I had been guilty of any such crimes, or entertained so much as a thought of them, as my enemies charged me withal, the Lord, who hates iniquity, would have denied me my request.

Ver. 19.] Which now sure you all see he hath graciously granted; and thereby cleared my innocence from all the aspersions that were cast upon me.

Ver. 20.] To the praise of God's infinite goodness be it spoken (not of my own righteousness), who did not reject my prayer, but vouchsafed me the mercy which I desired.

PSALM LXVII.

To the chief Musician upon Neginoth. A Psalm or Song.

1 God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us. Selah.

2 That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations.

PSALM LXVII.

ARGUMENT.—This excellent Psalm, all agree, hath the same author with the former; which I have made it probable (see Ps. lxxvi.) was composed by David; who, being settled in his throne after miserable confusions, and having brought the ark to Jerusalem, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings (as he promised in the Psalm foregoing, ver. 15), blessed the people in the name of the Lord of hosts (2 Sam. vi. 17, 18); pronounced, that is, this Psalm (as I conjecture), wherein he manifestly imitates that form of blessing which the priests were appointed to use on solemn occasions (as you may read Numb. vi. 23—25); beseeching God to continue his favour to them, and to make them such an example of his loving-kindness, that it might invite all nations to whom the fame of it should come, to submit themselves unto his government.

It is no argument against this, to say that he doth not bless them here in the name of the Lord, which is used in the blessing which Moses taught them. For it is certain he alludes, in the blessing of the next Psalm, to the form of prayer used at the setting forward of the ark (Numb. x. 35), and yet there also he uses the word Elohim instead of Jehovah, as he doth in this Psalm; which he delivered afterward to the master of music, to be sung as the fourth Psalm.

But what difference there is between a Song-psalm and a Psalm-song (in which the titles of the fifty-fifth and of this and the next differ from the foregoing, as the title of the thirtieth doth from the forty-eighth), I am not able certainly to resolve. For some think that a Psalm-song, or Psalm of a Song, began with voices, the musical instruments following after; and a Song-psalm, or Song of a Psalm, began with instruments, the voices follow-

3 Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee.

4 O let the nations be glad and sing for joy: for thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth. Selah.

5 Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee.

6 Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us.

7 God shall bless us; and all the ends of the earth shall fear him.

ing after: others give a quite contrary account; for taking a Psalm to be properly the sound of instruments (whereof there were six or seven sorts), and a Song to be the voice of singers, they will have a Psalm-song to be that where, the sound of instruments preceding, the singing voices followed; and a Song-psalm, that where, the voices preceding, the instrumental music followed. But Kimchi ingeniously confesses, in his preface to the book of Psalms, that their nation can give no account of such-like things which we meet with in the title of the Psalms.

Ver. 1.] Be gracious unto us, O God, and complete the happiness which thy almighty goodness hath begun to bestow upon us; let us not fall again into those dismal calamities out of which thou hast delivered us, but declare thou lovest us, by continuing thy gracious presence with us.

Ver. 2.] That the fame of thy wonderful providence over us, and of the deliverances thou workest for us, being spread not only here in this country, but throughout all other nations, they may be moved thereby to acknowledge and worship thee as the only God.

Ver. 3.] O that we might see that happy day; O that the people would confess and praise thee, O God; that all the people every where, with one consent, would confess and praise thee.

Ver. 4.] O that the nations were so sensible what a happiness it is to be under thy care, that they might rejoice and shout for joy, to know that thou art the governor of the world! who by thy power oppressest none, but distributest equal justice unto all; and graciously providest for the welfare of those who become thy subjects, and commit themselves unto thy conduct.

Ver. 5.] We cannot often enough wish to see them so happy; but must again and again repeat our desires that the people would confess thee, O God, to be the Lord of all: that all the people every where would with one consent celebrate thee with their praises, and confess that thou alone canst make them happy.

Ver. 6.] As thou dost us, whose land of late hath been so exceeding fruitful (2 Sam. vi. 19), that we may look upon it as an earnest of future blessings, which may it please our good God, whose people we are by peculiar covenant, to multiply upon us.

Ver. 7.] With this prayer let us conclude as we began, that God would be pleased still to pour down his benefits upon us: that so the people who live in the remotest parts of the earth may all devoutly worship and serve him.

PSALM LXVIII.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm or Song of David.

1 LET God arise, let his enemies be scattered: let them also that hate him flee before him.

PSALM LXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—David having brought the ark to Jerusalem with a great deal of joy and triumph (2 Sam. vi.), after it had long been neglected in the reign of Saul (1 Chron. xiii. 3), which was one cause, it is like, that he had no better success against his foreign enemies; hoped God would be more propitious to him, according to the prayer he had made in the foregoing Psalm. For now he had (to repair that negligence of Saul) not only brought the ark near to his own palace, in the chief city of the kingdom, but prepared a noble place for its reception (2 Sam. vi. 16; 2 Chron. I. 4), which it had been a long time without. For ever since its falling into the hands of the Philistines (1 Sam. iv. 11), it had been separated from the tabernacle of the congregation built for it by Moses, which was God's habitation or dwelling-place; and after the destruction of Shiloh was removed to Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 1), and from thence, after Doeg had slain the priests, to Gibeon, where it remained till the building of Solomon's temple. All which time, it is manifest, it had no ark of God's presence in it, for that was in Kirjath-jearim (1 Sam. vii. 1), from whence David fetched it (1 Chron. xiii. 5) to mount Zion; where he having made a tabernacle for its entertainment, the Lord God might be said (as we render it, ver. 18 of this Psalm) to dwell among them, with an intention not to remove from thence (as the ark had done before) to any other mountain (ver. 16). And, indeed, here he dwelt more magnificently than he had done before, and was more royally attended and solemnly served; David appointing, a little before he died (as he had begun to do before, 1 Chron. xvi.) the priests and Levites, in their courses, constantly to wait upon him, with songs and instruments of music; and settling all other officers belonging to a house, and suitable to the greatness of the majesty that dwelt there (1 Chron. xiii.—xxvi.).

Which honour being done to God, he hoped, as I said, that God would favour him in his enterprises better than he had done Saul, who took care of no such matters. And being shortly to engage some potent enemies (2 Sam. viii.), he earnestly begs the presence of God with him (of which the ark was a token) in this excellent Psalm. And he begs in that very form of words (ver. 1) which Moses had directed the priests to use every time that they took up the ark to set forward in their march to the land of Canaan (Numb. x. 35). Upon which occasion he calls to mind what wonders God had done for them, in leading them by the ark of his joyce before God: yea, let them exceedingly rejoice.

4 Sing unto God, sing praises to his name: extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name JAH, and rejoice before him.

5 A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation.

6 God setteth the solitary in families: he bringeth out those that are bound with chains: but the rebellious dwell in a dry land.

7 O God, when thou wentest forth before thy people, when thou didst march through the wilderness; Selah:

8 The earth shook, the heavens also dropped in the presence of God: even Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God, the God of Israel.

9 Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain, whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance, when it was weary.

10 Thy congregation hath dwelt therein: thou, O God, hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor.

11 The LORD gave the word: great was the company of those that published it.

12 Kings of armies did flee apace: and she that tarried at home divided the spoil.

13 Though ye have lien among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.

14 When the Almighty scattered kings in it, it was white as snow in Salmon.

presence through the wilderness into their good land. Where he hoped he would establish and settle his people, now that he had in so pompous and triumphant a manner ascended into the high hill of Zion (out of which David had expelled the Jebusites, 2 Sam. v. 6), and by his special direction and conduct already given them such great victories over the Philistines, their mortal enemies (2 Sam. v. 19, 23), that it was an emblem of the far more glorious ascension of the Lord Christ, after he had overcome death itself, the last and greatest enemy of mankind, into the highest heavens. Of the title of the Psalm, see lxxvii.

Ver. 1.] O that God, who by his powerful presence conducted his people, in spite of all opposers, into this land (Numb. x. 35), would now graciously appear, to disperse and put to flight those numerous armies which, out of mere hatred to him, come to dispossess us of it.

Ver. 2.] They are no more able to stand before him, than the smoke (whatsoever show it makes) is to stand before the wind: or the wax (how firm soever it seem) before the fire; but shall be dispelled, and melt away, like those feeble things: just so shall those wicked people perish, if God will be pleased to manifest himself to be among us.

Ver. 3.] Which shall fill the hearts of all his faithful servants with joy and gladness: they shall leap for joy before him (as I lately did when I brought up the ark unto mount Zion, 2 Sam. vi. 11, 16), and be so extraordinarily transported, that they shall not find words enough to express the joy they have in his gracious presence with them.

Ver. 4.] O begin your cheerful hymns unto his majesty; sing the praise of his powerful goodness, and of all the rest of his glorious attributes, whereby he is known to you: magnify him, and prepare a triumphal pomp for him, who turns about even the highest heavens, and rules them at his pleasure: O rejoice exceedingly before him, who hath plainly shown, by what he hath lately done, that he is the eternal, unchangeable God, who faithfully keeps his promises for ever.

Ver. 5.] The poorest and meanest persons on earth need not doubt of his patronage; for though he be higher than the highest heavens, yet he hath taken up his dwelling among us; that the fatherless and widows, when they have no helper, may fly unto his fatherly care, and appeal to him as their righteous judge to redress the wrongs that are done unto them.

Ver. 6.] God provides for those who are utterly destitute, and settles them in comfortable habitations: he unties the chains of captives, and gives them a happy deliverance; but brings rebellious oppressors into that want and scarcity whereunto they have reduced others.

Ver. 7.] A famous instance of which we saw at our coming out of Egypt; when thou, O God, wentest before thy people, night and day, in a pillar of cloud and fire (Exod. xiii. 21), and conductedst them, as their captain, through a barren and dangerous wilderness.

Ver. 8.] The earth trembled, yea, the heavens dissolved into thunder, lightning, and rain (Exod. xix. 16), when the divine majesty descended upon mount Sinai: the mountain itself quaked (ver. 18), before his glorious majesty, who is still present with his people Israel.

Ver. 9.] For whom, O God, thou didst miraculously provide, by sending them liberal showers in those dry and desert places; and, having chosen them for thy own peculiar people, didst rain down bread from heaven (Exod. xvi. 4), to refresh and strengthen them when they were faint and weary.

Ver. 10.] A vast congregation of people, with their flocks and their herds, found a convenient habitation in that wilderness, by thy bounty, O God: who didst furnish those who were in danger to starve, with all things necessary for them.

Ver. 11.] Yea, the Lord made them so victorious over all those who opposed them, that they still returned from the battle with songs of triumph in their mouths; and a great army of women met them (according to the custom, Exod. xv. 23, &c.), to join with them in publishing his praises; saying,

Ver. 12.] The kings and captains of those hosts who thought to have destroyed us were put to flight (Exod. xvii.; Numb. xxi. 2, 3, &c.). They fled away in haste, and left their spoil behind them, to be divided among us, that were too weak to go into the field, Numb. xxxi. 8, 11; Judg. viii. 21, 26).

Ver. 13.] But we welcome home our victorious countrymen with this encouragement, that though you have endured great hardships in Egypt, where you looked not like valiant soldiers, but rather like vile scullions besmudged among kettles and pots, you shall hereafter appear most beautiful and splendid, and the wings of your armies shall shine like those of a dove, when they glisten as if they were covered with silver and gold.

Ver. 14.] And their word was fulfilled at our entrance into Canaan; when, by scattering all their kings the Almighty appeared most illustrious at Salmon, and gave us possession of the country on this side Jordan.

16 Why leap ye, ye high hills? this is the hill which God desireth to dwell in; yea, the LORD will dwell in it for ever.

17 The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the LORD is among them, as in Sinai, in the holy place.

18 Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive: thou hast received gifts for many; yea, for the rebellious also, that the LORD God might dwell among them.

19 Blessed be the LORD, who daily loadeth us with benefits, even the God of our salvation. Selah.

20 He that is our God is the God of salvation; and unto God the LORD belong the issues from death.

21 But God shall wound the head of his enemies, and the hairy scalp of such an one as goeth on still in his trespasses.

22 The LORD said, I will bring again from Bashan, I will bring my people again from the depths of the sea:

23 That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs in the same.

24 They have seen thy goings, O God; even the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary.

25 The singers went before, the players on instruments followed after; among them were the damsels playing with timbrels.

26 Bless ye God in the congregations, even the LORD, from the fountain of Israel.

27 There is little Benjamin with their ruler, the princes of Judah and their council, the princes of Zebulun, and the princes of Naphtali.

28 Thy God hath commanded thy strength: strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us.

29 Because of thy temple at Jerusalem shall kings bring presents unto thee.

30 Rebuke the company of spearmen, the multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people,

Ver. 15.] As, on the other side of it, he subdued the country of Og king of Bashan (Numb. xxi. 33, &c.), which hill became the hill of God: the hill with so many fertile risings, the famous hill of Bashan, became part of his inheritance.

Ver. 16.] But do not grow proud of this, ye lofty mountains: for neither the height of Salmon, nor of Bashan, shall invite him there to make his habitation: Zion is the hill which he hath chosen to honour with that favour; yea, there the Lord hath resolved to fix his tabernacle, and never (till the Messiah come) to remove to any other.

Ver. 17.] Nor let the heathen brag of the multitude of their chariots, wherein consists their strength; for in Zion there are ten thousand times more innumerable hosts of angels attending upon the divine majesty; who is with them there, as he was upon mount Sinai, which now is in the sanctuary.

Ver. 18.] Thou hast declared as much, O God: who art gone up thither, and hast highly exalted thyself by illustrious victories: which through their invisible ministry thou hast given us over our enemies (as the Messiah, who shall be thy sanctuary, will do far more magnificently, when, after the conquest of death, &c. he shall ascend in a bright chariot, Acts i. 9, attended with the heavenly hosts, into the highest heavens, to be exalted at thy right hand), whom by thy aid, we have carried away captive, and their spoils together with them, to be distributed among thy people (an emblem of the rich gifts the Messiah shall bestow upon us, and distribute among us, after his ascension); yea, the rebellious opposers of thee in other nations shall become proselytes to dwell with thee, O Lord God, and worship at thy sanctuary (as the gentile world shall by that effusion of divine gifts submit themselves to the Messiah, the Lord God of all the world).

Ver. 19.] Blessed be the Lord, who day by day exercises as tender and careful a providence over us, as a mother over her children (Isa. xlii. 3), that mighty God be blessed, to whom we owe all our deliverances.

Ver. 20.] And they are very great and very many, which it is not in the power of any other god to bestow, but of him alone that dwells in Zion; who as the author of all men's being, and their supreme Lord and governor, disposes of their lives, and assigns them what passages he pleases out of the world.

Ver. 21.] And certainly God, the righteous judge, will now break in pieces all those enemies that lift up their heads so high, in hope to destroy us; their fierce captain (2 Sam. viii. 3), whose shaggy hair makes him look very terribly, shall not escape, if he go on still presumptuously to offend thee.

Ver. 22.] Thus the Lord hath determined within himself, saying, I will renew the wonders I wrought in former times; and make my people as victorious over all these mighty armies, as they were over Og the king of Bashan (Numb. xxi.), and over Pharaoh, when they marched through the Red Sea (Exod. xv.).

Ver. 23.] The victory shall be so complete, and such a slaughter made, that thou mayest wade, and thy dogs put their tongues, in the blood that shall flow from those enemies, and from him that leads them.

Ver. 24.] For thy people, O God, have seen to their joy, and thy enemies to their terror, what a solemn entrance thou madest (by the ark of thy presence), with what pomp thou, my mighty God, and my king, wast brought into the sanctuary (2 Sam. vi. 13. 15. 16).

Ver. 25.] Part of the Levites went singing before, and the rest with musical instruments followed after (1 Chron. xv. 16. 28), and, to complete the melody, the damsels playing with timbrels came between them both.

Ver. 26.] And as they went along, they sang this song; O bless your good God, in all your assemblies: bless the Lord, all ye that are the offspring of Israel.

Ver. 27.] Who were universally assembled to accompany that pomp (1 Chron. xiii. 5, xv. 3); for not only the nearest tribes were there, viz. Benjamin, little indeed in number (Judg. xxi. 6), but from whom the first king of Israel came; and the princes of the tribe of Judah, the great support and prop of the kingdom; but the princes also of those which were most remote, as Zebulun and Naphtali, came to attend at that solemnity.

Ver. 28.] This happy union, thy God, O Israel, hath brought about; and thereby made thee strong and formidable to thy enemies: and may it please thee, O God, to continue and confirm it; for as it is begun, so it must be perfected by thee alone.

Ver. 29.] Pour down thy blessings upon Jerusalem out of thy sanctuary, (1 Sam. i. 9. iii. 3), which now thou hast settled there; and so shall heathen kings bring presents, (2 Sam. viii. 9—11), in token of their subjection to thee.

till every one submit himself with pieces of silver: scatter thou the people that delight in war.

31 Princes shall come out of Egypt; Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God.

32 Sing unto God, ye kingdoms of the earth; O sing praises unto the Lord; Selah:

33 To him that rideth upon the heavens of heavens, which were of old; lo, he doth send out his voice, and that a mighty voice.

34 Ascribe ye strength unto God: his excellency is over Israel, and his strength is in the clouds.

35 O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places: the God of Israel is he that giveth strength and power unto his people. Blessed be God.

Ver. 30.] Destroy that fierce prince (2 Sam. viii. 3), who like a wild beast of the forest comes against us; with a great number of captains as furious as bulls; and of soldiers as insolent as young heifers: who prances in arms plated with silver, and, unprovoked by us, makes war upon us merely to satisfy his vain ambition, or desire of wealth: scatter, good Lord, all such people as have no better reason for the blood they delight to shed.

Ver. 31.] Which shall invite even the Egyptians to send princely ambassadors to Jerusalem: and the neighbouring countries also (1 Kings iv. 21), shall make haste to stretch out their hands unto the divine majesty, in oblations and prayers (which the most idolatrous nations in the world shall, in abundance, offer unto the Lord Christ, when he reigns).

Ver. 32.] Nothing shall conduce so much to their happiness: and therefore, O ye kingdoms of the earth both far and near, sing joyful songs unto God: set forth the praises of the great Lord of all the world with hymns and psalms.

Ver. 33.] Whose empire is the most ancient of all other, and extends beyond the highest heavens; hearken when it thunders, and consider how terrible his majesty is; for that is his voice, which makes the mightiest men on earth to tremble.

Ver. 34.] I would advise you all to acknowledge his divine power, by hearty submission to him; whose care over Israel as plainly appears in many magnificent works, as thunder declares his strength in the clouds.

Ver. 35.] O God, thy dreadful majesty is to be most humbly adored, who striketh terror into thy enemies, both out of thy sanctuary here in Zion, and out of thy sanctuary in heaven: but art most gracious to thy people, whom, as thy peculiar portion, thou enduedst with mighty strength and invincible courage. Blessed be God for his goodness to us.

PSALM LXIX.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim. A Psalm of David.

1 SAVE me, O God; for the waters are come in unto my soul.

2 I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing; I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow me.

3 I am weary of my crying: my throat is

PSALM LXIX.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, the title assures us, was composed by David; and the matter of it sufficiently declares, that he was in extreme great danger when it was penned. I should suppose it might have been about that time, when he concluded, that he should one day perish by the hand of Saul (1 Sam. xxvii. 1), were it not for what we read here, ver. 35 of this Psalm, concerning God's love to Zion: which was not then in the possession of the Israelites. And therefore it must rather be indited when he was persecuted by his rebellious son Absalom: who pressed him so sorely, and reduced him to such lamentable straits, that, as he feared he should never be able to extricate himself; so he could find no words high enough to express the agonies into which they cast him. But this is not so considerable a difficulty, as to be sufficient to incline those who read the whole Psalm seriously, to conclude that it hath no reference to Saul's persecution: unto which some passages in it seem more plainly to belong than to the other. And therefore I suppose he only reviewed it (see Ps. lxx.), and added the thirty-fifth verse, in the rebellion of Absalom: which was likewise so grievous and dangerous, that he could find no words fitter to represent his sad condition, than those he had formerly used in the like distress. And some of the expressions, it is manifest, are such as were not literally fulfilled in him, in either of those afflictions, but in our Saviour Christ; of whom David was a figure; both in his sufferings, and in his advancement after them to a kingdom. There is no mystery, I suppose, in the word Shoshannim (as some of the Jews fancy), but it only denotes that the master of the music was to take care this Psalm should be sung as the forty-fifth: to which I refer you for an account of this word.

Why Theodoret should think this Psalm was made without respect to David, for the Jews in the captivity of Babylon, praying for deliverance out of that servitude, I cannot imagine. But what he adds concerning our Saviour's sufferings, which are here foretold, together with the utter overthrow of the Jewish nation, who were the authors of them, is very considerable. For because, said he, they were so audaciously wicked, as to do that to their benefactor and Saviour, which they had suffered from their spiteful enemies; God the righteous judge condemned them to suffer that themselves, which they prayed might fall on the heads of those enemies.

Ver. 1.] O most mighty God, in whom alone I hope for safety; deliver me, I beseech thee, out of this miserable condition; wherein I am overwhelmed with so many calamities, that my life is in extreme danger, unless thou mercifully preserve it.

Ver. 2.] There is no hope otherways, that I should escape: for I am like a man that sinks deeper and deeper into the mud, and can find no bottom; or that is fallen into the very deepest place in a river; and carried away out of the reach of human help, by the violence of the stream.

Ver. 3.] I have long also implored thy help, with dried: mine eyes fail while I wait for my God.

4 They that hate me without a cause are more than the hairs of mine head: they that would destroy me, being mine enemies wrongfully, are mighty: then I restored that which I took not away.

5 O God, thou knowest my foolishness; and my sins are not hid from thee.

6 Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord God of hosts, be ashamed for my sake: let not those that seek thee be confounded for my sake, O God of Israel.

7 Because for thy sake I have borne reproach; shame hath covered my face.

8 I am become a stranger unto my brethren, and an alien unto my mother's children.

9 For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up; and the reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me.

10 When I wept, and chastened my soul with fasting, that was to my reproach.

most earnest prayers; even till I am tired with my crying: I can now scarce speak a word, nor lift up my eyes towards heaven, from whence, with great intention of mind, I have expected some relief; but cannot yet obtain it of my God, who hath been formerly most gracious to me.

Ver. 4.] No, rather my enemies are grown more formidable, both for their number, which exceeds the hairs of my head, and for their power, which enables them to destroy me: to which they want no will, having conceived an implacable, but unreserved, hatred to me. Who have been so far from provoking their malice, that I am content, rather than quarrel with them, to part with my own right; and make them satisfaction for a wrong that I never did them.

Ver. 5.] O God, the righteous judge, I make my appeal to thee, who knowest the very worst of me: and protest, that whatsoever my mistakes of my wilful sins have been, which cannot escape thy sight, I never did them any injury, nor gave them cause to persecute me.

Ver. 6.] Which will move thee, I hope, to take some compassion on me; for it will extremely dishearten all pious men, if thou sufferest innocence to be thus ruined: for their sakes, as well as for mine, be pleased to relieve me: O let not those that rely alone on thee, O Lord, the mighty God, who commandest all the powers in heaven and earth, hang down their heads for shame, to see me deserted by thee: let not those, O God (who hast engaged thyself unto us by a gracious covenant), that commend themselves to thee in well-doing, be confounded; as they will, if they see me forsaken by thee.

Ver. 7.] For it is upon thy account (merely because I adhere to thee, and will use no unlawful means to right thyself, 1 Sam. xxvi. 10, &c.) that I have thus long suffered so many reproaches and abuses, as have made me extremely contemptible.

Ver. 8.] Not only to those that do not know me, but to my cousins and familiars; nay, to those who lay in the same womb with me: who behave themselves towards me as if I were a perfect stranger; or a man of another country and religion.

Ver. 9.] Whereas thou knowest, it was nothing but ardent zeal for thy honour and service (not any childish ambition) which made me hazard my life for them; and was the first occasion of this hatred they bear me (1 Sam. xviii. 6—8, as it will be of the death of the Messiah, John ii. 17). I could not endure the blasphemies which I heard against thee, but they 11 I made sackcloth also my garment; and I became a proverb to them.

12 They that sit in the gate speak against me; and I was the song of the drunkards.

13 But as for me, my prayer is unto thee, O LORD, in an acceptable time: O God, in the multitude of thy mercy hear me, in the truth of thy salvation.

14 Deliver me out of the mire, and let me not sink: let me be delivered from them that hate me, and out of the deep waters.

15 Let not the waterflood overflow me, neither let the deep swallow me up, and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me.

16 Hear me, O LORD; for thy lovingkindness is good: turn unto me according to the multitude of thy tender mercies.

17 And hide not thy face from thy servant; for I am in trouble: hear me speedily.

moved my indignation (as they will do his, Rom. xv. 3) as much as if they had been against myself (1 Sam. xvii. 10. 26. 45).

Ver. 10.] These things grieved me exceedingly; and it hath cost me many a tear, while I humbled my soul with fasting, to bewail their impiety, and the dishonour that was done thee: but they took occasion from thence only to despise me; and to load me with greater reproaches, either of weakness or of hypocrisy.

Ver. 11.] And still the more sorrowfully I debased myself, wearing sackcloth in token of my heaviness, the more I was scorned and derided; and it was the common saying (when they would express their utmost hatred or contempt of any man), I value him no more than I do David.

Ver. 12.] This is the language even of the grave senators, and judges of the land, who ought in reason rather to have vindicated my innocence (Gen. xxiii. 10. 18. xxxiv. 20; Ruth iv. 1; Prov. xxii. 22), as well as of the idle and dissolute companions, who, in their drunken meetings, make abusive songs and libels on me.

Ver. 13.] While I in the mean time do nothing but only commend myself with the greater earnestness unto thee, O Lord; who, now that I am so despicable, wilt think it, I hope, the fittest time to be favourable to me: hear my prayer, O God, I beseech thee, and thereby magnify thy abundant mercy, and thy faithfulness, in such a seasonable deliverance of me.

Ver. 14.] For I am in extreme great danger of perishing in this distress, unless thou interpose (as I most humbly again beseech thee that thou wilt, ver. 1, 2) for my deliverance: O leave me not in this miserable condition into which I am plunged; but deliver me from my bitter enemies, and all the troubles and difficulties wherein they have involved me.

Ver. 15.] Which are great and many, and extremely dangerous; enough to make me despair of safety, did I not depend on thee; that thou wilt not suffer me to be carried away, overwhelmed, and buried in this heap of calamities which oppress me so sorely, that I am ready to sink under the weight of them.

Ver. 16.] Do not fail my expectation, O Lord, whose loving-kindness, as it is the only comfort I have, so it gives me abundant consolation: for it is prone to pity and relieve those that are distressed; and will incline thee, I hope, to look now favourably upon me, as thou hast done, many and many a time, with most compassionate mercy towards me.

Ver. 17.] Who, as despicable as I am, yet am thy 18 Draw nigh unto my soul, and redeem it: deliver me because of mine enemies.

19 Thou hast known my reproach, and my shame, and my dishonour: mine adversaries are all before thee.

20 Reproach hath broken my heart; and I am full of heaviness: and I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none.

21 They gave me also gall for my meat; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.

22 Let their table become a snare before them; and that which should have been for their welfare, let it become a trap.

23 Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not; and make their loins continually to shake.

24 Pour out thine indignation upon them, and let thy wrathful anger take hold of them.

25 Let their habitation be desolate; and let none dwell in their tents.

servant; and upon that score claim the patronage of my most gracious Lord and Master: O disown me not, especially now that I am in such helpless straits; but rather make the greater haste to relieve me.

Ver. 18.] For nothing less than my life (which is in imminent danger) will satisfy the rage and hatred of my enemies: therefore interpose thy power for my rescue, and let not them have the pleasure (which will make them still more insolent) to see me ruined.

Ver. 19.] Thou art perfectly acquainted with the reproaches, the shameful and contumelious abuses of all sorts, which I have suffered; and must still (without thy seasonable deliverance) endure from my cruel enemies: none of whom, nor of their secret plots, and subtle lies, whereby they seek to defame and undo me, are hidden from thy all-seeing eyes.

Ver. 20.] Which behold, likewise, what an intolerable burden it is to me to be thus loaded with reproaches, and to have no means to clear myself from their false imputations: it even breaks my heart, and I am oppressed with heaviness, looking still for some help to arrive; but alas! I cannot meet with so much as the comfort of any body to condole with me.

Ver. 21.] Instead of that they exasperated my grief; and because I was so miserable, reproached me the more bitterly: just as if, when a man is hungry, one should give him gall to eat; or when he is thirsty, they should give him (as they really will do Christ, John xix.) vinegar to drink.

Ver. 22.] Which barbarous usage shall meet with a suitable vengeance; for they shall have no friends neither: but they that eat of their meat shall betray them, and their prosperity shall prove their ruin (this shall be the recompense of those that abuse the Messiah, as now they do me, Rom. xi. 9).

Ver. 23.] They shall be deprived of all judgment, and not be able to see the evils that are coming on them; or if they do, let them not be able, O Lord, to prevent them; but make their counsels uncertain, and let them have no power to execute any good design for their preservation.

Ver. 24.] Pour out on a sudden so many evils upon them, that they may not be able to escape; but feel they suffer the most dismal effects of thy severest and lasting displeasure against them.

Ver. 25.] Let their most magnificent structures be laid waste; and root them out so entirely, that they may not be a man left to dwell in their poorest cottages (Matt. xxiii. 38; Acts i. 20.)

26 For they persecute him whom thou hast smitten; and they talk to the grief of those whom thou hast wounded.

27 Add iniquity unto their iniquity: and let them not come into thy righteousness.

28 Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and not be written with the righteous.

29 But I am poor and sorrowful: let thy salvation, O God, set me up on high.

30 I will praise the name of God with a song, and will magnify him with thanksgiving.

31 This also shall please the LORD better than an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs.

32 The humble shall see this, and be glad: and your heart shall live that seek God.

33 For the LORD heareth the poor, and despiseth not his prisoners.

34 Let the heaven and earth praise him, the seas, and every thing that moveth therein.

35 For God will save Zion, and will build the

Ver. 26.] For they had no pity upon the miserable; but instead of comforting him, when they saw him afflicted by thee, they took that opportunity to insult over him, and oppress him: nay, made a pastime of his calamity; and added to all his other sufferings, their scoffs and jeers, their lies and calumnies, or at least their uncharitable censures of thee.

Ver. 27.] Let such obstinate offenders be quite deserted by thee; and by thy just judgment be suffered to go on to complete their iniquity, and never obtain any mercy from him.

Ver. 28.] Let them be cut off before their time, in the midst of their jollity; and let them enjoy none of the blessings which thou hast promised to the righteous.

Ver. 29.] But let me, O God, who now am despised and dejected, be graciously delivered by thee, and raised above the contempt or power of such men to depress me.

Ver. 30.] And I will not be unmindful of the benefit, but praise thy power and goodness in joyful hymns; and acknowledge how great they are, in thankful commemorations of them.

Ver. 31.] Which will be, I know, more acceptable sacrifices to the Lord, than if I should bring him a whole ox, when he is young and in his prime, and offer him at his altar.

Ver. 32.] For other pious men, reading in my songs the goodness of the Lord, will be filled with joyful hopes, when they fall into such-like troubles as I am in: they will think they hear me saying to them, Do not despond, but be of good comfort, whosoever you are that seek God, and faithfully depend upon him.

Ver. 33.] For the Lord, you see, doth not fail to relieve the afflicted and helpless men, when they cry unto him, and rely on him alone: but owns them for his servants, when they are no better than slaves; by delivering them from their hard and cruel bondage.

Ver. 34.] Let the whole world therefore join together, to celebrate him with their highest praises: for one tongue is not sufficient to proclaim his most excellent goodness, and to thank him for all his benefits.

Ver. 35.] Which shall be continued towards Zion; for God will preserve it from being destroyed in these tumults: and will repair the ruins of the other cities of Judah; that his people may dwell quietly, and not be disturbed in their possessions.

Ver. 36.] And their posterity also may hereafter dwell securely in Zion ; and offer the continual sacrifice of praise unto him.

PSALM LXX.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

1 MAKE haste, O God, to deliver me ; make haste to help me, O LORD.

2 Let them be ashamed and confounded that seek after my soul : let them be turned backward, and put to confusion, that desire my hurt.

3 Let them be turned back for a reward of their shame that say, Aha, aha.

4 Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee : and let such as love thy salvation say continually, Let God be magnified.

5 But I am poor and needy : make haste unto me, O God : thou art my help and my deliverer ; O LORD, make me not tarrying.

PSALM LXX.

ARGUMENT.—It is easy to determine, whether this Psalm was only separated from the fortieth (whereof, for the main, it is a part), that it might serve those that are in any distress, as a short form recommending themselves and their condition to God ; or that David in some new danger (probably that into which he fell by Absalom's conspiracy, as Theodoret thinks) took a review of what he had there said, and, with some small alterations, composed this as a distinct prayer, to be used by him constantly, during the time of that sharp affliction. I incline to this latter, because there is some difference (though not very much, in the fourth verse) between every verse of this Psalm and those in the latter end of the fortieth, from which it is taken ; just as there is between the fifty-third and the fourteenth. See what I have said there ; and in the title of the thirty-eighth Psalm, you will find why this is called, A Psalm to bring to remembrance.

Ver. 1.] O God, the judge of all the world, thou seest the danger I am in is so exceeding great, that I am undone without thy speedy relief : which I beseech thee therefore not to delay ; but to make haste, O Lord, to declare thy power in sending me seasonable help for my rescue, now that I am ready to perish.

Ver. 2.] My enemies fancy that I cannot escape their hands : but do thou most shamefully disappoint all those that restlessly endeavour to take away my life : defeat them, and put them to flight with open disgrace, whosoever they be that study to do me mischief.

Ver. 3.] Let a total rout of their forces be the recompense of their shameful deeds ; whereby they thought to have exposed me to shame, when they insulted over my calamity, and make a mock both of it, and of my hope that thou wouldest deliver me.

Ver. 4.] But let all those that depend on thee alone, and seek by no other means, but such as thou allowest, for safety, have perpetual cause to rejoice in thee exceedingly : let such as expect and delight to see thee appear for the deliverance of thy people, never cease to say, Let the righteous judge of the world be praised ; let the glory of his wonderful works be every where published and extolled.

Ver. 5.] O God, I beseech thee again, delay not to speed the relief I expect from thee ; that this may be my song also ; for at present I am stripped of all, and utterly destitute of human help ; nay, so forlorn, that I shall perish presently, unless thou prevent it, O Lord ; on whom alone I rely for help and deliverance, which I once more beseech thee to send me speedily.

PSALM LXXI.

1 In thee, O LORD, do I put my trust : let me never be put to confusion.

2 Deliver me in thy righteousness, and cause me to escape : incline thine ear unto me, and save me.

3 Be thou my strong habitation, whereunto I

PSALM LXXI.

ARGUMENT.—Though this Psalm want an inscription, yet it is generally thought that David was the author of it : and if he was, there is no doubt he composed it upon the occasion of Absalom's unnatural rebellion. For the matter of the Psalm sufficiently informs us, that when he made it he was in extreme great danger of perishing ; and this danger also happened in the time of his old age (ver. 9,) when he was gray-headed (ver. 18). Now he was not so during the time of Saul's persecution (2 Sam. v. 4), but in that of Absalom's he was ; which though it did not last so long as the other, yet in this regard was more grievous to him ; that it fell out in his declining years, when men are more unapt for toil and labour, and naturally desirous of quiet and repose. And therefore he begins the Psalm almost in the same words as he doth one of those which he made when he was distressed by Saul (Ps. xxxi.), in his younger years, when he was better able to bear it.

As for the title, which some of the Greek translators, and from them the Latin, have prefixed to this Psalm (which they will have to be a Psalm of the sons of Jonadab and the first captives), it is so far from the business, that it is hard to give any account of it. For Theodoret pertinently observes, that the sons may continually resort: thou hast given commandment to save me; for thou art my rock and my fortress.

4 Deliver me, O my God, out of the hand of the wicked, out of the hand of the unrighteous and cruel man.

5 For thou art my hope, O Lord God: thou art my trust from my youth.

6 By thee have I been holden up from the womb: thou art he that took me out of my mother's bowels: my praise shall be continually of thee.

7 I am as a wonder unto many; but thou art my strong refuge.

8 Let my mouth be filled with thy praise and with thy honour all the day.

9 Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth.

of Jonadab were not among the first captives; and that he who made this inscription, confesses he did not find it in the Hebrew, but placed it there himself. Yet that learned father, I know not for what reason, takes this Psalm to have been composed by David, in the person of those who were captive in Babylon; wishing deliverance from that servitude, and desiring to be restored to their own land.

Ver. 1.] Thou seest, O Lord, that in all these troubles which have befallen me, I have no confidence in any thing, but only thy powerful goodness; which I hope will not fail me now, no more than it hath ever done heretofore; for I shall be lamentably ashamed, if thou shouldest frustrate my expectation.

Ver. 2.] Magnify thy mercy and fidelity in delivering me, and finding a way for my escape from these dangers that surround me: let me obtain this extraordinary favour of thee, and preserve me from falling into the hands of those who have conspired to destroy me.

Ver. 3.] For I am forced to quit my habitation, and have no place of safety (so universal is the revolt) to retreat unto; but whensoever I fly to thy almighty protection, do thou always keep me as secure as if I reposed myself in an impregnable castle; it is thy purpose, I am confident, to preserve me; for I never trusted in any other strong hold or fortress, but thee alone.

Ver. 4.] Deliver me, therefore, from falling into the power of that turbulent man, who hath no fear of thee before his eyes: from the power of him that cares not by what perfidious arts, or cruel violence, he brings his ends to pass.

Ver. 5.] For in thee, O Lord, who hast a sovereign dominion, which alters not, have I placed all my hope; and from thee is my expectation: when I was but a youth, I confided in thee (1 Sam. xvii. 33. 37), and was marvellously preserved by thee.

Ver. 6.] Who didst take care of me, even before I could trust in thee; for I have been supported by thee, and preserved in innumerable dangers, ever since I came out of my mother's womb: where I had perished also, if thy power had not drawn me thence, and brought me into the world, to praise and bless thee, as I have ever done, and will never cease to do, to the end of my days.

Ver. 7.] There are many, indeed (especially the great ones), that stare upon me, as if I were a monster; marvelling as much at this confidence I place in thee, as they do at my sudden fall into this deplorable condition: but, for all their taunts, I do not look

10 For mine enemies speak against me; and they that lay wait for my soul take counsel together, 11 Saying, God hath forsaken him: persecute and take him; for there is none to deliver him.

12 O God, be not far from me: O my God, make haste for my help.

13 Let them be confounded and consumed that are adversaries to my soul; let them be covered with reproach and dishonour that seek my hurt.

14 But I will hope continually, and will yet praise thee more and more.

15 My mouth shall shew forth thy righteousness and thy salvation all the day; for I know not the numbers thereof.

16 I will go in the strength of the Lord God: I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only.

upon myself as abandoned by thee; but have a strong hope that thou wilt deliver me.

Ver. 8.] And that I shall still have abundant cause to praise without ceasing thy most magnificent goodness towards me.

Ver. 9.] I have deserved, I know, very ill of thee; but let me prevail with thee, notwithstanding, for the continuance of thy favour towards me; and do not reject me now in my old age: O forsake me not, when I have most need of thy help, and am least able to do any thing for myself; but let that good providence, which watched over me in my youth, be still my security.

Ver. 10.] For my enemies are no less subtle than they are cruel; having defamed me, and taken away my reputation: as they now seek for an opportunity, and for that end are combined in a strong conspiracy to take away my life (2 Sam. xv. 3. 12).

Ver. 11.] Encourage one another in their enterprise with such words as these: God, it is manifest, hath forsaken him, for the hearts of all Israel are turned from him, and his own heart faileth him (2 Sam. xv. 13. 14); pursue him closely now, and we shall certainly take him; for he hath not forces enough to withstand us, and to deliver him out of our hands (2 Sam. xvii. 1. 2).

Ver. 12.] But how false soever my subjects are, it daunts me not, if thou, O God, who judgest righteously, will not be estranged from me: O my God, who hast hitherto so wonderfully preserved me, let this their vain confidence, and insulting language, incline thee to make the greater speed to relieve me.

Ver. 13. Let those implacable enemies, that will not be satisfied but with my life, be most shamefully disappointed; and see all their forces wherein they trusted quite dissipated, and come to nothing: expose them that design my ruin to the open shame and contempt of all the world; when they find that they have only ridiculously contrived their own destruction.

Ver. 14.] And I will learn thereby, both to hope in thee perpetually (as now I do) even in the greatest straits and difficulties; and to add new songs of praise over and above all those which I have already composed, to magnify thee for the vast heap of benefits which thou hast conferred on me.

Ver. 15.] That shall be the subject of my songs, to publish thy mercy and truth in judging righteously between me and my enemies: this shall be my continual employment; though I shall never be able to tell the least part of that mercy, which will appear in my deliverance from such formidable enemies.

Ver. 16.] I will enter notwithstanding upon this 17 O God, thou hast taught me from my youth : and hitherto have I declared thy wondrous works.

18 Now also when I am old and greyheaded, O God, forsake me not ; until I have shewed thy strength unto this generation, and thy power to every one that is to come.

19 Thy righteousness, O God, is very high, who hast done great things : O God, who is like unto thee !

20 Thou, which hast shewed me great and sore troubles, shalt quicken me again, and shalt bring me up again from the depth of the earth.

work, of pondering in my mind, and publishing with my mouth, the mighty things which I expect, from the sole powers of the great Lord and governor of all things : I will not ascribe them to my own deserts, or to the courage or fidelity of those few friends that still adhere to me ; but to thy undeserved favour, and faithfulness to thy word ; and to that alone will I give the praise.

Ver. 17.] O good God, thou hast given me many instances of this kind power and faithfulness of thine ever since I was a youth (ver. 5) : and from thence unto this present moment thou hast been doing wonderful things for my preservation and preferment ; which I have not failed to proclaim and thankfully commemorate.

Ver. 18.] And therefore do not now, O God, abandon the care of me, when I need it most : but continue the same kindness to me in my declining years, which I found when I was a youth : and let me survive these calamities, to proclaim thy power in fresh instances of it to this present generation ; and let all posterity know how mighty it is, in making a few victorious over very great multitudes.

Ver. 19.] Which I do not despair to see, when I consider how infinitely thy mercy, O God, surpasses all our deserts, expectations ; and what stupendous things thou hast already done for me, such as have no example : for who is there, O God, that can be compared to thee, either in goodness to design well for us, or in power to do what thou thinkest good ?

Ver. 20.] I never was in such straits and distresses (and yet I have been in the greatest and sorest) but I 21 Thou shalt increase my greatness, and comfort me on every side.

22 I will also praise thee with the psaltery, even thy truth, O my God : unto thee will I sing with the harp, O thou Holy One of Israel.

23 My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee ; and my soul, which thou hast re-deemed.

24 My tongue also shall talk of thy righteousness all the day long : for they are confounded, for they are brought unto shame, that seek my hurt.

found relief from thee : and therefore I doubt not thou wilt revive me, now that all men give me up for dead ; and draw me out of this extreme danger into which I am plunged, and wherein I shall perish without thy help.

Ver. 21.] Nay, thou wilt not only restore me to my former greatness, but much augment the splendour of it : and though now I seem forsaken by thee, wilt return again, and so surround me with thy favour, that my future comforts shall far exceed my present troubles.

Ver. 22.] And then sure I shall be no less forward to bless thee than thou art to bestow thy benefits on me : I will bless thee, O my God, in the most joyful manner, with the psaltery and harp, and the rest of my musical instruments : which shall play to the songs I will compose in praise of thy faithfulness and constancy to thy word ; O thou, whose incomparable excellencies are peculiarly known unto, and celebrated by, thy people Israel.

Ver. 23.] It is not possible to express the joy wherewith not merely my lips, but my heart and soul, shall sing triumphant songs : for the miraculous deliverance which I expect from thee.

Ver. 24.] Which shall not only be the subject of my solemn songs, but of my constant discourse ; wherein I will perpetually magnify thy goodness and truth towards me, and thy just vengeance upon my enemies : whom I look upon already as utterly defeated ; and hanging down their heads, to see that ruin fall upon themselves which they designed for me.

PSALM LXXII.

A Psalm for Solomon.

1 GIVE the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king's son.

2 He shall judge thy people with righteousness, and thy poor with judgment

PSALM LXXII.

ARGUMENT.—That David was the author of this Psalm, we may be satisfied from the conclusion of it. From whence we may also gather, that it was made by him towards the conclusion of his life : when, by his command, Nathan the prophet, and Zadok the priest, took Solomon and set him upon his throne (1 Kings i. 39, &c.), that David might have the satisfaction to see all the great men do homage to Solomon, and acknowledge him for their succeeding sovereign before he died ; which you find they did (see 1 Chron. xxix. 24). And thereupon the spirit of the holy man being transported with an extraordinary joy, he indited this hymn, and sent it to Solomon : wherein he first recommends him to the divine benediction, and then instructs him how to make his people happy ; by describing the qualities of a good king, and the prosperous state of the kingdom under his government. Which his eyes began to behold before he died (1 Chron. xxix. 25), and he hoped others should behold when he was gone : to the example and admiration of all following generations. For what we translate in the future time, as if it were a prophecy, may be construed to be only a prayer. Which he carries on in so high a strain, in some places, that the words had not a full accomplishment in Solomon, nor in any one else, till the appearing of that great king, Christ. Of the happiness of whose reign, and of the justice of 3 The mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills, by righteousness.

4 He shall judge the poor of the people, he shall save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor.

5 They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations.

6 He shall come down like rain upon the mountain grass : as showers that water the earth.

7 In his days shall the righteous flourish ; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth.

8 He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

9 They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him ; and his enemies shall lick the dust.

10 The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents : the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts.

11 Yea, all kings shall fall down before him : all nations shall serve him.

12 For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth ; the poor also, and him that hath no helper.

13 He shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy.

14 He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence : and precious shall their blood be in his sight.

whose government, together with the mightiness, and the largeness, and the eternal continuance of his kingdom, his father David here prophesies.

Of that there can be no reasonable doubt (for the Jews themselves acknowledge it, as appears by the Chaldee Paraphrase, Midrash Tehillim, the book Siphe, and many others) : but that in this Psalm he prophesies of nothing else, and hath no respect to Solomon, as Theodoret supposes in his interpretation, seems as far wide from the truth, as to say, that he looks no farther than Solomon. For the Psalm doth in part agree as aptly (if not more) to Solomon, as the name of Solomon doth to the Messiah, our Saviour Christ : who was indeed the prince of peace, and left his peace with his disciples when he left the world (as Theodoret notes), and made peace wheresoever his doctrine was entertained, and his government settled over men's hearts. Yet he is not the only person here spoken of ; but, as St. Jerome hath excellently stated the matter, in Solomon himself there was the shadow and image of the truth, which was more perfectly fulfilled in our Lord and Saviour.

Ver. 1.] O God, the supreme judge of the world, bestow I beseech thee upon Solomon, who is now anointed to sit on my throne, such a right judgment in all things, and such uprightness and integrity of heart, that he may govern thy people according to thy laws ; and, tempering justice with mercy, may be a worthy successor to me, who have now resigned my charge unto him.

Ver. 2.] The weight of which I know is so exceeding great, that he needs thy special guidance and assistance : by which he may be able to administer all affairs with such impartial justice and clemency ; that the poorest subjects he hath may be as dear unto him as they are unto thee ; and recover their rights, or be preserved in them, from the power of those who would oppress them.

Ver. 3.] So shall all parts of the kingdom be most happy ; living in peace, and enjoying the blessed fruits of it : while all the judges of the land, both great and small, make it their study to maintain them in their just rights and liberties.

Ver. 4.] And his authority is not abused to the oppression of the poor ; and the making those more miserable, who have nothing but beggary left them for their inheritance : but employed for their defence and preservation ; and for the crushing of those, that, by fraud and force, are injurious to them.

Ver. 5.] Which righteous administration shall redound to his everlasting honour, and win him such reverence and observance from his people, as shall make him a lively emblem of the great king, Christ : whose happy subjects shall never cease to worship and praise him day and night to the world's end.

Ver. 6.] For he shall not endeavour to be formidable to them like a tyrant, whose government imitates the thunder, storms, and tempests : but condescend most graciously to the meanest ; and rule them in so soft and gentle a manner, as shall make his authority no less acceptable and beneficial, than the rain is to the after-grass, or dripping showers, which fall in the summer heat, to refresh the parched earth.

Ver. 7.] The wicked shall have no preferment in his days ; but righteous and virtuous men shall grow to a great height, and flourish as the plants do after those cherishing showers : whereby such lasting peace and tranquillity shall be established, as nothing can exceed, but the blessed times of the prince of peace, whose kingdom shall have no end.

Ver. 8.] Nor shall his empire be confined within the bounds of Judea ; but, according to the promise made to our forefather Abraham (Gen. xv. 18), and renewed to his children (Exod. xxiii. 31 ; Deut. i. 7. xi. 24 ; Josh. i. 3, 4), he shall extend it from the Red sea to the sea of the Philistines, and from the river Euphrates to the border of Egypt (1 Kings iv. 21 ; 2 Chron. ix. 26 ; Ezra iv. 20), and be the most illustrious type of that glorious kingdom of Christ, which shall spread itself throughout the world.

Ver. 9.] The most barbarous nations shall come and do him homage ; and they that refuse it shall be humbled, and forced at last to submit and prostrate themselves with the lowliest reverence at his feet.

Ver. 10.] The kings of the most distant countries, they of Tarshish (1 Kings x. 22), as well as Cyprus and Crete, and the rest of the isles, shall honour him with their presents ; and so shall they of Arabia, as far as the Persian gulf, approach him with gifts.

Ver. 11.] Yea, so many kings and nations shall make their obeisance, and subject themselves unto him ; that it shall foreshadow the large extent of the kingdom of Christ, who shall be universally acknowledged, worshipped, and obeyed, by all kings, and all nations of the earth.

Ver. 12.] Nor shall they be induced to these submissions so much by the greatness of his power, the vastness of his riches, and the magnificence of his court, as by the fame of his justice, mercy, and compassion (wherein he shall resemble the Lord Christ). For no sooner shall any miserable wretch, who hath no friend in the world, implore his protection, but he shall instantly succour, defend, and relieve him.

Ver. 13.] He shall take pity upon such helpless creatures, and add no heavier burden unto that of their lamentable poverty ; nor shall he be prodigal of their lives, but as tenderly secure them as those of his greatest subjects.

15 And he shall live, and to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba: prayer also shall be made for him continually; and daily shall he be praised.

16 There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon: and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth.

17 His name shall endure for ever: his name shall be continued as long as the sun: and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed.

18 Blessed be the LORD God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things.

19 And blessed be his glorious name for ever: and let the whole earth be filled with his glory: Amen, and Amen.

20 The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.

Ver. 14.] He shall preserve them from being ruined either by the fraud or violence of those who are too subtle or too mighty for them, and love them so dearly, as never to satisfy his own ambition, covetousness, or revenge, with the expense of the precious treasure of their blood.

Ver. 15.] Whereby his reign shall be long and prosperous; and the longer he reigns, the richer presents shall be brought unto him (as there shall be to Christ from the eastern countries): together with their perpetual prayers for his continued prosperity; and the highest praises and commendations which shall ever be in men's mouths, of his just and gracious government.

Ver. 16.] Which God shall bless with such plenty, that a handful of corn sown in the earth, even upon the top of barren mountains, shall spring up so thick, with ears so plump and full, that when they are shaken with the wind they shall make a noise like the cedars of Lebanon; nor shall the city be less fruitful than the country, but become as populous and well stored with all good things as the earth is with grass or flowers in the spring.

Ver. 17.] His memory and fame shall never die, but be propagated from father to son, as long as the sun shall shine; and when they would wish well to another, they shall say, "God make thee as happy as Solomon:" for all people that hear of him shall look on him as the most excellent prince that ever was, except the king Messiah, whom all nations shall magnify and extol, and above all things desire his blessing.

Ver. 18.] For which good hopes, and for all other his benefits, I renew my thanks (1 Chron. xxix. 10) to the great Lord and sovereign of all the world; who hath graciously chosen Israel for his peculiar people: let him be most heartily blessed and praised, whose bounty is stupendous, and incomparably beyond all that can be said or thought of it.

Ver. 19.] Let his supereminent perfections be for ever celebrated with our praises; and not with ours only, but let the whole world be possessed with a sense of the surpassing greatness of his wisdom, power, and love, and join together with us in his praises. Let it be so, let it be so; let us all consent to say, again and again, The Lord be praised, the Lord be praised.

Ver. 20.] This was the last Psalm which David the son of Jesse composed, not long before he died: and was all of his that the collector of this book could find before he published it.

PART III.

PSALM LXXXIII.

A Psalm of Asaph.

1 TRULY God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart.

2 But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped.

PSALM LXXXIII.

ARGUMENT.—Here begins a new collection of seventeen Psalms, most of them very disconsolate and full of sad complaints, which make up the third book of this volume, as the Hebrews divide it. They were most of them composed by Asaph (and but one of them by David), though who he was is not resolved by interpreters: who suspect, indeed, there might be another author of some of these Psalms; but have no other Asaph to name but Asaph the singer, who was famous in the days of David (1 Chron. vi. 39. xvi. 5; 2 Chron. v. 12). And accordingly Apollinaris thus descants upon the title: "The divine invention of David failing in the composing of songs, Asaph arose, and by the divine spirit resounded this hymn." But it seems to me that there is another person of this name mentioned in the holy books (who may be more probably entitled to this work), called Asaph the seer (see Ps. 1.), who lived in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 30), and whose son, I suppose, was then recorder (2 Kings xviii. 37; Isa. xxxvi. 3). Some of them, indeed (as I shall take notice in due place), may be thought rather to belong to another Asaph in aftertimes; but for the present Psalm (and most of the rest) I can find no person so likely to whom it may be entitled, as him now named: who composed it, I conceive, either when he saw the miserable havoc which strangers made among them in the days of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxvii. 17—19. xxix. 8, 9), or when Sennacherib invaded them, notwithstanding the reformation which Hezekiah had made: or, which is most probable, upon the occasion that David wrote the thirty-seventh Psalm, to comfort himself and good

3 For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.

4 For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm.

5 They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued as other men.

6 Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment.

7 Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish.

8 They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily.

9 They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth.

10 Therefore his people return hither: and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them.

11 And they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the most high?

12 Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches.

13 Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocence.

14 For all the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning.

15 If I say, I will speak thus; behold, I should offend against the generation of thy children.

16 When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me.

17 Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end.

18 Surely thou didst set them in slippery men, when they saw the lowlier sort among them thrive and prosper, and the pious sometimes sorely afflicted; quite contrary to the sanctions of their law, which promised all good things to those that observed it, and threatened the evil to those that broke it. This extremely afflicted his spirit, and staggered his faith, till he considered the matter more deeply; and then he broke out into this meditation, saying,

Ver. 1.] I will never hereafter, whatsoever confusions I behold, question the justice of God's providence; but constantly affirm that he is not merely just, but very good; yea, hath a most singular love to his faithful people; who, notwithstanding the evils they endure, will never consent to do any evil.

Ver. 2.] Time was, indeed, when I, even I, who have had such long experience of his care over me, began to doubt and stagger in my faith: nay, was in danger to tumble headlong into unbelief.

Ver. 3.] The reason was, that having a just indignation against the folly, or rather madness, of wicked men, it first vexed me to see them, notwithstanding their ill deservings, in a very flourishing condition; and then tempted me to think it very hard, that sober men should not equal, if not exceed them in such happiness: especially when I saw no likelihood that it would end, but that they continue in their prosperity.

Ver. 4.] For as they carry on all their designs smoothly, and meet with no rub in their way, nor are in any danger (so great is their power) to be bound over by human justice to answer for their crimes, how many soever they commit: so they are not afflicted with sore diseases by the hand of God, nor brought to their graves with pains and torment; but after a long life, in firm and vigorous health, depart easily out of the world.

Ver. 5.] Their life is nothing so laborious and toilsome as that of many honest, but poor and wretched men: and they escape untouched, or are little hurt by such calamities as are common to all mankind.

Ver. 6.] Which makes them so unsufferably proud and vainly conceited of themselves, that they not only tyrannize over their neighbours, but openly boast of the power they have to do them mischief: and glory in all the violence and cruelty whereby they maintain and increase their pompous greatness.

Ver. 7.] In which they pamper themselves to such an excess, that in their very countenance they express the haughty swelling of their minds and hearts: which are strangely puffed up, by their being raised (not only beyond the expectation of all other men, but) far above all that they themselves at first imagined or could design.

Ver. 8.] They mock at all those who scrupulously tie themselves to the rules of justice, or tell them of the danger they run by their violation: for they threaten to undo all those that oppose them, and publicly declare, in the height of their arrogance, that they will not be bound by any laws.

Ver. 9.] No, not those of God himself, who (with all the invisible powers of which men talk), they say, is but a name; which they do not dread: and therefore no wonder if such blasphemers of his majesty spare neither high nor low, but let their tongues loose to abuse and calumniate whomsoever they please upon earth.

Ver. 10.] And yet, as bad as they are, there is none of them but hath his followers and admirers; whom he first invites, and then retains, like beasts, by filling their bellies: which abundantly contents them, though others be squeezed and oppressed to give them this poor satisfaction.

Ver. 11.] Nay, they drink in their opinions, and join with them in their impiety, saying, How can God know what we do here? or if he do, why should we think that he who is so high, troubles himself about our affairs?

Ver. 12.] For behold, there are none that condemn him more than these men; and yet he is so far from inflicting any punishment on them, that none enjoy such a continued course of prosperity as they, whose wealth and power increase every day.

Ver. 13.] And verily, if these men discourse aright, I have taken a great deal of pains to little purpose; while I have studiously endeavoured to keep my heart pure from so much as ill designs, as well as to refrain the doing of any evil actions, from the charge of which I can safely purge myself.

Ver. 14.] And yet I am plagued perpetually by the restless malice of these wicked doers; which, as constantly as the sun rises, falls on me a deal sooner than on other men.

Ver. 15.] But whatever confused and foolish thoughts came on a sudden into my mind, I concluded, upon more mature deliberation, that if I said as these men do, I should basely betray the cause of all them who are truly dear unto thee.

Ver. 16.] And therefore resolved with myself, before I pronounced my sentence, to study this point more seriously; which at first sight appeared so hard, that it grievously perplexed me.

Ver. 17.] And retiring myself into the holy places, to consult with thee, and with those to whom thou communicatest thy secrets, I was presently sensible how short their felicity is: unto which death having places: thou castedst them down into destruction.

19 How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors.

20 As a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image.

21 Thus my heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins.

22 So foolish was I, and ignorant: I was as a beast before thee.

23 Nevertheless I am continually with thee: thou hast holden me by my right hand.

24 Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory.

25 Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee.

26 My flesh and my heart faileth: but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever.

27 For, lo, they that are far from thee shall perish; thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from thee.

28 But it is good for me to draw near to God: I have put my trust in the Lord God, that I may declare all thy works.

put an utter end, it is followed with a dismal after-reckoning in another world.

Ver. 18.] And next I considered, that all of them do not stand so firm as they imagine, but merely flatter themselves with vain hopes of continuing in their station to the end of their days: for being raised to the highest preferments, they find them to be very slippery places; from whence, to the amazement of themselves and of all spectators, they come tumbling down into a most horrible ruin.

Ver. 19.] O what an astonishing change is this! which is the most frightful, when on a sudden the divine vengeance seizes on them; and, when they least expect it, an end is put to their greatness; nay, they are quite destroyed in a most terrible manner, as if they had never been.

Ver. 20.] So that it is but a dream of happiness wherein they live, and they pride themselves in a mere imaginary glory; which not only vanishes away when thou, O Lord, dost arise to judge them, but becomes as contemptible, in that very city where they appeared in all their pomp and splendour, as the fine things which a man sees in his sleep are when he awaketh.

Ver. 21.] And therefore, when my spirit boiled with vexation, and grew sour at the sight of their prosperity (ver 2, 3); when I was so vehemently provoked to passionate complaints, feeling the sharpest touches of grief and anger;

Ver. 22.] I now ingenuously acknowledge it was for want of such manly and religious thoughts as these, which should have been in my mind when I thought of thy administrations; if I had not been dull and stupid, as void of sense as the beasts, which look only at things before their eyes, and have no regard to what is to come, or is not seen.

Ver. 23.] For if I had looked beyond my senses, I might have seen that I am under the care of thy good providence, and that thou hast been my guide and my supporter, even when I had these brutish thoughts, and didst not suffer these wicked men to destroy me.

Ver. 24.] And therefore I ought in all reason still to conclude, that thou wilt direct me to behave myself so wisely that I shall never fall into their snares: but, after I have suffered awhile, be preferred to those dignities from whence they fall; and, which is more, be so graciously accepted by thee, as to continue in them unto immortal glory.

Ver. 25.] This I expect from thy almighty goodness, who art the sole object of my hope. For thou knowest there is none in heaven whom I depend upon for help and protection but thee alone; none upon earth whose favour I seek, but only thine, which shall perfectly content me.

Ver. 26.] It is possible I may still be pressed with such sore afflictions, that not only my bodily strength, but also my courage, may begin again to fail me; but then I will recover myself, and fortify my soul by flying unto thee, O God, for safety; in whose love I will always think myself happy, and enjoy everlasting satisfaction.

Ver. 27.] For there is nothing more certain or more remarkable than this; that they who, by forsaking thee, have put themselves far from under thy care, will never be able by any other means to save themselves from perishing: for thou hast already made such men a terrible example of thy displeasure, and utterly destroyed those who, quitting thy service, have devoted themselves to the worship of other gods (2 Chron. xxviii. 6. 18, 19; xxix. 7—9).

Ver. 28.] And therefore I will learn by their mis-carriages, that it is the best and safest course for me to adhere to my good God, and to make my humble addresses to him alone. I have done so hitherto, and no danger shall tempt me hereafter to quit this hold, and to confide in any thing but only in the sovereign of the world, who never fails those that depend upon him; and will, I hope, be so gracious unto me, that I shall have abundant cause to publish and proclaim to all others the works of his providence, in preserving the good, and in throwing the wicked down at last to the ground.

PSALM LXXIV.

Maschil of Asaph.

1 O God, why hast thou cast us off for ever? why doth thine anger smoke against the sheep of thy pasture?

2 Remember thy congregation, which thou hast purchased of old; the rod of thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed; this mount Zion, wherein thou hast dwelt.

PSALM LXXIV.

ARGUMENT.—The desolation of Jerusalem, and of the temple, as well as the rest of the country, made by Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, was the sad occasion of this Psalm. For it is altogether improbable that it hath respect to the days of Antio-tions; even all that the enemy hath done wickedly in the sanctuary.

4 Thine enemies roar in the midst of thy congregations; they set up their ensigns for signs.

5 A man was famous according as he had lifted up axes upon the thick trees.

6 But now they break down the carved work thereof at once with axes and hammers.

7 They have cast fire into thy sanctuary, they have defiled by casting down the dwelling place of thy name to the ground.

8 They said in their hearts, Let us destroy them together: they have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land.

9 We see not our signs: there is no more any prophet: neither is there among us any that knoweth how long.

10 O God, how long shall the adversary reclus Epiphaneas, as some fancy; because, as Theodoret pertinently notes (to omit all other reasons), we read nothing in any history of his burning the temple, or so much as of his laying the city waste, which are both here most sorrowfully bewailed by Asaph. Who was not therefore that Asaph in David's time (unless we should grant him to have written by the spirit of prophecy, and predicted what should be in after times, as a great many think), because there was no such temple in those days, nor had been, as is here described: nor was it Asaph the seer in Hezekiah's days (of whom see argument of the foregoing Psalm), who saw no such desolation made by Sennacherib (for he did not take Jerusalem, nor shoot so much as an arrow into it), nor, in all likelihood, prophesied of the destruction here spoken of; because the description of it in this Psalm is so plain, that we may most reasonably think the author of it had it before his eyes, and did not merely see it by the spirit of prophecy; which is not wont to foretell things in so clear a manner, but more obscurely and darkly.

I conclude, therefore, it was some other Asaph who composed this Psalm, in the time of the captivity, and in the middle, or rather towards the conclusion of it; because he complains (ver. 9) that they had no prophet (as there was in the beginning of the captivity, particularly Jeremiah) to tell them how long it should last. And, considering that in the second verse he speaks of himself as one that dwelt still in the land of Israel, pointing to mount Zion as a place near to him, I take him to have been some pious man of the posterity of Asaph, who was suffered to remain there with the Chaldeans.

And if it were fit to suppose him to have written this Psalm very young, and to have lived to a great age, when I have no proof of either, I should guess him to be Asaph, the keeper of the king's forest, in the days of Nehemiah; who desired Artaxerxes to write to him, to furnish him with timber out of Lebanon, for the rebuilding some of those places which the Psalmist here complains were destroyed. Among which, the porch of the court of the sanctuary remained unbuilt even unto those times.

Howsoever, from the mention of mount Zion in the second verse, it is manifest Grotius forgot himself, when, in his notes upon ver. 6, he applies this Psalm to the destruction of Shiloh, which he supposes to have here bewailed. For mount Zion had then never been in their possession, as it was afterward, and had lain so long waste (ver. 3), when Asaph wrote this Psalm, that it looked like a perpetual desolation. Besides, the tabernacle was not burnt when Shiloh was destroyed, but remained, though without the ark, till the days of Solomon, 2 Chron. i. 3 (see Ps. lxxviii.). And of the meaning of Maschil, see Ps. xxxii.

Ver. 1.] O God, the sovereign judge of the world, who has justly expelled us out of our land, and continued our banishment so long, that little hope appears of our being restored to it again; behold the anguish of our souls wherein we cry unto thee for mercy: for we are confounded to see thee so highly incensed against those who were once under thy most indulgent care, as if thou wert resolved never to be reconciled to us any more.

Ver. 2.] Thou hast not forgotten, we know, though it be very long ago, with the expense of how many miracles thou didst make our ancestors thy peculiar people: for which reason, though we be exceedingly undeserving, we beseech thee to let all the world see, thou wilt not utterly abandon the poor remainders of that nation, which thou didst acquire at so great a price; that kingdom, which thou didst rescue out of the most miserable slavery, to be thy own possession; and this mount Zion, wherein (after thou hadst by many wonders brought us into Canaan, and rooted out the old inhabitants) thou wast pleased at last to settle thy abode among us.

Ver. 3.] Make haste, good Lord, to come and visit the ruins of our country and city, which have lasted exceeding long, and will never be repaired without thy powerful help: which we implore against the authors of them; who, to all the other mischiefs they have done, have, with a peculiar spite, not only defaced, but utterly destroyed, thy dwelling-place.

Ver. 4.] They are thy enemies therefore as well as ours, whose fury and rage so transport them, that they roar rather than shout; whilst they triumph in those places where thy people were wont to meet to praise thy name: there they have set up their banners in token of their victory, and brag as if their gods were superior unto thee.

Ver. 5.] Every one of them laid about him, and bestirred himself with all his might, as if he hoped to get renown by the mischief he did: which was committed with no more remorse, than if they had been lopping off boughs in the thickets of a forest, where they may be spared.

Ver. 6.] Just so methinks I see (as if it were now adding) how they hacked and hewed with axes, and knocked down with hammers, the curious carved work of the temple: whose elegance would have moved any but barbarians to have preserved it, with as great a zeal as they employed to beat it in pieces.

Ver. 7.] But so mad was their rage, it was not satisfied with this, but set fire unto thy holy place: and what that did not consume, they pulled down; till they had utterly profaned the habitation consecrated to thy majesty, by laying it level with the ground.

Ver. 8.] Nor did all this give a stop unto their fury; but they rather grew the more outrageous: for, designing quite to destroy our religion, both in this and in future generations, they left not so much as one place wherein we might meet to say our prayers, or hear the law, throughout the land.

Ver. 9.] And, which is the saddest thing of all, thou seemest to have left us too; and we see no token of thy divine presence with us: so far we are from beholding any miraculous works, as our fathers did, for our deliverance, that there is not so much as a prophet to be found to give us any advice, or speak proach? shall the enemy blaspheme thy name for ever?

11 Why withdrawest thou thy hand, even thy right hand? pluck it out of thy bosom.

12 For God is my King of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth.

13 Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength: thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters.

14 Thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness.

15 Thou didst cleave the fountain and the flood: thou driedst up mighty rivers.

16 The day is thine, the night also is thine: thou hast prepared the light and the sun.

17 Thou hast set all the borders of the earth: thou hast made summer and winter.

a word of comfort to us: not a man among us that can tell when these calamities will have an end.

Ver. 10.] What a reproach is this, O God? which hath quite tired our patience, and made us cry unto thee to make haste to avenge thyself of these insulting enemies: stop their blasphemous mouths, O God, and let them not say any more, as they have done too long, that thou art not able to deliver us.

Ver. 11.] For we are confounded, and know not what to say, while thou thus withdrawest thy powerful presence from us; that mighty power which was wont to do such wonders for us: exert it again, we beseech thee, and stretch it out for the destruction of those who have spoken of it so contemptuously.

Ver. 12.] Why should I despair of it! since the great God, whom they deride, hath many ages ago undertaken the government and protection of us: working for us such deliverances in this land, which now lies waste, as astonished all the world.

