Ver. 8. Go down into the desert, and go into the sea:] These waters are described as taking their course along the plain or champaign country (for that is the sense of the word araba, here rendered desert) towards the lake where Sodom formerly stood, called the Dead sea, and by Moses the Salt sea (compare Deut. iii. 17 with this verse).

Which being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed,] This is the observation of all writers, who describe this lake, that nothing can live in it: and the text here tells us, that these living streams shall, by mixing with these salt and brackish waters, make them wholesome and fit for use; mystically denoting the healing virtue of God's grace to cure the vices and corruptions of wicked men.

Ver. 9.] The metaphor is still continued, to this sense: That as the fish which move or swim (compare Gen. i. 20) in waters cured or made wholesome, have life and nourishment from thence, whereas no fish can live in the Dead sea: so the waters which flow from the wells of salvation, as the prophet Isaiah expresses it (Isa. xii. 3), shall make all those thrive and multiply who enjoy the benefit of them, though their condition before were never so desperate. The word rivers and river are promiscuously used in this verse, though some of the Jewish writers are of opinion, that these waters divide themselves, and some flow eastward, and others westward: which opinion they ground partly upon the plural number used in this verse, but chiefly upon the words of Zechariah, xiv. 8.

Ver. 10. From En-gedi—to En-eglain;] En-gedi was a town that lay on the south-west of the lake of Sodom, or the Dead sea, called Hazezon-tamar, Gen. xiv. 7, compared with 2 Chron. xx. 2. En-eglain, or En-gallim, as St. Jerome reads the word, is another on the east side of the same lake, where Jordan falls into it; upon the confines of Moab, as may be conjectured from Isa. xv. 8, which is confirmed by the parallel text in Joel iii. 18, where it is said, that "a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord, and shall water the valley of Shittim:" which we know was in the country of Moab (see Numb. xxv. 1). So these two places denote the whole extent of that lake, which the prophet saith shall be full of fish, still prosecuting the allegory begun in the foregoing verses.

To spread forth nets;] These two towns shall afford convenience for the fishers to hang out their nets a drying (see xxvi. 5).

As the fish of the great sea,] This lake for plenty of fish may compare with the Mediterranean sea, called "the great sea" here, and ver. 15, 19, xlviii. 28, and more distinctly described in Joshua by "the great sea westward," Josh. xxiii. 4. Perhaps Christ may allude to this place, when he tells his disciples, he "will make them fishers of men," Matt. iv. 19.

Ver. 11.] By those unsound, rotten places, may be understood hypocrites; who shall receive no benefit by these healing waters, no more than some sort of marsh land can be made fruitful: but after all the care or culture that can be bestowed upon it, continues barren and unprofitable, which the Hebrew language expresseth by being "given to salt:" saltiness is equivalent to barrenness in that language (see Deut. xxix. 23, Ps. cvii. 34, Jer. xvii. 6): so we read Judg. ix. 45, when Abimelech destroyed Shechem, he sowed the ground whereon it stood with salt, to denote that it should never be cultivated or inhabited again.

Ver. 12. Grow all trees for meat,] See note on ver. 7.

Whose leaves shall not fade,] They shall be perpetually in a thriving condition, like the trees of paradise, never barren or withering: a proper emblem of the flourishing state of the righteous still bringing forth "fruit unto holiness," and whose "end is everlasting life" (see Ps. i. 3, Jer. xvii. 8).

It shall bring forth new fruit,] It shall be constantly fruitful, not only once a year, as fruit-trees commonly are (compare Rev. xxii. 2).

The leaf thereof for medicine,] As the waters issuing from the sanctuary have a healing virtue (see ver. 8); so the leaves of the trees shall have the same quality. The expression alludes to the opinion commonly received among naturalists and physicians, that the leaves of several trees are medicinal.

Ver. 13. This shall be the border,] The borders described in the following part of this chapter shall be the border, whereby ye shall inherit the land according to the twelve tribes of Israel: Joseph shall have two portions.

14 And ye shall inherit it, one as well as another: concerning the which I lifted up mine hand to give it unto your fathers: and this land shall fall unto you for inheritance.

15 And this shall be the border of the land toward the north side, from the great sea, the way of Hethlon, as men go to Zedad;

16 Hamath, Berothah, Sibraim, which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath; Hazar-hatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran.

17 And the border from the sea shall be Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus, and the north northward, and the border of Hamath. And this is the north side.

the limits or boundaries of your country. By the several captivities both of Israel and Judah, the several limits or borders belonging to the inheritance of each tribe were obliterated and forgotten: whereupon here is a new boundary and division made of the holy land, a full possession of which they might have expected to enjoy, if their sins had not prevented such a blessing. This may perhaps be the literal sense of the following part of the prophecy; though there is, without question, a mystical sense implied under this literal description (see note on xlviii. 7, 20).

Joseph shall have two portions.] Upon Reuben's forfeiting his birthright, the double portion belonging to the first-born accrued to Joseph's two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, according to Jacob's own appointment (see Gen. xlviii. 5, 1 Chron. v. 1).

Ver. 14. Ye shall inherit it, one as well as another:] The ten tribes that are scattered abroad, as well as Judah and Benjamin (see xlviii. 1, 7, 23, 27): who, together with some of the families of the tribe of Levi, made up the principal part of those who returned from the Babylonish captivity; from hence we may conclude that this prophecy relates to the general restoration of the Jews, an event often foretold in the prophecies of the Old Testament (see note upon xxviii. 25).

To give it unto your fathers:] See xx. 5, 6.

This land shall fall unto you for inheritance.] The word fall is taken from the manner of their first acquiring the possession of the land, which was by lot, as it had formerly been, when they first took possession of it (see ver. 22, and xlviii. 29). By which means all controversies will be prevented, the lot referring all things to the divine designation and appointment (Prov. xvi. 33).

Ver. 15.] The northern border of the land was to begin from the west point, on which side lay the Mediterranean sea (see ver. 10), and go on northward towards Hethlon, a place near Damascus (see xlviii. 1): and so on forward to Zedad, mentioned Numb. xxxiv. 8).

Ver. 16. Hamath.] The places here mentioned were within this tract of ground. Hamath was the utmost point of the land northward, therefore called "the entrance of Hamath," and described as the opposite point to the river of Egypt (see 1 Kings viii. 65, Amos vi. 14): the other two towns were situate between Hamath and Damascus.

Hazar-hatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran.] Or, as our margin reads, "the middle villages" between Hamath and Hauran, a place lying eastward

18 And the east side ye shall measure from Hauran, and from Damascus, and from Gilead, and from the land of Israel by Jordan, from the border unto the east sea. And this is the east side.

19 And the south side southward, from Tamar even to the waters of strife in Kadesh, the river to the great sea. And this is the south side southward.

20 The west side also shall be the great sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath. This is the west side.

21 So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel.

22 ¶ And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you: and they shall from Hamath, from whence that country was called Auranitis.

Ver. 17. The border from the sea shall be Hazar-enan.] Or, "Shall be to Hazar-enan, even the border of Damascus, and all the northern frontier, and the border of Hamath;" i. e. that tract of land which is called "the entrance of Hamath," as was observed before. Your north border shall be, as if a line were drawn from the Mediterranean sea, along by Hamath, and so to Hazar-enan (see Numb. xxxiv. 9); keeping along by the frontier of that part of Syria, called Syria of Damascus: so as to distinguish the northern boundaries of Israel from the southern limits of Syria.

Ver. 18. The east side ye shall measure from Hauran, and from Damascus, and from Gilead.] Damascus lay more northerly than Hauran, but the country called Auranitis might reach nearer it. Gilead was a long tract of ground that joined to mount Libanus, and was extended to the land of Zihon, king of the Amorites, as St. Jerome tells us in his book De Locis Hebraicis: it is called "the land of Gilead," and reached unto Dan, Deut. xxxiv. 1.

From the border unto the east sea.] From the northern limits of the land of Israel (ver. 17), near Casarea or Dan, where the river Jordan takes its rise, unto the Dead sea, or the lake of Sodom (see ver. 8).

Ver. 19. The south side southward, from Tamar even to the waters of strife in Kadesh, [to] the river to the great sea.] Compare xlviii. 28. The southern frontiers shall be from Engedi, called Hazazon-tamar, 2 Chron. xx. 2 (see Dr. Lightfoot's Description of the Land of Israel, ch. 6), to the waters of Meribah, or strife, in Kadesh (Deut. xxii. 52), and from thence to the river of Egypt. The river of Egypt riseth out of mount Paron, taketh its course westward to Rhinocorura, and from thence falls into the Mediterranean, called "the great sea," ver. 10. See Gen. xv. 18, Josh. xv. 47, 1 Kings viii. 65, Isa. xxvii. 12, where the LXX. translate it, Ἐως Ῥινεκορούρα, "to Rhinocorura," near which it runs. This river seems to be the same with Sihor, mentioned Josh. xiii. 3, though that name be commonly understood to signify the Nile (see notes upon Jer. ii. 18).

Ver. 20. The west side also shall be the great sea from the border.] i. e. From the south border, mentioned in the foregoing verse; so ver. 18, "from the border," means the northern border, mentioned ver. 17.

Till a man come over against Hamath.] Or rather, "Till a man come to Hamath;" for so the particle nad-nocah signifies (see Noldius, p. 657): till you be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel.

come to Hamath, the northern point towards the west frontier.

Ver. 22. Ye shall divide it by lot] See ver. 14.

To the strangers that sojourn among you,] Foreigners never before had the privilege of purchasing or possessing any inheritance among the Jews; so

23 And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord God.

this mystically denotes the incorporating the gentiles into the same church with the Jews: making them "fellow-heirs, and of the same body with them, by the gospel," Eph. iii. 6.

Among the tribes] In whatsoever tribe they sojourn, as it is expressed in the next verse.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

1 Now these are the names of the tribes.
From the north end to the coast of the way of Hethlon, as one goeth to Hamath, Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus northward, to the coast of Hamath; for these are his sides east and west;
a portion for Dan.

2 And by the border of Dan, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Asher.

3 And by the border of Asher, from the east side even unto the west side, a portion for Naphtali.

4 And by the border of Naphtali, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Manasseh.

5 And by the border of Manasseh, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Ephraim.

6 And by the border of Ephraim, from the east side even unto the west side, a portion for Reuben.

7 And by the border of Reuben, from the east side even unto the west side, a portion for Judah.

8 ¶ And by the border of Judah, from the east side unto the west side, shall be the offering which ye shall offer of five and twenty thousand reeds in breadth, and in length as one of the other parts, from the east side unto the west side: and the sanctuary shall be in the midst of it.

9 The oblation that ye shall offer unto the LORD shall be of five and twenty thousand in length, and of ten thousand in breadth.

CHAP. XLVIII.

ARGUMENT.—This last chapter contains a description of the several portions of land belonging to each tribe: together with the portions allotted to the sanctuary, city, suburbs, and prince: as also the measure and gates of the new city.

Ver. 1. From the north end to the coast of the way of Hethlon,] As the description of the limits, or boundaries of the land, began on the north side (xlvi.
15, &c.), so the portion of that tribe, to whom the most northern lot fell, is first named, which is Dan.

These are his sides east and west;] These are the boundaries belonging to that tribe, from the east point near mount Libanus and Gilead, to the west point, which is bounded by the Mediterranean sea (see xlvii. 15, &c.).

Ver. 2.] All along from the south side of Dan, measuring from east to west, shall the share of Asher be.

Ver. 7.] From the first verse to the seventh, the situation of seven of the twelve tribes is described, which were placed on the north side of the holy portion, the length of Judea, from north to south, being divided into twelve equal parts (see xlvii. 14); beside the allotment for the holy portion, and for the prince; and the city and temple being placed where they stood formerly, there must be seven shares on the north side of that allotment, and but five on the south side; for Jerusalem did not stand in the middle of the holy land, but more towards the south, as may appear to any one that consults the map of Judea.

But for the fuller explaining this difficulty, we may reasonably conclude, that Judah's portion lay nearest to that which was allotted for the priests and sanctuary, to be a barrier and defence to them against the invasion of Gog and Magog, or any other enemies.

It is the opinion of some learned men, that so particular a description of the several portions allotted to each tribe relates to the Jews' settlement in their own country after their conversion; several passages in the prophets looking that way (see the thirty-sixth and thirty-seventh chapters of this prophesy); but without laying too great a stress upon this opinion, we may fairly suppose some mystical sense contained under this description. The twelve tribes denote the pure Christian church in the New Testament (see Luke xxii. 30, Rev. vii. 4, &c.)
Twelve is a hieroglyphical number in the same book, denoting the true church, built upon the doctrine of the twelve apostles (see Rev. xii. 1, xxi. 14).
By the same analogy, the number of "a hundred and forty and four thousand," Rev. vii. 4, xiv. 1, signifies the church of pure Christians, who continue steadfast in the apostolical doctrine, twelve being the square root, out of which that number ariseth:
so this division of the land among the twelve tribes, may imply, that all true Christians shall be equally sharers in the privileges of the gospel.

Ver. 8. By the border of Judah,—five and twenty thousand reeds] Next to the border of Judah, which runs in length from east to west, shall be the offering ye shall set apart for the service of God (xlv.
1). The word reeds is not in the original, either here or in that text; and we may more probably understand the measure of both places of cubits (see note there).

In length as one of the other parts [are] from the east side unto the west] which was likewise five and twenty thousand, according to the dimensions of the holy portion set down, xlv. 1, 6. For the oblation was to be four-square, consisting of five and twenty thousand, multiplied by five and twenty thousand (see ver. 20 of this chapter).

Ver. 9.] This shall be set apart for the sanctuary, and the most holy place, and the priests' houses (see xlv. 3, 4).

10 And for them, even for the priests, shall be this holy oblation; toward the north five and twenty thousand in length, and toward the west ten thousand in breadth, and toward the east ten thousand in breadth, and toward the south five and twenty thousand in length: and the sanctuary of the LORD shall be in the midst thereof.

11 It shall be for the priests that are sanctified of the sons of Zadok; which have kept my charge, which went not astray when the children of Israel went astray, when the Levites went astray.

12 And this oblation of the land that is offered shall be unto them a thing most holy by the border of the Levites.

13 And over against the border of the priests the Levites shall have five and twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth: all the length shall be five and twenty thousand, and the breadth ten thousand.

14 And they shall not sell of it, neither exchange, nor alienate the first-fruits of the land: for it is holy unto the LORD.

15 ¶ And the five thousand that are left in the breadth over against the five and twenty thousand, shall be a profane place for the city, for dwelling, and for suburbs, and the city shall be in the midst thereof.

16 And these shall be the measures thereof; the north side four thousand and five hundred, and the south side four thousand and five hundred, and on the east side four thousand and five hundred, and the west side four thousand and five hundred.

17 And the suburbs of the city shall be toward the north two hundred and fifty, and toward the south two hundred and fifty, and toward the east two hundred and fifty, and toward the west two hundred and fifty.

18 And the residue in length over against the oblation of the holy portion shall be ten thousand eastward, and ten thousand westward: and it shall be over against the oblation of the holy portion; and the increase thereof shall be for food unto them that serve the city.

19 And they that serve the city shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel.

20 All the oblation shall be five and twenty

Ver. 10. The dimensions from east to west are called by the name of breadth here, but of length, ver. 8. And so they truly are, as may appear from the plan of the whole, described in the notes upon the forty-fifth chapter: but if we suppose that space of ground, which is expressed by the breadth in one place, to be called by the name of length in another, there will be no impropriety in the expression; because in an exact square, as the whole compass of ground is here supposed to be, all sides are equal.

Ver. 11. For the priests] See xlv. 10, 15.

When the Levites went astray.] Or, "As the other Levites went astray:" so the word other is supplied ver. 8. The Levites denote, in general, the sons of Levi, so as to comprehend the priests too (see ver. 22). Many of these had defiled themselves with idolatry; for which crime they were to be degraded from the honours and privileges due to those priests who had continued faithful in their office (see the note upon xlv. 10, 11).

Ver. 12. A thing most holy] As all things dedicated to God were (see Lev. xxvii. 28).

By the border of the Levites.] It shall lie next to the portion of the Levites, which lay southward, between the priests' and the city's portion (see the scheme placed at the forty-fifth chapter).

Ver. 13. Over against the border of the priests] It might be better translated, "just by the border of the priests," or "beside the border of the priests," as the word leummah is translated in our English bible, x. 19, xi. 22. The words import, that the border of the Levites ran parallel to that of the priests: and to the same sense the word should be translated in the fifteenth, eighteenth, and twenty-first verses of this chapter (see note upon xl. 18).

Ver. 14.] It being God's portion, they were not to sell nor part with it upon any pretence of advantage or greater convenience. This portion of land is called the first-fruits, as it is styled an oblation, ver. 8, 12, to denote that the whole land was God's property (see note upon xlv. 1).

Ver. 15. The five thousand that are left in the breadth over against [or beside, see ver. 13] the five and twenty thousand.] Which was the portion assigned to the Levites, ver. 13. This five thousand, added to the five and twenty thousand in length, and two ten thousands in breadth, mentioned ver. 10, makes up a square of five and twenty thousand every way (see ver. 20).

Shall be a profane place for the city.] See xlv. 6. It is called a profane place comparatively, because it was not so holy as the temple and the sanctuary (see note upon xlii. 20).

The city shall be in the midst] A square piece of ground, of four thousand and five hundred cubits on every side, shall be taken out of the middle of the five and twenty thousand cubits in length, for the area of the city (ver. 16).

Ver. 16.] It shall be an equilateral square, every side being exactly of the same measure, consisting in all of eighteen thousand measures (see ver. 35).

Ver. 17.] These dimensions of the suburbs, added to those of the city, make the whole area an equilateral square, of five thousand cubits on every side; adding five hundred in breadth, and five hundred in length, to the four thousand five hundred cubits, which was the compass of the city.

Ver. 18. And the residue in length over against [or beside, see ver. 13] the oblation of the holy portion shall be ten thousand eastward, and ten thousand westward.] These two dimensions of ten thousand in length, both eastward and westward, remain on each side of the area, which is five thousand cubits square, and set apart for the site of the city.

It shall be over against [or beside] the oblation of the holy portion.] It shall join to the Levites' portion, both on the east and west side; and it shall lie parallel with the two portions belonging to the priests and Levites (consult the scheme placed above).

For food unto them that serve the city.] That perform inferior offices in the city. The priests and Levites having a large portion already assigned for their sustenance.

Ver. 19.] This service being a burden, it is fit that all the tribes should bear their part in it.

Ver. 20. Five and twenty thousand by five and twenty thousand.] Five and twenty thousand in length multiplied by five and twenty thousand in breadth (see ver. 10.)

Ye shall offer the holy oblation four-square.] So the heavenly Jerusalem is described as lying four-square, thousand by five and twenty thousand: ye shall offer the holy oblation four-square, with the possession of the city.

21 ¶ And the residue shall be for the prince, on the one side and on the other of the holy oblation, and of the possession of the city, over against the five and twenty thousand of the oblation, toward the east border, and westward over against the five and twenty thousand toward the west border, over against the portions for the prince; and it shall be the holy oblation; and the sanctuary of the house shall be in the midst thereof.