Ver. 13.] Thou art that God, to whose power the raging sea is subject; which at thy command retired, and opened a way for us to pass through; but came back again with its wonted violence, and overwhelmed the Egyptians; who, like so many sea-monsters, thought to have devoured us.

Ver. 14.] Pharaoh, that fierce tyrant, as terrible as the vastest whales, thou didst utterly destroy there; with all his stern captains and commanders: whom the sea spewed up (Exod. xix. 30), to find their tombs in the bellies of the wild beasts and birds, which people the neighbouring wilderness.

Ver. 15.] Where, when our fathers wanted drink, thou madest water to gush out of a rock (Exod. xvii. 6; Numb. xx. 9); which followed them in a full stream, till they came to the borders of Canaan: and then thou driedst up the waters of Jordan, at a time when they ran violently, and (as if many rivers had been joined in one) it overflowed all its banks (Josh. iii. 15. 17).

Ver. 16.] And still there are such instances of thy power, which the whole world, if they would but mind, have always before their eyes. For as thou didst sometimes change the dry land into a river, and a river into dry land; so thou dost continually change the day into night, and the night into day: having settled the moon to govern the one, and the sun to govern the other, in their turns.

Ver. 17.] By thy almighty wisdom also it is, that the motion of the sun not only makes the days and nights, but the different climates of the earth, and the 18 Remember this, that the enemy hath reproached, O Lord, and that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name.

19 O deliver not the soul of thy turtledove unto the multitude of the wicked: forget not the congregation of thy poor for ever.

20 Have respect unto the covenant: for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty.

21 O let not the oppressed return ashamed: let the poor and needy praise thy name.

22 Arise, O God, plead thine own cause: remember how the foolish man reproacheth thee daily.

23 Forget not the voice of thine enemies: the tumult of those that rise up against thee increaseth continually.

seasons of the year: which are sometimes hot, and sometimes cold: sometimes flourishing, as we see in the summer, with all manner of fruit; and sometimes stripped, as we see in the winter, of all its ornaments, that afterward it may be the more fruitful.

Ver. 18.] And we sure have endured a very tedious winter; wherein all things have looked most ruefully. May it please thee now to return, like the sun, unto us, and let thy enemies know thou hast not forgotten how they have reproached thee, O Lord! (whom they ought to have honoured as the mighty Creator of all things) but wilt vindicate thy glory, by punishing these insolent people, who, foolishly puffed up with their victories, have despised and derided thy omnipotent majesty.

Ver. 19.] Deliver, we beseech thee, thy church, which, like a turtle-dove, can do nothing but meekly mourn, and make her silent complaints unto thee, from those violent men, who, like birds of prey, seek utterly to destroy her: let them not take away its life and being; but, though we be at present deserted by thee, yet hear our cries, and at last relieve a poor helpless company, who flee unto thee, and depend upon thee alone for safety.

Ver. 20.] Though we are unworthy to be regarded by thee, yet have regard unto thy own promises; wherein thou hast engaged thyself unto our fathers, to give to them and their posterity the land of Canaan: which is so far from being now inhabited by thy people, that every blind corner of it is a den of thieves and murderers; who have filled it with rapine and cruelty.

Ver. 21.] O let not thy poor afflicted servant, who implores thy aid against these barbarous oppressors, be denied his suit; and go away ashamed, to see himself disappointed of his hope: but let him, and all the rest of thy miserable people, who were never in greater need of thy help, be restored to praise thy goodness in their ancient possessions; from whence they have been thus long banished.

Ver. 22.] Appear, O God, in our behalf; and thereby vindicate thyself from reproach: let me again beseech thee, to show that thou art not unmindful of all the scoffs, which prosperous fools belch out against thee every day.

Ver. 23.] It is time to punish all the insulting language of thy enemies: for the insolent brags and furious threats of those that oppose thee increase still more and more, and rise up to a greater height of audacious impiety.

PSALM LXXV.

To the chief Musician. Al-taschith. A Psalm or Song of Asaph.

1 UNTO thee, O God, do we give thanks, unto thee do we give thanks : for that thy name is near thy wondrous works declare.

2 When I shall receive the congregation I will judge uprightly.

3 The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved : I bear up the pillars of it. Selah.

4 I said unto the fools, Deal not foolishly : and to the wicked, Lift not up the horn :

5 Lift not up your horn on high ; speak not with a stiff neck.

6 For promotion cometh neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the south.

7 But God is the judge : he putteth down one, and setteth up another.

8 For in the hand of the LORD there is a cup, and the wine is red ; it is full of mixture ; and he poureth out of the same : but the dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them.

PSALM LXXV.

ARGUMENT.—I take this Psalm to have been made by Asaph the seer, mentioned 2 Chron. xxix. 30 (see Ps. lxxiii.), after the great deliverance, which, by the strange destruction of Sennacherib's army, God gave the good king Hezekiah. For whose use Asaph composed this Psalm, and delivered it to the chief master of music in the tabernacle ; that he might therein make his public profession of his obligations to almighty God, and his resolution to serve him, and to depend upon him : as he advises all men else to do, if they would not be undone ; or if they hoped for any good, of which he is the sole and absolute dispenser.

If Al-taschith be more than a note, that this Psalm was to be sung like to the fifty-seventh, and those that follow ; it may signify as much as, thou shalt not, or wilt not, destroy : and be applied either to Sennacherib, who, the prophet told them, should not accomplish his design of destroying them, as he had done other nations (2 Kings xix. 17 ; 2 Chron. xxvii. 14), or to God, who had not given him commission, as he pretended, to destroy Jerusalem (2 Kings xviii. 25), but would defend it (2 Kings xix. 34), and not suffer it to be laid desolate.

Symmachus gives a more spiritual sense of the word, and calls this a triumphal song concerning immortality : because it contains, as Theodoret explains it, a prediction of the righteous judgment of God in the destruction of the wicked, and rewarding the lovers of virtue : which should admonish us not to suffer any godly thoughts we have in our mind to perish ; but to preserve them whole and entire, that we may inherit immortality.

What is to be understood by a Psalm-song, see in the argument of Psalm lxvii.

Ver. 1.] UNTO thee, O God, the righteous judge, who art the sole author of this great deliverance, do I and all my people give most solemn thanks : nor can we ever thank thee enough, but we must again and again renew our acknowledgments unto thee ; whose almighty power is still ready at hand, we clearly see by the wonders thou hast done, to succour all those who gratefully commemorate thy benefits.

Ver. 2.] And I will not content myself with these verbal praises alone ; but as soon as I shall meet with a fit opportunity, and we can have our solemn assemblies again (which by this invasion have been interrupted, 2 Chron. xxxii. 1), I will perfect the reformation which I have begun : and see that equal justice be done to all my people ; as well as that they be preserved in thy true religion.

Ver. 3.] The whole country hath been in a miserable confusion ; while their hearts melted with fear of an utter desolation : but as then I supported their spirits, and encouraged the great men and the officers to do their duty (2 Chron. xxxi. 6—8), so I will hereafter establish such magistrates and judges, as shall bring all into better order.

Ver. 4.] I have told them my mind already, and do still solemnly proclaim and declare, that I will proceed with the utmost severity against the contemners of thy laws ; and therefore I advise them not to be so madly rude and insolent : for the proudest of them all shall know, that it is safest for them to be more modest, than to glory, as they do, in their impiety ; or to boast of the power they have to be injurious to their neighbours.

Ver. 5.] Do not vaunt of this, I once more advise you, nor bear yourselves high, as if you would out-brave heaven itself ; be not refractory and stubborn, nor arrogantly say, that you will have your way, and that none shall curb you.

Ver. 6.] For which way soever you turn yourselves, whether to the east, or to the west, or to the mountainous deserts that lie on the north and south of us ; in vain do ye think to escape the righteous judgment of God.

Ver. 7.] Who, being the sovereign Lord and governor of the world, easily lays those low that proudly exalt themselves against his authority ; and lifts up those that humbly submit themselves unto him.

Ver. 8.] For he never wants power to inflict the most dreadful punishments ; which (like an intoxicating wine, full of stupefying ingredients, that loosens the very joints, and takes away all a man's strength to resist) never fail to have their effect : and the godly may taste of them, may suffer sorely for a time ; but the heaviest and most grievous punishments (like the dregs at the bottom of such wine) shall fall to the share of all the wicked of the land ; who shall be forced to endure the utmost expressions of the divine vengeance upon their sins.

Ver. 9.] And this I, who am his minister to execute his judgments, will not cease to declare, as long as I live, that none may pretend ignorance for their excuse : and I will sing praises unto God (who delivered Jacob from all evil), not only for his late miraculous preservation of us by his vengeance on Sennacherib (whom he hath made an example of his wrath to all proud contemners of him), but for making me the instrument of so happy a reformation.

Ver. 10.] For this is my resolution, not merely, as I said, to praise him, but to pull down the haughty spirit, and cut short all the power of the wicked, that they shall not be able to do such mischief as they desire: and to raise the righteous into such authority, 10 All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off; but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted.

9 But I will declare for ever; I will sing praises to the God of Jacob.

that they shall not fear what their most insolent enemies can do unto them.

PSALM LXXVI.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth. A Psalm or Song of Asaph.

1 IN Judah is God known: his name is great in Israel.

2 In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwelling place in Zion.

3 There brake he the arrows of the bow, the shield, and the sword, and the battle. Selah.

4 Thou art more glorious and excellent than the mountains of prey.

5 The stouthearted are spoiled, they have slept their sleep: and none of the men of might have found their hands.

6 At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep.

7 Thou, even thou, art to be feared: and who may stand in thy sight when once thou art angry?

8 Thou didst cause judgment to be heard from heaven; the earth feared, and was still,

9 When God arose to judgment, to save all the meek of the earth. Selah.

10 Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee: the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain.

PSALM LXXVI.

ARGUMENT.—It is visible to every eye, that the Psalmist here commemorates some notable victory over very powerful enemies: whereby God delivered (when it was in great danger) the whole country, particularly Jerusalem: which is called here Salem (ver. 2), by an usual form of speech among the Hebrews, who are wont, in names of places, to cut off the former part; instead of Abel-shittim, saying only Shittim; and Nimrim, for Beth-nimrim; Lechi, for Ramath-lechi; Sheba, for Beer-sheba, and many such-like, as Bochartus hath shown in the second book of his Phaleg. cap. 25, and in the first part of his work concerning the animals named in scripture, book ii. ch. 25.

And there is as little reason to doubt that the particular deliverance here aimed at is that from Sennacherib's army, which Asaph the seer, mentioned 2 Chron. xxix. 30 (see Ps. lxxiii.), was not content to celebrate in the former hymn, which he made for the use of the king; but added this also, for his own use, and all other pious persons: who he hoped would join in it, especially when it was sung in the temple, as he directed the master of the music, after the same manner as Ps. iv.

Some of the Greeks seem to have perceived something of this: for though there be no such title in the ancient Hexaplus of Origen, yet, in aftertimes, Theodoret tells us, he found in some copies this inscription, which still continues, An Ode against the Assyrians: which Apollinarius follows. Of a Psalm-song see Ps. lxxvii.

Ver. 1.] God hath so illustriously demonstrated himself among us (in this unexpected and terrible execution) to be the sovereign ruler and judge of the world, that he must shut his eyes that doth not see it: his power, and all his other glorious perfections, which are conspicuous every where, are in no country so magnified as they are in Israel.

Ver. 2.] Our enemies themselves, who reviled him (2 Chron. xxxii. 17, 19), and despised Jerusalem (ver. 10), are now sure convinced that there this mighty Lord maketh his abode: in the top of that mountain where he hath chosen to fix his dwelling-place.

Ver. 3.] Before the walls of which he hath slain, with an invisible dart, the fiery archers; (who have not shot so much as one arrow into it, 2 Kings xix. 32); and made the shields, and swords, and the rest of their military preparations, altogether useless and unprofitable.

Ver. 4.] Whereby thou, O Zion, art become more glorious than all the mountains, where the fiercest beasts of prey, or the most desperate robbers, have their resort, who never made such slaughters.

Ver. 5.] For they whose courage made them fear no danger but confidently promised themselves the spoils of Jerusalem, are given unto us for a spoil: they lay down to sleep, but never awaked (2 Kings xix. 35); not a man among the most mighty of them was able to strike a stroke, or do any thing to defend himself against that hand which cut them off.

Ver. 6.] But the most experienced horseman, as well as they that rode in chariots, sunk down dead, at the sudden check, the severe rebuke, which they received from thee, O God of Jacob, whom they reproached (Kings xix. 22, 23).

Ver. 7.] Thou, and none but thou, art to be dreaded: and what king is he, that is able, for so short a time as a moment, to resist thy power? which in an instant can destroy all those who incur thy heavy displeasure:

Ver. 8.] We have an example of it before our eyes; for when we made our solemn appeal to thee (2 Kings xix. 3, 4, 15, 16), thou wast pleased to pronounce a sentence of condemnation from heaven upon our enemies, which struck such terror into those that survived, that they who before were full of rage, and made a tumultuous noise (ver. 27, 28), were as still as lambs, and durst not stir a foot, but only to return from whence they came (ver. 28, 36).

Ver. 9.] They were afraid to continue their attempts against us, when God, who had long suffered their insolence, sent an angel to chastise it, and to do execution upon them; and thereby delivered the helpless people of this land, who had patiently borne their horrible oppression.

Ver. 10.] Which may well be a warning to all fell tyrants, not to be so fierce and outrageous; which will only present thee with a fairer opportunity to glorify thyself, and raise thy praise to a greater height; as thou hast now done, by suppressing the Assyrians' fury; who, if they have any relics of wrath, which may boil up again in their hearts, thou shalt chain it up, and not suffer it to break forth to our further disturbance.

11 Vow, and pay unto the Lord your God : let all that be round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared.

Ver. 11.] And let this excite you all, who are thus marvellously delivered, to make more liberal promises of grateful sacrifices ; as well as to perform those which you have already vowed, to the great Lord, your most gracious God : who so far excels all others, that the nations round about us, who hear the fame of this, shall reproach you (if you be forgetful of his benefits) by the presents which they shall make to 12 He shall cut off the spirit of princes : he is terrible to the kings of the earth.

him (2 Chron. xxxii. 23), who ought to be feared by all his friends, and is most terrible to his enemies.

Ver. 12.] For he can easily, with a sudden stroke, not only take down the proud stomach, but take away the life of the fiercest captains and commanders (2 Chron. xxxii. 21), yea, make the greatest monarchs (who keep the world in awe) quake and tremble at his dreadful executions.

PSALM LXXVII.

To the chief Musician, to Jeduthun. A Psalm of Asaph.

1 I CRIED unto God with my voice, even unto God with my voice ; and he gave ear unto me.

2 In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord : my sore ran in the night, and ceased not : my soul refused to be comforted.

3 I remembered God, and was troubled : I complained, and my spirit was overwhelmed. Selah.

4 Thou holdest mine eyes waking : I am so troubled that I cannot sleep.

5 I have considered the days of old, the years of ancient times.

6 I call to remembrance my song in the night :

I commune with mine own heart : and my spirit made diligent search.

7 Will the Lord cast off for ever ? and will he be favourable no more ?

8 Is his mercy clean gone for ever ? doth his promise fail for evermore ?

9 Hath God forgotten to be gracious ? hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies ? Selah.

10 And I said, This is my infirmity : but I will remember the years of the right hand of the most high.

11 I will remember the works of the Lord : surely I will remember thy wonders of old.

PSALM LXXVII.

ARGUMENT.—A Psalm composed by Asaph, and sent by him to that song-master, who was over the children of Jeduthun ; in which I imagined, at first sight, that he represented the sad condition of Hezekiah, and the motions of his heart towards God in his sickness (2 Chron. xxxii. 21 ; Isa. xxxviii. 1). But, upon farther consideration, it appears, from the latter part of it, when he bewails the calamity of all the nation : either when Sennacherib overran the country, or else in the captivity of Babylon. If we refer to the latter, then it was not Asaph the seer, whom I mentioned before (Ps. lxxiii.), that made this Psalm ; but some other in aftertimes (see Ps. lxxiv.), who laments the long continuance of their captivity ; which looked like an utter forsaking by God ; but he comforts himself, at last, with the remembrance of what God had done formerly for them, when he delivered them out of the Egyptian bondage.

Ver. 1.] I have incessantly made my prayer to God, and I will still most earnestly entreat his favour : to him who hath justly afflicted us, and can alone relieve us, have I again and again renewed my importunate suit ; which I hope will at last prevail with him for deliverance.

Ver. 2.] I have not negligently discharged this duty, but as the distressed is great wherein we are, so I have restlessly implored help from the Lord : in the night, when men are wont to bury their troubles in sleep, I have with unwearied diligence spread out my hands unto him (in token that all my dependence is upon his power alone), resolving to admit of no consolation, till I obtained a gracious answer from him.

Ver. 3.] I remembered, indeed, how kind God had been unto us in former times ; but this only gave me the greater trouble when I compared it with our present miseries ; and the more I mused on it, the more my spirit was disturbed, and miserably afflicted.

Ver. 4.] Inasmuch that I could not close my eyes, to take a wink of sleep ; nor open my mouth (such was my perturbation and astonishment) to express the heaviness of my grief.

Ver. 5.] All that I could do, was to recount thy merciful providences over our forefathers in times past : and ponder seriously what wonders thou didst for them many ages ago.

Ver. 6.] I called to mind all the songs I had indited, to celebrate the memory of those ancient benefits : and spent whole nights in silent meditations, and diligent inquiries, which I revolved to and fro in my mind ; why he who had taken such care of our ancestors, had so long rejected us.

Ver. 7.] Will the Lord, thought I, abandon us for ever ? Is he so incensed against us that he will never be reconciled, nor intend to show us any more favour ?

Ver. 8.] Is his infinite mercy, which is the fountain of all his benefits, quite exhausted ? and will he never hereafter speak a word of comfort to us ?

Ver. 9.] Hath God, whose property it is to show mercy, quite laid aside all thoughts of exercising his clemency towards us ? or have we so highly provoked him to anger, that he hath no regard at all unto our miseries ?

Ver. 10.] But having thus complained, and said within myself, This is the thing which sorely afflicts me, to see such alterations in the proceedings of the Most High, that the same hand which formerly protected us now severely scourges us ;

Ver. 11.] I presently considered, that there might be a change again ; and resolved to comfort myself with the remembrance of the former works of the Lord ; and to go back as far as the miracle thou didst

12 I will meditate also of all thy work, and talk of thy doings.

13 Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary : who is so great a God as our God !

14 Thou art the God that doest wonders : thou hast declared thy strength among the people.

15 Thou hast with thine arm redeemed thy people, the sons of Jacob and Joseph. Selah.

16 The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee ; they were afraid : the depths also were troubled.

for us (in bringing us up out of the land of Egypt), when our deserts were as small as in these days.

Ver. 13.] Of all the ensuing wonders I will think, rather than on our present miseries : I will not omit one of them ; but, instead of these complaints, make them the constant subject of my discourse.

Ver. 13.] From which I cannot but conclude, that the method of thy providence, O God, is not only perfectly holy and just, but quite out of our reach : nor is thy power inferior ; but, as thou dost not proceed in the common way of our thoughts, so none can resist what thy incomparable majesty thinks fit to effect.

Ver. 14.] For thou art the mighty God, who canst do miracles as easily as the most ordinary works : and hast made all the world sensible, that thy power exceeds both the strength and the opinion of all creatures.

Ver. 15.] Having delivered thy people, descended from Jacob, and miraculously preserved by Joseph, from the Egyptian bondage, by a long series of stupendous judgments upon Pharaoh and his servants (Exod. vi. 8 ; Deut. vi. 21, 22. vii. 8).

Ver. 16.] Which were followed presently with a greater wonder, when the waters of the Red sea felt thy power, O God : they felt thy power to the very bottom of them ; which so disturbed them, that they retreated, as if they had been affrighted at thy pre-

17 The clouds poured out water : the skies sent out a sound : thine arrows also went abroad.

18 The voice of thy thunder was in the heaven : the lightnings lightened the world : the earth trembled and shook.

19 Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known.

20 Thou leddest thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

sence, and left a plain way for thy people to march through upon dry ground :

Ver. 17.] But returned again upon the Egyptians (who pursued after us), accompanied with a terrible storm of rain, and thunder, and hailstones ; which flew about their ears, and break the very wheels of their chariots (Exod. xiv. 24, 25).

Ver. 18.] The noise of this thunder filled all the air thereabout ; and so did the lightning that flashed in their faces ; which, together with a dreadful earthquake, made the very inhabitants of Canaan tremble (Josh. ii. 10, 11).

Ver. 19.] We might well say then, that thy way is quite out of our reach (Ver. 13), who madest a passage through the sea, a broad path through the boisterous waters : which, as none ever trod before or after, so they cannot trace the footsteps, which the waters have overflowed and obliterated (Exod. xiv. 26, 27).

Ver. 20.] Nor did thy care over thy people end there ; but, by the ministry of thy servants, Moses and Aaron, thou didst conduct them with the same tenderness that a good shepherd doth his sheep, through a horrid wilderness, in which thou feddest them, till they came to Canaan. [And thither the same power can, and the same goodness will, I hope, restore us : though now we seem neglected by thee, as our fathers were, for a time, in the land of Egypt.]

PSALM LXXVIII.

Maschil of Asaph.

1 GIVE ear, O my people, to my law : incline your ears to the words of my mouth.

PSALM LXXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—When God gave his law to the Israelites, he commanded them not only to be careful to study it themselves, but to inculcate it upon their children (as the Psalmist here remembers, ver. 5), that they might propagate the knowledge of it to all future generations (Deut. iv. 9. vi. 7, 8, &c. xi. 18, 19, &c.), and particularly to instruct them in the reason of their feasts ; which were appointed for the commemoration of several benefits, which he would not have forgotten (Exod. xiii. 8, 14). In prosecution of which end, as Theodoret well observes, this Psalm was indited by the prophetic grace (as his words are) ; that they and all their posterity might preserve in mind the wonderful works of God. An epitome of which (for the help of their memory) he here presents them withal ; from the time of their coming out of Egypt, till David's promotion to the throne.

2 I will open my mouth in a parable : I will utter dark sayings of old :

Where this narration concluding, it makes it probable this Psalm was composed by that Asaph, so often mentioned, as one of the principal singers in those days ; who, setting before the people's eyes, as in a table, the benefits their fathers had received, with their shameful ingratitude, and the punishments inflicted upon them for it, teaches and instructs them who succeeded (for which reason some will have it called Maschil, see Ps. xxxii.), to learn greater gratitude and fidelity to their benefactor ; for fear they should incur his higher displeasure, if they did not beware by such bad examples.

Ver. 1.] Attend reverently, O my countrymen, for whom I have a particular affection, unto the admonition which now I intend to give you : listen diligently I beseech you, to the following instruction.

Ver. 2.] It is no vulgar lesson which I would have you learn ; nor will I be sparing in my instruction ; but I will abundantly inform you in the most remark-

3 Which we have heard and known, and our fathers have told us.

4 We will not hide them from their children, shewing to the generation to come the praises of the Lord, and his strength, and his wonderful works that he hath done.

5 For he established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel, which he commanded our fathers, that they should make them known to their children :

6 That the generation to come might know them, even the children which should be born; who should arise and declare them to their children :

7 That they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments :

8 And might not be as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation ; a generation that set not their heart aright, and whose spirit was not stedfast with God.

9 The children of Ephraim, being armed, and carrying bows, turned back in the day of battle.

10 They kept not the covenant of God, and refused to walk in his law ;

11 And forgot his works, and his wonders that he had shewed them.

12 Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers, in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan.

13 He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through ; and he made the waters to stand as an heap.

14 In the daytime also he led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire.

15 He clave the rocks in the wilderness, and gave them drink as out of the great depths.

16 He brought streams also out of the rock, and caused waters to run down like rivers.

17 And they sinned yet more against him by provoking the most high in the wilderness.

able passages of God's providence in former times ; which are more worthy your knowledge, than the skill of resolving the darkest riddles.

Ver. 3.] And I will not report uncertain or doubtful things to you ; or things done in another nation ; but such as are of unquestionable credit ; which you have heard and known to be recorded in your holy books : and our forefathers, who were eye-witnesses of them, have faithfully registered and transmitted unto us.

Ver. 4.] Who will not be so treacherous as to lose the memory of them in our days ; but diligently propagate them to posterity : endeavouring that all future generations may understand, how much the Lord deserves to be praised, for the mighty and stupendous works which he hath done in former ages.

Ver. 5.] And, indeed, when God gave us the law, he strictly charged our forefathers, and made a particular injunction about it, which he frequently repeated (Deut. iv. vi. xi. see the argument) ; that they should be careful to leave the knowledge of these things as a sacred legacy, or inheritance, unto their children.

Ver. 6.] In order to the conveying them, by their hands, to the next generation ; who were then unborn : who should be taught also, when they were grown up, to deliver them with the same diligence to their descendants ; and so preserve the memory of them to all succeeding generations.

Ver. 7.] To the end, that they might learn by such wonderful instances of his powerful goodness, to adhere unto him, and confide in him alone ; and, by the constant commemoration of his benefits, be provoked religiously to observe his precepts.

Ver. 8.] And take warning by the punishments inflicted on them, not to imitate the ingratitude of their forefathers, who were not only a refractory generation, but so fickle, that they fell off from God to the worship of idols, presently after they came out of Egypt : for they did not lay to heart what he had done for them, and so were never rightly disposed to his service ; or if in a good fit they were inclined to it, they soon revolted from him.

Ver. 9.] What could be more shameful, than their base refusal to go and engage the Canaanites, when they were so well appointed for the fight ; and were commanded by God, in whose power they had no confidence, to go up and take possession of the land (Deut. i. 26) ? unless it were their foul cowardice when they did engage them against his command (ver. 43, 44) ; and the Ephraimites themselves, though a valiant tribe, and excellent archers, ran away, and were chased in a shameful manner by their enemies.

Ver. 10.] For they brake their word with God (who therefore would not be with them, Numb. xiv. 43), and would not be governed by his will, but by their own.

Ver. 11.] Never thinking of the illustrious works which their eyes had seen ; and so distrusting his power, notwithstanding all the miracles, whereby he had demonstrated the greatness of it to them.

Ver. 12.] Nor were the next generation any better ; though the memory was then fresh of that heap of wonders, which their fathers saw him do publicly : not in a corner, but in all the land of Egypt ; yea, in and about the principal city of the kingdom.

Ver. 13.] From whence when he had delivered them, and they were in great distress at the Red sea, he made it give way to them, that they might walk through it on dry ground : the fluid water swelling into little hills (Exod. xv. 8), which stood like a solid wall on either hand, to secure them in that dangerous passage (Exod. xiv. 22).

Ver. 14.] Through which he conducted them, as he did at all other times, by a glorious cloud : whose dark side served also in the day-time, for a shadow from the scorching rays of the sun ; and its bright side in the night, for a torch to guide them when they travelled ; or if they rested, to light them in their tents.

Ver. 15.] And when they wanted water in the wilderness, he brought it out of the rocks (which he commanded Moses to smite more than once) ; first at Rephidim (Exod. xvii. 6), and then in Kadesh (Numb. xx. 8, 11), and they had it in such plenty, both for themselves and their cattle, as if it had been a great pond or lake.

Ver. 16.] And yet it was no standing, but a flowing water ; which ran continually out of the dry rock as out of its fountain, in several streams ; or rather, like unto rivers ; which followed them in their travels.

Ver. 17.] But all these miraculous works did not alter their depraved nature, which broke out into new and greater provocations ; in that very place, where,

18 And they tempted God in their heart by asking meat for their lust.

19 Yea, they spake against God; they said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness?

20 Behold, he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed; can he give bread also? can he provide flesh for his people?

21 Therefore the LORD heard this, and was wroth: so a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel;

22 Because they believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation:

23 Though he had commanded the clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven, 24 And had rained down manna upon them to eat, and had given them of the corn of heaven.

25 Man did eat angels' food: he sent them meat to the full.

26 He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven: and by his power he brought in the south wind.

27 He rained flesh also upon them as dust, and feathered fowls like as the sand of the sea:

28 And he let it fall in the midst of their camp, round about their habitations.

29 So they did eat, and were well filled: for he gave them their own desire;

30 They were not estranged from their lust. But while their meat was yet in their mouths, 31 The wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them, and smote down the chosen men of Israel.

32 For all this they sinned still, and believed not for his wondrous works.

33 Therefore their days did he consume in vanity, and their years in trouble.

34 When he slew them, then they sought him: and they returned and enquired early after God.

without the singular providence of their most high benefactor, they had all been starved.

Ver. 18.] For they were not content with the bountiful provision which he had made for them (Exod. xvi.), but muttered within themselves against him: and wished, if he was so powerful and kind as was pretended, that he would give them a new proof of it; by sending them meat to satisfy their wanton appetite.

Ver. 19.] And, at last, they openly declared that distrust of his power which was in their hearts; saying, Is God able to make us a feast here in this barren wilderness? (Numb. xi. 4, 5, &c.)

Ver. 20.) It is true, he hath brought water out of a rock for us in great abundance (which perhaps was lodged there before in the caverns of it, and might have flowed out of itself); but can he give us more substantial bread (not such light stuff as this manna is, which he also hath sent us, Numb. xi. 6), here where no corn grows? and make an ample provision for all this multitude, of such flesh as this place doth not afford?

Ver. 21.] Which rude and insolent language highly incensed the divine displeasure: so that he sent lightning from heaven (Numb. xi. 1) to consume those whom he had before cherished: and he resolved also to punish them more severely, before he had done with them (ver. 33).

Ver. 22.] Because they had so mean an opinion of him, that they durst not confide in him, and commend themselves to his good providence; to preserve and conduct them safe to Canaan.

Ver. 23.] No, not after such extraordinary benefits as they had received from him: for he had undertaken in a miraculous manner (as is fit to be more particularly remembered) to dispense food to them from above, and to make the clouds the granary, whose doors he opened to them.

Ver. 24.] And, instead of rain (to make the earth with long labour become fruitful), to send showers of manna out of the air (Exod. xvi. 4), which was a kind of corn ready prepared for them (Numb. xi. 8, 9).

Ver. 25.] There was not a man among that vast multitude, but was fed with that strong and hearty, or rather princely, food; brought to them from the habitation, and by the ministry, of angels. This was their daily entertainment, as long as their travels in the wilderness lasted; and they had it in such abundance, that none of them could pretend they were not sufficed (Exod. xvi. 16, 17, 35).

Ver. 26.] And therefore it was not to satisfy their hunger, but to reprove their unbelief, that he was pleased to comply with their desires; and, when the wind blew violently out of the east, turned it by his power into the south:

Ver. 27.] Which brought a great cloud of quails (a delicious bird) from the coasts about the Red sea: which (either tired with long flight, or beaten down by the wind) came pouring down like showers of rain; and lay on the ground, as thick as the dust or the sand on the sea-shore, from whence they came (Numb. xi. 31).

Ver. 28.] There was no need of labour, or of any art, to catch them; neither needed they go far to take them up: for they dropped down in the midst of their camp; and lay also many miles round it, in such heaps, that they, who would, might fetch enough to serve them for a whole month (Numb. xi. 20, 31).

Ver. 29.] So they had not only a taste of his liberality, but were glutted and crammed with them: for he satisfied their longings to the full.

Ver. 30.] And they were not hindered from eating as much as they pleased; nor was this diet becoming at all nauseous to them; but they greedily feasted on these birds to the end of the month: and at that very time had these sweet morsels in their mouths (Numb. xi. 33).

Ver. 31.] When the divine vengeance seized on them, by a very great pestilence (Numb. xi. 33), which swept away the strongest and goodliest persons that were in Israel.

Ver. 32.] But these punishments wrought no more change in their hearts than his benefits, for they added new sins to all the former; and were not moved by any of his wonderful works, to believe that he was able to bring them into the land of promise (Numb. xiv. 2—4).

Ver. 33.] For which cause he resolved they should never come thither, but be consumed in the wilderness (Numb. xiv. 28, 33, &c.): where, though they travelled up and down very much and long, yet it was to no purpose; for they were never the nearer to their journey's end, nor were ever free from one plague or other, till they were utterly destroyed.

Ver. 34.] They relented, indeed, sometimes, and when God cut off some of them, the rest began to deprecate his displeasure (Numb. xiv. 39, 40): and, by promising amendment, most earnestly sought to recover his favour.

35 And they remembered that God was their rock, and the high God their redeemer.

36 Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues.

37 For their heart was not right with him, neither were they stedfast in his covenant.

38 But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath.

39 For he remembered that they were but flesh; a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again.

40 How oft did they provoke him in the wilderness, and grieve him in the desert!

41 Yea, they turned back and tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel.

42 They remembered not his hand, nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy.

43 How he had wrought his signs in Egypt, and his wonders in the field of Zoan:

44 And had turned their rivers into blood; and their floods, that they could not drink.

45 He sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them; and frogs, which destroyed them.

46 He gave also their increase unto the caterpillar, and their labour unto the locust.

47 He destroyed their vines with hail, and their sycamore trees with frost.

48 He gave up their cattle also to the hail, and their flocks to hot thunderbolts.

49 He cast upon them the fierceness of his anger, wrath, and indignation, and trouble, by sending evil angels among them.

50 He made a way to his anger; he spared not their soul from death, but gave their life over to the pestilence;

51 And smote all the firstborn in Egypt; the chief of their strength in the tabernacles of Ham:

52 But made his own people to go forth like

Ver. 35.] And professed that they would trust in God hereafter for safety and deliverance: who they acknowledged was superior to all other gods, and had been their mighty redeemer.

Ver. 36.] But all this was little more than speaking him fair, while they lay under his correcting hand: and they did not sincerely intend to do as they promised, when it was removed.

Ver. 37.] For their hearts were not rightly disposed, nor firmly resolved to adhere unto him; as appears by their frequent revolts from their engagements; which they never faithfully observed, but as constantly broke, as they renewed their covenant with him (Numb. xvi. 3. xx. 3, 4. xxi. 5. 7. xxv. 1, 2, &c.).

Ver. 38.] Yet he was so full of compassion, that after he had threatened utterly to destroy them (Numb. xvi. 11, 12), he remitted very much of the severity of the sentence; and did not cut them off at once (ver. 15. 17, 18), but very often spared them when they deserved to be punished; or when he punished them, did it less than their deserts.

Ver. 39.] For he considered how frail they were, and that they could not continue long (though he did not snatch them away), but would moulder of themselves into dust; and vanish like a blast of wind, which makes a bustle and noise for a little time, and then is dispersed and heard of no more.

Ver. 40.] How many times, before this terrible threatening, did they provoke him to anger in the wilderness? (Numb. xiv. 22) and afterward did things exceeding offensive to him, in other parts of the desert? (Numb. xvi. xx. xxi. xxv.)

Ver. 41.] Being so vilely ungrateful, as to talk of returning into Egypt (Numb. xiv. 4); or requiring, upon every occasion, new proofs of his power: nay, questioning whether it could do all things, though he had wrought so many wonders; and appointing him, who had so often shown himself to be incomparably greater than all other gods, what he should do (as I said before, ver. 19, 20), if he intended to have them believe on him.

Ver. 42.] For they quite forgot (this was the reason of their naughtiness, ver. 11, 12, which is fit again to be repeated), or never laid to heart, the mighty things he had done for them: especially that memorable time, when he, by his power alone, delivered them from the tyranny of Pharaoh, who most miserably oppressed them.

Ver. 43.] They did not seriously ponder the evident demonstration he gave of his uncontrollable power, in the miraculous judgments which he sent upon the Egyptians; even upon the court of Pharaoh, and the principal city of the kingdom.

Ver. 44.] When, for instance, he left them no water to quench their thirst; by turning the river Nile (Exod. vii. 17, 19, 20), with all the streams that were derived from it, and all their ponds and pools of water, into blood.

Ver. 45.] And sent an infinite swarm of the most pestilent, and to them the most odious sorts of flies (Exod. viii. 21, 22), which bit the Egyptians, as they used to do their dogs: as not long before he had sent such an army of frogs to invade all places (ver. 3. 8, 9, &c.), and so to spoil their meat and drink, and every thing else, that if this plague had lasted, they must have left their country, or not have lived.

Ver. 46.] After which he exposed the fruits of the earth, for which they had taken long pains, to be devoured by various kinds of locusts; with which the whole country was so overspread, that nothing else but they were to be seen upon the face of the earth (Exod. x. 5).

Ver. 47.] Which had been miserably harrassed before, by storms of hail, both small and great: whereby not only the grapes and such-like fruit were smitten down, but the trees themselves (for instance, the vines, and the wild fig-trees) quite killed, and corrupted at the very root (Exod. ix. 18, 19, 25).

Ver. 48.] For there was a dreadful thunder, and lightning mixed together with it; which let no living creature escape, but destroyed even the cattle and the flocks, which were left abroad in the fields (Exod. ix. 22, 23, &c.).

Ver. 49.] Many other ways he plagued them, which were tokens of his severest displeasure; by a grievous murrain, by fiery boils, by a most dismal darkness (Exod. ix. 10), till at length he sent evil angels (who had frightened them in that darkness, Wisd. xvii. 3), as the ministers of his heavy wrath.

Ver. 50.] Which irresistibly and speedily seized on them, whosoever he found them; and spared not their lives: but took away the first-born of all their cattle by a pestilential disease (Exod. xii. 30).

Ver. 51.] As well as the first-born of all their children (the prop of their families, in whom the hope of future succession was principally laid), throughout the dwellings of the posterity of Cham, the father of the Egyptians (Gen. x. 6; Exod. xii. 30).

sheep, and guided them in the wilderness like a flock.

53 And he led them on safely, so that they feared not: but the sea overwhelmed their enemies.

54 And he brought them to the border of his sanctuary, even to this mountain, which his right hand had purchased.

55 He cast out the heathen also before them, and divided them an inheritance by line, and made the tribes of Israel to dwell in their tents.

56 Yet they tempted and provoked the most high God, and kept not his testimonies:

57 But turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers: they were turned aside like a deceitful bow.

58 For they provoked him to anger with their high places, and moved him to jealousy with their graven images.

59 When God heard this, he was wroth, and greatly abhorred Israel:

60 So that he forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent which he placed among men;

61 And delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemy's hand.

62 He gave his people over also unto the sword; and was wroth with his inheritance.

63 The fire consumed their young men; and their maidens were not given to marriage.

64 Their priests fell by the sword; and their widows made no lamentation.

65 Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine.

66 And he smote his enemies in the hinder part: he put them to a perpetual reproach.

67 Moreover he refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim:

Ver. 52.] And by that means brought forth his people from among them (Exod. xii. 31), as peaceably as a shepherd doth his sheep out of their folds (not so much as a dog moving his tongue against them, Exod. xi. 7), and then directed them the way they should go in the wilderness (Exod. xiii. 18. 21), where he graciously provided for them.

Ver. 53.] He conducted them securely, even through the Red Sea, without any apprehension of danger (Exod. xiv. 19. 22), but overwhelmed Pharaoh and his followers, in that very path where they travelled in safety.

Ver. 54.] And never ceased his care over them, (notwithstanding all their provocations), till he brought them into his holy land; and (in the issue) to this mount Zion: which, not their prowess, but his mighty power, by the hand of David, won for them (2 Sam. v. 6, &c.).

Ver. 55.] And after he had expelled the old inhabitants, who were not able to stand before them (Josh. xii.), he distributed, by lot, to every tribe their portion of land, which they should inherit (Josh. xiv.), and settled them in a quiet possession of it (Josh. xxi. 43, 44).

Ver. 56.] Yet, after so many, and so great benefits, they behaved themselves no better, in that good land, than they had done in the wilderness: but as soon as Joshua and the elders were dead (Judg. ii. 7. 10), they disbelieved the threatenings of their law, and would make a trial whether they were true or not; provoking the great Lord of all the world, by slighting his commandments, which he had so strictly enjoined them to observe.

Ver. 57.] They imitated their forefathers, both in their frequent apostasies from God, and in their falsehood to their promises, when they pretended to repent of them (Judg. ii. 13. 18. 19. iii. 7, &c.); having depraved minds and hearts, which (like an ill-made bow, that never sends the arrow to the mark) would turn aside into crooked ways, and not be directed according to the will of God.

Ver. 58.] For they highly incensed him, by their altars and images (Judg. vi. 25), which they built after the manner of the heathen (Numb. xxii. 41), in the high places; where they worshipped a number of false gods (Judg. x. 6), to his great offence and dishonour.

Ver. 59.] Which was so notorious, that the judge of the world could not but take notice of it, and severely punish it; by abandoning that people, for whom he had done such wonders, into the hands of the Syrians, the Moabites, the Midianites, Philistines, and the children of Ammon (see the book of Judges), who made them as contemptible unto others, as they were loathsome unto him.

Ver. 60.] Inasmuch that, at last, he quite forsook the city of Shiloh, where, in his tabernacle, he had been graciously pleased to be present with them (1 Sam. iv. 3. 4), and would never return unto it any more (Jer. vii. 12, and see argument of Ps. lxxviii.).

Ver. 61.] Nay, he let the ark of the covenant, the special token of his presence with them, from whence his power was wont to appear most gloriously for them, not only fall into their hands; but he carried away captive by the Philistines (1 Sam. iv. 11. 22. v. 1).

Ver. 62.] Whose sword slew a great number of his people (1 Sam. iv. 10); so exceeding angry was he with those, whom he had formerly taken into his special care, above all other nations (Deut. xxxii. 8, 9).

Ver. 63.] For it was by his divine vengeance, more than the Philistines' valour, that they lost abundance of brave young men; the very flower of their army: by which means many of their virgins were constrained to remain unmarried; and they that found husbands were fain to omit all tokens of joy, in a time of public sorrow.

Ver. 64.] For some of their priests, who were peculiarly consecrated to God's service, were slain in this battle (1 Sam. iv. 11), and their wives, oppressed with grief, did not long survive, to make any public funeral for them (ver. 20).

Ver. 65.] The Lord himself also (who was wont to fight for us) seemed no more concerned in all these calamities, which befell both us and our religion, than a mighty commander is at that which is done to his army when he is asleep, or overcome with wine: till at last, like such a great warrior (who being awaked calls for his arms, and charges the enemy with greater fury), he vindicated his honour in a terrible manner, and made a very great destruction among them (1 Sam. v. 9. 11).

Ver. 66.] For, besides the fall of Dagon before the ark, he smote several cities of the Philistines, with a grievous sort of hemorrhoids; whereof many died, and the rest languished under most miserable torments (1 Sam. v. 6. 9. 12); the monuments of which they themselves were forced to make, and send back with the ark; to his great glory, and their eternal reproach (vi. 3, 4, 9).

Ver. 67.] Yet he would not return to Shiloh again

68 But chose the tribe of Judah, the mount Zion which he loved.

69 And he built his sanctuary, like high palaces, like the earth which he hath established for ever.

70 He chose David also his servant, and took him from the sheepfolds:

(which was in the tribe of Ephraim, the son of Joseph), nor have the ark of his presence placed there any more.

Ver. 68.] But first it was brought to Kirjathaim, (1 Sam. vi. 21), a city of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 6), where he resolved hereafter to have his special residence: and so from thence (after a short stay at the house of Obed-edom) unto mount Zion (1 Chron. xiii. 6. xvi. 1. 3. 29), which he preferred before the hill of Kirjathaim (1 Sam. vii. 1), or any other place in all the country.

Ver. 69.] There Solomon built him a stately temple, which, as it was a high and lofty fabric, so was not movable like his former habitation; but remained perpetually fixed, like the earth on which it stood.

Ver. 70.] For as he had rejected Shiloh, and chosen

71 From following the ewes great with young he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance.

72 So he fed them according to the integrity of his heart; and guided them by the skilfulness of his hands.

Zion for the place of his dwelling; so he had likewise rejected Saul, and chosen David (the father of Solomon) to be the king of his people: a man, who served him as faithfully in that office, as he had done his father in keeping of his sheep.

Ver. 71.] From that mean employment he took him and raised him to the highest charge and dignity; that the care he had employed in looking after the ewes, and their lambs when they should fall, he might exercise in governing his people; and endeavouring that they, whom he had chosen for his own peculiar inheritance, did no way miscarry.

Ver. 72.] And he did not deceive his expectation; but governed them with equal integrity and prudence: never designing any thing but their good; and dexterously accomplishing whatsoever he designed.

PSALM LXXIX.

A Psalm of Asaph.

1 O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance; thy holy temple have they defiled; they have laid Jerusalem on heaps.

2 The dead bodies of thy servants have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the heaven, the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth.

3 Their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem; and there was none to bury them.

4 We are become a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and derision to them that are round about us.

5 How long, Lord? wilt thou be angry for ever? shall thy jealousy burn like fire?

6 Pour out thy wrath upon the heathen that and by him only made use of to his purpose: which was to show, that the same cruelties were in great part acted over again, which their fathers had seen at the destruction of Jerusalem.

Ver. 1.] O God, the supreme judge of the world, thou art not ignorant, we know, of our calamity, for it comes by thy order; but give us leave to represent unto thy majesty, the sad condition of the people and place which were once very dear unto thee; for profane nations have not only invaded our (or rather thy) country, to which thou hast a peculiar title, but polluted thy own house, which was separated to thy service alone; and laid it, together with Jerusalem, in ruinous heaps.

Ver. 2.] Under which thy servants the priests, and other holy men, whom they have slain, could not have the honour to be buried; nor obtain the common civility of a grave: but the dead bodies of those whom thou lovedst, they have barbarously exposed to be devoured by ravenous beasts and birds.

Ver. 3.] For they valued the shedding of their blood no more than the pouring out of water: which flowed in such abundance about Jerusalem, that they left not men enough alive to take care of the interment of the dead.

Ver. 4.] And we that remain lead a most despicable life, being not only scorned and abused, but openly derided, and made the sport of the Edomites and other nations, which formerly stood in awe of us.

Ver. 5.] And, which is saddest of all, we have long

PSALM LXXIX.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm was penned, in all probability, upon the same occasion with the seventy-fourth; viz. the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar: see what I have said there, in the argument of that Psalm; and it will appear altogether unlikely, that this should have respect to the times of Antiochus Epiphanes: as many imagine, and among the rest, Theodoret: which is the more strange, because the same reason he gives there why the seventy-fourth Psalm doth not belong to those times (which he repeats again upon Ps. lxxx. 17), lies as strongly against the application of this Psalm to the fury and rage wherewith that prince fell upon the Jewish nation. Whose miserable calamity under Nebuchadnezzar we find bewailed by Jeremiah, who then lived (Jer. x. 25), in the very words of the sixth and seventh verses of this Psalm; which is some indication that they both belong to the same matter: but whether Jeremiah took them from Asaph, or Asaph from him, I cannot certainly determine. The latter is most likely; because this Psalm seems to have been written after that desolation had for some time continued.

We read, indeed, in the first book of Maccabees (vii. 16, 17), two other verses of this Psalm (viz. 2, 3), applied to the slaughter of threescore of the devouter sort of Jews, presently after Antiochus's death. But that author quotes them, it is plain, as words which had been written in former days; have not known thee, and upon the kingdoms that have not called upon thy name.

7 For they have devoured Jacob, and laid waste his dwelling place.

8 O remember not against us former iniquities : let thy tender mercies speedily prevent us : for we are brought very low.

9 Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name : and deliver us, and purge away our sins, for thy name's sake.

10 Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is their God ? let him be known among the heathen in our sight by the revenging of the blood of thy servants which is shed.

11 Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee ; according to the greatness of thy power preserve thou those that are appointed to die ;

12 And render unto our neighbours sevenfold into their bosom their reproach, wherewith they have reproached thee, O LORD.

13 So we thy people and sheep of thy pasture will give thee thanks for ever : we will shew forth thy praise to all generations.

complained of this, and find no relief ; but only in our most passionate cries to thee, O Lord : the effects of whose just anger and jealousy we groan under (because we have forsaken thee, and been unfaithful to our covenant with thee), but hope they will not always last : nor proceed to make an utter end of us.

Ver. 6.] Pour them out rather (in as full a measure, and with as little pity, as they did our blood, ver. 3), upon the Babylonians : who, though they have conquered many kingdoms, do not acknowledge thee at all, nor ascribe their successes to thy power : but to their idols whom they serve and honour with that worship which is due to thee alone.

Ver. 7.] They have been the instruments, indeed, of thy vengeance ; but have executed it with such cruelty, that, not content with the conquest of us, they have sought our total extirpation : having depopulated our country, and made that pleasant land a wilderness ; which thou gavest to Jacob and his seed for their habitation.

Ver. 8.] O let not his virtue, and the covenant thou madest with him, be forgotten ; when thou reckonest with us for the sins of our forefathers ; the punishment of which we beseech thee that we may bear no longer : speed our deliverance, good Lord ; and how unworthy soever we be, let thy tender compassion prevail with thee, to save us from utter ruin, which is very near : so few, so broken and spent we are, unless seasonably prevented by thy mercy.

Ver. 9.] Send us that seasonable help, O God, from whom alone we expect it, and have heretofore very often received it : for it will tend much to the honour of thy almighty goodness (which in former times was much celebrated, but of late hath been exceedingly disparaged) to save us now, when none is able to preserve us : upon that account be pleased to pass by our sins, and to interpose for our deliverance ; lest thou suffer together with us.

Ver. 10.] While the idolatrous nations utter this insolent language (which is exceeding grievous, nay, insupportable, to us), If their God be so great in himself, and so kind to them, as they pretend ; why doth he not take their part, and appear for their deliverance ? O that thou wouldst put them to silence, by taking such an open and remarkable vengeance on these blasphemous nations for the blood they have shed ; that not only we, but all the world, may see, thou hast a care of us thy servants.

Ver. 11.] Let the sighs and groans of those who lie in prison be as prevalent with thee as these prayers : and magnify thy power by preserving the lives of those whom they have condemned to die.

Ver. 12.] And when thou hast done with the Babylonians, reckon with our neighbours also, who have insulted over us, and derided us, or rather have spoken so reproachfully of thee, O God, that they justly deserve, not only to be paid home in their kind, but to be made seven times more contemptible than we have been.

Ver. 13.] So we thy people, being conducted again to our land, and happily restored to live under thy government there, will never cease to give thanks unto thee, for thy benefits bestowed upon us ; and be careful to transmit the memory of them to those who shall come after us, that all future generations may perpetuate thy praises.

PSALM LXXX.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim-eduth. A Psalm of Asaph.

1 GIVE ear, O Shepherd of Israel, thou that leadest Joseph like a flock ; thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth.

2 Before Ephraim and Benjamin and Manasseh stir up thy strength, and come and save us.

PSALM LXXX.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm is something of kin to the former ; deprecating the displeasure of the Almighty in a time of great calamity. Which, as all that I have met withal think, was either in the captivity of Judah and Benjamin by Nebuchadnezzar ; or of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser. But it seems to me rather to have been penned between these two, in the time of Hezekiah : who had written a letter you find (2 Chron. xxxi. 6), to the remnant that were escaped out of the hand of the king of Assyria ; especially to Ephraim and Manasseh, the tribes nearest to them, that they would come to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, and keep the pass-over with them : which summons several of them obeyed (ver. 11. 18) ; and kept the feast as long again as they were wont (ver. 23). And when this was finished, they all went through the country, and threw down all the high places and altars that they found ; not only in Judah, but in Benjamin also, Ephraim, and Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxi. 1).

But after this happy settlement, you read there (xxxii. 1), that the land was invaded by Sennacherib, and sorely distressed ; to the great discouragement, no doubt, of those who had joined in the reformation ; which moved Asaph (mentioned 2 Chron. xxix. 30, see the argument of Ps. lxxiii.) most earnestly to 3 Turn us again, O God, and cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.

4 O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry against the prayer of thy people?

5 Thou feedest them with the bread of tears; and givest them tears to drink in great measure.

6 Thou makest us a strife unto our neighbours; and our enemies laugh among themselves.

7 Turn us again, O God of hosts, and cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.

8 Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt: thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it.

9 Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land.

10 The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars.

11 She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river.

12 Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her?

13 The boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it.

beseech God (ver. 2, of this Psalm), that he would be pleased to stir up himself before Ephraim and Manasseh, as well as Benjamin (who was so linked to Judah, that part of Jerusalem and of the temple stood in that tribe); and let them see, by a remarkable deliverance, that their zeal for the purity of their religion was acceptable to him.

Another reason, indeed, there may be given (which I have not omitted in my paraphrase) why these three are joined together, rather than any other, because they were the tribes (as we read in the second of Numbers), who, when they were in the wilderness, always marched behind the tabernacle when it moved; and had that part where the propitiatory was, from whence God sent his oracles, and the tokens of his power, just before them. But then there is this to be added, to make it probable that this Psalm was not penned in the time of the captivity, because, as then there was no ark; nor did God sit between the cherubims (concerning which phrase the learned reader may see Lud. De Dieu upon 1 Sam. iv. 4), as he is said here to do; nor were Ephraim and Manasseh then mixed with them, that we read of: so, first of all, it is too full of elegancies for that time of utter desolation: and, secondly, the Greek expressly calls it, A Psalm concerning the Assyrian (who is the wild boar, I suppose, that broke into God's vineyard, mentioned ver. 13), and lastly Hezekiah, I observe, applies himself to God (in the time of that distress by the king of Assyria), in the very language of the Psalmist; and begins his prayer just as Asaph doth here, to him that sits between the cherubims, desiring him to incline his ear to his requests (2 Kings xix. 15, 16; Isa. xxxvii. 16, 17.)

It was delivered to the chief master of music, to be sung as the sixtieth Psalm, upon the instruments of six strings: which were wont to be used in solemn thanksgivings (see the argument of that Psalm): for he nothing doubted God would hear his prayers, and destroy Sennacherib: or, perhaps, it was ordered afterward to be sung in that manner.

Ver. 1.] O thou, who art the ruler and protector of thy people Israel, who didst long ago give a famous instance of thy power, in preserving Joseph, when he fell, like an innocent lamb, among a company of wolves (Gen. xxxvii. 18, &c.), and conducting him to the highest preferment; reject not our humble petitions, which we put up unto thee in the like distress; but show that thou favourest us, by some illustrious token of thy presence among us, in thy holy place, from whence thou canst send angels to defend and deliver us (2 Kings xix. 35.)

Ver. 2.] Let the posterity of Joseph, who beheld heretofore so many enemies fall before thee, when they attended upon the ark of thy presence in the wilderness (Numb. ii. 18. 20. 22), and have lately been very zealous in thy service (2 Chron. xxx. I. xxxi. 1).

see thy power to be as great as ever (though for some time it hath not appeared at all for us): and that thou art as forward, in due time, to grant us a glorious deliverance.

Ver. 3.] Restore us, O God, to our former happiness; and for that end restore us into thy favour: and then there will soon be an end of our calamities.

Ver. 4.] For what can the greatest armies (2 Kings xviii. 17) do against thee, who art the supreme Lord of all, the absolute commander of the hosts of heaven? whose help we have most importunately implored, and long waited for, as men impatient to see our enemies so prevalent, though hitherto thou hast been so exceeding angry with us, that thou hast not heard the prayers of thy people.

Ver. 5.] But hast turned our joyful feasts into fasting and weeping; and our plenty into scarcity of all things, but only of tears: which we pour out in large measure; when we think of the danger we are in, to perish by famine and by thirst (2 Chron. xxxii. 21).

Ver. 6.] Our neighbours, the Edomites and others, either pick quarrels with us, or strive among themselves who shall make the greatest booty of us: while our enemies, that besiege us, mock at our inability to help ourselves; and at our confidence which we place in thee (2 Kings xviii. 22, 23; 2 Chron. xxxii. 15).

Ver. 7.] Convince them, O Lord, that it is not vainly placed, by restoring us again to our former happiness: which it is easy for thee to do, who hast all the host of heaven at thy command; if thou wilt but be pleased to favour us (as we again beseech thee thou wilt), then no harm shall befall us.

Ver. 8.] We were once very dear unto thee, when thou didst transplant us, like a choice vine, out of Egypt into this country: from whence thou didst drive out the ancient inhabitants, that we might be settled in their place.

Ver. 9.] Thou preparedst the way for us, making our terror fall upon them before we came (Joshua ii. 9—11), so that we easily expelled them; and being there firmly established, like a vine deeply rooted in a fruitful soil, we increased and multiplied, till we peopled all the land.

Ver. 10.] And as a rich vine covers the hill, on the side of which it is planted, or overtops the lofty cedars, which support it: so we obscured the splendour of the greatest kingdoms, and made mighty kings become tributaries to us (1 Kings iv. 21).

Ver. 11.] For our empire extended itself (just like such a luxuriant vine, which spreads its branches every way) from the Midland sea to the river Euphrates, 1 Kings iv. 21 (see Ps. lxxii. 8).

Ver. 12.] But now, alas! thou hast withdrawn thy protection from us; and we are left like a vineyard without its hedges: all our strong holds and fenced cities are taken (2 Kings xviii. 3); so that we lie open to be made a prey to every one that hath a mind to spoil us.

14 Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts : look down from heaven, and behold, and visit this vine ;

15 And the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted, and the branch that thou madest strong for thyself.

16 It is burnt with fire, it is cut down : they perish at the rebuke of thy countenance.

Ver. 13.] The Assyrian king, like a wild boar, that breaks into a vineyard, treads down all under his feet, and seeks to root us up : there is no savage beast can make greater havoc among the vines, than his barbarous soldiers have done throughout all the land ; which they have eaten up (2 Kings xix. 29).

Ver. 14.] Our only hope is, that thou, the great Lord of hosts, on whom the event of wars, as of all things else, depends, wilt be reconciled unto us, and drive him out again ; deny us not this request, we beseech thee ; but, though we be destitute of all help on earth, yet send us some from heaven ; and, though very unworthy, yet graciously take us into thy care, and repair the breaches which they have made.

Ver. 15.] Be favourable to the remnant of us, which, by thy powerful preservation, is still left ; like the root or stock of a vine, which may sprout out again (2 Kings xix. 30, 31) : and especially to our king, whom thou hast endued with zeal and courageous resolution for thy service (2 Chron. xxx. 32) and for our defence (xxxii. 5—8).

Ver. 16.] Great numbers of us are destroyed already, and may be compared to the numerous 17 Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, upon the son of man whom thou madest strong for thyself.

18 So will not we go back from thee : quicken us, and we will call upon thy name.

19 Turn us again, O LORD God of hosts, cause thy face to shine ; and we shall be saved.

branches of that remaining stock, which being cut off, are burnt with fire : and all the rest of us must perish, if thou wilt not be reconciled unto us, but still persevere in thy anger towards us.

Ver. 17.] Which we beseech thee turn away ; and be the mighty helper of our sovereign, who is dearly beloved by thee ; of that excellent prince, whom thou hast endued with zeal and courageous resolution, for thy service, and for our defence and preservation (ver. 15).

Ver. 18.] Which shall be an everlasting obligation upon us, never to revolt from thee to our former idolatry : do but free us from these deadly enemies and we will worship thee alone ; and never cease to praise thee, and acknowledge that we owe our very lives to thy almighty goodness.

Ver. 19.] Hear us, O great Lord, who hast all the angels in heaven at thy command ; hear us, we once more beseech thee, and restore us perfectly to our former happiness ; and, in order to it, restore us to thy favour ; and let there be a speedy end of all these calamities.

PSALM LXXXI.

To the chief Musician upon Gittith. A Psalm of Asaph.

1 SING aloud unto God our strength : make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob.

PSALM LXXXI.

ARGUMENT.—There was a special command of God, as the psalmist here takes notice (ver. 4), for the making a joyful sound with trumpets, upon all the solemn days, especially their new moons (Numb. x. 10). But more particularly upon the first day of the seventh month ; which is called by this peculiar name, above all other days, a day of blowing the trumpets, i. e. from morning unto evening, (Numb. xxix. 1), and a memorial of blowing trumpets, (Lev. xxiii. 24). For this solemn day, I suppose, this Psalm was composed ; and the reason is apparent why they were to blow with trumpets longer on this day than any other, because it was the first new moon in the year (for, according to their old computation before they came out of Egypt, their year began on this day, as appears from Exod. xxiii. 16. xxxiv. 22, where the feast of in-gathering their fruits is said to be in the revolution, or the end, of the year) ; and God intended, it is possible, to awaken them, (as Maimonides conjectures) to prepare themselves by strict inquiry into their lives, and by hearty repentance, for the great day of atonement, which was the tenth of this month.

But of what this blowing trumpets or cornets was a memorial, is not easy to resolve ; the Hebrews themselves being at such a loss about it, that they are fain to go as far back as the deliverance of Isaac, and the offering a ram in his stead, for the reason of it. The clearest account of which, it seems to me, may be fetched from this Psalm ; which plainly intimates, that the blowing with trumpets at that time, related to something which ensued upon their happy deliverance out of Egypt : which, though it began upon the first day of the first month, according to their new computation (which took its original from that deliverance, in memory of which God ordained the feast of the passover to begin on that day, Lev. xxiii. 6), yet they had not a complete body of laws delivered to them by Moses, till the first day of the seventh month, which was the feast of blowing trumpets.

Moses received, indeed, several laws in the third month (Exod. xix. 1. 3, &c.), on the third day whereof (ver. 11. 16. 19, 20) God himself appeared on the top of Mount Sinai, with the sound of a trumpet exceeding loud and prolonged (to which I believe this feast hath respect), and spake the ten commandments ; after which Moses delivered them a body of civil laws (Exod. xxi.—xxiii). But they did not know the manner of the divine service, for which they came out of Egypt into the wilderness, till Moses had been twice forty days, one after the other, in the mount ; and, likewise (as several of the Jews understand those passages in Deut. ix. relating to this matter), had forty days more bewailed their sin in making the golden calf. Which sixscore days, if we add to the time between their coming out of Egypt, and the giving of the law on 3 Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast day.

4 For this was a statute for Israel, and a law of the God of Jacob.

5 This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony, when he went out through the land of Egypt: where I heard a language that I understood not.

6 I removed his shoulder from the burden: his hands were delivered from the pots.

7 Thou calledst in trouble, and I delivered thee; I answered thee in the secret place of thunder: I proved thee at the waters of Meribah. Selah.

8 Hear, O my people, and I will testify unto thee: O Israel, if thou wilt hearken unto me;

9 There shall no strange god be in thee; neither shalt thou worship any strange god.

10 I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt: open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it.

11 But my people would not hearken to my voice; and Israel would none of me.

mount Sinai, and to the six days which passed before Moses was called up into the cloud, it will fall out exactly to be the first day of the seventh month, when he began to give orders for the building of the tabernacle, and making all things belonging to God's house; according to the direction he had received in the mount. I am sure this was the precise time of their setting up the altar, and beginning to offer burnt-offering, after their return from the captivity at Babylon, before the foundation of the temple was laid. For you read, Ezra iii. 1. 6, it was upon the first day of the seventh month; in the middle of which they also kept the feast of tabernacles, as Moses had appointed; in memory of their dwelling in booths in the wilderness, under the government of the Almighty, unto which the psalmist here hath respect in the next words, which we translate "in the time appointed," that is, at the full moon (as De Dieu. hath demonstrated), on which the feast of tabernacles was kept in this seventh month: at which feast Solomon dedicated his temple, 1 Kings viii. 2, where it is called the feast: and may well be meant here in the last words of the third verse of this Psalm, our solemn feast-day. Unless we take both the new moon feast, and the full moon (i. e. feast of tabernacles), to be meant, and translate it "on the day of our feast." The same first day also was kept holy by Nehemiah, with great solemnity, viii. 1. 8—10, where you find how the book of the law was distinctly read to the people on this day, and the sense of it explained: so that they came the next day again for further instruction (ver. 13).

Now that they might be more mindful of those divine benefits which in this month they commemorated, more than in any other month in the year, Asaph (in the days of David, it is likely) composed this Psalm, and directed it to the master of music, to be sung (as the eight Psalm upon Gittith) in the beginning of it, upon the feast of trumpets. And he introduces God himself (before whom they were summoned, as I said, by these trumpets to appear), instructing them in the end of this solemnity; and complaining of their forgetfulness of his benefits, in giving them so great a deliverance out of the Egyptian slavery; and of their hard-heartedness, in preferring their own inventions, and the miseries they brought thereby upon themselves, before his counsels, and the happiness he intended for them. Which happiness is expressed in the last verse, by satisfying them with honey out of the rock: concerning which the learned may consult Bochartus, De Sacris Animal. par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 12.

Ver. 1.] Sing praises aloud unto God, to whose mighty power alone we owe the deliverance which we now commemorate: shout with the voice of triumph, in honour of him, who was so good unto your forefathers.

Ver. 2.] Offer to him your cheerful hymns; and, to complete the melody, and express the greatness of your joy, let some with timbrels, others with the pleasant harp, and others with the psalter, celebrate the memory of his mercies.

Ver. 3.] And let the priests especially (Numb. x. 8) take care to blow with the trumpets at the sacred solemnity; on the first day of the seventh month, the principal new moon in the year (which is attended with another feast at the full moon of this month): that all the people may call to mind the trumpet of God (Exod. xix. 16. 19), which our fathers heard, at his dreadful appearance on mount Sinai, to give his law unto them.

Ver. 4.] For thus hath the Lord decreed in that law; where the God of our father Jacob requires this service of us (Lev. xxiii. 24, &c.).

Ver. 5.] This he appointed unto the children of Joseph, as well as the rest of the tribes of Israel, for a perpetual memorial of his benefits: when he, going out over all the land of Egypt (Exod. xi. 4. xii. 23. 29), and destroying all the first-born, forced them to let us depart into the wilderness; where we heard, to our great astonishment (for we were never before acquainted with it), the voice of God.

Ver. 6.] Who, considering with himself what a title he had to our service (having taken off the heavy burdens which the Egyptians had laid upon our backs, and rid our hands of those sordid and dirty employments, wherein they made us labour),

Ver. 7.] Admonished us to this effect, saying; You cried to me by reason of your cruel servitude under Pharaoh's task-masters (Exod. ii. 23), and I delivered you out of it (iii. 8); and again answered your prayers, when you cried unto me in a new distress, at the Red sea (xiv. 10. 13), but confounded the Egyptians, with thunder and lightning out of the cloudy pillar (ver. 24, 25; Ps. lxxvii. 18), after all which, I might well expect you should depend upon me: but presently found you full of distrust and infidelity at the waters of strife (Exod. xvii. 7); where I gave you a new proof of my power.

Ver. 8.] Of which, if you will still enjoy the benefit, then give ear, O my people, and I will solemnly declare my will; and give a severe charge unto you, O ye Israelites, if you resolve to be obedient to my admonitions.

Ver. 9.] Then this is the principal thing upon which all the rest depends; you shall not suffer any other gods to be acknowledged among you, but only me (Exod. xx. 3. 23); nor shall you worship the gods of other nations (xxiii. 13. 24. 32).

Ver. 10.] For I, and I alone, am the living Lord, the eternal God; who gave a being to all things; and who am your peculiar benefactor; having brought you out of the Egyptian bondage (Exod. ix. 4. xx. 2); and if you will be faithful and obedient to me, enlarge your desires as far as you please, and I will satisfy them; for all the world is mine (xix. 5. xxiii. 25).

Ver. 11.] But, notwithstanding their seeming compliance with him, and the fair promises they made him (Exod. xix. 8. xx. 19. xxiv. 3. 7) he presently complained (xxxii. 7—9, as I hear him still do at this day), My people would not be obedient to me; and Israel would not rest contented with me alone:

Ver. 12.] So, provoked by their long stubbornness, I took no farther care of them, but left them to do as they pleased; saying, Let them follow their own inventions.

Ver. 13.] But it had been better for them to have adhered to me; who, out of my tender affection to their good, still wished, even when they were so refractory, that my people Israel had been so wise as to have followed my directions, and been led by my advice; and not their own foolish imaginations.

Ver. 14.] Then I should in a short time have quelled all their enemies; and, by one victory after another, have quite destroyed those adversaries: which (since I brought them into Canaan) have often miserably afflicted and oppressed them (Judg. ii. 2, 3, 14, 15, 19, 20. iii. 1, &c. iv. 2).

Ver. 15.] All that maligned their prosperity, and set themselves against the design of the Lord, to make them victorious over their enemies, should have been so daunted, that they should have dissembled their inward hatred, and been forced, at least, to a counterfeited submission: but his people should have seen blessed days, and enjoyed a substantial and durable happiness without any interruption.

Ver. 16.] He should have made their country exceeding fruitful, and fed them with the richest wheat: and I myself, saith the Lord, would have blessed thee with such plenty, that in the deserts thou shouldst have found the sweetest refreshments; and, without any care of thine, the bees should have laboured honey for thee, in the rocks, and holes of trees, and such-like places (Deut. xxxii. 13; Judg. xiv. 8; 1 Sam. xiv. 25, 26).

PSALM LXXXII

A Psalm of Asaph.

1 God standeth in the congregation of the mighty; he judgeth among the gods.

2 How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked? Selah.

3 Defend the poor and fatherless: do justice to the afflicted and needy.

4 Deliver the poor and needy: rid them out of the hand of the wicked.

PSALM LXXXII.

ARGUMENT.—Though there had been a notable reformation made by Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xix. 5, 6, &c.) of those corruptions which had been growing in the supreme court of judicature at Jerusalem, as well as in the lesser in other cities, ever since the times of David and Solomon (who took care to see justice done, 1 Chron. xviii. 14; 1 Kings iii. 9. 23); yet it appears, by the frequent complaints of Isaiah, that when Hezekiah (in whose days that prophet lived) came to the crown, there was a general depravation again; and that, notwithstanding the amendment he had made in matters of the divine worship (2 Chron. xxx. xxxi.), and his resolutions and endeavours, no question to reform the abuses which were in the civil judicatures (as I have expounded Ps. lxxv. 2, 3), they continued still exceeding corrupt. Inasmuch that Isaiah calls their judges, "rulers of Sodom" (Isa. i. 10, when he finds no fault with their religious services, ver. 11, 12, &c.), and says, their princes were rebellious, companions of thieves, loving gifts, and following after rewards (ver. 23).

Where it is evident he describes the judges in the highest court of all; who are called by the name of princes in several places, particularly in Jeremiah: who being condemned by the priests, and prophets, and people, as a man worthy to die (Jer. xxvi. 8, 9), was brought before the princes (ver. 10, 11), at whose bar he cleared himself so well, that they acquitted him (ver. 16).

And as there they are called princes, with respect to their superiority over the people, so here in this Psalm they are called elohim, gods, in respect to the fountain of their power, which was from the most high; who honoured them with his own name; which is so frequent for those of the supreme court, that some, not unreasonably, understand those words (Judg. ix. 13), which we render, "cheers the heart of God and man," in this manner; Wine alike cheers both princes and people, judges and clients, the meanest persons (called in this Psalm Adam, man, ver. 6, 7) as well as the greatest, who, in opposition to them, are called gods. Whom Asaph (who lived in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxix. 30, see Ps. lxxiii.) admonishes to be more careful in their duty; and to remember that God observed them, and would judge them.

Ver. 1.] Remember, O ye judges, whose ministers you are (2 Chron. xix. 6); and consider, that you are not so powerful, but God, who hath put you in his place, and honoured you with his name (Exod. xxii. 28), is far greater: and, as he is present in your court to observe what you do, so will call you to a strict account, and severely punish you, if you judge amiss.

Ver. 2.] How dare you then pronounce an unrighteous sentence? Is it not time to leave off your partiality? and no longer to favour a bad cause, because the man is rich and great; and can either give you a large bribe, if you will judge it for him; or do you a mischief, if you give sentence against him?

Ver. 3.] Your duty is, to do equal justice to all men that come before you; and to take a particular care, that the poor and the fatherless do not suffer because they have no money to give, nor any friend to solicit, for the defence of a righteous cause: and that the 5 They know not, neither will they understand; they walk on in darkness: all the foundations of the earth are out of course.

6 I have said, Ye are gods; and all of you are children of the most high.

men of low condition, and such as are reduced to very great want, be not condemned, when they are injuriously prosecuted by those who are above them.

Ver. 4.] See that you protect and deliver him that is quite exhausted and miserably oppressed with poverty; let them not become a prey to violent men, who have no conscience; but put it out of their power to undo them.

Ver. 5.] These are the constant admonitions which the men of God give the judges; but, alas! hitherto they have little prevailed. For they will not study the laws of God; or if they do, will not think it their interest to be governed by them: but are blinded by bribes, or by their corrupt affections, to do any thing that they would have them; inasmuch that the foundations of the kingdom, which are justice and truth, are shaken; all things are in confusion, and in danger to come to utter ruin (Isa. v. 23, 24. x. 1—3).

Ver. 6.] Hear therefore the sentence of God upon you (whose words these are); I have put my majesty

7 But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes.

8 Arise, O God, judge the earth; for thou shalt inherit all nations.

upon you; and, though you be no more than other men in yourselves, have by my constitution raised you to such a dignity on earth, as my celestial ministers have in heaven.

Ver. 7.] Yet this shall not privilege you in your unjust proceedings; but since you have no regard to me, nor to your office, I will have as little regard to you: for you shall perish like one of the common men, without any respect to your honour; and be thrown down from your seats, like the tyrants and cruel oppressors that have been before you.

Ver. 8.] Let us see this sentence fulfilled, O God, the righteous judge; and do not suffer the insolent iniquity of these men any longer; but redress all those evils wherewith such men have filled not only this nation, but all the world; which belongs to thee, and thou wilt one day sure vindicate mankind, as the just owner of them, from the tyranny of those impious governors; who now abuse them, as if they had an absolute dominion over them.

PSALM LXXXIII.

A Song or Psalm of Asaph.

1 KEEP not thou silence, O God: hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God.

2 For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult: and they that hate thee have lifted up the head.

PSALM LXXXIII.

ARGUMENT.—It is the common opinion, that the combination of powerful enemies, against which they here implore the divine assistance, was that mentioned in 2 Chron. xx. in the days of Jehoshaphat. The reason is, because the children of Lot (ver. 8), viz. the Moabites and Ammonites (the ground of whose quarrel with the Jews is set down in Judg. xi.), seem to have been the principal in this confederacy, and the other but assistants; as it is plain they were in that invasion (2 Chron. xx. 1). And then the author of this Psalm must be either Jahaziel, one of Asaph's posterity (upon whom you read there, ver. 14, the Spirit of the Lord then came), or some other in those days, whose proper name this was. Which is much more probable than their conjecture, who think the author was Asaph, in the days of David; who subdued, indeed, the Moabites and Edomites, and other neighbouring nations: but we do not read of any confederacy they made against him; much less that they sent as far as Assyria for help; or that they began the war, as the people here mentioned did.

The same may be said against the application of it to the conquests made in the days of Uzziah, over several people here mentioned (2 Chron. xxvi. 6—8). Or to the invasion made by Sennacherib king of Assyria: who did not join himself (as we read here ver. 8), with other nations; but by the forces of his own kingdom alone, as far as appears, came up against them.

There are those indeed, that take in all the attempts made upon them since that in Jehoshaphat's days, by several nations; the last of which was Assyria; whose king came to do that which the rest had not been able to effect; and then the author is easily found to be the same that I have named in the argument of the foregoing, and many other Psalms. And which way soever we are pleased to determine the matter, it is plain, in general, that many nations, both near and remote, who had a hatred to the Jews, set themselves together, when this Psalm was penned, to destroy them: assailing them not only severally, but conjunctly; entering into consultation also, and conspiring together how to effect it. Which hatred continuing after their return to their own land, from the captivity of Babylon, gave occasion to Theodoret to say, both in his preface to this Psalm, and upon the twelfth verse of it, that the Psalmist here complains of the opposition which several of their neighbours made to the rebuilding of the temple and of Jerusalem.

But this seems more improbable than all the rest; many of those countries here named, being before that time destroyed: and the Assyrians themselves (as he himself observes upon ver. 8), being not then extant. Though whensoever this confederacy happened, there was very great reason for that solicitous and vehement importunity wherewith this Psalm begins.

Why it was called a Song-psalm, see Ps. lxvii.

Ver. 1.] O God, the supreme judge of the world, whose power is so great, that the united forces of all men on earth, or angels in heaven, are not to be compared with it (2 Chron. xx. 6. 12), who with one word of thy mouth canst dissipate this great army; do not refuse now to answer our prayers in this sore distress: O do not shut thy merciful ears to our cries, nor quietly see us perish, most mighty God.

Ver. 2.] For we are surprised with a sudden invasion of numerous enemies (haters of thee and thy worship, as much as of our nation), who make a 3 They have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against thy hidden ones.

4 They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance.

5 For they have consulted together with one consent: they are confederate against thee:

6 The tabernacles of Edom, and the Ishmaelites; of Moab, and the Hagarenes;

7 Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistines with the inhabitants of Tyre;

8 Assur also is joined with them: they have holpen the children of Lot. Selah.

9 Do unto them as unto the Midianites; as to Sisera, as to Jabin, at the brook of Kison:

10 Which perished at En-dor: they became as dung for the earth.

11 Make their nobles like Oreb, and like Zeeb: yea, all their princes as Zebah, and as Zalmunna:

12 Who said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession.

13 O my God, make them like a wheel; as the stubble before the wind.

14 As the fire burneth a wood, and as the flame setteth the mountains on fire;

15 So persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm.

16 Fill their faces with shame; that they may seek thy name, O LORD.

17 Let them be confounded and troubled for ever; yea, let them be put to shame, and perish:

18 That men may know that thou, whose name alone is JEHOVAH, art the most high over all the earth.

dreadful noise, like the waves of the sea (2 Chron. xx. 2), and proudly promising themselves a victory, insult as if they had already won it.

Ver. 3.] They have, with equal malice and subtilty, carried on a close design against thy people; and with great secrecy consulted how to destroy, not only us, whom thou hast hitherto wonderfully protected as thy jewels, but thy temple also; and the secret place wherein thou there dwellest.

Ver. 4.] Come, say they one to another, let us agree and join all the power we have together; not merely to make a conquest of them, but for their utter extirpation (2 Chron. xx. 11), that there may be no mention hereafter in the world, of such a people as the commonwealth of Israel.

Ver. 5.] And accordingly ten several nations are combined heartily in this design; and how different soever their inclinations are upon other accounts, they have all entered into a solemn league, and made a covenant of mutual help, and of employing their joint endeavours, totally to subvert that government and religion which thou hast established.

Ver. 6.] Those warlike nations, the Edomites and Ishmaelites, who dwell in tents, are engaged in this enterprise: and so are the Moabites, and others descended from Hagar, the mother of Ishmael.

Ver. 7.] With whom are united our neighbours the Gebalites (Josh. xiii. 5), the Ammonites; our old enemies the Amalekites and Philistines; and they that dwell in and about the famous city of Tyre.

Ver. 8.] And, to add to their strength, they have called the powerful nation of the Assyrians into their association: on whose assistance the Moabites and Ammonites (the authors of this war) do principally rely.

Ver. 9.] The greater need we have of thy assistance and with the greater earnestness we beseech thee to make them an example of human weakness: by defeating them, as thou didst that vast army of the Midianites and their confederates (Judg. vi. 5. vii. 12), whom Gideon overthrew with no greater power than three hundred men (Judg. vii. 21, 22, compared with 2 Chron. xx. 23); and as thou didst in former times to that famous captain Sisera (who fell by the hand of a woman, Judg. iv. 21), and to Jabin his king: who, together with his army, was swept away in the brook of Kishon (Judg. iv. 21. 24. v. 21).

Ver. 10.] A great slaughter there was of them near En-dor (compare Judg. v. 19, with Josh. xvii. 11), where their carcasses lay and rotted; and served instead of dung, to fatten and enrich the earth.

Ver. 11.] Let their princes and commanders fall like Oreb and Zeeb (Judg. vii. 35), and their kings not be able to save themselves by flight; but be taken and slain, like Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. viii. 12. 21).

Ver. 12.] Who came with a design (Judg. vi. 3—5), as these nations do now (2 Chron. xx. 10, 11), to possess themselves of that pleasant land, wherein thou dwellest among us in thy holy habitation.

Ver. 13.] O my God, whose goodness hath never failed us in distress; let them not be able to stand their ground; but put them to flight, and make them run as swiftly as a ball down a hill; disperse all their forces like the chaff, when it is blown about with a furious wind.

Ver. 14.] Blast and consume them utterly; as the lightning, or the scorching rays of the sun in a long drought do the leaves of the forest trees, or the grass upon the mountains (Joel i. 19).

Ver. 15.] Raise a dreadful tempest to affright them; and pursue them so with thy vengeance, that they may be shattered and driven away instantly, as in a whirlwind: put them into such a panic fear that they may not know which way to turn, but clash against one another in a terrible confusion (2 Chron. xx. 22, &c.).

Ver. 16.] And make those that escape so ashamed at this disgraceful disappointment, that they may not be able to hold up their heads, nor deny thy power to be superior to theirs, but humbly seek thy favour.

Ver. 17.] This is the worst we wish them, notwithstanding their enmity to us; that they may be so astonished and confounded at their defeat, as never to recover any courage to assault us: nay, together with their credit and their courage, quite lose their power to give us any farther trouble.

Ver. 18.] And thereby be convinced, which they would not believe before, that thou art what thou art called, the true and only God, who givest being to all things; and art the supreme governor, not only of us, but of all the nations upon earth.

PSALM LXXXIV.

To the chief Musician upon Gittith. A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

1 How amiable are thy tabernacles, O LORD of hosts!

2 My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the LORD: my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God.

3 Yea, the sparrow hath found an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O LORD of hosts, my king, and my God.

4 Blessed are they that dwell in thy house: they will be still praising thee. Selah.

5 Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee; in whose heart are the ways of them,

6 Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools.

7 They go from strength to strength, every one of them in Zion appeareth before God.

8 O LORD God of hosts, hear my prayer: give ear, O God of Jacob. Selah.

9 Behold, O God our shield, and look upon the face of thine anointed.

10 For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.

11 For the LORD God is a sun and shield: the LORD will give grace and glory: no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly.

12 O LORD of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee.

PSALM LXXXIV.

ARGUMENT.—It is uncertain to what times this Psalm belongs: they seem to have most reason on their side, who think it was composed upon the same occasion with the forty-second and forty-third, when David, forced from Jerusalem by the rebellion of his son Absalom, most passionately longed to be restored to the place of God's worship. But it may as well, or better, in my judgment, be thought to have been composed by some pious Levite in the country, when Sennacherib's army had blocked up the way to Jerusalem, and hindered them from waiting upon the service of God at the temple; where he judged the lowest ministry, that of a porter (as we read ver. 10), to be far more honourable than the highest preferment among pagan nations. And thus I shall take the liberty to expound it in my paraphrase: pointing the reader to such places in the history of that sad time, as I think will explain some passages of this Psalm: which, after their freedom was restored, by the destruction of Sennacherib's army, the author of it delivered to the master of music in the temple, to be sung as the eighth Psalm (see there).

Ver. 1.] It is impossible to express the affection I have to thy dwelling-place, O Lord; who art attended there by the ministry of the heavenly host (Isa. xxxvii. 16), and needest none of our services.

Ver. 2.] But we cannot live with any satisfaction while we are absent from thee; for I am ready to faint away in ardent longings to tread again in the courts of the Lord's house: where my tongue and my hands, as well as my mind, would gladly be employed in the praises of our God; who in this excels all other (2 Kings xix. 4. 16. 18), that he lives for ever.

Ver. 3.] It grieves me, O mighty Lord of all the heavenly hosts, whose subject I am, and infinitely engaged to thee, to see the very birds, who know nothing of thee, enjoy that liberty which is denied me: who am here lamenting my distance from thee, when the sparrows and the ring-doves have their constant residence at thy house: and there live so undisturbed that they build their nests, and bring forth their young in the rafters of it.

Ver. 4.] O how happy are they who partake of such a privilege! who live so near thy house, and frequent it so much, as if it were their own! Their delightful employment is, with never-ceasing praises, to pay their thankful acknowledgments unto thee.

Ver. 5.] And happy also is that man (how mean soever his outward condition be) who, relying upon thy divine protection (Exod. xxxiv. 24), goes up three times a year to the solemn feast at Jerusalem: or when he is debarred that liberty, as I now am, is one of those devout persons, whose hearts are more in the highways that lead thither, than at their own home.

Ver. 6.] Who travelling through the troublesome valley of Baca, where there is no water, pass it as cheerfully, as if it abounded with pleasant springs; and, depending on God, as the fountain of what they want, receive from him the blessing of plentiful and seasonable showers, to refresh them in their journey:

Ver. 7.] So that the whole company go from stage to stage, with an unwearied vigour: till they all present themselves before God, to receive his blessing in his temple, upon the hill of Zion.

Ver. 8.] O mighty Lord, who commandest all the heavenly hosts, which attend in that holy place (and are far more numerous than the armies that invade us, 2 Chron. xxxii. 7), make me one of that happy number; and restore me, O God, who deliverest Jacob out of all his troubles, to the liberty of waiting upon thee there.

Ver. 9.] Look graciously upon me, O God, who hast hitherto been our protector against the most powerful enemies; and accept the prayer of our sovereign, who petitions thee still to be our defender (2 Kings xix. 19).

Ver. 10.] For one day spent in thy courts is far more pleasant than a thousand in any other place; and I had rather lie at the gates of thy house, than live in the most splendid condition in idolatrous countries.

Ver. 11.] For though our happiness be sometimes clouded, yet the Lord, like the sun, will dispel the darkness of affliction; and having brought us out of a disconsolate condition, defend and secure us in a better (2 Kings xx. 6): the Lord will give those favour with others, and advance them to great honour (2 Chron. xxxii. 22, 23); he will never be sparing of his blessings, but heap them abundantly on those who sincerely do his will in all things (2 Kings xviii. 5, 6. xx. 3).

Ver. 12.] O most mighty Lord, who commandest all the host of heaven, happy is that man who, by his integrity, preserves this hope and confidence in thee; though for the present he be restrained from the delightful enjoyment of thee in thy temple.

PSALM LXXXV.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

1 LORD, thou hast been favourable unto thy land: thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob.

2 Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people, thou hast covered all their sin. Selah.

3 Thou hast taken away all thy wrath: thou hast turned thyself from the fierceness of thine anger.

4 Turn us, O God of our salvation, and cause thine anger towards us to cease.

5 Wilt thou be angry with us for ever? wilt thou draw out thine anger to all generations?

6 Wilt thou not revive us again: that thy people may rejoice in thee?

7 Shew us thy mercy, O LORD, and grant us thy salvation.

8 I will hear what God the LORD will speak: for he will speak peace unto his people, and to his saints: but let them not turn again to folly.

9 Surely his salvation is nigh them that fear him; that glory may dwell in our land.

10 Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other.

11 Truth shall spring out of the earth; and righteousness shall look down from heaven.

12 Yea, the LORD shall give that which is good; and our land shall yield her increase.

13 Righteousness shall go before him; and shall set us in the way of his steps.

PSALM LXXXV.

ARGUMENT.—It is thought by many that this Psalm was composed by some of the sons of Korah, after David's banishment from Jerusalem by his son Absalom (called a captivity, as we read Ps. xiv. ult.), and his happy restoration to his kingdom; though not to such a scutlement as they desired. But it may be as well, or better, applied to the miraculous providence which drove Sennacherib out of the land (who had taken many captives, Isa. v. 13), and restored them to the happy liberty, whose loss they bewailed in the Psalm foregoing.

Which way soever we understand it, the composure is such, that it might be much better used by them after their return from the captivity of Babylon, than at any other time: when they were infested with many enemies, who disturbed the peaceable enjoyment of their country and religion. And therefore it is possible it might be reviewed, if not made, in those days, and delivered to the chief master of music in the temple, to be sung presently after the foundation of it was laid (Ezra iii. 10, 11, &c.), but the work hindered from proceeding by the opposition of their enemies. And so I shall interpret it.

Ver. 1.] Thou hast been exceeding kind unto us, O Lord; and we most thankfully acknowledge the favour thou hast done us, in delivering us, the posterity of Jacob, out of our sad captivity, and restoring us to the land in which thou thyself hast chosen to dwell (Ezra. i.).

Ver. 2.] Our sins kept us from it in banishment a long time; but now thou hast graciously pardoned both our idolatry, and all the other crimes for which we justly suffered.

Ver. 3.] Thou hast put an end to the sore punishments which in thy heavy displeasure thou inflictedst on us: and turned thy severity, which, like fire, had almost consumed us, into great clemency and mercy towards us.

Ver. 4.] Complete, good Lord, our deliverance, which thou hast thus graciously begun: and let not our ingratitude provoke thee to continue this new vexation and trouble that is befallen us (Ezra iv. 4, 5. 21. 23).

Ver. 5.] Which forced us to sigh, and say, in the anguish of our souls, Will there never be an end of our miseries? Is it not enough that the foregoing generation hath felt the sad effects of thine anger, but it must extend itself to us also, and our posterity?

Ver. 6.] Will it not be more for thy honour, not only to preserve this feeble life which thou hast bestowed on us, but to give us a perfect recovery? that thy people may have nothing to damp their joy and entire satisfaction in thy goodness to them.

Ver. 7.] Make us so happy, good Lord; and though we deserve, indeed, to be more miserable than we are, yet let thy mercy prevail with thee to grant us a complete deliverance.

Ver. 8.] I will wait patiently upon the Lord, the judge of the world, for a gracious answer to these prayers; hoping that he will not condemn us to farther punishment, but settle his people, who devoutly worship him, in a prosperous tranquillity, provided they return not again to their old idolatry.

Ver. 9.] He will be so far from deserting those who fear to offend him, that I am confident the time approaches when he will finish what he hath begun to do for us, in rebuilding our temple (Ezra. v. 2. 8. vi. 7, 8, &c.) and restoring our country to its ancient dignity and splendour.

Ver. 10.] For methinks I see goodness and fidelity, justice and concord (which are the principal glory of a kingdom), meeting together, like ancient friends which have been long absent, and embracing each other.

Ver. 11.] And as truth and honesty, with all other virtues, shall grow and flourish among us (like flowers and herbs in the spring, after a tedious winter), so God shall faithfully fulfil his promises to us, and exercise a most gracious providence over us.

Ver. 12.] Yea, the Lord will do us good beyond our expectation; and reward our fruitfulness in good works with such a large and plentiful increase of the fruits of the earth, as shall demonstrate the bounty of heaven to us.

Ver. 13.] He will govern us with great justice and mercy, having his faithful promises always before his eyes: from that rule he will never swerve, but steadfastly proceed by it, as the constant method he will hold in his divine administrations.

PSALM LXXXVI.

A Prayer of David.

1 Bow down thine ear, O LORD, hear me : for I am poor and needy.

2 Preserve my soul ; for I am holy : O thou, my God, save thy servant that trusteth in thee.

3 Be merciful unto me, O LORD : for I cry unto thee daily.

4 Rejoice the soul of thy servant : for unto thee, O LORD, do I lift up my soul.

5 For thou, LORD, art good, and ready to forgive ; and plenteous in mercy unto all them that call upon thee.

6 Give ear, O LORD, unto my prayer ; and attend to the voice of my supplications.

7 In the day of my trouble I will call upon thee : for thou wilt answer me.

8 Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O LORD ; neither are there any works like unto thy works.

9 All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O LORD ; and shall glorify thy name.

10 For thou art great, and doest wondrous things : thou art God alone.

11 Teach me thy way, O LORD ; I will walk in thy truth : unite my heart to fear thy name.

12 I will praise thee, O LORD my God, with all my heart, and I will glorify thy name for evermore.

13 For great is thy mercy toward me : and thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell.

PSALM LXXXVI.

ARGUMENT.—The title satisfies us that David was the author of this Psalm, which the collector of this third book found, I suppose, after the other two were made up and published, and so placed it here, among those which belong to the same subject. For though it was composed by David when he was so persecuted, either by Saul or Absalom, that he was stripped of all he had, and left in a most forlorn condition (ver. 1), yet Theodoret thinks it was made with a prospect of the attempt which the Assyrians made upon Jerusalem, and the hope which Hezekiah then placed in God for deliverance. Which notion, it is likely, he had from the Jews ; who say that this prayer was made use of by Hezekiah in the time of that sore distress ; for the first words of this Psalm are the same with his in 2 Kings xix. 16, and the eighth and ninth verses may very fitly be accommodated to that history (as I have there observed), but the rest a great deal better to David.

Ver. 1.] There cannot be a fitter object of thy mercy, O Lord, than thy poor supplicant, who beseeches thee graciously to condescend to his request ; for else he is utterly undone, being quite destitute of all human help.

Ver. 2.] And yet my life is in imminent danger, unless thou dost preserve it, as many reasons make me hope thou wilt ; for as thou the righteous judge hast been long my benefactor, and I am perfectly innocent of that my enemies charge me withal, so I myself have been a reliever of others in their need, and besides, am a faithful servant of thine, who depends entirely upon thee, and hath no confidence in any thing but only thy almighty goodness.

Ver. 3.] Whose merciful help I have also implored with most importunate and incessant prayers, which is another reason of my hope that thou wilt take compassion upon me, O Lord.

Ver. 4.] And turn the present sorrow of thy servant into joy and gladness : for I have placed my hope entirely in thee, O Lord, and expect nothing but from thee alone.

Ver. 5.] Who art no less bountiful (which is another exceeding great encouragement to me) than I am indigent, ready also to pardon those that have offended thee ; yea, to show abundant kindness to every one of them in his greatest distress, when with unfeigned devotion he calls upon thee.

Ver. 6.] As I now do, O Lord, most humbly beseeching thee, with repeated entreaties, to give a favourable answer to these prayers and supplications, whereby I deprecate thy displeasure, and sue unto thee for favour.

Ver. 7.] Which I beseech thee let me the rather obtain, because my distress is so great and so urgent, that thy power will now be the more magnified in delivering me ; as heretofore thou hast been wont to do upon such earnest petitions as these are unto thee.

Ver. 8.] For nothing is too hard for thee, nor art thou unwilling to do more kindnesses for us because thou hast done so many already : but, as appears by thy unparalleled works, dost incomparably excel (whatsoever strangers think, 2 Kings xviii. 15) all those that are worshipped in the world as gods ; who are not able so much as to help and preserve themselves.

Ver. 9.] Which shall move all our neighbouring nations (2 Chron. xxxii. 23), as all the rest shall do in the days of that great king which we expect (Rom. xv. 9), to acknowledge thee, O Lord, to be their creator ; and with humble veneration to submit themselves unto thee, and to honour thee with their highest praises.

Ver. 10.] For they shall clearly see by the magnificence of thy marvellous works, that thou art infinitely superior to all those powers whom they adore ; and that in truth there is no God but thou thyself alone.

Ver. 11.] Which I so firmly believe, that I desire nothing more than to be perfectly instructed in all thy will, which I will sincerely observe : knit my heart, O Lord, in such pious affections to thee, that it may never in the least dissent from thee, nor be disturbed with any vain cares, but entirely bent to study this alone—what is pleasing unto thee.

Ver. 12.] Whom I am bound to praise, both as the supreme Lord of all, and as my most bountiful benefactor, with all the powers of my soul : and, accordingly, I do now most thankfully acknowledge thee ; and will never cease to honour thee, and to do thee service, as long as I have any being.

Ver. 13.] For the benefits thou hast bestowed on me are as inestimable as they are innumerable : I owe my very life to thee, which hath been often snatched out of the extremest dangers ; wherein I had inevit

14 O God, the proud are risen against me, and the assemblies of violent men have sought after my soul; and have not set thee before them.

15 But thou, O LORD, art a God full of compassion, and gracious, longsuffering, and plenteous in mercy and truth.

ably perished, if thou hadst not mercifully delivered me (1 Sam. xxiii. &c.).

Ver. 14.] Behold, O God, a new opportunity to glorify that mercy; for proud and ambitious men (2 Sam. xv. 1, 2, &c.) have made an insurrection against me, and raised a most formidable army, (ver. 12, 13) to take away that life which thou hast so miraculously preserved: having no regard to thy providence, nor refusing any means whereby they may satisfy their unjust desires.

Ver. 15.] All our comfort is, that thou, not they, dost govern the world, who art no less compassionate than thou art powerful; readily forgiving offences, for bearing long before thou punishest them; choosing rather to heap thy benefits upon us, and never failing to perform thy faithful promises.

16 O turn unto me, and have mercy upon me; give thy strength unto thy servant, and save the son of thine handmaid.

17 Shew me a token for good; that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed; because thou, LORD, hast holpen me, and comforted me.

Ver. 16.] In confidence of which, I humbly beseech thy favour and gracious pardon, though I have highly offended thee: assist thy poor servant by thy irresistible power against those mighty forces which are ready to assault me: O deliver me, who am here humbled in the lowest manner before thee; looking upon myself as more absolutely thine, than any slave that is born in our house can be ours.

Ver. 17.] Vouchsafe me now in this great distress such manifest tokens of thy favour towards me, that I may not only be delivered, but all may take notice of it; and good men thereby be encouraged to hope in thee, but they that hate me be utterly confounded, to see him whom they intended to destroy not only preserved, but blessed with comforts proportionable to the sorrow he hath endured.

PSALM LXXXVII.

A Psalm or Song for the sons of Korah.

1 His foundation is in the holy mountains.

2 The LORD loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.

3 Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God. Selah.

4 I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me: behold Philistia, and Tyre, with Ethiopia; this man was born there.

5 And of Zion it shall be said, This and that man was born in her; and the highest himself shall establish her.

6 The LORD shall count, when he writeth up the people, that this man was born there. Selah.

7 As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there: all my springs are in thee.

PSALM LXXXVII.

ARGUMENT.—It is as uncertain when this Psalm-song (see lxxvii.) was composed, as which of the sons of Korah was the author of it. But it is manifest enough that it was written in commendation of Jerusalem, situate in the holy mountains of Zion (where David built his palace, and afterward settled the ark) and of Moriah, where Solomon built the temple. There are those that think it was composed upon the anniversary of the birth or coronation of some great prince, such as Hezekiah, in whose days this city was made more famous, by the glorious deliverance which God gave it from the power of the king of Assyria's army. But this is a mere conjecture; and I shall follow the vulgar opinion: according to which, the beginning of this Psalm must be looked upon as very abrupt; but expresses the greater rapture of joyful admiration wherein the Psalmist was.

Ver. 1.] Great is the strength and beauty of this place, which is founded by God in the high mountains; which he hath peculiarly chosen for the seat of his kingdom, and of his priesthood.

Ver. 2.] Though the Lord loves all the habitations of his people, yet none are so dear unto him as those within the gates of Jerusalem: a principal part of which is Zion.

Ver. 3.] There is no city in the world of which such glorious things are foretold, or of which any thing can now be said, comparable to what we can truly boast of thee, that art the city which God himself hath separated for his own habitation.

Ver. 4.] I do not deny the due praises which belong to other places and countries, but rather am wont to make honourable mention among my acquaintance and familiars, of Egypt and Babylon; and of those who are nearer to us, the Philistines, Tyrians, and Arabians: bidding them observe that such a notable person was born among them.

Ver. 5.] But what is this to Zion? of whom it shall be said in future times, that (not such a single person, but) this and that man; a great many worthies, and far more eminent, both in learning and in arms, but especially in piety, were born in her; for she hath no meaner instructor than the most High, who shall settle her in a flourishing estate, by educating and forming her inhabitants to the most excellent qualities.

Ver. 6.] So that when he himself, whose eyes nothing can escape, shall look over the register of those nations, and count the famous men they have produced, he shall find only some one great man, and he comparatively of no great value, was born among them.

Ver. 7.] But in thee, O city of God, he shall find multitudes of excellent persons, all eminent in their kind, even among those of lower rank, as well as in the higher. And there shall be a constant succession of such, as there is of water in the spring.

PSALM LXXXVIII.

A Song or Psalm for the sons of Korah; to the chief Musician upon Mahalath Leannoth. Maschil of Heman the Ezrahite.

1 O LORD God of my salvation, I have cried day and night before thee :

2 Let my prayer come before thee : incline thine ear unto my cry ;

3 For my soul is full of troubles : and my life draweth nigh unto the grave.

4 I am counted with them that go down into the pit : I am as a man that hath no strength.

5 Free among the dead, like the slain that lie in the grave, whom thou rememberest no more : and they are cut off from thy hand.

6 Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps.

7 Thy wrath lieth hard upon me, and thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves. Selah.

8 Thou hast put away mine acquaintance far from me ; thou hast made me an abomination unto them : I am shut up, and I cannot come forth.

9 Mine eye mourneth by reason of affliction : LORD, I have called daily upon thee, I have stretched out my hands unto thee.

10 Wilt thou shew wonders to the dead ? shall the dead arise and praise thee ? Selah.

11 Shall thy lovingkindness be declared in the grave ? or thy faithfulness in destruction ?

PSALM LXXXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—Who this Heman was is uncertain. Not he who was the famous singer in David's time, for he was of the tribe of Levi (1 Chron. vi. 32. xv. 17) : whereas this was descended from Zerah, who was one of the sons of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 6, where we find, indeed, not only Heman, but Ethan (to whom the next Psalm is ascribed), mentioned as two of Zerah's sons : but we cannot reasonably think that they were, in those early times, the authors of these two Psalms ; because Ethan plainly makes mention of David, and the promise which God had passed to him of a perpetual kingdom.

It remains, therefore, that these two here mentioned were of the posterity of those sons of Zerah (and thence called Ezrahites), and had the names of their noble ancestors given them, to perpetuate the memory of those who were so famous for wisdom (1 Kings iv. 31).

But in what time they lived cannot be certainly determined. It is probable when Jeconiah, otherwise called Jehoiachin (or after him Zedekiah) was taken and carried captive to Babylon, together with abundance of the nobility, and the principal commanders and artisans (2 Kings xxiv. 14—16). In some of which ranks I suppose this Heman was ; who being cast into a dark prison (which hath made some fancy Jehoiachin himself to have made it, ver. 6. 8), or otherwise as miserably treated as if he had been in a dungeon, bewails his private calamity, as Ethan in the next Psalm doth the public.

Why it is called a Song-psalm, see upon the title of Ps. lxvii. It was to be sung by the sons of Korah interchangeably, which is the meaning of leannoth, upon a flute or pipe (see Ps. liiii.), to the known tune of Maschil (see Ps. xxxii.). Some passages in it may be applied to our Saviour's death and burial in his grave, which the prophet Isaiah compares to a prison ; and so is used by our church upon Good Friday

Ver. 1.] O mighty Lord, by whose gracious care and good providence I have been hitherto preserved, and on whom all my hopes of safety still depend, I have not failed in this sore affliction to implore thy mercy with most earnest cries, without any intermission.

Ver. 2.] Let them at last prevail, I beseech thee ; and do not reject my petition, accompanied with sad moans and doleful lamentations ; but vouchsafe a favourable answer to it.

Ver. 3.] For my soul is overcharged with great variety of long-continued evils, which have brought me so low, that there is but a step between me and the grave.

Ver. 4.] All that know my condition look upon me as utterly lost ; and I have no reason to think otherwise, being quite spent, and having no power at all to help myself.

Ver. 5.] I am no longer one of this world, from whose society I am quite separated ; there is little difference between me and those, who, being slain in a battle, and cast all together into one common grave, are no farther regarded ; or those whose families are so wholly extirpated, that there are none left to preserve their memory.

Ver. 6.] For thou hast thrust me down into a deep and dismal dungeon (which I can compare to nothing but a grave) ; wherein I lie neglected, and see no hope of being delivered.

Ver. 7.] My spirit is ready to sink under the weight of thy displeasure, while my calamities fall upon me so fast and so heavily (like the mountainous waves of the sea), one after another, that it is impossible to express the soreness of my affliction.

Ver. 8.] I am not allowed to have any familiarity with my friends or acquaintance, no more than if I were in another world ; and as for other men, they abominate to come into such a loathsome place ; where I am kept so close, that I have no means of getting out.

Ver. 9.] Nor can I do any thing there but weep, till I am almost blind by reason of the miseries I endure : only I cease not to look up unto thee, O Lord, continually, who art my only companion in this solitary and helpless condition ; imploring thy aid with fervent prayers and longing expectations ; saying,

Ver. 10.] Make haste, good Lord, to deliver me, if thou intendest any kindness to me, otherwise I shall presently perish ; and then, without the greatest miracle, there is no help for me : for can I with any reason expect that thou shouldst do wonders for me among the dead, when thou wouldst do nothing for me while I was alive ? and raise me out of my grave when thou wouldst not bring me out of prison ?

Ver. 11.] Now is the time to declare the love thou bearest to me, and to perform the promise thou hast made to them that faithfully serve thee ; for if thou dost defer thy relief, I die ; and what can I hope for when I am rotten in my grave ?

12 Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?

13 But unto thee have I cried, O LORD; and in the morning shall my prayer prevent thee.

14 LORD, why castest thou off my soul? why hidest thou thy face from me?

15 I am afflicted and ready to die from my youth up: while I suffer thy terrors I am distracted.

16 Thy fierce wrath goeth over me; thy terrors have cut me off.

17 They came round about me daily like water; they compassed me about together.

18 Lover and friend hast thou put far from me, and mine acquaintance into darkness.

Ver. 12.] Shall thy power be apparent there where nothing is seen? and wilt thou convince men how good and how just thou art to thy servants, in the place where they are no more remembered?

Ver. 13.] Thus, O LORD, I cry unto thee in the anguish of my soul, which keeps me awake to present my prayers unto thee before the morning light.

Ver. 14.] Though, alas! they have no effect; but I see myself deserted, notwithstanding all my prayers, in these miserable straits; wherein I lie sighing, to think what the reason should be that thou deniest me thy help, and takest no notice of me.

Ver. 15.] Which is the more strange, because I faint away under my misery, which hath continued many years, and under the sad prospect I have before me of more dreadful calamities; which so astonish me, that I know not what to do with myself.

Ver. 16.] I only bemoan over again my forlorn estate, which grows still more deplorable; I suffer not merely the effects of thy anger (ver. 7), but of thy severest and most terrible displeasure; wherewith I am so overwhelmed and oppressed, that I am scarce able to fetch my breath.

Ver. 17.] Which way soever I turn myself I find that I am environed with them; and they increase continually, like floods of water coming from several places, and at last meeting all together, to enclose and swallow me up.

Ver. 18.] And there is no friend, no neighbour, comes near me to give me the least consolation: but all they whose sweet society was wont to help to mitigate my sorrow, are either dead, or kept from my sight; or hide themselves for fear of being thrust down, together with me, into this doleful place.

PSALM LXXXIX.

Maschil of Ethan the Ezrahite.

1 I WILL sing of the mercies of the LORD for ever: with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations.

2 For I have said, Mercy shall be built up for ever: thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens.

3 I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant,

PSALM LXXXIX.

ARGUMENT.—The author of this Psalm was near of kin to him that made the former (see the argument there); and they lived, I suppose, in the same time. Only Heman bewailed some private affliction, which was befallen himself; whereas Ethan (after a thankful acknowledgment of the benefits God had bestowed upon them, and especially of his promise made to David by Samuel and Nathan, of settling the kingdom upon him and his posterity for ever) laments most sadly the public calamity; by the subversion of the royal family and government in the days of Jehoiakim, or of Zedekiah. Whose miserable fate seems, in the conclusion of this Psalm, to be bewailed with the greater passion, because it looked like a breach of God's promise to David; and gave the Babylonians, and other nations, who assisted in their destruction, occasion to say, that notwithstanding all the promises they boasted of, and the fidelity of their God in their performance, there was now a period put to David's family and kingdom.

That is the clearest account I can give of the meaning of the last clause of the last verse but one; where we read that they "reproached the footsteps of his anointed." The word we render footsteps, signifies properly the heel of a man's foot: and from thence is translated to signify the end of any thing, as in Ps. cxix. 33. Which notion of it, in my judgment, best suits with all that goes before in this Psalm; concerning the stability of David's kingdom: which their enemies now boasted (as we would express it in our present language), they saw upon its last legs. And the truth is, it was never restored to that family till Christ the son of David came; to whom some passages in this Psalm are applied by the Jews themselves, in both the Bereschiths, and in other books; to which Aben Ezra and R. Solomon consent.

Why this Psalm is called Maschil, see Ps. xxxii. But why any should fancy, as some have done, that it was made by Jehoiachin, after he came out of prison (2 Kings xxv. 27, 28), I cannot conceive; unless the first words moved them to think that he who, in the foregoing Psalm, speaks of himself as in a dungeon, gives God thanks here for his deliverance.

Ver. 1.] The innumerable calamities that are befallen us, shall not blot out the memory of the innumerable benefits which the Lord hath formerly bestowed on us; but I will sing of them without ceasing; and endeavour to make all posterity believe, notwithstanding our present desolation, that thou art faithful and constant to thy word.

Ver. 2.] For I am confident thy mercy, which is immovable, and endures for ever, will raise us out of these ruins: thy promises being as firm and steadfast as the heavens; in which we see an image of the unchangeableness of thy nature and of thy will.

Ver. 3.] Which thou didst declare by thy prophet, saying (1 Sam. xvi. 13; 2 Sam. iii. 9, 10. v. 2. vii. 15, 16. 28). I have chosen David my faithful servant to be the governor of my people; and have made a covenant with him, confirmed by an oath, 4 Thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations. Selah.

5 And the heavens shall praise thy wonders, O LORD: thy faithfulness also in the congregation of the saints.

6 For who in the heaven can be compared unto the LORD? who among the sons of the mighty can be likened unto the LORD?

7 God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are about him.

8 O LORD God of hosts, who is a strong LORD like unto thee, or to thy faithfulness round about thee?

9 Thou rulest the raging of the sea: when the waves thereof arise, thou stillest them.

10 Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces, as one that is slain; thou hast scattered thine enemies with thy strong arm.

11 The heavens are thine, the earth also is thine: as for the world and the fulness thereof, thou hast founded them.

Ver. 4.] That not only he, but his children after him, shall be settled in the throne; which, though it totter sometimes, or be thrown down, shall be raised again, and continued throughout all succeeding generations.

Ver. 5.] For which stupendous kindness, if we should forget to praise thee, or in this our calamitous condition distrust thy power and fidelity to make it good, the heavenly inhabitants will not fail to do it: but, in their holy assemblies, confess them both with their solemn praises.

Ver. 6.] For there are none of the powers of the air they know (much less any upon earth) that can resist the Lord, and hinder the fulfilling of his will: the mightiest among themselves, they are sensible, are not to be compared with his majesty, to whom they are but ministers.

Ver. 7.] And when they assemble, in the greatest numbers, and make the most glorious court, stand in great fear and dread of him: attending, with awful reverence, what commands he will be pleased to lay upon them.

Ver. 8.] With whom I will join, O Lord, the command of all these heavenly hosts, and celebrate thy name on earth, as they do in heaven, saying: Where is he among them all that can equal thee, O most powerful Lord: whose faithfulness is as ready to fulfil thy promises, as the angels are to execute thy commands?

Ver. 9.] The sea itself, which submits to nobody else, is under thy government: who, when it is a calm, maketh it swell, as if it would overflow the earth; and reducest it, when it is in its greatest rage, to a perfect stillness again.

Ver. 10.] There the Egyptians, who had been wounded before with many other grievous plagues, were utterly overthrown: and with the like irresistible power the Canaanites were scattered, at the entrance of thy people into the promised land.

Ver. 11.] For thou art the owner of all things both in heaven and earth, and hast the justest right to dispose of them to whom thou plearest; because the world, and all the inhabitants of it, are thy creatures.

Ver. 12.] Whether we cast our eyes to the southern or northern parts of the earth, to the west towards Tabor, or eastwards towards Hermon, they all ac-

12 The north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name.

13 Thou hast a mighty arm: strong is thy hand, and high is thy right hand.

14 Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne: mercy and truth shall go before thy face.

15 Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O LORD, in the light of thy countenance.

16 In thy name shall they rejoice all the day: and in thy righteousness shall they be exalted.

17 For thou art the glory of their strength: and in thy favour our horn shall be exalted.

18 For the LORD is our defence; and the Holy One of Israel is our king.

19 Then thou spakest in vision to thy holy one, and saidst, I have laid help upon one that is mighty; I have exalted one chosen out of the people.

20 I have found David my servant; with my holy oil have I anointed him:

knowledge thee thy creator: and rejoice in thy bountiful providence, which enriches them with all things needful for them.

Ver. 13.] And thy power, extending itself throughout the whole, always effects in every place whatsoever thou designest; and that with an irresistible force; whether it be to punish evil-doers, or to preserve and exalt them that do well.

Ver. 14.] But none shall be able to say thou dost them any wrong: because thou dost not rule the world merely by thy absolute power; but hast placed thy principal glory in justice and equity, mercy and fidelity; from which thou never swerrest.

Ver. 15.] Happy then are the people who live under thy righteous and merciful government; and hear the trumpet sound, which signifies the royal presence of thy majesty among them, and calls them to attend upon thee (Numb. x. 10): they shall spend their days most cheerfully, O Lord; being secure of thy favour, which will let them want nothing that is good for them.

Ver. 16.] They shall not barely rejoice, but triumph, and that continually, in thy love to them, and thy power to defend them; and, walking in thy holy laws, shall, by thy goodness, be highly exalted, and made superior to all their enemies.

Ver. 17.] For they owe not their conquests to their own valour, or forces, though never so great; but it is thou who givest illustrious victories to the smallest armies: and therefore by thy favour we hope, that our empire, which is now broken, shall be raised again to its former splendour.

Ver. 18.] For the Lord is still our protector, though our prince be taken, and made unable to defend us: be whom Israel adores, and acknowledges infinitely to transcend all other beings, is our king and governor.

Ver. 19.] Who then didst reveal thy mind, in a vision, to the holy prophet Samuel (1 Sam. xvi. 1), when the Philistines defied Israel, and grew terrible to them (xvii. 10, 11. 24), saying; I have provided myself a valiant champion (1 Sam. xvi. 18), to be your deliverer (2 Sam. iii. 18), I have designed a person of singular worth, from among the common people (1 Sam. xvi. 11), to be promoted to the kingdom.

Ver. 20.] I have observed David (1 Sam. xvi. 1), and find him a man that will faithfully serve me;

21 With whom my hand shall be established : mine arm also shall strengthen him.

22 The enemy shall not exact upon him ; nor the son of wickedness afflict him.

23 And I will beat down his foes before his face, and plague them that hate him.

24 But my faithfulness and my mercy shall be with him : and in my name shall his horn be exalted.

25 I will set his hand also in the sea, and his right hand in the rivers.

26 He shall cry unto me, Thou art my father, my God, and the rock of my salvation.

27 Also I will make him my firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth.

28 My mercy will I keep for him for evermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with him.

29 His seed also will I make to endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven.

30 If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments ;

31 If they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments ;

32 Then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes.

33 Nevertheless my lovingkindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail.

34 My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips.

35 Once have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David.

36 His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me.

37 It shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven. Selah.

38 But thou hast cast off and abhorred, thou hast been wroth with thine anointed.

39 Thou hast made void the covenant of thy servant : thou hast profaned his crown by casting it to the ground.

40 Thou hast broken down all his hedges ; thou hast brought his strong holds to ruin.

go, and anoint him with the holy oil ; for I intend him for the governor of my people.

Ver. 21.] With whom I will always be powerfully present, for his assistance (1 Sam. xvii. 45, &c.), and never desert him, as I did Saul (xviii. 12. 24. 28) ; but my mighty power shall extraordinarily strengthen him in all his enterprises (1 Sam. xxx. 6 ; 2 Sam. viii. 6. 14).

Ver. 22.] The subtlest of his enemies shall not be able to circumvent him ; nor the most malicious, how powerful soever, oppress him.

Ver. 23.] But after all their vain attempts, I will not only protect him from their crafty violence, but subdue all his adversaries under him, and destroy those that hate him (2 Sam. vii. 9).

Ver. 24.] He shall ever find me, not only faithful in my promise to him, but kind above his expectation ; and, by my powerful assistance, and his confidence in it, his authority shall be highly exalted (1 Chron. xiv. 17 ; 2 Sam. vii. 9. viii. 13).

Ver. 25.] On one hand he shall conquer the Philistines, and those that live upon the coast of the sea (2 Sam. viii. 1) : and on the other hand the Syrians, as far as Tigris and Euphrates (2 Sam. viii. 9, &c. x. 16. 19).

Ver. 26.] For he shall entirely depend on me in all his distresses, and fly to me for succour, as a child to his parent ; saying, with more than usual love and confidence, Thou art my Father, as well as my omnipotent God, from whom alone I expect protection and deliverance.

Ver. 27.] Which I will never fail to afford him, till I raise him to the prime dignity, among all those whom I call my sons ; and set him so high above all other kings in the world, that he shall be a most eminent type of my son, Christ, the King of kings, and the Lord of lords.

Ver. 28.] Nothing shall alter these kind intentions towards him ; but I will always have a love for him, and faithfully perform my covenant with him.

Ver. 29.] Which is, that his family shall never be extinct ; but, notwithstanding the changes which all things are subject unto here below, have the royal power continued in it, as long as the heavens endure (2 Sam. vii. 16. 28, 29 ; Luke i. 32, 33).

Ver. 30.] If his successors, indeed, shall depart from the law which I have given you by my servant Moses, and not judge my people righteously ;

Ver. 31.] If they profanely neglect or corrupt my religion, and observe not the rest of the rules of life which I have enjoined them :

Ver. 32.] Then will I execute the threatenings which are in my law (Lev. xxvi.), upon them ; and punish their transgressions with sore diseases, and their idolatries with several plagues (2 Sam. vii. 14).

Ver. 33.] But I will not so chastise them, as never more to do good to his family (2 Sam. vii. 25) ; but I will still have a kindness for it, and faithfully keep my promise with it (1 Kings xi. 34—36. xv. 4 ; 2 Kings viii. 19, &c.).

Ver. 34.] I will not violate the covenant I have made with David (2 Chron. xxi. 7), nor retract the promise which I have solemnly passed to his family.

Ver. 35.] For I have unalterably sworn by my own incommunicable excellences, that I will as soon cease to be what I am, as deceive him.

Ver. 36.] His family (as I said ver. 29), shall never be quite extinct ; but always remain in my favour, and hold the royal dignity as long as the sun shineth.

Ver. 37.] The moon may as well fall from her orb, as his authority fall to the ground, and rise no more : let that be a witness of my fidelity, when you look upon it (Jer. xxxiii. 20, 21) ; and conclude that after all the changes and eclipses his kingdom may suffer, it shall stand as fast as that and all the rest of the heavenly bodies.

Ver. 38.] But all these promises, alas ! so sacredly confirmed and oft repeated, have not secured it from a dismal subversion : for thou hast rejected, with the greatest contempt and indignation, our sovereign ; one of the posterity of David, and his lawful successor in the kingdom (2 Kings xxiv. 20. xxv. 6, 7 ; Lam. iv. 20).

Ver. 39.] Thou seemest not to regard the covenant made with that thy faithful servant (which thou promisedst not to break, ver. 34), and, instead of raising his family higher than all other kings (ver. 27), hast suffered it to lose all its authority ; which, together with the royal diadem, is vilely trodden under foot.

Ver. 40.] Thou hast broken down all the walls of Jerusalem (2 Kings xxv. 10), and made all his fortified places a mere desolation.

41 All that pass by the way spoil him : he is a reproach to his neighbours.

42 Thou hast set up the right hand of his adversaries ; thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice.

43 Thou hast also turned the edge of his sword, and hast not made him to stand in the battle.

44 Thou hast made his glory to cease, and cast his throne down to the ground.

45 The days of his youth hast thou shortened : thou hast covered him with shame. Selah.

46 How long, LORD ? wilt thou hide thyself for ever ? shall thy wrath burn like fire ?

47 Remember how short my time is : wherefore hast thou made all men in vain ?

Ver. 41.] So that he hath no defence against those who have a mind to make a prey of him (2 Kings xxiv. 2), and is now scorned and derided by those who formerly dreaded him.

Ver. 42.] Thou hast made his adversaries (whom thou promisedst to depress, ver. 23), far stronger than himself : they have executed all that they designed, and now triumph in his ruin.

Ver. 43.] His forces have done him no service ; but being shamefully routed, durst never rally again, to make any opposition to their enemies.

Ver. 44.] Thou hast put out that splendour which we thought should have been perpetual (ver. 37, 38) ; and hast utterly overturned his kingdom.

Ver. 45.] Thou hast made a speedy end of the reign of Jehoiachin, who in his youth is made a slave (2 Kings xxiv. 8, &c.) : and suffered Zedekiah to be most disgracefully condemned as a rebel, to lose his eyes, and remain a prisoner all the days of his life (2 Kings xxv. 6, 7).

Ver. 46.] O what a sad condition is this, in which thou seemest wholly to neglect us ! but, O Lord, wilt thou never appear for us again, and put a period to our miseries ? wilt thou let thy anger burn, till we be utterly consumed ?

Ver. 47.] Our natural weakness pleads for some mercy ; and emboldens us to beseech thee, that since we must not only die unavoidably, but a short time will bring us to our graves, thou wilt be pleased to let us spend that little time in more ease ; and not live, as 48 What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death ? shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave ? Selah.

49 LORD, where are thy former lovingkindnesses, which thou swarest unto David in thy truth ?

50 Remember, LORD, the reproach of thy servants ; how I do bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people ;

51 Wherewith thine enemies have reproached, O LORD ; wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of thine anointed.

52 Blessed be the LORD for evermore. Amen, and Amen.

if we were made for nothing else, but only to be miserable and to die.

Ver. 48.] For where is the man whose constitution is so firm, that he shall not yield to death ? For what ability have we, though our enemies should not thus destroy us, to defend ourselves from the power of the grave ?

Ver. 49.] Lord, what a difference is there between our times, and those when thou wast so exceeding good to David ! and swarest, most faithfully, to continue to him for ever thy loving-kindness, which we beseech thee now restore unto us.

Ver. 50.] Show, O Lord, that thou dost not forget the scoffs and jeers, whereby our enemies augment the sufferings of thy servants : there is nothing I lay to heart so much, as all the reproaches of many and mighty nations.

Ver. 51.] Who are thy enemies as well as ours : and have blasphemed thee, O Lord, and mocked at thee, as if our slavery were the effect of thy inability to protect us ; and as if there were an end of the family and kingdom of David, thine anointed, which thou saidst should last for ever.

Ver. 52.] But let them laugh on ; neither their scoffs, nor our calamity, shall hinder us from praising the Lord, and speaking good of him continually, in assured hope that he will at last deliver us. Let it be so, we beseech thee ; let it be so, as we desire and hope ; that we may ever praise thee for our restoration.

PART IV.

PSALM XC.

A Prayer of Moses the man of God.

1 LORD, thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations.

2 Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God.

PSALM XC.

ARGUMENT.—Here begins the fourth book of Psalms ; in this differing from the rest—that as those of the first book are most of them ascribed to David, and those of the second in great part to the sons of Korah, and those of the third to Asaph ; so there are few of these whose author is certainly known : and therefore, I suppose, were all put together, in one and the same collection. The first of them, indeed, being made by Moses, the Hebrews have entertained a conceit (which St. Jerome and St. Hilary follow), that he was the author also of the next ten immediately ensuing. But, as there is no

3 Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men.

4 For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night.

5 Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as a sleep: in the morning they are like grass which groweth up.

6 In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth.

7 For we are consumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath are we troubled.

8 Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, reason for that (it will appear in due place), so I can see no cause why we should fancy David, or some of the children of Moses in his time, or a singer of that name (as Aben Ezra conjectures), to have composed this present Psalm; when not only the title expressly gives it to that Moses who was the man of God, (as their lawgiver is called, Deut. xxxiii. 1), or that famous prophet by whom God spake to them; but the Chaldee Paraphrase and the very matter of this Psalm, sufficiently show that it was a meditation of his, when the people offended so highly against God in the wilderness (especially by murmuring at the relation the spies brought them of the good land, Numb. xiv.), that he shortened their lives to seventy or eighty years at the most, and suffered them not to arrive at the age of their ancestors, or of Moses, Caleb, and Joshua, whose lives he prolonged to a hundred and twenty years.

Which grievous punishment Moses prays God they may lay to heart seriously, and so recover his favour (ver. 12, &c.), who is the eternal God, as he tells them (in the beginning of the Psalm), and had been in a particular manner, kind to their progenitors in former generations.

This is the substance of the Psalm: which the collector of this book thought fit to place in the very beginning of it: because of the great antiquity of this Psalm, and the dignity of its author.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, who sustainest and governeest the whole world, thou hast been the constant protector of our nation for many ages; having afforded all things necessary for the defence and security of our forefathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, when they had no certain dwelling-place, but were strangers in the land whither we are going, and supported us 'in the land of Egypt'; where, in a time of dearth, thou madest an ample provision for us; as thou hast also done hitherto in this barren desert.

Ver. 2.] Where, though we have no towns nor houses, we ought to think ourselves safe; and to trust in thee, who art the same mighty God thou ever wast (not only before we and our forefathers were made, but before the mountains arose out of the waters, and thou commandedst the rest of the earth, and this beautiful world, to appear), and ever wilt be, whatever changes there be here, without any alteration.

Ver. 3.] We have highly offended thee indeed, and so did our first parents; who became thereby most wretched and miserable creatures, and were doomed by thee to return to the dust, out of which they were formed; as all their posterity must do, whensoever thou summonest them to obey that sentence thou hast passed upon them.

Ver 4.] And should we have a reprieve for a longer time than our first father Adam, and some of his successors had, who lived near to a thousand years, we should be wretched still: especially when we compared ourselves with thee; in whose account the longest life is as inconsiderable as one day, and that when it is spent and gone; nay, as three or four hours, which pass away in sleep.

9 For all our days are passed away in thy wrath: we spend our years as a tale that is told.

10 The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away.

11 Who knoweth the power of thine anger? even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath.

12 So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

13 Return, O Lord, how long? and let it repent thee concerning thy servants.

cessors had, who lived near to a thousand years, we should be wretched still: especially when we compared ourselves with thee; in whose account the longest life is as inconsiderable as one day, and that when it is spent and gone; nay, as three or four hours, which pass away in sleep.

Ver. 5.] But, alas! in these ages thou carriest men away suddenly; as a violent torrent doth those things it meets withal in its passage: they vanish like a dream when we awake; and are as grass, which in the morning is grown higher and stronger than it was:

Ver. 6.] But how flourishing and fresh soever it then appear, is cut down before night, and loses all its beauty: such is the frailty of man; who is now in vigorous health, and anon languishes, and falls to the earth.

Ver. 7.] This, I am sure, is our condition; who have so provoked thee to anger by our sins, that we perish in an instant (Numb. xvi. 35, 46), and are perpetually disturbed with dreadful apprehensions of thy heaviest displeasure (xvii. 12, 13).

Ver. 8.] After many threatenings, thou hast proceeded, as a righteous judge, to call us to a severe account for all our foul crimes, though never so secretly committed; and makest it appear, by our punishments, to all the world (Numb. xiv. 20, &c.) that we are a perverse generation, though we pretend to thy service.

Ver. 9.] For we constantly feel some effects or other of thine anger; whereby our lives decline exceeding fast, and many times before we can say what this, are at an end.

Ver. 10.] We fall short of the days of our forefathers; being now all doomed to perish in the wilderness, and not to exceed, commonly, the age of seventy, or (if men be of a vigorous constitution) at most of eighty years: the best part of which also is spent in toilsome travels (Numb. xx. 14. xxi. 4. xxxi. 11; Deut. ii. 1. 3, &c.) and much sorrow and vexation; to see the strongest among us cut down like grass, in a moment, or at least making great haste unto their graves.

Ver. 11.] And yet, alas! who is there that seriously considers, and lays to heart, the dreadful effects of thy displeasure, which irresistibly falls upon us? (Numb. xxv. 1—3, &c.) or, with such a pious fear as it ought to excite, takes any care to prevent more terrible punishments than those we have felt already?

Ver. 12.] Lord, do thou touch us with a sense of thy judgments; that we may not presume thus foolishly to offend thee, as our fathers have done: but, making a just account of the shortness and uncertainty of our lives, may wisely apply ourselves to make the best use we can of them, in repenting of our sins.

Ver. 13.] And then be pleased to turn thy severity into kindness towards us: let it suffice, good Lord, that we have endured so many and long punishments;

14 O satisfy us early with thy mercy ; that we may rejoice and be glad all our days.

15 Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil.

and now at last revoke or mitigate the sentence thou hast passed upon us, who, though very disobedient, are thy servants.

Ver. 14.] O let us see some appearance of thy love to us ; which may satisfy and cheer our languishing souls, like the morning light after a tedious night : and, instead of sighs and groans, fill us with shouts of joy all the remainder of our days.

Ver. 15.] Compensate our past troubles with future comforts : and make our happiness to equal, if not exceed, the misery we have suffered.

Ver. 16.] Declare to all the world that thou hast not quite forsaken us thy servants : but wilt still 16 Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children.

17 And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us : and establish thou the work of our hands upon us ; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it.

work wonders for us, and do more glorious and magnificent things for our children, though we have sinned against thee (Numb. xx, 17, 18, &c. xxxi. 2 ; Deut. ii. 25. iii. 21).

Ver. 17.] Let them inherit, by the special favour of the Lord our God, that lovely and pleasant land (Gen. xlix. 15 ; Deut. viii. 7, 8, &c.), which he hath promised to give us : and, for that end, direct and prosper our arms ; that what we shall attempt in vain, if we be left to ourselves, may successfully be achieved by thy assistance (Deut. viii. 17, 18, &c. xxxi. 6-8). O prosper thou our undertaking, and make our arms victorious.

PSALM XCI.

1 HE that dwelleth in the secret place of the most high shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

2 I will say of the LORD, He is my refuge and my fortress : my God ; in him will I trust.

3 Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence.

4 He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust : his truth shall be thy shield and buckler.

PSALM XCI.

ARGUMENT.—The author of this Psalm is not known, but the occasion seems to have been some great pestilence ; in which the psalmist commends an humble confidence in God, an ardent love to him, as the best security both in that and in all other danger. Maimonides thinks (as other of the rabbins also do) that the psalmist hath a peculiar respect to the incursions of evil spirits, ver. 5, 6, as in the following verses, 7, 8, to those mischiefs which may come from the hand of evil men. And as far as those spirits had any hand in the pestilence here spoken of, his opinion is true ; and his words in general are very significant, that the psalmist here “ treats elegantly of that great providence which protects and keeps us from all evils, both universal and particular,” &c. Thus he discourses in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 51, where we have the reason of that name which is given to this Psalm by the Talmudists ; who call it, A Song of evil spirits (see Buxtorf. Lex. Talmud. in the word pis). Now there is no pestilence so likely to have given occasion to this Psalm, as that in the latter end of David’s reign ; who, having numbered the people, and not made those acknowledgments to God which the law in that case prescribed (Exod. xii.), had this sad choice given him by the prophet Gad—whether he would be punished for his negligence by famine, or by the sword of his enemies, or by pestilence. And submitting to the last (which God sent a destroying angel to inflict, 2 Sam. xxiv. 15, 16) was taught, it is not unlikely, by that prophet, called David’s seer, to recommend himself to the divine protection, in the words of this Psalm. For that David himself was the author, as some conceive, is not so probable ; because there is no such confession of his sin, and deprecation of the divine displeasure, in this Psalm, as we read he made on this occasion, 2 Sam. xxiv ; 1 Chron. xxi. unless we will imagine that he made this Psalm after that plague ; to direct and excite all others to make God their refuge, as he had done in such-like calamities. And this is far more probable, than that it should be made by Moses, as some of the Hebrews fancy ; for none of the plagues in his time were so great as that in David’s : and the most of them fell on those whom God had condemned to die in the wilderness (as he in the foregoing Psalm commemorates), and therefore he could not promise long life to them upon any terms ; as the psalmist here doth to the man that confides in God (ver. 16).

The ancient interpreters by schaal (which commonly signifies a lion), do so unanimously understand some kind of serpent, and not without reason (as Bochartus hath demonstrated), that I have followed them in my paraphrase of ver. 13, and made no mention of those beasts of prey, but only of venomous creatures.

Ver. 1.] It is an undoubted truth, that he who always makes the divine providence his sanctuary, and commending himself to the protection of the most high, rests in that, and troubles himself no farther, need not fear any danger whatsoever : but think himself safe and secure in his custody ; who, as he is almighty, so will never fail those that piously confide in him.

Ver. 2.] And therefore I will now encourage my soul to flee unto the Lord for shelter, saying, I have no confidence in any thing but him alone : he is a better defence than the most impregnable fortress ; being the sovereign of the world, and so good to me, upon all occasions, that I will never distrust his kindness.

Ver. 3.] I doubt not but he will deliver thee from all unseen dangers ; particularly from this most destructive pestilence ; whose venom catches men as insensibly and suddenly as the snare doth the bird, when it is laid by the cunning fowler.

Ver. 4.] He will affectionately defend thee, as a lion

5 Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day;

6 Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday.

7 A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee.

8 Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked.

9 Because thou hast made the LORD which is my refuge, even the most high, thy habitation;

10 There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling.

doth her young ones under her wings: and therefore trust to his benign providence, and depend upon his faithful word; opposing that to all the dangers which threaten thee, as a soldier doth his shield and buckler to the darts and thrusts of his enemies.

Ver. 5.] Then thou needest not to be afraid, either of murderers and robbers, whose sudden attempts in the night make them more dreadful: or of insurrections, and popular tumults, and the open assaults of any adversaries.

Ver. 6.] No, nor of those infectious diseases which arise from unknown causes: nor of those malignant fevers which reign in the hottest season of the year.

Ver. 7.] Whereby, though whole towns and countries be depopulated, a thousand falling on the left hand, and ten thousand on the right hand, of thee, thou shalt remain untouched in that mortality:

Ver. 8.] And only be a spectator of the divine vengeance, in punishing wicked offenders so visibly, that thou canst not but observe his righteous judgments (2 Sam. xxiv. 15, 16).

Ver. 9.] Because I have placed my confidence and hope in thee, O Lord, who art a sanctuary to which no violence can approach.

Ver. 10.] Therefore rest still assured, O my soul, that he will suffer no mischief to befall thee, nor let this plague seize upon thy family.

Ver. 11.] But give his angels, who are always ready to obey his commands a strict charge to take care

11 For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.

12 They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone.

13 Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet.

14 Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name.

15 He shall call upon me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him.

16 With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation.

of thee, and to preserve thee whithersoever thou goest.

Ver. 12.] They shall as diligently attend thee, as a nurse doth her child: guiding, supporting, and defending thee, with such a solicitous affection, that the least harm shall not befall thee.

Ver. 13.] No, shouldst thou come among serpents, asps, and dragons, with all the rest of those venomous sorts of creatures, they shall not be able to do thee hurt; but thou shalt victoriously trample upon them and triumph over them (Luke x. 19; Mark xvi. 18).

Ver. 14.] For so hath the Lord declared his will and pleasure to be, when he gave commission to his angels concerning me, saying, Because he heartily loves me, and delights in me, therefore will I deliver him from all present danger, and raise him above the reach of all future: because he hath acknowledged me to be the only safe refuge; and relied on my power for his protection.

Ver. 15.] I will grant him all his petitions; especially when he is in any distress, I will be present with him to afford him suitable comfort: and not only preserve him from perishing, but, after a happy deliverance, make him great and illustrious.

Ver. 16.] And more than that, he shall have the satisfaction of enjoying his honour to a great old age: and when his strength fails him, I will not; but still give him evident proofs of my care of him, and kindness towards him.

PSALM XCII.

A Psalm or Song for the Sabbath-day.

1 It is a good thing to give thanks unto the LORD, and to sing praises unto thy name, O most high:

2 To shew forth thy lovingkindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night,

3 Upon an instrument of ten strings, and

PSALM XCII.

ARGUMENT.—If Adam had made this Psalm, presently after he was created, in the evening of the sabbath (which is a rabbinical fancy, mentioned in the Mid-rash upon this place), sure it would have been set in this fourth book of Psalms before that of Moses: who may more probably be conceived to have composed it, to raise the hearts of the Israelites to the proper business of the sabbath-day: which was to praise God, when they meditated upon his wonderful works, not only of creation, but of providence in the government of the world. Several instances of which in rewarding the good, and punishing the wicked, they themselves had seen since they came out of Egypt: and were to see more when they came into the land of Canaan; to keep their sabbath or rest there, after their long travels in the deserts: with respect to which, some think Moses might call this A Psalm for the Sabbath-day.

But there is no certainty of these things; or rather it is certain, that neither of these conjectures is true. For as Adam in Paradise had no enemies to rise up against him, nor was he troubled with any workers of iniquity (such as we read of, ver. 7. 11), and there were no psalteries, harps, and instruments of music, then made, which Moses himself tells us were found out by Jubal; so those instruments were not employed in the service of God till the days of Da-upon the psaltery ; upon the harp with a solemn sound.

4 For thou, LORD, hast made me glad through thy work : I will triumph in the works of thy hands.

5 O LORD, how great are thy works ! and thy thoughts are very deep.

6 A brutish man knoweth not ; neither doth a fool understand this.

7 When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish ; it is that they shall be destroyed for ever :

8 But thou, LORD, art most high for evermore.

9 For, lo, thine enemies, O LORD, for, lo, thine enemies shall perish ; all the workers of iniquity shall be scattered.

10 But my horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of an unicorn : I shall be anointed with fresh oil.

11 Mine eye also shall see my desire on mine enemies, and mine ears shall hear my desire of the wicked that rise up against me.

12 The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree : he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon.

13 Those that be planted in the house of the LORD shall flourish in the courts of our God.

14 They shall still bring forth fruit in old age ; they shall be fat and flourishing ;

15 To shew that the LORD is upright : he is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him.

vid ; who may therefore more reasonably be thought to have made this Psalm for the sabbath, than either of the other ; after God had given him such " rest round about from all his enemies," 2 Sam. vii. 1, that he concluded he should be able to subdue those who should hereafter adventure to oppose him : such as those mentioned in the following chapter, viii. 10.

Ver. 1.] Now is the proper season to give thanks unto the Lord, for all the benefits we have received from him ; and it is no less delightful, than it is profitable, to sing hymns, in the praise of the divine perfections ; which infinitely transcends all that can be said, or thought of them.

Ver. 2.] This is the sweetest employment in the morning ; and no entertainment equal to it at night : to commemorate and declare to all how bountiful thou art ; and how faithful in performing thy promises to those who depend on thy almighty goodness.