22 Moreover from the possession of the Levites, and from the possession of the city, being in the midst of that which is the prince's, between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin, shall be for the prince.

23 As for the rest of the tribes, from the east side unto the west side Benjamin shall have a portion.

24 And by the border of Benjamin, from the east side unto the west side, Simeon shall have a portion.

25 And by the border of Simeon, from the east side unto the west side, Issachar shall have a portion.

26 And by the border of Issachar, from the east side unto the west side, Zebulun shall have a portion.

27 And by the border of Zebulun, from the east side unto the west side, Gad shall have a portion.

28 And by the border of Gad, at the south side southward, the border shall be even from Tamar unto the waters of strife in Kadesh, and to the river toward the great sea.

29 This is the land which ye shall divide by lot unto the tribes of Israel for inheritance, and these are their portions, saith the Lord God.

30 ¶ And these are the goings out of the city

Rev. xxi. 16, a square figure being the emblem of perpetuity, strength, and solidity (compare xlii. 16, 20.)

A great part of the wisdom of the eastern nations was wrapped up in hieroglyphical emblems and numbers. The symbols of Pythagoras are a remarkable instance of this sort of ancient learning. This method God hath thought fit to make use of to discover some mysterious truths in his word: such as perhaps he thinks not convenient to be more clearly revealed till its proper time and season: intending by such obscure hints to encourage men's searching into the more abstruse parts of the scriptures, and to show that all human knowledge may be made subservient to divine.

The text before us, compared with its parallel in the forty-second chapter of this prophecy, and in the Revelation, plainly shows that a square is an emblematical figure. In like manner the number twelve is a sacred number, as I observed upon ver. 7, and the learned Mr. Potter, in his book of the Number 666, hath with great acuteness reconciled the twelve thousand furlongs, the measure of the New Jerusalem in the Revelation, with the measures of Ezekiel here, by interpreting them of solid measures, and extracting the root of each of them.

With the possession of the city.] Or, the land assigned for the site of the city: which was a square of five thousand cubits; and being added to the portion of the priests and Levites, made their twice ten thousand to be five and twenty thousand in breadth (see ver. 10, 15).

Ver. 21. The residue shall be for the prince, on the one side and on the other.] The prince's part shall be extended both on the east and west side of the several allotments belonging to the priests, the Levites, and the city. The particular extent of the prince's portion is not here specified, but it is computed by some to contain above four times as much as those allotments (see note upon ver. 22).

Over against the five and twenty thousand of the oblation.] The particle el-pene, translated "over against," is rendered before in the parallel text, xlv. 7, and thus interpreted makes the sense clearer: the words then importing, that the prince's portion ran along eastward and westward, like a frontier before the holy portions (see the forementioned scheme).

Over against the portions for the prince, &c.] Our translation hath rendered the latter part of this verse very imperfectly: which should be thus translated: "Beside these [or joining to these] portions (so leummath signifies, see ver. 13), shall be that belonging to the prince: and this shall be the holy oblation."

and the sanctuary of the house shall be in the midst thereof." The last part of the sentence is only a recapitulation of what is said more at large, ver. 8.

Ver. 22. Moreover from the possession of the Levites, and from the possession of the city.] The words might be more plainly translated thus, "Moreover beyond the possession of the Levites, and beyond the possession of the city"—to this sense: that the possession belonging to the priests and Levites (see ver. 11), and the city, were bounded on the east and west side with the prince's portion: so those lay in the middle, and this beyond them. The Hebrew particle min signifies beyond, in several places: examples of which may be seen in Noldius, p. 564.

Between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin, shall be for the prince.] The border of Judah was extended from east to west, next to the holy portion on the north side (see ver. 1, 8). The portion of Benjamin lay from east to west next the allotment set apart for the city, on the south side (ver. 23, 25). The several portions allotted for the priests, the Levites, and the city, extended only to the length of five and twenty thousand cubits from east to west: so that whatever ground ran in a parallel line eastward and westward beyond that boundary, even to the land's-end, belonged to the prince: and supposing the whole country to be sixty miles in breadth (as St. Jerome reckons it from Joppa to Jordan, Epist. ad Dardanum), and the holy portion, about seven miles square (see the note upon xlv. 1), there will remain above six and twenty miles both on the east and west side for the prince's share (see the scheme placed at the forty-fifth chapter).

Ver. 23.] The portion assigned to Judah was situate next to the holy portion on the north side, (see ver. 1, 8). The portion assigned to Benjamin lay next to the ground allotted for the city on the south side (see ver. 25). All these allotments run from east to west in length, and from north to south in breadth.

Ver. 24—27.] In these verses the four remaining tribes have their allotments assigned them, lying on the south side of the holy portion. These appointments are not laid out with any regard to the division of the land made in Joshua's time: for here a platform of a new church and state is set forth.

Ver. 28.] This is a description of the southernmost borders of the land, extending by the south and west to the Mediterranean sea (see xlvii. 19).

Ver. 29.] See xlvii. 14, 22.

Ver. 30.] The same measures of the city are al-on the north side, four thousand and five hundred measures.

31 And the gates of the city shall be after the names of the tribes of Israel: three gates northward; one gate of Reuben, one gate of Judah, one gate of Levi.

32 And at the east side four thousand and five hundred: and three gates; and one gate of Joseph, one gate of Benjamin, one gate of Dan.

33 And at the south side four thousand and five hundred measures: and three gates; one gate of Simeon, one gate of Issachar, one gate of Zebulun.

34 At the west side four thousand and five hundred, with their three gates; one gate of Gad, one gate of Asher, one gate of Naphtali.

35 It was round about eighteen thousand measures; and the name of the city from that day shall be, 'The Lord is there.'

ready set forth (ver. 16), beginning with those on the north side, as the general division of the land doth (see ver. 1).

Ver. 31.] The same description is given of the gates of the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 12, 13, to signify that all true Israelites have their share in this heavenly city, and a right to enter into it (Rev. xxii. 14).

Ver. 35. Eighteen thousand measures:] See ver. 16.

The Lord is there.] Jerusalem was formerly called "the city of God" Ps. lxxxvii. 3), and "the city of the great King" (Ps. xlviii. 2). But in this New Jerusalem, God shall dwell in a more glorious manner, and make it the place of his perpetual residence. So that every part of the city shall be honoured with evident tokens of the divine presence; and every member of it being dedicated to God's service, and becoming "a habitation of God through his Spirit," shall have some degree of the holiness of the temple, where God "had placed his name" (1 Kings viii. 29, compare with Rev. xxi. 22). This is in a lower degree fulfilled in all good Christians, who are called "the temples of the living God," 2 Cor. vi. 16, 1 Pet. ii. 5, and "a habitation of God through the Spirit," Eph. ii. 22.

OF

AND

THE TWELVE MINOR PROPHETS.

TO THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,

WILLIAM,

LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY;

PRIMATE OF ALL ENGLAND, AND METROPOLITAN; AND ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY-COUNCIL.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR GRACE,

HAVING had the honour to offer some former parts of my Commentary upon the Prophets to your Grace, I beg leave to lay this last and finishing part of my design at your Grace's feet, humbly entreating your favourable acceptance of my sincere endeavours to give what light I could to this important part of the holy writings.

The obscurity which is found in some passages of these prophecies, particularly in those of Daniel, hath exercised the thoughts of inquisitive men, in the foregoing ages of the church. But we, "upon whom the ends of the world are come," seem to have an advantage above those that went before us: forasmuch as it may be reasonably supposed, that the nearer the events foretold are to their accomplishment, the greater light several providential occurrences may afford to the predictions themselves.

The prophecy of Daniel is an undeniable proof of an overruling providence that "changes times and seasons," that removeth one government, and setteth up another. For what foresight was able so exactly to describe the orderly succession of the four great monarchies, but that of the Eternal Mind, whose "wisdom reacheth from one end to another mightily, and sweetly orders all things? Who declares the end from the beginning, and from ancient times things which are not yet come to pass: saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure."

That holy prophet was adorned with such extraordinary endowments, as seldom are found in one person: being not only honoured with the gift of prophecy; but likewise advanced to bear rule over kingdoms, "by reason of that excellent spirit which was found in him:" this might afford me a proper occasion to draw a parallel between his and your Grace's accomplishments, which have qualified you to sustain the highest office in the church, and the greatest trusts in the state. But I shall forbear pursuing this subject, being well assured that your Grace takes greater satisfaction in performing worthy deeds, than hearing the report of them proclaimed by others: and shall conclude with my hearty prayers, that your Grace may also resemble the felicity of Daniel, in enjoying a long and prosperous life here, and may then be translated to an endless happiness hereafter.

I am, may it please your Grace,
Your Grace's most dutiful and obedient servant,
WILLIAM LOWTH.

CONCERNING THE AUTHOR AND THE SUBJECT OF THE ENSUING PROPHECY.

THE prophet Daniel was descended of the royal family of the kings of Judah: so that in the captivity of himself and his companions was fulfilled that prophecy of Isaiah, that the "king's issue should be eunuchs, or officers, to the king of Babylon" (Isa. xxxix. 7). The later Jews do not reckon Daniel among the prophets; but herein they contradict the sense of the more ancient ones, and particularly of Josephus, who calls him "one of the greatest of the prophets," and saith, "that he did not only foretell future things, which was common to him with other prophets, but also prefixed a time for their coming to pass" (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 12). Our Saviour's authority is decisive in this matter, who expressly calls Daniel a prophet, Matt. xxiv. 15, wherein he likewise spoke the sense of the Jews of that time. And if we consider the important subject of some of his prophecies, wherein he plainly points out the time of Christ's coming and sufferings, and the large extent of others of them, giving an account of the succession of four monarchies unto the end of the world, he may justly be reckoned among the first of that order. Daniel and St. John had both of them the honour of being persons greatly beloved by God and Christ (compare Dan. x. 11, with John xiii. 23): so the latter, in his Revelation, doth more distinctly unfold those events which the former foretells in general terms, as Mr. Mede has observed (see his works, p. 787).

This prophecy is writ partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee: for which this reason may be assigned; that those parts of it in which the Babylonian empire was concerned were writ in their language, viz. from ii. 4, to the end of the seventh chapter; a great part of which was probably entered into their public registers (see a like instance, Esth. ii. 23).

St. Jerome tells us in the preface to his Commentary upon Daniel, that Porphyry had the boldness to affirm, that the prophecies of Daniel relating to the kings of Syria and Egypt (ch. xi.), were written after the times of Antiochus Epiphanes: this was plainly granting the truth of the matters of fact therein contained, as St. Jerome observes; and the falsity of his assertion clearly appears from hence, that this prophecy was translated into Greek a hundred years before Antiochus's time, and that translation was in the hands of the Egyptians, who had no kindness either for the Jews or their religion. Nay, farther, the prophecies of Daniel foretelling the great successes of Alexander (viii. 5, xi. 3), were shown to Alexander himself by the Jews, who thereupon obtained several privileges from him, as Josephus informs us, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8.

Daniel lived in great favour under Nebuchadnezzar and his successors in the Babylonian monarchy; his extraordinary merits continued him in the same degree of favour under Darius and Cyrus, the first two Persian monarchs: and, as Josephus observes (ubi supra), "he was the only prophet that enjoyed a great share of worldly prosperity." He must needs have lived to a great age, it being near seventy years from the date of his first prophecy (ii. 1) to that of his last (x. 1). Our learned chronologer, Bishop Lloyd, supposes him to have been carried into captivity, when he was about twenty years old: about ten years after we find him famed for his piety and wisdom, as appears from Ezek. xiv. 14, xxviii. 3. His last vision was in the third year of Cyrus (Dan. x. 1). at which time he was about ninety-four years of age, and it is not likely he lived much longer.

There need not anything be said concerning the three additions to Daniel, viz. The Song of the three Children, the History of Susannah, and of Bel and the Dragon: since they manifestly appear to have been the productions of Hellenists of later times, and accordingly are rejected as apocryphal, by St. Jerome, in the prefaces to his translation, and to his Commentary on Daniel, and by other ancient writers.

CHAPTER I.

1 IN the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem, and besieged it.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—The first chapter gives an account of the captivity of Daniel, and his companions, together with the manner of their education under the king of Babylon.

VOL. III.—51

2 And the LORD gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God: which he carried into the land of

Ver. 1.] The prophet Jeremiah makes the first year of Nebuchadnezzar coincident with the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and from thence begins the date of the seventy years' captivity (see Jer. i. 11, xxv. 1): but here Daniel speaks of Nebuchadnezzar as king of Babylon in the third year of Jehoiakim. To this Shinar to the house of his god; and he brought the vessels into the treasure-house of his god.

3 ¶ And the king spake unto Ashpenaz the master of his eunuchs, that he should bring certain of the children of Israel, and of the king's seed, and of the princes;

4 Children in whom was no blemish, but well favoured, and skilful in all wisdom, and cunning knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace, and whom they might teach the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans.

5 And the king appointed them a daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank: so nourishing them three years, that at the end thereof they might stand before the king.

6 Now among these were of the children of Judah, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah:

7 Unto whom the prince of the eunuchs gave names: for he gave unto Daniel the name of Belteshazzar; and to Hananiah, of Shadrach; and to Mishael, of Meshach; and to Azariah, of Abed-nego.

8 ¶ But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank: therefore he requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself.

9 Now God had brought Daniel into favour objection Dr. Prideaux gives an easy answer (Script. Connex. par. i. p. 60, edit. 8vo). That Daniel begins his computation from the time that Nebuchadnezzar was sent by his father on the expedition against Pharaoh-nechoh, king of Egypt, which was towards the latter end of the third year of Jehoiakim. In the beginning of the following year he conquered the Egyptians, which was the fourth year of Jehoiakim (see Jer. xlv. 2); and in the latter end of the same year he came and besieged Jerusalem in the ninth month, according to the Jews' account, who to this day keep a fast, on the eighteenth day of that month, in memory of this taking of Jerusalem. At which time Jehoiakim became tributary to the king of Babylon, and consequently the seventy years of captivity and vassalage to Babylon began.

It has been observed in the notes upon Jer. xxv. 1, that the scripture account of the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's reign anticipates the computation of Ptolemy's Canon two years, which two years Nebuchadnezzar reigned with his father, as Josephus informs us from Berosus, Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11.

Ver. 2. The Lord gave Jehoiakim—into his hand] He took Jehoiakim prisoner, and put him in chains, with a design to carry him to Babylon: but he having humbled himself, and submitted to become his tributary, he was restored to his kingdom (comp. 2 Kings xxiv. 1, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6).

The vessels of the house of God:] See 2 Chron. xxxvi. 7, compared with Dan. v. 2, 3. Some of the vessels were still left, which Nebuchadnezzar seized when he carried Jeconiah captive (see 2 Kings xxiv. 13, Jer. xxvii. 19, 20).

The land of Shinar] This was the original name of the country about Babylon (Gen. xi. 2), and it was still called by this name in some places of the prophets (see Isa. xi. 11, Zech. v. 11).

The treasure-house of his God.] Of the idol Bel (see Jer. l. 2), from whence they were taken by Cyrus, and delivered to Zerubbabel (Ezra i. 7, 8). To this agrees the testimony of Berosus apud Josephum (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11), who tells us, "That Nebuchadnezzar adorned the temple of Bel with the spoils of war which he had taken in that expedition."

Ver. 3. Ashpenaz] One of the chief officers of his palace; the officers that attended about the persons of the eastern kings being commonly eunuchs: a custom still practised in the Ottoman court.

And of the king's seed, &c.] The words may be better translated, "even of the king's seed;" the conjunction copulative being often used by way of explication (see Noldius's Concordance, p. 276, and the note upon Isa. li. 19). And thus Isaiah's prophecy was punctually fulfilled, xxxix. 7, as hath been observed in the preface.

Ver. 4. Children in whom was no blemish, &c.] He was directed to make choice of such as had the best accomplishments both of body and mind, and were fit to give attendance in a king's court. The word yeladim, "children," is used in scripture of such as are past the years of childhood, as we now distinguish the parts of man's life. It is applied to Rehoboam's counsellors, 1 Kings xii. 8, who cannot be thought mere children, since Rehoboam himself was of an advanced age. Nor can we suppose Daniel and his companions less than twenty years of age at this time, as may be concluded from their being put into considerable posts in the government in a short time after (ii. 48, 49).

The learning—of the Chaldeans.] Besides the study of politics and the art of war, the learning chiefly valued among them was astrology, or the knowledge of the heavenly motions, the interpretation of dreams, and architecture (see the notes upon ver. 17, 20).

The tongue of the Chaldeans.] The same was likewise called the Syrian language (see ii. 4).

Ver. 5. A daily provision of the king's meat, &c.] In like manner it was a custom of the Persian kings to feed their domestics with the remainder of their own tables (see Athenæus, lib. iv. cap. 10).

Ver. 7. Belteshazzar;] "According to the name of his god," as Nebuchadnezzar himself derives the word, iv. 8. So the name was derived from Bel, the chief idol of Babylon, as Nebuchadnezzar had his own name from Nebo, another of their idols, mentioned Isa. xlv. 1, and Evil-merodach, his successor, was named from their idol Merodach, Jer. l. 2. It is probable that the other names imposed upon Daniel's companions, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, were derived from some of their idols. Misael, a word derived from El, the name of the true God, may probably have been changed into Meshach, because Sac was an idol worshipped by the Chaldeans (see the note upon Jer. xxv. 26).

Ver. 8.] It was the custom of most nations, before their meals, to make an oblation of some part of what they ate and drank to their gods, as a thankful acknowledgment, that everything they enjoyed was their gift. These oblations were called proscitia and libamina among the Romans; so that every entertainment had something in it of the nature of a sacrifice. This practice generally prevailing, made Daniel and his friends look upon the provisions coming from the king's table as no better than meats offered to idols, and, by being so offered, to be accounted unclean and polluted (see Ezek. iv. 13, Hos. ix. 3, compare with Acts xv. 20). [The portion of the king's meat.] The word in the Hebrew is path-bag: from whence Scaliger derives the word patibagis, mentioned in Athenæus as a dish served up to the table

10 And the prince of the eunuchs said unto Daniel, I fear my lord the king, who hath appointed your meat and your drink: for why should he see your faces worse liking than the children which are of your sort? then shall ye make me endanger my head to the king.

11 Then said Daniel to Melzar, whom the prince of the eunuchs had set over Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, 12 Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days; and let them give us pulse to eat, and water to drink.

13 Then let our countenances be looked upon before thee, and the countenance of the children that eat of the portion of the king's meat: and as thou seest, deal with thy servants.

14 So he consented to them in this matter, and proved them ten days.

15 And at the end of ten days their countenances appeared fairer and fatter in flesh than all the children which did eat the portion of the king's meat.

16 Thus Melzar took away the portion of their meat, and the wine that they should drink; and gave them pulse.

17 ¶ And as for these four children, God gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom: and Daniel had understanding in all visions and dreams.

18 Now at the end of the days that the king had said he should bring them in, then the prince of the eunuchs brought them in before Nebuchadnezzar.

19 And the king communed with them; and among them all was found none like Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah: therefore stood they before the king.