Ver. 3.] Which ought to be celebrated with a full concert, not only of our cheerful voices, but of all the instruments of music.

Ver. 4.] For all are too little, O Lord, to express the joy I have in the acts of thy providence ; by whom, as the world was made, so it is still governed : it ravishes my spirit, and makes me shout for joy, to think how excellently thou orderest and disposest all things.

Ver. 5.] Whose administration, though I cannot fully comprehend, yet I admire and applaud the astonishing greatness of thy works ; and reverence the unsearchable depth of thy counsels and designs.

Ver. 6.] Of which a stupid man, who looks not beyond his senses, is so wholly ignorant, that seeing himself, and other such-like fools, prosper and thrive, while better men are in trouble and affliction, he presently concludes, thou dost not meddle in our affairs ; but leavest all to chance : for he doth not understand so much as this secret :

Ver. 7.] That when the lowdest men grow rich, high, and powerful ; and their interest is such, that by their means all the workers of iniquity, and few other men, are promoted ; the reason is, because nothing in this world is of any great value, nor of any long continuance ; but, after they have flourished awhile in empty glory, they shall be cut down like grass ; and, which is more, never rise up again.

Ver. 8.] And that thou, who rulest all things, though far out of their sight, canst as well punish or reward men hereafter, as at present ; being the eternal Lord.

Ver. 9.] Who shonest thou dost not intend to let the wicked escape, though now they flourish ; for thou hast begun already to give thy enemies, who have long prospered, a remarkable defeat : they have received such a notable blow, that I am confident they shall perish ; and all their partakers, though never so numerous and strongly linked together, be dispersed and utterly destroyed.

Ver. 10.] But my power and authority thou shalt raise to a formidable height : and crown that dignity with such undisturbed joy and pleasure, as shall prove the pious are not always miserable ;

Ver. 11.] Nor the wicked always prosperous : for to all other pleasures this shall be added, that I shall see those deprived of all power who have long watched to do me mischief : or certainly hear of the ruin of those malicious men, who set themselves with all their might to destroy me.

Ver. 12.] Which may be an encouragement to every good man to hope in God, and not question the justice of his providence, if at present he be afflicted : for as he shall overturn all his enemies at the last, so he will make the righteous flourish (not as the wicked do, like the grass, ver. 7, but) in a durable prosperity, like the fruitful palm and the stately cedar in Lebanon.

Ver. 13.] For they are under the care of the Lord our God, whose house they frequent : and there partake of his divine blessing, for the growth and increase of their happiness.

Ver. 14.] Which shall not decay, as the strength and freshness of those trees will do with age ; but the older they grow, the more happy fruits shall their piety produce : and they shall abound in wealth and honour as much as they do in that.

Ver. 15.] To demonstrate to all the world that the Lord is a most impartial governor, whom I have found my firm and immovable friend : and, assure yourselves, is so just and kind, that he will never let wickedness go unpunished, nor virtue be always unrewarded.

PSALM XCIII.

1 THE LORD reigneth, he is clothed with majesty; the LORD is clothed with strength, where-with he hath girded himself: the world also is established, that it cannot be moved.

2 Thy throne is established of old: thou art from everlasting.

2 The floods have lifted up, O LORD, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves.

4 The LORD on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea.

5 Thy testimonies are very sure: holiness becometh thine house, O LORD, for ever.

PSALM XCIII.

ARGUMENT.—There is no title in the Hebrew to tell us who was the author of this Psalm: nor was there any in Origen's Hexaplus, or in Eusebius, as Theodoret confesses: who found, in the Greek copy which he used, this Psalm called An Ode of David, in praise of God: to which hath been since added, in the day before the sabbath, when the earth began to be inhabited. Which Musculus thinks was not rashly done by the Greeks: but suspects they were moved to it; because they knew, perhaps, that the Jews used this Psalm upon that day. As indeed they did; for the words of the Talmud, in the title Kedishim, confirm his suspicions; which are these (as I find them set down by De Dieu, upon the foregoing Psalm): "The Canticles which the Levites sung in the sanctuary were as follow: on the first day of the week the twenty-fourth, on the second the forty-eighth, on the third the eighty-second, on the fourth the ninety-fourth, on the fifth the eighty-first, on the sixth the ninety-third, and on the seventh the ninety-second."

Nor is the matter of this Psalm more distant from the foregoing, than the sixth day is from the seventh; for it seems to me to have been composed when some of those potent enemies began to take heart again, and threaten to disturb David's peace and tranquillity: which, in the foregoing Psalm, he had said he was confident they should never be able to overthrow. Though, in the more sublime sense, it ought to be applied to the stability of Christ's kingdom: which several of the Jews acknowledged is prophesied of, in this, and in all the Psalms that follow unto the hundredth.

Ver. 1.] Let the nations boast of the power and splendour of their kings, and trust to their military preparations; this is our glory and our confidence, that the Lord reigneth over us; whose royal ornaments are not gold and precious stones, but majesty itself; and is not armed with sword and spear, but with almighty strength, which is ready to fight for us: who have this comfort also, that he who made the world will support that excellent order wherein we are settled; so that it shall not be in the power of man to disturb what he has established.

Ver. 2.] This we know, because thy kingdom, O Lord, is fixed and immovable: and did not begin now, when we were made thy peculiar people; but was, as thou art, from everlasting.

Ver. 3.] We will not be afraid, therefore, though multitudes of combined enemies threaten to break in upon us like a flood: though they storm and rage and insolently vaunt, as if they were sure to overwhelm us:

Ver. 4.] Though they roar terribly, and be as numerous as the waters of the sea; swelling like its boisterous waves, in a furious tempest; the great Lord is above them all, and can instantly depress them as low as he pleases.

Ver. 5.] And thy fidelity in performing the promises wherein thou hast testified thy good will to us, is as unquestionable as thy power; no age shall find it fail: for it becomes not thee to start from thy word delivered to us by thy oracle; but it is thy glory to observe it sacredly for ever.

PSALM XCIV.

1 O LORD God, to whom vengeance belongeth; O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, shew thyself.

2 Lift up thyself, thou judge of the earth: render a reward to the proud.

PSALM XCIV.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm also wants an inscription in the Hebrew, to tell us who was the author of it, but the later Greeks entitle David to it; and call it, A Psalm of his for the fourth day of the week: which they had, (as I showed in the argument of the foregoing Psalm) from the Hebrew tradition in the Talmud: and he hath little acquaintance with the history of David, who doth not see that here is an exact description of the court of Saul, who abused their authority to all manner of oppression and violence (especially against David), without any fear of God, or thought that he would call them to any account for it; as he complains in several other Psalms; particularly lvii.—lix.

But it might as well be penned by any other holy man, who lived in times of general corruption; when (as Theodoret expresses it) their kings and their princes (i. e. judges) loved not to be tied to the law: but pronounced unjust sentences, and committed murders; selling the blood of innocents for bribes: of whom the prophet Isaiah sadly complains, ver. 21 of the first chapter; where, ver. 10 he calls them "rulers of Sodom." Certain it is, the psalmist, whosoever he was, desires he may see justice done upon such atheistical oppressors; and desires good men not to be discouraged under their tyranny: but patiently expect a happy issue of all the vexation which they gave them.

Ver. 1.] O eternal Lord, the sovereign of the world, in whose power it is to punish the highest offenders; and to whom alone it belongs to take revenge on those who oppress thy people, when they should protect them; make thy justice conspicuous in a severe vengeance upon them.

3 LORD, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph?

4 How long shall they utter and speak hard things? and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves?

5 They break in pieces thy people, O LORD, and afflict thine heritage.

6 They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless.

7 Yet they say, The LORD shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it.

8 Understand, ye brutish among the people: and ye fools, when will ye be wise?

9 He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see?

10 He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? he that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?

11 The LORD knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity.

Ver. 2.] Call them to an account, O thou righteous judge of the whole earth; and, by making them suffer according to the wrong they have done, let those proud men, who have acted as if they thought none could control them, know they have a superior.

Ver. 3.] We can scarce behold these wicked men without indignation; it tempts us to impatience, O LORD, to see how they prosper and triumph in their injurious proceedings.

Ver. 4.] And to hear their insolent and provoking language; for they care not what they say; but as they intolerably abuse us, so they audaciously blaspheme thee: the whole company of them priding themselves in the mischief they do: and scornfully deriding those that tell thy judgments will overtake them.

Ver. 5.] They have crushed thy people so, that they dare scarce complain of their tyranny: which cruelly afflicts those who are dear unto thee, with all manner of rapines and extortions.

Ver. 6.] They have no compassion upon the widow or the stranger; but rather spoil them; nay, condemn them to die upon false accusations (that they may possess themselves of their estates), because they have no patron to defend them: and in the same manner they murder, for it is no better, the poor fatherless children, whom they ought to protect from violence.

Ver. 7.] And to harden themselves in their wickedness, they say; What do you tell us of the Lord? he knows not, nor minds not, what we do here. Though there are such evident demonstrations of the divine providence over Jacob and his posterity; yet, for all that, they fancy he doth not regard nor will call them to any account for their doings.

Ver. 8.] What stupid wretches are these! who think themselves the wisest, but are in truth the most brutish of all mankind; whom I would advise, if they have not perfectly lost their reason, to consider this (and sure they are not such fools, but they may soon understand it):

Ver. 9.] Shall not he hear your blasphemies, who gave you the faculty of hearing? and shall not he see all you do, who gave you the power of seeing? Is it possible he should give to others what he wants himself?

Ver. 10.] He that taught all nations his will, shall not he correct them when they transgress it? to what purpose did he make man to know the difference between good and evil, but that he should observe it; and expect, if he did not, to suffer for it?

VOL. II.—118

12 Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O LORD, and teachest him out of thy law;

13 That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity, until the pit be digged for the wicked.

14 For the LORD will not cast off his people, neither will he forsake his inheritance.

15 But judgment shall return unto righteousness: and all the upright in heart shall follow it.

16 Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers? or who will stand up for me against the workers of iniquity?

17 Unless the LORD had been my help, my soul had almost dwelt in silence.

18 When I said, My foot slippeth; thy mercy, O LORD, held me up.

19 In the multitude of my thoughts within me thy comforts delight my soul.

20 Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which frameth mischief by law?

Ver. 11.] Let them devise what ways they please, and flatter themselves with hopes to escape his vengeance: the Lord knows them all: and will make them see, one day, that all such counsels and contrivances are but mere folly and vanity.

Ver. 12.] And far better had it been for them to have been punished sooner; for not he that prospers in his wickedness is happy, but he whom thou chastenest, O Lord, when he doeth amiss; and thereby teachest to study and obey thy law with greater care and diligence.

Ver. 13.] Which will quiet his mind under all his troubles, and at last procure the removal of them: when absolute destruction and ruin meantime are preparing for the ungodly.

Ver. 14.] For the Lord will never abandon the care of his people; nor leave those whom he owns for his peculiar possession, to be utterly undone by the oppressions, which for a time they may endure.

Ver. 15.] But how much sower his judgments may seem to depart from the rules of righteousness, while the wicked flourish, and the godly are afflicted; they shall at last return to such a perfect conformity with them, that all honest-hearted men shall be encouraged thereby still to follow the Lord; and by no means to depart from their integrity, though all things look as if they were unequally carried.

Ver. 16.] Let them learn by my example not to despond; for who is it but he alone, from whom I have expected, and still do expect, to receive protection and help against these malicious men! who make no conscience of what they do, and design my utter ruin.

Ver. 17.] Whose power also is so great, that if the Lord had not seasonably interposed for my assistance and deliverance, I had not now been praying to him, but laid in a silent grave.

Ver. 18.] This was my constant support, if at any time my heart even failed me, and I was ready to conclude, I cannot subsist any longer; then thy mercy, O Lord, sent me relief, and preserved me from the danger wherein I was afraid I should have unavoidably perished.

Ver. 19.] I have had innumerable perplexed thoughts, and anxious cares, which have extremely disquieted me: but as soon as ever I reflected on thy goodness, justice, and truth, they all vanished; and I felt such consolation from thence, as revived my dejected soul.

Ver. 20.] And made me say, I will never imagine

21 They gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous, and condemn the innocent blood.

22 But the LORD is my defence; and my God is the rock of my refuge.

it possible, that thou shouldst favour the tyrannical proceedings of these unrighteous judges: who not only oppress thy people, but do it in a form of justice; and under the colour and pretext of law, make them miserable.

Ver. 21.] They assemble themselves together, and in full council combine to destroy the righteous: upon whom they pass a solemn sentence, though he be perfectly guiltless, to lose his life.

Ver. 22.] But this doth not discourage me (whose case this is); let them decree what they please, and be too hard for all laws, the Lord, who hates unrighteousness, will be my defence; he, who hath been long very gracious to me, I am confident, will secure me from their violence:

Ver. 23.] And, more than that, retort it upon themselves; for the mischief they intended against me shall fall upon their own head: he shall cut them off in their own wicked contrivances; though it be not in our power, yet the Lord our God, who hath undertaken the patronage of those that confide in him, shall cut them off.

PSALM XCV.

1 O COME, let us sing unto the LORD: let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation.

2 Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto him with psalms.

3 For the LORD is a great God, and a great King above all gods.

PSALM XCV.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm likewise is without any title in the Hebrew; but the Greeks call it A Psalm of David, because the apostle to the Hebrews cites a passage out of it under his name, iv. 7. Though that, it must be confessed, is no concluding argument of its being composed by him; because it is usual to call the whole five books by the name of the Psalms of David; when it is certain he did not make them all, but only the greater part.

Whoever was the author, it looks as if it were intended to be a προσφώνημα, or solemn invitation of the people (when they were all assembled together on the Sabbath or some public occasion: Grotius, in Heb. iii. 7—13, thinks on the feast of tabernacles, for which this Psalm was composed) to praise the Lord their God, and hear instructions out of his law: and is justly employed still by the church, in the entrance of our morning service, for the very same purpose. For it plainly relates to the days of Christ, as the Jews confess, and the apostle proves, Heb. iii. iv. where he demonstrates to them of that nation, that the rest here spoken of could not be merely that in the land of Canaan, which their forefathers fell short of, by their disobedience to God in the wilderness: but another, far better, into which they in that day were to be brought by the Messiah, a far greater captain of salvation than Joshua. And therefore it concerned them then, he shows, above all other times, to take care they did not harden their hearts against him, when he came to invite them to a participation of the greatest blessedness; but entertain his holy gospel with a cheerful and joyful obedience to it. Theodoret is of opinion, that it was particularly designed for the times of Josiah, when he made that notable reformation (which we read of 2 Chron. xxxiv. xxxv.) and called them from the worship of idols to the service of the true God. But it could never be more properly used by that nation, than when the Lord Christ came to call them to repentance.

4 In his hand are the deep places of the earth: the strength of the hills is his also.

5 The sea is his, and he made it: and his hands formed the dry land.

6 O come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before the LORD our maker.

7 For he is our God; and we are the people

Ver. 1.] O stir up yourselves, all ye that come hither to worship the Lord, and with united affections let us cheerfully sing his praises: let us lift up our voices, and triumphantly laud the author of all the good we enjoy; and in whom we may safely confide for ever.

Ver. 2.] Let us approach into his presence with thankful hearts, to acknowledge the benefits we have received from him: and devoutly proclaim, with triumphant hymns, what a joy it is to us that we may address ourselves unto him.

Ver. 3.] For the Lord is infinitely powerful, and hath a sovereign authority; not only over all the princes on the earth, but all the angels and principalities in heaven.

Ver. 4.] All those treasures are in his possession, which lie in the deepest and most secret parts of the earth, whither none of our monarchs can extend their power: and the loftiest hills, which none but the clouds can touch, are part of his dominion.

Ver. 5.] The sea also obeys him alone; who hath an unquestionable title to it, and to all the rest of his wide empire; for he made both it and the dry land, with all the things contained therein.

Ver. 6.] O be not backward then to comply with this renewed invitation; but let us all with the lowest protestations devoutly adore his majesty: let it not suffice us to do it once; but again let us, with humble reverence, bow both our bodies and souls, in token of our subjection to him: let us fall on our knees, and submissively acknowledge the duty we owe to the great Lord who gave us our being.

Ver. 7.] Which we, above all people, have reason to do, because he hath a peculiar relation to us and kindness for us; providing for all our wants most liberally, and continually defending us from all dangers: O that you would therefore, without delay, listen to him, and be obedient to the voice of your creator, conservator, and benefactor, who calls upon you most graciously (by his own Son, Heb. iii. 6, 7, iv. 7), saying; of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand. To day if ye will hear his voice,

8 Harden not your heart, as in the provocation, and as in the day of temptation in the wilderness:

9 When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my work.

Ver. 8.] Lay to heart what I have done for you, and be not so stupidly insensible as your fathers were; at that place whose name (Meribah and Massah) preserves the memory of their provoking strife with Moses, and temptation of God in the wilderness (Exod. xvii. 2—7).

Ver. 9.] When they doubted of my power, and demanded new proofs of my presence among them (Exod. xvii. 7), though they had seen my wonderful works in their late deliverance at the Red Sea; and in making the bitter waters sweet; and in sending them bread from heaven (Exod. xiv.—xvi.).

Ver. 10.] Nor did they then cease their discontented

10 Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart, and they have not known my ways:

11 Unto whom I swore in my wrath that they should not enter into my rest.

murmurings and distrust of me; but continued their stubborn infidelity, vexing, nay tiring, my patience for the space of forty years; long before the end of which I concluded that they were a people whose heart would never be steadfastly resolved to adhere unto me; for they did not mind what wonderful things I did for them, nor what I commanded them to do for me.

Ver. 11.] Which so highly displeased me, that I swore they should wander all their days, and die at last in the wilderness (Numb. xiv. 28, &c.), and never enter into that good land, where I intended to give them rest after all their travels (Deut. xii. 9).

PSALM XCVI.

1 O SING unto the LORD a new song: sing unto the LORD, all the earth.

2 Sing unto the LORD, bless his name; shew forth his salvation from day to day.

3 Declare his glory among the heathen, his wonders among all people.

4 For the LORD is great, and greatly to be praised: he is to be feared above all gods.

PSALM XCVI.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm also wants a title in the Hebrew: but the Greeks are justified in the former part of their inscription (which calls it An Ode of David's), by 1 Chron. xvi. where we find, that, at the bringing up the ark from the house of Obadedom, to the place he had prepared for it on mount Zion, David delivered this Psalm (together with the hundred and fifti) into the hand of Asaph, to express the joy he had in God's special presence among them: which all their neighbours round about, he foretells, should be made sensible of, as well as themselves.

This Psalm, indeed, is not exactly the very same with that; but there is a difference in some expressions; ex. gr. it is called here a new song, but not there; which shows it was afterward altered by some divine person, who accommodated it to other uses. And very probably by Ezra, when they came out of Babylon: which occasioned the Greeks to add, in the latter part of the inscription of this Psalm. these words: "when the house was built after the captivity." Ezra, that is, made use of it to express their joy at the re-edification of the temple.

But it never had a complete fulfilling, answerable to the height of it, till the Messiah (who was indeed the temple of God) came to dwell among us, to give eternal salvation to us. Several of the Jewish writers acknowledge that it belongs to his times: and accordingly we not only may, but ought to have him in our minds, when we say, "Sing unto the Lord a new song (for his new grace, that is, in sending him to give salvation to all nations), and 'the Lord reigneth'" (ver. 10), and hath all things put under his feet (see Euseb. in his Demonstrat. Evangelicæ, lib. i. cap. 4).

Ver. 1.] O sing praises unto the Lord, for his new 5 For all the gods of the nations are idols: but the LORD made the heavens.

6 Honour and majesty are before him: strength and beauty are in his sanctuary.

7 Give unto the LORD, O ye kindreds of the people, give unto the LORD glory and strength.

8 Give unto the LORD the glory due unto his name: bring an offering, and come into his courts.

and extraordinary benefits which he hath bestowed upon us: let all the earth join together with us to sing his praises.

Ver. 2.] We can never praise him enough; and therefore cease not to bless his name, and to spread the fame of his almighty goodness towards us; but publish every day, with joyful hearts, the great deliverances he hath wrought for us.

Ver. 3.] Tell the nations round about how he hath glorified himself: let none of them be ignorant of the wonderful things he hath done among us.

Ver. 4.] For all our praises fall infinitely short of the greatness of the Lord; who is worthy of the highest praise of the whole world: and hath shown both to us (1 Chron. xiii. 10—12, 1 Sam. vi. 29), and to others (1 Sam. v. 3, 4, &c.), how dreadful he is above all that are called gods.

Ver. 5.] For all the gods of the nations are nothing worth, being able to do neither good nor harm; but the Lord not only made the earth, but the heavens too; which abundantly declare the greatness and splendour of his majesty.

Ver. 6.] Whose heavenly court infinitely outshines all the state and pomp wherein the greatest earthly monarchs live (Esther i. 4). For all the words we have are not able to express the brightness and magnificence, the power and comely order, of so much as his ministers: an image of which we have in his holy place; wherein he manifests himself among us.

Ver. 7.] Ascribe, therefore, unto the Lord, O ye people, from whatsoever family ye come; ascribe unto him that incomparable majesty and supreme dominion and authority, which you give to imaginary gods.

Ver. 8.] And renounce them all; and, acknowledging the Lord alone to be the omnipotent king of all the world, do him honour suitable to the excellency of his majesty; bring him an oblation in token 9 O worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness: fear before him, all the earth.

10 Say among the heathen that the LORD reigneth: the world also shall be established that it shall not be moved: he shall judge the people righteously.

11 Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad; let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof.

of your subjection to him, and humbly worship him in his temple.

Ver. 9.] O come and cast down yourselves before the Lord in his sanctuary, where he hath fixed his glorious residence among us: adore his transcendent perfections; and let all the people approach into his presence with a pious trembling and dread to offend their sovereign.

Ver. 10.] Go, ye that are already become proselytes unto him, and publish everywhere, in all countries, that the Lord [Christ] is the sovereign of the world, who alone can make it happy: for he shall settle those in peace that submit unto his government: and they shall not be so disturbed as they were wont with wars and tumults: he shall administer equal justice unto all; and neither suffer the good to be unrewarded, nor the evil to escape unpunished.

Ver. 11.] Let the whole universe therefore be filled

12 Let the field be joyful, and all that is therein: then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice

13 Before the LORD: for he cometh, for he cometh to judge the earth: he shall judge the world with righteousness, and the people with his truth.

with joy at this blessed news; which the angels themselves shall gladly receive (Luke i. 30, 32): much more ought all mankind, wheresoever they are dispersed, on the earth, or on the sea, and the islands thereof, exceedingly rejoice; and fill all places with the loud sound of their joyful praises.

Ver. 12.] Let the husbandmen, and the shepherds, and all that dwell in the fields, leap for joy: and the woodmen and foresters shout for joy, to see the happy day approaching; when all the idols that are worshipped there shall be thrown down together with their groves.

Ver. 13.] Let them welcome that day; and meet the Lord with forward affection, who is coming to them: for he comes to reform the earth, and will govern mankind by righteous and merciful laws; and faithfully keep his word with all those that truly observe them.

PSALM XCIV.

1 THE LORD reigneth; let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of isles be glad thereof.

2 Clouds and darkness are round about him: righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne.

PSALM XCIV.

ARGUMENT.—Some of the Hebrews conceive (as I observed upon Ps. xc.), that Moses was the author of this, as well as the rest of these Psalms which want an inscription. And, indeed, he excelled in this faculty of composing hymns, as we learn from Exod. xv. and Deut. xxxii., and might upon some other occasion, as well as the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red sea, make a song of triumph, after some of those great victories which God gave them over their enemies. Which was a thing in use before his time, as it appears by the fragments of ancient songs recorded in his books: particularly that invictus made by some poet among the Amorites, after Sihon had taken Heshbon from the Moabites, to whom it formerly belonged; wherein they triumph over their god Chemosh, as unable to deliver his worshippers (Numb. xxi. 27, &c.). And if we could be sure this Psalm was made by Moses, I should think it to have been composed after the Israelites had conquered Sihon and his land: over whom they triumphed, as he had done over the former possessors of that country. But the Psalm seems so plainly to have been composed in pursuance of what was said in the foregoing Psalm, that the Lord reigneth, and is king, not only over Israel, but all the earth, that one cannot but think they had the same author: who shows the truth of that by the illustrious victories which God, as their king, had given them over all those that opposed them. For the eighth verse makes it manifest that this Psalm hath respect to some conquests they had lately made over the heathen: which, I suppose, were no other than those which David won over divers nations; not long after (1 Chron. xviii. 1) he had brought the ark to Zion, and delivered the foregoing hymn to be sung, to put the Israelites in hope, and their enemies in fear, of the great things which should ensue, upon this special presence of God among them.

Which moved the Greeks to call this A Psalm of David, after his land was restored unto him: that is, after he was made master of all those countries which God anciently designed to be the inheritance of Israel. For that it should relate to the restoring his kingdom to him after Absalom's rebellion, is not probable; because the mention of idolaters and of their gods, ver. 7, seems to determine it to other countries. In the subduing of which, God, it is likely, fought for them by some such tempest as we read of, 2 Sam. v. 20, 24, whereby their enemies' armies were shattered, and so terrified, that they not only fled, but left their images behind them (such was their haste), and gave the Israelites an easy victory over them.

But whatever was the carnal sense, it belongs, in the diviner meaning, to Christ's triumph over the grave, and all the powers of darkness, at his resurrection and ascension to his throne in heaven: as appears by those words which the apostle to the Hebrews alleges out of the seventh verse, and applies to Christ's royal power and authority over angels. Which the Hebrew doctors themselves, as Kimchi confesses, take to be there intended: and may be farther justified from that exposition which we meet withal in Midrasch Tenchuma, of the words of the prophet Isaiah, lii. 13, "Behold, my servant shall prosper: he shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high." This is the king Messiah, says that gloss, who shall be exalted above Abraham, and extolled above Moses, and be very high above the angels of the ministry.

3 A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about.

4 His lightnings enlightened the world: the earth saw, and trembled.

5 The hills melted like wax at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the Lord of the whole earth.

6 The heavens declare his righteousness, and all the people see his glory.

7 Confounded be all they that serve graven images, that boast themselves of idols: worship him, all ye gods.

Ver. 1.] The Lord, it is manifest, is the sovereign of the world: under whose happy government, not only we, and they who are already become subject to him in other places, ought to rejoice; but the most distant countries have the greatest reason to be glad thereof.

Ver. 2.] His majesty is most dreadful; and hath appeared in great terror against those that oppose him: whom, as he will not wrong, so he will certainly punish; for he maintains his authority, and supports his government, by doing exact and equal justice.

Ver. 3.] Let none therefore resist him, for flames of fire proceed from his presence; which make the battle too hot for his enemies: who can turn no way but they feel them flashing in their faces.

Ver. 4.] It was his thunder and lightning, the brightness of which the world lately saw; and were so amazed, that shivering pains took hold upon them, as upon a woman in her travail.

Ver. 5.] The hearts of the stoutest kings and captains failed them; and melted like wax before the fire, at this terrible appearance of the Lord: at the appearance of him whose dominion extends over all the earth.

Ver. 6.] For he is the Lord of the heavens: which have declared, by this dreadful tempest (excited by his angelical ministers), his severity against his enemies; and made all the people sensible of the incomparable splendour of his majesty.

Ver. 7.] Which may well make them all ashamed (and they shall be confounded by him, if they will not renounce their errors) who worship graven images (though of gold and silver, 2 Sam. v. 21), and boast themselves in vain gods, who can do nothing for them: let all that are called gods, whether princes

8 Zion heard, and was glad; and the daughters of Judah rejoiced because of thy judgments, O Lord.

9 For thou, Lord, art high above all the earth: thou art exalted far above all gods.

10 Ye that love the Lord, hate evil: he preserveth the souls of his saints; he delivereth them out of the hand of the wicked.

11 Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart.

12 Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous; and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

on earth, or angels in heaven, bow down to him, as the only saviour (Heb. i. 6), and acknowledge his supreme authority over them all.

Ver. 8.] Jerusalem, the mother-city, hath received the news of thy victories with a joyful heart: after whose example, all the other cities of Judah are exceeding glad, O Lord; because thou hast judged righteously, in destroying our idolatrous enemies, and defending thy faithful servants.

Ver. 9.] Whose hearts are filled with the greater joy, because thou, O Lord, hast manifested thyself hereby, to be the supreme and only potentate; who rulest over all the earth, and art infinitely superior to all that have the name of gods.

Ver. 10.] But do not content yourselves merely with this passion of joy: if you truly love the Lord, hate every thing which you know is displeasing to him: so shall you have the Lord of all things for your continual keeper; who preserves the lives of sincerely pious men, and watches over them with such a careful providence, that when they are in the power of the wicked, he will not suffer them to destroy them.

Ver. 11.] Be not discouraged, though the world should frown upon you; but rest assured that God designs you, in due time, more cheerful and happy days: which, if you continue faithful, and serve him with upright hearts, shall as certainly come as the corn at land springs up after it hath lain all winter in the ground.

Ver. 12.] Let all truly good men rely on this, and rejoice in their worst estate; that they serve such a gracious Lord: let them give thanks unto him for his benefits, and gratefully commemorate how kind and gracious he hath been unto them; that it may be kept in perpetual remembrance.

PSALM XCVIII.

A Psalm.

1 O SING unto the Lord a new song; for he hath done marvellous things: his right hand, and his holy arm, hath gotten him the victory.

2 The Lord hath made known his salvation: his righteousness hath he openly shewed in the sight of the heathen.

PSALM XCVIII.

ARGUMENT.—There is no title here but only this, A Psalm; to which the Greeks add, of David: who, it is very probable, was the author; or if he was not, it was made by some holy man, in imitation of what David saith in the ninety-sixth (of many of whose expressions this Psalm consists), upon occasion of some remarkable deliverance, which God had newly granted to Israel, as an earnest of future blessings; especially of the coming of that great blessing, the Lord Christ, to give complete salvation to his people.

Ver. 1.] O let the new and extraordinary benefits which the Lord hath bestowed upon us provoke you to sing praises unto him with fresh devotion: for he hath done stupendous things, and, by his almighty goodness alone, and incomparable strength, hath wrought salvation for those who were as unworthy to be helped by him, as they were unable to help themselves.

Ver. 2.] The Lord hath declared, by the wonders he hath done, how mighty he is to save and deliver: he made the gentile world apparently see that he is the just rewarder of all those who piously obey him; and will not let the wicked escape unpunished.

3 He hath remembered his mercy and his truth toward the house of Israel: all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.

4 Make a joyful noise unto the LORD, all the earth: make a loud noise, and rejoice, and sing praise.

5 Sing unto the LORD with the harp; with the harp, and the voice of a psalm.

Ver. 3.] He hath not forgot his ancient covenant with our forefathers: but so faithfully performed what his mere mercy moved him to promise (Luke i. 54, 55, 72), that all mankind have seen what our gracious God hath done, and partake of his divine benefits.

Ver. 4.] Let them all therefore shout for joy; let them cry aloud, and with strong and cheerful voices sing hymns of thanks and praise unto the Lord.

Ver. 5.] Let nothing be wanting to express your joyful sense of the goodness of the Lord; but let the harp accompany your songs; let the sweet sound of the harp, I say, and the sound of your voices, be mixed together with your psalms.

Ver. 6.] And let the trumpet also and cornet proclaim with a louder sound the exceeding greatness of 6 With trumpets and sound of cornet make a joyful noise before the LORD, the King.

7 Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.

8 Let the floods clap their hands: let the hills be joyful together

9 Before the LORD; for he cometh to judge the earth: with righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with equity.

your joy; while you shout with triumphant acclamations to him, and acknowledge the Lord to be your king.

Ver. 7.] Let the noise of his praises be heard like thunder, throughout all the habitable world; both among those that live on the sea, and those that are upon the land.

Ver. 8.] Let high, as well as low, applaud their happiness, and join together with one consent, to express, by all the tokens of joy, the singular pleasure and satisfaction they feel in their hearts.

Ver. 9.] Let them meet the Lord with forward affections; who is coming to reform the earth: and will govern mankind by righteous and merciful laws; distributing to every man according to his work.

PSALM XCIX.

1 THE LORD reigneth; let the people tremble: he sitteth between the cherubims; let the earth be moved.

2 The LORD is great in Zion; and he is high above all the people.

3 Let them praise thy great and terrible name; for it is holy.

4 The king's strength also loveth judgment; thou dost establish equity, thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob.

PSALM XCIX.

ARGUMENT.—The Greeks entitle David to this Psalm: which seems to have been made upon the same occasion, and to the same end, with the three foregoing: only with these two differences; first, that from the consideration of the royal power of the Lord (who had manifested himself by some notable conquests over his enemies, to be the only monarch whose sovereignty extends over all the world), they should mix fear and trembling, together with that joy and exultation to which in the former Psalm he had excited them: and secondly, that he doth not so plainly, as in those Psalms, prophesy of the kingdom of the Lord Christ.

But there are many passages, as Theodoret observes, which may be applied to the appearing of our Saviour, and the infidelity of the Jews. St. Austin and St. Ambrose apply to him that passage, upon which the Roman church builds the lawfulness of worshipping images (ver. 5), where the Vulgar Latin reading, Adorate scabellum pedum ejus, "worship his footstool;" those two fathers think there is no way to reconcile this with that command, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve," but by expounding this of the flesh of Christ, which is the footstool, they say, which the psalmist exhorts all men to worship (so far were those holy men from allowing adoration to any thing that is not God, or hath not a personal union with him). And, indeed, Christ was represented by the ark; which was the divine footstool (here spoken of), but not to be adored, no more than the hill on which it stood: concerning which the psalmist speaks, in the last verse, just as he doth of the ark in this; and therefore we ought to understand both passages alike (the particle in the Hebrew being the very same before footstool and before hill), and translate them thus, worship at, or before, or towards, his footstool and holy hill: as elsewhere he speaks of worshipping towards his temple (cxxxviii. 2). And so Menochius very honestly here expounds this passage in these words: "Worship in his temple, turning your faces towards the ark, on which is the propitiatory, which is his footstool; since he sits on the wings of the cherubins."

Ver. 1.] Let the people fret and be tumultuous, if they please; it will do them no service: for the Lord is the supreme governor of the world, whether they will or no: and they had better, with a pious fear, submit themselves unto him; though the whole earth should be in an uproar, we are safe and secure; for the Lord is attended with innumerable heavenly ministers, who are a guard to his faithful worshippers.

Ver. 2.] The Lord, whose palace is in Zion, is transcendently great: there is no power on earth able to oppose him; who infinitely surpasses the united strength of all people.

Ver. 3.] Let them all therefore praise, and reverently acknowledge, thy mighty and dreadful majesty: for that alone is every way most excellent, and hath no equal; and therefore worthy of all veneration.

Ver. 4.] For, though none can resist him, yet he is not a king that uses his power to wrong or oppress his subjects; but to do them right, and give them relief, in which he delights: this is thy character, O Lord, who hast established most equal laws among us; and hitherto governed the seed of Jacob with exact justice and singular mercy.

5 Exalt ye the LORD our God, and worship at his footstool; for he is holy.

6 Moses and Aaron among his priests, and Samuel among them that call upon his name; they called upon the LORD, and he answered them.

7 He spake unto them in the cloudy pillar:

Ver. 5.] Do you, therefore, above all other people, extol the Lord our God, both in your thoughts, affections and words; and, turning your faces towards the ark of his presence, prostrate yourselves before his majesty, in token of your absolute subjection to him: for he is incomparably above all other beings, and the proper object of your adoration.

Ver. 6.] Thus did Moses and Aaron, two of his principal and most famous ministers (Exod. xxxii. 11. Numb. xvi. 45, 46,) and thus did Samuel, one of his greatest prophets, that were wont to intercede for you (1 Sam. vii. 5, 9, xii. 19). These holy men fell down before him, to make their humble supplications to him; and he gave them what they desired.

Ver. 7.] He spake to them in a familiar manner, telling them his mind out of a pillar of cloud, wherein he appeared to them (Exod. xxxiii. 9, 10, Numb. xii. 5, xvi. 42, 1 Sam. iii. 10), and they, like faithful servants of his, conformed themselves to his precepts, by they kept his testimonies, and the ordinance that he gave them.

8 Thou answerdest them, O LORD our God: thou wast a God that forgavest them, though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions.

9 Exalt the LORD our God, and worship at his holy hill; for the LORD our God is holy.

which he testified his will to them; and worshipped him after that manner that he appointed them.

Ver. 8.] Whereby they obtained great favour with thee, O Lord our God: for when they prayed to thee thou fulfilledst their petitions: passing by, for their sakes, the sins of those who had highly offended thee; but taking a most severe vengeance on all those who contemned their authority, and were contriving how to depose them (Numb. xii. 2, 10, xvi. 3, 35, 1 Sam. viii. 7-9, &c.).

Ver. 9.] Imitate therefore the piety of those admirable men; and raise your thoughts, and affections, and voices, to extol and magnify the Lord our God, as much as you are able; for you can never do it enough: and in token of your absolute subjection to him, go and prostrate yourselves before him, at his house on the holy hill of Zion: for the Lord our God is incomparably above all other beings, and alone worthy of your adoration.

PSALM C.

A Psalm of praise.

1 MAKE a joyful noise unto the LORD, all ye lands.

2 Serve the LORD with gladness: come before his presence with singing.

PSALM C.

ARGUMENT.—There is no other Psalm hath the like title with this; which is called A Psalm of praise: or rather of thanksgiving, and acknowledgment for divine blessings, as the word is translated below (ver. 4), and in most other places. For which reason, I suppose, it is, that the Hebrews imagine (as the Chaldee paraphrase, as well as others of their authors, tell us,) it was peculiarly appointed to be sung, when their sacrifices of thanksgiving were offered; mentioned Lev. vii. 12, 13. The companies also, or choirs of them, who gave thanks to God, are called by this name, Neh. xii. 31-38. Which makes it probable, that the Levites sung this song upon that occasion: which the Greeks think was made by David; who invites all the world to join with the Israelites, in the service of him, who was kind and gracious to them beyond expression. Accordingly we Christians now properly use it in acknowledgment of God's wonderful love to us in Christ: by whom we offer up continually spiritual sacrifices; for redeeming us by the sacrifice he made of himself; for making the world anew, and creating us again unto good works; according to his faithful promises, which we may depend upon for ever.

I do not know but the word new made (ver. 3), may be used here as it is 1 Sam. xii. 6, for advancing, raising, or preferring them (as he is there said to have done Moses and Aaron); making them to be what they then were, a famous people, in a good land: which seems to agree best with the following

3 Know ye that the LORD he is God: it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves; we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture.

4 Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and words, "and not we ourselves" (and therefore I have not omitted that sense). For to deny that we created ourselves, is altogether needless; but that it is not to be ascribed to our industry or wit, that we are raised to a happy condition, is a proper expression of humility.

Ver. 1.] Let all the people of the earth lift up their voices, in triumphant songs, to the honour of the Lord; who deserves all our praises.

Ver. 2.] Make the service of the Lord your delight, nay, greatest pleasure; and when you approach into his tabernacle, shout for joy that you are admitted into his blessed presence, to praise him with your cheerful hymns.

Ver. 3.] Consider that the Lord, whom you worship, is the creator and governor of the world; who gave us our being, and all the good things we enjoy: his we are, and by his power and goodness, not our own, we are become so great and mighty a nation! whom, out of his own mere good will alone, he hath made his peculiar people, of whom he takes a tender care.

Ver. 4.] When you enter therefore into the gates of his sanctuary, present him not merely with the sacrifices of beasts, but with the most acceptable sacrifice of hearty thanksgiving; and as you stand in his courts, attending on him, cease not to sing his praises: thank him, I say, for all his benefits, and praise his incomparable perfections.

Ver. 5.] For as his power is transcendent, so is his goodness; as appears by his never-failing bounty into his courts with praise : be thankful unto him, and bless his name.

towards us, and his steadfast faithfulness to his word : for the mercy promised to our forefathers he hath 5 For the Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations.

exactly fulfilled in our days ; and will continue to all succeeding generations.

PSALM CI.

A Psalm of David.

1 I WILL sing of mercy and judgment : unto thee, O LORD, will I sing.

2 I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way. O when wilt thou come unto me ? I will walk within my house with a perfect heart.

3 I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes : I hate the work of them that turn aside ; it shall not cleave to me.

4 A froward heart shall depart from me : I will not know a wicked person.

5 Whoso privily slandereth his neighbour, him will I cut off : him that hath an high look and a proud heart will not I suffer.

6 Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with me : he that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me.

7 He that worketh deceit shall not dwell

PSALM CI.

ARGUMENT.—The title tells us who made this Psalm ; and the matter of it is so plain, that anybody may see it is a pious resolution of David to govern first himself, and then his court, and then his kingdom, with so much care, that the good might expect all favour from him, but no wicked man, of any sort, have the least countenance or encouragement.

The only difficulty is to know when he composed it ; whether before or after he was settled in his kingdom. The first words of it seem to countenance those who think he was possessed of it ; and newly entered upon the government ; which he thankfully acknowledges. But the words that follow (ver. 2), "O when wilt thou come unto me," seem to justify their opinion, who think he was now under Saul's persecution : yet, having confidence in God's promises (which he longed to see fulfilled), made this religious vow, of being a good king ; and proposed to himself an excellent form and manner of life, when God should be pleased to perform them. To reconcile both these, there is a middle way lies open to every one's view that reads this history. For upon the death of Saul, he was immediately promoted to the kingdom ; though not entirely ; but resolved then with himself how well he would govern ; when God should make him king over all Israel, as he had done over Judah. And so I shall order my paraphrase, supposing him to reign now in Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 1—4), and expecting to reign in Jerusalem (v. 3—5), which I presume he here calls the city of God (ver. 8), because there he intended to settle the ark, as well as to fix his court ; when he should be possessed of it.

That passage, indeed, hath induced some to think, that he composed this Psalm after he had made an attempt to bring the ark thither : but failing in it (2 Sam. vi. 9, 10), sighs here for its enjoyment. Which I shall not dispute, because I would not prolong this preface unnecessarily. It is sufficient in my judgment to say, that it doth not seem likely he would defer this resolution so long after he was installed in his kingdom. For it required time to prepare a place for the reception of the ark, suitable to the majesty it represented.

Ver. 1.] I will never forget, but celebrate with perpetual praises that mercy which hath raised me from a low condition unto the throne ; and that just punishment which I see inflicted upon all my opposers : both which I ascribe, O Lord, to thee alone, and not to my virtue or valour ; and therefore to thee will I sing my grateful hymns.

Ver. 2.] Nor will I satisfy myself merely with songs of praise ; but study, with all diligence, integrity of life, and purity of manners : O when wilt thou perfect what thou hast begun for me, and settle me peaceably in my kingdom ? Then I shall be able to live more regularly than now in this state of war and confusion (2 Sam. iii. 1, 39), and so I resolve to do ; sincerely endeavouring to make myself an absolute pattern of piety and virtue to all my court.

Ver. 3.] No pretended reasons of state and politic ends shall make me so much as project any thing against the law, to which I will ever tie myself : for I abhor the practices of those who decline that rule, to pursue their own private desires ; no such corrupt principles shall be entertained in my mind.

Ver. 4.] I will turn him instantly out of my service, who shall dare to suggest to me any crooked counsels : I will have no familiarity with him, much less make him my favourite, who makes no conscience how he compasses his ends.

Ver. 5.] I will be so far from listening to their private whispers, who, by secret calumnies and detractions, endeavour to supplant their fellow-servants, that I will severely punish and banish them my court : nor will I endure those whose pride make them overlook all others, as if they were another sort of creatures ; or whose unsatiable covetousness and ambition make them study their own advancement more than the public good.

Ver. 6.] I will look out for trusty persons, men fearing God, and of clear integrity ; and in what part of the country soever I find them, make them of my privy-council : and no man shall bear any other office in my court but he that lives unblamably.

Ver. 7.] No subtle knave that is made up of shifts and tricks, or that devises cunning cheats to oppress my subjects shall remain in my service : though he have craftily got into it under a guise of simplicity, yet no false informer, flatterer, or any other sort of liar, shall continue in my favour.

Ver. 8.] As soon as ever I am settled in my throne, I will use my utmost diligence to reform the whole nation ; especially the place of thy peculiar residence, which ought to be an example to the rest of the king-within my house : he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight.

8 I will early destroy all the wicked of the dom ; taking care that all offenders be severely punished in the courts of justice : and, if there be no land ; that I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the LORD.

other remedy, cutting off those evil members who have got an incurable habit of doing wickedly.

PSALM CII.

A Prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the Lord.

1 HEAR my prayer, O LORD, and let my cry come unto thee.

2 Hide not thy face from me in the day when I am in trouble ; incline thine ear unto me : in the day when I call answer me speedily.

3 For my days are consumed like smoke, and my bones are burned as an hearth.

4 My heart is smitten, and withered like grass : so that I forget to eat my bread.

5 By reason of the voice of my groaning my bones cleave to my skin.

6 I am like a pelican of the wilderness : I am like an owl of the desert.

7 I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the house top.

8 Mine enemies reproach me all the day ; and they that are mad against me are sworn against me.

9 For I have eaten ashes like bread, and mingled my drink with weeping, 10 Because of thine indignation and thy wrath : for thou hast lifted me up, and cast me down.

11 My days are like a shadow that declineth ; and I am withered like grass.

12 But thou, O LORD, shalt endure for ever ; and thy remembrance unto all generations.

PSALM CII.

ARGUMENT.—A prayer composed by some pious person (towards the latter end of the captivity of Babylon, or rather presently after their return from thence to their own country, ver. 13, 14), who was extremely afflicted, and even overwhelmed, with grief and trouble, to see the temple still lie in its rubbish, and the rebuilding of it hindered by many enemies. This was the cause of those sad complaints and lamentations, wherein he takes the liberty to represent their condition unto the Lord, and thereby give some ease to his oppressed spirit : which began to lift up itself into some comfortable hopes, when he considered both the faithfulness of God to his promises, and the honour it would be to him, when the nations round about should see their wonderful restoration happily completed, and thereby be invited to embrace their religion. Which proved a lively emblem of the coming of the gentiles into the church of Christ : the eternity of whose kingdom is here prophesied of, in the conclusion of the Psalm. Which, as Theodoret well expresses it, may serve for any man's use, who wrestles with any great calamity, and implores the divine favour for his help and deliverance. It may be applied also to his sad condition, who groans under the burden of his sins, and cries for mercy : being the fifth among those seven which are called penitential Psalms.

Ver. 1.] Reject not my humble supplication, O LORD ; but graciously admit the earnest request, which, with lamentable cries, I present unto thy majesty.

Ver. 2.] The distress wherein I am is exceeding great ; which will move thee, I hope, to moderate thy anger, and not absolutely refuse my petition : but rather to grant me the more favourable audience, and to send me the speedier relief ; when I implore it in the time of the sorest calamity.

Ver. 3.] For my days are spent as dismally as if I lived and breathed in smoke ; and the anguish I suffer is so sharp, that it penetrates to my very bones, and makes them as parched and dry as the fire doth the hearth.

Ver. 4.] My vital spirits are exhausted ; and flag like the grass when it is struck with a pestilential blast : for, together with my appetite, I have lost even the thoughts of my necessary food.

Ver. 5.] Sadness hath seized on me to such a degree, that I do nothing but groan and sigh : which hath wasted me away to skin and bone.

Ver. 6.] I take no delight in the company of my friends ; but seek for lonesome places, like a pelican in the wilderness ; where I may bemoan myself like the bitter in the desert.

Ver. 7.] Grief and sorrow banish sleep from mine eyes ; and make me like those solitary birds, which spend the night on the tops of houses, in doleful shrieks and cries.

Ver. 8.] This hath exposed me to the scorn of my enemies, who do nothing but upbraid me with my misery : and, not content therewith, are so furiously bent upon my ruin, that they have entered into a combination, and sworn they will destroy me.

Ver. 9.] Which hath still more increased my affliction, and made me lie down in the ashes : where, while I mourn and weep, they mingle themselves with my bread, as tears do with my drink.

Ver. 10.] Because thy anger still continues in great severity against us ; for thou hadst lifted me up in glorious hopes (Ezra i. 5, ii. 68, iii. 10), thou hast dashed them all in pieces (Ezra iv. 4, 24), and thereby given me the sorer fall.

Ver. 11.] And whilst I wait for better times, my life declines apace ; like a shadow, which, being come near to its utmost length, is ready to vanish : for I have very little strength remaining ; but droop and languish like the dried grass ; which is ripe for the mower's hand.

Ver. 12.] All my comfort is, that, though I die, thou abidest to all eternity ; and canst hereafter remedy all these evils, which thou dost not think fit to redress at present ; and wilt, I am confident ; for all generations have transmitted down unto us the memorial of thy faithfulness, and the glorious things thou hast done for thy people.

13 Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion : for the time to favour her, yea, the set time, is come.

14 For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favour the dust thereof.

15 So the heathen shall fear the name of the LORD, and all the kings of the earth thy glory.

16 When the LORD shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory.

17 He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer.

18 This shall be written for the generation to come : and the people which shall be created shall praise the LORD.

19 For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary ; from heaven did the LORD behold the earth ;

20 To hear the groaning of the prisoner ; to loose those that are appointed to death.

21 To declare the name of the LORD in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem ;

22 When the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms, to serve the LORD.

23 He weakened my strength in the way ; he shortened my days.

24 I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days : thy years are throughout all generations.

25 Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth : and the heavens are the work of thy hands.

26 They shall perish, but thou shalt endure : yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment ; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed :

27 But thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end.

28 The children of thy servants shall continue, and their seed shall be established before thee.

Ver. 13.] It will not be long before thou dost take pity upon the desolations of Zion, and raise her out of her ruins : for the time prefixed for her punishment being expired (Jer. xxix. 10, 11), it is the season now, the appointed season, for thy mercy in her restoration.

Ver. 14.] For her scattered stones are far more dear to thy pious worshippers, than the goodliest palaces in Babylon : and therefore they cannot look upon her dust and rubbish, without the most sensible grief and commiseration.

Ver. 15.] Especially when they consider how thy glory suffers thereby : whereas the nations who now condemn thee, will stand in awe of thee ; O Lord, all their kings and princes will reverence thy glorious power, the fame of which now seems to lie buried in her ruins.

Ver. 16.] When they shall see Zion rebuilt (which the Lord alone can bring about), and his glorious majesty there worshipped with the ancient solemnities :

Ver. 17.] And the prayers of miserable captives, who were stripped of all, prevail with him not only for their liberty, but for their entire restitution to their former splendour.

Ver. 18.] This wonderful deliverance shall never be forgotten, but remain upon record to the following generation : who shall transmit the memory of it to their posterity, that they may also look upon themselves as a people created anew to praise the Lord.

Ver. 19.] Because, in much mercy, he hath been pleased to preserve a miserable nation from utter destruction : and though he be infinitely exalted above all our thoughts, yet the Lord hath graciously condescended to mind the afflicted condition of this distressed country.

Ver. 20.] And to be moved by our groans to deliver us out of a sad captivity : and to revive us when we had reason to look upon ourselves as dead and hopeless.

Ver. 21.] That we might go and recount in his temple the famous things which he hath done : and make the holy city sound with the praises of his power, goodness, and truth ; which he hath declared in our restoration.

Ver. 22.] When all the people shall be gathered together, there to worship the divine majesty ; and other kingdoms join with us unanimously in his service.

Ver. 23.] I had hoped to have lived to see this blessed time, and thought I had been in the way to it (Ezra iii. 8, &c.) : but he hath stopped our vigorous beginnings (Ezra iv. 4), and thereby so sorely afflicted me, that I feel I am like to fall short of my expectations.

Ver. 24.] Though I prayed most earnestly to him, and said, O my God, who hast so graciously begun our deliverance, take me not away before it be completely finished ; but let me see thy promise fulfilled, which thou, who diest not (as we do), I am sure, wilt not fail to make good.

Ver. 25.] For it cannot be too hard for thee to raise Zion out of her ruins ; who hast, many ages ago, created this goodly fabric of heaven and earth by thy eternal word (Heb. i. 10).

Ver. 26.] And thou dost neither decay nor alter, in process of time, as thy creatures do ; some of which shall perish, but thou shalt eternally subsist ; all of them shall grow old, like our garments, with long wearing : even the heavens themselves, which now enwrap the earth, as our clothes do our bodies, shall be folded up (Heb. i. 12), and laid aside like a tattered garment, when thou shalt command that alteration.

Ver. 27.] But thou (and thy word) art still the very same ; and shall always continue so, without any the least variation.

Ver. 28.] Yet all that I conclude from hence is only this : that though I do not live to see our perfect restoration, yet, according to thy unalterable purpose, the temple and Jerusalem shall be rebuilt ; and the children of thy servants, who now are in great distress, be peaceably settled there ; yea, their posterity after them remain unmoved in their favour, and enjoy the tokens of thy divine presence among them.

PSALM CIII.

A Psalm of David.

1 BLESS the LORD, O my soul : and all that is within me, bless his holy name.

2 Bless the LORD, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits :

3 Who forgiveth all thine iniquities ; who healeth all thy diseases ;

4 Who redeemeth thy life from destruction ; who crowneth thee with lovingkindness and tender mercies ;

5 Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things ; so that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's.

6 The LORD executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed.

7 He made known his ways unto Moses, his acts unto the children of Israel.

8 The LORD is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy.

9 He will not always chide : neither will he keep his anger for ever.

10 He hath not dealt with us after our sins ; nor rewarded us according to our iniquities.

11 For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him.

12 As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us.

PSALM CIII.

ARGUMENT.—The title tells us this Psalm is one of David's : and the third, fourth, and fifth verses may satisfy us that he composed it after his recovery from a dangerous sickness, to such a vigorous health as the eagles have when they renew their plumes. To that he alludes, ver. 5, as Euthymius and St. Jerome understand it. The latter of which says upon Isa. xl. that he had often taught, the eagles do no other way return to youthfulness when they are old, but only mutatione pennarum, "by change of their feathers." I have expressed this a little more largely than ordinary, in the paraphrase (as I have done in the rest of the Psalm), to fit it the better to their use now that have escaped the like danger : who should take occasion, when they thank God for such a blessing, to imitate David ; in making a thankful commemoration of the rest of his mercies, both to him and to others ; both in the present and in past ages. And the more to excite devout souls to this, and that I might make their thankfulness the more affectionate (if they please to make use of this hymn for that purpose), I have oft repeated the beginning of the Psalm, which I think refers to the whole : and likewise put it into a little different form (of a soul actually praising God), without the least alteration of the sense.

Ver. 1.] Blessed, for ever blessed, be the Lord of life and health, and all other blessings ; blessed be his eternal power, wisdom, and goodness : with my whole heart do I bless him ; with my most ardent love, and the devoutest affections of my soul.

Ver. 2.] Which shall be every day thus employed, and praise his name with continual pleasure : I will never forget (how shouldst thou prove so ungrateful, O my soul ! as not) to acknowledge the inestimable benefits I have received from his bounty ; which are more than thought can number.

Ver. 3.] More particularly, I render thee, O Lord, my most hearty thanks, for thy late mercies vouchsafed to me : blessed be thy merciful kindness, that, after a short correction for my faults, thou hast graciously pardoned them ; and healed all the sores and grievous wounds which they had made.

Ver. 4.] Blessed be God, who hath saved me from death ; and not only spared my life, but surrounded it most graciously with I know not how many benefits ; which make it exceeding delightful to me. [I owe my friends, lovers, and acquaintance, my careful attendants, my warm and quiet habitation, the plentiful estate thou hast given me, the liberal provision thou makest for me, with all the rest of thy mercies to the bowels of thy tender compassions towards me.]

Ver. 5.] Blessed be thy almighty goodness, that my mouth (which lately disgusted all things, or was restrained from what it desired, or was prescribed that which was disgusting to it) can now relish its food again ; and is satisfied with many good things ; I can never sufficiently bless thy goodness, who by this means dost restore my strength, and makest my youth and freshness return like the eagle's. [O that I may with fresh delight and joy be still praising thee ! and be lifted up to heaven (as they are when they have renewed their plumes), in more vigorous love, and affectionate desires and endeavours ; to employ all my renewed strength in thy faithful service.]

Ver. 6.] Nor am I alone obliged to my gracious Lord for his singular favour to me : but, blessed be his name, he relieves all those who suffer wrong ; and doth justice upon their oppressors, who are too mighty for them.

Ver. 7.] Moses and the rest of our forefathers are witnesses of this : whom the Lord delivered, in a stupendous manner, out of the house of bondage.

Ver. 8.] And by other methods of his providence towards them, and dealing with them, declared how bountiful his blessed nature is, and how ready to forgive : forbearing long when men deserve to be punished ; and soon releasing them from their pain, when they heartily repent of their folly.

Ver. 9.] He doth not love, blessed be his name, to be always chastising us for our faults : and when he doth chastise us, he neither loves to prolong our miseries, nor to inflict them proportionable to our deserts.

Ver. 10.] No, blessed be his holy name, there is mercy even in our punishments : our sufferings are never so great as our sins ; but we might justly suffer a great deal more than we do for our faults.

Ver. 11.] And were we never so obedient, there is not a greater disproportion between the vast circumference of the heavens and this little spot of earth, than there is between his mercies towards us and our small services.

Ver. 12.] To those mercies alone it is to be ascribed, that we are not bemoaning ourselves under innumerable miseries : but he hath quite taken away his wrath from us ; and, adored be his goodness, perfectly remitted the punishment due to our manifold offences.

13 Like as a father pitieth his children, so the LORD pitieth them that fear him.

14 For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust.

15 As for man, his days are as grass: as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth.

16 For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more.

17 But the mercy of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him, and his righteousness unto children's children;

Ver. 13.] O what bowels of mercy are these! no father can be more indulgent and tender-hearted to his returning children, than the Lord, blessed be his name, is to those who so reform by his chastisements, as to fear hereafter to offend him.

Ver. 14.] He easily relents, and takes compassion on them: considering how frail he hath made them; and how soon of themselves they will moulder into the dust, out of which he took them.

Ver. 15.] For what is man, that the Almighty should contend with him? He looks fresh and fair; but, alas! is as feeble as the grass, and as a flower in the field; whose beauty is far greater than its strength.

Ver. 16.] Many accidents snatch him away, even in his prime: just as the biting wind, to which the field-flowers are exposed, blasts them on a sudden, and they spring up no more in the place that was adorned with them.

Ver. 17.] O how much doth this magnify the wonderful mercy of our God! who designs to be everlastingly kind (blessed be his goodness) to such short-lived creatures as we are: rewarding the faithful services of a few years with eternal life to ourselves; and with many blessings to our posterity in future generations.

Ver. 18.] There is no doubt of this; which hath been verified in those who have sincerely kept their 18 To such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them.

19 The LORD hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all.

20 Bless the LORD, ye his angels, that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word.

21 Bless ye the LORD, all ye his hosts; ye ministers of his, that do his pleasure.

22 Bless the LORD, all his works in all places of his dominion: bless the LORD, O my soul.

faith with him; and not only promised, but constantly performed, the obedience they owed him.

Ver. 19.] For none can under thee, O most mighty Lord, from being as kind as thou pleasest: who art the universal monarch; the blessed and only potentate; to whom, not only the greatest men on earth, but the highest powers in heaven, are subject.

Ver. 20.] Let the angels, therefore, who know his greatness, power, and gracious providence, better than I, bless his holy name: let those mighty ones, whose strength surpasses all the powers on earth, and yet never dispute his sacred commands, give praise unto him, with all their might; and with the same cheerfulness wherewith they obey his word.

Ver. 21.] Let the whole company of heaven, all the several hosts of those glorious creatures, who have been employed by his majesty so many ways for our good, and understand how much we are beholden to his love, speak good of his name, and bless his mercy, both to themselves and unto us.

Ver. 22.] Yea, let every creature, throughout the wide world, proclaim, as well as it is able, the loving-kindness of the Lord: let none of them be silent, but all with one consent bless his holy name: and thou, O my soul, be sure thou never forget to make one; O fail not to bear thy part in this joyful choir, that daily sing his praise.

PSALM CIV.

1 BLESS the LORD, O my soul. O LORD my God, thou art very great; thou art clothed with honour and majesty.

2 Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment: who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain:

PSALM CIV.

The foregoing and the following Psalm being certainly composed by David, the Greeks, and from them several other ancient interpreters, have ascribed this also to the same author. For which they had this farther reason, that it begins (as Aben Ezra observes) just as the foregoing Psalm ends: and celebrates the mighty power and goodness of God in the fabric of the world; as the hundred and third doth his benefits to himself, and to the rest of the children of men.

As for the occasion of it, we may look upon it as a probable opinion, that when David thought of building a house for the divine service, and God sent Nathan to forbid him (2 Sam. vii. 5), he fell not long after into the contemplation of the majesty of God; who, having built this great world as his temple, needed none of his erecting; though he would be pleased to accept one for the burning-sacrifice before him, as Solomon afterward speaks (2 Chron. ii. 6). To strengthen this conjecture of mine, it may be observed, that he begins this Psalm with such an admiration of God's most excellent perfection, as we meet withal in David's prayer: immediately after God had certified him of his love towards him, though he would not let him build him a house (2 Sam. vii. 22): "Thou art great, O Lord, for there is none like unto thee." In the same manner he saith here, "O Lord my God, thou art very great:" as he proceeds to demonstrate from his wonderful works. And first he begins with the heavens, the clouds, and the angels; and then comes down to the earth, the sea, the mountains, valleys, fountains, and other inferior things: which depend so much upon the sun, the moon, and heavenly bodies, that all of them together declare the most admirable wisdom of him by whom they were composed; and should excite all mankind to his perpetual praises. Which that we may do the more affectionately, when we use this hymn, I have often repeated the beginning of it, as I did in the foregoing.

3 Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters: who maketh the clouds his chariot: who walketh upon the wings of the wind:

4 Who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire:

5 Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed for ever.

6 Thou coveredst it with the deep as with a garment: the waters stood above the mountains.

7 At thy rebuke they fled; at the voice of thy thunder they hasted away.

8 They go up by the mountains; they go down by the valleys unto the place which thou hast founded for them.

9 Thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over; that they turn not again to cover the earth.

10 He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills.

Ver. 1.] Stir up thyself, O my soul, with all thy might, to meditate the praises of the Lord. For the highest of all our thoughts are infinitely below thy greatness, O Lord, my most gracious God: who hast shown in thy most admirable works, the surpassing excellence of thy majesty; which we can never worthily celebrate with all our praises.

Ver. 2.] The light, which dazzles our eyes with its splendour, is the royal robe, wherein thy invisible and incomprehensible brightness appears unto us: and the spacious heavens are the royal pavilion, which thy sovereign power hath extended, like a canopy, for thy majesty, in this great palace of the world.

Ver. 3.] The floor of whose chambers, which the Lord hath laid in the upper region of the air; O how highly is it advanced above the top of the stately piles that are raised by earthly monarchs! whose pompous chariots (whereof they boast) fall infinitely short of those glorious clouds, wherein he makes himself present to us; as their swiftest horses are slow-paced, in comparison with the quick motion, more speedy than the wind, wherewith he visits every part of his dominion.

Ver. 4.] Into which he sends his angels (and what king is there that hath such noble ministers?) sometimes in vehement winds, and sometimes in lightning, and thunder, whereby they execute his royal pleasure.

Ver. 5.] Who hath settled the massy globe of the earth even in the liquid air, upon such firm foundations, that none of those storms and tempests, which beat upon it from without, nor any commotions from within, can ever stir it out of the place he hath fixed for it.

Ver. 6.] It was all covered over at the first with waters (Gen. i. 2), which were so deep, that there was no appearance of the highest mountains.

Ver. 7.] Till thy omnipotent word charged them to retire (Gen. i. 9), at which they started back, and suddenly shrunk away; as an affrighted slave doth, when he hears the thunder of his master's threatenings, if his commands be not obeyed.

Ver. 8.] Immediately the dry land was seen; part of which (by thy wonderful contrivance, O Lord) rose up in lofty hills, and the rest sunk down in lowly valleys; where thou hast cut channels for the waters to run into the main ocean; the place thou hast appointed for them.

Ver. 9.] And there, though they restlessly toss and swell, yet they cannot get over the shores, wherein 11 They give drink to every beast of the field: the wild asses quench their thirst.

12 By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches.

13 He watereth the hills from his chambers: the earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works.

14 He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man: that he may bring forth food out of the earth;

15 And wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart.

16 The trees of the Lord are full of sap; the cedars of Lebanon, which he hath planted;

17 Where the birds make their nests: as for the stork, the fir trees are her house.

18 The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats; and the rocks for the conies.

thou hast enclosed them: nor shall they recover their former liberty, to overflow the earth again.

Ver. 10.] But still, such is the admirable providence of the Lord, they climb, through the hollow places of the earth, up the steepest parts of it; and there break out in springs: which fall down into the valleys, to make brooks and rivers, that run between the hills; which, on either side, send into them fresh supplies to enlarge their streams.

Ver. 11.] Which afford, not only to us, but to all the beasts of the earth, such abundant refreshment, when they are dry; that even the dull asses, who live in parched deserts, find them out to quench their thirst.

Ver. 12.] The birds of the air also delight to resort thither; where, having wet their throats, they sit and chant the various notes among the thick boughs of the trees, which grow upon the banks.

Ver. 13.] As for the hills, which constantly thus enrich the lower grounds, he waters them from the regions above; whence dews distil, and showers of rain come pouring down, by thy marvellous contrivance, O Lord, unto the satisfaction of them, and of all the rest of the earth.

Ver. 14.] O bless the Lord, my soul, who by this means provideth the beasts with grass and hay, and us with all variety of herbs, and roots, and fruit, and pulse, which he causes to sprout out of the earth, that we may never want what is necessary for our food, or for our physic.

Ver. 15.] But rather take our pleasure and delight in the rich wines, which he produces to cheer the drooping spirits of miserable men; together with oil to anoint their heads; and bread to recruit their strength, when it is spent with toil and labour.

Ver. 16.] Blessed be the Lord, who by this means also supplies, with abundant nourishment, the largest trees, which are not planted by the art, nor watered by the care of man, but by his almighty providence: who makes whole forests of them grow, as the cedars in Lebanon do, even upon the most barren and stony mountains.

Ver. 17.] In these trees the birds, both small and great, build themselves convenient habitations; and some of them (as the stork, for instance, who seats her nest on the top of lofty pines, and fir-trees) with admirable artifice.

Ver. 18.] And with no less safety the wild goats deposit their young, in the tops of those craggy mountains; whither they can climb as easily as the birds fly to the tops of trees: and other feeble creatures

19 He appointed the moon for seasons: the sun knoweth his going down.

20 Thou makest darkness, and it is night: wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth.

21 The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God.

22 The sun ariseth, they gather themselves together, and lay them down in their dens.

23 Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour until the evening.

24 O LORD, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches.

25 So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts.

26 There go the ships: there is that leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein.

27 These wait all upon thee; that thou mayest give them their meat in due season.

28 That thou givest them they gather; thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good.

29 Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled: thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust.

30 Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created: and thou renewest the face of the earth.

31 The glory of the LORD shall endure for ever: the LORD shall rejoice in his works.

32 He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth: he toucheth the hills, and they smoke.

33 I will sing unto the LORD as long as I live: I will sing praise to my God while I have my being.

34 My meditation of him shall be sweet: I will be glad in the LORD.

35 Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more. Bless thou the LORD, O my soul. Praise ye the LORD.

creep into the rocks, and there lie secure from the violence that stronger beasts would offer to them.

Ver. 19.] By his most wise contrivance the moon hath her full and her wane; and the sun doth not always shine, but observes a constant time for its going down.

Ver. 20.] And then darkness covering the face of the earth, and inviting us to rest, gives the wolves and other wild beasts of the forest (such is thy care, O Lord, of all creatures), who were afraid to venture abroad before, security and confidence, to come out of their lurking-places, and seek their food.

Ver. 21.] Which the ravening young lions then meet withal; falling upon their prey with a horrible noise; whereby they express the eagerness of their hunger; which is not so sharp and devouring, but by the divine providence, it finds full satisfaction before the morning.

Ver. 22.] When the sun again appearing, and rousing us out of our sleep, they all return with one consent, and lay themselves down in their several dens.

Ver. 23.] And so man, refreshed by the night's repose, goes forth, without any danger, about his business in the fields: and continues his labours till the night calls him to rest again.

Ver. 24.] O eternal Lord! how many and how great are thy works! and with what admirable wisdom hast thou contrived them all! If we look no farther than this earth, what astonishing variety of good things do we behold, wherewith thy bounty hath enriched it!

Ver. 25.] And this great and spacious sea also, which seems to embrace the earth in its arms, is no less full of thy wonderful works: for there swim fish without number; some of which astonish us as much with the art thou hast shown in their small bodies, as others do with their prodigious greatness of their bulk.

Ver. 26.] There the ships sail as swiftly as the fishes swim; fetching us the riches both of sea and land: and there that great leviathan (in forming whom thou hast shown thy mighty power) finds room enough to tumble up and down, and sport himself in his absolute dominion over all that the sea contains.

Ver. 27.] O how liberal is thy goodness, which provides convenient sustenance for such a vast world of creatures! Every one of which, though they know not their benefactors, are duly and seasonably supplied, with the food they seek, by the care thou takest of them.

Ver. 28.] For they only gather what thou, without any care of theirs, dispensest to them: and thou art not sparing of thy blessings; but hast made a most plentiful provision, which thou scatterest everywhere for them.

Ver. 29.] If it fail at any time, by the suspense of thy heavenly influences, all things look most ruefully: they grow weak, nay, die; and are dissolved into the elements out of which they were made.

Ver. 30.] But then thou sendest forth again thy quickening power; whereby new ones are produced, in the room of those that are dead: just as the earth after a sharp winter hath made it bare, looks fresh and green again at the return of the spring.

Ver. 31.] Thus the world is still as full as ever it was: and all future ages shall praise, as well as we, the same power, and wisdom, and goodness, of the Lord: which appears so gloriously in all his works, that he himself is still pleased, and delighted in the continuance of them; as he was at first in their contrivance (Gen. i. 31).

Ver. 32.] Else they would all soon vanish, and come to nothing: for at his presence the very earth trembles; and the mountains, as our fathers saw at mount Sinai, are full of fire and smoke.

Ver. 33.] I will never cease therefore to sing the praises of the Lord; who, as he created, so supports and maintains the whole fabric of heaven and earth, and all the creatures contained in them: and I will never forget his particular kindness to me, among the rest; but acknowledge to my very last breath the innumerable benefits I have received from his bounty.

Ver. 34.] With such affection will I praise him, that all my thankful meditations and discourses shall be, I hope, no less pleasing to him, than they shall be to myself: who will take the highest satisfaction in thinking and speaking of the goodness of the Lord; from whom I shall still receive more abundant cause to rejoice in him.

Ver. 35.] But as for them, whose only pleasure it is to satisfy their brutish lusts, and abuse the many good things they enjoy (either denying, or never acknowledging, him who is the donor of them), they shall utterly perish, and be no longer the care of that providence to which they are so ungrateful; O my soul, never imitate their impiety, or negligence; but be excited thereby to the greater diligence; in praising thy great creator and benefactor. And let all those who have any sense of him, stir up themselves, and join with me in his praises.

PSALM CV.

1 O GIVE thanks unto the LORD : call upon his name : make known his deeds among the people.

2 Sing unto him, sing psalms unto him : talk ye of all his wondrous works.

3 Glory ye in his holy name : let the heart of them rejoice that seek the LORD.

4 Seek the LORD, and his strength : seek his face evermore.

5 Remember his marvellous works that he hath done ; his wonders, and the judgments of his mouth ;

6 O ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen.

PSALM CV.

ARGUMENT.—Though this Psalm hath no title, yet we are assured by what we read in 1 Chron. xvi. 8, &c. that the first part of it, at least (to the end of ver. 15), was made by David; and delivered by him to Asaph and his brethren, for the constant service of God in the tabernacle: when, after several victories over the Philistines (1 Chron. xiv.), he had settled the ark of God in Zion. And it is most probable that he afterward enlarged this Psalm (for who else would adventure to do it)? that it might be a more complete commemoration of all the mercies of God towards their nation, from the days of Abraham to their taking possession of the land of Canaan. Into which he shows their glorious Lord conducted them by so many miraculous providences, in several ages (according to his faithful promise made to Abraham, his faithful servant), that it deserved their most hearty acknowledgments: to which he excites them, by ten several expressions, in the first five verses of the Psalm.

To which the Greeks prefix a hallelujah (for they take the last word of the foregoing Psalm, and set it on the head of this), as a note how much they were obliged to praise the Lord, according to that exhortation; when they remembered in this Psalm the benefits that he had bestowed upon their forefathers: which were sufficient to excite and whet their minds to the imitation of their virtue.

And it may serve to admonish the new people of God (as Theodoret speaks), that is, as Christians, how much we ought to rejoice in God's goodness to us; and how dangerous it is to be ungrateful to him: which provoked him to deprive the Jews of that fatherly care which he had taken of their ancestors.

Ver. 1.] Stir up yourselves, all ye that are here assembled, to make your most grateful acknowledgments unto the great Lord, who is pleased to come and dwell among you: never approach his presence to make your petitions to him, but join his praises together with them; and proclaim to all the people round about, what great things he hath done for you and for your forefathers.

Ver. 2.] Sing his praise with a cheerful voice, and with all the instruments of music: and let the subject of your hymns, and of your ordinary discourse, be his many marvellous acts, of which let not one be forgotten.

Ver. 3.] For nothing can be so great an honour to you, as that you are servants of such a mighty Lord; who infinitely transcends all other beings: triumph,

7 He is the LORD our God: his judgments are in all the earth.

8 He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations.

9 Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac;

10 And confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant:

11 Saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance:

12 When they were but a few men in number; yea, very few, and strangers in it.

therefore, and make your boast of this, as a greater happiness than all worldly goods; let it fill the hearts of all his faithful worshippers with the highest joy and gladness.

Ver. 4.] Let it encourage them to address themselves unto him upon all occasions; and prostrating themselves before the ark of his presence (2 Chron. vi. 41), commend themselves to his powerful protection; let them unweariedly seek his favour, and implore his gracious assistance.

Ver. 5.] Which you may, with the greater confidence, expect, if you call to mind, and thankfully commemorate, the marvellous things he hath done for your deliverance; and his terrible execution (Exod. iii. 20), according to his just sentence passed (Exod. vii. 4), upon your enemies.

Ver. 6.] The benefit of which you still enjoy, O ye who are the posterity of his servant Abraham (whose faith and obedience you ought to imitate); the children of Jacob, whom he chose (rejecting Esau) to inherit the promised blessing.

Ver. 7.] He is still the same mighty Lord, and our most gracious God; who continues to execute his judgments everywhere upon our enemies (2 Sam. v. 7, 10, 17, &c.), and therefore let us never cease to praise him, and cheerfully serve him, and faithfully depend upon him.

Ver. 8.] For he is never unmindful of his engagements to us; but punctually performs, in all ages, what he hath promised in his covenant.

Ver. 9.] Which he first solemnly made (Gen. xv. 17, 18), and then swore (xxii. 16), unto Abraham: and renewed with his son Isaac; to whom he promised to perform that oath, which he swore unto Abraham, (Gen. xxvi. 3).

Ver. 10.] And again confirmed it to Jacob, both when he went to Haran (Gen. xxviii. 13, &c.), and at his return, when he changed his name into Israel (xxxv. 10, &c.); and, at last, passed into a law, in that covenant which he made with their posterity (Exod. xxiii. 22, 23, 31, 32), never to be altered, if they keep their covenant with him.

Ver. 11.] The sum of which was this; I bestow upon thee, and will bring thee into that good land, the land of Canaan: which according to this faithful covenant, you now possess; as by lot it was distributed to your several tribes, for their inheritance (Josh. xiv. 1, 2).

Ver. 12.] This covenant he began to make with your forefathers (and showed his intention to perform it, by his singular care over them), when their family was very small (Gen. xii. 1, 5), and consequently so weak, that they might easily have been destroyed in 13 When they went from one nation to another, from one kingdom to another people;

14 He suffered no man to do them wrong: yea, he reproved kings for their sakes;

15 Saying, Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.

16 Moreover he called for a famine upon the land: he brake the whole staff of bread.

17 He sent a man before them, even Joseph, who was sold for a servant:

18 Whose feet they hurt with fetters: he was laid in iron:

19 Until the time that his word came: the word of the Lord tried him.

20 The king sent and loosed him; even the ruler of the people, and let him go free.

21 He made him lord of his house, and ruler of all his substance:

the land were they were strangers (xxiii. 4), and had no friends nor allies to support them:

Ver. 13.] Nor any settled habitation; but were forced to wander to and fro, from one part of Canaan into another (Gen. xii. 6, 8, 9), and then to sojourn in other kingdoms; sometimes in Egypt (ver. 10), sometimes in Gerar (xx. 1, xxvi. 1), and sometimes in the eastern country from whence they came (xxix. 1).

Ver. 14.] And wheresoever they sojourned, he took them into his protection, and suffered no man to do them any injury (Gen. xxxi. 24, 42), but gave severe checks even to the king of Egypt (xii. 16), and the king of Gerar (xx. 3, &c.), to prevent the mischief which they were designing to them.

Ver. 15.] For he told them, these were sacred persons, whom he designed to make greater men than themselves, and therefore charged them not to hurt them; but to honour them, not merely as princes (Gen. xxiii. 6), but as prophets (xx. 7), by whose prayers they should receive great blessings if they were kind to them.

Ver. 16.] And when in the days of Jacob, he punished the land of Canaan, as well as other countries, with such a dearth (Gen. xli. 54, &c.), that the earth brought forth no kind of grain for the support of human life:

Ver. 17.] He took a special care, in a most wonderful way, to provide both for him and for his family; for Joseph (whom his brethren first conspired to destroy, but afterward were diverted from their purpose, and only sold for a slave) was brought into Egypt, by the secret counsel of God (Gen. xiv. 5, 7, &c.), to be the instrument of their preservation.

Ver. 18.] He was oppressed, indeed, for a long time by a most grievous calumny: which was a sorer affliction to him than the chains and fetters that were, at first, laid upon him in prison.

Ver. 19.] Till mention at last was made of him to Pharaoh, by one of his officers: who related how exactly Joseph predicted what had befallen him and another of his fellow-servants; as if he were a man inspired (Gen. xl. 21, 22, xli. 12, 13).

Ver. 20.] Whereupon the king presently sent for him (Gen. xli. 14); that great prince, whose dominion extended over many provinces, and commanded him to be set at liberty.

Ver. 21.] And received such satisfaction from him about his dream, which none of his wise men could interpret, that he not only wholly discharged him from his imprisonment, but made him the chief officer in the court: and, under himself, the supreme governor of his whole kingdom (Gen. xli. 40, 41).

22 To bind his princes at his pleasure; and teach his senators wisdom.

23 Israel also came into Egypt; and Jacob sojourned in the land of Ham.

24 And he increased his people greatly; and made them stronger than their enemies.

25 He turned their heart to hate his people, to deal subtilly with his servants.

26 He sent Moses his servant; and Aaron whom he had chosen.

27 They shewed his signs among them, and wonders in the land of Ham.

28 He sent darkness, and made it dark; and they rebelled not against his word.

29 He turned their waters into blood, and slew their fish.

30 Their land brought forth frogs in abundance, in the chambers of their kings.

Ver. 22.] Yea, intrusted him with an absolute power to command all the rulers of his several provinces, what he pleased: and to punish their disobedience according to his discretion: the most ancient and wisest counsellors in the realm were ordered to repair to him, and to do nothing without his instructions (Gen. xli. 44).

Ver. 23.] By which great authority he procured not only the leave, but the invitation of Pharaoh (Gen. xlv. 16, 17, &c.), to his father, to come and bring all his family with him into Egypt; and accordingly he came and dwelt in the best part of all the country (xvi. 26, 27).

Ver. 24.] Where, according to his promise, when he bade Jacob accept that invitation (Gen. xlv. 3, 4), the Lord multiplied them exceedingly (Exod. i. 7), and made them mightier than the Egyptians (ver. 9), who, of friends, were now become their enemies.

Ver. 25.] For the kinder God was to the Israelites, and the more he increased their numbers, the greater jealousy it begat in the hearts of the Egyptians: which turned at last into an absolute hatred of them; and provoked their malice to invent the cruellest ways, first to diminish (Exod. i. 10, 11, &c.), and then to destroy them (ver. 15, 16).

Ver. 26.] This moved the divine compassion, when he saw their oppression grew intolerable, to give commission to Moses, whom he had in an extraordinary manner preserved from perishing (Exod. iii. 13), and to Aaron, whom he chose to be his assistant (iv. 15), to go and demand their liberty of Pharaoh (iv. 23, v. 1).

Ver. 27.] And he disputing their commission (and refusing to let Israel go), they proved it, and persuaded him to obey it, by many miraculous works: which God commanded them to do, as tokens that he had sent them.

Ver. 28.] Among which the pitchy darkness, which overspread the whole land three days (except only where the Israelites dwelt), was a very remarkable punishment of Pharaoh's blindness: who would not see the hand of God in all those other plagues, which Moses and Aaron, not fearing his displeasure, but pursuing their orders, had inflicted on him.

Ver. 29.] As, first of all, the Lord commanded them to stretch their hand upon all the waters of Egypt; which he turned into blood: and made them so putrid that the fish which was in the river died (Exod. vii. 20, 21).

Ver. 30.] And, at the next stroke, produced such a vast number of frogs out of the stinking waters and mud, that not only the whole earth was covered with 31 He spake, and there came divers sorts of flies, and lice in all their coasts.

32 He gave them hail for rain, and flaming fire in their land.

33 He smote their vines also and their fig trees; and brake the trees of their coasts.

34 He spake, and the locusts came, and caterpillars, and that without number, 35 And did eat up all the herbs in their land, and devoured the fruit of their ground.

36 He smote also all the firstborn in their land, the chief of all their strength.

37 He brought them forth also with silver and gold: and there was not one feeble person among their tribes.

38 Egypt was glad when they departed: for the fear of them fell upon them.

39 He spread a cloud for a covering; and fire to give light in the night.

40 The people asked, and he brought quails, and satisfied them with the bread of heaven.

41 He opened the rock, and the waters gushed out; they ran in the dry places like a river.

42 For he remembered his holy promise, and Abraham his servant.

43 And he brought forth his people with joy, and his chosen with gladness:

44 And gave them the lands of the heathen: and they inherited the labour of the people;

45 That they might observe his statutes, and keep his laws. Praise ye the Lord.

them, but no house, no room in their houses, no, not the cabinets of their king and his princes, were free from their annoyance (Exod. viii. 3—6).

Ver. 31.] And then followed an infinite swarm of the most pestilent sort of flies (see Ps. lxxviii. 45), after a troublesome and filthy plague of lice, which had infested all the country (Exod. viii. 17, 24).

Ver. 32.] Which was succeeded (after a murrain upon their cattle, and a fiery ulcer on their own bodies) by a dreadful storm of hail (when fruitful showers of rain were most desirable), together with such lightning, as was never seen: for it ran upon the ground, and burnt up all that was not destroyed by the hail (Exod. ix. 23, 24, &c.).

Ver. 33.] Which not only struck down the grapes and the figs; but shattered the vines and fig-trees themselves: together with many other fruit-trees in the land.

Ver. 34.] And whatsoever escaped this tempestuous storm (for some things were not then grown up, Exod. ix. 31), was, not long after, devoured by an innumerable army of various sorts of locusts (Exod. x. 4, 12, &c.).

Ver. 35.] Which, by his command, came and covered the whole face of the country, eating up the very leaves of the trees, as well as all the grass and herbs upon the ground (Exod. x. 15).

Ver. 36.] And, at last he finished these plagues in the slaughter of all their first-born, both of man and beast: the angel of the Lord killing, in one and the same night (Exod. xii. 29), the principal prop of every family: and the best of all their flocks and their herds.

Ver. 37.] Which terrible destruction so affrighted them, that they not only let Israel go, but were forward to thrust them out of Egypt, and that loaded with silver and gold (Exod. xii. 31—35), and, which is very wonderful among so many thousand persons (ver. 37), there was not one, at that time, so feeble, as to be unable to travel.

Ver. 38.] And great was the joy at their departure; not only among the Israelites, but among the Egyptians: who thought themselves not safe till the Israelites had their liberty; but were in dread of another plague, which they thought might kill them, as the former had done their children (Exod. xii. 33).

Ver. 39.] Nor did the divine providence desert our fathers after it had brought them out of Egypt; but, lest they should suffer any prejudice by the exceeding great heats, or mistake their way in a desolate wilderness, he defended them in the day from the scorching rays of the sun by a cloud; which itself gave them light to comfort, and (if need were) to guide them in the night (Exod. xiii. 21, 22).

Ver. 40.] He provided also a delicate food for that vast multitude; even when they were so ungrateful as to murmur against him (Exod. xvi. 12, &c.), sending them, in the evening, such flights of quails, and in the morning such showers of corn out of the clouds, as abundantly satisfied every one of them.

Ver. 41.] And when they murmured again for want of drink (Exod. xvii. 2—6), he was so kind as to stop their complaints, by making water to spring out of a rock: from whence it gushed so constantly, and in such abundance, that it made a stream; which followed them in all the parched grounds through which they marched.

Ver. 42.] For the Lord was resolved punctually to perform his promise, passed in former ages (Gen. xv. 18, Exod. ii. 24), which made him reward the fidelity of his servant Abraham; even upon his incredulous posterity; at that very time which he had prefixed for it (Gen. xv. 13; Exod. xii. 41).

Ver. 43.] When, with much mirth and joy, he brought his people out of the Egyptian bondage; and made them shont to see the difference he made between them and the Egyptians; who were drowned in the Red sea; while they were conducted safe through it on dry land (Exod. xv. 1, 13, 19).

Ver. 44.] And in conclusion, he cast out seven nations, to make room for them in the land of Canaan: where their posterity took possession of cities and towns, fields and vineyards; which the labour of others had built and planted for them (Deut. vi. 10, 11; Josh. xxiv. 13).

Ver. 45.] That they might have the more leisure to purge the country of all its ancient superstition and filthiness: and set themselves heartily to worship God, after that manner that he had prescribed; in a strict observance of all the rest of his holy laws.—For which, and all other his benefits, excite yourselves to praise the Lord.

PSALM CVI.

Hallelujah, i. e. Praise the Lord.

1 PRAISE ye the LORD. O give thanks unto the LORD; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.

2 Who can utter the mighty acts of the LORD? who can shew forth all his praise?

3 Blessed are they that keep judgment, and he that doeth righteousness at all times.

4 Remember me, O LORD, with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people: O visit me with thy salvation;

5 That I may see the good of thy chosen, that I may rejoice in the gladness of thy nation, that I may glory with thine inheritance.

6 We have sinned with our fathers, we have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly.

7 Our fathers understood not thy wonders in Egypt; they remembered not the multitude of thy mercies; but provoked him at the sea, even at the Red sea.

8 Nevertheless he saved them for his name's sake, that he might make his mighty power to be known.

9 He rebuked the Red sea also, and it was dried up: so he led them through the depths, as through the wilderness.

10 And he saved them from the hand of him that hated them, and redeemed them from the hand of the enemy.

11 And the waters covered their enemies: there was not one of them left.

PSALM CVI.

ARGUMENT.—There is little doubt to be made, but this is the title of the Psalm, as it is of many other (cxl. &c.), whereby the author excites them to acknowledge God's bounty to their ungrateful forefathers. For as, in the foregoing Psalm (they are the words of Theodoret), the divine benefits are commemorated: so in this the psalmist both commemorates them, and also upbraids the ingratitude of those that received them. Which magnified the mercies of God the more; in being so very kind to those wicked people, that when he punished them, he did not utterly destroy them.

The opinion of that father is, that the Psalm was composed in the person of the more pious sort of people, who bewail the common calamities, and implore the divine indulgence. And most interpreters that I have met withal, imagine it to have been made in the time of the captivity of Babylon: but the proof of it is very weak. For the last verse but one, upon which they ground that conjecture, may have another construction, and mean no more but this; that God would be pleased, when the nation, or any part of it, should be carried captive, to take pity upon them, and restore them again to their country. Or rather, in my opinion, it refers to those, who, in the days of Saul, or before, were taken prisoners by the Philistines, and other nations; whom David prays God to gather to their own land again, that they might worship him in that place, which he had prepared for the ark of his presence. For it seems plain enough that this was one of the Psalms which he delivered then to Asaph: the first verse and the last two being set down in 1 Chron. xvi. 36, 37, as the beginning and ending of another Psalm (which can be none but this), which he then gave in with the other two mentioned (xv. and cv.), to praise the Lord withal.

Ver. 1.] O make your thankful acknowledgments to the great Lord of all the world, who was exceeding gracious to your forefathers, and will continue his kindness, you may hope, unto all succeeding ages.

Ver. 2.] Praise him with all your might: for when you have done your best, you must acknowledge that it is impossible to express your obligations to his omnipotent goodness. For who is able to tell how miraculous that power was, which wrought such wonders for us in Egypt, and in the wilderness, and in the land of Canaan? where shall we find a man that can set forth as they deserve, all the praiseworthy acts of the Lord?

Ver. 3.] Which are so great and many, that they are most happy men, who by faithful obedience to all his precepts (not only when they have newly received his benefits, but throughout the whole course of their lives), preserve themselves in the favour of so gracious a Lord and master (which our forefathers foolishly lost, by revolting presently from their merciful deliverer).

Ver. 4.] Make me, good Lord, one of this happy number; and let me partake of the favour thou still designest for thy people; and find thee ready at hand in all dangers, to preserve and deliver me (1 Chron. xviii. 6, 13, 14).

Ver. 5.] That I may live to see thy chosen people Israel settled in a peaceable enjoyment of all thy blessings (1 Chron. xxii. 18), and have my share in their joy and felicity (xxix. 9), nay, triumph together with them, in the highest praises of thy bounty towards thy own nation, and peculiar inheritance (ver. 10. &c.)

Ver. 6.] Our sins, indeed, may hinder these blessings from us; for we are no better than our forefathers, but have offended after their example, by which we ought to have been amended: we are guilty of many iniquities against one another, and much impiety against thee.

Ver. 7.] We are the wicked offspring of those who were so stupid as not to be affected with the prodigious works thou didst in Egypt; or presently to forget that long series of miraculous preservations and deliverances by which they were brought from thence, but in the very next strait into which they fell (at the borders of the sea, that remarkable place, the Red sea), distrusted his power, and wished he had left them in that cruel servitude, of which before they so heavily complained (Exod. xiv.).

Ver. 8.] And yet (such was his stupendous goodness) he would not let them perish in their ingratitude; but, to preserve the name he had gotten of their mighty saviour, gave them a new deliverance: that the world might not imagine he wanted power to complete what he had begun to do for them.

Ver. 9.] On this consideration, he checked the course of that sea by so strong a wind, that he made a path in the midst of it: and led them through those depths on as hard and dry ground as they trod upon in their march through the parched deserts (Exod. xiv. 21, 22).

Ver. 10.] By which means he saved them from Pharaoh's army; which pressed hard upon their backs as the sea was before their face (Exod. xiv. 9, 10). He rescued them from the power of those implacable enemies, whose hatred carried them to pursue them eagerly even into the sea (ver. 23).

Ver. 11.] Where they were drowned every man of 12 Then believed they his words; they sang his praise.

13 They soon forgot his works; they waited not for his counsel:

14 But lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God in the desert.

15 And he gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul.

16 They envied Moses also in the camp, and Aaron the saint of the Lord.

17 The earth opened and swallowed up Dathan, and covered the company of Abiram.

18 And a fire was kindled in their company; the flame burned up the wicked.

19 They made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the molten image.

20 Thus they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass.

21 They forgot God their saviour, which had done great things in Egypt;

22 Wondrous works in the land of Ham, and terrible things by the Red sea.

23 Therefore he said that he would destroy them, had not Moses his chosen stood before him in the breach, to turn away his wrath, lest he should destroy them.

24 Yea, they despised the pleasant land, they believed not his word:

25 But murmured in their tents, and hearkened not unto the voice of the Lord.

26 Therefore he lifted up his hand against them, to overthrow them in the wilderness:

27 To overthrow their seed also among the nations, and scatter them in the lands.

28 They joined themselves also unto Baal-peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead.

them; the sea which had stood fixed as a wall to save the Israelites, returning back with a mighty violence to overwhelm their adversaries.

Ver. 12.] Which was so evident a token of his power and goodness, that they were persuaded by it, at that present, to believe God's promises (Exod. xiv. 31), and to sing a song of praise to him for this miraculous deliverance (Exod. xv. 1, &c.).

Ver. 13.] But within three days they grew impatient again (Exod. xv. 22, 24), and, forgetting the great and many pledges they had received of his divine power, quarrelled with his servants; and would not expect till he showed what way he intended to relieve them.

Ver. 14.] But not long after this murmured again (Exod. xvi.); and though, instead of punishing them for it, he satisfied them with bread from heaven, and gave them several other demonstrations of his divine presence among them in the wilderness (Exod. xvi. xx. xxiv. &c.); yet to please their wanton appetite, they mutinied another time, and cried out vehemently for flesh to eat (Numb. xi. 4, 5, &c.), and desired new proofs of his power to supply them.

Ver. 15.] Which he was pleased to grant in such abundance, that they surfeited of the quails which he sent them: and, instead of being nourished, fell into a grievous disease, whereby great numbers of them were wasted and consumed (Numb. xi. 31, 32, &c.).

Ver. 16.] And they that escaped were not cured of their rebellious humour, but seditiously disputed the authority of Moses: and accused both him and Aaron, whom the Lord had consecrated for the service of his altar, as ambitious men that took too much upon them (Numb. xvi. 3).

Ver. 17.] Which moved the divine justice to punish their presumption with a most terrible vengeance: for the earth opened and buried alive both Dathan and Abiram, and the faction that adhered to them (Numb. xvi. 32, 33).

Ver. 18.] And the other company raised by Korah were smitten with lightning from heaven; which burnt up those impious men, who were so bold as to invade the office of the priests of the Lord (Numb. xvi. 35).

Ver. 19.] Whose anger they began very early to incense; for even at that very place where the Lord had newly appeared to them, in astonishing thunder, and lightning, and clouds (Exod. xx. 18), and had spoken to them with an audible voice, and at the second word he spake had charged them not to make any graven image (Exod. xx. 4), and had called Moses up into the mount to receive the rest of his laws (which he had begun in a most dreadful manner to deliver to them), they stupidly made a golden calf, and prostrated themselves before the work of their own hands.

Ver. 20.] Slighting that glorious presence of the majesty of God (Exod. xxiv. 16, 17), which appearing in the clouds, had done many wonders for them: and choosing rather to commend themselves to the protection of an image, in which they saw no glory: the image of a dull ox, a creature without reason, a servant of man, that is supported itself by so weak a thing as hay (Exod. xxxii. 14).

Ver. 21.] The root of which sottish apostasy was, that they did not keep in mind what deliverances God had granted them under the conduct of Moses; whom now they despised (Exod. xxxii. 1), but forgot his great works in the land of Egypt where they never saw any similitude of him.

Ver. 22.] Miraculous works, which filled the whole country with wonder and astonishment; and concluded at last in the fearful overthrow of Pharaoh and all his host in the Red sea, through which they passed safely.

Ver. 23.] Which provoked the divine displeasure so highly, that he resolved to destroy them (Exod. xxxii. 9, 10), and had done it, if Moses, for whom he had a great respect, had not, by his earnest intercession, made up this breach; and reconciled him so far to them, that he did not proceed then to take such vengeance on them (ver. 11, 12, 14, 15).

Ver. 24.] But when after this they despised (Numb. xiii. 32), that goodly country, to the borders of which he had brought them (Deut. i. 19, 20), which the spies themselves confessed was rich and desirable (Numb. xiii. 27, xiv. 32) and would not believe that God intended, or was able, to perform his promise to them (Numb. xiii. 37).

Ver. 25.] But murmured against Moses and Aaron in their tents, as if they had deluded them (Numb. xiv. 1, 2, &c.), refusing to march, when the Lord commanded them to go up and take possession of it (Deut. i. 21, 26, 32).

Ver. 26.] Then he solemnly swore, that not one of that wicked generation, who had so often rebelled against him, should ever come there, but all perish in the wilderness (Numb. xiv. 21, 22, 35; Deut. i. 34).

Ver. 27.] And some of them be overthrown by the heathen, whom the Lord would have delivered up into their hand (Numb. xiv. 45), and others dispersed in several parts of that country which they despised (xxi. 1).

Ver. 28.] Nor did they grow much better by these dreadful threatenings and executions; but not only 29 Thus they provoked him to anger with their inventions : and the plague brake in upon them.

30 Then stood up Phinehas, and executed judgment : and so the plague was stayed.

31 And that was counted unto him for righteousness unto all generations for evermore.

32 They angered him also at the waters of strife, so that it went ill with Moses for their sakes :

33 Because they provoked his spirit, so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips.

34 They did not destroy the nations, concerning whom the Lord commanded them :

35 But were mingled among the heathen, and learned their works.

36 And they served their idols : which were a snare unto them.

37 Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils,

38 And shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan : and the land was polluted with blood.

39 Thus were they defiled with their own works, and went a whoring with their own inventions.

40 Therefore was the wrath of the Lord kindled against his people, inasmuch that he abhorred his own inheritance.

41 And he gave them into the hand of the heathen ; and they that hated them ruled over them.

42 Their enemies also oppressed them, and they were brought into subjection under their hand.

43 Many times did he deliver them ; but they provoked him with their counsel, and were brought low for their iniquity.

44 Nevertheless he regarded their affliction, when he heard their cry :

45 And he remembered for them his covenant, most shamefully committed whoredom with the daughters of Moab, but embraced their religion : devoting themselves to the vile service of Baal, whose temple stood upon mount Peor ; and partaking with them in the sacrifices which they offered to dead men (Numb. xx. 1—3).

Ver. 29.] Which abominable wickedness incensed the divine displeasure to such a degree, that he commanded the offenders to be killed and hanged up in the face of the sun : and also sent a grievous plague among the people (Numb. xxv. 4, 5, 9).

Ver. 30.] Which raged in the camp, till Phinehas, in a holy zeal, went as boldly to punish, as others did to commit their crimes : and thrust through the body one of the princes of the people, whom the judges feared to meddle withal ; and then the plague ceased (Numb. xxv. 5—8).

Ver. 31.] Which seasonable piece of justice the Lord not only approved as a praiseworthy act, but rewarded also with the promise of the priesthood : which he entailed upon his posterity, throughout all generations (Numb. xxv. 12, 13).

Ver. 32.] And, before this, they had been so unbelieving and rebellious, as having had long experience of God's power and goodness in providing for them, to murmur for want of water ; at that place, which took its name from their quarrel with Moses (Numb. xx. 3, 13), who sadly suffered upon their account (Numb. xx. 12).

Ver. 33.] For, being exasperated by their frequent mutinies, he let fall some passionate words ; which expressed such distrust and impatience, as did not become so great a minister of God (Numb. xx. 12), who thereupon resolved he should not have the honour to accomplish his promise, of bringing them to their rest (Numb. xxvii. 24 ; Deut. i. 37).

Ver. 34.] In which, being settled, they did not destroy those seven nations (Judg. i. 21, 27, 29, &c.), whose abominations were so foul, that the Lord gave them a strict charge not to suffer them to live there any longer (Exod. xxiii. 30, 33 ; Deut. vii. 2).

Ver. 35.] But, quite contrary, they not only let them live, but, against God's express commandment (Josh. xxiii. 7, 12), entered into familiarity, and made a covenant and league with them (Judg. ii. 1, 2), and so at last learned to do as they did, and imitated their evil manners.

Ver. 36.] For they forsook the Lord, who had brought them thither, and worshipped the gods of those people whom they had conquered (Judg. ii. 11, 12, iii. 5, 6), which proved their utter ruin and destruction (Deut. vii. 16, 26 ; Judg. ii. 3).

Ver. 37.] For they were so besotted with their idolatry, as to imitate their most barbarous rites : sacrificing to infernal spirits, not only their beasts, but (as the custom of that country was, Deut. xii. 30, 31), their sons and their daughters.

Ver. 38.] Whom they did not merely consecrate to the service of devils ; but offered their blood, the blood of innocent babes, even of their own sons and daughters (as I said), upon the altars of the idols of Canaan : profaning thereby the holy land with the most impious and unnatural murders.

Ver. 39.] Besides other abominable works wherewith they defiled themselves ; such as whoredom and all manner of beastly lusts : which were the filthy vices of those nations whom God cast out before them (Lev. xviii. 24, 25, 27, 28, &c.).

Ver. 40.] And so contrary to nature, as well as his law, that the Lord was exceeding angry with them (Judg. ii. 14, 20), and the more, because he had made them his people : whom he now abominated as impure and unclean, though once they had been very dear unto him.

Ver. 41.] And thereupon delivered them up to the power of those impious nations, with whom they contracted friendship, when they should have destroyed them (Judg. iii. 3, 5, iv. 2, xiii. 1), who retaining still their ancient hatred, exercised a rigorous tyranny over them (iv. 3).

Ver. 42.] And so did many other of their neighbouring enemies, the Mesopotamians and Moabites (Judg. iii. 8, 12), the Midianites and Amalekites (vi. 2, 3, &c.), and suchlike (x. 7, 8), who not only grievously afflicted them, but deservedly made those their subjects, nay, slaves, who would not serve their gracious God.

Ver. 43.] Who still continued so kind to them, that upon the first sign of their repentance, he constantly raised up the spirit of some great man or other to rescue them from every one of these oppressors : though they as constantly provoked him again, by relapsing to their former idolatry, which in the issue brought them exceeding low (Judg. x. 8, 9).

Ver. 44.] And yet, such was his tender compassion towards them, he did not absolutely refuse to help even these base revolters (Judg. x. 14—16), when, in their distress, they made a lamentable moan, and promised amendment.

Ver. 45.] For he was not unmindful of the cove-and repented according to the multitude of his mercies.

46 He made them also to be pitied of all those that carried them captives.

47 Save us, O LORD our God, and gather us nant he had made with their forefathers (Lev. xxvi. 42, 44, Deut. xxx. 1—3), but let them reap the benefit of it, in ceasing to punish them; and, when they deserved to be utterly destroyed, bestowing many and exceeding great blessings on them.

Ver. 46.] For he inclined the hearts, even of those who had subdued, and implacably hated them, unto some compassion towards them: so that they did not endeavour their total extirpation (Judg. xiii. 1, xiv. 2, xv. 9, &c.).

Ver. 47.] And therefore we humbly hope still in the same great mercies; and beseech thee, O most mighty Lord, who hast been wont to do our nation good, to deliver us, how unworthy soever, from from among the heathen, to give thanks unto thy holy name, and to triumph in thy praise.

48 Blessed be the LORD God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting: and let all the people say, Amen. Praise ye the LORD.

all our present enemies; and to restore such of us as are fallen into their hands unto their own country, that they may join with us in giving thanks to thy incomparable goodness, and setting forth thy praises with the greatest joy and triumph saying,

Ver. 48.] Let the great Lord of all the world, who hath been so gracious unto Israel, as to choose them for his own peculiar people, be most heartily blessed and praised: let all generations bless him, as long as the world shall last, and unto all eternity: and let all his people concur in these desires, and wish it may be so; let them all praise the Lord, and desire he may be ever praised.

PART V.

PSALM CVII.

1 O GIVE thanks unto the LORD, for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.

2 Let the redeemed of the LORD say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy;

3 And gathered them out of the lands, from the east, and from the west, from the north, and from the south.

PSALM CVII.

ARGUMENT.—The fifth book of Psalms (which consists most of praises and thanksgivings) begins here with an exhortation to those whom God (according to the prayer foregoing, cvi. 47), had delivered from pagan servitude, to acknowledge that singular benefit with their hearty thanksgivings; and thence to take occasion to magnify his merciful providence over all other men, not only of that, but of all nations, where they addressed themselves unto him in their distresses. For instance, travellers in the desert, who have lost their way, prisoners, sick people, mariners, husbandmen, even whole countries, the psalmist shows, are made strangely prosperous, if they have a regard to God; and on the other side, fall into great misery, if they neglect him. It had been endless to enumerate all other cases; but by these any man may understand, if he please (as he observes in the conclusion), how good the Lord is, and ready to help those who fly unto him for succour, whatever their condition be.

The author of the Psalm is unknown; but if I have guessed aright, at the connection of this with the foregoing Psalm, it is most probable it was composed by David: who having, in the hundred and fifth, put them in mind (as Theodoret observes) of the promises made to the patriarchs, and of the blessings bestowed on their posterity; and, in the hundred and sixth, of their horrid ingratitude for such benefits, and the punishments, for that cause, 4 They wandered in the wilderness in a solitary way; they found no city to dwell in.

5 Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them.

6 Then they cried unto the LORD in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses.

inflicted upon them: declares in this Psalm the inexplicable kindness of God, in their freedom from slavery; and in his careful providence, as I said, over all mankind: which might give them the greater encouragement to hope in him, if they served him faithfully, who had taken them for his peculiar people.

Ver. 1.] O make your grateful acknowledgments to the great Lord of the world; of whose goodness you and your forefathers have had such a long experience, that you may conclude his loving-kindness will extend itself to all succeeding ages.

Ver. 2.] Let them especially call upon one another to give thanks unto his goodness, whom the Lord hath graciously redeemed from a sad captivity: into which they were reduced by their prevailing enemies:

Ver. 3.] And hath brought them back to their own country again; from all the lands, on every side, into which they were dispersed.

Ver. 4.] And they also, who travelling through vast wildernesses and sandy deserts, lost their way, and could find no track to lead them to a city inhabited:

Ver. 5.] But in this perplexity, wandered up and down so long, that all their provision spent, and they were ready to die with hunger and thirst.

Ver. 6.] Yet then, recommending themselves to the Lord, and earnestly imploring his help in this miserable strait, he mercifully delivered them out of it, and freed them from all their anxieties:

7 And he led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation.

8 Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

9 For he satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness.

10 Such as sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron;

11 Because they rebelled against the words of God, and contemned the counsel of the most High:

12 Therefore he brought down their heart with labour; they fell down, and there was none to help.

13 Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saved them out of their distresses.

14 He brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death, and brake their bands in sunder.

15 Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

16 For he hath broken the gates of brass, and cut the bars of iron in sunder.

17 Fools because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted.

18 Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat; and they draw near unto the gates of death.

19 Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saveth them out of their distresses.

20 He sent his word, and healed them, and delivered them from their destructions.

21 Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

22 And let them sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declare his works with rejoicing.

23 They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters;

24 These see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep.

25 For he commandeth, and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof.

26 They mount up to the heaven, they go down again to the depths: their soul is melted because of trouble.

27 They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wit's end.

Ver. 7.] Directing them, when they were in a maze, into the right path again; which brought them to a place inhabited, where they found relief for their necessities.

Ver. 8.] Oh that such men would never forget to make their thankful acknowledgments to the Lord for this singular kindness; but everywhere proclaim his wonderful works!

Ver. 9.] Who thus seasonably preserved them from starving, by providing, in this languishing condition, drink to quench their thirst, and plenty of good things to satisfy their hungry appetite.

Ver. 10.] They also who have no other dwelling but a dark prison, nay, a horrible dungeon; where, to add to their affliction, they are loaded with iron manacles or fetters;

Ver. 11.] As a just punishment for the crimes they had rebelliously committed against the express commands of God, and the plain dictates and frequent cheeks of their own consciences; which were the voice of the Most High, giving them wholesome counsel, though they contemned and despised it:

Ver. 12.] And thereby provoked him to throw them into that miserable condition, to humble their proud hearts by the hardship of a tedious and painful imprisonment; in which they lay so dejected and helpless, that they saw no human means whereby they should be delivered.

Ver. 13.] Yet, they then making their addresses to the Lord, and earnestly beseeching him to take pity upon their wretched estate, he was pleased mercifully to hear their prayers, and free them from those miserable straits:

Ver. 14.] Bringing them out of their sad confinement in that dismal dungeon, and setting their hands and feet at liberty, from the chains wherewith they were bound.

Ver. 15.] Oh that such men would never forget to make their thankful acknowledgments to the Lord for his singular kindness: but everywhere proclaim his wonderful works!

Ver. 16.] Who, when their case was desperate, removed the greatest obstacles; and made even brazen gates, and iron bars, give way to their escape.

Ver. 17.] In like manner we see others, who forgetting God and sottishly giving themselves up to all kind of debauchery, in an irregular way of living, falling into grievous diseases:

Ver. 18.] Which not only quite take away their appetite, but make them nauseate all manner of food, which they formerly abused; and thereby lay them so low, that they are at the very brink of the grave:

Ver. 19.] Yet even these men, when they make their addresses unto the Lord, and, in the weak estate into which they have brought themselves, pray earnestly to him, are wont to find relief from him, when no medicines whatsoever will avail them.

Ver. 20.] He orders their recovery, when all the prescriptions of physicians prove ineffectual: nay, when they are left for dead, raises them up to life and health again.

Ver. 21.] Oh that these men would be so grateful to the Lord, as never to forget his singular kindness to them; but everywhere proclaim such wonderful works as these!

Ver. 22.] And not content themselves with the sacrifice of beasts (which in their sickness they were apt to vow unto him), but offer those far more acceptable sacrifices of a grateful heart: acknowledging his goodness, and telling everybody they meet withal, in such a manner as may express how much they are affected with it, what great things the Lord hath done for them.

Ver. 23.] Who shows no less kindness to those that have occasion to do much upon the sea; to fish, or to traffic upon the main ocean.

Ver. 24.] Where they behold remarkable acts of divine providence, in the wonderful alterations which he makes in that vast collection of waters.

Ver. 25.] For when they are smooth and still, a sudden tempest arises by his command: which puts them into such a rage, that they are turned into swell ing waves and billows.

Ver. 26.] On which the ships are sometimes mount ed up as high as if they would touch the clouds; and then sink down as low as if they would be buried in the bottom of the sea; to the great astonishment of the passengers, who are ready to die with fear.

28 Then they cry unto the LORD in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses.

29 He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still.

30 Then are they glad because they be quiet; so he bringeth them unto their desired haven.

31 Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

32 Let them exalt him also in the congregation of the people, and praise him in the assembly of the elders.

33 He turneth rivers into a wilderness, and the watersprings into dry ground;

34 A fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein.

35 He turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into watersprings.

Ver. 27.] For they are so tossed and whirled about, that, as they are not able to stand upon the decks, so the most skilful mariners do not know which way to steer or what course to take, to save themselves from perishing.

Ver. 28.] And yet, when in the midst of this great strait, they make their addresses to the Lord, with earnest prayers for his protection, he is graciously pleased to hear their cry, and to free them from that anguish of mind which sorely oppresses them.

Ver. 29.] For he silences the blustering wind, and makes so great a calm, that the swelling waves lie quiet and still.

Ver. 30.] Which happy change turns their fear into joy; when they see not only the storm appeased, but gentle gales arising to carry them directly to the port for which they are bound.

Ver. 31.] Oh that they who are thus unexpectedly preserved, would never forget to make their thankful acknowledgments to the Lord for this singular kindness, but everywhere proclaim what wonders he hath done for them.

Ver. 32.] Let them magnify his power and goodness in the greatest assemblies of the people, especially in his temple: let them praise him in the supreme court of the kingdom; that the judges and governors may be excited to make him their trust and confidence.

Ver. 33.] Who turns well-watered countries into a mere wilderness, and makes moist and fertile soils become dry and barren ground:

Ver. 34.] Where none of those fruits will grow, which before it plentifully yielded; because of the ill disposition of the inhabitants, who produce nothing but all manner of vice and wickedness.

Ver. 35.] And, on the other side, he turns a barren desert (for none of these things come by chance) into rich and fruitful pastures; and sends such plenty of water into dry sandy grounds.

Ver. 36.] That there they, who lived wretchedly before, find a comfortable habitation: and are invited to build towns and cities in those formerly desolate places.

36 And there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation;

37 And sow the fields, and plant vineyards, which may yield fruits of increase.

38 He blesseth them also, so that they are multiplied greatly; and suffereth not their cattle to decrease.

39 Again, they are minished and brought low through oppression, affliction, and sorrow.

40 He poureth contempt upon princes, and causeth them to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way.

41 Yet setteth he the poor on high from affliction, and maketh him families like a flock.

42 The righteous shall see it, and rejoice: and all iniquity shall stop her mouth.

43 Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the LORD.

Ver. 37.] Where they sow all manner of grain, and plant vineyards; which recompense their pains with a plentiful harvest, and a joyful vintage.

Ver. 38.] His blessing also makes the inhabitants fruitful, as well as their ground: they grow exceeding populous together with their flocks and their herds, which by the increase of the people are not diminished.

Ver. 39.] But when they prove ungrateful to him, he quite alters the course of his providence; and on a sudden sends some grievous pestilence, which lessens their numbers; or lays them low by tyrannical oppressors (into whose hands he delivers them) by dearth and other calamities, which make them pine away in grief and sorrow.

Ver. 40.] Their princes and the most eminent persons in their country are not able to preserve themselves from contempt and scorn; to which they are so openly exposed, that they who had troops of followers and attendants are utterly deserted, and forced to walk in solitary places to hide their shame, without any means that they can see to recover their thrones, out of which they are disgracefully thrown.

Ver. 41.] Which he bestows upon some poor despicable person, whom from a low condition, he raises to the highest dignity; and gives him a very numerous issue to maintain and continue the honour he hath conferred on him.

Ver. 42.] Which is a great encouragement to the righteous; who herein behold with joy the wise and just providence of almighty God: but gives the wicked (who under those bad princes were insolent, and full of proud boasts) such a rebuke, that they hang down their heads, and are confoundedly put to silence.

Ver. 43.] And therefore whosoever will be truly wise ought to mark and ponder such passages as these in the divine government; that they may make others, who are less considerate, understand how very kind and gracious the Lord is, to those who study to please him, and to obtain his favour by dutiful obedience, and humble submission to him.

PSALM CVIII.

A Song or Psalm of David.

1 O God, my heart is fixed; I will sing and give praise, even with my glory.

2 Awake, psaltery and harp: I myself will awake early.

3 I will praise thee, O LORD, among the people: and I will sing praises unto thee among the nations.

4 For thy mercy is great above the heavens: and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds.

5 Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens: and thy glory above all the earth;

6 That thy beloved may be delivered: save with thy right hand, and answer me.

7 God hath spoken in his holiness; I will rejoice, I will divide Shechem, and mete out the valley of Succoth.

8 Gilead is mine; Manasseh is mine; Ephraim also is the strength of mine head; Judah is my lawgiver;

9 Moab is my washpot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe; over Philistia will I triumph.

10 Who will bring me into the strong city? who will lead me into Edom?

11 Will not thou, O God, who hast cast us off? and wilt not thou, O God, go forth with our hosts?

12 Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man.

13 Through God we shall do valiantly: for he it is that shall tread down our enemies.

PSALM CVIII.

ARGUMENT.—The title tells us this Song-psalm (see the reason of this name upon Ps. lxxvii.), was made by David: and was placed here, as I conjecture, because now he was in a hopeful way to perfect some victories which he had begun to win; whereby some of those captives in strange lands (mentioned ver. 2, 3, of the foregoing Psalm) were rescued and set at liberty. What those nations were, over whom he was about to triumph, see in the title of Ps. lx. For the latter part of this Psalm, from ver. 6 to the end, is the very same (with some light variations) with the last eight verses of that; as the former part of it is very little different from the last five verses of Ps. lvii. Which the psalmist, I suppose, here placed instead of those wherewith the sixtieth begins (though he retains all the latter end of it), because now, as I said, he had made some progress in those wars, which he was about entering upon when he made that sixtieth Psalm. And therefore here he begins with thanks to God for his mercy, as there he laments the ill condition wherein he found the affairs of the kingdom when he came to the crown.

Ver. 1.] My heart is ready, O most gracious God, it is firmly resolved to give thee most solemn thanks: my tongue also, wherewith I ought to glorify thee, shall sing of thy goodness; and, with all the expressions of joy, set forth thy praise.

Ver. 2.] Nor shall any of the instruments of music be silent, but accompany my hymns: which I will sing unto thee so early, that I will prevent the rising of the sun.

Ver. 3.] Nor will I merely make thee my private acknowledgments, but publish thy praise in the greatest assemblies of thy people, among whom this song shall be sung: yea, other nations shall read therein, how thankful I am for what thou hast begun to do for us.

Ver. 4.] For it is fit my thankfulness should be as boundless as thy mercy: which infinitely transcends all my expressions; and hath nothing equal to it, but thy faithfulness and truth.

Ver. 5.] Be thou more and more exalted in these, O God; and raise to thyself thereby the highest praises; spread the fame of them everywhere, that thou mayest be glorified throughout the world.

Ver. 6.] Especially now, I beseech thee to grant my humble petitions, that by thy mighty power, accompanying my arms, I may be an instrument of delivering thy beloved people from their oppressors.

Ver. 7.] Why should I doubt of it, and not rather rejoice in assured hope of a perfect victory? since God, who is most holy, and cannot lie, hath said he will deliver them by my hand (2 Sam. iii. 18); and hath already put me in possession (as he also promised, ver. 2) of all the country about Samaria: which I will distribute under such officers as I think fit to set over them.

Ver. 8.] Gilead, also, and Manasseh, who were lately under another king (2 Sam. ii. 9), have submitted themselves to me; and so hath the tribe of Ephraim, which is a main support of my authority; these, and all the rest of the tribes of Israel, are united to the royal tribe of Judah; which (according to the prophecy of our forefather, Gen. xlix. 10), supplies me with wise and able men to administer the laws, and order the affairs of my kingdom.

Ver. 9.] Which shall now extend itself beyond the bounds of this country; for I will tread the Moabites under my feet, and reduce them to the vilest servitude (2 Sam. viii. 2): I will trample also upon the Edomites, and make them my slaves (ver. 14): the Philistines also, whom I have begun to smite (2 Sam. v. 17, 22, &c.), shall add to my triumphs, and be forced to submit unto me, as their conquering lord (viii. 1).

Ver. 10.] These are difficult things, indeed; and I may well ask, when I consider how potent these nations are, by what power or force I shall be able to enter that strongly-fenced city, in the frontiers of their country? who is it that will conduct me into Idumea, and make me master of it?

Ver. 11.] But I can soon answer myself: for why should I despair of thy presence with us, O God of all power and might; who formerly indeed didst reject us, and forsake the conduct of our armies (1 Sam. xxxi. 1, 7); but now, I hope, wilt graciously aid us, and make us victorious.

Ver. 12.] Do not frustrate these hopes; but afford us thy help against the Syrians also (2 Sam. viii. 5), now that they distress us, for no human force is able to deliver us, nor have we any confidence in it, but in thee alone.

Ver. 13.] By whose assistance we will behave ourselves courageously, and do valiant acts: for God will utterly rout our enemies; and tread them down like the mire in the streets.

PSALM CIX.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 HOLD not thy peace, O God of my praise;
2 For the mouth of the wicked and the mouth of the deceitful are opened against me: they have spoken against me with a lying tongue.

3 They compassed me about also with words of hatred; and fought against me without a cause.

4 For my love they are my adversaries: but I give myself unto prayer.

5 And they have rewarded me evil for good,
and hatred for my love.

6 Set thou a wicked man over him: and let Satan stand at his right hand.

7 When he shall be judged, let him be condemned: and let his prayer become sin.

8 Let his days be few; and let another take his office.

9 Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow.

10 Let his children be continually vagabonds, and beg: let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places.

11 Let the extortioner catch all that he hath;
and let the strangers spoil his labour.

12 Let there be none to extend mercy unto him: neither let there be any to favour his fatherless.

13 Let his posterity be cut off; and in the generation following let their name be blotted out.

PSALM CIX.

ARGUMENT.—Most interpreters consent to the opinion of Aben Ezra and D. Kimchi that David (to whom the title ascribes this Psalm) hath respect here, in the first place, to the grievous persecution which he suffered by Saul, and some of his court: who would let him enjoy no rest, but having driven him from his own house, pursued him so close, whosoever he heard he was, that he could have no certain dwelling: but became like a locust (as he speaks ver. 23), which, having no nest (as Bochartus observes, par. ii. lib. iv. De Animal. Sac. cap. 2), leaps or flies from hedge to hedge; as he did from place to place. To provoke Saul to this rage against him, as they all loaded him with many calumnies (which made David curse them to Saul's face, 1 Sam. xxvi. 19), so one especially among the rest, who is generally thought to be Doeg the Edomite, was notoriously guilty of this wickedness: whom, by a prophetic spirit, he here most solemnly curses, in a direful manner; and pronounces the heaviest judgment upon him and his family: his inhuman villany being so great, that it made him an exact picture of the traitor Judas, to whom the apostle St. Peter (Acts i. 20) applies the eighth verse of this Psalm. The rest of which is spent in prayer to God against such false accusers: and in vows of the praises he would give him, when he was delivered from the mischief which thereby they designed to him. Accordingly, when he was settled in his throne, he sent this Psalm, among others, unto the master of music in the tabernacle; to perpetuate the memory of God's mercy to him.

Concerning such imprecations as we here meet withal, see the argument of Ps. xxxv, which is of the same nature with this.

Ver. 1.] O God, the supreme judge of the world, who, as thou hast given me hitherto continual cause to praise thee, so I hope wilt still vindicate my honour: I appeal unto thy majesty: beseeching thee to declare thyself on my side; and make it appear that I am innocent.

Ver. 2.] For men of no conscience have taken the liberty to invent the most mischievous lies of me; whereby, though they always speak me fair to my face, they have wickedly traduced me to Saul behind my back.

Ver. 3.] And spread those false reports so diligently, that I find they have made me odious every where:

and thereupon, without any provocation from me, have levied war against me, to take away my life (1 Sam. xxiii. 8. 25).

Ver. 4.] Who have been so far from doing them any harm; that I have deserved well of them (1 Sam. xix. 4, 5): and even now, when they require my kindness with endeavours to destroy me, do nothing but recommend myself by prayer to thy protection; refusing to make use of the opportunity I had to revenge myself upon them (1 Sam. xxiv. 9, 10, &c.).

Ver. 5.] And yet this will not mollify them, but still they are so extremely ungrateful as to repay my kindness with new attempts to do me mischief (1 Sam. xxvi. 2); and the more affection I express, with the greater hatred am I prosecuted.

Ver. 6.] So implacable is his malice, who is the principal author of the calumnies wherewith I am loaded (1 Sam. xxii. 9. 11), against whom, therefore, I implore thy justice, O most righteous judge of the world: let the worst man that can be found be appointed to hear his cause when he is accused, and his most malicious adversary plead against him.

Ver. 7.] When sentence is given let him be condemned to be as guilty as really he is; and if he petition for a pardon, let it not only be rejected, but prove an aggravation of his crimes.

Ver. 8.] Let him (and the false traitor, who in future times will use the Messiah as now they do me) be cut off before his time: and his office (1 Sam. xxi. 7. xxii. 9), wherein he behaves himself with such insufferable insolence and falsehood, be transferred to a better man.

Ver. 9.] Let not his fatherless children succeed him in any thing that he hath; nor his widow have any thing left to maintain her.

Ver. 10.] Let them not have so much as a house wherein to put their heads; but be perpetual vagabonds, supporting a miserable life by begging an alms; and seeking where to lodge, because their own dwellings are laid waste and desolate.

Ver. 11.] Let his creditor (pretending a judgment) seize on all his estate: and a stranger, by that means, reap the fruit of all his care and labour.

Ver. 12.] Let no man show the least kindness to his memory; or upon that account bestow an alms upon his fatherless children.

Ver. 13.] Let them rather be odious for his sake, and the sooner destroyed: so that they be the last of the name; and, in the next generation, not one of that family be found.

14 Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered with the LORD; and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out.

15 Let them be before the LORD continually, that he may cut off the memory of them from the earth.

16 Because that he remembered not to shew mercy, but persecuted the poor and needy man, that he might even slay the broken in heart.

17 As he loved cursing, so let it come unto him: as he delighted not in blessing, so let it be far from him.

18 As he clothed himself with cursing like as with his garment, so let it come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones.

19 Let it be unto him as the garment which covereth him, and for a girdle wherewith he is girded continually.

20 Let this be the reward of mine adversaries from the LORD, and of them that speak evil against my soul.

Ver. 14.] But, according to the just sentence of thy law (Exod. xx. 5), let the punishments (which were due long ago, but thy patience moved thee to forbear) fall all upon him; let him suffer for the sins of his progenitors on both sides; in whose wicked steps he would not cease to tread.

Ver. 15.] Let it be seen that their wickedness is not forgotten, though committed many years ago; but prosecute it with a continued vengeance, till nobody remember that there were such people in the world.

Ver. 16.] This will be but a deserved recompense for all his cruelties: for as he let all benefits slip out of his mind, and was ungrateful to those who had obliged him, so he had no sense of that common compassion which is due to the calamitous; but when he saw me in a necessitous condition, destitute of friends, and dejected in spirit, made no other use of it but to persecute me to death.

Ver. 17.] What can be more just than that the mischief, in which he delighted, and both wished and designed to others, should fall upon himself? and that he should never meet with the blessing of those righteous courses which he always hated and avoided?

Ver. 18.] His very business was to slander others, every where; taking a pride in the mischievous effects of his cursed lies: and therefore let him feel the miserable fruit of his wickedness, spreading itself, like the water he drinks, into every vein of him; and sticking as close to him as oil unto the bones.

Ver. 19.] Let him be involved in perpetual misfortunes and miseries, and never be able to shake them off: let him be hampered with straits and difficulties, without any possibility of getting out.

Ver. 20.] This shall most certainly be the reward, which the righteous Lord will give to my malicious adversaries for all the pains they have taken, by slanderous reports and calumnies, to take away my life:

Ver. 21.] Which I commend to thy protection, O Lord, the governor of all things; beseeching thee to take my part, and appear for me; though not for my honour, yet for thy own; whose kindness is so exceeding bountiful unto all, that for that reason I am encouraged to hope thou wilt deliver me; to whom thou hast engaged thyself by many promises of mercy.

Ver. 22.] Which I never needed more than now: for I am so poor, and forsaken of all my friends

21 But do thou for me, O God the Lord, for thy name's sake: because thy mercy is good, deliver thou me.

22 For I am poor and needy, and my heart is wounded within me.

23 I am gone like the shadow when it inclineth: I am tossed up and down as the locust.

24 My knees are weak through fasting; and my flesh faileth of fatness.

25 I became also a reproach unto them: when they looked upon me they shook their heads.

26 Help me, O LORD my God: O save me according to thy mercy:

27 That they may know that this is thy hand; that thou, LORD, hast done it.

28 Let them curse, but bless thou: when they arise, let them be ashamed; but let thy servant rejoice.

29 Let mine adversaries be clothed with shame, and let them cover themselves with their own confusion, as with a mantle.

(1 Sam. xxv. 8, &c.), that I am ready to faint away with grief and sorrow, like one that is wounded at the very heart.

Ver. 23.] The evening shadow doth not vanish sooner than I, from the place of my present abode (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 3, 5; xxiii. 13, 14): which I am forced to quit on a sudden; and to wander like the locust, which flies, or is driven, with the wind, uncertainly from place to place.

Ver. 24.] And for want of food in those desert places, I am sometimes scarce able to remove: for my body, which heretofore was plump and fat (1 Sam. xvi. 12), is now grown lank and thin, like one of those miserable lean creatures.

Ver. 25.] Which, instead of moving their pity, hath exposed me to such contempt and scorn, that when I am seen by any of them, they deride and scoff at me as an undone wretch, that vainly hopes to escape their hands.

Ver. 26.] But my hope is, that thou, O Lord, who hast hitherto been my most gracious God, will seasonably interpose for my relief: and deliver me, out of that tender mercy, which is wont to extend itself to those who have nothing else to depend upon.

Ver. 27.] Whereby they themselves may be convinced, and forced to acknowledge, that, not by chance, no more than by small forces, but by thy almighty power alone, and thy care of me, O Lord, I am delivered.

Ver. 28.] Thy blessing and protection I implore; which if thou wilt vouchsafe me, let them go on to curse and slander me as long as they please; it shall not hurt me: nay, let them assault me with armed force, they shall only be confounded at their vain attempt; and give thy servant the greater cause to rejoice at their disappointment.

Ver. 29.] Which shall so increase the confusion of my malicious adversaries, that they shall not be able to bear the disgrace: but wish they could hide themselves from the sight of their shame, which their own wickedness hath brought upon them.

Ver. 30.] In hope of which defeat, I vow beforehand to the Lord the best expressions of my gratitude that I am able to make: not only in private, but in the greatest assemblies; where I will not cease to praise his almighty love.

Ver. 31.] And bid them trust in God, who hath pleaded my cause, and rescued me from death; and 30 I will greatly praise the LORD with my mouth; yea, I will praise him among the multitude.

will ever be the advocate of him that hath no helper, but depends on his goodness, to deliver him from the hands of those judges, who prosecute the unjust sentence they have passed upon him to lose his life.

PSALM CX.

A Psalm of David.

1 THE LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool.

2 THE LORD shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion: rule thou in the midst of thine enemies.

3 Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth.

4 THE LORD hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.

5 THE LORD at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath.

6 He shall judge among the heathen, he shall

PSALM CX.

ARGUMENT.—There is the same reason to think this Psalm was composed by David (not by some other concerning David), that there is to conclude all the rest to be so, which have the same title. And then, as it is very plain he speaks of some person much greater than himself, whom he calls his Lord, so it can be no other but the Lord Christ, of whom he here prophesies. Not, as he is wont to do elsewhere, with respect to himself, in the first place, as his type and figure; but in plain words, which can belong to none but Christ alone: for no other king but he can be said in any sense to sit at God's right hand; nor was there any priest of the order of Melchizedek that could be a shadow of him.

David, indeed, seems once to have exercised the office of a priest, when he blessed the people, at the bringing of the ark to Zion (2 Sam. vi. 18), and so to have been then both king and priest in one person, as Melchizedek was; but not a priest for ever, on whom the office was perpetually established, and that by an oath; as it was on the priest here mentioned.

And therefore it is in vain to endeavour to accommodate any part of this Psalm to David; who conquered many of the neighbouring countries, smote their kings, made them bring him tributes, and at last smote the "head of the country of Rabbah" (as some render the last words of the sixth verse of this Psalm), that is, the king of the children of Ammon: but still we are to seek how the rest can be applied to him, who never had any pretence to such an authority as is here described, nor can in any sense call himself my Lord: but as our Lord Christ hath demonstrated, spake concerning him (Matt. xxii. 43, &c.), and his exaltation, after his resurrection from the dead (as St. Peter and St. Paul also show, Acts ii. 34, 35; 1 Cor. xv. 25; Heb. iv. 1, 13; v. 6,) when he set up another priesthood, and abolished that of Moses; which change is here predicted.

And though the Jews have taken a great deal of pains to wrest this Psalm to another sense, yet they are so divided in their opinions about it (speaking inconsistent things, like drunken men, as St. Chrysostom's words are, or rather, says he, like men in the dark, running against one another), that from thence alone we may be satisfied they are in the wrong, and have their eyes blinded, else they would not have embraced such interpretations as those, which may be seen in them that have written upon this Psalm, which some of the Jews themselves (such as R. Moses Hadarsan, Saadiah Gaon, and divers others whom I might mention), have been forced to acknowledge belongs to Christ; and is a very plain prediction of his divinity, his royal dignity, his priesthood, and his victories and triumphs, which the psalmist sets forth as follows.

Ver. 1.] This is the decree of the eternal Lord, that the great person whom we expect, and whom I honour as my lord and master, shall be advanced (after his sufferings) to the highest dignity (1 Kings ii. 19) in the heavens; and reign with him as the king of all the world, till he hath perfectly subdued (Josh. x. 24) the most powerful opposers of his kingdom; and overcome death itself, by whom all mankind are conquered (1 Cor. xv. 25, 26).

Ver. 2.] The eternal Lord, who hath thus decreed to honour thee, O most mighty prince, will make Zion, first of all, to feel how powerful the sceptre is (Acts i. 8; ii. 34, 37), and thence extend thy empire over all the earth; where I wish thou mayest, and foretell thou wilt, prevail over all infidelity, idolatry, superstition, and impiety; which will set themselves against thy authority.

Ver. 3.] For in the day when thy forces (2 Tim. ii. 3), completely armed with a divine power (Acts iv. 33), shall march forth to subdue the world unto thy obedience: they that are fit for thy kingdom (Luke ix. 62; Acts xiii. 48) shall cheerfully submit themselves, and present thee with freewill-offerings, in token of their absolute subjection unto thee (Acts ii. 45; iv. 34). And great shall be the number of chosen men (1 John ii. 13), who, glad to see the night of ignorance gone, shall, at thy first appearance, by the celestial blessing, fall unto thee as thick as the morning dew.

Ver. 4.] And happy are they who live under thy government; for the Lord hath unchangeably resolved that thou shalt be a priest as well as king; with full power to bless all thy subjects, not only in that, but in all future ages, even to all eternity: for thou shalt not be a priest like those after Aaron's order, who die to make room for others; but, like that great king and priest Melchizedek, shalt neither have any predecessor nor successor in thine office, but continue a royal priest for evermore (Heb. vii.).

Ver. 5.] Who, as he will be most compassionate to all those who heartily acknowledge him for their Lord, and submit unto his government; so will break fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries.

7 He shall drink of the brook in the way: therefore shall he lift up the head.

in pieces the greatest powers on earth that provoke his displeasure by obstinate opposal of his authority at thy right hand.

Ver. 6.] From whence he shall demonstrate himself to all the heathen world, to be their lawgiver and their judge; taking a severe vengeance on those that persecute his subjects, and destroying, at last, even that mighty empire which shall then rule over many countries.

Ver. 7.] But before all this, he shall first humble himself to the meanest condition; not living in the state of a king here in this world, but of a wayfaring man (Luke ix. 56), who is content with such provision as he meets withal. For which cause, after the enduring many hardships, even death itself, he shall be highly exalted to his royal and priestly dignity in the heavens; from whence he shall never fall.

PSALM CXI.

Hallelujah, i. e. Praise the Lord.

I PRAISE YE the LORD. I will praise the LORD with my whole heart, in the assembly of the upright, and in the congregation.

2 The works of the LORD are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein.

3 His work is honourable and glorious: and his righteousness endureth for ever.

4 He hath made his wonderful works to be remembered: the LORD is gracious and full of compassion.

5 He hath given meat unto them that fear him: he will ever be mindful of his covenant.

6 He hath shewed his people the power of his works, that he may give them the heritage of the heathen.

7 The works of his hands are verity and judgment; all his commandments are sure.

8 They stand fast for ever and ever, and are done in truth and uprightness.

9 He sent redemption unto his people: he hath

PSALM CXI.

ARGUMENT.—It is certain this is the title of the Psalm, which consists of as many short metres, as there are letters in the Hebrew alphabet; and therefore cannot begin with Hallelujah, whose first letter is the fifth, not the first letter in that alphabet. In which order it proceeds for the better help of the memory: being composed thus artificially, that every one, as well as the singers (to whom the Hallelujah, perhaps, is particularly directed), might have in their minds a brief form of thanking God (especially upon festival days) for the wonderful things he had done for that nation.

It was a meditation which the author had in time of peace and quiet; for in distress, or immediately after a great deliverance, men's spirits are not at liberty to use such art and curiosity in their compositions, as there is in this Psalm; being full at those seasons of such passions as make them neglect it, even when they are inclined to use it (see Psalm xxv.). For which reason, I think, Theodoret's opinion hath no ground; that the psalmist hath respect to the great victory obtained by Jehoshaphat over the Ammonites and other nations, who invaded his kingdom; for which they gave thanks to God presently after (2 Chron. xx.). It is more likely that David, who composed those larger forms of commemoration, Psalm cv. and cvi. made this (as I said) for a compendious remembrance of what is there more largely delivered. And that he might not exceed the number of the ten commandments (as some give the reason of it) in the verses of this Psalm, the metres of the last two are so short, that they have each of them three letters of the alphabet in them, whereas all the former have but two.

Ver. 1.] I will make my thankful acknowledgments to the Lord, not only with my lips, or with some slight affections of my mind, but with all my heart and soul: and that not only in the private society of those good men whom I am more intimately acquainted withal, but in the public congregation of all his people.

Ver. 2.] Who ought to join together to praise the Lord for his mighty and wonderful works, which it will not cost them much labour to understand; for they are easily found out by all those who take any pleasure in such inquiries.

Ver. 3.] And there is not one of them but is full of majesty and splendour; and fruit of his infinite bounty, and faithfulness to his promise, which he still expresses towards us, and will do so for ever.

Ver. 4.] And such is his goodness, lest we should forget his benefits, he hath instituted solemn times for the commemoration of the wonders he hath done for us (Exod. xii. 14; xiii. 3, 9, &c.), which are everlasting testimonies, that we serve a most gracious and compassionate Lord.

Ver. 5.] Who gave our forefathers (whom by his wonderful works he possessed with the fear of him, Exod. xiv. 31) the spoil of the Egyptians (Exod. xii. 35, 36), and afterward fed them with manna in the wilderness (Exod. xvi.), according to his covenant, which he had made long before (Gen. xv. 14), and will never forget in future ages.

Ver. 6.] He hath evidently demonstrated to his people the greatness of his power in destroying Sihon the Amorite (Deut. ii. 24, 25), and Og the king of Bashan (Deut. iii. 21, 24), with the rest of the Amorites and other nations, in the land of Canaan (Josh. x. 6, 11, 12, &c.): which he took from the ancient inhabitants, that he might give it us for our possession.

Ver. 7.] In which he did them no wrong; but was exactly just in fulfilling his promise to us, and in executing his judgments upon those wicked wretches (Deut. ix. 5; Gen. xv. 16). For all his orders of either kind are in pursuance of most righteous decrees.

Ver. 8.] Which he doth not alter and change at pleasure, but hath settled as eternal rules; because there is no partiality or inquiry in them; but they were enacted with a sincere respect to all men's good and happiness.

Ver. 9.] And it was in conformity to these that he commanded his covenant for ever: holy and reverend is his name.