20 And in all matters of wisdom and understanding, that the king enquired of them, he of the Persian kings, being a mixture of corn and wine together. See his notes upon Eusebius, p. 112.]

Ver. 9.] See a like instance of God's care over Joseph, when he was a poor captive and prisoner, and destitute of all friends to support or comfort him: Gen. xxxix. 11, and compare Ps. cvi. 46.

Ver. 10. The children—of your sort?] Or, "Of your age;" for so the word gile signifies in the Arabic, and to this sense the Greek translation understands it.

Ver. 12. Pulse] The Hebrew word zeronim signifies all sorts of garden roots or herbs (see Isa. lxi. 11).

Ver. 17. God gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom:] In all sorts of learning and knowledge: so that it became a proverb, "Thou art wiser than Daniel," Ezek. xxviii. 3. They were particularly skilful in those parts of the Chaldean learning which were really useful, and might recommend them to the favour of the kings both of Babylon and Persia, and qualify them for places of trust under them. So Moses's education in the Egyptian learning (Acts vii. 22), fitted him to be a ruler of God's people.

Visions and dreams.] It was an opinion generally received in the early ages of the world, that dreams, when they were attended with unusual circumstances, did portend or signify some future event. This subject Tully handles at large in his first book De Divinatione, and alleges some very remarkable instances of that kind. Homer speaks the general sense of his own age, when he saith, καὶ γὰρ τ' ὄναρ ἐν Διὶς ἔσται: "even a dream comes from God." The authority of Joseph is still more ancient, who saith, "Do not interpretations [of dreams] come from God!" (Gen. xli. 8). The next evidence, in point of antiquity, is the book of Job, where Eliphaz relates a night vision he himself had, which instructed him in a truth of great importance (Job. iv. 12, &c. xxxiii. 14, 15). Elihu affirms, that "God speaks once, yea twice to men—in a dream, in a vision of the night:" which, indeed, was the common way by which God revealed his will to the patriarchs of old, and afterward to the prophets (see Gen. xxviii. 12, &c. xxxi. 11, Numb. xii. 6). To descend to later times, the son of Sirach, when he discourses of the vanity of dreams, yet makes this exception, "Unless they be sent from the most high" (Eccles. xxxiv. 1. 6).

Ver. 18. At the end of the days] At the end of three years (see ver. 5).

Ver. 19. Therefore stood they before the king.] They were in continual attendance in the king's court. So "Joseph stood before Pharaoh," Gen. xli. 46. The same expression is used of Elijah and Jeremiah, as God's servants and messengers, 1 Kings xvii. 1, Jer. xv. 19, and the Levites are said to "stand before the congregation, to minister to them," Numb. xvi. 9.

Ver. 20.] These words may be understood of those that employed themselves in the lawful search of natural causes and effects, and of the regular motions of the heavenly bodies. For when Daniel made intercession to the captain of the guard, that "the wise men of Babylon might not be slain" (ii. 24), we cannot suppose all of them were such as studied unlawful arts and sciences, since he himself was afterward made master or head over them (ii. 48): and if no part of the Chaldean learning might lawfully be studied, they that "would not defile themselves with the king's meat," would have refused to be instructed in that way of education which he had appointed, as St. Jerome observes upon ver. 8. In like manner, the wise men mentioned Matt. ii. 1, called Magi in the original, may be supposed such as employed themselves in observing the motions of the heavenly bodies, and might reasonably suppose that the new star they had seen, in that region of the heavens which the astrologers appropriated to Judea, did portend the birth of that Prince whom the Jews expected should be born about this time, and had spread such an expectation over a great part of the world: as a learned prelate hath lately shown, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, ch. 1.

[Astrologers] The word in the Hebrew is Assaphim, which coming near in sound to the Greek Σαφει, hath made some conjecture that it was derived from thence. But the true derivation of it is either from the verb tsapha or sapha, signifying to view carefully, from whence comes the word tsophim, "watch men," a name given to the prophets: or else from tsaphah, to hide, from whence the author of Ecclesiasticus derives the Greek sophia; "wisdom," saith he, "is according to her name, and she is not manifest unto many" (vi. 22). See the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Vindication, book i. ch. 1, sect. 2.]

Ver. 21.] Daniel lived to see the overthrow of the Babylonish monarchy by Cyrus: which made way for the fulfilling of Jeremiah's prophecy concerning the seventy weeks, in the return of the Jews found them ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm.

from their captivity; which was accomplished in the first year of king Cyrus (Ezra i. 1): for the accomplishment of which prophecy we find Daniel very solicitous, ix. 1, 2. This being so remarkable a year, the text takes notice that Daniel lived so long: not but that he lived longer, at least till the third year of Cyrus, as appears from x. 1. The word unto, or until, does not always exclude the time following the period mentioned (see Ps. cx. 1, cxii. 8).

CHAPTER II.

1 AND in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar Nebuchadnezzar dreamed dreams, wherewith his spirit was troubled, and his sleep brake from him.

2 Then the king commanded to call the magicians, and the astrologers, and the sorcerers, and the Chaldeans, for to shew the king his dreams. So they came and stood before the king.

3 And the king said unto them, I have dreamed a dream, and my spirit was troubled to know the dream.

4 Then spake the Chaldeans to the king in Syriack, O king, live for ever: tell thy servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation.

5 The king answered and said to the Chal-deans, The thing is gone from me: if ye will not make known unto me the dream, with the interpretation thereof, ye shall be cut in pieces, and your houses shall be made a dunghill.

6 But if ye shew the dream, and the interpretation thereof, ye shall receive of me gifts and rewards, and great honour: therefore shew me the dream, and the interpretation thereof.

7 They answered again, and said, Let the king tell his servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation of it.

8 The king answered and said, I know of certainty that ye would gain the time, because ye see the thing is gone from me.

9 But if ye will not make known unto me the

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—An account of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, the substance of which he had forgot, and the wise men of Chaldea could not relate to him: who are thereupon threatened with death: Daniel rescues them from that imminent danger, relates the dream to the king, and interprets it of the four great monarchies; and how, in the latter times of the fourth, God would set up the kingdom of the Messiah. Upon this the king advances him and his friends to considerable posts of honour.

Ver. 1. In the second year] This was the fourth year of his reign, according to the scripture computation (see the note upon i. 1): for above three years must have been expired since the time of Daniel's captivity (see i. 5, 8). But Daniel, writing the following history in Chaldee for the use of the Chaldeans, follows that computation of time which was in use among them.

Dreamed dreams.] Though it was but one continued dream, it contained divers scenes of affairs; being a description of the succession of the four monarchies, which were to continue, under different forms, unto the end of the world.

Broke from him.] Or, "went from him," as a like phrase is rendered, vi. 18. The preposition al, sometimes signifies from, as Noldius shows in several instances, Concordance, p. 689.

Ver. 2. The king commanded to call the magicians, and the astrologers.] See the note upon i. 20. Daniel and his companions did not appear among them: perhaps because the Chaldeans despised them as youths and strangers, and would not have them thought equal in knowledge with themselves.

Sorcerers.] This word is always taken in an ill sense by the holy writers, for those that consult with evil spirits.

Chaldeans.] The Chaldeans were so much addicted to the study of the heavenly motions, and to make prognostications from thence, that the word Chaldean is used both in Greek and Latin writers for an astrologer.

Ver. 4. Then spake the Chaldeans—in Syriack.] The ancient Chaldee and the Syrian language were the same (see Gen. xxxi. 47, 2 Kings xviii. 26, Ezra iv. 7). This language is found in its greatest purity in the books of Daniel and Ezra. The Jews, in the time of their captivity, mixed several Hebrew words with the Chaldean language, and this is the Chaldee in which the Targums upon the law and the prophets are writ, and is called the Hebrew tongue in the New Testament. The language spoken in Antioch, and other parts of Syria, differs as a dialect from the two former, and, being written in a different character, is what we now call Syriac (see Bishop Walton, Prolegom. xiii. ad Bibl. Polyglot, and Dr. Prideaux's Connex. par. ii. p. 529, edit. 8vo).

The following part of the chapter from this verse is written in Chaldee, and so on to the end of the seventh chapter: the reasons of which see in the preface.

Ver. 5. Cut in pieces.] A punishment of which other places of scripture make mention (see 1 Sam. xv. 33, 1 Chron. xx. 3). Our Saviour alludes to it, Matt. xxiv. 51.

Your houses shall be made a dunghill.] That there might be no remains left of their memory (see Ezra vi. 11).

Ver. 6. Gifts and rewards] Such as the king actually bestowed upon Daniel, after he had interpreted the dream, ver. 48 (compare v. 16).

Ver. 8. I know of certainty that ye would gain the time.] By importunately renewing your request that I would recollect my dream, you only protract the time, and delay the execution of the sentence pronounced against you, ver. 5. "Buying" or "redeeming the time" is a proverbial expression, denoting men's using their utmost endeavours to free themselves out of some imminent danger or difficulty: gaining time, being a considerable advantage to that purpose (see the following verse). In this sense St. Paul uses the phrase, Eph. v. 16, Col. iv. 5.

Ver. 9. There is but one decree for you:] The sentence of death already pronounced shall certainly be put in execution.

Ye have prepared lying and corrupt words] Ye dream, there is but one decree for you: for ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me, till the time be changed: therefore tell me the dream, and I shall know that ye can shew me the interpretation thereof.

10 ¶ The Chaldeans answered before the king, and said, There is not a man upon the earth that can shew the king's matter: therefore there is no king, lord, nor ruler, that asked such things at any magician, or astrologer, or Chaldean.

11 And it is a rare thing that the king requireth, and there is none other that can shew it before the king, except the gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh.

12 For this cause the king was angry and very furious, and commanded to destroy all the wise men of Babylon.

13 And the decree went forth that the wise men should be slain; and they sought Daniel and his fellows to be slain.

14 ¶ Then Daniel answered with counsel and wisdom to Arioch the captain of the king's guard, which was gone forth to slay the wise men of Babylon:

15 He answered and said to Arioch the king's captain, Why is the decree so hasty from the king? Then Arioch made the thing known to Daniel.

16 Then Daniel went in, and desired of the king that he would give him time, and that he would shew the king the interpretation.

17 Then Daniel went to his house, and made have only contrived feigned excuses to protract the time, in hopes that circumstances might possibly alter, and so you might escape punishment.

Ver. 11.] These Chaldeans undertook to foretell future events by their skill in the motions of the stars: and to explain dreams by some natural observations, such as are still to be seen in Artemidorus's Oneirocritics. Or if they pretended to have correspondence with spirits, they were the demons of a lower rank, who could not impart to them things so much above the compass of ordinary knowledge (compare ver. 28, and v. 11).

Ver. 12.] He might in his rage and fury not think of sending for Daniel; which made Daniel try to get admission to the king (ver. 14, &c.), to prevent his own destruction, as well as that of the other wise men.

Ver. 13.] Though they had not been summoned with the wise men of Chaldea (see ver. 2).

Ver. 14. Then Daniel answered with counsel and wisdom to Arioch] With whom he was in favour (see i. 9). The Vulgar Latin translates the former part of the sentence thus; Tunc Daniel requisivit de lege et sententia, "Daniel enquired concerning the law and decree," which the king had made for destroying the wise men. The word tenem, translated here wisdom, usually signifies an edict, or public decree, set forth by authority.

Ver. 16.] The king's anger was now abated, and withal the providence of God was visible, in inclining the king's heart to allow Daniel that favour which he had before denied to the magicians (ver. 8).

Ver. 18. That they would desire mercies of the God of heaven] The danger equally threatened Daniel and his friends, therefore it was fit they should join in prayer for the averting of it.

the thing known to Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, his companions:

18 That they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret; that Daniel and his fellows should not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon.

19 ¶ Then was the secret revealed unto Daniel in a night vision. Then Daniel blessed the God of heaven.

20 Daniel answered and said, Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever: for wisdom and might are his:

21 And he changeth the times and the seasons: he removeth kings, and setteth up kings: he giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding:

22 He revealeth the deep and secret things: he knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with him.

23 I thank thee, and praise thee, O thou God of my fathers, who hast given me wisdom and might, and hast made known unto me now what we desired of thee: for thou hast now made known unto us the king's matter.

24 ¶ Therefore Daniel went in unto Arioch, whom the king had ordained to destroy the wise men of Babylon: he went and said thus unto him; Destroy not the wise men of Babylon: bring me in before the king, and I will shew unto the king the interpretation.

25 Then Arioch brought in Daniel before the king in haste, and said thus unto him, I have

Ver. 19. A night vision.] The same with a dream (see Job iv. 13, xxxiii. 15).

Ver. 20. For wisdom and might are his:] His wisdom appears in ordering the great affairs of the world, and his might or power in bringing them to pass. To the same purpose Jeremy styles him, "great in counsel, and mighty in work," Jer. xxxii. 19.

Ver. 21. He removeth kings,] The great changes of the world are brought to pass by removing kings, and translating their dominions to others: by raising some empires, and pulling down others. Of this, Nebuchadnezzar's dream that was then revealed to Daniel was a signal instance: which contained the succession of the four great monarchies of the world. The prophet speaks of the disposal of governments as one of God's prerogatives, and the means whereby he brings to pass the most considerable changes which are wrought in the world. The psalmist speaks to the same purpose, Ps. lxxv. 6, 7. This is a very good reason to persuade men to submit to such changes and revolutions being brought to pass by providence for great and wise reasons (see iv. 17, Jer. xxvii. 5, 6).

Ver. 22.] He knoweth the most secret things, while they yet lie hid in their causes, and can discover and bring them to light (compare v. 11, 14).

Ver. 23. For thou hast now made known unto us the king's matter.] See the note upon ver. 26.

Ver. 24. Destroy not the wise men of Babylon:] Some of them might probably employ themselves in laudable studies, and searches after knowledge (see the note upon i. 20). However, here was no just cause given for putting them to death.

Ver. 25. I have found a man—that will make known—the interpretation.] Daniel undertook to do it of his own accord (ver. 24), but this officer, ac-found a man of the captives of Judah, that will make known unto the king the interpretation.

26 The king answered and said to Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, Art thou able to make known unto me the dream which I have seen, and the interpretation thereof?

27 Daniel answered in the presence of the king, and said, The secret which the king hath demanded cannot the wise men, the astrologers, the magicians, the soothsayers, shew unto the king;

28 But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets, and maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days. Thy dream, and the visions of thy head upon thy bed, are these:

29 As for thee, O king, thy thoughts came into thy mind upon thy bed, what should come to pass hereafter: and he that revealeth secrets maketh known to thee what shall come to pass.

30 But as for me, this secret is not revealed to me for any wisdom that I have more than any living, but for their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king, and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thy heart.

31 ¶ Thou, O king, sawest, and behold a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; and the form thereof was terrible.

32 This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass, 33 His legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay.

34 Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces.

35 Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors; and the wind carried them away, that cording to the manner of courtiers, takes this opportunity of ingratiating himself to the king, as if the discovery of Daniel's abilities in this kind was owing purely to his diligence.

Ver. 27. Soothsayers.] This word is not met with before among the several sorts of pretenders to wisdom among the Chaldeans, mentioned ver. 2. The Chaldee word is gazerin, which some think answers the Latin aruspices: who pretended to foretell events by tokens found in the entrails of the living creatures which they sacrificed.

The Greek translation which St. Jerome tells us was Theodotion's, retains the Chaldee word, and reads γαστριμν, which shows he did not understand the true import of that original.

Ver. 28. But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets.] Daniel assumes nothing to himself, but gives the glory to God alone, whose knowledge, as he tells the king, infinitely exceeds that of all the wise men of Chaldea, and of the gods or demons which they consulted or worshipped.

Maketh known—what shall be in the latter days.] God only can certainly foreknow such events as depend upon contingent causes, and the determination of man's free-will (see Isa. xli. 22, 23). The "latter days" very often signify the times of the Messiah, called the "last times," or age of the world (see the note upon Isa. ii. 2); and so the expression may be understood here; for the prophecy contained in this vision reaches to the times when the "kingdom of the Messiah" shall be set up (see ver. 44, and compare x. 14).

Ver. 30.] See ver. 28, 36. That this may be a means for myself and my three friends to gain an interest in your majesty, the better to promote the glory of God, and to do kindnesses to our brethren of the captivity. This is the sense of the words if we follow the common translation: but I take the marginal reading to be the better interpretation, "But for the intent that the interpretation may be made known to the king." The verb transitive is often used for the impersonal (see the note upon Isa. xlv. 18). Several instances of this kind are to be found in the book of Daniel: as iii. 4, iv. 16, 31, v. 20, xi. 21.

Ver. 31. Whose brightness was excellent.] Grotius acutely observes, that this image appeared with a glorious lustre in the imagination of Nebuchadnezzar, whose mind was wholly taken up with admiration of worldly pomp and splendour; whereas the same monarchies were represented to Daniel under the shape of fierce and wild beasts, ch. vii., as being the great supporters of idolatry and tyranny in the world.

The form thereof was terrible.] The success which accompanied their arms made them feared and dreaded by all the world.

Ver. 32. This image's head was of fine gold.] The Babylonian monarchy was arrived to the height of glory under Nebuchadnezzar (see ver. 37, 38): who likewise improved and adorned the city of Babylon to such a degree, as to make it one of the wonders of the world: as Dr. Prideaux shows at large, Connex. par. i. p. 94, &c. So this empire might justly be compared to a golden head.

His breasts and his arms of silver.] The second monarchy of the Medes and Persians will be inferior to the first (see ver. 39); probably in respect of its continuance: the Babylonian monarchy, if we date its beginning from Ninus, having lasted about seven hundred years.

Ibid. and ver. 33. And his thighs of brass, his legs of iron.] These emblems denote the strength of the third and fourth monarchies, and the irresistible force with which they subdued their adversaries. Iron and brass are the emblems of strength in the prophetic writings (see ver. 39, 40, iv. 15, vii. 19, Isa. xlv. 2, xlviii. 4).

Ver. 33.] See ver. 41, 42.

Ver. 34.] A very proper representation how the whole image was destroyed: viz. by a great stone's falling upon the feet of the image, and breaking them to pieces, whereby the whole image was overturned, and broken to pieces. In like manner the kingdom of Christ, a kingdom of God's own erecting (see ver. 45), shall break to pieces the fourth and last monarchy, in which the remainders of the other three were comprehended: and shall at length put an end to all earthly rule, authority, and power, 1 Cor. xv. 24.

The Jews unanimously agree, that by the stone is here meant the Messiah (see the authorities collected in the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's learned Defence of Christianity, p. 122).

Ver. 35. Became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors.] There was no sign or remainder left of their former greatness (compare Ps. i. 4, xxxvii. 10, Hos. xiii. 4). The same expression is used by Isaiah, xli. 15, where speaking of the victory God will give to no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth.

36 ¶ This is the dream; and we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king.

37 Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory.

38 And whosoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven hath he given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold.

his church over its enemies, he saith, "Thou shalt thrash the mountains, and make the hills as chaff: thou shalt fan them, and the wind shall drive them away." The expressions in both places allude to the threshing-floors in the eastern countries, which were usually placed on the tops of hills (see 2 Chron. iii. 1).