10 The fear of the LORD is the beginning of at first sent Moses and Aaron to bring our fathers out of Egypt (Exod. vi. 6), and then exercised his supreme authority over them, in giving them a law, which he tied them by a covenant perpetually to observe (Exod. xix. 4, 5; xxiv. 8); appearing in such majesty to them (Exod. xx. 18; xxiv. 10, 11), as might possess them with an awful regard to him; and make them for ever dread, by any profaneness, to offend him, who infinitely excels all other beings.

wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments: his praise endureth for ever.

Ver. 10.] And, indeed, it is the first and principal point of wisdom to fear the Lord, and carefully observe his commandments; the practice of which gives men a better understanding of what is good for them, than any politic maxims can infuse into them. Therefore let the Lord be for ever praised, who hath given us these good and wholesome laws; and thereby shown us the way to eternal honour and praise.

PSALM CXIL

1 PRAISE ye the LORD. Blessed is the man that feareth the LORD, that delighteth greatly in his commandments.

2 His seed shall be mighty upon earth: the generation of the upright shall be blessed.

3 Wealth and riches shall be in his house: and his righteousness endureth forever.

4 Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness: he is gracious, and full of compassion, and righteous.

5 A good man sheweth favour, and lendeth: he will guide his affairs with discretion.

6 Surely he shall not be moved for ever: the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.

7 He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is fixed, trusting in the LORD.

8 His heart is established, he shall not be afraid, until he see his desire upon his enemies.

9 He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor; his righteousness endureth for ever; his horn shall be exalted with honour.

10 The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away: the desire of the wicked shall perish.

PSALM CXIL

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm is composed after the very same manner with the former; and seems to be intended for a short commentary upon the last verse of it: showing how well and wisely they consult their own good and happiness, who observe God's commandments; especially those about charity, or doing good to others. Of which that they might be always mindful, the Psalm is contrived, for the help of their memories, into as many short verses as there are letters in the Hebrew alphabet. Hallelujah therefore is no part of them, but the title prefixed to the Psalm (see argument upon Psalm cxi.), to excite them to praise the Lord; who had made it their present interest to be religious.

Ver. 1.] Happy is that man whose chiefest care it is to praise the Lord, by observing his commandments: which will yield, in the issue, the highest pleasure and satisfaction to himself.

Ver. 2.] And procure a blessing also upon all belonging to him: first, upon his children, and those that shall descend from them in future times; who shall fare the better, and be more powerful and prosperous, for the sincere virtue of their pious forefathers:

Ver. 3.] And next on his estate; which shall not only be rich and plentiful, but so firmly settled and entailed on his posterity, that they shall reap the perpetual fruit of his justice and charity.

Ver. 4.] Or if any affliction come, it will be so far from making him unhappy, that, besides the divine comforts imparted to him for his support, it will make the virtue of upright men the more illustrious: while one exercises meekness and sweetness to those that provoke him, another forgives offences, and pities the instruments of his trouble; and a third exercises the greater justice of mercy, and will not be tempted to do any dishonest or cruel thing for his own deliverance.

Ver. 5.] But, above all other men, he leads the most comfortable life, who is so kind, that he supplies the needs of others; giving to one, and lending to another, as occasion serves: and yet ordering all his affairs so judiciously, that he doth not impair, but rather maintain, the good estate of his own family.

Ver. 6.] Sure it will not be in the power of the most mighty and malicious enemies (though they may disturb him) quite to overthrow him: and when they are forgotten, or mentioned with contempt, the worthy actions of this sort of righteous men shall be celebrated with never-ceasing praises.

Ver. 7.] He is not affrighted and discomposed at the false reports that are raised of him; nor at the rumour of dangers which threaten him: being prepared for such things as these, by a settled trust and hope in God; that he will take care of him, who hath been as kind as he could to others in their distresses.

Ver. 8.] This confidence is the prop and support of his soul; which will not let him be dismayed: but makes him expect the time, when he shall be able securely to look upon all his enemies.

Ver. 9.] He doth not merely heap up riches for himself; but dispenses them to others, especially to the poor and needy, with a liberal hand: nor is he weary of well-doing, but ever producing some new fruit of his charity, which shall gain him the greatest honour, and raise him to an illustrious degree of power and authority.

Ver. 10.] At the sight of which the wicked (who shall not be able to obstruct it) shall be extremely vexed; or rather furiously enraged: he shall pine away with grief, envy, and impatience, to see himself and his companions disappointed in all that they wished; either of good to themselves, or evil to the righteous.

PSALM CXIII.

1 PRAISE ye the LORD. Praise, O ye servants of the LORD, praise the name of the LORD.

2 Blessed be the name of the LORD from this time forth and for evermore.

3 From the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same the LORD's name is to be praised.

4 The LORD is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens.

5 Who is like unto the LORD our God, who dwelleth on high.

PSALM CXIII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, with the next five that follow, the Hebrews call by the name of Hallel, or Hymn: which they recited at their table (as in the new moons and other feasts, so) in the paschal night, after they had eaten the lamb; concluding it with Hallelujah: which is the title of this Psalm (as of the two foregoing), to excite all God's people, especially those that constantly attended in the tabernacle, to the praises of God's good providence; which extends itself as far as this earth where we live: several instances of which the psalmist here mentions.

Ver. 1.] O ye ministers of the Lord, and whosoever you are that love his service, praise his eternal majesty: be not remiss in this heavenly employment: but, with your best affections, praise the power, wisdom, and goodness, of his eternal providence.

Ver. 2.] Praise him now in this present age; and wish that those incomparable perfections of his may be celebrated with the praises of those that live in future times, as long as the world shall last.

Ver. 3.] And not only here in this little spot of earth but wheresoever the sun shines, and lets men see how splendid and glorious his majesty is.

Ver. 4.] For all the nations of the earth are his; and but a little parcel of his supreme dominion; which 6 Who humbleth himself to behold the things that are in heaven, and in the earth!

7 He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifeth the needy out of the dunghill;

8 That he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people.

9 He maketh the barren woman to keep house, and to be a joyful mother of children. Praise ye the LORD.

extends far beyond the sun, and moon, and stars; whose light is but a dim resemblance of the brightness of his glory.

Ver. 5.] Do not think that any of them (though worshipped by other nations as gods) is comparable to that great Lord, and our most gracious God, whom we adore: for the very place where his glorious majesty resides is far higher than they.

Ver. 6.] And it is a great condescension in him, that he will have any respect to the most illustrious of those celestial bodies: though he be so gracious also as to extend his kind and careful providence, even to us who dwell upon this earth.

Ver. 7.] Where, among other manifest tokens of his stupendous goodness, he is pleased to take special notice of those whom the world despises: and to raise them out of a mean, nay, sordid condition, to such a pitch of honour and dignity.

Ver. 8.] That at last they are advanced to sit upon a throne; and made the governors of his own people (1 Sam. ii. 8; 2 Sam. vii. 8, 9, compared with 1 Sam. xxiv. 14).

Ver. 9.] And, which is still more strange, he opens the barren womb (which according to the course of nature would have brought forth nothing), and makes a numerous family spring from thence, to the great joy of her that bears them (1 Sam. i. 20; ii. 21). Praise the Lord in these, and such-like wonderful works of his.

PSALM CXIV.

1 WHEN Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language;

2 Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion.

3 The sea saw it, and fled: Jordan was driven back.

PSALM CXIV.

ARGUMENT.—As the foregoing Psalm puts them in mind of several works of the divine providence, about particular persons: so this makes a brief narration of some miraculous work; wherein the Lord declared his power, when he brought the whole Jewish nation out of the Egyptian bondage.

Ver. 1.] When our forefathers, with their whole family, were brought out of Egypt; and not one of them left behind among that barbarous people who had long oppressed them;

Ver. 2.] There was a most glorious appearance of God among them, by that bright cloud, the token of his presence: which then had no other peculiar place

4 The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs.

5 What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back?

6 Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams; and ye little hills, like lambs?

for its sanctuary; but stood over the whole camp of Israel (Exod. xiii. 21; Numb. xiv. 14), whom he then took for his peculiar kingdom (Exod. xix. 6).

Ver. 3.] At which appearance the Red sea forsook its channel, and left a dry path for them to march through (Exod. xiv. 21, 24): and so did Jordan also afterward; to make way for their easy entrance into Canaan (Josh. iii. 15, 16).

Ver. 4.] All the mountains, great and small, which adjoined unto Sinai, trembled and leaped, like so many affrighted rams, or little lambs, before the same most dreadful majesty (Exod. xix. 18).

Ver. 5.] To what else shall we ascribe that sudden ebb of the sea? and that, no less strange, retreat of Jordan, when it overflowed all its banks?

7 Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the LORD, at the presence of the God of Jacob;

Ver. 6.] What made the mountains and hills leap up like affrighted rams or lambs; as if they would run away from the place where they were so firmly fixed?

Ver. 7.] But only the glorious presence of the divine majesty, who was then bringing his people to the rest he had promised to give them. And let the whole earth be afraid and tremble before that great Lord who hath honoured us so far as peculiarly to be our God:

8 Which turned the rock into a standing water, the flint into a fountain of waters.

Ver. 8.] And was so kind as to supply the necessities of our forefathers, even when they murmured against him, by a new miracle: bringing out of hard rocks, as hard as flint, such plenty of water, as if they had been dissolved into lakes or rivers (Exod. xvii. 8; Numb. xx. 11).

PSALM CXV.

1 NOT unto us, O LORD, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake.

2 Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is now their God?

3 But our God is in the heavens: he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased.

4 Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands.

5 They have mouths, but they speak not: eyes have they, but they see not:

6 They have ears, but they hear not: noses have they, but they smell not:

7 They have hands, but they handle not: feet have they, but they walk not: neither speak they through their throat.

8 They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them.

9 O Israel, trust thou in the LORD: he is their help and their shield.

10 O house of Aaron, trust in the LORD: he is their help and their shield.

PSALM CXV.

ARGUMENT.—There is great reason to think, that this Psalm was made in some time of sore distress; when their pagan enemies began to boast and brag, as if their gods were too hard for the God of Israel. But by whom it was made, or on what particular occasion, there are so many conjectures, that it will be no presumption to interpose mine, which is this; that when Jehoshaphat saw that vast army (which we read of 2 Chron. xx. 2), composed of several nations coming against him; and, after his prayer to God for deliverance, was encouraged by a prophet to hope for it (ver. 14, 15), and had by the Levites given him thanks for this hope; he, or that prophet, composed this hymn to quicken and confirm their faith in God: unto which you read he exhorted them (ver. 20). And it is likely that this was the hymn which, by common consent, the singers were appointed to use, when they went out to encounter those enemies: saying not only those words, which we read there (ver. 21), "Praise the Lord, for his mercy endureth for ever;" but these, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake," &c.

Ver. 1.] Prosper our arms, O Lord, and give us the victory over these enemies that invade us: not that we may grow more famous (no, we have no thoughts of the glory that will accrue to ourselves thereby): but that thy divine majesty may be honoured, and thy goodness and faithfulness to thy promises be made the more illustrious.

Ver. 2.] What a sad thing will it be to hear the nations that surround us insult, not so much over us, as over thee; saying, What is become of their God in whom they trusted? if he be so powerful as they boast, why doth he not deliver them?

Ver. 3.] Let them know that thou art infinitely superior to them and all their gods; being the possessor of the heavens, as well as the earth (2 Chron. xx. 6), whom no power of theirs can hurt, or so much as restrain; but art able to do whatsoever thou pleasest for their confusion, and for our deliverance.

Ver. 4.] Their idols cannot hinder it in the least; who are of no more value than the silver and gold of which they are made; and are so far from being the makers of things, that they themselves are the work of those that adore them.

Ver. 5.] They are mere lifeless images; that have mouths, but cannot give a word of advice, or of encouragement and comfort, to their supplicants: and eyes also, but cannot see the devotion wherewith they look up unto them, or prostrate themselves before them.

Ver. 6.] Let their worshippers cry to them never so loudly, they cannot hear a word: all the frankincense and sweet odours which they burn to them are merely lost; for they cannot smell them.

Ver. 7.] Though they have thunderbolts in their hands they feel them not; nor are able to do either good or harm: they cannot stir a foot from the place where they stand, unless they be carried; nor make so much noise as a fly; being utterly void of breath, as well as of sense and reason.

Ver. 8.] To what then, but to those idols, shall we compare the makers of them, and such as confide in them? who are mere images of men: having eyes, but do not see that the brutes are more excellent than such gods: and that the least help is not to be expected from them.

Ver. 9.] O ye Israelites, who by the divine favour are better instructed, repose that confidence in the eternal Lord, which they do in those vanities: and he will not only protect and defend you against all the assaults of your enemies: but help you to overcome them (2 Chron. xx. 9).

Ver. 10.] O ye priests and Levites, do you above all others rely upon that eternal Lord; whose praise you sing, and to whom you offer continual sacrifice; for he will never fail, not only to protect, but to assist, all such as piously confide in him.

Ver. 11.] And let all that fear the Lord, and devoutly worship him (of whatsoever nation they be), place the like confidence in his almighty goodness: for he will never forsake those that depend on him alone (though they be not of the seed of Abraham), 11 Ye that fear the LORD, trust in the LORD: he is their help and their shield.

12 The LORD hath been mindful of us: he will bless us; he will bless the house of Israel; he will bless the house of Aaron.

13 He will bless them that fear the LORD, both small and great.

14 The LORD shall increase you more and more, you and your children.

but defend them also in all dangers, and aid them against all their enemies.

Ver. 12.] We have had abundant experience of his care over us in all ages; and therefore, though now for the present our enemies afflict us, yet let us believe that the Lord will do us good, and bless us with a glorious deliverance: all the house of Israel shall see how kind he is; especially they that minister unto him in his holy temple.

Ver. 13.] And he will not forget those pious proselytes that are come to worship him there, as the only God; but, without any respect of persons, give them his blessing also: which shall not be denied, either to old or young, to rich or poor.

Ver. 14.] Nor will he grant you only a single blessing, by sending a present deliverance; but heap his benefits, and multiply his mercies, upon you; and upon all those that shall succeed you.

Ver. 15.] Ye are a happy people, who live under the care, and love, and benediction, of that mighty 15 Ye are blessed of the LORD which made heaven and earth.

16 The heaven, even the heavens, are the LORD's: but the earth hath he given to the children of men.

17 The dead praise not the LORD, neither any that go down into silence.

18 But we will bless the LORD, from this time forth and for evermore. Praise the LORD.

Lord, whose power nothing can confine; for he is not made (like the gentile gods), but himself created both the heaven and the earth.

Ver. 16.] In which he cannot be comprehended neither; for his empire extends farther than you can see; to the heavens, which are above these visible heavens, from whence his providence reaches down, even to us the children of men; whom he hath placed upon this earth, to admire and praise his infinite majesty.

Ver. 17.] And therefore will not suffer us to be rooted out, as our enemies design (2 Chron. xx. 11), for then the earth would have none in it to sing his praises, which the dead, who dwell in the silent grave, cannot celebrate.

Ver. 18.] But will continue us still alive, that we may praise the Lord, and speak good of his name, as we do at this time (2 Chron. xx. 21, 22), and leave those to succeed us, who shall continue his praises in all future generations to the world's end. Hallelujah, Praise the Lord.

PSALM CXVI.

1 I LOVE the LORD, because he hath heard my voice and my supplications.

2 Because he hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon him as long as I live.

3 The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me: I found trouble and sorrow.

4 Then called I upon the name of the LORD, O LORD, I beseech thee, deliver my soul.

5 Gracious is the LORD, and righteous; yea, our God is merciful.

6 The LORD preserveth the simple: I was brought low, and he helped me.

PSALM CXVI.

ARGUMENT.—I do not understand the reason why Theodoret applies this Psalm to the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, when it agrees so exactly to the condition of David in his flight from his son Absalom (which seems to be mentioned ver. 11), when Ahithophel and others proved very false to him; and he had little or nothing to depend upon, but only the goodness of the Almighty; who was pleased to plead his cause, and deliver him. For which he resolved to be very thankful, and to call all his friends to rejoice with him, as I have expressed it, ver. 13, where the first words sufficiently declare the sense; but I have added more to explain the phrase, which is borrowed from the custom of those days: about which the reader may consult Mr. Mede, p. 483, last edit. In this resolution he was so serious that he repeats it in the conclusion; and saith he will pay his vows in the midst of Jerusalem: from whence the history tells us he was forced to fly, in great haste, to save his life (2 Sam. xv. 14).

This seems to be the occasion of the Psalm, which may very well befit any other persons that receive any great deliverance from God; and accordingly I will order the paraphrase, and fit it for the expressing of their devout affections.

Ver. 1.] O how I love the Lord! he knows that I love him exceedingly: and there is the greatest reason for it; because he hath so graciously heard my prayer, when in distress I cried unto him.

Ver. 2.] I cannot chose but mention again this love of his, in granting so readily my desires: which encourages, and engages me, on all such occasions, to address myself, with thankful acknowledgments, unto him; and to the last breath of my life, to expect deliverance from him.

Ver. 3.] Great was my misery; exceeding great: death itself and the grave were ready to seize on me; and I saw no way to escape: nay, I myself, in the anguish of my soul, inconsiderately cast myself into danger.

Ver. 4.] Yet I did not despond in these straits; but made the mighty, wise, and good providence of God my refuge; to whom I cried, saying, O Lord, who wast before all things, and commandest them as thou pleasest; rescue me, I most humbly beseech thee, from those dangers which threaten my destruction.

Ver. 5.] And it was not in vain that I cried unto him; for the Lord hath shown me how ready he is to do good, and how faithful in his promises: and withal how gentle in his punishments, and inclinable to pardon our faults; which demonstrates that no people serve such a gracious master as our merciful God.

Ver. 6.] I had perished, I am sure, if I had relied 7 Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee.

8 For thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling.

9 I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living.

10 I believed, therefore have I spoken: I was greatly afflicted:

11 I said in my haste, All men are liars.

12 What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me?

13 I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord.

14 I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people.

15 Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.

16 O Lord, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid: thou hast loosed my bonds.

17 I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the Lord.

18 I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people.

19 In the courts of the Lord's house, in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem. Praise ye the Lord.

only on my own wisdom, or the skill and policy of others: but the Lord was my hope, who preserves the most simple and incautious souls, when they commit themselves to him, and wholly depend on his providence. I ought to say so; who was reduced to a most forlorn estate, and then, by his assistance in a wonderful manner delivered.

Ver. 7.] What hast thou then to do, O my soul, who hast been so tempestuously tossed, but to settle thyself again in peace and tranquillity; loving and praising the Lord, who hath very many ways expressed his bounty most liberally to thee.

Ver. 8.] For when the dangers of death surrounded me, thou, O my God, didst deliver me: whenever any sadness seized on me, thou hast been my comforter: and when I have been in danger of hurts, maims, or bruises (or falling into the hands of my enemies), thou still hast been my protector.

Ver. 9.] I ought therefore, and I am resolved, to employ all that health and cheerfulness, that soundness of body and mind, that peace and safety, which thou hast thus graciously bestowed on me, in doing thee (to whom as my sovereign Lord I owe) all faithful service; as long as I stay in this world.

Ver. 10.] I had nothing, I will thankfully remember, to depend upon, but only thy kind providence: in this I placed my trust; in this I gloried to others, when I was in my greatest straits: for the truth is, I was extremely miserable.

Ver. 11.] Pressed on all sides with dangers; from which, when I fled as fast as I was able (2 Sam. xv. 14; xvii. 16, 22), I concluded it was vain to rely on the friendship and help of men: for they in whom I trusted proved so false and treacherous (xv. 31), that I had reason to think the rest would deceive and fail my expectation, when I was in the greatest need of them.

Ver. 12.] O the greatness of thy love! who even then didst interpose and deliver me, by the assistance of some faithful friends, who still stuck to me! (2 Sam. xvii. 13, &c.) What shall I render unto the Lord, who heard my prayer? (xv. 31.) How shall I show myself grateful to him for this, and for all other his benefits, which he hath heaped upon me?

Ver. 13.] All that I can do cannot make him more happy: but, as my duty binds me, I will praise the Lord, and speak good of his name, and give him thanks, in the best and most solemn manner I am able: I will call all my friends together to rejoice with me, and taking the cup, which we call the cup of deliverance (because, when blessed and set apart, we are wont to commemorate the blessings we have received), I will magnify the power, goodness, and faithfulness of God my Saviour before all the company; and will drink myself, and then give it to them, that they may praise his name together with me.

Ver. 14.] And whatsoever I have promised thee, O Lord, in the time of my distress, I will faithfully engage myself to perform before them all: they shall see I am not forgetful of thee, who wast so mindful of me in my trouble.

Ver. 15.] As, indeed, thou art of all good men, whose lives thou preservest as a precious jewel: and wilt not give them up to the pleasure of their enemies; nor suffer them to be lost, but by thy special providence.

Ver. 16.] Accept, good Lord, of these my resolutions; for I am sensible that I am thy servant; every way thy servant, and entirely obliged to be faithful to thee; both by my birth and by my education; and by this marvellous deliverance, whereby thou hast rescued me from the power of death, which had, in a manner, taken hold on me.

Ver. 17.] I can never sure prove ungrateful to thee, unto whom I am tied by so many bonds; but will always be making thee my most thankful solemn acknowledgments for the benefits I have received: and together with those praises, and thanksgivings, wait upon thy goodness, for the like mercies in time to come.

Ver. 18.] I resolve again, religiously to make good these, and all other my vows, wherein I stand engaged to the Lord: and that not only in private; but here at this solemnity, in the face of all his people:

Ver. 19.] When they are gathered together at his house, in the midst of the holy city of our God; where they meet to worship him, and to do him honour. There let them all join with me, to bless and praise the great creator and preserver of all things.

PSALM CXVII.

1 O PRAISE the LORD, all ye nations: praise him, all ye people.
2 For his merciful kindness is great toward us; and the truth of the LORD endureth for ever. Praise ye the LORD.

PSALM CXVII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm (like the hundred and tenth) seems to be altogether prophetic, of the joy that all the world should conceive at the coming of the Messiah: to give salvation, first to the Jews, and then to all other nations; according to his faithful promise. St. Paul applies the first words of it to this business (Rom. xv. 11), and some of the Hebrews justify his application; confessing that this Psalm belongs to that matter. The brevity of it makes it the more remarkable; and easier to be remembered both by Jews and gentiles.

Ver. 1.] Let not the praises, which are due to the great Lord of all, be confined to our nation; but let all people upon the face of the earth praise him: let all mankind sing thankful hymns unto him.

Ver. 2.] For they are all concerned in his transcendent kindness, which hath done mighty things for us; and the Lord, who changes not, will never fail to perform his faithful promises to the world's end. Therefore let us all join our praises to our common benefactor.

PSALM CXVIII.

1 O GIVE thanks unto the LORD; for he is good: because his mercy endureth for ever.
2 Let Israel now say, that his mercy endureth for ever.
3 Let the house of Aaron now say, that his mercy endureth for ever.

4 Let them now that fear the LORD say, that his mercy endureth for ever.

5 I called upon the LORD in distress: the LORD answered me, and set me in a large place.

6 THE LORD is on my side; I will not fear; what can man do unto me?

PSALM CXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—There is nothing more probable than that David composed this Psalm, after God had settled him upon the throne of Israel as well as Judah; and also subdued the Philistines (who hoped to have crushed him before he grew too powerful, 2 Sam. v. 17), together with other enemies round about him, who, though they are not mentioned, yet, in all likelihood, joined with them, as we may gather from ver. 10, 11 of this Psalm, compared with 2 Sam. vii. 1. For that it was written after he had brought the ark to Jerusalem (mentioned there, ch. vi.), and placed it in the house he had prepared for it, seems very plain from ver. 19 of this Psalm; where he begins to praise God in such words, as had not their complete fulfilling till the Lord's Christ (whom the Jews rejected, and said, He shall not reign over us) was made king of the world. For to him R. Solomon himself acknowledges those words, "The stone which the builders refused," &c. are to be applied.

And as the latter part of the Psalm is a prophecy of Christ, in David's type, so the former part may be accommodated to all Christians: who, being persecuted (as Theodoret speaks), and tormented, and disgracefully treated, by many princes and their people, by kings and governors, got a glorious victory over them all, after they had endured a thousand deaths.

It seems also to have been pronounced, at first, in some solemn assembly of all the people, met together to praise the Lord for his benefits. And it is the common opinion of most interpreters, that they all had a part in this Psalm. The greatest part of which was spoken by David; who begins with a declaration how much he was indebted to God, desiring all to assist him in his praises: and then coming in a solemn procession, I suppose to the gates of the tabernacle, calls upon the porters (ver. 19) to open them to him, that he might praise God in his sanctuary, which he doth in the very entrance (ver. 20), and then in the courts of his house (ver. 21); after which all the people shout, and magnify the divine goodness; in making him, who was banished from his country, their king (ver. 22, &c.): and then the priests come forth, and bless both the king and people, in the name of the Lord (ver. 26), and exhort them to be thankful (ver. 27): and then David seems to take the words out of their mouths, and to declare that he will never be un mindful of God's benefits; desiring all the people also to remember them (ver. 28, 29). According to which account of the Psalm I have ordered the paraphrase.

Ver. 1.] O make your thankful acknowledgements to the great Lord of all the world: who, as he is the author of all good, and hath been exceeding bountiful unto us, so will continue his kindness to all succeeding generations.

Ver. 2.] Let the children of Israel, who have had such long experience of his love, and now see his promises fulfilled; let them confess, and thankfully acknowledge, that his kindness continues to all generations.

Ver. 3.] Let the priests and the Levites, whose business it is to attend upon his service, confess now, and thankfully acknowledge, that his kindness extends unto all ages.

Ver. 4.] And let all the devout worshippers of the Lord, of whatsoever nation they be, join together with us (for there is one Lord of all, who dispenses various benefits to every one of us), and confess now most thankfully, that there is no end of his kindness.

Ver. 5.] You may see an example of it in me, who was in grievous straits and dangers (1 Sam. xxiii. 26; xxvii. 1); but then imploring the divine protection, the Lord not only delivered me, but placed me in a secure estate, free from all such molestation (2 Sam. v. 3; vii. 1).

Ver. 6.] For the Lord, it is evident, takes my part;

7 The LORD taketh my part with them that help me: therefore shall I see my desire upon them that hate me.

8 It is better to trust in the LORD than to put confidence in man.

9 It is better to trust in the LORD than to put confidence in princes.

10 All nations compassed me about: but in the name of the LORD will I destroy them.

11 They compassed me about; yea, they compassed me about: but in the name of the LORD I will destroy them.

12 They compassed me about like bees; they are quenched as the fire of thorns: for in the name of the LORD I will destroy them.

13 Thou hast thrust sore at me that I might fall: but the LORD helped me.

14 The LORD is my strength and song, and is become my salvation.

15 The voice of rejoicing and salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous: the right hand of the LORD doeth valiantly.

16 The right hand of the LORD is exalted: the right hand of the LORD doeth valiantly.

17 I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the LORD.

18 The LORD hath chastened me sore; but he hath not given me over unto death.

19 Open to me the gates of righteousness: I will go into them, and I will praise the LORD:

20 This gate of the LORD, into which the righteous shall enter.

21 I will praise thee: for thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation.

22 The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner.

23 This is the LORD's doing; it is marvellous in our eyes.

24 This is the day which the LORD hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it.

and therefore, though I have many enemies, I am not afraid of them: for, when he is for me, what disturbance can men, be they never so powerful, give me?

Ver. 7.] It is sufficient that the Lord, who hath done great things for me by weak instruments, is still aiding me: therefore I dare look the most malicious enemies in the face, and doubt not to see them turn their backs upon me (2 Sam. vii.).

Ver. 8.] This is my hope; and long experience hath taught me, that it is much safer to rely upon him, than upon the most numerous armies:

Ver. 9.] Far more safe to depend upon his help and protection (who, as he can do what he pleases, and is constant to his word, so never dies,) than to confide in the aid of the greatest princes; whose mind may change, or their forces fail, or they themselves, on a sudden, leave the world.

Ver. 10.] All the neighbouring nations round about (1 Sam. v. 17, &c.; vii. 1), combined with the Philistines to environ me; but, by the almighty power of the Lord, I was confident that I should hew them in pieces.

Ver. 11.] Again they made a new invasion, and beset me with stronger forces (2 Sam. v. 22, &c.), but still, by the almighty power of the Lord, I doubted not that I should cut them off, and utterly defeat them.

Ver. 12.] Though they were exceeding numerous, swarming about me like angry bees, and flaming with such rage and fury, as if they would presently consume me; yet it was but like the blaze of fire among thorns: for, by the almighty power of the Lord, I was confident I should destroy them.

Ver. 13.] They pressed me exceeding hard, and, as one man, conspired with all their might to throw me down from the throne, to which I was advanced; but though they shook it, and it was ready to fall, yet, by the help of the Lord, it was supported.

Ver. 14.] To him alone I ascribe my present happiness, saying, with our forefathers in their triumphant song (Exod. xv. 2), The Lord hath armed me with invincible strength; he, and he alone, is to be praised, who hath given me a most glorious deliverance.

Ver. 15.] Which comforts the hearts of all righteous men; whose houses sound with such joyful shouts of praise for my deliverance as these: The mighty power of the Lord hath done most stupendous things.

Ver. 16.] He hath made his mighty power to appear to be superior to all other; for not by man, but by that power we have again and again obtained illustrious victories over our enemies (2 Sam. xix. 9).

Ver. 17.] From whence I conclude, that I shall not fall into the hands of those that would take away my life; but still prolong it to declare what wonderful works the Lord hath done for me.

Ver. 18.] Who have let mine enemies have power to afflict me very sorely, but not to proceed so far as to destroy me.

Ver. 19.] No, instead of that, he hath brought me to his own house again, from which I was banished (1 Sam. xxvi. 19), where I will return thanks unto him: and therefore, O ye that minister in the tabernacle, open the gates at which the righteous enter into the courts of the Lord, that I may go in and make him my acknowledgments, for bringing me from a most forlorn condition to a throne.

Ver. 20.] This is the gate (which I behold and approach with joy) that leads to the courts of the Lord, at which the righteous shall enter together with me, and hear me say;

Ver. 21.] I will never cease to praise and acknowledge thy goodness. O Lord, who hast graciously heard my prayer, when I implored thy help, and delivered me out of all my distresses.

Ver. 22.] And let them bear a part with me in this my psalm of praise, saying; He whom the great men and rulers of the people rejected (1 Sam. xxvi. 19), as the builders of a house do a stone unfit to be employed in it, is now become our king; to whom we must all join ourselves, if we hope for safety: in whom we see a figure of that glorious king, who shall hereafter be in like manner refused (Luke xix. 14; xx. 17), and then by God exalted to be the Lord of all the world, and the foundation of all men's happiness (Acts iv. 11, 12).

Ver. 23.] This is the sole work of the Lord (not the effect of human counsels, who opposed and obstructed it), which surprises us with the greatest admiration, to see a despised person become on a sudden so renowned.

Ver. 24.] This is the happy day which the Lord himself hath made illustrious by his marvellous work; and which it becomes us to celebrate with joyful hearts, and with all outward expressions of gladness, for so great a benefit:

25 Save now, I beseech thee, O LORD: O LORD, I beseech thee, send now prosperity.

26 Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the LORD: we have blessed you out of the house of the LORD.

27 God is the LORD, which hath shewed us

Ver. 25.] Most humbly beseeching thee, O Lord, to preserve our king; and to advance and perpetuate his kingdom (especially the kingdom of Christ, which shall be welcomed into the world with these words, Matt. xxi. 9, &c.) It begins most gloriously; be pleased now, O Lord, to give it answerable success and prosperity.

Ver. 26.] Which acclamations of the people, let the priests of the Lord meet with their approbation, saying: Blessed be the king which is set over us by the divine appointment; and blessed be all the people who live under his happy government: we, whose office it is to minister to the Lord, give you his blessing from the holy place, into which you are come to worship him.

Ver. 27.] Who is the omnipotent Lord, most faithful to his promise; who hath put an end to our troubles, and made peace among us: O be not ungrateful light: bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar.

28 Thou art my God, and I will praise thee: thou art my God, I will exalt thee.

29 O give thanks unto the LORD; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.

to him, but solemnize this day with festival joys; bind your sacrifices with cords, and bring them to the corners of the altar, to be offered as testimonies of your love and thankfulness unto him.

Ver. 28.] And so for my part, I am resolved; who must own thee to be my most gracious God, and almighty deliverer; to whom therefore I will make continually my most thankful acknowledgments: to thy almighty goodness alone I owe this greatness to which I am promoted, and therefore I will never cease to speak the highest things I am able in thy praise.

Ver. 29.] And let all good men join together with me, and make their thankful acknowledgments to the great Lord of the world: who, as he is the author of all good, and hath been exceeding bountiful unto us; so will continue his kindness unto all succeeding generations.

PSALM CXIX.

ALEPH.

1 BLESSED are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the LORD.

PSALM CXIX.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm is contrived so artificially, that one would think, at first sight, it was made after the foregoing; when God had subdued the rest of David's enemies (2 Sam. viii. 10), and given him leisure for such curious composesures. For it is divided into as many parts as there are letters in the Hebrew alphabet, each part containing eight verses, and every one of those verses beginning with that letter wherewith that part begins. The verses, for instance, of the first part, all begin with alpha, or A; and all of the second with beth, or B, &c. And thence this Psalm is called in the Masora, The great alphabet; which is an indication that David was now in a very sedate condition, under no extraordinary motions, when he penned this Psalm; but quietly considered things as they were represented to his remembrance.

But when we observe how frequently he mentions his affliction, as lying actually upon him, now when he wrote these meditations, it forces us to conclude that it was penned during Saul's persecution: in which there were, I suppose, some quiet intervals (see ver. 54); either between the time that Saul (having his life given him by David) resolved to persecute him no more (1 Sam. xxiv.), and his renewed attempts to destroy him, upon the information the Ziphites again gave him (1 Sam. xxvi.): or after David's fresh demonstration of his loyalty to him, before he went to Gath: or while he was in that city, where he had liberty to meditate on the excellence of God's laws, and the happiness of those that kept them, and the comfort they were to him in his affliction; which he found to be so sweet and so great, that he begs of God little else, but that he might be more and more in love with them; which were already so much his delight, that he mentions them under one name or other in every verse of this Psalm, none excepted but one (ver. 122), or two at the most (ver. 90); where, he celebrating God's fidelity, which relates to the steadfastness of his promise (called in this Psalm his word), it may well be thought to be no exception to that observation.

I shall not be so curious as to examine the nice difference which is made by some, between laws, statutes, testimonies, judgments, precepts, &c., because they seem here to be used promiscuously; or if there be any peculiar meaning in some verses, I shall endeavour to express it plainly in the paraphrase.

Theodoret hath a conjecture concerning David's design in this Psalm (both in his preface to it, and upon ver. 157), which I shall mention, that the reader may take his choice. David, it is well known, had great varieties in his condition, for he both fled from enemies, and chased them; lived sometimes very melancholy, and again most pleasantly; ran into God's ways, and stumbled, and rose again to run that good course. Now all these things, saith he (and it is not improbable), David afterward collected into this one Psalm; "connecting all the prayers which he had made to God at several times, and on several occasions, and putting them together in this admirable meditation, divided into twenty-two parts, which propound one and the same most profitable lesson to all men: and teach them how it is possible to live virtuously in the worst condition. Nor doth he neglect dogmatical instruction (as he speaks); but adds it to the other: so that this Psalm is sufficient to perfect those that study exquisite virtue, and to stir up the diligence of those that are lazy; to comfort those that are sad; to correct the negligent; and, in one word, to afford all manner of medicines for the cure of the various diseases of mankind." And, if it would not have made this

ALEPH. PART I.

Ver. 1.] Happy, more happy than can be expressed, are those men, who do not take the liberty to live as they list ; but making the law of the Lord their rule, order their life in an exact conformity therewith.

Ver. 2.] The stricter they keep to that rule (wherein he hath testified his will unto us,) most heartily studying to please him, entirely devoting themselves to seek his favour in this way alone, the happier still they are.

Ver. 3.] Especially when they will not be tempted to do an evil action, though it were to gain the greatest good in this world ; but constantly adhere to him in the way which he hath prescribed them.

Ver. 4.] We are infinitely beholden to thee, therefore, O Lord, that thou hast obliged us to be so happy by requiring us to use our utmost diligence to observe thy precepts (which we ourselves know to be good for us) with all care and exactness.

Ver. 5.] O that I may ever be one of those happy men ! I have no greater wish than this ; that all the actions of my life may be ordered and governed according to thy will.

Ver. 6.] Then shall I never be disappointed of my hopes, nor blush at the crimes which are laid to my charge ; when my own conscience tells me, that there is not one of thy commandments but is ever before my eyes, as the rule of my actions :

Ver. 7.] And is so dear unto me, that nothing can give me such a joy as to have learnt effectually how just and how good they all are ; for which I will most sincerely thank thee, as the greatest benefit.

Ver. 8.] Deal with me according to the uprightness of my heart in this resolution ; that I will observe even those statutes for which I see no other reason but only thy will. O do not abandon me too far (1 Sam. xxvii. 1), but stick to me, as I purpose to do to thy statutes.

BETH. PART II.

Ver. 9.] But how shall a young man, such as I am (1 Sam. xxvii. 33 ; 2 Sam. v. 4), in an age that is prone to evil, be able to do as he resolves ? keeping himself so pure in all his ways, that they maintain an exact conformity unto thy word ?

Ver. 10.] First, I implore, with all my soul, thy 12 Blessed art thou, O Lord : teach me thy statutes.

13 With my lips have I declared all the judgments of thy mouth.

14 I have rejoiced in the way of thy testimonies, as much as in all riches.

15 I will meditate in thy precepts, and have respect unto thy ways.

16 I will delight myself in thy statutes : I will not forget thy word.

GIMEL.

17 Deal bountifully with thy servant, that I may live and keep thy word.

18 Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law.

19 I am a stranger in the earth : hide not thy commandments from me.

20 My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments at all times.

21 Thou hast rebuked the proud that are gracious assistance ; beseeching thee to afford me such a measure of it, that for want of those heavenly supplies I may not be drawn aside at any time from thy commandments.

Ver. 11.] Next, I have laid up thy word in my heart, as the most precious treasure ; hoping that will be a security to me, and preserve me from offending thee ; whose promises are no less comfortable, than thy threatenings are dreadful.

Ver. 12.] And I know also, that thou, O Lord, art kind, and dost not envy thy favours to any of us, but wilt for ever be praised for thy bounty towards us ; and therefore I expect that thou wilt hear my prayer, and enable me effectually to learn thy statutes.

Ver. 13.] On which I have so much set my heart, that I have not spared to declare to others the great regard I have to every thing which thou hast pronounced just, or condemned as unrighteous.

Ver. 14.] I can safely say, likewise, that I have taken more satisfaction, now that I am poor, in doing that which thou hast testified to be acceptable to thee, than I should in all the wealth of the world, were it heaped on me.

Ver. 15.] I will ruminate also often on thy precepts (which will be another means, I trust, to preserve me undefiled) : and never do any thing, but consider beforehand, how it agrees with the rules which thou hast prescribed me.

Ver. 16.] The study of thy statutes (see ver. 8), shall be my delight ; and I will not let slip any word of thine, but preserve it in faithful remembrance.

GIMEL. PART III.

Ver. 17.] Let these reasons move thee to deal graciously with me, who am devoted to thy service : render to me according to my integrity ; and let not my enemies take away my life, which I intend to employ in doing whatsoever thou hast commanded.

Ver. 18.] For which end, I beseech thee to illuminate the eyes of my mind, that I may clearly discern the admirable wisdom which discovers itself in thy law.

Ver. 19.] I am no better than a stranger in the land, wandering from place to place (1 Sam. xxiii. 13), and having no possessions : but do not let me want the knowledge of thy will ; and then I shall not think myself destitute of an inheritance.

Ver. 20.] For which my soul longs so vehemently, that I am not more broken with the hardships of my banishment, than with my continual labour and ear-cursed, which do err from thy commandments.

22 Remove from me reproach and contempt; for I have kept thy testimonies.

23 Princes also did sit and speak against me: but thy servant did meditate in thy statutes.

24 Thy testimonies also are my delight and my counsellors.

DALETH.

25 My soul cleaveth unto the dust: quicken thou me according to thy word.

26 I have declared my ways, and thou hearest me: teach me thy statutes.

27 Make me to understand the way of thy precepts; so shall I talk of thy wondrous works.

28 My soul melteth for heaviness: strengthen thou me according unto thy word.

29 Remove from me the way of lying: and grant me thy law graciously.

30 I have chosen the way of truth: thy judgments have I laid before me.

nest application of my mind, to have a full understanding of thy judgments.

Ver. 21.] According to which, thou hast already given a severe rebuke to those haughty men, who, without any respect to right or wrong, persecute and abuse thy servant (1 Sam. xxiv. 11, &c.; xxv. 10. 37), and the curse which thou hast pronounced (Deut. xxvii. 26), shall light on all such men as take the boldness to transgress those bounds which thou hast set them.

Ver. 22.] And thereby remove from me that disgrace and shame, unto which they expose me as a traitor to my king and country: for I am not guilty of any such wickedness; but carefully observe thy testimonies, ver. 14 (1 Chron. xii. 17).

Ver. 23.] Though the rulers and principal senators of the kingdom sat in consultation how to ruin me, declaring me guilty of the greatest crimes; the only care of thy servant hath been to study how to behave himself unblamably according to thy statutes.

Ver. 24.] Of which I have not been weary; but make the study of thy testimonies my recreation; and never took advice of any other counsellors.

DALETH. PART IV.

Ver. 25.] Consider, therefore, the forlorn condition wherein I lie, struggling for life, and utterly unable to help myself; and be pleased to revive and raise me out of it, according to thy promise (1 Sam. xvi. 12).

Ver. 26.] Thou knowest both my manner of life, and all the dangers to which I am exposed; for I have ever laid them before thee, and found thee ready on all occasions to assist and relieve me; and therefore I hope thou wilt not now leave me; but more perfectly instruct me in my duty, as the surest way to safety.

Ver. 27.] Give me such a right understanding, that I may ever be preserved in the way of thy precepts: then shall I escape the snares of my enemies; and my ordinary discourse shall be, what wonderful deliverances thou hast given me.

Ver. 28.] Pity my sad condition; and now that my heart sinks under the weight of my affliction, support and strengthen me according to thy promise; that I may never take any undue course for ease and relief.

Ver. 29.] Far be all fraud and falsehood from me, whereby my enemies contrive to undo me: I desire not to learn any of their wicked arts; but only be-

31 I have stuck unto thy testimonies: O Lord, put me not to shame.

32 I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart.

HE.

33 Teach me, O Lord, the way of thy statutes; and I shall keep it unto the end.

34 Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law; yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart.

35 Make me to go in the path of thy commandments; for therein do I delight.

36 Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness.

37 Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity; and quicken thou me in thy way.

38 Stablish thy word unto thy servant, who is devoted to thy fear.

39 Turn away my reproach which I fear: for thy judgments are good.

40 Behold, I have longed after thy precepts: quicken me in thy righteousness.

sech thee to give me grace to observe thy laws constantly.

Ver. 30.] That is the way I have resolved upon, to deal truly and sincerely; squaring all my actions according to thy judgments; which I have laid before me as the most equal rule of my life.

Ver. 31.] And hitherto I have kept my resolution, and never started from thy testimonies: preserve me, good Lord, that I may not hereafter disgrace myself, by doing any thing contrary to them; nor be disappointed of my hope, by falling into the hands of those that seek my ruin.

Ver. 32.] And when thou shalt have filled my heart with joy, by freeing me from those grievous straits, I will do thee better service; and be more forward cheerfully to execute all thy commandments.

HE. PART V.

Ver. 33.] Instruct me, therefore, good Lord, more and more in the right way of serving thee; and I will show myself most thankful for it, by keeping exactly to it all the days of my life.

Ver. 34.] Illuminate my mind to understand the excellence of thy law; and then I shall not only observe it, but set myself to do it with a watchful, impartial, and most affectionate diligence.

Ver. 35.] Be thou my leader and guide, that I may not stray from the path of thy commandments, wherein I find the greatest satisfaction.

Ver. 36.] Incline my heart always to seek its contentment in thy testimonies: and suffer it not to be drawn away by the desire of worldly goods, which, having no measure, is never satisfied.

Ver. 37.] Help me to overlook those empty honours and fading beauties which we are apt to behold with too much admiration, and with lively affections and vigorous endeavours, to persist in the pursuit of thy favour, in the way thou hast set before me.

Ver. 38.] And at last make good thy promise to thy servant (2 Sam. v. 2), who fears to do any thing to offend thee, though thereby he might win a crown.

Ver. 39.] Turn from me that disgrace, of which I cannot but be sometime afraid (1 Sam. xxvii. 1), and must certainly suffer, if I fall into my enemies' hands; for thou wilt proceed, I know, according to thy own judgments; which are all equitable, merciful, and gracious.

Ver. 40.] I appeal to thee, whether I have not a great zeal for thy precepts ; unto which I desire above all things to be conformed : let me not perish therefore in these troubles ; but in much mercy revive me, according to thy faithful promise.

VAV. PART VI.

Ver. 41.] To those infinite mercies of thine, which moved thee to make such gracious promises, I betake myself : and beseech thee to let me feel the happy effects of both in my deliverance.

Ver. 42.] So shall I be able to put to silence those that reproach me for my confidence in thee ; which they call a vain presumption ; but is an humble reliance on thy own gracious promises to me.

Ver. 43.] Which till thou art pleased to fulfil, do not so far abandon me, as to let me be disheartened in asserting their truth and faithfulness (which I am wont to oppose to all the threats of my enemies) : for my whole dependence is on this, that thou wilt not fail me ; but pronounce a righteous sentence for me.

Ver. 44.] And I for my part promise, when thou shalt be so gracious to me, not to suffer myself to grow more negligent in thy service ; but to be more careful than ever in the observance of thy laws, to the very end of my days.

Ver. 45.] For then I shall have no such encumbrances on me, as I now have in these straits and difficulties ; from which, when thou freest me, I will do my duty with the greater cheerfulness and joy ; for it is not liberty, no, nor a kingdom, that I seek, so much as better advantages to fulfil thy precepts.

Ver. 46.] Which I will not be ashamed to justify before the greatest persons in the world, to be the most excellent rule of life, and the best testimony of thy love to us ; and will do it with such reasons, that they shall never be able to disprove me.

Ver. 47.] Nor will I confute myself, by leading a voluptuous life ; when I have liberty to do as I list : but as I have hitherto preferred thy commandments before all other things, so then will I take the highest pleasure in them ;

Ver. 48.] Not only in their study ; but show the truth of my love to them, by a diligent and zealous practice of them : which shall be the end of my meditation in them.

Ver. 49.] Be pleased therefore, in due time, to perform the promise, which thou hast long ago made to 50 This is my comfort in my affliction : for thy word hath quickened me.

51 The proud have had me greatly in derision : yet have I not declined from thy law.

55 I have remembered thy name, O LORD, in the night, and have kept thy law.

56 This I had, because I kept thy precepts.

CHETH.

57 Thou art my portion, O LORD : I have said that I would keep thy words.

58 I intreated thy favour with my whole heart : be merciful unto me according to thy word.

thy servant (2 Sam. v. 2), and when I thought of no such thing, given me an assured hope of it (1 Sam. xvi. 11—13).

Ver. 50.] Which, as it hath been the occasion of many and great troubles to me, so hath comforted me under them all : and even when I despaired of safety, revived my spirit, and restored my courage to life again.

Ver. 51.] Though my insulting enemies mocked exceedingly at my hope, and, in the pride of their hearts, attempted by the most unjust means to destroy me ; it never moved me to imitate them, by taking any unlawful method for my preservation.

Ver. 52.] But I called to mind, O Lord, how, in all foregoing ages, thou hast suffered good men to fall into great calamities ; thereby to render them, at last, the more illustrious : and with this consideration also I comforted myself.

Ver. 53.] I have been seized, indeed, sometime with a horrible fear, when I thought what sort of men were my persecutors ; who stuck at nothing which would serve their ends, having no regard to right or wrong.

Ver. 54.] Yet in all my wanderings up and down, (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2, 5 ; xxiii. 13), I never tarried long in any place, but I passed the time delightfully, in composing some such song as this in praise of thy statutes.

Ver. 55.] When others were asleep, I was calling to mind how good, how powerful, and how faithful thou art ; and resolving with myself still to observe thy laws.

Ver. 56.] Which make those so happy that obey them, that I ascribe this sweet composure of mind, and cheerfulness of spirit, under all my grievous afflictions, to my strict observance of them.

CHETH. PART VIII.

Ver. 57.] I have no possessions in this world (1 Sam. xxvi. 19), which I see others greedily sharing among them ; but I do not think myself poor, as long as I have an interest in thy love, and in thy promises, O Lord : whose words I have resolved to keep as the greatest treasure.

Ver. 58.] For there is nothing comparable to thy favour ; which I have besought with the heartiest affection, and the most importunate prayers : and do again beseech thee to deal mercifully with me, according to thy repeated promises unto me.

Ver. 59.] For upon serious deliberation what course

60 I made haste, and delayed not to keep thy commandments.

61 The bands of the wicked have robbed me : but I have not forgotten thy law.

62 At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee because of thy righteous judgments.

63 I am a companion of all them that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts.

64 The earth, O LORD, is full of thy mercy : teach me thy statutes.

TETH.

65 Thou hast dealt well with thy servant, O LORD, according unto thy word.

of life it was best to take, I rejected all other, which with specious shows of worldly advantages would have seduced me, and determined to be guided wholly by thy testimonies.

Ver. 60.] And being thus resolved, I admitted no farther debate about it ; but instantly, without any delay, set myself to the strict observance of thy commandments.

Ver. 61.] Nor hath any thing been able to remove me from this resolution ; but though I have been beset with troops of wicked men, who stripped me of all I had (1 Sam. xxiii. 26), it did not make me forget my duty ; nor put me upon any unlawful means of being revenged of them (xxiv. 6, 7).

Ver. 62.] But have blessed thee both night and day, and arose at midnight to give thee thanks for those just and good laws, which thou hast taught me to observe.

Ver. 63.] Associating myself willingly with none but such as fear to offend thee, and do religiously observe thy precepts : who are all truly dear unto me.

Ver. 64.] And no other thing do I desire of thee, O Lord, whose kindness is so great that it dispenses its blessing plentifully throughout all the earth, but that thou wilt instruct me still to serve thee as I ought.

TETH. PART IX.

Ver. 65.] Many other benefits, I will thankfully acknowledge, O Lord, thou hast bestowed upon thy servant : with whom thou hast faithfully kept thy word.

Ver. 66.] And I am not ignorant of thy commandments, which, by thy grace, I have believed to be the only way to happiness : but still I need thy farther assistance, to give me a delightful taste and thorough sense of what I know ; which I beseech thee add to the rest of thy benefits I have received from thee.

Ver. 67.] And if it be necessary for this end to deprive me still of all other delights, I submit unto it : for I must confess I committed many errors before I was thus afflicted ; which, since, I have corrected, and grown more strictly observant of thy word.

Ver. 68.] Thou art in thy own nature kind and good ; and nothing else can proceed from thee, who designest our good even when thou afflictest us : take what methods thou pleasest with me ; only teach me effectually to do as thou wouldest have me.

70 Their heart is as fat as grease ; but I delight in thy law.

Ver. 69.] They that disdain to be tied to the common and plain rules of honesty, have taken a great deal of pains to invent a lie against me (1 Sam. xxiv. 9) : but as I am hitherto conscious of no such guilt, so I will always confute them by an impartial and most hearty observance of thy precepts.

Ver. 70.] Which gives me infinitely greater satisfaction in a poor starved condition, than all the dull delights of sense, which they enjoy, in the fullest plenty of worldly prosperity.

Ver. 71.] This they stupidly imagine is the only happiness ; but I can truly say, it was more happy for me that I was afflicted : for thereby I learnt to apply myself more seriously to thy statutes.

Ver. 72.] Whereby thy will is declared unto us by a voice from heaven (Exod. xx. 1), which I prefer before all the gold and silver in the kingdom.

JOD. PART X.

Ver. 73.] Desert me not, then, who am thine own workmanship ; that neither hath nor hopeth for any thing but from thy almighty power : and desires above all things to comprehend fully what thy will is, that he may obey it.

Ver. 74.] It will be a very great comfort and encouragement to all good men, when they see me delivered out of all these troubles ; for thereby they will be confirmed in their belief of thy faithfulness to thy promises ; on which it will appear I have not vainly depended, though I stayed long for the performance.

Ver. 75.] And I am satisfied, O Lord, that while thou makest me wait for the performance, thou doest nothing contrary to thy justice, or to thy fidelity : but that all these cross dispensations of thy providence, in the heavy afflictions which have befallen me, are perfectly righteous : and will only make thy truth and faithfulness at last the more illustrious.

Ver. 76.] O hasten that happy time ; when I shall see thy loving-kindness turning this disconsolate into a more comfortable condition ; according to the promises which thou hast made unto thy servant (1 Sam. xvi. 12, 13).

Ver. 77.] Let me feel the speedy effects of thy compassionate mercy ; rescuing me from those that seek my life, and raising me out of this forlorn estate (1 Sam. xxiv. 14). For howsoever I am represented, my highest satisfaction is in obedience to thy law.

CAPII.

81 My soul fainteth for thy salvation: but I hope in thy word.

83 For I am become like a bottle in the smoke; yet do I not forget thy statutes.

84 How many are the days of thy servant? when wilt thou execute judgment on them that persecute me?

85 The proud have digged pits for me, which are not after thy law.

86 All thy commandments are faithful: they persecute me wrongfully; help thou me.

Ver. 78.] Confound all those proud contemners of it, who, making no conscience of what they say, have oppressed and overthrown me with lies and calumnies; as if I studied to disturb the kingdom, when my only study is to observe thy precepts.

Ver. 79.] Let all pious men, who have a due regard to thy testimonies, be convinced of this; and be no longer abused by these slanders; but turn to my side and become my friends.

Ver. 80.] And in order to it preserve me so blameless before thee, in such integrity of heart as well as life, that I may not be ashamed of the hope I have, that thou and all good men will take my part.

CAPH. PART XI.

Ver. 81.] For which blessing I have now attended so many years, that I am ready some time to faint away with vehement desire to see thy long-expected promise fulfilled, of deliverance from all my enemies.

Ver. 82.] That joyful sight I have looked for, till I am in danger to be weary with expectation; saying, When will the time come of my deliverance from this disconsolate condition?

Ver. 83.] I hope it will not be long delayed; for I am worn away, and my skin (like an empty leathern bag, that hath hung a great while in the smoke) is shrivelled up with toil and grief; and yet I have never taken any unlawful course to rid myself of all this misery.

Ver. 84.] I leave that to thee, O Lord; beseeching thee to consider how my days spend apace in trouble and sorrow: which force me to sigh and say, How long must thy poor servant still lie in this calamitous condition? O when wilt thou do me right against my persecutors?

Ver. 85.] Who proudly contrive by all manner of frands and treachery to take away my life, directly contrary to thy law; to which they are as injurious as unto me.

Ver. 86.] For all thy commandments teach us to be just and true; being as faithful as those men are false and perfidious: therefore make good thy promises to me; and deliver me from those who persecute me with lies and forgeries.

Ver. 87.] Which they have employed so successfully, that I escaped very hardly with my life, when I was in the land of Judah (1 Sam. xxiii. 26), and yet, for all this, I stuck to thy precepts; and would not take away the life of him that sought mine, when I could have easily done it (xxiv. 6, 7).

Ver. 88.] Deal as kindly with me, O Lord; and not only spare my life, but raise me out of this forlorn estate, wherein I lie, like a man that is dead (1 Sam. xxiv. 11): and I will endeavour the more carefully to observe the testimonies which thou hast solemnly (ver. 72) given us in charge.

LAMED. PART XII.

Ver. 89.] Thou art eternal, O Lord, and changest not; and thy promises are, like thyself, fixed and settled in the heavens; which are a lively emblem of their constancy, and unvariable truth.

Ver. 90.] One generation goes, and another comes; but thy fidelity is still the same to all; and alters no more than the earth; which thou hast firmly and immovably established, while all those creatures that live upon it pass away and perish.

Ver. 91.] All things remain to this day in the order at first appointed; and never vary from the laws which thou hast set them: for they are entirely subject to thy will and pleasure.

Ver. 92.] Which was a most comfortable meditation in my afflicted condition: when my heart would have failed me, and I should have been undone; if thy laws (which stand as fast as heaven and earth) had not given me constant consolation.

Ver. 93.] I will never, therefore, be guilty of neglecting thy precepts: which have revived me (by thy faithful promises thou hast annexed to the observance of them), when I looked upon myself as a dead man that could not escape the hands of those that sought to destroy me.

Ver. 94.] And be thou pleased still to deliver me from falling into their hands: for though they have driven me from thy inheritance (1 Sam. xxvi. 19), I still continue thine, and serve no other God; but have diligently inquired, in my greatest dangers, what would be most pleasing to thee as most advantageous to myself.

Ver. 95.] Those wicked men, who are combined to destroy me, have long watched for an opportunity which they confidently expect to meet withal: but it doth not discourage my study of thy testimonies, as the best defence against their bloody attempts.

Ver. 96.] For had I greater forces than my enemies, alas! I never yet saw anything so complete, but, as it 97 O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day.

98 Thou through thy commandments hast made me wiser than mine enemies: for they are ever with me.

99 I have more understanding than all my teachers: for thy testimonies are my meditation.

100 I understand more than the ancients, because I keep thy precepts.

101 I have refrained my feet from every evil way, that I might keep thy word.

102 I have not departed from thy judgments: for thou hast taught me.

had its bounds and limits so it is exceeding frail; and when it is arrived at perfection, comes to a speedy end; whereas the wisdom which thou hast revealed to us hath infinite satisfaction in it, durable and lasting satisfaction; which never fails those that depend upon it.

MEM. PART XIII.

Ver. 97.] It is impossible to express the love I have to thy law; which entertains my meditations, or enables me to entertain others, with admirable variety, whole days together.

Ver. 98.] Mine enemies are very crafty, and use many artifices to destroy me: but, by observing thy commandments, I have defeated all their subtle devices, and confounded them, even by refusing (because thy commandments, which are ever before my eyes, restrain me), to be avenged on them (1 Sam. xxiv. 17, 18, &c.; xxvi. 21.)

Ver. 99.] I have outstripped all the doctors of the law, of whom I formerly learnt; and understand more perfectly than they, the best means of securing myself: because my mind is still employed in thy testimonies, as the rule of all my designs and undertakings.

Ver. 100.] Though I am but young, yet have I more understanding in things, than the judges and grave privy-councillors; because my maxim is, strictly to observe thy precepts.

Ver. 101.] Whatsoever advantage it promised me, I have never proceeded in any evil course to obtain my end: but refused the seeming gain; that I might not offend against thy word.

Ver. 102.] My respect to thee hath hindered me from doing any injury unto others: because I know thou art the author of those laws which forbid it; and in the observance of them, I have learnt, consists my happiness.

Ver. 103.] And a happiness it is, I feel already, incomparably above all other: the pleasure I take in every word of thine is inexpressibly far to be preferred before all the delights of sense, though never so sweet and luscious.

Ver. 104.] And by thy precepts I am so fully instructed how to behave myself, that I need not to betake myself to any dishonest ways, which I utterly abhor.

NUN. PART XIV

Ver. 105.] Thy word is my only guide; whose di-

106 I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments.

107 I am afflicted very much: quicken me, O Lord, according unto thy word.

108 Accept, I beseech thee, the freewill offerings of my mouth, O Lord, and teach me thy judgments.

109 My soul is continually in my hand: yet do I not forget thy law.

110 The wicked have laid a snare for me: yet I erred not from thy precepts.

111 Thy testimonies have I taken as an heritage for ever: for they are the rejoicing of my heart.

112 I have inclined mine heart to perform thy statutes alway, even unto the end.

SAMECH.

113 I hate vain thoughts: but thy law do I love.

114 Thou art my hiding place and my shield; I hope in thy word.

rections I follow in all the dark and difficult passages of my life.

Ver. 106.] I have solemnly resolved, and bound myself by the most sacred ties, which I will never break, but do now confirm, that I will carefully observe thy decrees, which I find to be both just and good.

Ver. 107.] I have suffered very much upon that account, and am still sorely afflicted; but I comfort myself, O Lord, with thy promise, according to which I beseech thee to deliver me from those that seek to destroy me; and raise me out of this forlorn condition, wherein I can scarce be said to live.

Ver. 108.] I have no other sacrifices that I am able in this exile to offer to thee, but these of prayer, and thankful acknowledgments, and vows of sincere and cheerful obedience; with which I do most freely and heartily present thee, O Lord: beseeching thee to teach me still more effectually thy judgments; that I may never fail to be conformed to thy will.

Ver. 109.] To which I have hitherto so closely adhered, that though I go in continual danger of my life (Judg. xii. 3), it doth not move me in the least (whatsoever shifts I am forced to make) to save myself by forsaking thy law.

Ver. 110.] They that make no conscience of their actions, have contrived a subtle plot to ruin me; but I have never stepped out of the way of thy precepts, to avoid the snares they have laid for me.

Ver. 111.] I had rather always continue as poor as I am, than do any thing against thy testimonies; which I hold to be my chiefest good and surest possession: out of which none can expel me; and which always yield me that inward satisfaction and joy which none can take from me.

Ver. 112.] This infinitely outweighs all other considerations; and hath inclined my heart to resolve to do always as thou biddest me (whatsoever I may lose by it), to the very end of my days.

SAMECH. PART XV.

Ver. 113.] I hate all double dealing, and crafty devices, that are not warranted by thy law: to which I have resolved to stick with hearty affection.

Ver. 114.] In that way I will trust to thee for safety and protection: having a firm hope that thou wilt be as good unto me as thy word.

115 Depart from me, ye evildoers : for I will keep the commandments of my God.

116 Uphold me according unto thy word, that I may live : and let me not be ashamed of my hope.

117 Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe : and I will have respect unto thy statutes continually.

118 Thou hast trodden down all them that err from thy statutes : for their deceit is falsehood.

119 Thou puttest away all the wicked of the earth like dross : therefore I love thy testimonies.

120 My flesh trembleth for fear of thee ; and I am afraid of thy judgments.

AIN.

121 I have done judgment and justice : leave me not to mine oppressors.

122 Be surety for thy servant for good : let not the proud oppress me.

123 Mine eyes fail for thy salvation, and for the word of thy righteousness.

124 Deal with thy servant according unto thy mercy, and teach me thy statutes.

Ver. 115.] Do not persuade me any longer, O ye evil-doers, to join with you ; but get you gone from me : for I will follow none of your counsels ; but strictly observe the commandments of my God, who hath hitherto most graciously delivered me.

Ver. 116.] And on whom I still depend, that thou wilt support me, O Lord, according to thy promise, against all the assaults of my enemies that seek my life : and not let me be ashamed of the hope and expectation I have, that thou wilt defend and deliver me.

Ver. 117.] Be thou my support in this weak condition, I humbly again beseech thee : and then they shall not be able to throw me down ; but in safety and security I shall make thy statutes my perpetual study.

Ver. 118.] They shall fall to the ground, and not I ; for thou art wont, I observe, to abase and lay as low as the mire in the streets all those who presume to go out of the plain way of thy statutes ; for all their crafty tricks and crooked arts, on which they rely, at last prove false unto them and deceive them.

Ver. 119.] Thou castest all such wicked men out of the land like dross, that is good for nothing, which makes me addict myself, with the greater love, unto thy testimonies.

Ver. 120.] Trembling all over with fear lest I should by any disobedience to thee incur thy severe displeasure ; and dreading above all things thy judgments : which are threatened in the law, and which I see executed upon the contemners of it.

AIN. PART XVI.

Ver. 121.] This pious fear laid such a restraint upon me, that I never did any wrong to them, nor so much as dealt hardly with them, that now injure me : therefore suffer me not to fall into the hands of those who oppress me with their calumnies.

Ver. 122.] Their pride is great, and, having power equal to their malice, they hope to prevail over me ; but do thou graciously undertake my protection, and be my security against the mischief they design me ; that instead of being my ruin, their calumnies may turn to my greater good and advantage.

Ver. 123.] I believe they will ; but I have looked so long for that happy time, when thou wilt deliver me (and yet am still in apparent danger to fall into the hands of my enemies), that I am almost tired with 126 It is time for thee, LORD, to work : for they have made void thy law.

127 Therefore I love thy commandments above gold ; yea, above fine gold.

128 Therefore I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right ; and I hate every false way.

PE.

129 Thy testimonies are wonderful : therefore doth my soul keep them.

130 The entrance of thy words giveth light ; it giveth understanding unto the simple.

131 I opened my mouth, and panted : for I longed for thy commandments.

expectance of thy promise ; though I know it is faithful and true, and shall certainly be performed.

Ver. 124.] Pity my infirmity, and in much mercy send speedy relief unto thy servant ; and in the mean time instruct me more perfectly in thy statutes ; that I may make the better use of that deliverance.

Ver. 125.] I am devoted to thy service, and designed by thee to a high employment : enlighten my understanding therefore, that I may fully know my duty.

Ver. 126.] For now is the time to do all I can for the Lord (who may be pleased then to take this opportunity to perform his promise), when wicked men not only transgress, but are so profane that they reject, and would wholly lay aside, thy law.

Ver. 127.] This inflames my zeal, and heightens my love to thy commandments, which I value far more than all the riches in the world ; which shall not tempt me to violate one of them, or suffer them, if I can help it, to be contemned by others.

Ver. 128.] For the more I consider them, the more I approve every one of them (as the exactest and best rule whereby I square all my actions), and abhor all those base and dishonest ways whereby others study to advance themselves to riches and honours.

PE. PART XVII.

Ver. 129.] I cannot sufficiently admire and extol the excellent wisdom also of thy laws, whereby thou hast testified thy will unto us ; which makes me the more careful faithfully to observe them.

Ver. 130.] When a man doth but begin to be acquainted with thy word, he finds his mind marvelously enlightened with such clear and useful knowledge, as directs the most simple people how to live happy.

Ver. 131.] Which hath excited me to the most eager pursuit of this most excellent wisdom ; for I longed to have a perfect understanding of thy commandments, which at first sight affords such abundant satisfaction.

Ver. 132.] Favour my desires, I most humbly beseech thee ; and vouchsafe me the same grace which thou art wont to bestow on those that sincerely love thee, and study, as I do, thy honour and glory.

Ver. 133.] And first of all enable me to walk steadily, according to the rule of thy word, that I may not be a slave to any sin whatsoever.

134 Deliver me from the oppression of man: so will I keep thy precepts.

135 Make thy face to shine upon thy servant; and teach me thy statutes.

136 Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law.

TZADDI.

137 Righteous art thou, O LORD, and upright are thy judgments.

138 Thy testimonies that thou hast commanded are righteous and very faithful.

139 My zeal hath consumed me, because mine enemies have forgotten thy words.

140 Thy word is very pure: therefore thy servant loveth it.

141 I am small and despised: yet do not I forget thy precepts.

142 Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness, and thy law is the truth.

143 Trouble and anguish have taken hold of me: yet thy commandments are my delights.

144 The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting: give me understanding, and I shall live.

KOPH.

145 I cried with my whole heart; hear me, O LORD: I will keep thy statutes.

146 I cried unto thee; save me, and I shall keep thy testimonies.

147 I prevented the dawning of the morning, and cried: I hoped in thy word.

148 Mine eyes prevent the night watches, that I might meditate in thy word.

149 Hear my voice according unto thy loving-kindness: O LORD, quicken me according to thy judgment.

150 They draw nigh that follow after mischief: they are far from thy law.

151 Thou art near, O LORD; and all thy commandments are truth.

152 Concerning thy testimonies, I have known of old that thou hast founded them for ever.

RESH.

153 Consider mine affliction, and deliver me: for I do not forget thy law.

Ver. 134.] And then deliver me from the oppression of him (1 Sam. xxvi. 24), who unjustly seeks to destroy me; that I may have the greater liberty to study and observe thy precepts.

Ver. 135.] Put an end to the troubles of thy servant, who is devoted to thy obedience; and for this reason, above all others, desires to see better days, that he may have better opportunities to learn thy statutes.

Ver. 136.] Which it is a very great grief to me, to behold so universally neglected; and hath cost me many a tear, when I consider, not merely the persecution which I suffer, but how thereby my enemies violate thy law.

TZADDI. PART XVIII.

Ver. 137.] I leave it to thee, O Lord, to redress these evils; who art both just and good, and governest all things with an unerring equity.

Ver. 138.] For as all the laws thou hast given us are perfectly righteous; so thou dost exactly and most faithfully fulfil all the promises or threatenings which thou hast made to the observers, or against the breakers, of them.

Ver. 139.] The consideration of which moves my indignation to such a degree, that I am tormented to see my enemies so forgetful of their own interest, as not to regard thy words.

Ver. 140.] Which I know to be infallibly true, and perfectly free from all falsehood and deceit: which is the reason of that ardent affection thy servant hath unto them.

Ver. 141.] Which will not suffer me, though I am mean and contemptible in the eyes of my enemies (who are honourable and mighty), to be guilty of neglecting any of thy precepts.

Ver. 142.] For still I think with myself, that thy justice, goodness, and fidelity, are unchangeable; and whatsoever thou hast said in thy law is the very truth; upon which we may certainly depend, and never be deceived.

Ver. 143.] And therefore, though I am unexpectedly (1 Sam. xx. 3) involved in very sore straits and difficulties, yet I do not forsake, but find great consolation in the study of thy commandments.

Ver. 144.] Especially in this consideration (which comes often into my mind, ver. 142), that all the declarations thou hast made of thy will to us are so just and true, that they will never fail our expectation: O give me wisdom to order my life according to them! and then it shall not be in the power of my enemies to make me miserable.

KOPH. PART XIX.

Ver. 145.] I have besought thy favour in this sorrowful and distressed condition, with most vehement cries and hearty affection; be pleased to rescue me out of it, O Lord, and I promise with the greater care to observe thy statutes.

Ver. 146.] I have made it my constant business to cry unto thee for help; from whom alone I seek it: deliver me, I again beseech thee, and I will not fail to make good my promise of observing thy testimonies.

Ver. 147.] I have sent up early cries unto thee, before the morning-light appeared: constantly expecting the performance of thy promise to me.

Ver. 148.] Nor have I been less forward in the study of my duty than in the imploring of thy mercy; but have awaked before all the watches were set, to meditate in thy word.

Ver. 149.] Let my prayer prevail with thee, O Lord, for that favour and kindness which I have oft experienced; and preserve my life, as thou hast done hitherto, by such means as thou judgest best for me.

Ver. 150.] I am closely beset, thou seest, and in danger to be seized (1 Sam. xxiii. 26), by those who, as they persecute me, and seek my ruin, so care not by what wicked arts they compass their design: for they have no regard at all to thy law.

Ver. 151.] My only comfort is, that they cannot approach so near to hurt me, as thou, O Lord, art to defend and preserve me; and that all thy promises annexed to thy commandments (still I think of that, ver. 142) shall faithfully be fulfilled.

Ver. 152.] This hath ever been my support, long before I fell into these troubles; that whatsoever thou hast testified to be thy will and pleasure, is firm and steadfast, and shall never fail those that depend upon it (ver. 144).

RESH. PART XX.

Ver. 153.] Show then that thou dost not neglect

154 Plead my cause, and deliver me : quicken me according to thy word.

155 Salvation is far from the wicked : for they seek not thy statutes.

156 Great are thy tender mercies, O LORD : quicken me according to thy judgments.

157 Many are my persecutors and mine enemies ; yet do I not decline from thy testimonies.

158 I beheld the transgressors, and was grieved ; because they kept not thy word.

159 Consider how I love thy precepts ; quicken me, O LORD, according to thy lovingkindness.

160 Thy word is true from the beginning : and every one of thy righteous judgments endureth for ever.

me ; but art as mindful of me, as I am of thy law in this afflicted condition, out of which I beseech thee to deliver me ; for none of the evils that have befallen me have made me forget my duty to thee.

Ver. 154.] I appeal to thee, whether I have not a righteous cause ; beseeching thee to do me justice upon mine enemies (1 Sam. xxiv. 15), and rescue me from their persecutions : for I am in great danger of perishing, but depend upon thy promise for my safety.

Ver. 155.] Far be from thee to afford any help to the wicked : for they have no regard to thy statutes ; but seek only how they may satisfy their own lewd and cruel desires.

Ver. 156.] To which I oppose the bowels of thy compassion, O Lord, whose tender mercies are many and great : and will preserve my life, I hope, according to thy wonted care over me, and kindness to me (ver. 149).

Ver. 157.] I am not discouraged, either by the number or the strength (which are both very great) of those that persecute me with a deadly enmity : which doth not move me in the least to depart from thy testimonies (Lev. xix. 18), by seeking their destruction as they do mine (Lev. xxiv. xxvi.).

Ver. 158.] It only provokes my sorrow, to see that there is no faith, nor truth, nor gratitude, in them (1 Sam. xxiv. 17, &c. ; xxvi. 2), and troubles me beyond measure, that they have no regard to what thou commandest or forbiddest.

Ver. 159.] Such is the love I have to thy precepts ; which I beseech thee, let the world see thou dost observe : and both preserve my life, O Lord, and, according to the exceeding greatness of thy goodness, deliver me out of this sad condition.

Ver. 160.] As I doubt not thou wilt ; for none of thy promises have ever failed : but the very first of them, which thou madest to our forefather Abraham (Gen. xii. 2), hath been faithfully fulfilled ; and so shall every thing else, which thou hast resolved and declared to be thy will, be punctually performed to the end of the world.

SCHIN. PART XXII.

Ver. 161.] The rulers and prime counsellors of the kingdom persecute me, for pretended crimes, of which as I am not guilty ; so I do not fear so much what they can do against me, as lest I should do any thing in my own vindication against thy word (1 Sam. xxiv. 6 ; xxvi. 9).

Ver. 163.] I would not purchase my liberty, my peace, or the honour they enjoy, by any unlawful actions : for I take far more delight in doing thy will, and in what thou hast promised to do for me, than in the completest victory over all my enemies.

Ver. 163.] I hate all fraud and deceit ; even to the degree of abhorrence and abomination : but most heartily love these honest courses to which thy law directs me.

Ver. 164.] It is the subject of my perpetual thanks and praise, that I have the happiness to be acquainted with the justice and goodness of those laws, whereby thou governest us.

Ver. 165.] The observance of which gives such inward satisfaction, and brings so many and great blessings to those who truly love them, that they take all things which befall them in good part ; and nothing will tempt them to turn aside and leave those virtuous paths wherein they lead them.

Ver. 166.] I have met with the most grievous discouragements : but, Lord, in the midst of the greatest straits I have expected deliverance only from thee ; and never done any thing, for my preservation, contrary to thy commandments.

Ver. 167.] All my care hath been still most heartily to observe thy testimonies : which I prefer infinitely before all earthly enjoyments.

Ver. 168.] There is not one of thy laws, of any sort, but I have carefully observed ; even then when I might have privily broken them, and been a gainer by it (1 Sam. xxiv. 4, &c.) : for I knew that nothing can be done so secretly but thou art perfectly acquainted with it.

TAU. PART XXII.

Ver. 169.] As thou art also with my most earnest petitions ; to which, I beseech, thee, O Lord, vouchsafe a gracious answer : and in the first place teach me, according as thou hast promised, to walk, not only innocently, but prudently, in the midst of all the snares that are laid for me.

Ver. 170.] Do not deny admittance to this humble suit ; but in due time grant this farther request : that I may, according to the same promise, be perfectly delivered from this long persecution.

Ver. 171.] Then will I praise thee without ceasing ;

172 My tongue shall speak of thy word: for all thy commandments are righteousness.

173 Let thine hand help me; for I have chosen thy precepts.

174 I have longed for thy salvation, O LORD; and thy law is my delight.

first, for instructing me how to please thee in all things;

Ver. 172.] And next, for fulfilling thy promise to me: which I will loudly proclaim with my thankful acknowledgments; that whatsoever thou hast said is truly and faithfully performed.

Ver. 173.] Let thy divine power therefore succour me in this weak and distressed condition wherein I am; for I rely on that alone; having resolved to be guided wholly by thy precepts.

Ver. 174.] And I have long expected, with most ardent desires, thy help, O LORD, for my deliverance: delighting myself, in the mean time, in thy laws; while thou art pleased to delay it.

Ver. 175.] O let me not perish in these straits

175 Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee; and let thy judgments help me.

176 I have gone astray like a lost sheep; seek thy servant; for I do not forget thy commandments.

wherein I am involved; but spare my life, according to thy wonted kindness, and I will spend it in thy praises: send me relief, by executing the judgments thou hast decreed against my enemies.

Ver. 176.] Who have so chased me from place to place during this tedious banishment; that, like a wandering sheep, which hath lost its way, I know not whither to betake myself for safety: but be thou pleased, like a careful shepherd, to look after me, and to put thy servant into the right way of escaping all the dangers to which I am exposed, and of recovering my liberty, rest, and peace again: for, how hard soever my condition hath been (I can still seriously profess it) I have not been careless in the observance of thy commandments.

PSALM CXX.

A Song of degrees.

1 IN my distress I cried unto the LORD, and he heard me.

2 Deliver my soul, O LORD, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue.

3 What shall be given unto thee? or what shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue?

4 Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper.

5 Woe is me, that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar!

6 My soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace.

7 I am for peace: but when I speak, they are for war.

PSALM CXX.

ARGUMENT.—There can no certain account be given, why this and fourteen other psalms, which follow, are called songs of degrees, or ascents. Their conjecture seems to me most probable, who think the title denotes, either the elevation of the voice in the singing these songs, or the excellence of the composure, or of the music to which they were set, or the high esteem they had of them upon some account or other; particularly because they were so fit for their use (though most of them composed in former times), at and after their return from the captivity of Babylon. Then, some think, this title was given to them because they sang them as they went up to their own country again.

But this present psalm seems to have been made by David, when the calumnies of Doeg, and others, forced him to flee his country, and to go as far as the Kedarens, or Arabians, (ver. 5), whose company was very irksome to him. We do not read, indeed, in his history that he was there: but we may well think he sought for safety in more places than are particularly mentioned; and might as well be there, as among the Moabites, and in the wilderness of Paran (1 Sam. xxv. 1), which was not far from them. As for Mesech, I take that to signify not a place, but the length of time which he stayed there, before he durst stir from thence; or which he was forced to spend in exile; as all the ancient interpreters, except one, understand it (See Bochart, in his Phaleg. lib. iii. cap. 12).

Ver. 1.] I have had frequent experience of the goodness of the Lord; who, when I have earnestly implored his help in my straits and difficulties, hath constantly relieved me.

Ver. 2.] May it please thee, O LORD, still to continue thy mercy towards me: and now that men strike at my life, by calumnies and cunningly-devised lies (1 Sam. xxii. 9; xxiv. 9), to preserve me from the danger into which they have thrown me.

Ver. 3.] O thou false accuser! what dost thou hope to get by these specious tales which thou hast forged? What will they add to that heap of wealth which thou treasurest up? (Ps. lii. 7.)

Ver. 4.] They shall be so far from turning to thy advantage, that they shall prove thy undoing: for the mighty Lord (whom none can resist) shall take a sharp and a swift vengeance on thee; which shall never cease, till it hath utterly consumed thee.

Ver. 5.] For it is but fit thou shouldst smart for the mischief thou hast done, under which I groan most sadly; not only in a tedious banishment from my own country, but in that I am forced to seek for shelter among the barbarous Arabs.

Ver. 6.] Where my mind cannot but perpetually reflect upon the implacable spirit of my enemies; whose bitter hatred will not suffer them to come to any terms of agreement.

Ver. 7.] As I never gave them the least offence, so there is nothing that I more vehemently desire than peace and reconciliation; but when I make a motion of it, they are the more exasperated: and, as if I distrusted my cause, or craftily sought advantage by a treaty, betake themselves more fiercely and resolutely to their arms.

PSALM CXXI.

A Song of degrees.

1 I WILL lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help.

2 My help cometh from the LORD, which made heaven and earth.

3 He will not suffer thy foot to be moved: he that keepeth thee will not slumber.

4 Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep.

5 The LORD is thy keeper: the LORD is thy shade upon thy right hand.

6 The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night.

7 The LORD shall preserve thee from all evil: he shall preserve thy soul.

8 The LORD shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even forevermore.

PSALM CXXI.

ARGUMENT.—If David was the author of this psalm, (and to whom can we with so much likelihood ascribe it?) it is an expression of the high trust and confidence which he reposed in God, when he was in great straits, and saw no hope of human help: being either environed by Saul's forces, or pursued by his son Absalom. It is hard to say to which it belongs; but if by hills in the first verse we understand Zion and Moriah, where David's palace and the ark of God were placed; then it must be referred to the latter: for Zion was not theirs, during Saul's persecution.

There are those, indeed, who, following Kimchi, take the first verse to be a military form of speech; and supposed David to have looked round about him, as a captain in danger doth, to see if he could spy any assistance coming to him down the neighbouring hills wherewith he was encompassed. But the other sense seems to me more simple; which therefore I have followed: though, if we should adhere to that conjecture, still it will best agree to the distress into which Absalom had reduced him. For then he might well look to see if any of his subjects, continuing their fidelity to him, would appear to defend him. Why called a song of degrees, see Ps. cxx.

Ver. 1.] Though I am driven not only from my own palace, but from God's dwelling-place (2 Sam. xv. 14, 25), yet my eyes shall be ever directed thitherward: from whence I expect a powerful aid against those numerous enemies that are combined to destroy me.

Ver. 2.] I have no dependence on any other help, but wait for deliverance wholly from the presence of the Lord: to whom all creatures are subject, and who hath angels at his command, to send to the succour of his servants; for he made the heaven as well as the earth.

Ver. 3.] And methinks I hear his ministers calling to me out of his holy place, and saying, Fear not, since thou hast placed thy confidence in the Lord alone, he will not let thee be subverted: thou hast a stronger guard than the most valiant army would be to thee; for they may be tired and fall asleep, but he that hath thee in his custody will exercise a most unwearied care over thee.

Ver. 4.] Be confident of it; he that is the protector of all good men, will never in the least neglect thee; much less abandon the care of thee: but, by a most watchful providence, keep thee in safety.

Ver. 5.] The omnipotent Lord of the world is thy guardian; the very same Lord that covered your forefathers with a glorious cloud (Exod. xiii. 21), is always present with thee, to defend and assist thee against all the enemies that assault thee.

Ver. 6.] Be not troubled that thou art forced to take up thy quarters in the open field: for the sun shall do thee no hurt by its vehement heat in the day, nor the moon by its cold and moisture in the night (2 Sam. xvii. 1, 6, 22.)

Ver. 7.] The Lord shall preserve thee from all manner of harm: he will preserve thy life, and not suffer thee to fall into the hands of those that contrive to take it away (2 Sam. xvii. 1, 2, 11.)

Ver. 8.] The Lord shall secure thee whithersoever thou marchest; and prosper thee all along in thy undertakings, either abroad or within doors: not only now, but in all future times, to the end of thy days.

PSALM CXXII.

A Song of degrees of David.

I I WAS glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the LORD.

2 Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem.

PSALM CXXII.

ARGUMENT.—The title satisfies us that David was the author of this Psalm: who having settled the ark (which before had no certain place) at Jerusalem, and being at that time, upon some occasion, in the country, heard the good people there speak one to another, as some of them did to him, of going to worship God, at some of the three solemn feasts: which devotion of theirs, as it rejoiced his heart, so it moved him, I conjecture, to compose this Psalm, for their use, at such times.

If the Talmudists may be believed, they were wont to sing the first verse of this Psalm as they went out of the country towards Jerusalem, carrying their first-fruits to the house of the Lord; as the law (Dent. xxvi. 2) directed them: and when they entered within the gates of the city, they sang the second verse. There they were met by some of the citizens, who, if this be true, sang the rest of the Psalm, it is likely, together with them, as they went towards the temple. Of this custom Mr. Selden treats, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 13. Of a song of degrees, see Ps. cxx.

3 Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together:

4 Whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the LORD, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the LORD.

5 For there are set thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David.

Ver. 1.] I was exceedingly pleased with the cheerful devotion of those who came unto me, before the approaching feast, and said, Let us go and pay our thankful acknowledgments to the Lord in the place where he dwells, and makes himself present among us.

Ver. 2.] Which motion ought to be the more readily embraced, because now he hath fixed his habitation: and we need not travel farther than Jerusalem, to inquire after the ark of his presence.

Ver. 3.] To Jerusalem, I say, that fair and beautiful city, whose buildings do not now lie scattered and divided: but are all compacted, and united together (as we ought to be) in a goodly order (1 Sam. v. 9; 1 Chron. xi. 8).

Ver. 4.] Thither all the twelve tribes of Israel, who own the great Lord for their God, go up from all the parts of the country, by his special commandment (Exod. xxiii. 17), to acknowledge, before the ark of his testimony (xxv. 21, 22), all the benefits they have received from his almighty goodness; and this above the rest, that he thereby testifies his singular care and providence over them.

Ver. 5.] Thither also they repair for justice; for 6 Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: they shall prosper that love thee.

7 Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces.

8 For my brethren and companions' sakes, I will now say, Peace be within thee.

9 Because of the house of the LORD our God I will seek thy good.

the supreme judicatory of the kingdom sits here (2 Chron. xix. 8), and there is the seat of the royal family (where David and his sons have their residence, and govern the people, (2 Sam. viii. 15, 18).

Ver. 6.] O let this be part of your devout prayers, when you come there; that God would preserve Jerusalem in peace: happy shall they be, who, out of love to the religion and justice which are administered in thee (O beloved city), contribute their endeavours, as well as their prayers, for thy safety and prosperity.

Ver. 7.] Let no enemy (this shall be my constant prayer) approach so much as to thy outworks to disturb thee; and let plenty of all good things abound within thy palaces.

Ver. 8.] The kindness I have for my kindred, and my neighbours and friends, whether in the city or the country, will not let me cease my earnest prayers to God, that he will confer his blessings on thee.

Ver. 9.] But above all, the love I have to the Lord our God, whose house is here (whither all his devout servants resort to worship him, and celebrate his name), shall excite not only my prayers, but my study, to promote thy welfare.

PSALM CXXIII.

A Song of degrees.

1 UNTO thee lift I up mine eyes, O thou that dwellest in the heavens.

2 Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the LORD our God, until that he have mercy upon us.

PSALM CXXIII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, it is certain, was composed in a time of great distress; when they were extremely afflicted by some haughty and insolent enemies (ver. 3, 4). Who those enemies were there are several conjectures; and I will add mine: that this short form of prayer was made by some pious person, when the king of Assyria (whose pride the prophet Isaiah describes viii. 7, and many other places) sent Rab-shakeh, and other of his captains, to besiege Jerusalem: where they poured out most contemptuous, nay, blasphemous words, against God and his people (2 Kings xviii; xix.). It is probable, if this conjecture be admitted, that it is made by Isaiah, whom Hezekiah desired to lift up his prayers for the remnant that was left (2 Kings xix. 4; Isa. xxxvii. 4). Accordingly we read (2 Chron. xxxii. 20), both he and Hezekiah cried unto the Lord: and, we may suppose, lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said these words.

Ver. 1.] Though all human help fail us in this sore

3 Have mercy upon us, O LORD, have mercy upon us: for we are exceedingly filled with contempt.

4 Our soul is exceedingly filled with the scorning of those that are at ease, and with the contempt of the proud.

distress; yet I do not despair of relief from thee, O Lord: whose majesty and power incomparably excel all earthly monarchs.

Ver. 2.] Behold, how, not only I, but the rest of thy faithful people, wait upon thee: submitting ourselves to this severe punishment, as poor slaves do to the stroke of their offended master or mistress; and resolving to bear it patiently, till thou our Lord, who dost inflict it, wilt be pleased to show thyself our most gracious God; and in much pity towards us remove it.

Ver. 3.] O be gracious unto us, good Lord, be gracious unto us; and in much mercy take away this heavy scourge from us: for we are become so beyond all measure contemptible (2 Kings xviii. 23, 24; xix. 34), that we can scarce any longer endure it.

Ver. 4.] We have a long time groaned under the intolerable load of the derision and contempt of those whose constant prosperity puffs them up with pride; nay, makes them insolently oppress all those who are unable to resist them.

PSALM CXXIV.

A Song of degrees of David.

1 IF it had not been the LORD who was on our side, now may Israel say;

2 If it had not been the LORD who was on our side, when men rose up against us:

3 Then they had swallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us:

4 Then the waters had overwhelmed us, the stream had gone over our soul:

5 Then the proud waters had gone over our soul.

6 Blessed be the LORD, who hath not given us as a prey to their teeth.

7 Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped.

8 Our help is in the name of the LORD, who made heaven and earth.

PSALM CXXIV.

ARGUMENT.—If the title had not told us that this is a Psalm of David's, I should have thought it had been composed by the author of the former; to acknowledge the wonderful power and goodness of God in delivering them from Sennacherib's army; which came in like a flood (Isa. lix. 19), and had overthrown all the country as far as Jerusalem (viii. 7, 8), which might well make them be called proud waters (as the psalmist here speaks, ver. 5), because they fancied nothing could stand before them. Such it seems were, either the Philistines, upon whom, when they spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim, the Lord broke forth as a breach of waters (2 Sam. v. 19), or the Ammonites and their associates (x. 6, 15, 16). Of A song of degrees, see Ps. cxx.

Ver. 1.] If we had not had such a mighty helper as the Lord, who took our part, may Israel now most thankfully acknowledge;

Ver. 2.] If it had not been the Lord (whom none can resist) who took our part, when such numerous enemies united their forces, as one man, to make war upon us:

Ver. 3.) They would then have made but one morsel of our small army: and in the furious rage wherein they were, have immediately devoured us; as monstrous beasts do their prey, which they greedily swallow down alive.

Ver. 4.] Then they would have overrun all the country like a violent torrent: and we should have been buried in the flood.

Ver. 5.] Having once made a wide breach, by the overthrow of our army, they would have poured in more numerous forces upon us: till, like an inundation of water, which swells more and more, they had wholly overwhelmed us.

Ver. 6.] Thanks be to the Lord, to whose infinite mercies we ought to ascribe it; that he hath not permitted them to domineer over us, and execute their cruel intentions against us.

Ver. 7.] They thought they had laid their design so strongly, that we could not escape; no more than a little bird, which a fowler hath taken in his snare: but, blessed be the Lord, who hath assisted our weakness, their plot is defeated, they are broken in pieces; and we thereby most wonderfully delivered.

Ver. 8.] This was not a work of our wit, no more than of our power; nor were we beholden to the help of any of our neighbours; but we owe it wholly to his almighty goodness; who commands, because he made, all creatures: in whom we ought to place our confidence for ever.

PSALM CXXV.

A Song of degrees.

1 THEY that trust in the LORD shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever.

2 As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the LORD is round about his people from henceforth even for ever.

3 For the rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous; lest the righteous put forth their hands unto iniquity.

4 Do good, O LORD, unto those that be good, and to them that are upright in their hearts.

PSALM CXXV.

ARGUMENT.—We may well look upon this Psalm as a pious exhortation to the people to trust in God; when Sennacherib's army threatened to destroy Jerusalem. And perhaps these were some of the comfortable words which we read, 2 Chron. xxxii. 6—8. Hezekiah then spake to them; when God chastised them by that rod of anger (as he calls Sennacherib, Isa. x. 5), which the psalmist here foretold (ver. 3) should not long afflict them. Of A song of degrees, see Ps. cxx.

Ver. 1.] There are none so safe as they that repose a pious confidence in the Lord: by which they shall both maintain themselves in a settled peace and tranquility; and remain for ever, as unmovable, conspicuous, and illustrious, as mount Zion.

Ver. 2.] For as Jerusalem is surrounded with high hills, which make it not easily accessible by any enemies, so the divine providence encompasses his people who depend upon him, to guard and defend them from all dangers; not only now, but in all succeeding ages, to the end of the world.

Ver. 3.] The power of wicked tyrants, indeed, may heavily afflict the righteous for a time: but they shall not always harass their country, nor continue their oppression so long, as quite to tire out the patience of the righteous, and tempt them to forsake their pious confidence in him, and lay hold on any means, though never so unjust, of obtaining deliverance.

5 As for such as turn aside unto their crooked ways, the LORD shall lead them forth with the workers of iniquity: but peace shall be upon Israel.

Ver. 4.] To prevent so great an evil, be pleased now, good Lord, to deal well with those who are truly good, and reward their fidelity; who, notwithstanding all these calamities, sincerely persist in thy ways, and preserve their integrity.

Ver. 5.] But as for those who, instead of growing better by these oppressions, decline more and more from the ways of piety, unto the most perverse and crooked courses: the Lord shall deliver them over to be punished with their oppressors; when Israel, after all these sore afflictions, shall be settled again in peace and happiness.

PSALM CXXXVI.

A Song of degrees.

1 WHEN the LORD turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream.

2 Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing: then said they among the heathen, The LORD hath done great things for them.

3 The LORD hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad.

4 Turn again our captivity, O LORD, as the streams in the south.

5 They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.

6 He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.

PSALM CXXXVI.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm is so universally thought to be a joyful song composed by Ezra, or some such good man, when they returned out of Babylon, that I shall seek for no other interpretation: but observe, with Theodoret, that when Cyrus gave them all leave to return to their own land, some were so ill-minded that they chose to continue where they were: but such as had any sense of the piety of their forefathers, and desired to see the worship of God, according to the law, restored, gladly embraced the opportunity of returning to their own country: where they thought themselves so happy in the liberty which they enjoyed, that they pray (ver. 4) all the rest of the nation, who remained still behind, would come and partake of it.

This is the most received sense; else I should have thought the deliverance from Sennacherib might be here celebrated; who had carried many of them captive (Isa. v. 13, and other places), and when they were delivered from his oppression, they were, indeed, “like men that dreamed,” as the psalmist here speaks. For awaking in the morning, and seeing his vast army to be dead corpses (2 Kings xix. 35), they could scarce believe what they beheld with their eyes, it was so wonderful.

And, perhaps, it was first made then, and afterward applied, with some alteration, to their return from Babylon (see Ps. cxxxiii.).

Ver. 1.] To the Lord alone must we ascribe this wonderful change (which is like the sudden recovery of health, out of a tedious and desperate sickness); for when the proclamation unexpectedly came forth, to give us liberty to return to our own country, out of a long captivity (Ezra i. 2, 3), we could scarce believe it; but were apt to look upon ourselves, as only in a dream of so great a happiness.

Ver. 2.] Which presently turned our heaviness into such a height of joy, that it filled all places with our mirth, especially with cheerful hymns; in which the heathen themselves accompanied us, saying, This truly is the Lord’s work, who hath magnified his power in the strange deliverance of this nation.

Ver. 3.] And truly so he hath (we should be very ungrateful, if we should not thankfully acknowledge the singular benefits which strangers admire); the Lord hath not only restored our liberty, but declared the greatness of his power in this deliverance; which justly fills us with joy and triumph.

Ver. 4.] O that the Lord would be pleased to perfect what he hath begun! and bring back, in greater numbers, the rest of our brethren that still remain in Babylon: which would be as welcome to this desolate country, as streams of water to the dry and thirsty grounds.

Ver. 5.] Then this small handful of people, who are come to plant themselves here again, and have laid the foundation of the temple, with a great mixture of sadness and tears (Ezra iii. 12), shall shout for joy, to see so great an increase, and this pious work, by their help, brought unto perfection.

Ver. 6.] Just as we behold the poor husbandman, going to and fro with a little seed, which in a scarce year he throws with a heavy heart into the ground, returning again and again from the field, with songs of joy in his mouth, when the harvest comes to reward his past labours with a plentiful crop of corn.

PSALM CXXXVII.

A Song of degrees for Solomon (see cxx.).

1 EXCEPT the LORD build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the LORD keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.

PSALM CXXXVII.

ARGUMENT.—The Hebrew particle which here we translate for, is thought by our interpreters, in most other places, to signify of: and so they translate it a little before, in the title of Ps. cxxiv. and a little after in that of the hundred and thirty-first. Therefore I shall look upon this Psalm as composed by 2 It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows: for so he giveth his beloved sleep.

3 Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord: and the fruit of the womb is his reward.

Solomon; who, you read, 1 Kings iv. 32, made above three thousand songs: though none of them (except that large poem called the Song of Songs, and, as some think, Ps. cxxii, and, as I suppose, the next to this) have been transmitted to posterity, but only this: which is a commentary upon a pious maxim of his, often repeated in the book of his Proverbs, that it is in vain to attempt any thing, if the Lord do not prosper it. Teaching us, therefore, in all our ways, to acknowledge him (Prov. iii. 6; xvi. 3), and not to presume, that it is in our power "to direct our own way" (that is, our designs, enterprises, and actions) to what issue we please. For, "though a man's heart deviseth his way, yet it is the Lord that directeth his steps" (Prov. xvi. 9; xx. 24; xxi. 30, 31). A truth to be deeply pondered by all, especially by princes; in whose affairs this overruling providence is most visible. Of A song of degrees, see Ps. cxx.

Ver. 1.] The success of all our undertakings depends so entirely upon the Lord's blessing, that it is in vain, by building houses and cities, to enter into societies, unless he prosper the design: and when they are framed, all the care of the soldier and the magistrate is to no purpose, unless his good providence be their guard.

Ver. 2.] And as fruitless, unless he favour it, is the toil and solicitude of you the artificers and tradesmen

4 As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man; so are children of the youth.

5 Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them: they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate.

in the city; who rise betime, and go to bed late, and fare hardly: when they whom he loves (because they own his providence, and depend upon his blessing, more than their own diligence) live securely, and want nothing that is fit for them; though they have no such strong guard of soldiers to defend them; nor break their sleep with labour and care, to supply their necessities.

Ver. 3.] Observe it also; it is not in the power of the strongest and most healthful persons (though nature designs, above all things, the propagation of mankind) to have children when they please, to inherit the riches they have got: but the Lord bestows them as freely as parents do their estates; and makes those women fruitful, whose pious reliance upon him he thinks good to reward.

Ver. 4.] And yet there is nothing of which we are more desirous than a numerous issue; especially in the flower and vigour of our youth: for they will be no less defence to us in our age, than arrows or darts are in the hand of a valiant champion, to beat off his assailants.

Ver. 5.] Happy is that man who hath obtained so much favour of the Lord, as to have his house as full of them as the champion's quiver is of arrows; they will undauntedly appear for him, to answer any challenge sent him by his enemies (see Theodoret); or any accusation put in against him before the judges.

PSALM CXXVIII.

A Song of degrees.

1 BLESSED is every one that feareth the Lord; that walketh in his ways.

2 For thou shalt eat the labour of thine hands: happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee.

3 Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house: thy children like olive plants round about thy table.

PSALM CXXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—It is not unlikely, that this Psalm was composed by the same author that made the former; to excite men to be truly religious, as the only way to obtain the blessings there mentioned of the Lord. Which, as he there shows we must have from his free gift, and not think to acquire merely by our own industry: so here he shows the Lord is wont to bestow on those who, fearing to offend him, sincerely keep his commandments.

Some think this was a form prescribed to be used at the blessing of their marriages; when they wished the new-married couple all manner of happiness: especially a long life in peaceable times (ver. 5, 6). Of A song of degrees, see Ps. cxx.

Ver. 1.] Whosoever thou art that desirest to be happy, be sure to add unto the devout worship of the Lord the practice of justice and charity, and all other virtues: and thou shalt never miss of it.

Ver. 2.] For then he will prosper thy honest labours; and give thee a heart also to enjoy the 4 Behold, that thus shall the man be blessed that feareth the Lord.

5 The Lord shall bless thee out of Zion: and thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem all the days of thy life.

6 Yea, thou shalt see thy children's children, and peace upon Israel.

fruit of them: yea, this will seem no small part of thy happiness, that thou art able to live of thyself, and not be beholden unto others.

Ver. 3.] He will bless thee also in thy wife; and make her as fruitful as the vine, which spreads itself, laden with full clusters, over all the sides of thy house: and in thy hopeful children too, who shall grow up and flourish like the young olive-plants, that are set in thy arbour, round about thy table.

Ver. 4.] Observe it, that this shall be the comfortable portion of the man that religiously serveth the Lord; who alone can bless our labours, and continue the product of them in our families.

Ver. 5.] Address thyself unto him in his holy place; and the Lord shall bestow on thee whatsoever blessings thou askest of him; yea, mayest thou be so happy as to see Jerusalem, the seat of justice and religion, in a flourishing condition all thy life long.

Ver. 6.] And long mayest thou live, to such a good old age, as to see thy children's children; and the whole nation, all the time, in a prosperous tranquillity.

PSALM CXXIX.

A Song of degrees (see cxx.).

1 MANY a time have they afflicted me from my youth, may Israel now say :

2 Many a time have they afflicted me from my youth : yet they have not prevailed against me.

3 The plowers plowed upon my back : they made long their furrows.

4 The LORD is righteous : he hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked.

5 Let them all be confounded and turned back that hate Zion.

6 Let them be as the grass upon the house-tops, which withereth afore it groweth up.

7 Wherewith the mower filleth not his hand ; nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom.

8 Neither do they which go by say, The blessing of the LORD be upon you : we bless you in the name of the LORD.

PSALM CXXIX.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm was made when some new calamity threatened them, either by Sennacherib, or, as Theodoret thinks, by those nations which combined to destroy the Jews, as soon as they returned from the captivity of Babylon. When they were taught by Ezra, or some such holy man, to recount what God had done for them ever since they were a people ; and to denounce the divine vengeance against those that now sought their ruin. The former conjecture seems the truer ; because as yet, he saith (ver. 2), their enemies had not prevailed against them ; unless we expound that phrase, as I have done in the paraphrase (according to the received interpretation of the Psalm), that they had not quite destroyed them, and made them cease to be a nation.

Ver. 1.] Our adversaries, may Israel now upon this occasion say, have very often, and very sorely, distressed us ; ever since we began to be a people.

Ver. 2.] It is hard to number how oft, or to tell into how great straits, they have reduced us, ever since we began to be a nation : and yet, by the special favour of God, they have not been able to compass their desire of our utter extirpation.

Ver. 3.] They have laid us sometimes exceeding low ; and not only scourged us so severely, that the marks of it might be seen as plain as the furrows are which the plough makes in the ground, but long continued also our vexation and torment.

Ver. 4.] But the Lord at last, in much mercy, hath made good his faithful promises, and broken in pieces the power of wicked oppressors ; that they might not always hold us under their yoke, and thus miserably tyrannise over us.

Ver. 5.] And may all those that still hate us and our religion, never have better success, but be shamefully defeated, and forced to desist in all their attempts upon us.

Ver. 6.] Let none of their designs ever come to maturity ; but be blasted like the grass upon the house-top, which, having no root, withers of itself, and needs nobody's hand to pluck it up.

Ver. 7.] And as it lies unregarded by those that reap, or that carry in the fruits of the earth ; so let these men and all their enterprises become contemptible, and be looked upon as good for nothing.

Ver. 8.] Let all their hopes so speedily vanish, that there be none to favour them ; nor so much as to wish prosperity to them : no more than there are gatherers of such withered grass appear, to whom the passengers (after the usual form, Ruth ii. 4) should say, The Lord give you a good harvest : we pray God you may reap the fruits of your labours.

PSALM CXXX.

A Song of degrees (see cxx.).

1 OUT of the depths have I cried unto thee, O LORD.

2 LORD, hear my voice : let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications.

3 If thou, LORD, shouldst mark iniquities, O LORD, who shall stand ?

4 But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.

PSALM CXXX.

ARGUMENT.—Some think David made this prayer, after he had plunged himself into a very deep guilt, by his sin with Bath-sheba. I rather think, when he was persecuted by Saul, and reduced to so low a condition, that his heart began to sink within him. For “the floods of ungodly men (as he speaks, Ps. xviii. 4) made him afraid,” that he should one day perish in them (1 Sam. xxix. 1), and he complains elsewhere, “that he sunk in the mire, where there was no standing,” &c. (Ps. lxi. 2, 14, 15).

In this condition he implores the divine mercy with great earnestness : and beseeches him to pardon his sins, and the sins of all the people ; which made them deserve that ill government under Saul and his flatterers.

It is the last but one of the seven penitential Psalms.

Ver. 1.] In the greatest straits, when I can see no bottom, no end of my troubles, but I still sink lower and lower into them ; I never despair of thy mercy, O Lord ; but cry unto thee most earnestly to deliver me.

Ver. 2.] Vouchsafe, good Lord, the governor of all things, to grant my petition : do not reject it, I humbly beseech thee ; but give me a favourable answer when I deprecate thy displeasure.

Ver. 3.] I do not plead any merits of mine, but rather excuse myself before thee ; knowing that if I

5 I wait for the LORD, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope.

6 My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning: I say, more than they that watch for the morning.

were the most innocent person in the world, yet if thou, Lord, shouldst strictly examine my life, and proceed against me, according to my deserts (Lord, what would become of me)? I should certainly be condemned.

Ver. 4.] But thou most graciously investest us unto thy service, by thy readiness to pardon all those that are truly penitent; without the hope of which, we could not so much as think of becoming religious.

Ver. 5.] This encourages me to wait and expect when the Lord will deliver me; my soul is earnestly bent to expect this happy time, which I believe will come; because I have his promise for it, on which I depend.

7 Let Israel hope in the LORD: for with the LORD there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption.

8 And he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities.

Ver. 6.] I direct my thoughts to the Lord alone for safety and relief; which I implore incessantly with my early prayers: for they that watch in the temple for the break of day; I say, the priests that watch in the temple for the break of day, are not more forward than I to offer up their morning sacrifice to the Lord.

Ver. 7.] In whom let all his people place their trust and confidence; for the Lord is very ready to do good; and hath more ways than we can imagine to rescue those that hope in him out of the sorest distresses.

Ver. 8.] And he will at last free them from all those troubles; which he hath inflicted on them as a punishment for their iniquities.

PSALM CXXXI.

A Song of degrees (see cxx.).

1 LORD, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty: neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me.

2 Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of his mother: my soul is even as a weaned child.

3 Let Israel hope in the LORD from henceforth and for ever.

PSALM CXXXI.

ARGUMENT.—Though David could not purge himself from all manner of guilt (as he confesses in the foregoing Psalm, ver. 3), yet in that matter, which he was charged withal by his enemies (of affecting the kingdom), he could safely protest he was as innocent as a little child. Which he doth in this Psalm particularly; and in several parts of other Psalms.

Ver. 1.] O Lord, I am accused of traitorous designs against my sovereign, and of aspiring to the throne wherein thou hast placed him: but thou, who searchest the hearts, knowest that I harbour no such ambitious thoughts; nor hath my behaviour betrayed any such intentions: for I never looked upon any man superciliously; nor meddled with affairs of state, or anything else that is above my place and calling.

Ver. 2.] But have levelled my mind (else let me perish) to an equality with my condition; and resolved to acquiesce in the present state of things, committing myself unto thy care, and depending on thy providence, as a child that is newly weaned doth upon its mother; just so do I silence my natural desires; and am content to be disposed of as thou pleasest.

Ver. 3.] And let all good men, in like manner, modestly place their confidence and hope in the Lord as long as they live; and choose rather to be depressed, than by any undue means raise themselves to greatness and honour.

PSALM CXXXII.

A Song of degrees (see cxx.).

1 LORD, remember David, and all his afflictions:

2 How he sware unto the LORD, and vowed unto the mighty God of Jacob;

PSALM CXXXII.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm seems to have been composed by some holy man; after God had given commandment to David, by Gad the seer, to build an altar in the thrashing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite (where the destroying angel stood); and the Lord had answered him by fire upon that altar (1 Chron. xxi. 18, 26), whereby David knew, what he had till now been ignorant of, that this was the place where God would be worshipped, and have his temple built (xxii. 1). Accordingly we read expressly, that Solomon therefore built the temple in this place; because God here appeared to David his father, and David designed and prepared this place for it (2 Chron. iii. 1): that there God's habitation might be fixed; and not removed from place to place, uncertainly, as it had been in former times. For the tabernacle, which the Hebrews call Mischkan, had been in an unsettled condition, except one period of time, ever since they came into the land of Canaan. It was first pitched in Gilgal, and stayed there twenty-four years. Then it was removed to Shiloh, where it remained to the death of Eli, three hundred and sixty-nine years. After his death, Shiloh being laid waste, it was translated to Nob, where it remained, they say, thirteen years (but was now no better than a cabinet without its jewel; the ark being in another place, and never restored to it after that desolation of Shiloh;

3 Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed;

4 I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eyelids,

5 Until I find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob.

6 Lo, we heard of it at Ephratah: we found it in the fields of the wood.

7 We will go into his tabernacles: we will worship at his footstool.

8 Arise, O Lord, into thy rest; thou, and the ark of thy strength.

9 Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness; and let thy saints shout for joy.

10 For thy servant David's sake turn not away the face of thine anointed.

11 The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David; he will not turn from it; Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne.

12 If thy children will keep my covenant and my testimony that I shall teach them, their children shall also sit upon thy throne for evermore.

13 For the Lord hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation.

14 This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it.

15 I will abundantly bless her provision: I will satisfy her poor with bread.

16 I will also clothe her priests with salvation: and her saints shall shout aloud for joy.

see Ps. lxxviii.). After the death of Samuel, they say, Nob was also destroyed: and then it was carried to Gibeon, where Solomon found it, and from thence fetched it, when he had finished the temple. Which the Hebrews therefore call Beth-olamim, the eternal house; because it was fixed to a place, and out of it the ark never departed, as it had done out of the tabernacle: but there (as the Psalmist here speaks, ver. 14), the Lord took up his rest for ever: never to depart, that is, to any other place, till the Messiah came; who was the temple of God, "in whom the fulness of the God-head dwelt bodily."

There are those who think Solomon penned this Psalm; because (in 2 Chron. vi. the last two verses) he concludes his prayer at the consecration of the temple with some part of it, viz. ver. 8—10. And truly, since he speaks as if the priests were just taking up the ark to carry it into this resting place, and there begs that God would not, for David's sake, turn away the face of his anointed (i. e. refuse to hear his prayer), it is not an improbable conjecture; which I shall follow in my paraphrase, and connect also this Psalm with the former; to which it seems to have respect: if we render the last word of the first verse, as the ancient interpreters do; not affliction, but humility, meekness, or modesty. Yet I have not forgot to take notice of the other signification: and, in like manner have expounded that phrase, the mighty God of Jacob, two several ways (ver. 2, 5).

Ver. 1.] Let it appear, O Lord, that thou art not unmindful of the pious humility of my father David (cxxx. 1), who chose to endure many afflictions, rather than by unlawful means to prefer himself to a kingdom.

Ver. 2.] Which when he enjoyed, his principal care was to provide a settled place for the worship of God: for he bound himself with a solemn oath unto the Lord, and vowed unto the mighty one, who had preserved him, as he did Jacob, in all his troubles:

Ver. 3.] Saying, I am resolved, as I hope to prosper, that I will not come into the new palace, which I have built for myself (1 Chron. xiv. 1), much less go to dwell and take up my lodging there;

Ver. 4.] Nay, I will not lay myself down to rest, nor take a wink of sleep;

Ver. 5.] Until I have found out a convenient place for the ark of the Lord (1 Chron. xv. 1; xvi. 1. 43), a habitation for that mighty one; who there makes himself present to his people, the posterity of Jacob.

Ver. 6.] And now, behold, the Lord himself, to our great joy, hath told us the very place where he will fix his habitation (1 Chron. xxi. 18, 26), in the territory of Beth-Jehem-ephratah (Gen. xxxv. 16, 19), in the fields of that forest, where the angel stood, and directed David to build an altar unto the Lord (1 Chron. xxi. 18; xxii. 1).

Ver. 7.] Let us go therefore into his tabernacles; and prostrating ourselves before his majesty, let us take up the ark on which his glory stands (1 Chron. xxviii. 2), with humble reverence, and bring it into the temple which is now built for it (2 Chron. v. 2—4, &c.).

Ver. 8.] And be pleased, O Lord, together with the ark, the token of thy powerful presence among us, to translate thy divine glory thither (2 Chron. v. 13, 14; vii. 1—3), there to settle itself, and stir from thence no more for ever.

Ver. 9.] Guard also thy priests, who minister unto thee here, and encompass them with thy goodness (2 Chron. vi. 41): that they may procure thy blessings for others; and make all thy pious worshippers, who are dear unto thee, triumph in thy kindness to them.

Ver. 10.] I beseech thee, have a respect to the sincere piety of my father David, and thy gracious promise to him (1 Chron. xxii. 2, 10, 14; xxviii. 2, 6, &c.), and upon that account deny me not; but grant the petitions of thy servant, who, by thy special appointment, succeeds him in the government of thy people.

Ver. 11.] According to that oath, whereby the Lord secured the kingdom to his family; that faithful oath, which he will never break, saying: One of thy sons will I advance to sit upon thy throne, when thou shalt leave it (1 Chron. xvii. 11; xxviii. 5; 2 Chron. vi. 10).

Ver. 12.] Yea, I will perpetuate this royal dignity to thy children in all succeeding generations (and not take it from them, as I did from Saul, 2 Sam. vii. 15, 16), if they prove faithful and constant in their religion; and observe all the commandments, whereby I will teach and instruct them how my pleasure is, that they should worship and serve me (1 Kings ii. 4; ix. 4, 6).

Ver. 13.] For the Lord hath such a love to Zion, the seat of the royal family (2 Sam. v. 7, 9), that he hath chosen to place his own dwelling very near unto it (2 Chron. iii. 1; vii. 12.)

Ver. 14.] Saying, This is the place where my glory shall fix itself for ever (2 Chron. vii. 16). I will remove no more; but here will I take up my abode: for I have pitched on this place, and declared it is acceptable to me above all other (1 Chron. xxi. 26; xxii. 2).

Ver. 15.] From whence I will dispense my blessings so abundantly, that Zion (which is become the city of God as well as of David) shall never be in any want.

17 There will I make the horn of David to bud : I have ordained a lamp for mine anointed.

but I will make such liberal provision for it by fruitful years, that the poorest person there shall be satisfied with food (2 Chron. vii. 13, 14).

Ver. 16.] I will also defend her priests, and they shall be giving continual thanks and praise for the blessings they shall procure for my pious worshippers : who shall exceedingly triumph in my kindness towards them.

Ver. 17.] There will I make the regal power and majesty of David to put forth itself afresh in his royal successors ; no sooner shall one be extinguished but 18 His enemies will I clothe with shame : but upon himself shall his crown flourish.

another shall shine (1 Kings xi. 36. 2 Chron. xxi. 7), in such splendour as shall give a lustre to the name of that anointed servant of mine ; till the great prince, the Messiah, appear.

Ver. 18.] And whosoever they be that go about to destroy this succession, they shall be so miserably defeated that they shall not be able to show their faces ; while, with shame and confusion, they behold the regal dignity in his family (notwithstanding all their attempts against it) in an unfading glory.

PSALM CXXXIII.

A Song of degrees (see cxx.).

1 BEHOLD, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity !

2 It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard : that went down to the skirts of his garments ;

3 As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion : for there the LORD commanded the blessing, even life for evermore.

PSALM CXXXIII.

ARGUMENT.—When there was no other strife among all the tribes of Israel, than who should be most forward in returning their allegiance ; and the children of Judah also were inclined as one man to bring back David to his kingdom, from which his son Absalom had driven him (2 Sam. xix. 9. 14), he fell into a rapturous admiration of that happy unity and concord which made them meet together in one place to worship God (for so, I think, Zanchius rightly understands the last word of the first verse, which we translate together in unity, to relate to the public assemblies) : which unity he commended to them afterward in this Psalm, as their best preservative and security in future ages. This seems to me more probable to be the occasion of it than the concurrence of all the tribes to make him king after Saul's death (which is the common account that is given of it), for then Zion was not in his possession ; and it is not likely he would then have made such mention of it as he doth here, while it remained in the hands of the Jebusites. But whatsoever was the first occasion, it was aptly applied to their condition after the return of their captivity from Babylon ; when, as Theodoret notes, the tribes which had been divided by the imprudence of Rehoboam, were then again united ; living under one and the same government, and worshipping God in the same place and the same manner as the law prescribed.

It was as fitly used by the first Christians, to express their joy for the blessed union of Jews and gentiles ; and may now serve the uses of all Christian societies, whose happiness lies in holy peace and concord.

Ver. 1.] O consider, how beneficial and delightful it is, beyond all expression, for those that come from the same stock, and are of the same religion, to have no differences one with another ; but to live and worship God together, in such a friendly agreement, as if they had but one soul among them all.

Ver. 2.] I cannot resemble it to anything better than to that excellent ointment compounded of several spices (Exod. xxx. 21, &c.), which consecrated the high-priest to the divine service (Lev. viii. 12), and was poured in such plenty, that, running over all his face, even to the collar of his garment (where he did bear the names of all the tribes of Israel), it perfumed all the place with its fragrant odour ; for just so doth this holy concord make you both dear to God, and procure you an excellent fame among men ; who cannot but be pleased to see such variety of humours and inclinations all conspiring with one accord to promote the common good of the whole society.

Ver. 3.] The dew of heaven is not more necessary for the parched mountains, which, though never so distant one from another (as far as from Hermon to Zion), are refreshed with it, than this is for men of all ranks and conditions, who everywhere perceive the comfortable fruits of it ; for to this the divine favour is immutably annexed, which will pour upon such societies innumerable blessings ; giving them a happy and long life (an earnest of endless felicity), in a constant enjoyment of all manner of good things.

PSALM CXXXIV.

A Song of degrees.

1 BEHOLD, bless ye the LORD, all ye servants of the LORD, which by night stand in the house of the LORD.

2 Lift up your hands in the sanctuary, and bless the LORD.

3 The LORD that made heaven and earth bless thee out of Zion.

PSALM CXXXIV.

ARGUMENT.—It is uncertain by whom this Psalm was composed, but it seems to have been made to be sung by some one or more of the Levites, at the shutting up of the gates of the temple; to excite the rest, whose turn it was to watch that night, to be diligent in their office of singing Psalms, and making devout prayers for the people. It is the last of those that have the title of a Song of Degrees: concerning which, see Ps. cxx.

Ver. 1.] Attend to your duty, O ye ministers of the Lord; who not only by day, but by night also, rerently wait upon him in his house (1 Chron. ix. 33): cease not to declare how great and how good the Lord is.

Ver. 2.] Be fervent in your devotion; and, disclaiming all dependence on any thing else, praise the Lord in his sanctuary with pure hearts and clean hands; and give thanks for all his benefits.

Ver. 3.] Pray also for his people Israel, and say; The great Lord, who, though he cannot be confined, being the creator of all things, yet hath his special residence in this place, dispense his blessings, both heavenly and earthly, from hence, unto every one of you.

PSALM CXXXV.

1 PRAISE ye the LORD. Praise ye the name of the LORD; praise him, O ye servants of the LORD.

2 Ye that stand in the house of the LORD, in the courts of the house of our God,

3 Praise the LORD; for the LORD is good: sing praises unto his name; for it is pleasant.

4 For the LORD hath chosen Jacob unto himself, and Israel for his peculiar treasure.

5 For I know that the LORD is great, and that our Lord is above all gods.

6 Whatsoever the LORD pleased, that did he in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and all deep places.

7 He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth; he maketh lightnings for the rain; he bringeth the wind out of his treasures.

PSALM CXXXV.

ARGUMENT.—This perhaps was the morning hymn, which the precentor (ver. 4, 5), called upon the Levites to sing, at the opening of the gates of the temple: as the former was sung at the shutting up of the gates in the evening. It recounts several of the great works of the Lord; especially towards that nation: whom it excites to steadfastness in their religion: and to contempt of idols and idolaters. It both begins and concludes with an exhortation to give praise to God; and so was entitled, as several other Psalms are (cvi. cxi. &c.), Hallelujah, or Praise the Lord: that is, by this hymn set forth the most excellent perfections and works of the Lord.

There are those who conjecture, from what we read ver. 14, of this Psalm, that when it was composed they were (or rather had been lately) infested by some of their idolatrous neighbours. Whose gods the Psalmist derides in the very same manner as he doth Ps. cxv. For the four following verses of this Psalm, 15—18, differ very little from 4—6, 8, of that, which it is certain was composed in a time of great distress; as this was when it was over.

Ver. 1.] Let all here present praise the most wise omnipotent goodness of the Lord: let him especially be praised, by you, his priests, who minister unto his majesty.

Ver. 2.] And by the Levites who attend upon him in his house; together with all the rest of his people that frequent the courts of God's house, who is our constant and most liberal benefactor.

Ver. 3.] Let this excite you all to praise the Lord: for, as his nature is most excellent, so he is the fountain of all the good we enjoy: and no employment is so delightful as to acknowledge his perfections, and commemorate the benefits we have received from him, by singing psalms and hymns of praise and thanks unto him.

Ver. 4.] I invite you above all other people to this heavenly duty: both because the Lord had a peculiar kindness for Jacob your forefather; and doth still exercise a special providence over you his children, as far more dear and precious to him, than the rest of mankind, who are under his care:

Ver. 5.] And because I am sensible that the Lord, under whose government we are, is so great and powerful above all other beings, though called by the name of gods; that you can never praise his majesty enough.

Ver. 6.] His own will alone gives bounds to his power: for, as none act without his leave, so none can hinder him from doing what pleases himself; in the heavens as well as in the earth, and the seas, and other deep waters.

Ver. 7.] He raises vapours, for instance, from any quarter of the earth, and makes them go up into the air; where some of them break forth in flashes of lightning; and that (which is strange) is followed with great showers of rain: and, from unknown places and causes, strong and violent winds blow with such continuance, as if they came out of some treasury, where he had gathered, and long locked them up, till he had occasion to bring them forth.

8 Who smote the firstborn of Egypt, both of man and beast.

9 Who sent tokens and wonders into the midst of thee, O Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his servants.

10 Who smote great nations, and slew mighty kings;

11 Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og king of Bashan, and all the kingdoms of Canaan:

12 And gave their land for an heritage, an heritage unto Israel his people.

13 Thy name, O LORD, endureth for ever; and thy memorial, O LORD, throughout all generations.

14 For the LORD will judge his people, and

Ver. 8.] He made the Egyptians feel how much superior he was to all their gods (Exod. xii. 12), who could not defend them from his stroke; but he sent his angel, and, in one night slew all the first-born in the country, both of man and beast (ver. 29).

Ver. 9.] Before which terrible blow, he had given many other wonderful demonstrations of his power, in several miraculous plagues; which he openly inflicted on thee, O Egypt; not only on the meaner sort, but upon the king and all his court (Exod. vii.—ix. &c.).

Ver. 10.] And after he had, by these means, brought you out of their bondage, he overthrew several great nations and slew potent kings: who, presuming of their strength, opposed the accomplishment of his promises to you.

Ver. 11.] First of all Sihon king of the Amorites, who were esteemed invincible (Numb. xxi. 24; Amos ii. 9), and then Og, that giantly king of Bashan (Numb. xxi. 33; Deut. iii. 11), and at last, all the kingdoms and kings of the land of Canaan (Josh. xii. 7, 24).

Ver. 12.] Which he graciously bestowed upon us, the children of Israel, as an inheritance we should hold of him, by a divine right; of which none, while we continue his obedient people, shall be able to dispossess us.

Ver. 13.] O Lord, how astonishing is this thy omnipotent goodness! the fame of which shall never be forgotten: but an illustrious memory, O Lord, shall be continued of it, from generation to generation.

Ver. 14.] For though our enemies may sometimes oppress us, when we offend him, yet the Lord, at last, will take the part of his people, and deliver them, and being reconciled unto his servants, will turn his severity into kindness towards them.

he will repent himself concerning his servants.

15 The idols of the heathen are silver and gold, the work of men's hands.

16 They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not;

17 They have ears, but they hear not; neither is there any breath in their mouths.

18 They that make them are like unto them: so is every one that trusteth in them.

19 Bless the LORD, O house of Israel: bless the LORD, O house of Aaron:

20 Bless the LORD, O house of Levi: ye that fear the LORD, bless the LORD.

21 Blessed be the LORD out of Zion, which dwelleth at Jerusalem. Praise ye the LORD.

Ver. 15.] It is not in the power of the idols, which the heathen worship, to divert his kindness from us; for they are of no more value than the silver and the gold of which they are made: and are so far from being able to do any thing, that they themselves are made by those that adore them.

Ver. 16.] They are mere images of things, without their life: having mouths, but cannot give a word of advice, or comfort, to their supplicants; and eyes also but cannot see, much less prevent any danger that doth approach them.

Ver. 17.] Ears they have; but cannot hear a word that is said to them: and noses also; but they do not so much as breathe, much less can they smell the odours that are offered them.

Ver. 18.] They that make them therefore, or put any confidence in them, are as senseless as themselves; having eyes, for instance, but do not see that brutes are more excellent than such gods; and that no help is to be expected from them.

Ver. 19.] O how much then are we all bound to bless the Lord, the creator of all, who hath freed us from this stupid blindness. Let the whole nation of the children of Israel, especially the priests of the Lord, praise him and give thanks to him, who hath better instructed them.

Ver. 20.] Let all the Levites declare how gracious he is: yea, let all his pious worshippers, of whatsoever nation they be, join in this heavenly employment, of speaking good of the Lord.

Ver. 21.] Let them all say, with one accord, The Lord be ever praised in this holy place; who, though he be the owner of all the world, yet makes his special residence at Jerusalem.

The honour the heathens give to their lifeless images ought to excite you all, with the greater devotion to praise the Lord of the world.

PSALM CXXXVI.

1 O GIVE thanks unto the LORD; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.

PSALM CXXXVI.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, like the former, is a commemoration of the goodness of God, expressed in his wonderful works: particularly those he had done for that nation. And, it is likely, was composed to be sung upon the great festivals; as every day, I suppose, they sung the foregoing; which is of the same strain with this, and contains much of the same matter: only here, at every half verse, one half of the choir answers to the other, in these

VOL. II.—125

2 O give thanks unto the God of gods: for his mercy endureth for ever.

words: "For his mercy endureth for ever." A form of acknowledgment prescribed by David, to be used continually in the divine service (1 Chron. xvi. 41), and accordingly followed by Solomon (2 Chron. vii. 3, 6), when he dedicated the temple; and by Jehoshaphat, when, by the encouragement of a prophet, he went out to encounter a vast army with small forces (xx. 21); and here is repeated six-and-twenty times, to make them the more sensible that they owed all they had to the mere bounty of God, and to excite them to depend 3 O give thanks to the Lord of lords : for his mercy endureth for ever.

4 To him who alone doeth great wonders : for his mercy endureth for ever.

5 To him that by wisdom made the heavens : for his mercy endureth for ever.

6 To him that stretched out the earth above the waters : for his mercy endureth for ever.

7 To him that made great lights : for his mercy endureth for ever :

8 The sun to rule by day : for his mercy endureth for ever :

9 The moon and stars to rule by night : for his mercy endureth for ever.

10 To him that smote Egypt in their first-born : for his mercy endureth for ever :

11 And brought out Israel from among them : for his mercy endureth for ever :

12 With a strong hand, and with a stretched out arm : for his mercy endureth for ever.

13 To him which divided the Red sea into parts : for his mercy endureth for ever :

14 And made Israel to pass through the midst of it : for his mercy endureth for ever :

15 But overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red sea : for his mercy endureth for ever.

16 To him which led his people through the wilderness : for his mercy endureth for ever.

17 To him which smote great kings : for his mercy endureth for ever.

18 And slew famous kings : for his mercy endureth for ever.

entirely upon it, and rest assured it would never fail them if they did piously and most heartily acknowledge it. Such repetitions we use now in our earnest prayers, when we say, "Lord, have mercy upon us," &c. which are no more vain than these. I have variously expressed the sense of this repeated acknowledgment, according as the other part of the several verses seemed to direct me.

Ver. 1.] Offer your thankful hymns unto the Lord of all; who is as good as he is great, and will continue his kindness (which hath been exceeding abundant towards us) unto all succeeding generations.

Ver. 2.] He is the sovereign of all the heavenly hosts; and therefore praise him, and give thanks unto him: for he can employ them all for your help and protection (as he hath in former times), and you need not doubt of his kindness, which continues unto all ages.

Ver. 3.] All the kings and princes of the earth are his subjects; upon which account also, give him praise and thanks: for his kindness endures throughout all ages, to defend you, as he hath done hitherto, from their tyrannical violence.

Ver. 4.] He it is, and he alone, whose works are so great, that they surprise all those who seriously consider them with wonder and astonishment; and therefore give him praise and thanks: for his kindness will never fail, still to employ his infinite power for the good of those who are truly grateful to him.

Ver. 5.] Look upon the heavens, and behold, with admiration and praise, the splendour and the order wherein his wisdom hath contrived and settled them: for his kindness is as large, and as firm, and durable as they.

Ver. 6.] And then look down to the earth; thankfully praise him who brought it out of the waters, and preserves it in its just extent from being again overflowed by them; for his kindness is no less immovable, and by length of time can never be impaired.

Ver. 7.] Witness those great lights which never go out, but always call upon us to praise and give thanks to him; who made them to illuminate the world, and to be the emblems of his kindness; which sends its benign influence continually upon us unto all generations.

Ver. 8.] By day the sun exerts his power to quicken all inferior beings; and excites us to praise him, and be thankful to him; whose kindness thereby perpetually administers to us all necessary things, and will do so to the end of the world.

Ver. 9.] And by night the moon or the stars supply its place: and let us see how much we are bound to praise and thank him, whose kindness is so constant, that, in the worst condition, it will never quite forsake us.

Ver. 10.] We must needs say so, and think ourselves engaged above all others to give him thanks, if we call to mind that memorable night (Exod. xii. 29) when he punished the Egyptians with the loss of all their first-born: for his kindness still continues for ever to relieve those that are injured, and to punish their insolent oppressors.

Ver. 11.] Let us not forget how after that stroke he brought our forefathers out of the cruel bondage, wherein they had long held them (Exod. xii. 41, 42), but thankfully acknowledge that wonderful deliverance; for it is an argument why we should never distrust his kindness, in the sorest straits that can befall us.

Ver. 12.] His power, let us remember, is irresistible; which first by lesser, then by greater signs and wonders, delivered us out of their hands (Exod. vi. 5, 6; vii. viii. &c.), to praise and magnify him, whose kindness is stupendously great, and will never cease to succour those who depend upon him.

Ver. 13.] Let us therefore give thanks to him; who, when our forefathers utterly despaired of safety (Exod. xiv. 10, 11), commanded the Red sea to retire, and leave a broad way for them to pass (ver. 21), which plainly proves that his kindness is inexhaustible, and always ready to help us in the most dreadful dangers.

Ver. 14.] For he led them safely through the very midst of the sea (which rose up like a wall on either hand of them, Exod. xiv. 22), and will by his kindness eternally secure all those that piously confide in him:

Ver. 15.] But throw those that oppose him headlong into destruction, as he did Pharaoh and his host, in the very same place where Israel was preserved (Exod. xiv. 27, &c.): for his kindness loves to complete his favours, and perfect what he hath begun for his people.

Ver. 16.] And accordingly, when he had thus delivered them, he led his people, by the direction of a glorious cloud, through an untrodden desert; and there (with our thankful praises let it be remembered) made a miraculous provision for them (Exod. xvi.). For his endless kindness, wheresoever they went, still with new benefits pursued them.

Ver. 17.] When potent kings opposed their passage to the promised land, he utterly discomfited them (to his praise be it thankfully acknowledged): for his kindness was not stopped by difficulties, but ever overcame them.

Ver. 18.] Though they were kings famous for their prowess; yet, such was his for-ever-to-be-praised

19 Sihon king of the Amorites : for his mercy endureth for ever :

20 And Og the king of Bashan : for his mercy endureth for ever :

21 And gave their land for an heritage : for his mercy endureth for ever :

22 Even an heritage unto Israel his servant : for his mercy endureth for ever.

kindness towards us ; he gave us as easy and as absolute a victory over them, as he had done before over Pharaoh and his host.

Ver. 19.] Over Sihon, king of that fierce nation of the Amorites, who were thought invincible (Amos ii. 9) : for his kindness was mightier than they, and gave us this as an earnest of future conquests over our enemies.

Ver. 20.] Over that huge tyrant Og, the king of Bashan (Deut. iii. 11) : for his kindness added that, as a new pledge of what he intended to do for us, when we came into Canaan.

Ver. 21.] And gave both their countries to be held of him, as a perpetual inheritance : for his kindness doth not decay (nor loves to revoke his favours), but continues to the latest posterity.

Ver. 22.] An inheritance they were, which he settled upon us, the children of Israel, as long as we continue his faithful servants ; for his kindness hath no end ; but delights to perpetuate his mercies to those who are worthy of them.

23 Who remembered us in our low estate : for his mercy endureth for ever :

24 And hath redeemed us from our enemies : for his mercy endureth for ever.

25 Who giveth food to all flesh : for his mercy endureth for ever.

26 O give thanks unto the God of heaven : for his mercy endureth for ever.

Ver. 23.] Nay, when for our sins we were severely afflicted, and in danger to be thrown out of this good land into which at last he brought us (Judg. ii. iii. iv. &c.) ; he was pleased graciously to relieve us : for his kindness pardoned our ingratitude, and was as forward as ever to bestow fresh benefits upon us.

Ver. 24.] And rescued us many a time, when we cried unto him, from the power of those that tyrannised over us : for his kindness was not spent by the frequent deliverances it had given us ; but still granted new matter for our thanksgivings to him.

Ver. 25.] Whose bounty, is not confined to us alone, but supplies the wants of all mankind, yea, of all living creatures : for his kindness hath no bounds ; nor will ever cease to make a plentiful provision for them.

Ver. 26.] O raise your hearts to give him thanks with the highest praises ; whose power extends itself beyond this earth, even unto the highest heavens : for his kindness is so unwearied, that we may hope from thence to be ever receiving more and more his blessings.

PSALM CXXXVII.

1 By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion.

2 We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof.

3 For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song ; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion.

4 How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land ?

PSALM CXXXVII.

ARGUMENT.—This is a mournful song, composed by some of the captive Levites in Babylon : when he reflected upon their sad parting with their dear country, and the scorn wherewith their insulting enemies treated them in that strange land. Which he foresaw God would severely punish, by the hand of some other cruel people ; who should show them as little mercy as they had showed the Israelites.

The Vulgar Latin ascribes this Psalm to Jeremiah ; upon which inscription, Theodoret (who found it also in some Greek copies in his time) passes this censure ; That the bold author of it wanted wit, as the inscription itself openly proclaims : for Jeremiah was not carried captive into Babylon ; but, when he had stayed some time in Judea, was compelled by the disobedient Jews to go down with them into Egypt. Yet there are those who, to excuse this, would have us think that Jeremiah sent this Psalm to the captives in Babylon : and that it is called A Psalm of David (for so it is in the Vulgar Latin also), because made after the example of his Psalms : as Virgil said he sung Ascreum carmen among the Romans ; when he made his Georgics in imitation of Hesiod.

In the paraphrase of the first verse, I have followed a conjecture of St. Chrysostom's, that the captives were not suffered (at their first coming thither) to dwell within any of their towns or cities ; but were dispersed all along several rivers of the country ; where they built tabernacles, or cottages, for themselves : and, perhaps, were forced to drain those moist places to make them wholesome.

Ver. 1.] When we were transported from our own country into the land of Babylon, and had the sides of Euphrates, and several of its rivers (Ezek. i. 1 ; Baruch i. 4), assigned for our habitation, there we sat down in a sorrowful posture ; and could not refrain from tears, when we called to mind the happy days which we enjoyed in the holy hill of Zion.

Ver. 2.] We brought our harps along with us, wherewith we were wont to praise the Lord (1 Chron. xv. 16) ; but as our fruitful vines and fig-trees, under which we formerly sat, were turned into barren willows and osiers ; so all our mirth and joy were turned into such heaviness and sorrow of heart, that we let all our instruments of music hang neglected upon the boughs of those doleful trees.

Ver. 3.] For when our new masters, who had carried us away captive, they that had laid Jerusalem on heaps, and had power to do what they pleased with us, required us (between jest and earnest) to entertain them with our music ; and to let them hear one of those songs, which were wont to be sung in the temple :

Ver. 4.] Neither fear nor favour could extort this service from our Levites, but they resolutely answered ; As those songs were not made for pastime and sport, but in honour of the great lord of the world ; so, how can you imagine that miserable slaves are disposed to 5 If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.

6 If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy.

7 Remember, O LORD, the children of Edom in the day of Jerusalem; who said, sing? and to sing those songs, in the land where we are exiles, which recount the mercies of God unto us, in our once most flourishing country?

Ver. 5.] No (said I then within myself), if I forget thy desolations, O Jerusalem (though never so far removed from thee), so as to gratify their desires, by profaning thy music and thy songs; then let my right hand be benumbed, or quite lose its skill of touching the harp any more.

Ver. 6.] Let me be struck dumb, and never be able to move my tongue; if I be not so mindful of thee, as never to sing again; till I see Jerusalem, and her holy solemnities restored.

Ver. 7.] Which joyful day I hope will come; when thou, O Lord, wilt call our enemies to an account: and first of all, reckon with the Edomites (Jer. xlix. 10; Ezek. xxv. 12), who, instead of pitying Jerusalem, as became kind neighbours and relations, were glad to see the day of its desolations; and encouraged Rase it, rase it, even to the foundation thereof.

8 O daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed; happy shall he be, that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us.

9 Happy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones.

our destroyers with their acclamations, saying, Lay it flat, lay it even with the ground upon which it stands.

Ver. 8.] And then shall your turns come, O ye Babylonians; who have laid waste so many nations, but shall one day be made desolate yourselves (Isa. xlii. 19, &c.); and may that prince and people prosper and be happy (Jer. l. 9, 41), who shall pay you in your kind; and use you as barbarously as you used us (li. 24, 35, 49).

Ver. 9.] He shall be praised and thought to have done a worthy work, who shall snatch your sucking children from their mothers' breasts; and have no more mercy on them, than upon the whelps of wolves, or such-like creatures; but shall dash out their brains against the walls of your houses, or stones in the street (Isa. xlii. 16), that there may be no remains of such a cruel generation (Jer. li. 62).

PSALM CXXXVIII.

A Psalm of David.

1 I WILL praise thee with my whole heart: before the gods will I sing praise unto thee.

2 I will worship toward thy holy temple, and praise thy name for thy lovingkindness and for thy truth: for thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name.