And the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth.] This denotes the advancement and increase of Christ's kingdom, that it should from small beginnings proceed to fill the whole earth: as if a stone by degrees should grow to a mountain. Thus Christ is described as "going forth conquering, and to conquer," Rev. vi. 2. Mr. Mede hath very judiciously observed (see his Works, p. 743), that this kingdom is described here under two states or forms; the one may be called by way of distinction the kingdom of the stone, the other the kingdom of the mountain. The first commenced upon the erection of the fourth kingdom, while the statue continued on its feet; the other was to be manifest under its last and weakest state. Christ, the foundation of the church, is often described as a stone (see Isa. xxviii. 16, Zech. iii. 9), and the church in its flourishing estate is represented as a mountain (Isa. ii. 2, Ezek. xx. 40, Rev. xxi. 10).

Ver. 36. We will tell the interpretation—before the king.] An expression becoming the modesty of so good a man as Daniel: who allows his friends a share in the honour of interpreting the dream, because the interpretation was obtained by their joint prayers to God (see ver. 18, 23).

Ver. 37. A king of kings:] So Nebuchadnezzar is styled, Ezek. xxvi. 7, because he had kings for his vassals and tributaries: such were Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, the former kings of Judah (2 Kings xxiv. 1, 17). The same title was afterward given to Artaxerxes, king of Persia, Ezra. vii. 12.

Ver. 38. And whosoever the children of men dwell—hath he—made thee ruler over them all.] The great monarchs assumed to themselves the title of being lords of the world (see vi. 25, viii. 5): so the word ὁ κύριος, the "world," commonly signifies the Roman empire in the New Testament (see Luke ii. 1, Acts xi. 29).

The beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven] The Greek adds, "And the fish of the sea:" whatever right thy subjects can claim, either in their possessions, or in any perquisites thereto belonging, is all held of thee, as the supreme lord (compare Jer. xxvii. 6).

Ver. 39. Another kingdom inferior to thee,] See ver. 32.

And another—(see ver. 32) which shall bear rule over all the earth.] The Grecian monarchy shall ex-

40 And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things: and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise.

41 And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potters' clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay.

42 And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken.

43 And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay.

tend its conquests beyond the bounds of the preceding empires, even to those parts of the east, which none of the Persian monarchs had ever attempted to subdue.

Ver. 40. And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron:] So it is represented as having great iron teeth, vii. 7, 19. This fourth kingdom can be no other than the Roman empire. Some commentators, indeed, have reckoned the empire continued in Alexander's successors, as a distinct kingdom from that which was set up by himself. But no writer of the history of those times speaks of it as such: and this notion plainly contradicts the description which Daniel gives of that kingdom, ch. viii. There the prophet represents the third kingdom as it were set up by Alexander, and continued under his successors, under the figure of a "goat having one great horn," and afterward, "four others which stood up in its stead" (ver. 8), and afterward expressly calls Alexander the first king (ver. 21), and farther tells us (xi. 4), that his kingdom shall be "broken and divided towards the four winds of heaven." They that want farther satisfaction, may see more proofs of this point in Mr. Mede's Dissertation upon this subject, p. 712 of his Works.

The reason why the Spirit of God takes notice of these monarchies rather than any others, is, because God's people were subjects to these monarchies as they succeeded one another; and in their succession, a line of time is carried on to the coming of Christ, who was to appear in the times of the fourth monarchy, and the countries belonging to it were to be the chief seat of Christ's kingdom: as Mr. Mede observes in the same Dissertation.

And as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise.] Or, "even as iron that breaketh (all things), shall it break in pieces and bruise all these."

Ver. 41.] The ten toes of the image signify the ten kings, who were in aftertimes to divide this kingdom among themselves: denoted by the ten horns of this fourth beast, mentioned vii. 7, compared with Rev. xvii. 12. This partition of the Roman empire will divide its strength, and by consequence be a diminution of its power.

Ver. 42.] Or, brittle. The sense of the word is more fully explained in the following verse. Some interpreters explain them thus: That the chief power in these ten kingdoms shall be partly secular, and partly ecclesiastical: and the encroaching of the ecclesiastical power upon the secular, shall be the occasion of frequent clashings between them, to the weakening of both parties, and endangering their breaking to pieces.

Ver. 43.] These ten kingdoms shall be a medley

44 And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever.

45 Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure.

46 Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell upon his face, and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation and sweet odours unto him.

47 The king answered unto Daniel, and said, Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing thou couldest reveal this secret.

48 Then the king made Daniel a great man, and gave him many great gifts, and made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon.

49 Then Daniel requested of the king, and he set Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, over the affairs of the province of Babylon: but Daniel sat in the gate of the king.

of people of different nations, laws, and customs: and although the kings of the several nations shall try to strengthen themselves by marriage-alliances into one another's families, yet the different interests which they pursue will make them often engage in wars with each other, and thereby weaken the common strength.

Ver. 44. And in the days of these kings] During the succession of these four monarchies, and in the times of the last of them. Compare ver. 34, where the "stone cut out without hands," is said "to smite the image upon its feet," which part of the image denotes the fourth monarchy.

A kingdom, which shall never be destroyed:] The kingdom of Christ is described in scripture as an everlasting kingdom: not like the kingdoms of this world, subject to change and dissolution, but like the author of it, eternal and unchangeable (see vii. 14, 27).

It shall break in pieces] See ver. 34.

Ver. 45.] There should not have been a full stop placed at the end of the last verse, as our translation is commonly pointed: the particle forasmuch showing that the sense of this verse depends upon the foregoing words, as in ver. 40, 41. The words show the correspondence between the several parts of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and the event thereby signified: that as the "stone cut out without hands" overturned the image, and broke it to pieces; so a kingdom of God's own erecting should put an end to all these earthly kingdoms.

The stone was cut out of the [or a] mountain without hands,] The phrase "without hands" denotes it to be an act of God's own immediate power, and brought to pass without the interposition of second causes (compare viii. 25). So the heavenly body we are to receive at the resurrection, is called "a building not made with hands," 2 Cor. v. 1. The same expression is used concerning the heavenly tabernacle, Heb. ix. 11, 24, in opposition to buildings of human structure. In like manner, Christ at his coming into the world had a "body prepared for him" by the immediate operation of the Holy Ghost.

God hath made known] See ver. 28.

Ver. 46.] Doing reverence by prostration is not only an act of worship paid to God, but often given to kings and great men in the Old Testament, according to the custom of the eastern countries (see 2 Sam. ix. 6, xiv. 33). It was likewise an expression of reverence paid to prophets, on the account of the sanctity of their office, and not refused by them (see 1 Kings xviii. 7). Of this kind was probably the worship paid by the leper to Christ (Matt. viii. 2), whom he took for a prophet. But when other circumstances were added to it, which made it look like divine worship, then it was refused to be accepted, as in the case of St. Peter, Acts x. 25, and of the angel, Rev. xix. 10. The adoration here described seems to have been of the latter kind, being joined with offering incense, an act of worship peculiar to God alone (see Ezra vi. 10). For this reason it is highly probable that Daniel refused the honours offered to him, and put the king in mind that he should give God the glory, as we find he does in the following verse. Nebuchadnezzar seems in a sudden transport to have looked upon Daniel as having something more than human in him (see iv. 8); just as the barbarians thought of St. Paul, Acts xxviii. 6.

Ver. 47. A God of gods, and a Lord of kings,] Superior to all the gods or demons who are worshipped by men; the supreme governor of the world, and ruler of the kings and kingdoms in it (see ver. 21).

Ver. 48. Then the king made Daniel—ruler over the whole province of Babylon,] When the empire came under the government of the Medes and Persians, every province had a prince or ruler appointed over it (vi. 1). This might probably have been practised before, only afterward improved by the addition of three presidents over the rest (ibid. ver. 2, and v. 7).

And chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon,] See the note upon i. 20, and compare iv. 9, v. 11.

Ver. 49. Then Daniel requested of the king, &c.] That they might be assisting to him, and partners in honour with him, by whose joint intercession this secret was revealed (ver. 18).

But Daniel sat in the gate of the king,] He was a constant attendant at the king's court (see Esth. ii. 19, 21, iii. 2).

CHAPTER III.

1 NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king made an image of gold, whose height was threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof six cubits: he set it up in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—The history of the miraculous deliverance of Daniel's three friends out of the fiery furnace, into which they were cast, because they refused to worship the golden image which king Nebuchadnezzar had set up.

2 Then Nebuchadnezzar the king sent to gather together the princes, the governors, and the captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, to come to the dedication of the image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up.

3 Then the princes, the governors, and captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, were gathered together unto the dedication of the image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up; and they stood before the image that Nebuchadnezzar had set up.

4 Then an herald cried aloud, To you it is commanded, O people, nations, and languages,

5 That at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king hath set up:

6 And whoso falleth not down and worshippeth shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace.

7 Therefore at that time, when all the people heard the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of music, all the people, the nations, and the languages, fell down and worshipped the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up.

8 ¶ Wherefore at that time certain Chaldeans came near and accused the Jews.

9 They spake and said to the king Nebuchadnezzar, O king, live for ever.

10 Thou, O king, hast made a decree, that every man that shall hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music, shall fall down and worship the golden image:

11 And whoso falleth not down and worshippeth, that he should be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace.

12 There are certain Jews whom thou has set

Ver. 1. Nebuchadnezzar—made an image] This image was set up probably in honour of Bel, whom Nebuchadnezzar worshipped as his tutelar deity; and called Daniel after his name (see i. 2, iv. 8).

The proportion of this image shows it to have been a very irregular figure, no man's height being above six times his thickness. This makes interpreters generally understand these sixty cubits of the height of the image and pedestal taken both together; and suppose the image to have been thirty-six cubits and the pedestal twenty-four. Diodorus Siculus, giving an account of the plunder Xerxes had taken out of the temple of Belus, mentions a statue of massy gold which was forty feet high, which Dr. Prideaux conjectures to have been this statue; and then the body of the image would hardly have been twenty-seven cubits high (see his Script. Connex. par. i. p. 100, 101).

The Greek interpreter supposes this remarkable story to have happened in the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign.

Ver. 2.] It seems a needless task to undertake an exact description of these several officers and commanders, who cannot be distinguished with any certainty. From the first word akashdarpanaia, "princes," the word satrapas is derived, which is commonly taken for a word of Persian original, but was probably first used among the Assyrians or Babylonians, and from thence derived into the Persian language.

Treasurers.] In the Chaldee, ghedabraia, the same word with ghizbar, translated "treasurer," Ezra i. 8, Z being often changed into D, in the Chaldee.

Ver. 3. And they stood before the image] They made their personal appearance, and showed themselves ready to perform the worship required of them.

Ver. 4. O people, nations, and languages.] whatsoever parts of the empire ye come from, and whatever language you speak (see ver. 29, and iv. 1). This form of speech was designed to set forth the largeness and extent of the Babylonish empire, which had subjects of so many different languages. The same phrase was afterward used under the Medes and Persians (see vi. 25, Esth. i. 22, iii. 12, viii. 9).

Ver. 5.] Some of the names of these musical instruments have a great affinity with the Greek words of the same signification: as the word karna, "the cornet," with κίρνα; kithros, the "harp," with κίθαρα; pesanterin, the "psaltery," with ψαλτήριον; and symphonia, translated "dulcimer," with συμφωνία. This some account for, by supposing that the traffic managed by the Phoenicians with Greece (see Ezek. xxvii. 13), and the transplanting of the Eolian and Ionian colonies into Asia, which happened about an age after the destruction of Troy, brought these and other Greek words into the eastern parts of the world. But it is more probable that these names should be transferred from the eastern languages into Greece. This is taken for granted in the word sambuca, derived into Greek from the Chaldee sabca, mentioned in the text. In like manner kithros, from whence cithara is derived, is probably taken from citrus, i. e. the citron-wood, of which the instrument is made, the best of which kind grew in Media. This opinion is confirmed by the testimony of Strabo (lib. x. p. 471), who saith, "That the names of musical instruments, such as nablia, sambuca, and barbitos, were derived from barbarous languages:" by which the Greeks denote the eastern tongue. The words of Athenæus are to the same purpose, lib. iv. cap. 23, and lib. xiv. cap. 5, where he saith, "That the Phrygian and Lydian harmony came from the barbarians, i. e. the eastern nations, to the Greeks."

There is but one objection against this opinion, which is, that the word symphonia, here mentioned, is a Greek compound. But Isidore, in his Origines, describes that instrument to be hollow, something like our drum, and covered with leather, which they played upon with a stick or a quill: from whence we may conclude, that the affinity between this and the Greek word of the same sound is purely accidental.

Ver. 6. The same hour] This is the first place in the Old Testament where we meet with the division of time into hours. The Greeks ascribe the invention of hours to Anaximander or Anaximenes; who probably learned it from the Chaldeans (see Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 109).

Be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace.] Burning offenders alive was a punishment used among the Babylonians (see Jer. xxix. 22), and it may be in other eastern countries (see Ps. xxi. 9).

Ver. 7.] Paying divine honours to the images of deified men was a piece of worship generally practised among the Chaldeans, as well as other heathens (see Isa. xlvi. 1, Jer. x. 2, 11, 1. 2).

Ver. 12. Thy gods.] Or rather, "thy god," for the image represented but one single object of worship:

over the affairs of the province of Babylon, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego; these men, O king, have not regarded thee; they serve not thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.

13 ¶ Then Nebuchadnezzar in his rage and fury commanded to bring Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. Then they brought these men before the king.

14 Nebuchadnezzar spake and said unto them, Is it true, O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, do not ye serve my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up?

15 Now if ye be ready that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the image which I have made; well: but if ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?

16 Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter.

17 If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king.

18 But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.

19 ¶ Then was Nebuchadnezzar full of fury, and the form of his visage was changed against Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego: therefore he spake, and commanded that they should heat the furnace one seven times more than it was wont to be heated.

20 And he commanded the most mighty men that were in his army to bind Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, and to cast them into the burning fiery furnace.

21 Then these men were bound in their coats, their hosen, and their hats, and their other garments, and were cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace.

22 Therefore because the king's commandment was urgent, and the furnace exceeding hot, the flame of the fire slew those men that took up Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego.

23 And these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace.

24 Then Nebuchadnezzar the king was astonished, and rose up in haste, and spake, and said unto his counsellors, Did not we cast three men bound into the midst of the fire? They answered and said unto the king, True, O king.

25 He answered and said, Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God.

26 ¶ Then Nebuchadnezzar came near to the mouth of the burning fiery furnace, and spake and said, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, ye servants of the most high God, come forth, and come hither. Then Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, came forth of the midst of the fire.

27 And the princes, governors, and captains, and the king's counsellors, being gathered together, saw these men, upon whose bodies the fire had no power, nor was an hair of their head singed, neither were their coats changed, nor the smell of fire had passed on them.

28 Then Nebuchadnezzar spake, and said, Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who hath sent his angel and delivered his servants that trusted in him, and have changed the king's word, and yielded their bodies, that they might not serve nor worship any god, except their own God.

so the word is rendered i. 2, and so it should be translated, Exod. xxxii. 4: "This is thy God, O Israel;" as the same words are rendered Neb. ix. 18. For Aaron certainly designed to worship the true God by the emblem of the golden calf, and accordingly "proclaimed a feast to the Lord," Exod. xxxii. 5.

Ver. 14. Is it true,] Or, "Is it on purpose?" so the word is used, Exod. xxi. 13.

Ver. 15. Now if ye be ready, &c.] The sentence is imperfect in the original, and is rightly supplied by our translators with the word well: see a like instance, Luke xiii. 9.

And who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?] Thus Nebuchadnezzar exalted himself above God Almighty, as Sennacherib had done before him (2 Kings xviii. 36), notwithstanding that he had before made an ample confession of the true God (ii. 47).

Ver. 16.] In so plain a case there is no room for deliberation: we have an answer ready at hand, "that we ought to obey God rather than man."

Ver. 17.] As we are firmly persuaded of his power to deliver us, so we trust in his mercy and goodness that he will deliver us out of this imminent danger. This they speak out of a well grounded hope, not from a certain foresight of being delivered; for such an assurance would have defeated the worth of their courage and constancy in despising the danger which threatened them.

Ver. 19.] He discovered in his looks the signs of his fierce anger against these three persons, whom he was incensed against, not only as guilty of disobedience, but likewise of the highest ingratitude towards him who had preferred them to places of trust and honour.

Ver. 25. And the form of the fourth is like the Son of God.] Like that of an angel (see ver. 28). Angels are called the sons of God, Job i. 6, xxxviii. 7.

Ver. 26. Ye servants of the most high God.] This miracle calls to the king's mind that confession he had formerly made of the true God (ii. 47).

Ver. 28. Blessed be the God of Shadrach, &c.] So Darius offers up his acknowledgments to the "God of Daniel" (vi. 26), looking upon him as superior to other gods, but not as the only true God.

Who hath sent his angel.] So Daniel ascribes his deliverance from the lions to an angel, vi. 22 (compare Acts xii. 11).

And have changed the king's word.] Have rendered his command of none effect, God himself having suspended the execution of it.

Ver. 29.] See ii. 5.

29 Therefore I make a decree, That every people, nation, and language, which speak any thing amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill: because

Ver. 30.] Or restored them to their former places and dignities: so Lud. De Dieu explains the Chaldee verb hatselach. The Greek interpreter adds, at there is no other God that can deliver after this sort.

30 Then the king promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in the province of Babylon.

the end of the verse, "And he advanced them to be governors over all the Jews who were in his kingdom."

CHAPTER IV.

1 NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king, unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you.

2 I thought it good to shew the signs and wonders that the high God hath wrought toward me.

3 How great are his signs! and how mighty are his wonders! his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion is from generation to generation.

4 ¶ I Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in mine house, and flourishing in my palace:

5 I saw a dream which made me afraid, and the thoughts upon my bed and the visions of my head troubled me.

6 Therefore made I a decree to bring in all the wise men of Babylon before me, that they might make known unto me the interpretation of the dream.

7 Then came in the magicians, the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers: and I told the dream before them; but they did not make known unto me the interpretation thereof.

8 ¶ But at the last Daniel came in before me, whose name was Belteshazzar, according to the name of my god, and in whom is the spirit of the holy gods: and before him I told the dream, saying,

9 O Belteshazzar, master of the magicians, because I know that the spirit of the holy gods is in thee, and no secret troubleth thee, tell me the visions of my dream that I have seen, and the interpretation thereof.

10 Thus were the visions of mine head in my bed; I saw, and behold a tree in the midst of the earth, and the height thereof was great.

11 The tree grew, and was strong, and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth:

12 The leaves thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all: the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it.

13 I saw in the visions of my head upon my bed, and, behold, a watcher and an holy one came down from heaven;

14 He cried aloud, and said thus, Hew down of the wise men of Babylon can attain to (see ii. 11, v. 11, 14).

Ver. 9. O Belteshazzar, master of the magicians,] See ii. 48, and the note upon i. 20.

Tell me the visions] Nebuchadnezzar tells the dream himself in the following words: so the meaning of this sentence must be, Tell me the dream, that is, the interpretation thereof; in which sense the copulative particle is often used (see the note on i. 3). The Greek translate it thus, "Hear the visions of my dream, and tell me the interpretation thereof."

Ver. 10.] Princes and great men are often represented by fair and flourishing trees. So the king of Assyria is described, Ezek. xxxi. 3, 18 (compare Isa. x. 34, Zech. xi. 2).

Ver. 12. The beasts of the field had shadow under it,] All the subjects of that large empire thought themselves safe under his protection (compare Ezek. xvii. 23, xxxi. 6, Lam. iv. 20).

Ver. 13. Behold, a watcher and [or even] an holy one came down from heaven;] The conjunctive copulative is used here by way of explication (see ver. 9). The word "watcher" is understood of some principal angel: the angelical orders being described as always attending upon God's throne, to receive and execute his commands (see Ps. ciii. 20, Matt. xviii. 10, and the notes upon Ezek. i. 11, 24). For the same reason they are called "the eyes of the Lord," Zech. iv. 10. In the fragments of that ancient book, called The Prophecy of Enoch, quoted in the Epistle of St.

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—A recital of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which foretold the loss of his kingly power, and his being driven from human society, as it was explained by Daniel, and fulfilled in the event.

Ver. 1.] This chapter contains a recital of the very words of that edict or proclamation which Nebuchadnezzar published after his restoration, for the greater confirmation of the truth of the event here related.

Ver. 3. His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom,] He exercises an uncontrollable dominion over all the world, and even over the greatest princes (see ver. 17, 34, 35).

Ver. 4.] I thought myself secure in my enjoyments, and at full ease and prosperity in my palace at Babylon, which was built with that state and magnificence as to be reckoned one of the wonders of the world (ver. 30). God's particular judgment often resembles the general one, in their coming suddenly and unexpectedly, when men indulge themselves in their carnal security (see Ps. xxx. 6, 7, Matt. xxiv. 43, 44, 1 Thess. v. 2, 3).

Ver. 6.] As he did before upon a like occasion (ii. 2).

Ver. 8.] See the note upon i. 7.

And in whom is the spirit of the holy gods:] Who is enlightened by the gods, or heavenly powers, with a supernatural degree of knowledge, such as none the tree, and cut off his branches, shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit: let the beasts get away from under it, and the fowls from his branches:

15 Nevertheless leave the stump of his roots in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth:

16 Let his heart be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him; and let seven times pass over him.

17 This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones: to the intent that the living may know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men.

18 This dream I king Nebuchadnezzar have seen. Now thou, O Belteshazzar, declare the interpretation thereof, forasmuch as all the wise men of my kingdom are not able to make known unto me the interpretation: but thou art able; for the spirit of the holy gods is in thee.

19 ¶ Then Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, was astonished for one hour, and his thoughts troubled him. The king spake, and said, Belteshazzar, let not the dream, or the interpretation thereof, trouble thee. Belteshazzar answered and said, My lord, the dream be to them that hate thee, and the interpretation thereof to thine enemies.

20 The tree that thou sawest, which grew, and was strong, whose height reached unto the heaven, and the sight thereof to all the earth;

21 Whose leaves were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all; under which the beasts of the field dwelt, and upon whose branches the fowls of the heaven had their habitation:

Jude, the angels are called ἑγρήγοροι, the Greek word which answers to Eir in the text; and some critics derive the Iris of the poets, whom they describe as the messenger of the gods, from the word Eir: though others take the word Eir to differ only in the Chaldee dialect from the Hebrew Tseir, a "messenger." The word "holy one" denotes such of the angels who kept their station, and were not seduced from their obedience when the evil angels fell (see viii. 13). In the same sense the word is taken, Jude, ver. 14, "The Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints," or holy ones (compare Deut. xxxiii. 2, Zech. xiv. 5, 1 Thess. iii. 13).

Ver. 14. Let the beasts get away from under it, &c.] Let his subjects not rely upon his protection (compare Ezek. xxxi. 12).

Ver. 15. Nevertheless leave the stump of his roots in the earth.] As when the root of a tree is still alive there is a possibility of its flourishing again: so there should still be hopes that the king may recover his former state and dignity (see ver. 26).

With a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field;] To denote that while the king was deprived of his reason, and lived among the beasts of the field, he was bound with fetters and chains, as madmen usually are (see Mark v. 4).

Ver. 16. Let his heart be changed from man's, &c.] Let him lose the use of his reason (see ver. 34, 36). Scaliger thinks this madness of Nebuchadnezzar is obscurely hinted in a fragment of Abydencus, produced by Eusebius, Præp. Evang. lib. ix. cap. 41, where, having represented the king from the Chaldean writers to have fallen into an ecstasy, and to have foretold the destruction of that empire by the Medes and Persians; the author adds, that "immediately after uttering this prophecy he disappeared," which Scaliger expounds of his being driven from his kingly state and the society of men (see Scaliger's notes upon the Ancient Fragments, in the appendix to his work De Emendatione Temporum).

And let seven times pass over him.] That is, seven years: so the expression is taken xi. 13, where the Hebrew reads, "The king of the north shall come at the end of times," that is, years. So the time, times, and a half, mentioned vii. 25, xii. 7, signify three years and a half; and are accordingly explained by forty-two months, Rev. xi. 2, and by one thousand two hundred and sixty days, Rev. xii. 7, both which reckonings of time are equivalent to three years and a half.

Ver. 17. This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones:] It is called "the decree of the most High," ver. 24. So the expression of the text is an allusion to the proceedings of earthly princes, who publish their decrees with the advice of their chief ministers. Thus God is described as summoning all the hosts of angels, and taking resolutions according to their advice, 1 Kings xxii. 19, and Christ is represented as attended with angels and saints as his assessors at the day of judgment (see vii. 22 of this prophecy, 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3, 1 Tim. v. 21, Rev. xx. 4). The words are capable of another sense; viz. that this sentence was pronounced at the request of those angels whom God had appointed to preside over the affairs of the Babylonish empire (see the note upon x. 13). Watchers and holy ones are here spoken of in the plural number, whereas the words are in the singular, ver. 13, which difference may thus be accounted for; that the sentence was pronounced at the joint request of many, but was to be put in execution by one single angel. See ii. 21.

And setteth up over it the basest of men.] This regards Nebuchadnezzar, either with respect to his present condition, whose pride and cruelty rendered him as despicable in the sight of God, as his high estate made him appear honourable in the eyes of men; and therefore was justly doomed to so low a degree of abasement: or else it may be understood of his wonderful advancement and restoration, after he had been degraded from his dignity, and sent to herd with the beasts of the field. God thereby asserting that prerogative of his, of "bringing low and lifting up;" and of "raising the beggar from the dunghill, to set him among princes" (1 Sam. ii. 8, 9, Psal. cxliii. 7, 8).

Ver. 18.] See ver. 8.

Ver. 19. Then Daniel—was astonished, &c.] Both at the surprising circumstances of the judgment denounced against the king; and likewise out of a tender regard and respect for his person, who had bestowed so many favours upon him.

The dream be to them that hate thee, &c.] The words are spoken by the figure called euphemismus, when we would avert an ill omen from ourselves or friends, by wishing it may light upon our enemies. See a like instance, 1 Sam. xxv. 22, "So and more also do God unto the enemies of David." At the same time, Daniel expresses his dutiful concern for the safety of the king's person and government. Jeremy had before advised the Jewish captives at Babylon to wish and pray for the prosperity of the government under which they lived, Jer. xxix. 7.

22 It is thou, O king, that art grown and become strong: for thy greatness is grown, and reacheth unto heaven, and thy dominion to the end of the earth.

23 And whereas the king saw a watcher and an holy one coming down from heaven, and saying, Hew the tree down, and destroy it; yet leave the stump of the roots thereof in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass, in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts of the field, till seven times pass over him;

24 This is the interpretation, O king, and this is the decree of the most High, which is come upon my lord the king:

25 That they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, and they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven, and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.

26 And whereas they commanded to leave the stump of the tree roots; thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee, after that thou shalt have known that the heavens do rule.

27 Wherefore, O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee, and break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by shewing mercy to the poor; if it may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity.

28 ¶ All this came upon the king Nebuchadnezzar.

29 At the end of twelve months he walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon.

Ver. 22.] See ii. 38.

Ver. 25.] See ver. 16.

Ver. 26.] Heaven is put for God, as Matt. xxi. 25. Luke xv. 18, 21.

Ver. 27. Break off thy sins by righteousness, &c.] Become a new man. The Greek translates it, "Redeem thy iniquities by alms-deeds;" making this sentence equivalent in sense to the following words: and it is true that righteousness is often taken for mercy (see Ps. xxxi. 2, cxii. 9). Nor does this sense of the words favour the doctrine of merit, any more than those words of Solomon, Prov. xvi. 6. "By mercy and truth iniquity is purged," or expiated: as the Hebrew verb capbar properly signifies. To the same sense St. Peter saith, "Charity shall cover a multitude of sins," 1 Pet. iv. 8, viz. as it is a testimony of unfeigned repentance or conversion. Thus Salvian, descending upon this text, and speaking of works of charity, as proper evidences of true repentance, saith of the sinner, Offerat cum compunctione, cum lacrymis: aliter quippe oblata non prosunt; quia non pretio, sed affectu placent. "We ought to make such oblations with all the signs of true contrition, or else they will not be accepted; because it is not the value of the things themselves, but the disposition of the giver, which renders them acceptable" (Salvian. ad Eccles. Cathol. lib. i.).

It may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity.] God sometimes defers his judgments upon men's showing signs of repentance (see 1 Kings xxi. 29).

Ver. 30.] Though Babylon was one of the oldest 30 The king spake, and said, Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?

31 While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken; The kingdom is departed from thee.

32 And they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field: they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and seven times shall pass over thee, until thou know that the most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.

33 The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown; like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws.

34 And at the end of the days I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and I blessed the most High, and I praised and honoured him that liveth for ever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom is from generation to generation:

35 And all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing: and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?

36 At the same time my reason returned unto me: and for the glory of my kingdom, mine honour and brightness returned unto me; and my cities in the world, yet Nebuchadnezzar had very much improved, and made it one of the wonders of the world, upon account of the largeness and height of its new walls, the temple of Belus, his own palace, and the hanging gardens belonging to it; the banks of the river, and the canals made for the draining of it: all which were the works of this king, and an exact description of them may be seen in Dr. Prideaux's Script. Connex. par. i. p. 94, &c.

The words of Nebuchadnezzar here recited savour of great pride and arrogance, and are therefore justly punished by that judgment pronounced upon him in the following verses (compare v. 20).

Ver. 31.] So Herod was struck immediately, because he gave not God the glory (Acts xii. 23).

Ver. 34.] At the end of seven years (see ver. 16) I recovered the use of my reason (ver. 36), and became sensible of my dependence upon God, and lifted up mine eyes to heaven in a devout acknowledgment of his sovereign majesty, whose dominion alone is unchangeable, and endures for ever.

Ver. 35.] The greatest monarchs, as well as persons of an inferior rank, are as nothing in his sight: and he disposes all things in heaven and earth by an irresistible power and authority (compare Isa. xl. 15, 17, xlv. 9).

Ver. 36.] Or, "The glory of my kingdom (for the particle in the word likar is used for the nominative case, see Noldius, p. 463), mine honour, and countenance," or comeliness, "returned to me." The word ziv is translated countenance v. 6, vii. 28. I counsellors and my lords sought unto me; and I was established in my kingdom, and excellent majesty was added unto me.

37 Now I Nebuchadnezzar praise and extol recovered my former looks, was possessed of the same outward glory and majesty, and was honoured with the same attendance and retinue as I was before.

Ver. 37. All whose works are truth, &c.] Who and honour the King of heaven, all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment: and those that walk in pride he is able to abase.

governs the world with equity and justice (compare Rev. xv. 3, xvi. 7).

Those that walk in pride he is able to abase.] Of which Nebuchadnezzar himself was a remarkable instance, ver. 30, 31, and v. 20.

CHAPTER V.

1 BELSHAZZAR the king made a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine before the thousand.

2 Belshazzar, while he tasted the wine, commanded to bring the golden and silver vessels which his father Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple, which was in Jerusalem; that the king, and his princes, his wives, and his concubines, might drink therein.

3 Then they brought the golden vessels that were taken out of the temple of the house of God which was at Jerusalem; and the king, and his princes, his wives, and his concubines, drank in them.

4 They drank wine, and praised the gods of gold, and of silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone.

5 ¶ In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaister of the wall of the king's palace: and the king saw the part of the hand that wrote.

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.—A judgment is denounced against Belshazzar, for his sacrilege, by a hand-writing upon the wall, which Daniel reads: importing the downfall of the Babylonish monarchy, and translating the empire to the Medes and Persians: which sentence is fulfilled the same night.

Ver. 1. Belshazzar the king] This was the last king of the Babylonish race, and therefore must be the same who is called Nabonnedus by Berosus, and Naboandelus by Josephus, Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11 (see this clearly proved by Dr. Prideaux, Script. Connex. par. i. p. 114).

Made a—feast] The king made a great feast to the principal officers and great men of his court, and was himself present at it. This feast was made at a time of public rejoicing, being an annual festival, when the whole night was spent in reveling: which season Cyrus took the advantage of to make himself master of the city, as Herodotus, lib. i., and Xenophon, lib. vii. relate, and was foretold by Jeremy, li. 39, 57.

Ver. 2. The golden and silver vessels] These vessels were carried by Nebuchadnezzar into the temple of his own god (i. 2), and set apart, as it seems, for religious uses. So this farther profanation of them was contrary to the rules of their own religion, and may be supposed to have been done out of a drunken frolic by Belshazzar.

Without question the vessels and other furniture with which Solomon adorned the temple, were extraordinarily magnificent: since Nebuchadnezzar thought them worth carrying to Babylon, to furnish the temple he had built there for his god Belus, a structure that might be esteemed one of the wonders of the world (see Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra, p. 98). Some of these vessels were afterward carried in triumph to Rome by Titus, after he had conquered Jerusalem, as Josephus, an eye-witness, asserts (Bell. Jud. lib. vii. p. 1306, edit. Oxon.): afterward, when Genserius sacked Rome, he carried these away with the rest of his booty; but when Justinian conquered Africa, he recovered them again, and sent them for a present to the church of Jerusalem (see Evagrius, lib. iv. cap. 17).

His father Nebuchadnezzar] Nebuchadnezzar was in truth his grandfather; for he was the son of Evil-merodach by Nitocris his queen: so he was grandson to Nebuchadnezzar: and thus the prophecy of Jeremy was fulfilled, that “all nations should serve Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and his son's son,” Jer. xxvii. 7. It is usual in scripture to call the grandfather, by the name of father (see 2 Sam. ix. 7, 2 Kings viii. 26, compared with ver. 18; 2 Chron. xv. 16, compared with xi. 20; Zech. i. 1, with Ezra vi. 14).

Ver. 4.] They sang praises to their false gods, who were fitly represented by senseless images; and this they did by way of triumph over the God of Israel, the vessels of whose temple they brought forth as so many trophies of their victory (see ver. 23).

Ver. 5. In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand.] Next to murder, no sin is so remarkably punished in this world as that of sacrilege; as appears by innumerable instances taken out of the histories of all ages, of heathens and infidels, as well as Jews and Christians. For to profess a religion to be true, and yet to offer violence to the places and utensils dedicated to the service of that religion, is downright impiety, and argues a contempt of all religion. Remarkable examples of this kind in the heathen story are, the miserable end of the Phœceans, who robbed the temple of Delphos, and were the occasion of that war, which was called from thence the holy war; an account of which may be seen in Petavius, Rationar. Temporum. par. i. p. 113; the destruction of the Gauls in their attempt upon the same temple; and of Crassus, who plundered the temple of Jerusalem, and that of the Syrian goddess: these two last stories are very particularly related by Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. p. 26, 202.

Grotius's note upon this place is worth observing: “The heathens thought it a great impiety to convert sacred things to common uses; but now-a-days neither princes nor people think there is any harm in it: and can we expect that God should not visit for these things?”

And wrote over against the candlestick] The feast

6 Then the king's countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him, so that the joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another.

7 The king cried aloud to bring in the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers. And the king spake, and said to the wise men of Babylon, Whosoever shall read this writing, and shew me the interpretation thereof, shall be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about his neck, and shall be the third ruler in the kingdom.

8 Then came in all the king's wise men: but they could not read the writing, nor make known to the king the interpretation thereof.

9 Then was king Belshazzar greatly troubled, and his countenance was changed in him, and his lords were astonied.

10 ¶ Now the queen by reason of the words of the king and his lords came into the banquet house: and the queen spake and said, O king, live for ever: let not thy thoughts trouble thee, nor let thy countenance be changed:

11 There is a man in thy kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy gods; and in the days of thy father, light, and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, was found in him; whom the king Nebuchadnezzar thy father, the king, I say, thy father, made master of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans, and soothsayers;

12 Forasmuch as an excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, interpreting of dreams, and shewing of hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts, were found in the same Daniel, whom the king named Belteshazzar: now let Daniel be called, and he will shew the interpretation.

13 Then was Daniel brought in before the king. And the king spake and said unto Daniel, Art thou that Daniel, which art of the children of the captivity of Judah, whom the king my father brought out of Jewry?

14 I have even heard of thee, that the spirit of the gods is in thee, and that light and understanding and excellent wisdom is found in thee.

15 And now the wise men, the astrologers, have been brought in before me, that they should read this writing, and make known unto me the interpretation thereof: but they could not shew the interpretation of the thing:

16 And I have heard of thee, that thou canst make interpretations, and dissolve doubts: now if thou canst read the writing, and make known to me the interpretation thereof, thou shalt be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about thy neck, and shalt be the third ruler in the kingdom.

17 ¶ Then Daniel answered and said before the king, Let thy gifts be to thyself, and give thy rewards to another; yet I will read the writing unto the king, and make known to him the interpretation.

18 O thou king, the most high God gave Nebuchadnezzar thy father a kingdom, and majesty, and glory, and honour:

19 And for the majesty that he gave him, all people, nations, and languages, trembled and feared before him: whom he would he slew; and whom he would he kept alive; and whom he would he set up; and whom he would he put down.

20 But when his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him:

21 And he was driven from the sons of men; and his heart was made like the beasts, and his dwelling was with the wild asses: they fed him with grass like oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven; till he knew that the most high God ruled in the kingdom of men, and that he appointeth over it whomsoever he will.

22 And thou his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this;

23 But hast lifted up thyself against the Lord was continued till late in the night, according to custom (see the note upon ver. 1).

Ver. 6.] He discovered the disorder of his mind, by the shaking and trembling which seized his whole body (compare Psal. lxxix. 23).

Ver. 7. The king cried aloud] Discovering thereby great fear and impatience.

To bring in the astrologers, &c.] See the note upon i. 20, ii. 2, iv. 6.

The third ruler] One of the three principal rulers (see vi. 2).

Ver. 8 They could not read the writing,] It was probably writ in the old Hebrew letters, now called the Samaritan character, which the Chaldeans were ignorant of.