3 In the day when I cried thou answeredst me, and strengthenedst me with strength in my soul.

PSALM CXXXVIII.

ARGUMENT.—This is one of David's Psalms (as the title assures us), wherein he thankfully acknowledges God's goodness to him, in advancing him from a low and afflicted condition to the royal dignity; which remarkable change would invite, he thought, other kings and princes to have a very great regard to his divine majesty: who, he hoped therefore, would support and defend him in his new-gotten kingdom, by the same almighty power which raised him unto it.

Ver. 1.] I will make thee my thankful acknowledgments, O Lord, with the devoutest affections of my heart: thy holy angels shall be witnesses of my gratitude, which I will express in psalms and hymns, in the presence of the great assembly of the judges (Exod. xxii. 9; Ps. lxxxii. 1, 6), that they may remember to whom they owe their power and authority.

Ver. 2.] I will prostrate myself in the humblest adorations of thee, towards the place where the monument of thy divine presence is; and acknowledge how much I am indebted to thy almighty goodness: first, for promising me, out of thy mere grace and favour, the royal dignity; and then for performing thy promise most faithfully: for thou hast manifested thy most excellent power and goodness to me, in nothing

4 All the kings of the earth shall praise thee, O LORD, when they hear the words of thy mouth.

5 Yea, they shall sing in the ways of the LORD: for great is the glory of the LORD.

6 Though the LORD be high, yet hath he respect unto the lowly: but the proud he knoweth afar off.

7 Though I walk in the midst of trouble, thou so much as in punctually fulfilling thy promise (1 Sam. xvi. 13), notwithstanding all the opposition which was made to it; nay, in raising me higher than I expected.

Ver. 3.] I had long ago fallen short of this honour to which I am advanced, hadst not thou, during all the time of Saul's persecution, as readily relieved me, as I cried to thee: and mightily supported my spirit, by a courageous faith and hope in thee.

Ver. 4.] Which will move, sure, all our neighbouring kings, who have any knowledge of my affairs (2 Sam. v. 11, 12; viii. 10) to join with me, in praising thee, O Lord: when they shall hear by how many strange providences thou hast brought to pass, that which thou promisedst to me by thy prophet.

Ver. 5.] The wonderful ways whereby the Lord brings things about, shall be the subject of their songs; and they shall think it their greatest happiness to be guided and governed by him: for they shall confess, that none can do such glorious things as the Lord hath wrought.

Ver. 6.] Whose sublime greatness doth not make him neglect (as they see in me) the meanest persons; especially when their minds are as humble as their condition: but will not let him stoop to the loftiest princes (as they may see in Saul), whom he despises, when they are forgetful of him, and ungrateful to him for his benefits.

Ver. 7.] Which have been so great to me, that, wilt revive me: thou shalt stretch forth thine hand against the wrath of mine enemies, and thy right hand shall save me.

should I fall again into the same straits wherein I was before, and be encompassed with them, I should hope that thou wouldest preserve me, and bring me safe out of them all. Thy power, I am confident, will repress the violent assaults of my enemies; and by thy almighty goodness I shall be delivered from their wrath and fury (2 Sam. v. 17, &c.; viii. 1, &c.).

Ver. 8.] The Lord, who hath begun, will go on to 8 The LORD will perfect that which concerneth me: thy mercy, O LORD, endureth for ever: forsake not the works of thine own hands.

finish his gracious intentions towards me; not for my merits (I know they are none at all,) but for thy own mercy's sake, O Lord; which, as it was the sole motive to what thou has done for me, so will I hope (for it is still the same, and ever will be) incline thee to preserve and settle me in that dignity, to which not my ambition, but thy own goodness and pleasure, hath promoted me.

PSALM CXXXIX.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 O LORD, thou hast searched me, and known me.

2 Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising, thou understandest my thought afar off.

3 Thou compassedst my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways.

4 For there is not a word in my tongue, but, lo, O LORD, thou knowest it altogether.

5 Thou hast beset me behind and before, and laid thine hand upon me.

6 Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it.

7 Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence?

8 If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there.

9 If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea;

10 Even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me.

11 If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me; even the night shall be light about me.

12 Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee;

PSALM CXXXIX.

ARGUMENT.—The last two verses of this Psalm seem to me a sufficient indication that David (to whom the title ascribes it) composed it, when he lay under the imputation of having evil designs upon Saul (1 Sam. xxiv. 9); which, as he protests against, in several parts of other Psalms, and calls God often to witness his integrity; so here he appeals unto him in a set and solemn meditation, composed on purpose to represent before him the clearness of his intentions: which never suffered such designs to enter into his thoughts. And who could believe that a man who seriously acknowledged it was impossible to conceal any thing from God's all seeing eye, who forms us in the womb, should be so impudent as to make this appeal unto him, if he were conscious to himself of any such guilt? And, which is more, how could he be confident (as he declares he was, ver. 19) that God would make his innocence evidently appear, by destroying his opposers, if he did not know they were calumniators? whose vile aspersions when God had effectually confuted, he delivered this Psalm to the master of the music, as a lasting testimony of his sincerity all along, before he came to the kingdom; and a constant admonishment to himself and others, never to promote any designs for the future by sinister arts, though managed so secretly that they lay hid from the eyes of all the world: since God cannot but be privy to them; who loves righteousness, and hates all iniquity.

Ver. 1.] I am accused, O Lord, of grievous crimes; but my comfort is, thou seest I am not guilty of them: for the exactest survey cannot make any thing so well known to us, as I am to thee; who art thoroughly acquainted with me.

Ver. 2.] Thou knowest what designs I have, when I sit musing at home; and what I go about when I stir abroad: nay, my inclinations are so perfectly understood by thee, that before I have conceived any design it is visible unto thee.

Ver. 3.] Nothing can be so narrowly sifted, as all the motions of my body and mind, both by day and by night, are scanned by thy all-penetrating eye: which comprehends and is intimately privy to all the ends which I pursue.

Ver. 4.] When I am about to speak, thou, O Lord (such is thy most admirable wisdom), needest not to be informed what it is: but knowest before I open my mouth every thing I intend to utter.

Ver. 5.] Whatsoever I have done long ago, is as well known to thee, as that which is lately passed, or which I am about to do: for I am so environed by thee, and so absolutely in thy power, that I cannot possibly escape thy notice, nor so much as stir without thy leave.

Ver. 6.] O amazing height of understanding! It is in vain to think I can hide any thing from it; which so far surpasses all I can say or conceive, that it exceeds even my admiration.

Ver. 7.] Into what world shall I go, where thou art not as present as thou art in this! It is impossible for me, should I make never so much haste, to get out of thy sight.

Ver. 8.] If I could get up into the highest part of heaven, I should not be out of thy reach; or go down and lie in the lowest depth of the earth, I should find thee still as near unto me.

Ver. 9.] If I could move as swiftly as the light of the rising sun, and in an instant fly from hence, and take up my dwelling in the remotest parts of the world:

Ver. 10.] I should not be a jot the farther from thee; without whom, as I could not get thither, so I should be still subject to thy government, and as much under the care and protection of thy almighty providence there, as any where else.

Ver. 11.] If I should have such a thought as this but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee.

13 For thou hast possessed my reins: thou hast covered me in my mother's womb.

14 I will praise thee: for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well.

15 My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth.

16 Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them.

17 How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! how great is the sum of them!

in my mind, that though thou art present every where, yet, in the dark, I may lie undiscovered by thee; it would be very foolish: for when the sun is gone down, all that is in me is as apparent unto thee, as if it were noon-day.

Ver. 12.] The darkness cannot conceal any thing from thee; who, being the fountain of light, seest as well in the blackest night as in the brightest day: the night and the day, the most open and the most covert practices, are equally clear unto thy view.

Ver. 13.] For my very thoughts (and what is there more abstruse than they?) my most retired thoughts and contrivances, and my most secret desires, are apparent to thee; whose I am, and by whom I was wrapped up in those skins, which enclosed me in my mother's womb; than which there is nothing more hidden and dark.

Ver. 14.] Yet there (such is thy stupendous wisdom, which I will never cease to praise and thankfully acknowledge) I was, I know not how, in such a wonderful manner formed, that the thoughts of it strike me with astonishment: thy operations in that work are most admirable; and of that I am exceeding sensible; but I can say no more, for they are incomprehensible.

Ver. 15.] Though I was made in so secret a place, yet not the least joint in my body was concealed from thy eyes; but I received from thee there (where no more light can come, than there doth in the lowest depths of the earth) such a comely distinction of parts, and variety of powers, that no embroidery can be so curiously wrought.

Ver. 16.] For when the matter out of which I was made was without any form, it was visible to thee how every muscle, vein, and artery, with all the rest of my body, should be wrought out of the pattern of them which was in thy mind; and accordingly, in time, when there was not so much as one of them, they were all fashioned for the several uses to which they are designed; and not the smallest of them omitted, or left imperfect.

Ver. 17.] How invaluable, also, and incomprehensible (O God, I am not able to express the high and grateful sense I have of it), is thy tender care and providence which thou hast exercised over me ever since I was born! All the secret passages of it amount 18 If I should count them, they are more in number than the sand: when I awake, I am still with thee.

19 Surely thou wilt slay the wicked, O God: depart from me therefore, ye bloody men.

20 For they speak against thee wickedly, and thine enemies take thy name in vain.

21 Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee? and am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee?

22 I hate them with perfect hatred: I count them mine enemies.

23 Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts:

24 And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.

to such a sum, that I am not able to give an account of them.

Ver. 18.] When I attempt to reckon how many they are, I find that I may as well undertake to number the sand; for, though I continue the whole day in this employment, and, after a night's rest, begin again in the next morning to think how numerous thy mercies are; I am still as far as ever from seeing any end of them.

Ver. 19.] Which makes me confident, O God, thou wilt not now desert me; but rather destroy that wicked man (Ps. cxl. 1), who, forgetting thy all-seeing eye, regards not by what means he plots my ruin: and therefore it will be the best for you all, O ye men of blood, who have slain the priests of the Lord (1 Sam. xxii. 18), and now thirst after my life, to make your retreat, and desist from persecuting me any farther.

Ver. 20.] For it is not so much me that they persecute, as virtue and piety; to which, though they are not open, yet they are the most dangerous enemies, because they make it serve their wicked ends: having godly pretences for their doing mischief; and not sticking (so little belief have they of thy omniscience) to call thee to witness the truth of their lies and calumnies.

Ver. 21.] And have I not reason then, O Lord, to hate those who have such an inveterate hatred unto thee? and to take the greatest distaste to them that oppose themselves so industriously to thy holy laws?

Ver. 22.] I detest them with all my heart; and, as their impiety is the only cause of it, so I cannot loathe them more than I do: but declare myself upon that account to be their utter enemy.

Ver. 23.] If I have any other ground of my enmity or am guilty of so much as designing any evil to them, merely because they have done so much evil to me, I desire to find it out, and submit myself to the severest trials, which may discover to me any such thought that lurketh in my heart.

Ver. 24.] For I would not continue in such a pernicious course: but if in any thing I do, I intend them any hurt, or so much as to be grievous to them, my humble request is, either that I may not live, or live more exactly by the unchangeable rules of righteousness, sincerity, and truth.

PSALM CXL.

To the chief Musician. A Psalm of David.

1 DELIVER me, O LORD, from the evil man : preserve me from the violent man ;

2 Which imagine mischiefs in their heart ; continually are they gathered together for war.

3 They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent ; adders' poison is under their lips. Selah.

4 Keep me, O LORD, from the hands of the wicked ; preserve me from the violent man ; who have purposed to overthrow my goings.

5 The proud have hid a snare for me, and cords ; they have spread a net by the wayside ; they have set gins for me. Selah.

6 I said unto the LORD, Thou art my God : hear the voice of my supplications, O LORD.

7 O God the LORD, the strength of my salvation, thou hast covered my head in the day of battle.

8 Grant not, O LORD, the desires of the wicked : further not his wicked device ; lest they exalt themselves. Selah.

9 As for the head of those that compass me about, let the mischief of their own lips cover them.

10 Let burning coals fall upon them : let them be cast into the fire ; into deep pits, that they rise not up again.

11 Let not an evil speaker be established in the earth : evil shall hunt the violent man to overthrow him.

PSALM CXL.

ARGUMENT.—There is no doubt (for the title ascribes it to him) but this Psalm was made by David. And it is little less undoubted that he composed it (as Theodoret well judges) when he was persecuted by Saul: who was instigated thereunto, by the calumnies of Doeg, and the information of the Ziphites: whose falseness and pestilent malice he here describes; beseeching God to preserve him from the mischief they intended him, and to turn it upon themselves: as he rests assured he would. When he came to his kingdom, and had settled the service of God in that manner, which we read 1 Chron. xvi. xxiii. &c. he delivered it to the master of the music; to be sung at certain times in the tabernacle. But it was not found, I suppose (no more than the two foregoing, and the four following), till some time after the other books of Psalms were published: and so were placed here all together by him that collected this book.

Ver. 1.] Defeat, O Lord, the wicked designs of that naughty man (1 Sam. xxii. 9, &c.), who makes no conscience of what he saith or doeth to compass his ends; and let me not fall into the hands of that injurious prince (xxiii. 7), whom I have never wronged, but done him faithful service.

Ver. 2.] They are zealously bent to do me all the mischief they are able: which they studiously plot, and do nothing all the day but contrive how to oppress me with armed force; which in several places they have laid to intercept me.

Ver. 3.] And they have so traduced me by their calumnies and false accusations, that they have already given my reputation a deadly wound: for the tongue of the serpent, or the teeth of the adder or viper, do not more effectually convey their poison into men's bodies, than they have infused these venomous slanders into the people's minds.

Ver. 4.] And therefore I most humbly again beseech thee, O Lord, to keep me from falling into the power of that naughty man (ver. 1), who instigates his prince to the most injurious proceedings against me: be thou my preserver, O Lord; for otherwise I shall never escape the trains they have devised and laid, to supplant and utterly undo me.

Ver. 5.] There is no hunter or fowler more industrious and cunning in laying snares and toils, in spreading nets, or setting gins and traps, for the beasts or the birds in the places which they are wont to frequent; than they are to trace me in all my motions (1 Sam. xxii. 23), and to invent all manner of wiles and subtle arts to surprise me; which they proudly presume will have their desired success.

Ver. 6.] To which I have neither cunning nor power of my own to oppose, no friend whose aid I can implore; but only commend myself unto the Lord, saying, I have always owned thee for my protector, and thou hast hitherto owned me, and been my merciful deliverer: do not now, O Lord of all power and might, deny my earnest request; who depend on thee alone for succour.

Ver. 7.] O most mighty Lord, whom no creature whatsoever can withstand; O thou who dispose of all events; I again profess, that I look for safety from thy almighty power alone: by which I was protected (having no other helmet or armour, but only that, 1 Sam. xvii. 39, 40, 50), in the day when I fought with Goliath.

Ver. 8.] Suffer not him, O most mighty Lord, who now seeks my destruction, to effect his desire; let him not succeed in any of his mischievous designs and projects against me: lest he and his partakers grow so insolent, as to dare to attempt all manner of violence against other innocents.

Ver. 9.] Let the poisonous and pernicious calumnies of those that now beset me round retort upon themselves; and let them be overwhelmed by those very devices, which with laborious lies they have contrived for my ruin.

Ver. 10.] Let their slanders (which I can compare to nothing better than burning coals, that are not easily quenched) be the instruments of their own destruction: let them perish in the flames which they themselves have kindled; and be irrecoverably thrown headlong into those dangers and mischiefs which, like dreadful deep pits, they prepared for my destruction.

Ver. 11.] This I am confident shall be their portion; for though a false informer may for a time be believed, and thrive by his lies and slanders, yet truth will at last prevail; and not suffer him to establish his greatness by such base and wicked practices: and as little shall violence and injustice avail him that relies upon them; but bring upon him one evil after another, which shall pursue him to his ruin; as the hounds do the wild beast, which, after all its windings and turnings, becomes a prey unto them.

12 I know that the Lord will maintain the cause of the afflicted, and the right of the poor.

Ver. 12.] For I am sure the Lord, who is stronger than all, will assert the cause of the oppressed: and do right to those who are destitute of human help, by punishing all that are injurious to them.

Ver. 13.] Let the righteous rely on this as an undoubted truth, that they shall give thanks to thy almighty goodness, for appearing in their vindication; and, when these false and violent men shall be extinct, they that are sincerely honest shall remain in thy favour; and receive the marks of it in thy constant care and providence over them.

13 Surely the righteous shall give thanks unto thy name: the upright shall dwell in thy presence.

PSALM CXLI.

A Psalm of David.

1 LORD, I cry unto thee: make haste unto me; give ear unto my voice, when I cry unto thee.

2 Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice.

3 Set a watch, O LORD, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips.

4 Incline not my heart to any evil thing, to practice wicked works with men that work iniquity: and let me not eat of their dainties.

5 Let the righteous smite me; it shall be a kindness: and let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head: for yet my prayer also shall be in their calamities.

6 When their judges are overthrown in stony places, they shall hear my words; for they are sweet.

7 Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth.

8 But mine eyes are unto thee, O God the LORD: in thee is my trust; leave not my soul destitute.

9 Keep me from the snares which they have

PSALM. CXLI.

ARGUMENT.—If the title had not told us that David was the author of this Psalm, the matter of it would have led our minds to think of him, and his many sufferings, during the persecution of Saul. Which he prays to God (as Theodoret observes upon the third and fourth verses) he may be able to bear so patiently, that it may not exasperate his spirit to speak irreverently of Saul, much less to do him any mischief: but leave it unto God, to take his enemies in the snare they had laid for him.

Nobody need wonder, that there are so many prayers found upon the same subject; for that persecution endured long, and they were made upon different occasions, or to different purposes: and if they had been all to the same purpose, it would not have been strange to him that considers the pious disposition of David; who loved to spend his time in such devout meditations. And this seems to have been composed about the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice (ver. 2), when his afflictions also pressed him sorely, that they tempted him to speak something which was, ex impetis (as Theodoret's phrase is), unbecoming God's anointed (Saul), and the profession he made of duty to him.

Ver. 1.] The danger wherein I am, O Lord, is exceeding great (1 Sam. xxiii. 25; xxiv. 1, 2), which makes me double my cries, and beseech thee the more importunately, speedily to succour me (when my distresses call for it) with seasonable relief.

Ver. 2.] Though I am now in a wilderness, and thereby disabled from offering thee any other sacrifice but my prayers; yet they shall be as acceptable to thee, as if they were accompanied with the sweetest odours; and my fervent devotion in them, with entire dependence on thee alone for help, be as prevalent as if I now could present thee, at the tabernacle, with an evening oblation.

Ver. 3.] And in the first place, I humbly desire thee, O Lord, to lay such restraints upon my tongue, and to enable me so vigilantly to observe all the motions of it; that none of the troubles I endure, though never so grievous, may make me burst out into any intemperate speeches; which may give a just offence to them that persecute me.

Ver. 4.] Yea, govern all the motions of my will so steadily, that I may not listen to evil counsels (1 Sam. xxiv. 4, 6, 7), much less engage with men, who have no regard to right and justice, in any evil practices; but always refuse to partake in their designs; though invited with the specious promises of the greatest felicity.

Ver. 5.] I had rather much that a righteous man should give me a severe rebuke, than be enticed by evil-doers to accompany them in their sins: for it will do me a real kindness, and be so far from giving me any vexation, that it will be as acceptable to me as the most excellent ointments are unto the head; and only make me continue my prayers with the greater earnestness, that I may not run into those mischievous courses, from which I am deterred by their pious reprofs and admonitions.

Ver. 6.] The effect of which their greatest rulers have seen, when, being left by their masters on the sides of the rock (1 Sam. xxiv. 2, 3), while he went into a hole of it to uncover his feet, they heard that I spake not a reviling word (much less did I stretch out my hand against him), but in the mildest and most dutiful language addressed myself unto him (1 Sam. xxiv. 8, 9, &c.).

Ver. 7.] And yet this gentleness hath been so far from mollifying their hearts, that they still persecute me, and the small body of men that follow me (1 Sam. xxvi. 2; xxvii. 1), whom they have reduced to such extremities, that, like the earth when it is ploughed up, we break in pieces; and are ready to disperse and flee for our lives, with little hope of safety.

Ver. 8.] But in this sore distress I fix my thoughts on thee, O mighty Lord, the governor of all things; in whom I repose an assured confidence, that thou wilt not abandon me to the malice of those that seek to take away my life from me.

Ver. 9.] Preserve me, I beseech thee, from all the laid for me, and the gins of the workers of iniquity.

subtle plots which they have laid to destroy me: and though they stick at nothing (though never so unjust), and have various arts to blind the world, and hide their perfidious designs; suffer me not to be ensnared by them.

PSALM CXLII.

Maschil of David. A Prayer when he was in the cave.

1 I CRIED unto the LORD with my voice; with my voice unto the LORD did I make my supplication.

2 I poured out my complaint before him; I shewed before him my trouble.

3 When my spirit was overwhelmed within me, then thou knewest my path. In the way wherein I walked have they privily laid a snare for me.

4 I looked on my right hand, and beheld, but

10 Let the wicked fall into their own nets, whilst that I withal escape.

Ver. 10.] But let all the contrivances of such wicked men prove pernicious to themselves; and bring upon them the evils which they intended me: whilst I, and they that are with me, by thy care of us, escape untouched by any of them.

PSALM CXLII.

ARGUMENT.—When David hid himself for fear of Saul, in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. xxii. 1), or as others think, more probable, in the cave of Engedi (1 Sam. xxiv. 1—3), this was the meditation he had in that disconsolate place, before Saul came thither to uncover his feet in it. Which was set afterward to the tune of maschil (see Ps. xxxii.); or called by that name, because it admirably instructs posterity in the most forlorn, nay desperate, condition, to recommend themselves to God, and to depend on him with a resolved faith. Who, by an unexpected means, granted the desire of David, which he makes in the conclusion of this Psalm (ver. 7), and brought him out of those straits wherein he was imprisoned. I say resolved faith, because in the Hebrew words of the first and second verses run thus: “I will cry unto the Lord; I will make my supplication; I will pour out my complaint before him,” &c.

Ver. 1.) Though I am destitute of human help, I will not despair of safety; but with the more fervent cries implore the divine succour: and with vehement sighs and groans deprecate the Lord’s displeasure.

Ver. 2.] I will lay before him at large all the sad thoughts which perplex my heart: and, representing the inextricable straits and difficulties wherein I am, expose myself unto him; as an object of his pity.

Ver. 3.] Now that I am utterly at a loss, and ready to faint away in a confusion of thoughts, thou know-there was no man that would know me: refuge failed me; no man cared for my soul.

5 I cried unto thee, O LORD: I said, Thou art my refuge and my portion in the land of the living.

6 Attend unto my cry; for I am brought very low: deliver me from my persecutors; for they are stronger than I.

7 Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name: the righteous shall compass me about; for thou shalt deal bountifully with me.

est very well a way for my escape: though, by the intelligence they hold with mine enemies (1 Sam. xxiv. 1), they have blocked up all the passages which I am acquainted withal; and laid ambushes for me in every road.

Ver. 4.] Look about thee, O my soul, and see if thou canst spy any hope of relief from thy best and most powerful friends: there are none of them that dare own thee; nor do I know whither to fly for safety, if any of them would be so kind as to invent a means, and open my way, for my deliverance from the present danger.

Ver. 5.] All that I can do, is to recommend myself to thee, O Lord, by fervent prayers, saying, I trust myself with thy almighty goodness, as in a sure sanctuary; I have nothing else in the world to depend upon, but thee alone; by whom I will hope to be protected and provided for as long as I live.

Ver. 6.] O let my importunate cry prevail for some relief, which will come most seasonably in this exceeding great necessity: rescue me now, that I may not fall into the hands of my persecutors; who are every way (except in these cries unto, and confidence, in thee) much too strong for me.

Ver. 7.] Bring me, with life and liberty, out of this dismal cave, wherein I am pent up; that I may make my thankful acknowledgments to thy almighty goodness: which shall attract the admiration of all good men, and provoke them unanimously to join together with me in praising thee; when they see that thou art the most righteous judge, and bountiful benefactor, of those that commit themselves unto thee.

PSALM CXLIII.

A Psalm of David.

1 HEAR my prayer, O LORD, give ear to my supplication: in thy faithfulness answer me, and in thy righteousness.

2 And enter not into judgment with thy servant: for in thy sight shall no man living be justified.

PSALM CXLIII.

ARGUMENT.—To the title of A Psalm of David, Theodoret says he found, in some Greek copies, these words added (to explain the time of its composition), “when Absalom his son persecuted him.” Which he confesses was not then in the Hebrew (no more than it is now), nor in other interpreters

3 For the enemy hath persecuted my soul; he hath smitten my life down to the ground; he hath made me to dwell in darkness, as those that have been long dead.

4 Therefore is my spirit overwhelmed within me; my heart within me is desolate.

5 I remember the days of old; I meditate on all thy works; I muse on the work of thy hands.

6 I stretch forth my hands unto thee: my soul thirsteth after thee, as a thirsty land. Selah.

7 Hear me speedily, O LORD: my spirit fail-eth: hide not thy face from me, lest I be like unto them that go down into the pit.

8 Cause me to hear thy lovingkindness in the morning; for in thee do I trust: cause me to know the way wherein I should walk: for I lift up my soul unto thee.

9 Deliver me, O LORD, from mine enemies: I flee unto thee to hide me.

10 Teach me to do thy will; for thou art my God: thy spirit is good; lead me into the land of uprightness.

11 Quicken me, O LORD, for thy name's sake: for thy righteousness' sake bring my soul out of trouble.

12 And of thy mercy cut off mine enemies, and destroy all them that afflict my soul: for I am thy servant.

of the Psalms; but agrees well enough, he thinks, with the truth of the story. So he that was the author of the Vulgar Latin thought also; though there are some passages in the Psalm, which sound as if it had been made during the persecution of Saul; at some time when he was in the like distress with that described in the foregoing. For ver. 3, 4, he uses some of the same expressions which we find there; and represents himself as in danger to be buried in some such cave as that mentioned in the last verse of Ps. cxlii. where he begs, as he doth here, for a speedy deliverance. Yet, for all this, there are other passages, which will incline us to adhere to the forenamed addition, and apply the Psalm to his flight with Absalom. For then it was he had most reason to fear, lest God should deal with him according to his sins; which he deprecates (ver. 2), with such a deep sense of his unworthiness, that it hath made this to be numbered among the penitential Psalms, and is the last of them. The memory also of God's former deliverances of him, a great while before (ver. 5), may well refer to what he had done for him, not only against Saul, but before he knew him; which, as he doth not forget, so he hoped the Lord would now remember, and grant him the like again, when he was in the like distresses.

Ver. 1.] I renew my requests and my earnest supplications unto thee, O Lord, for some relief, in these new straits and difficulties into which I am fallen: hoping, though I am very unworthy, yet, in thy abundant mercy, thou wilt faithfully fulfil the promises thou hast made to me.

Ver. 2.] My sins, indeed (2 Sam. xii. 9—11), have justly brought these troubles upon me; but I humbly beseech thee to own me still for thy servant, and not to call me unto a severe account for what I have done amiss; but to deal favourably with me: for if thou shouldst proceed according to the rigour of the law, the best man living (much less so great a sinner as I), will not be acquitted at thy tribunal.

Ver. 3.] And I am not so bad, but my enemy that persecutes me is far worse: who without any provocation seeks my life, and hath already utterly spoiled me of all the comforts of it (2 Sam. xv. 13), and forced me to seek my safety in holes and obscure places, in the wilderness (xvii. 16), where I seem to be buried alive without any hope of a resurrection.

Ver. 4.] Which, as it calls to mind the distress wherein I was, when, in my flight from Saul, I hid myself in caves (see cxlii. 3), so it hath the same effect upon me; for I am ready to swoon away in this great perplexity; which hath struck me with such astonishment, that I have no strength remaining in me.

Ver. 5.] Till I call to mind, withal, not only what thou didst for me in that former persecution, but long before, in my younger days, when I was delivered by thee from the greatest dangers (1 Sam. xvii. 34, &c.): on these wonderful works I meditate; and consider with myself, that not by my own strength, but by thy stupendous power, I was then preserved.

Ver. 6.] And then I feel my fainting spirits return again; and though I despair of human help, I make my prayer unto thee, with a cheerful confidence for thy relief; which I long for, and expect with as eager desire as the parched ground gasps for a refreshing shower.

Ver. 7.] Do not delay it, O Lord, I most earnestly beseech thee; for I am not able to hold out much longer in this great extremity: deny not my humble request, lest I be utterly lost (as I am in danger), without all hope of recovery (2 Sam. xvii. 16).

Ver. 8.] Though this night be very sad, yet let me hear (according to the confidence I repose in thy mercy) better news, and see my affairs in a more comfortable posture, in the morning (2 Sam. xvii. 22, 23). Show me which way I shall direct my course, and provide for my safety, (ver. 24, 27), for I depend entirely upon thee.

Ver. 9.] Let me not fall into the hand of my enemies, from whom I am now flying; but know not whither to go, but only to thee, for shelter and protection.

Ver. 10.] Whose guidance I beseech, as well as defence, that I may do nothing (no, not for my preservation) but what is perfectly agreeable to thy laws; for thy favour is my security, which I know is not otherways to be obtained: and therefore I desire the conduct of thy good Spirit (which is ready to assist those that seek it), as well to lead me in the plain path of justice and piety, as to suggest to me the ways and means of escaping the snares of my enemies; and of coming into an honest country, where I may be free from the fear of being betrayed to them.

Ver. 11.] I have nothing to move thee to it, but only the honour it will be unto thy majesty; in respect to which I hope, O Lord, thou wilt preserve me from perishing, and restore me again to thy kingdom: for though my straits are so great that my life is in extreme danger, yet nothing can hinder the performance of thy just and faithful promise to me.

Ver. 12.] Thy mercy also surpasses all the malice of my enemies; whom I trust thou wilt cut off and destroy, rather than let me continue in these hazards: for I am thy minister, and, though never so unworthy, am appointed by thee to govern thy people; in which office I will do thee all faithful service.

PSALM CXLIV.

A Psalm of David.

1 BLESSED be the LORD my strength, which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight:

2 My goodness, and my fortress; my high tower, and my deliverer; my shield, and he in whom I trust; who subdueth my people under me.

3 LORD, what is man, that thou takest knowledge of him! or the son of man, that thou makest account of him!

4 Man is like to vanity: his days are as a shadow that passeth away.

5 Bow thy heavens, O LORD, and come down: touch the mountains, and they shall smoke.

PSALM CXLIV.

ARGUMENT.—The inscription will not let us doubt that David was the author of this Psalm; but that it was a triumph after his victory over Goliath (as the Vulgar Latin hath it), is asserted without ground. For though some Greek copies have such an addition to the inscription; yet Theodoret says, that as he could not find it in the Hebrew, so it was not to be met withal in any other interpreters, no, not in the LXX. in the Hexaplus. And it plainly appears by the second verse, that it was composed after he came to the kingdom; and not then, till he had got some victories over those that opposed him. Nay, there are so many expressions here like to those we meet withal in Psalm xviii. that it hath inclined some to think it was made at the same time, and for the same purpose, with that; of which it looks like a compendium, and might be intended for a short form of thanksgiving for his deliverance from all his enemies. But if the expressions be carefully examined, their opinion will appear to be truer, who think it was composed, not after God had given him rest from all his enemies, but after those two victories over the Philistines, mentioned 2 Sam. v., if not before them: for as he still mentions more opposers who were unsubdued (ver. 7, 11), so he doth not say, as in Ps. xviii. that God had cast forth lightnings, and shot his arrows against them, &c., but desires him here (ver. 5, 6), that he would appear in that manner for him; acknowledging that not only his kingdom, but his courage, his victories, and successes, were all to be ascribed unto God.

Ver. 1.] Praised be the Lord, by me, and by all men else; by whom I have been kept in safety, as in an impregnable fortress: and who hath given me both strength and skill to handle my arms, whensoever I engaged, either in a single combat or in battles.

Ver. 2.] I ever found him very merciful unto me, when I was in any danger; for he still preserved me as in a strong hold; nay, set me out of the reach of the most potent enemies; either making a way for my escape when they surrounded me, or protecting me in their most furious assaults upon me: and, as I reposed a constant trust in him, so he hath never failed my expectation; but, after long contests, made all Israel submit themselves unto thy empire (2 Sam. v. 7, &c.).

6 Cast forth lightning, and scatter them. shoot out thine arrows, and destroy them.

7 Send thine hand from above; rid me, and deliver me out of great waters, from the hand of strange children;

8 Whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood.

9 I will sing a new song unto thee, O God: upon a psaltery and an instrument of ten strings will I sing praises unto thee.

10 It is he that giveth salvation unto kings: who delivereth David his servant from the hurtful sword.

11 Rid me, and deliver me from the hand of

Ver. 3.] I am astonished, O Lord, at this thy wonderful goodness; and know not what to say, but only admire that thou shouldst take such care of so poor a thing as man is, at the best: especially of me, a miserable wretch; whom thou hast honoured with most glorious successes.

Ver. 4.] Man, alas! is but a breath which presently vanishes: what a marvel is it then, that I should have strength to achieve such things! His life is exceeding short and uncertain; and yet, such is thy stupendous goodness, I am not only alive, notwithstanding all the hazards through which I have run; but, in a little time, have performed such memorable acts, that the fame of them will last for ever.

Ver. 5.] Proceed, O Lord, to perfect my conquest; and now that my enemies are combined against me (2 Sam. viii.), let thy majesty appear, as it hath done formerly (see Ps. xviii. 9), for my assistance and defence: and as soon as the proudest opposers feel that thou art present, they will vanish away like smoke.

Ver. 6.] Let them be dispersed by flashes of lightning in their faces: and so terrified with thunder and hail, that they may not be able to re-collect their forces.

Ver. 7.] Send powerful aid unto me from heaven (Ps. xviii. 16), for I rely upon nothing on earth: relieve me in all my straits; and deliver me out of these great and manifold dangers, wherewith I am threatened by a foreign power of idolatrous people, which now invade me:

Ver. 8.] Who, as they have been wont to brag of more than they do, so promise more than they will ever perform: for whatsoever treaties of peace and leagues of friendship I make with them, they break them all; and falsify so shamefully both their words and their oaths, that there is no trust to be given to them (ver. 11).

Ver. 9.] I will never prove ungrateful to thee for so great a benefit: but here solemnly vow to compose, with my best skill, new hymns of thanks unto thee, O God; and with the usual instruments of music sing thy praises, saying,

Ver. 10.] It is not merely by the conduct and valour of our captains and soldiers that we have overcome; but the most powerful kings owe their safety, and their victories, unto the Lord: to whom I am more particularly bound; first, for the high honour he hath done for me, in making me his minister; and now, for this deliverance from these mighty armies, which threaten my destruction (2 Sam. viii.).

strange children, whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood:

12 That our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth; that our daughters may be as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace:

13 That our garners may be full, affording all

Ver. 11.] Grant my renewed request, therefore, I beseech thee, (ver. 7, 8), and send me seasonable relief and deliverance from this foreign invasion of an idolatrous people: who have no faith nor honesty, but shamefully falsify both their words and their oaths; and when they shake hands with others, as if they were their friends, intend thereby to deceive them.

Ver. 12.] Let not our country be overrun by such barbarians; but be so preserved by thee in peace and tranquillity, that our hopeful sons may grow up like young flourishing trees, till they attain their full strength and stature, and our daughters be tall and beautiful, like those polished pillars, which are the ornaments of a royal palace.

Ver. 13.] Our granaries also and storehouses, being manner of store: that our sheep may bring forth thousands and ten thousands in our streets:

14 That our oxen may be strong to labour; that there be no breaking in, nor going out; that there be no complaining in our streets.

15 Happy is that people, that is in such a case: yea, happy is that people, whose God is the Lord.

as full as they can hold, may afford us all sorts of provision from year to year: and our flocks of sheep bring forth thousands; which may multiply into ten thousands, in their walks.

Ver. 14.] Our cows also, being great with young, may neither be driven away by the irruption of our enemies, nor cast their calves at home; but we may be free from this and all other causes of crying, or complaining, in our streets.

Ver. 15.] Happy is that nation, which is settled in such a prosperous condition! That is, happy is that nation which truly worships the great Lord of the world; who hath promised (Deut. xxviii.), to bless his faithful servants with these and all other fruits of his love.

PSALM CXLV.

David's Psalm of praise.

1 I WILL extol thee, my God, O king; and I will bless thy name for ever and ever.

2 Every day will I bless thee; and I will praise thy name for ever and ever.

3 Great is the LORD, and greatly to be praised; and his greatness is unsearchable.

4 One generation shall praise thy works to another, and shall declare thy mighty acts.

5 I will speak of the glorious honour of thy majesty, and of thy wondrous works.

6 And men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts: and I will declare thy greatness.

PSALM CXLV.

ARGUMENT.—After David had obtained those favours of God for himself and for the nation, which he begs in the foregoing Psalm, he composed (according to his promise there, ver. 9), this admirable hymn: which is contrived with such art, that it is manifest from thence, he made it when he was much at leisure; and God had given him rest from all his enemies (2 Sam. vii. 1), for every verse begins with a new letter of the alphabet in order: which are all here, except the letter nun, which is wanting (ver. 13), I suppose it was lost when this Psalm came to the hands of the collector of this book; and he would not adventure to supply it with one of his own inventing. The Greek, indeed (that is, the present Greek copies; for Theodotion, and Aquila, and the ancient LXX. had it not), and Latin, and Arabic (which in effect are but one and the same), have another verse, which we may well think, if it ever were in the Hebrew, began with that letter nun: but it differs so little from the seventeenth verse (when there is no repetition in any other part of the Psalm), that it doth not, in my opinion, look like the true original verse. And it may be doubted, whether there ever was any such verse in that place (where we suppose one wanting), for the psalmist might be carried (see Ps. xxv.), by the strength of the inspiration, which was upon him, out of the method he had at first proposed to himself.

Certain it is, this Psalm was always esteemed so excellent, that the title of the whole book of Psalms is taken from this; which is wholly spent in praising God with such admirable devotion, that the ancient Hebrews were wont to say (as Valentine Schindler hath long ago observed), “He could not fail to be a child of the world to come, who would say this Psalm three times every day.” And for that reason, perhaps, it was composed alphabetically; that so useful a Psalm might be the more easily learnt, and remembered by every body.

Ver. 1.] I will proclaim to all the world, O my God, the supreme governor of heaven and earth, how excellent thy majesty is; infinitely surpassing the highest of our thoughts: and will never cease to express the delightful sense I have of all thy glorious attributes; whereby thou art made known unto us.

Ver. 2.] This shall be my daily employment; and I will sing joyful hymns in praise of thy glorious perfections, without any end.

Ver. 3.] For the Lord is immensely great, in power, and dominion, and all other ways, and therefore to be honoured with our highest, and with our endless praises: but when we have said all we can, our best praise of him will be, to confess that his transcendent excellences cannot be comprehended.

Ver. 4.] For there are none of thy works, which we see, that we are able to understand; but, though this age transmit its observations to the next, and that recommend the study of them to posterity, yet still we are ignorant, and cannot praise them enough; no, nor sufficiently declare the prodigious acts of thy marvellous providence, for the preservation of thy people, which shall be perpetually commemorated.

7 They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and shall sing of thy righteousness.

8 The LORD is gracious, and full of compassion; slow to anger, and of great mercy.

9 The LORD is good to all: and his tender mercies are over all his works.

10 All thy works shall praise thee, O LORD; and thy saints shall bless thee.

11 They shall speak of the glory of thy kingdom, and talk of thy power;

12 To make known to the sons of men his mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom.

13 Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations.

Ver. 5.] It shall be my business, in this present age, to speak of the dazzling splendour and beauty of thy majesty; which I want words to express, but appears in thy stupendous works.

Ver. 6.] Which they that come after shall rehearse; and from the narratives that I shall make of thy magnificent greatness, declare to their posterity, what dreadful things were done by thy irresistible power, for the subversion of our enemies.

Ver. 7.] And with the same diligence shall they continue the constant memory of thy numerous benefits to us: which they shall no more cease to celebrate with their praises, than a spring doth to pour out water; but publish, in their perpetual hymns, how just and faithful thou art to thy word.

Ver. 8.] For the Lord (this shall be the subject of their and of my song) is exceeding propense to do us good; and very indulgent when we do amiss: which makes him that he doth not presently punish, but rather chooses to bestow new and greater benefits upon us, if we repent of our faults.

Ver. 9.] Nor is his goodness confined unto us; but extends itself in various acts of bounty to all mankind: who need not doubt of his kindness, when they see he takes so tender a care of all his creatures.

Ver. 10.] Who all in their several kinds declare, O Lord, throughout all generations, how great, how wise, how powerful, and provident, thou art; which such as we, who are particularly bound unto thee for special favours bestowed upon us, ought most sensibly to acknowledge with thankful praises.

Ver. 11.] It is their duty to discourse of the incomparable wisdom, and goodness, and care, which thou exercise in the government of the whole world; especially of us; and to recount the memorable acts of thy invincible power among us.

Ver. 12.] That all mankind, who regard not such things so much as they ought, may be made sensible how mighty the Lord is: and adore the amazing splendour of his illustrious works; and the admirable order he observes in his government of all things.

Ver. 13.] Which as they are all entirely subject to him, so his empire over them is immovable; and neither ends nor decays: but when earthly kingdoms fail, and are transferred from one to another, his dominion is still the same throughout all successions.

14 The LORD upholdeth all that fall, and raiseth up all those that be bowed down.

15 The eyes of all wait upon thee; and thou givest them their meat in due season.

16 Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing.

17 The LORD is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works.

18 The LORD is high unto all them that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth.

19 He will fulfil the desire of them that fear him: he also will hear their cry, and will save them.

20 The LORD preserveth all them that love him: but all the wicked will he destroy.

21 My mouth shall speak the praise of the LORD: and let all flesh bless his holy name for ever and ever.

Ver. 14.] In which he doth not neglect any of his subjects that depend upon him (as mortal princes too frequently do), but supports and comforts the meanest of them that are oppressed with grievous afflictions; and gives them a seasonable deliverance, when they are in danger to sink and perish under the heavy weight of their burdens.

Ver. 15.] He makes a constant provision also for them; which every creature, when their necessities call for supply, daily receive from thee, O Lord, in the proper season for it.

Ver. 16.] And thou art not sparing of thy blessings; but dispensest them with such a bountiful hand, that there are none of them live without satisfactions, but have all their appetites filled, by thy liberality to the smallest of them.

Ver. 17.] And therefore let us not doubt, but thankfully acknowledge, that the Lord is not only just in all the dispensations of his providence to us (though perhaps we do not apprehend it), but exceeding merciful and kind in every thing that befalls us.

Ver. 18.] We need do no more but piously commend ourselves to him, and he will take care of us: for he is ready, on all occasions, to relieve every one that addresses himself unto him, with a sincere heart, truly disposed to be faithful to him.

Ver. 19.] He that satisfies the appetite of all creatures (ver. 16), will not fail, we may be confident, to gratify in their desires, such religious persons as fear to offend him: but though he let them fall into troubles and straits, in due time will be moved, by their importunate prayers, to send them a seasonable deliverance.

Ver. 20.] For since they love him so well, that they had rather suffer any thing than disobey him; the Lord undoubtedly will preserve them: and destroy all those impious men, who have no regard to his laws; nor make any scruple to abuse and oppress such virtuous persons.

Ver. 21.] For which, and all the rest of his benefits, I will never cease to sing hymns of praise unto the Lord: and let all mankind (remembering how weak and frail they are) join together with me in this employment (as the greatest support, and comfort, and security they have), to bless his incomparable goodness, and power, and careful providence, for ever and ever.

PSALM CXLVI.

Hallelujah.

1 PRAISE ye the LORD. Praise the LORD, O my soul.

2 While I live will I praise the LORD: I will sing praises unto my God while I have any being.

3 Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help.

4 His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish.

5 Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the LORD his God:

6 Which made heaven, and earth, the sea, and all that therein is: which keepeth truth for ever:

7 Which executeth judgment for the oppressed: which giveth food to the hungry. The LORD looseth the prisoners:

8 The LORD openeth the eyes of the blind: the LORD raiseth them that are bowed down: the LORD loveth the righteous:

9 The LORD preserveth the strangers; he releiveth the fatherless and widow: but the way of the wicked he turneth upside down.

10 The LORD shall reign for ever, even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations. Praise ye the LORD.

PSALM CXLVI.

ARGUMENT.—This Psalm, and the other four which follow, both begin and conclude with the word Hallelujah, i. e. Praise ye the Lord. And therefore might, if the Jews had pleased, have been called The great Hallelujah: being all of them exhortations and incitements to the people; to stir up themselves to that heavenly employment: which this Psalm recommends to them, from the consideration of several of the divine excellences: which make him the proper object of our confidence in all conditions. The Vulgar Latin, and the present Greek, entitle it to Haggai and Zechariah: but there is no such thing in the Hebrew, nor in other ancient interpreters, nor in the LXX. in the Hexaplas, as Theodoret tells us. And we might rather think it not unlikely to have been composed by David; when Saul, who at first had a great kindness for him, afterward turned his most bitter enemy; were it not for one word, viz. the mention of Zion; which was not then in David's possession. This, it is possible, inclined those that made the foregoing title to think it was not composed till aftertimes: and they could find none so likely, as that after the captivity: when they soon found it was in vain to rely upon the favour of princes; some of which hindered the building of the temple, as much as Cyrus, at the first, had furthered it. I shall not trouble the reader with any other conjectures: but only note, that the eighth verse was most exactly and literally fulfilled in our Lord Christ; when he came to give salvation to us.

Ver. 1.] Stir up thyself, O my soul, to give the Lord, who gave being to all things, those affectionate praises which are due unto him.

Ver. 2.] The best resolution thou canst make is this; I will praise the Lord all my life long; and never cease to give thanks unto my God, who never ceases to bestow his benefits on me.

Ver. 3.] And let all mankind, if they would be happy, preserve his favour by being grateful to him; and not (with the neglect of his service) court the favour of princes, and settle upon them their dependence: for the greatest king on earth, though never so just, never so bountiful, as well as rich and powerful, is still but a man; who cannot be present every where when we are in danger, nor be able always to help us in our greatest needs.

Ver. 4.] For there is a time when he cannot help himself, nor, by the whole power of his empire, keep his soul from leaving his body: nay, a small accident may carry him away suddenly; and then a clod of earth can do as much as he, and whatsoever designs and projects he had laid (for any man's preferment suppose), they all die together with him.

Ver. 5.] He, and he alone, is the truly happy man, who expects help from the mighty God, by whom Jacob was fed all his life long (Gen. xlviii. 15), who trusts to him that is Lord of the world; and hath made him his friend so much, that he can call him his God.

Ver. 6.] For, as he never dies, so there can be no defect in his power, nor want of his presence in every place; the heavens, the earth, and the sea, and all that is in them, being his own works: and, as nothing can hinder him from doing what he pleases, so, he will never alter his mind, nor go back with his word; but faithfully keep his promises for ever, with those that rely upon them.

Ver. 7.] There are innumerable instances of the careful providence of this great king: who doth not slight or forget the cries of his grieved subjects, but in due time asserts the rights of those who are oppressed, and can find no relief in other courts of judgment: he supplies also the needs of poor hungry wretches, who are ready to famish: and is so gracious a Lord, that he sets them at liberty, who, by unjust or pitiless men, have been held in miserable captivity.

Ver. 8.] The Lord sends help, when there are no hopes of human cure; for he restores sight to the blind (as we shall see most remarkably when the Lord Christ appears), and lifts up those who are bowed together, by tedious weaknesses (Luke xiii. 11), or crushed under other insupportable burdens: and, above all, the Lord delights to do good to them who have done good to others.

Ver. 9.] The friendless strangers are preserved by the Lord from those injuries which men are apt to do them, when they commit themselves to his protection: and so do the disconsolate widows and fatherless children find support and relief from him, against the injustice and violence of their wicked oppressors, whose designs and practices he utterly confoundeth.

Ver. 10.] Be of good comfort, then, O ye inhabitants of Zion, who sincerely worship this great Lord, that doth all these wondrous things: for his power and authority never fail, but from age to age will ever succour those pious souls who are destitute of human help; therefore praise perpetually this everlasting king.

PSALM CXLVII.

Hallelujah (see xlv.).

1 PRAISE ye the LORD : for it is good to sing praises unto our God; for it is pleasant; and praise is comely.

2 The LORD doth build up Jerusalem : he gathereth together the outcasts of Israel.

3 He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds.

4 He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names.

5 Great is our LORD, and of great power : his understanding is infinite.

6 The LORD lifteth up the meek : he casteth the wicked down to the ground.

7 Sing unto the LORD with thanksgiving; sing praise upon the harp unto our God:

8 Who covereth the heaven with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, who maketh grass to grow upon the mountains.

9 He giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry.

10 He delighteth not in the strength of the horse : he taketh not pleasure in the legs of a man.

11 The LORD taketh pleasure in them that fear him, in those that hope in his mercy.

12 Praise the LORD, O Jerusalem; praise thy God, O Zion.

PSALM CXLVII.

ARGUMENT.—St. Chrysostom and Theodoret think this Psalm hath respect to the return of the Jewish nation from the captivity of Babylon, and the instauration of Jerusalem, which followed upon it. And the second and thirteenth verses may well incline us to be of the opinion, that it was made by some holy man at that time (Haggai or Zechariah some ancient interpreters imagine; or rather Nehemiah, who built the walls and set up the gates); especially if we observe that there are some phrases in it which savour of the Chaldean language. And though this can be no more than a conjecture, yet it is very certain and evident, that, in that deliverance, God gave such illustrious proofs of his power, wisdom, mercy, and justice, as the Psalmist here exhorts the people to celebrate with their thankful praises. I shall follow it therefore in my paraphrase; it being reasonable to suppose that devout persons would be as forward to acknowledge the wonderful providence of God in their restoration, as they were to bewail (which they do, Ps. cxxxvii.) the ruin of their country; and that posterity would be no less careful to preserve what was composed in memory of the one, than they had been to continue the memory of the other: and there is no hymn we can find so suitable to that occasion as this.

Ver. 1.] Let all the nations praise the Lord; who will send us new benefits when we are truly thankful to him, our great benefactor, for the old: for it is a thing highly acceptable to him, as well as delightful to those who are employed therein, and best becomes us of all other things; there being nothing so decent as to see men grateful to him that hath obliged them.

Ver. 2.] To which we stand bound above all other men: for the Lord hath not only delivered us out of a sad captivity; but, in spite of all the opposition our enemies have made to it (Ezra iv. 12), hath raised Jerusalem out of its ruins; whereby he invites the rest of our brethren, who remained behind, to return to their own country, from whence they are expelled.

Ver. 3.] He comforts us after our long sorrows, which had, in a manner, broken our heart with grief and sadness; and hath, in some measure, repaired our breaches, which, like a festering wound, endangered the life of our nation.

Ver. 4.] Whom he knows how to gather, out of all their dispersions, and to find every one of them where-soever they are, though as numerous as the stars of heaven (Gen. xv. 5), which he as directly and exactly understands (how confusedly soever they seem to us to be scattered in the sky), as we do those things which we call by their proper names.

Ver. 5.] Let us not despair of it, for nothing is impossible with our Lord and governor: who is not like earthly kings, that rule over a few petty provinces, but the great sovereign of the whole world; whose power and wisdom are so unlimited, that he is able to do whatever he pleases, and knows how to compass whatever he designs.

Ver. 6.] And doth not, because he is so great, despise the afflicted; but, if they meekly commit themselves to his care, will raise them up to a better condition; and throw down the mightiest princes that proudly oppress them as low as the very ground.

Ver. 7.] Celebrate therefore with your thankful songs (you cannot make a less return unto him), this infinite power, and wisdom, and goodness: begin now, with the usual instruments of music, to sing hymns of praise unto our God, for all his benefits.

Ver. 8.] Particularly for the great plenty he hath given us by his almighty goodness (Hag. ii. 4), which shows itself, first in raising vapours from the earth; and then turning them into clouds, wherewith he covers the face of heaven; and then bringing forth rain out of those clouds: which he sends back to the earth again; and makes not only the green pastures but the parched mountains and desert places become fruitful.

Ver. 9.] By which wonderful providence he provides food even for the wild goats, and such-like beasts, that live upon the top of craggy rocks: for he neglects not the vilest creatures, but satisfies the hunger of the young ravens; though it be so ravenous, that they are continually crying for new supplies.

Ver. 10.] Let us not doubt, then, but he that takes care of crows, will much more take care of us; and not be afraid, though we are of little force (Neh. iv. 3, 4; vii. 4), and have no armies of horse and foot to defend us: for the Lord (who fights for us, Neh. iv. 20), hath no need of these; and will not take part with our enemies, because they are superior to us in the strength of their horses, and the nimbleness of their soldiers.

Ver. 11.] But delights to give those his assistance and protection, who, worshipping him devoutly, fear to offend him; and having no help in themselves, nor any earthly refuge to fly unto, depend notwithstanding with a steadfast faith on his infinite mercy.

Ver. 12.] Praise the Lord, O ye inhabitants of Jerusalem; sing joyful hymns unto your God, O ye people of Zion (Neh. xii. 27, 31, 40, 43), who have seen this truth abundantly demonstrated in your days.

13 For he hath strengthened the bars of thy gates; he hath blessed thy children within thee.

14 He maketh peace in thy borders, and filleth thee with the finest of the wheat.

15 He sendeth forth his commandment upon earth: his word runneth very swiftly.

16 He giveth snow like wool: he scattereth the hoarfrost like ashes.

Ver. 13.] For he hath made this city, which was lately without walls and gates, so strong a place, that no enemy dare assault it (Nch. vi. 14—16), and hath increased the number of thy citizens, which were but few (vii. 4; xi. 1, 2), by the manifold blessings he hath poured out on them.

Ver. 14.] Which are not confined within the walls of that city; but he hath settled all the country in peace: no enemy appearing to infest thy borders, and to disturb the husbandmen in their labours, which have produced so rich a crop, that plentiful provision is made for all our satisfaction.

Ver. 15.] This we ought to ascribe to his merciful providence, who shows, by the fruitful seasons he sends, after all things seem to be killed by a hard winter, that he doth not intend by our affliction to destroy us; and that he can easily bring all our brethren hither who remain still in captivity: for when he would have any alteration made in the earth, it is done as speedily as we can speak.

Ver. 16.] He sends, for instance, a sudden cold; which sometimes turns the moist vapours, in the air, into flakes of snow, to cover the earth as with a fleece of wool, and defend the corn from the biting winds, and sometimes into hoary frost, which he gently scatters and strews, like ashes, upon the earth.

Ver. 17.] And sometimes congeals them into ice; which he breaks into bits, and throws down in violent 17 He casteth forth his ice like morsels: who can stand before his cold?

18 He sendeth out his word, and melteth them: he causeth his wind to blow, and the waters flow.

19 He sheweth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel.

20 He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for his judgments, they have not known them. Praise ye the Lord.

hail; accompanied with such extremity of cold, that neither man nor beast, nor the fishes in the ponds and rivers, are able long to endure it.

Ver. 18.] But then to prevent the hurt that might ensue by its continuance, he issues forth another command, which as suddenly (ver. 15), makes a thaw; and, by the warm breath of softer winds, loosens the waters which were bound up, and causes them to flow again.

Ver. 19.] In such things as these the whole world see how powerful and how good he is; but we have more peculiar reasons to depend upon him, for a happy return of our nation; whom he doth not teach merely by the snow, the hoar-frost, and the ice; but by another sort of word than that which sends them upon the earth (ver. 15): even by his ten commandments delivered from heaven (Exod. xx. 1), in a most glorious and astonishing manner (ver. 18), and by laws of all sorts, which he hath given us for the government of our life.

Ver. 20.] This is a privilege which no other nation in the world enjoys (Deut. iv. 32, 33). For though they all receive the showers and snow out of the clouds, yet laws from thence they have no acquaintance withal. Therefore let not us dishonour him so much as to distrust his providence; but continually praise the Lord and acknowledge his bounty to us.

PSALM CXLVIII.

Hallelujah (see cxlvi.)

1 PRAISE ye the LORD. Praise ye the Lord from the heavens: praise him in the heights.

2 Praise ye him, all his angels: praise ye him, all his hosts.

PSALM CXLVIII.

ARGUMENT.—It doth not appear who was the author of this hymn, nor upon what occasion it was composed. But the last verse sufficiently shows the nation was then in a very flourishing condition; and therefore probably it was made by David, when God had given him rest from all his enemies: which filled his heart with such love to God, that it transported him into this rapture. Wherein, finding how short his own praises were, he wishes all creatures in heaven and earth would conspire in a sweet symphony, as Theodoret speaks, of singing hymns unto him. And first he calls upon the world above, and all that is therein, from the first verse to the seventh: where he descends to the world here below; and calls upon all things on the earth to praise the Lord; concluding (ver. 13,) that as there is one maker of both, so all that they can say of him, when they have joined all their powers together in one choir, falls infinitely short of his most excellent majesty; who hath set forth his most transcendent wisdom, power, and munificence, in such variety of stupendous work, that there is not the smallest of them, but ministers such matter of praise, nay, admiration, to those that attentively consider them: that they cannot but wish, with the Psalmist here, that every one of them were able to tell us how much skill and kindness he hath shown in their contrivance; or that we were able to find it out, and comprehend it. Thus he is to be understood when he calls upon all creatures to praise the Lord; or it is as if he had said, the Lord is to be praised by, or in, all these things, as long as the world lasts.

This I take to be the true account of this Psalm, which I refer to the times of David, because the two following seem to have been then made: and there is no other we can so well fix upon; unless we will conceive that it was a meditation, when they were perfectly settled in a peaceable enjoyment of their religion, after the captivity; of which there is not the least intimation of this Psalm.

Ver. 1.] Let all creatures praise the Lord. First let the celestial choir begin, and sing their thankful hymns to him, who hath raised them so high above us in power and might, as well as in dignity and place.

3 Praise ye him, sun and moon : praise him, all ye stars of light.

4 Praise him, ye heavens of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens.

5 Let them praise the name of the LORD : for he commanded, and they were created.

6 He hath also established them for ever and ever : he hath made a decree which shall not pass.

7 Praise the LORD from the earth, ye dragons, and all deeps :

8 Fire, and hail ; snow, and vapours ; stormy wind fulfilling his word :

9 Mountains, and all hills ; fruitful trees, and all cedars :

Ver. 2.] Praise him, all ye angels, who have the honour to be the prime ministers of his excellent majesty : O let their several hosts and companies, in whatsoever rank or order they stand, praise him whose sovereign authority commands them all.

Ver. 3.] Praise him, ye sun and moon, who are his greatest visible ministers, and unwearied in his service : praise him all the rest of the shining stars : and declare to all future generations, as ye have done for so many ages past, how glorious he is.

Ver. 4.] Let all the heavenly regions praise him : particularly the clouds, which hang in the air, and distil in fruitful showers to enrich the earth.

Ver. 5.] Let all these set forth the adorable wisdom, and power, and goodness, of the Lord : for by his omnipotent word these, whom the mistaken world calls gods, were created ; not to be worshipped, but perpetually to proclaim his praise.

Ver. 6.] Who hath made them not only illustrious, but everlasting monuments of his splendour and glory : having fixed and settled them in an admirable order, which they constantly observe ; and prescribed them laws which they never transgress.

Ver. 7.] O let all creatures here below accompany those celestial hosts, in their praises of the Lord : whose power the vast whales in their several kinds, and all that move in the profound depth of the sea, abundantly declare.

Ver. 8.] Let the lightnings, thunder, and hail ; the snow, hoary frost, and ice ; the winds, storms, and tempests ; all make a part of this song : for they constantly execute his sovereign will, and serve his wise designs.

Ver. 9.] The lofty mountains also and the lesser hills ; the fruit-bearing trees, with the stately cedars ; the pines, the firs, and all the rest (which he hath created for several ends and uses), let them all be called upon to tell how great and how bountiful he is.

Ver. 10.] The wild beasts also of the forest, and all

10 Beasts, and all cattle ; creeping things, and flying fowl :

11 Kings of the earth, and all people ; princes, and all judges of the earth :

12 Both young men, and maidens ; old men, and children :

13 Let them praise the name of the LORD : for his name alone is excellent ; his glory is above the earth and heaven.

14 He also exalteth the horn of his people, the praise of all his saints ; even of the children of Israel, a people near unto him. Praise ye the LORD.

the cattle that feed in the fields ; whatsoever creeps upon the earth, or swims in the sea, or flies in the air ; let it join in this hymn of praise to him : who hath shown his manifold wisdom and diffusive goodness in them all.

Ver. 11.] But especially let mankind praise him ; who (after he had made these things) brought them into the world, last of all, to contemplate his wonderful works : and first let kings (who here on earth resemble the angels or the sun in heaven), and then let their ministers of state, and lieutenants in their several provinces ; and next, all the judges of the earth (who are like the moon and the stars) give a good example unto all the subjects ; and stir them up to meditate his praise.

Ver. 12.] Let no sex, no age, think themselves exempted from this heavenly employment ; but let the young men praise him for their strength, and the virgins for their beauty : they that are going out of the world, for all that they have seen and heard of him : and they that are newly come into it, for all the goodly spectacles that are before them.

Ver. 13.] Let them praise the incomparable wisdom, goodness, and power of the Lord : for how great soever any other beings are, there is no other god but he ; whose most excellent majesty infinitely surpasses all that the earth or the heavens can tell us of him.

Ver. 14.] And yet so great is his condescension unto us (who are bound therefore more particularly to praise him), he takes a peculiar care of us ; and hath set over us a powerful prince for the defence and safety of his people (Ps. lxxxix. 19). Whose fame he hath thereby raised to the highest pitch of honour ; having obliged the children of Israel by many peculiar benefits, especially this ; that they are a people more nearly related to him than any other whatsoever : for he dwells among them in his holy place, where they approach to him. O praise him there for this singular favour.

PSALM CXLIX.

Hallelujah (see cxlvi.).

1 PRAISE ye the LORD. Sing unto the LORD a new song, and his praise in the congregation of saints.

PSALM CXLIX.

ARGUMENT.—Theodoret thinks this Psalm was made for them that, after their return from captivity, had many opposers ; but, by the divine assistance, overcame them : and that it is a prediction of those great things which were done by the Maccabees. Certain it is, that some signal victory was the occasion of it ; and thence St. Chrysostom hath here given us a full ac-

6 Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a twoedged sword in their hand;

count, I think, of the meaning of a new song, which according to the use of the word new in other places (when they would express a thing very wonderful, such as hath not been seen nor heard of before, Numb. xvi. 30, Jer. xxxi. 22), he takes to denote "an illustrious and famous hymn, made for victories, for great achievements and trophies."

Which were never more remarkable in this nation than in the days of David; and therefore this Psalm may very well relate to his reign; who subdued several kingdoms, which had stood out, and would not submit to Israel till his time, though God had promised to give their countries to them (Gen. xv. 18; Exod. xxiii. 31; 2 Sam. viii. 1, 2, &c. x. 19). The interpretation which I have given of the sixth verse, need not seem strange to any one, who considers that it hath been and is the custom of all nations, to stir up themselves to fight by the sound of some musical instrument or other. "The ancient inhabitants of Etruria (saith Clemens Alexandrinus, in the second book of his Pædagogus, cap. 4) used the trumpet for this purpose; the Arcadians the whistle; the Sicilians an instrument called pectids; the Cretans the harp; the Lacedæmonians the pipe; the Thracians the coronet; the Egyptians the drum; the Arabians the cymbal;" but it was proper to the Israelites to go forth against their enemies, singing psalms of praise to God (as we read, 2 Chron. xx. 21, 22), who had given great victories to their ancestors, and had promised never to forsake their posterity; while they served him only, and piously confided in him.

Ver. 1.] Sing a new hymn unto the Lord, for the fresh and singular benefits he hath bestowed upon us: let him be praised not only in private, but in the public assemblies of those who have received special marks of his favour to them.

Ver. 2.] Let all the Israelites rejoice in him that made them his peculiar people; and hath now raised them to great splendour among the nations of the world: let the inhabitants of Zion, more particularly, be exceeding glad, that the Lord, who is our king, hath there settled his royal throne (2 Sam. v. 9, vi. 12).

Ver. 3.] Let them leap for joy, and unanimously praise his most excellent majesty, in their dances to the flute (2 Sam. vi. 16): let them testify their gratitude to him by singing psalms, with the timbrel and the harp.

Ver. 4.] For the Lord taketh pleasure in doing good unto his people: and will not only deliver them after they have been oppressed many years; but, if they meekly depend upon him, make them as great and illustrious as they have been contemptible and mean (1 Chron. xiv. 2).

Ver. 5.] Which shall fill the hearts of good men (who are dear to him) with the highest triumph, in the honour that he hath done them: and make them shout for joy in the security and peace he shall bestow upon them.

Ver. 6.] Which they shall not doubt to maintain against all opposers; for in assured hope of victory they shall go to war, with psalms and hymns in their mouths concerning the great acts of the Lord: which they shall courageously sing with a loud voice, when they shall fall upon their enemies; and prefer to the two-edged sword which they carry in their hand.

Ver. 7.] Wherewith they shall take a just revenge upon the heathen, for all the injuries they have done us: and so chastise the insolence of the people, that they shall fear again to molest us (1 Chron. xiv. 17).

Ver. 8.] For their victories shall be so complete, that they shall not only rout their enemies and put them to flight, but lead away their kings captive in chains; and take their great captains and commanders prisoners, and keep them fast in fetters of iron.

Ver. 9.] In order to the executing upon them the judgment which God hath long ago decreed, and is recorded in his law (Deut. vii. 24, xxxii. 41—43). This is the honour which all Israel shall have, when they are in favour with God; and such shall be their glorious victories, and such hymns and melodious songs shall they sing, saying; Hallelujah, praise the Lord, by whose power and might we have done all this.

PSALM CL.

Hallelujah (see cxlvi.).

1 PRAISE ye the Lord. Praise God in his sanctuary: praise him in the firmament of his power.

2 Praise him for his mighty acts: praise him according to his excellent greatness.

PSALM CL.

ARGUMENT.—Theodoret takes this also to be ᾠδὴ νικητικὴ, "a song of triumph after some victory;" and the mention of the "mighty acts of the Lord," ver. 2, seems to countenance this conjecture: which consists well enough with what others conceive; that it was at first particularly directed to the Levites (by David I suppose), whose office it was to praise the Lord with musical instruments (1 Chron. xvi. 4, 5); and excite others to his praises, not only for victory, but for all other his benefits. For if the tradition of the Jews be true, which we read at large in Maimonides (in a treatise on that subject), when the people of any place brought up their first-fruits to present them to the Lord at Jerusalem (according to the law, Deut. xxvi.), with a pipe going before them; as soon as they came to the mountain of the temple, every one took his basket into his hand, and sung this whole Psalm : till they came to the courts of the Lord's house, where the Levites met them singing the thirtieth Psalm.

And, indeed, it might well be used upon occasion of any exceeding great joy ; for it seems to be intended (by the repetition of these words, praise the Lord, or praise him, thirteen times ; and by the calling for no less than ten instruments of music) to express the height and fulness of their joy, and thankfulness to God for his benefits : nor can music be so well employed to any other use, as this divine and heavenly exercise of praising God, by hymns, and psalms, and spiritual songs : to which the psalmist seems to me to excite all creatures, in heaven and in earth ; from the highest to the lowest. And with this the collector of these five book of Psalms thought good to conclude the whole ; and not unfitly : for in whatsoever condition we be (as there are Psalms adapted to several purposes), we should never forget to praise the Lord ; but after we have prayed, or complained, &c., still end with thankful acknowledgments to God for his goodness to us.

Here are several sorts of musical instruments mentioned ; which I have not adventured to explain, because the Hebrews themselves acknowledge they do not understand them. We have no way (saith Aben Ezra upon those words, ver. 5, which we translate loud cymbals) to know what these musical instruments were : there being many found in the country of the Ishmaelites (i. e. Mahometans) which are not among the men of Edom (i. e. Christians), and others among them, which the wise men of Ishmael never heard of.

5 Praise him upon the loud cymbals : praise him upon the high sounding cymbals.

Ver. 1.] Praise the mighty God, ye angelical ministers that attend upon him in his celestial sanctuary ; praise him all ye inhabitants of heaven, where you see the brightest demonstrations (and most lasting monuments) of his power.

Ver. 2.] Praise him all ye ministers of his upon earth, for the miraculous things which he hath done for our deliverance and exaltation ; let your praises bear some proportion to the excellence of his majesty, and the multitude of those great and magnificent acts of mercy towards us.

Ver. 3.] Let the priests of the Lord (Numb. x. 8) praise him with the sound of the trumpet ; and let the Levites (1 Chron. xxv. 6), praise him with psalteries and harps.

Ver. 4.] Let some praise him with the timbrel and the flute : and others praise him with the stringed instruments and organs.

Ver. 5.] Let all sorts of cymbals accompany their psalms and hymns in his praise : both those of daily use, and those that are wont to be employed in times of the highest joy and triumph.

Ver. 6.] Finally, let every man living join himself to this sacred choir ; and let every breath praise the Lord, the giver of life and of all good things. To him let all the world, with one consent, give perpetual praise.