Ver. 10.] The king's wives and concubines sat with him at the feast, ver. 2. So the person here mentioned must be the queen-mother Nitocris; a lady famous for her wisdom, who had the chief management of the public affairs, and so is called the queen, by way of eminence (see Dr. Prideaux, par. i. p. 122).

Ver. 11. There is a man in thy kingdom in whom is the spirit of the holy gods;] See the note upon iv. 8.

And in the days of thy father] i. e. Thy grandfather Nebuchadnezzar (see ver. 2).

Ver. 13. Art thou that Daniel, &c.] Though his grandfather had advanced Daniel to considerable places of honour (ver. 11), yet Belshazzar knew nothing of him; which argues him to have been a weak and vicious prince, according to the character historians give of him, and that he left the care of the public affairs to his mother, minding nothing but his pleasures.

Ver. 17. Let thy gifts be to thyself,] The prophet was not willing to receive any reward for interpreting a writing, which was to receive its accomplishment in the destruction of the king and the government.

Ver. 19.] See ii. 37, 38.

Ver. 20. But when his heart was lifted up, &c.] See iv. 30.

And they took his glory from him:] Or, "His glory was taken from him:" the verb transitive being often used for the impersonal (see the note upon ii. 30).

Ver. 23. But hast lifted up thyself, &c.] See the note upon ver. 4.

And the God in whose hand thy breath is,—hast thou not glorified:] Thou hast not given due honour of heaven; and they have brought the vessels of his house before thee, and thou, and thy lords, thy wives, and thy concubines, have drunk wine in them; and thou hast praised the gods of silver, and gold, of brass, iron, wood, and stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know: and the God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, thou hast not glorified:

24 Then was the part of the hand sent from him; and this writing was written.

25 ¶ And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN.

26 This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it.

to that supreme Being, who hath an absolute disposal, not only of thy affairs (compare Jer. x. 23), but even of thy life itself.

Ver. 26.] The determinate number of years which God hath appointed for the continuance of thy reign and the Babylonish monarchy is finished. So God is said to "number the months" of man's life, and to "appoint him bounds which he cannot pass," Job xiv. 5. The word Mene is doubled in the foregoing verse, to show that the thing is certain, and established by God, as Joseph tells Pharaoh in a like case, Gen. xli. 32.

Ver. 27.] Wicked men are often compared to silver adulterated, and alloyed with baser metals, which makes it too light when weighed in the balances (see Jer. vi. 30, Ezek. xxii. 18). Such was Belshazzar when weighed in the scales of divine justice (compare Job xxxi. 6, Ps. xlii. 10). The same comparison is used by Homer, when Hector's fatal day approaches, Iliad, xxii. and by Virgil at the death of Turnus, Æneid, xii.

Ver. 28.] The verb paras, from whence Peres is derived, as an appellative, signifies to divide, or break: it is likewise the proper name of the Persians, who were to be sharers in the division of the Babylonish empire. Upharsin, in the twenty-fifth verse, is a participle of the verb paras; it literally signifies, And they divide it.

Ver. 29.] The king thought himself bound in honour to perform the promise he had made, ver. 16, which yet it is likely could not take effect at that unseasonable time of night: so the words might better be thus translated; "Then commanded Belshazzar, that they should clothe Daniel with scarlet—and should make a proclamation concerning him," &c. The particle van is often put for the con-

27 TEKEL; thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting.

28 PERES; Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians.

29 Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with scarlet, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and made a proclamation concerning him, that he should be the third ruler in the kingdom.

30 ¶ In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain.

31 And Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about threescore and two years old.

junction that (see Noldius, p. 312): so it is used in the second verse of this chapter.

Ver. 30.] He and all his nobles were slain together in the midst of their feasting and revelling, as Herodotus (lib. i.) and Xenophon inform us; the latter relates the story thus (Cyropæd. lib. vii.): "That two deserters, Gadatas and Gobryas, having assisted some of the Persian army to kill the guards, and seize upon the palace, they entered into the room where the king was, whom they found standing up in a posture of defence; but they soon dispatched him, and those that were with him." Thus the prophecy of Jeremy was accomplished, that Babylon should be taken at the time of a public feast, while "her princes and great men, her captains, her rulers, and mighty men, should be drunken, and should sleep a perpetual sleep, and not awaken" (li. 39, 57).

Ver. 31. And Darius the Median took the kingdom.] This Darius is said to be of the seed of the Medes (ix. 1): and is supposed by the most judicious chronologers to be the same with the Cyaxares, the son of Astyages: him Cyrus made king of the Chaldeans, as being his uncle by his mother's side, and his partner in carrying on the war against the Babylonians, and left him the palace of the king of Babylon, to live there whenever he pleased, as Xenophon relates, Cyropæd. lib. viii. Darius succeeding in the empire, being Cyrus's gift, Ptolemy's Canon supposes Cyrus to be the immediate successor of Nabonnedus, or Belshazzar, and allots nine years to his reign: whereas Xenophon reckons two of these years to Darius, and seven to Cyrus: ubi supra. The Chaldee paraphrase rendered here, "took the kingdom," is translated possessed the kingdom, vii. 18, and means the same with succeeding in the kingdom.

CHAPTER VI.

1 IT pleased Darius to set over the kingdom an hundred and twenty princes, which should be over the whole kingdom;

2 And over these three presidents; of whom

Daniel was first; that the princes might give accounts unto them, and the king should have no damage.

3 Then this Daniel was preferred above the inces which were subject to the Medo-Persian empire. These were afterward enlarged to a hundred and twenty-seven by the victories of Cambyses and Darius Hystaspes (see Esth. i. 1).

Ver. 2. And over these three presidents; of whom Daniel was first:] He had been appointed one of the principal officers of state by Belshazzar, v. 29. Darius came not to Babylon, but tarried at Ecbatane in Media, whither he sent for Daniel, that he might

Ver. 1.] According to the number of the prov-presidents and princes, because an excellent spirit was in him; and the king thought to set him over the whole realm.

4 ¶ Then the presidents and princes sought to find occasion against Daniel concerning the kingdom; but they could find none occasion nor fault; forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him.

5 Then said these men, We shall not find any occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God.

6 Then these presidents and princes assembled together to the king, and said thus unto him, King Darius, live for ever.

7 All the presidents of the kingdom, the governors, and the princes, the counsellors and the captains, have consulted together to establish a royal statute, and to make a firm decree, that whosoever shall ask a petition of any God or man for thirty days, save of thee, O king, he shall be cast into the den of lions.

8 Now, O king, establish the decree, and sign the writing, that it be not changed, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not.

9 Wherefore king Darius signed the writing and the decree.

10 ¶ Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime.

11 Then these men assembled, and found

Daniel praying and making supplication before his God.

12 Then they came near, and spake before the king concerning the king's decrees; Hast thou not signed a decree, that every man that shall ask a petition of any God or man within thirty days, save of thee, O king, shall be cast into the den of lions? The king answered and said, The thing is true, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not.

13 Then answered they and said before the king, That Daniel, which is of the children of the captivity of Judah, regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed, but maketh his petition three times a day.

14 Then the king, when he heard these words, was sore displeased with himself, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him: and he laboured till the going down of the sun to deliver him.

15 Then these men assembled unto the king, and said unto the king, Know, O king, that the law of the Medes and Persians is, That no decree nor statute which the king establisheth may be changed.

16 Then the king commanded, and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of lions. Now the king spake and said unto Daniel, Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee.

17 And a stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the den; and the king sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords; that the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel.

be always near him: see Joseph. Antiq. lib. x. cap. 12 (al. 11), where it is likely he received this new advancement. Josephus informs us, in the same place, that Daniel built an admirable structure at Ecbatane, probably by Darius's direction, which was afterward made the burial-place of the kings of Media and Persia, the care of which place was always committed to a Jewish priest.

Ver. 3. Because an excellent spirit was in him;] Compare v. 11, 12. He had great experience in the public affairs, it being now sixty-five years ago since he was first advanced by Nebuchadnezzar (ii. 48).

Ver. 8. According to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not.] After it is once enacted by the king, with the consent of his counsellors. So Diodorus Siculus tells us (lib. iv.) of Darius, the last king of Persia, that he would have pardoned Charidemus after he was condemned to death, but could not reverse the law that had passed against him. We may observe the difference of style between this text and that of Esth. i. 19. Here the words are, "the law of the Medes and Persians," out of regard to the king, who was a Mede: there it is styled "the law of the Persians and Medes," the king being a Persian at that time.

Ver. 10. His windows being open in his chamber.] "In his upper chamber," as the Greek reads that text. It seems to have been customary among the devout persons of the Jewish nation, to set apart some upper room for their oratories, as places freest from noise and disturbance. So we read Tobit iii. 17, that "Sarah came down from her upper chamber," where she had been at her devotions: and the apostles assembled together "in an upper room,"

Acts i. 13 (see Bishop Pearson on that text, in his first Lecture upon the Acts).

Toward Jerusalem.] According to that petition in Solomon's consecration prayer (1 Kings viii. 48), "That if they were led away captive, and should pray to God towards the city which he had chosen, and the house which Solomon had built, then hear thou their prayer, &c. (compare Ps. v. 7, Jonah ii. 4).

Three times a day.] Some learned writers tell us, out of Maimonides, that upon solemn days, such as were the third and fifth days of the week, the evening sacrifice was killed at half an hour after twelve; so the hour of prayer, which on other days was the ninth hour, or three in the afternoon, was then about noon; and the third hour of prayer must then be towards bed-time (see Thorndike on Religious Assemblies, ch. 8, and Dr. Prideaux's Dissert. upon the Synagogue Service, par. i. book vi. of his Script. Connex.).

Ver. 13. That Daniel, which is of the children of the captivity of Judah,] Compare v. 13. This is added to aggravate his fault, that one who is a foreigner, and brought hither a captive, should offer a public affront to the laws of the king, whose favour and protection he enjoys.

Ver. 14. Then the king,—was sore displeased with himself.] Having too late discovered that the princes, in procuring him to sign this decree, had no other aim but to take advantage of it to the prejudice of Daniel.

Ver. 16. Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee.] The words express the king's hopes and good wishes, but no certain persuasion (see ver. 20).

18 ¶ Then the king went to his palace, and passed the night fasting: neither were instruments of music brought before him: and his sleep went from him.

19 Then the king arose very early in the morning, and went in haste unto the den of lions.

20 And when he came to the den, he cried with a lamentable voice unto Daniel: and the king spake and said to Daniel, O Daniel, servant of the living God, is thy God, whom thou servest continually, able to deliver thee from the lions?

21 Then said Daniel unto the king, O king, live for ever.

22 My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me: forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me; and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt.

23 Then was the king exceeding glad for him, and commanded that they should take Daniel up out of the den. So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, because he believed in his God.

24 And the king commanded, and they brought those men which had accused Daniel, and they cast them into the den of lions, them, their children, and their wives; and the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces or ever they came at the bottom of the den.

25 ¶ Then king Darius wrote unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you.

26 I make a decree, That in every dominion of my kingdom men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel: for he is the living God, and steadfast for ever, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed, and his dominion shall be even unto the end.

27 He delivereth and rescueth, and he worketh signs and wonders in heaven and in earth, who hath delivered Daniel from the power of the lions.

28 So this Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian.

Ver. 20. O Daniel, servant of the living God,] God sometimes makes the mouths of infidels instrumental in setting forth his praises (see ii. 47, iii. 28).

Ver. 22. My God hath sent his angel,] See iii. 28. And also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt.] Though I disobeyed thy decree, it was not done out of contumacy or stubbornness, but purely to preserve a good conscience, which is the only true principle of loyalty and obedience (see Rom. xiii. 5).

Ver. 24. Them, their children, and their wives,] According to the cruel laws and customs which prevailed in some countries, of involving whole families in the punishment due to particular persons:

in opposition to which, that equitable law was ordained by Moses, that "fathers should not be put to death for the children, nor the children for the fathers," Deut. xxiv. 16.

And the lions had the mastery of them, &c.] To show that their sparing Daniel was miraculous.

Ver. 25.] See the note upon ii. 38.

Ver. 26, 27.] He makes the same acknowledgment of the true God as Nebuchadnezzar had done before him (see iii. 29, iv. 3, 34).

Ver. 38. In the reign of Cyrus the Persian.] Who upon Darius's death took possession of the whole monarchy of the Medes and Persians, called from him the Persian monarchy (see Ezra i. 2).

CHAPTER VII.

1 In the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon Daniel had a dream and visions of his head upon his bed: then he wrote the dream, and told the sum of the matters.

2 Daniel spake and said, I saw in my vision by night, and, behold, the four winds of the heaven strove upon the great sea.

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.—Daniel's vision concerning the four beasts, which an angel interprets of the four great monarchies, that were to continue successively unto the end of the world.

Ver. 1.] The prophet having related some remarkable passages concerning himself and his brethren in captivity, and given proofs of his skill in interpreting other men's dreams, proceeds to give an account of his own visions; and thereupon goes back to the first year of Belshazzar's reign, which was seventeen years before the history contained in the last chapter.

Ver. 2.] Denoting those commotions of the world, and that troublesome state of affairs, out of which empires and kingdoms commonly take their rise.

Ver. 3.] They took their rise from wars and commotions, which end in setting up the conqueror to be a great monarch over those whom he hath subdued (compare Rev. xiii. 1). The reason why these monarchies are represented by fierce and savage beasts, hath been observed in the note upon ii. 31.

3 And four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse one from another.

4 The first was like a lion, and had eagle's wings: I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked, and it was lifted up from the earth, and made stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart was given to it.

Ver. 4. The first was like a lion, and had eagle's wings:] Warriors, especially conquerors, are compared to lions for their strength and cruelty, and to eagles for their swiftness (see Deut. xxviii. 49, 2 Sam. i. 23, Jer. iv. 7, xlviii. 40, Hab. i. 8).

And it was lifted up from the earth,] Or rather, "Wherewith it was lifted up from the earth;" as the margin reads, the conjunction copulative sometimes supplying the place of a relative (see Noldius, p. 296). There was a stop put to the progress of its victories, by the frequent irruptions of the armies led by Cyrus and Darius, or Cyaxares, against the Babylonians, for twenty years together, before the final overthrow of that empire. See Dr. Prideaux's Script. Connex. from the first year of Neriglissar's reign, and so onwards.

5 And behold another beast, a second, like to a bear, and it raised up itself on one side, and it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it; and they said thus unto it, Arise, devour much flesh.

6 After this I beheld, and lo another, like a leopard, which had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl; the beast had also four heads; and dominion was given to it.

7 After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it; and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns.

And made stand upon the feet as a man, &c.] It became more tame and tractable.

Ver. 5. And behold another beast, a second, like to a bear.] This beast denotes the Persian empire, and its first beginning to advance itself and arrive at dominion. The margin reads, And it raised up one dominion; i. e. it made up one empire out of the joint powers of Media and Persia.

And it had three ribs in the mouth of it] The learned Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, in the Vindication of his Defence of Christianity, vol. i., chap. 2, sect. 3, explains these three ribs to be Babylon, Lydia, and Egypt. It is certain that Lydia was conquered by Cyrus, from the famous story of Cræsus, the king thereof, whom he condemned to the fire: and as Egypt had been conquered by Nebuchadnezzar (see Ezek. xxix. 19), so it still continued tributary to Cyrus under the government of Amasis (see the additional notes upon Ezek. xxix. 13, and Xenoph. Cyropæd. lib. vii., viii.).

Arise, devour much flesh.] Their success made them still more greedy of dominion.

Ver. 6. After this I beheld, and lo another, like a leopard.] This third beast denotes the Grecian empire, begun by Alexander, and continued in his four successors (see viii. 8, 22). The four wings signify the swiftness of its progress and victories (see ver. 5, of that chapter). A leopard is a creature of extraordinary swiftness, and jumps upon its prey, as naturalists observe.

And dominion was given to it.] By the swiftness of Alexander's progress, and the victories he obtained by small forces, it appeared that providence gave him the empire of the world.

Ver. 7. Behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly;] And for that reason compared to iron, ii. 40. This must mean the Roman empire, as hath been fully proved in the note upon that place.

It devoured and brake in pieces.] It subdued all the nations who had been subjects of the former empires. The latter part of the sentence alludes to the fury of the wild beasts, who stamp upon that part of their prey which they cannot devour (compare viii. 7, 10). So those conquests which the Romans could not make use of themselves, they gave for a prey and spoil to their allies.

And it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns.] In this it was different from all the beasts or empires before it; that its dominion was to be divided into ten kingdoms or principalities, signified here by ten horns, and by the ten toes of the image, ii. 41 (see ver. 23, 24 of this chapter, and the notes there).

8 I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things.

9 ¶ I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire.

10 A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened.

Ver. 8. There came up among them another little horn, &c.] See ver. 24, 25.

Eyes like the eyes of man,] Denoting great cunning and foresight.

A mouth speaking great things.] See the note upon ver. 25.

Ver. 9. I beheld till the thrones were cast down,] Or rather, pitched down, or placed. So the Greek interpreter understands it, and the verb in the text is used in the same sense in the Chaldee paraphrase upon Jer. i. 15, where our translation reads, "They shall set every one his throne." The following words "And the Ancient of days did sit," justify this translation. The thrones here mentioned import, first of all, the thrones of God and Christ (see ver. 13, 14); and then those of the saints, who shall be assessors with God and Christ at the day of judgment (see ver. 22, and Rev. xx. 4). The fourth monarchy being to continue till the consummation of all things, the general judgment is described in this and the following verses, wherein sentence was to pass upon this fourth beast, and an end put to its dominion.

The Ancient of days did sit,] The eternal judge of the world (see Rev. xvi. 5), he "that was from the beginning" (1 John ii. 14), who is elsewhere described "covering himself with light as with a garment" (Psal. civ. 2), and as a clear and unspotted brightness (1 John i. 5).

In this divine representation there is mention made of the hair of the head, as there is in that vouchsafed to Moses and the elders of Israel of the feet, Exod. xxiv. 10, yet we are not to suppose that in either place any determinate shape or figure like that of a man was represented (see Deut. iv. 15). The expressions only import that both the upper and the lower part of this divine Shechinah was of an amazing inexpressible brightness.

His throne was like the fiery flame,] God is described as coming to judgment in flames of fire, whereby the world and the wicked that are therein shall be destroyed (see Ps. l. 3, 1 Cor. iii. 15, 2 Thess. i. 7, 8, 2 Pet. iii. 7, 10). His throne is here described in the nature of a triumphal chariot, supported by angels, as so many fiery wheels (see Ps. lxxviii. 17, civ. 3, 4, Ezek. i. 12—15).

Ver. 10. A fiery stream—came forth from before him:] Lightnings and streams of fire were his harbingers, to give notice of his speedy approach (compare Ps. l. 3, xlviii. 3).

Thousand thousands ministered unto him, &c.] His retinue was an "innumerable company of angels" (see Deut. xxxiii. 2, Ps. lxxviii. 17, Heb. xii. 22, Rev. v. 11).

The judgment was set,] The court, God as the supreme judge, and the saints as his assessors, made 11 I beheld then because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake: I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame.

12 As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time.

13 I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him.

14 And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

15 ¶ I Daniel was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body, and the visions of my head troubled me.

16 I came near unto one of them that stood by, and asked him the truth of all this. So he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things.

17 These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth.

18 But the saints of the most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever.

19 Then I would know the truth of the fourth beast, which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, whose teeth were of iron, and his nails of brass; which devoured, brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet;

20 And of the ten horns that were in his head, and of the other which came up, and before whom their public appearance (see ver. 9). The expression alludes to the seats in the Jewish consistories, where the abbith din, or president of the court, had his assistants sitting with him; or, as some think, to the ancient custom among the Jews for the princes, or heads of the tribes, to sit with the king in the courts of justice.

And the books were opened.] The books both of God's laws and men's actions. The phrase is an allusion to the rolls and records belonging to courts of judicature (compare Deut. xxxii. 24, Ps. lvi. 8, Isa. lxxv. 6, Mal. iii. 16).

Ver. 11. Because of the—great words which the horn spake:] See ver. 25.

I beheld even till the beast was slain.] The prophet here relates what was the final destruction of this fourth and last beast, and of that little horn belonging to it, and coming up after the rest of the horns (ver. 24). See Rev. xviii. 8, xix. 20.

Ver. 12.] As to the first three monarchies, though the succeeding monarchy took away the dominion of that which went before, yet it was not done all at once, but by degrees: and the nations where those monarchies were seated, still had a being, though they changed their masters. Whereas the destruction of the last monarchy implied the putting an end to that empire, and to all other earthly governments: the kingdom of Christ being then immediately to take place (see ver. 13, 14, and ii. 34).

Ver. 13. Behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven.] One in the shape and likeness of a man; but clothed with such ensigns of majesty, as showed him to be an extraordinary person (see the note upon Exek. ii. 1, compare Rev. i. 13, xiv. 14): indeed, no less than the Messiah, as the description of him that follows doth declare. The two foregoing verses having explained why the fourth beast was destroyed, this part of the vision declares by whom it was done, represents Christ in his judicial capacity, and describes him by that title he often gives himself, the Son of man, in allusion to this place: particularly he alludes to this text, Matt. xxvi. 64, where he speaks of his coming in the clouds of heaven, by which expression he acknowledges himself to be the Messiah here described; and gave a direct answer to the question there proposed to him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? (compare Mark xiv. 61, 62, Rev. i. 7). Whereupon they condemned him as guilty of blasphemy. A learned prelate, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, p. 131, observes, that Anani, the clouds, was a known name of the Messiah among the Jewish writers, which shows that they understood this text as spoken of him.

And came to the Ancient of days.] To signify that Christ received his kingdom from his Father (see Mat. xi. 27, xxviii. 18, John iii. 35, 1 Cor. xv. 27, Eph. i. 21, Phil. ii. 9, 10, Rev. v. 7, compare Jer. xxx. 21).

Ver. 14. And there was given him dominion, and glory, &c.] Upon the destruction of antichrist, the little horn of the fourth beast, the stone which Nebuchadnezzar saw in his first vision, was to become a great mountain (ii. 35); and then all the ancient prophecies are to be accomplished, which speak of the uninterrupted glory and universality of Christ's kingdom (see Ps. ii. 7, 8, viii. 6, cx. 1, Isa. ii. 2—4): and the universality of Christ's dominion will be illustriously displayed at the day of judgment, when all the world shall be summoned to appear before him (see Rom. xiv. 10—12).

His dominion is an everlasting dominion, &c.] See ver. 27.

Ver. 15. I—was grieved] The terrible appearance of this vision made an extraordinary impression upon my spirits (see ver. 28, viii. 27, x. 8).

In the midst of my body.] The original reads, "In the midst of my sheath:" a metaphor used by several heathen writers, who call the body the sheath of the soul (see Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. vii. chap. 52, and Seneca, epist. 92).

Ver. 16.] To one of the angels, who always attended upon the throne of God and Christ (ver. 9, 10): several angels are represented as attending upon Daniel's visions (see viii. 13, 16, x. 5, 6, 16, xii. 5, 6).

Ver. 17. These—are four kings.] Four kingdoms or monarchies: so the word king is used for kingdom, Isa. xxiii. 15 (see the note there).

Which shall arise out of the earth.] Shall be of the earth, earthly, and have nothing of a heavenly spirit in them: whereas the kingdom of Christ is a heavenly kingdom, which the saints shall possess, as it follows.

Ver. 18. But the saints of the most High shall take the kingdom, &c.] "Those earthly kingdoms being taken away," or destroyed, as the Greek adds by way of explication, the succeeding kingdom shall be that of Christ and his saints (see ver. 22). Instead of the "most High," the margin reads "high ones," from the Chaldee: sometimes the one true God is spoken of in the plural number, by way of eminence: see Josh. xxiv. 19, Eccles. v. 8, where it is in the Hebrew—He is holy Gods.

Ver. 20. Whose look was more stout than his fellows.] Or, "his appearance was more excellent than three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows.

21 I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them;

22 Until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom.

23 Thus he said, The fourth beast shall be the his fellows." Though he was little at first, yet he afterward claimed a superiority above the other horns or principalities.

Ver. 21. The same horn made war with the saints,] So antichrist is described as making war with the saints, and overcoming them for a time (see Rev. xi. 7, 9, xiii. 7, xvii. 14).

Ver. 22. Until the Ancient of days came,] Came to judgment, ver. 9.

And judgment was given to the saints of the most High,] They were to sit in judgment with God and Christ (see the note upon ver. 9).

And the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom.] The saints are described as reigning with Christ in his kingdom: 2 Tim. ii. 11, Rev. ii. 26, 27, iii. 21, xx. 4.

Ver. 23.] As being managed under different forms of government: having the form of a commonwealth at the beginning of its greatness, and afterward governed by kings and emperors: and in process of time being divided into ten kingdoms or principalities; and all of them under the direction of one spiritual head (see Rev. xvii. 13, and compare ver. 7 of this chapter).

Ver. 24. The ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise:] A horn is an emblem of strength, so it comes to signify power and authority (see Deut. xxxiii. 17, Ps. lxxxix. 17): and from thence it is applied to denote sovereignty or dominion (see viii. 21, 22, Rev. xvii. 12). These ten horns or kingdoms arose out of the dissolution of the Roman empire, which came to pass about the year of Christ 476. And it was divided into the following principalities or kingdoms, according to Mr. Mede (see his works, p. 661): 1. Britons. 2. Saxons. 3. Franks. 4. Burgundians. 5. Wisigoths. 6. Suevians and Alans. 7. Vandals. 8. Almons. 9. Ostrogoths; succeeded by the Longobards, first in Pannonia, and then in Italy. 10. Greeks.

The late learned Bishop Lloyd hath given the following list of the ten kingdoms which arose out of the dissolution of the Roman empire, and the time of their rise.

1. Huns, erected their kingdom in that part of Pannonia and Dacia, which from them was called Hungary, about A. D. 356.

2. Ostrogoths settled themselves in the countries that reach from Rhetia to Mæsia, even to Thrace, about 377, and afterward came into Italy under Alaricus in 410.

3. Wisigoths settled in the south parts of France, and in Catalonia, about 378.

4. Franks seized upon part of Germany and Gaul, 410.

5. Vandals settled in Spain, afterward set up their kingdom in Africa, 407.

Their king Gensericus sacked Rome, 455.

6 Suevians and Alans seized the western parts of Spain, 407, and invaded Italy, 457.

7. Burgundians came out of Germany into that part of Gaul, called from them Burgundy, 407.

fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces.

24 And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings.

25 And he shall speak great words against the most High, and shall wear out the saints of the

8. Herules, Rugians, and Thoringians, settled in Italy, under Odoacer, about 476.

9 Saxons made themselves masters of Great Britain about the same time, 476.

10. Longobards, called likewise Gopidæ, settled in Germany about Madgeburg, 383, and afterward succeeded the Heruli and Thuringi in Hungary, about the year 826.

And another shall rise after them;] The papacy took its rise from the same cause, but did not arrive at direct supremacy till the year 606, when pope Boniface usurped the title of Universal Bishop. Mr. Mede translates the words, "Another shall arise behind them; i. e. in an unperceived manner, so as the other kings were not aware of his growing greatness till he overtopped them."

And he shall be diverse from the first,] His authority will be ecclesiastical, yet so as to lay claim to temporal power too, and to assert a right of disposing of secular affairs.

And he shall subdue three kings.] Or, kingdoms, see ver. 17. Mr. Mede (p. 778, 779), explains these three kingdoms to be, 1. The exarchate of Ravenna, which Charles the Great recovered from the Lombards, and gave to the pope. 2. The kingdoms of the Greeks in Italy, of which the emperor Leo Isaurus was deprived by the popes Gregory the Second and Third: and, 3. The kingdom of the Franks, or German emperors: from whom the popes wrested the election and investiture of themselves and other bishops, and by degrees took from them all the jurisdiction they had in Italy; which was the occasion of grievous wars for several ages, between the popes and the emperor Henry IV. and his successors. See a brief account of those encroachments of the popes, and the disturbances which followed upon them, in Bishop Stillingfleet's Disc. of the Idolatry of the Church of Rome, &c. ch. 5.

Ver. 25. And he shall speak great words against the most High,] See ver. 8, 20, xi. 36. St. John plainly alludes to this text, Rev. xiii. 5, 6, where the beast is said to "open his mouth in blasphemy against God:" this he did by advancing his own authority above that of God's, and in derogation to his laws (compare 2 Thess. ii. 4): as also by setting up the worship of images, and other idolatrous practices, which the prophet Isaiah calls reproaching and blaspheming God, Isa. lxxv. 7.

And shall wear out the saints of the most High,] By raising wars and persecutions against them (see ver. 21, Rev. xvii. 6, xxviii. 24).

And think to change times and laws:] To alter governments and their constitutions (compare ii. 21, 1 Chron. xxix. 30). This the papacy hath done by claiming a power to depose kings, and set up others in their stead: and not only to abrogate human laws, but likewise to dispense with divine ones.

And they shall be given into his hand (or power, see Rev. xiii. 7), until a time and times and the dividing of time.] Or "half a time," as the Hebrew most High, and think to change times and laws : and they shall be given unto his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time.

26 But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end.

27 And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaexpresseth it, xii. 7, from whence the expressions are taken by St. John, Rev. xii. 14, i. e. for three years and a half of prophetic time (see the note upon iv. 16). The same space of time is expressed in other places of the Revelation by "two and forty months," and by "twelve hundred and three-score days," xi. 2, 3.

These times of antichrist some learned men think to be typically represented in the persecution which Antiochus Epiphanes raised against the Jewish church, and his interdict of the public worship in the temple, which Josephus reckons to have lasted "three years and a half" (Bell. Jud. lib. i. cap. 1, n. 3); although, computing from the time that the idol altar was set up, that desolation continued but three years precisely: as appears from 1 Macc. i. 54, compared with iv. 52 (see Archbishop Usher's Annals, par. ii. p. 23, and Dr. Prideaux's Script. Connex. par. ii. ad A. C. 165, 168).

Ver. 26.] See ver. 22. This being the last of the four earthly kingdoms or monarchies, when that is destroyed, there will be an end of the present state of things, when all human rule, authority, and ven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him.

28 Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me: but I kept the matter in my heart.

power, shall cease (1 Cor. xv. 24), and the "kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ," Rev. xi. 15.

Ver. 27.] This denotes the reign of Christ on earth, where the saints are described as reigning with him (see ver. 18, 22, compared with Rev. v. 10, xx. 4).

Ver. 28. As for me Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me,] The extraordinary circumstances of the vision made a great impression upon my mind (see ver. 15), and it was matter of great trouble to me to foresee the profanation of God's laws and worship, and the persecutions and calamities which should come upon his church and people.

And my countenance changed in me:] The impressions this vision made upon me, weakened my spirits, and altered my complexion, as if I had a fit of sickness (see viii. 18, 27).

But I kept the matter in my heart.] I frequently meditated upon it (compare Luke ii. 19): and by that means was enabled to give an exact account of the vision and its interpretation in writing, for the use and benefit of after ages (see ver. 1).

CHAPTER VIII.

1 In the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar a vision appeared unto me, even unto me Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first.

2 And I saw in a vision; and it came to pass,

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.—This vision, as it is interpreted by the angel, foretells the succession of the Persian and Grecian monarchies, and how, during the latter, Antiochus Epiphanes should grievously persecute the Jews, profane the temple, and take away the daily sacrifice there offered: wherein he should be a type or figure of those horrible desolations which antichrist should make in the church of God.

Ver. 1.] The foregoing prophecy was written in Chaldee, being a farther explication of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, interpreted ch. ii. This vision that follows is written in Hebrew, because that part of it which relates to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes did chiefly concern the Jews.

A vision appeared unto me,—Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first.] Or, "in the beginning of Belshazzar's reign" (vii. 1): or the sentence may be translated, "After that which appeared to me before:" as the word batechillah signifies, ix. 21.

Ver. 2. I saw in a vision;] When I was awake, and had the use of my bodily senses (see ver. 3; compare x. 4, 5).

I was at Shushan in the palace (or, the palace; compare Esth i. 1), which is in the province of Elam;] The province of Elam, or Persia, properly so called, was taken from Astyages king of Media by Nebuchadnezzar, according to the prophecy of Jeremiwhen I saw, that I was at Shushan in the palace, which is in the province of Elam; and I saw in a vision, and I was by the river of Ulai.

3 Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and, behold, there stood before the river a ram which ah against Elam, xlix. 34. So it was subject to the king of Babylon when Daniel saw this vision; though afterward the viceroy of that country revolted to Cyrus, and joined with him in taking Babylon: as hath been observed in the note upon that place. Daniel's residing in the palace of Shushan, shows that he still continued in those posts of honour to which Nebuchadnezzar had advanced him (see ver. 27 of this chapter).

The river of Ulai.] This river divides Susiana from the province of Elam, probably so called (see Pliny, lib. vi. cap. 27): though Elam is often taken in a larger sense, so as to comprehend Susiana under it. It was usual for the prophets to see visions by river sides: of which Daniel gives us another instance, x. 4, and Ezekiel saw his first vision by the river Chebar (Ezek. i. 3); such places being proper for retirement and contemplation.

Ver. 3. Behold, there stood before the river a ram which had two horns:] Horns are an emblem of power and dominion (see vii. 24). So this ram with two horns denotes the kingdoms of Media and Persia united into one government. The Hebrew reads one ram: but the adjective one means no more than an article prefixed to a noun substantive; and so it is used x. 5, 1 Sam. i. 1. The ram was the royal ensign of the Persians, as Amm. Marcellinus observes (lib. xix.), and rams' heads with horns, the one higher, and the other lower, are still to be seen among the remains of the ruins of Persepolis, as Sir John Chardin takes notice in his Travels.

had two horns: and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last.

4 I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great.

5 And as I was considering, behold, an he-goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes.

6 And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power.

But one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last.] To denote that the Persian kingdom, though it was of a later date, should overtop that of the Medes, and make a greater figure in the world, as it did from the times of Cyrus (see the note upon Jer. li. 11).

Ver. 4. I saw the ram pushing westward,] Persia lay eastward of Babylon: so all the conquests of Cyrus over Syria and the adjacent countries enlarged his dominions westward. But we may probably include under this head Cyrus's conquests in the lesser Asia, particularly over Croesus, whereby he carried on his victories as far as the Ægean sea. And his successors were for some time masters of a great part of Greece, called the west in the following verse.

And northward,] In the conquests over the Iberians, Albanians, those of Colchos and Armenia, and the adjacent countries.

And southward;] This chiefly relates to Cambyses's conquests over Egypt and Ethiopia, together with those of Darius Hystaspes over India, whence Ahasuerus, king of Persia, is said to have reigned from India to Ethiopia, Esth. i. 1.

But he did according to his will,] Nobody being able to oppose him (see v. 19, xi. 3, 15).

Ver. 5. And as I was considering, behold, an he-goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth,] A he-goat was anciently the emblem of princes or great commanders: see Prov. xxx. 31, Isa. xiv. 9, Zech. x. 3, where the word translated chief ones, signifies in the Hebrew great goats. The goat is described here as coming from the west, that is, from Greece, on the face of the whole earth; i. e. carrying all before him as he went: denoting thereby the uninterrupted success of Alexander the Great. A goat was the emblem, or arms, of Macedonia, as we now-a-days express it, ever since their king Caranus (see Justin's Hist. lib. viii.).

And touched not the ground;] Hereby is signified the swiftness of his conquests: for which he is here described as "having four wings of a fowl," vii. 6, having in eight years' time conquered all the countries that lay between the Ægean sea and the river Hypanis in India (see Dr. Prideaux, par. i. p. 503).

And the goat had a notable horn between his eyes.] See ver. 21.

Ver. 7. And I saw him come close unto the ram, &c.] He made a quick and furious onset upon the Medo-Persian empire, and utterly broke it in two engagements, the first at Issus, the second at Arbela.

He cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him;] See vii. 7. This prophecy of Alexander's success, Jaddus the high-priest showed to him when he came to Jerusalem, and thereby encouraged him to go on in his expedition (see Josephus, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8).

7 And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns: and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him: and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand.

8 Therefore the he-goat waxed very great: and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven.

9 And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land.

Ver. 8. The great horn was broken;] Alexander died in the height of his triumphs and prosperity (see ver. 21, 22).

And for it came up four notable ones] This the angel explains by "four kingdoms standing up" instead of it, ver. 22 (see likewise xi. 4). Dr. Prideaux (ubi supra, p. 557) shows, that this prophecy had its exact completion upon the partition of the Grecian empire after the battle of Ipsus, where Antigonus was killed. There were, indeed, partitions of it into provinces under the brother and son of Alexander; but this was a partition of it into kingdoms, among so many kings or independent governors, represented here by horns, and by heads, vii. 6. And these four kings were, 1. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, Lybia, Palestine, Arabia, and Cælo-Syria, which may be called the southern part of the empire. 2. Cassander of Macedonia and Greece, which was the western part of it. 3. Lysimachus of Thrace and Asia, which was the northern part; and, 4. Seleucus of Syria, and the eastern countries.

From the description here given of the empire of Alexander and his four successors, it is plain that the prophet represents it as one and the same empire: and as the third in order of four great monarchies. For it is represented under the emblem of one and the same he-goat, having first one notable horn in its forehead, which is expressly called the first king, ver. 21, and afterward four growing up in the room of it. This is a confirmation of what is observed before upon ii. 40, that the fourth kingdom must be the Roman empire.

Ver. 9. And out of one of them came forth a little horn,] From one of these four successors of Alexander came forth Antiochus, afterward called Epiphanes, or Illustrious, by his flatterers, but was, indeed, "a vile person, to whom the honour of the kingdom did not belong," as the angel gives his character, xi. 21, Demetrius, his elder brother's son, being the rightful heir.

This little horn belonging to the third head, or monarchy, must not be confounded with the little horn belonging to the fourth, mentioned vii. 8, 20, although this here spoken of may be allowed to be a type or figure of the latter.

Which waxed exceeding great,] He took advantage of the youth of Ptolemy Philometor (see 1 Macc. i. 16, 19), and made himself master of Egypt, called the south in several places of the twelfth chapter of this prophecy.

The east,] Towards Armenia and Persia (see the note on xi. 44).

The pleasant land,] Judea is so called by the holy writers, as being made choice of by God to place his people there, and to make it the seat of his peculiar residence (see Ps. xlviii. 2, Ezek. xx. 6, and compare

10 And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them.

11 Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down.

12 And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast xi. 16, 41, 45). It is often described as a land "flowing with milk and honey." The cruelties which Antiochus Epiphanes exercised in Judea, are the subject of the following verses (compare xi. 31, &c.).

Ver. 10. And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven;] As the faithful are heirs of the kingdom of heaven, so the names and titles of the heavenly church are sometimes given to that on earth. The Christian church is called "the Jerusalem which is above," Gal. iv. 26, and the governors of it are styled angels, Rev. i. 20. In like manner the "host of heaven" means here the Jewish church, and particularly the priests and Levites, who are called the "host of heaven," a title proper to angels, from their continual attendance on God's service in the temple, in imitation of the angelical office. The word tsaba, "host," is applied to the attendance in the sanctuary: Exod. xxxviii. 8, Numb. iv. 23.

It cast down some of the host and of the stars] Persons of principal dignity in the church are called stars, Rev. i. 20, so here the words import, either that Antiochus should put an end to the priests' ministration in the service of God, by "taking away the daily sacrifice" (ver. 12), or else that he seduce some of them by threats and flatteries to turn apostates (see xi. 32, and compare Rev. xi. 1).

Stamped upon them.] Utterly subdued or destroyed them (see vii. 7).

Ver. 11. Yea, he magnified himself even to [or against] the prince of the host.] This some understand of the high-priest Onias (compare xi. 22,) whom Antiochus deprived of his office, and put in his room Jason, an ungodly wretch, who set up heathen rites in the place of God's worship (2 Macc. iv. 13, 17): but it may more probably be understood of God himself, the Lord whom the Jews served (compare ver. 25), or else of Christ "the high-priest over the house of God," whose sanctuary the temple is called in the following words.

The daily sacrifice] The sacrifice which was offered in the name of the whole nation every morning and evening (see Numb. xxviii. 3). This was taken away by Antiochus, and both altar and temple profaned (see 1 Macc. i. 44, 64).

The place of his sanctuary was cast down.] Or, "cast out," as profane (compare Rev. xi. 2). It was deprived of the honour and privileges belonging to a holy place, as if the enclosures had been thrown down, which separated it from common ground.

Ver. 12. And an host was given him, &c.] Antiochus prospered so far in his attempts against the Jews and their religion, that he built a citadel in the city of David, and placed a garrison of soldiers there, to disturb those that should come to worship God at the temple (see 1 Macc. i. 33, 36). This God permitted as a just punishment for the sins of his people; and particularly of those who professed a willingness to forsake the worship of God, and to join with the heathens in their idolatry (see 1 Macc. i. 11, &c., 2 Macc. iv. 13, 17). Some translate the words, "And a set time was appointed against the daily sacrifice:" for the word tsaba, host, signifies likewise a "set time" (see x. 1).

down the truth to the ground; and it practised, and prospered.

13 ¶ Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?

14 And he said unto me, Unto two thousand

And it cast down the truth to the ground;] He prospered so far in his attempts against the truth, as to suppress it for a time, and hinder the open profession of it (see ver. 24, xi. 28, 32).

Ver. 13. I heard one saint] The word saint is equivalent to angel (see iv. 13). What this saint or angel said is not expressed: no more than the words spoken by that illustrious person who appeared to Daniel, x. 5, are recorded.

And another saint said unto that certain saint] Several angels are introduced in Daniel's visions: see ver. 15, 16, x. 6, 10, 16, xii. 5, 6; and so in Zecharias, i. 13, 14, iii. 2, 4. The word rendered here "certain saint," is translated in the margin, "the numberer of secrets," or "the wonderful numberer:" and must mean a person of extraordinary rank, as being able to unfold those secrets which were hid from other angels: and is therefore justly supposed to mean the Son of God, called the "Wonderful Counsellor," Isa. ix. 6, as being acquainted with all God's purposes and designs (compare John i. 18). The participle medabber, "speaking," used here twice with relation to this person, may denote him to be the Logos, or "Word of God."

How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, &c.] The words may be rendered more agreeably to the Hebrew thus; "For how long a time shall the vision last, the daily sacrifice" be taken away, "and the transgression of desolation" continue? The "transgression of desolation," or "making desolate," is the same with the "abomination that maketh desolate," xi. 31, and applying the expression to the persecution raised by Antiochus, denotes the idol which he caused to be set upon God's altar, and there to be worshipped (see 1 Macc. i. 54, compared with ver. 59).

Ver. 14.] This computation of time, in its obvious sense, contains something more than six years and four months, reckoning three hundred and sixty days to a year: and, if we explain it with relation to the persecution set on foot by Antiochus, we must date it, not from the height of that persecution, when the daily sacrifice was actually taken away, for that continued but just three years (compare 1 Macc. i. 54, with iv. 52); but we must date the rise of it from those transgressions which occasioned the desolation (see 1 Macc. i. 11, &c.): and so we may reasonably suppose some time before Antiochus's first invasion of Judea, and his pillaging the sanctuary, mentioned 1 Macc. i. 20—22, which invasion was above two years before the entire abolishing of God's worship in the temple, as appears from the twenty-ninth verse of the same chapter. But since it is generally agreed, that the persecution of Antiochus was a type, or an imperfect representation, of a greater desolation which antichrist should make in the church of God (compare ver. 13 here with xii. 11); it is the opinion of some learned men, that these two thousand three hundred days are a line of time that is to be extended to the end of the times of antichrist; taking each day for a year, according to the genius of the prophetic writings (see Numb. xiv. 34, Ezek. iv. 6): according to and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.

15 ¶ And it came to pass, when I, even I, Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning, then, behold, there stood before me as the appearance of a man.

16 And I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which called, and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision.

17 So he came near where I stood: and when he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face: but he said unto me, Understand, O son of man: for at the time of the end shall be the vision.

18 Now as he was speaking with me, I was in a deep sleep on my face toward the ground: but he touched me, and set me upright.

which sense the three years and a half, mentioned vii. 25, and the seventy weeks in the ninth chapter, are explained by most interpreters. According to this opinion these two thousand and three hundred days will be commensurate to the one thousand two hundred and ninety, or one thousand three hundred and thirty-five prophetic days, or years, mentioned xii. 11, 12, and then the sanctuary will be thoroughly cleansed, and God's indignation will come perfectly to an end, as it is expressed, ver. 19.

The phrase here translated "two thousand three hundred days," is in the original "two thousand three hundred mornings [and] evenings:" which is the Hebrew way of expressing a natural day (see Gen. i. 5). According to this way of speaking, Christ is said to be "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth," Matt. xii. 40; i. e. part of three natural days. And perhaps the phrase may be here used, in allusion to the daily sacrifice, which was to be offered every morning and evening: the taking away of which is here foretold.

Ver. 15.] Compare xii. 8.

Ver. 16.] The person who utters this voice seems to be the same who is called the "wonderful numberer," ver. 13, because he speaks as one that had authority over the angel Gabriel.

Ver. 17. When he came I was afraid,] Being struck with fear and astonishment (compare x. 7, 8, Ezek. i. 28, Rev. i. 17).

Understand, O son of man,] This is a title given to none of the prophets but Ezekiel and David, who had more frequent converse with angels than any of the rest: and is given to the prophet here, either to put him in mind that he was but flesh and blood, that he might not be exalted for having these heavenly visions imparted to him; or else it may be interpreted for a mark or title of honour, as implying something more than an ordinary man, even such a man that was highly favoured and beloved of God (see ix. 23, x. 11, and the note upon Ezek. ii. 1).

At the time of the end,] Or, "To the time of the end:" i. e. there is a precise time determined for the accomplishment of the vision, when it shall certainly be fulfilled (see ver. 19, and compare ix. 27, xi. 35, 36, Hab. ii. 3).

Ver. 18. Now as he was speaking with me, I was in a deep sleep] As one that faints away, and falls into a swoon through fear and astonishment (see ver. 27, x. 7—10, 16).

But he touched me, and set me upright.] See x. 10, Ezek. ii. 2.

Ver. 19.] Or, "To the last end of the indignation:" I will explain to thee the whole series of God's judgments upon his people to the end and 19 And he said, Behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation: for at the time appointed the end shall be.

20 The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia.

21 And the rough goat is the king of Grecia: and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king.

22 Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power.

23 And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up.

24 And his power shall be mighty, but not by conclusion of them (see xii. 8). God will not continue his anger for ever, but there is a fixed period appointed for it (see ver. 17).

Ver. 20—22.] See the notes upon ver. 3, 5, 8.

Ver. 22.] Four kingdoms shall be set up by Alexander's generals, who shall be of the same nation with him, although not of his posterity: nor shall they have that power or extent of dominion which he possessed (see xi. 4).

Ver. 23. And in the latter time of their kingdom,] Greece was the chief province of this empire, from whence it had its original and its name: the bringing this country into subjection to the Roman power was a manifest indication of the declension of the third monarchy, and the advancement of the fourth: this was remarkably brought to pass when Æmilius the Roman consul vanquished Perseus King of Macedonia, and thereby brought all Greece under the power of the Romans: and this happened much about the time when Antiochus set up the abomination of desolation in the temple of Jerusalem (see Mr. Mede's Works, p. 654, and Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra, ad. A. C. 169).

When the transgressors are come to the full,] When many of the Jews shall be disposed to cast off the true religion, and embrace the gentile idolatries (see 1 Macc. i. 11, 15, 43, ii. 15, 18). God spares sinners for a time, to give them space for repentance, till their iniquities come to their full height, and are ripe for judgment (see Gen. xv. 16, Matt. xxiii. 32, 1 Thess. ii. 16).

A king of fierce countenance, &c.] One of a fierce and untractable temper, without pity or compassion, (compare Deut. xxviii. 50); one practised in craft and policy (see ver. 25); especially in the arts of inveigling men, and seducing them from their religion. This character may be justly applied to Antiochus Epiphanes: though in other respects he behaved himself so unaccountably, that he might more fitly be called Epimanes the Madman, than Epiphanes the Illustrious, as Polybius observes (see the Fragments of his twenty-sixth book; and Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. book iii. at the beginning). This makes some interpreters think that the character here given to Antiochus, more properly belongs to antichrist, whose type he was: an observation that may be applied to some other expressions in the following verses.

Ver. 24. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power:] He shall subdue Judea, Egypt, and several other countries (see ver. 9, xi. 41—43). It is added here, that he shall not effect this "by his own power:" which they that apply to Antiochus understand either, first, of the assistance which Eumenes king of Pergamus, and his brother Attalus, gave him in keeping the kingly power he had usurped (see xi.

his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people.

25 And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand.

21, 22): or, secondly, we may understand the words of the wickedness of Jason and Menelaus, the high-priests, who joined with an irreligious party among the Jews, and forwarded Antiochus' designs to establish gentilism among them (1 Macc. i. 11, &c., 2 Macc. iv. 7, &c.): or, thirdly, the place may be understood of God's prospering his attempts, as a punishment for the transgressions of his people (ver. 23). But the expression may be more fitly applied to antichrist, of whom Antiochus was the type, who grew great, and carried on his designs, not so much by his own strength, as by the power of the ten kings, who afforded him their arms and assistance (see Rev. xvii. 13, 17).

And shall prosper, and practise,] See ver. 12.

And shall destroy the mighty and the holy people.] That people, who, being set apart for God's service (see ix. 16), were under his peculiar protection, by virtue whereof they were formerly victorious over all their enemies. Antiochus, in his first invasion of Judea, slew and led captive eighty thousand Jews (2 Macc. v. 14), and two years afterward sent Apollonius with an army of two and twenty thousand men, to destroy those that assembled in the synagogue on the sabbath (see 1 Macc. i. 29, 30, 2 Macc. v. 24).

Ver. 25. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand;] He first of all obtained the kingdom "by flatteries" (xi. 21): then after he had made leagues and covenants, he "wrought deceitfully," and under pretence of peace and friendship he invaded and spoiled both Egypt and Judea (xi. 24, 27, 1 Macc. i. 30, &c., 2 Macc. v. 25). The same thing is foretold in the following words, "By peace he shall destroy many."

And he shall magnify himself in his heart,] See ver. 11, xi. 36, 2 Macc. ix. 4, 7, 8, 11).

He shall also stand up against the Prince of princes;] He shall exalt himself against the true God, the Lord of heaven and earth (compare ver. 11, xi. 36), abolishing his worship, and setting up idolatry in its stead (see 1 Macc. i. 21, 24, 44, 54).

But he shall be broken without hand.] By an immediate judgment of God (compare Job xxxiv. 20, 26 And the vision of the evening and the morning which was told is true: wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days.

27 And I Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days; afterward I rose up, and did the king's business; and I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it.

and see the note upon ii. 45). God struck him with a noisome disease, attended with horrible torments both of body and mind. See 1 Macc. vi. 8, 13, 2 Macc. ix. from the fifth verse to the end. The history those two writers give of his death agrees in many particulars with Polybius's account of it, p. 1453 of Gronovius's edition.

Ver. 26. And the vision—which was told is true:] The vision of the two thousand three hundred evenings and mornings, mentioned ver. 14, is certain (see x. 1).

Wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days.] The same thing is expressed by "shutting up the words," and "sealing the book," xii. 4. The expression in both places denotes the concealing the sense of it from common understandings; or deferring the accomplishment of the events therein foretold. So we find "shutting and opening," "sealing and unfolding," are opposed in the prophetic language, and import the same as concealing and revealing; delaying the accomplishment of a prophecy, and bringing it into effect (see Isa. xxix. 11, Rev. v. 1, 5, xxii. 10). The words instruct us that prophecies are never fully understood till they are accomplished; and the nearer the time approaches of their accomplishment, the more light shall diligent searchers have for the explaining them (see xii. 4).

It shall be for many days.] See x. 1, 14.

Ver. 27. And I Daniel fainted,] See the note on ver. 18.

Afterward I rose up,] See the note upon ver. 2.

And I was astonished at the vision,] The calamities which it foreshowed should come upon God's people, filled me with melancholy and desponding thoughts (see vii. 28).

But none understood it.] Daniel himself had but an imperfect apprehension of it, just as when men view things at a distance, though the angel did impart to him the general meaning of it (ver. 16, 17), and afterward he had a more particular revelation of several things relating to it (see the note upon x. 1). But still it remained unintelligible to common capacities (see the foregoing verse).

CHAPTER IX.

1 In the first year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans;

2 In the first year of his reign I Daniel understood by books the number of the years, whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the pro-

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.—Daniel having thoroughly considered the prophecies of Jeremy relating to the seventy years' captivity, and being satisfied that that term of years was near expiring, humbles himself in prayer for the sins of his people, and earnestly begs of God the restoration of Jerusalem. In answer to his prayers the angel Gabriel informs him, that the city should be rebuilt, and peopled as in former times, and should so continue for seventy weeks of years, i. e. four hundred and ninety years; and then should be utterly destroyed for putting the Messias to death.

Ver. 1.] See v. 31. This is the same person who is called Cyaxares, the son of Astyages, by the heathen historians, with whom Josephus agrees. His father Astyages had the name of Ahasuerus among the Jews, as appears by a passage in Tobit, xiv. 15, where the phet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem.

3 ¶ And I set my face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplications, with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes:

4 And I prayed unto the Lord my God, and made my confession, and said, O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, and to them that keep his commandments;

5 We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts and from thy judgments:

6 Neither have we hearkened unto thy servants the prophets, which spake in thy name to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, and to all the people of the land.

7 O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee, but unto us confusion of faces, as at this day; to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and unto all Israel, that are near, and that are far off, through all the countries whither thou hast driven them, because of their trespass that they have trespassed against thee.

8 O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against thee.

9 To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgiveness, though we have rebelled against him;

10 Neither have we obeyed the voice of the Lord our God, to walk in his laws, which he set before us by his servants the prophets.

11 Yea, all Israel have transgressed thy law, even by departing, that they might not obey thy voice; therefore the curse is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the law of Moses the servant of God, because we have sinned against him.

12 And he hath confirmed his words, which he spake against us, and against our judges that judged us, by bringing upon us a great evil: for under the whole heaven hath not been done as hath been done upon Jerusalem.

13 As it is written in the law of Moses, all

With fasting, &c.] The soul and body are so nearly related, that the humiliation of both is necessary to make our repentance complete (see James iv. 9, 10).

Ver. 4. And I—made my confession.] Both acknowledging his justice and holiness, and my own and my people's iniquity. The better men are, the greater is the sense of their guilt, and the deeper is their humiliation (see Job xlii. 6, 1 Tim. i. 15).

Keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, &c.] The prophet does not insist upon any right the people had in those gracious promises made to their fathers, because the condition of their obedience, whenever it was not expressly mentioned, yet was tacitly implied (compare Neh. i. 5).

Ver. 5.] Daniel uses the same confession that is prescribed in Solomon's consecration prayer, to be used by the Jews in the land of their captivity: with a promise subjoined of a favourable answer, that God would make to their supplications, presented to him upon that occasion (see 1 Kings viii. 48—50, and compare Neh. i. 7, Ps. cvi. 6).

Ver. 7.] Some of the Jews were carried captive, or went voluntary exiles, upon foreseeing the calamities which were coming upon their country, into the neighbouring countries, of Edom, Moab, and Ammon (see the note upon Jer. xii. 14): as others went down into Egypt (see Jeremiah xliii. xlv.). Those were not removed to such a distance from their own country, as those that were carried to Babylon.

Ver. 10. To walk in his laws, which he set before us] By Moses, and the succession of the prophets that followed him: who reinforced the law of Moses, and gave the people new instructions from God upon emergent occasions.

Ver. 11.] Those solemn denunciations of God's judgments declared against impenitent sinners, Lev. xxvi. Deut. xxviii. xxix. 20. The Hebrew Shebunah, is taken here for an imprecation, as it is used, Numb. v. 21. the forms of swearing or adjuration, implying an imprecation upon those that forswear themselves. For which reason the Hebrew alah signifies both swearing and cursing (see the note upon Jer. xxiii. 10).

Ver. 12. Against our judges] Judges here signify any princes or rulers (compare Job xii. 17, Ps. ii taking of Nineveh is ascribed to Nebuchadonosor and Assuerus, who were the same with Nabupolasar, Nebuchadnezzar's father, and Astyages: Nebuchadnezzar being a name common to all the Babylonian kings, as Pharaoh was to the kings of Egypt (see Dr. Prideaux's Script. Connex. ad A. C. 612).

We need not wonder to find the same persons called by such different names, especially in different countries: the scripture affords several instances of this kind: so Daniel was called Belteshazzar by Nebuchadnezzar, who changed the names of his three companions, i. 7, Zerubbabel was called Shezbazzar, Ezra i. 8, Esther, Hadassah, Esth. ii. 7.

Ver. 2. I Daniel understood by books] The several prophecies of Jeremiah are called so many books (see xxv. 13, xxix. 1). We may observe from hence, that the prophets studied the writings of those prophets who were before them, for the more perfect understanding of the times when their prophecies were to be fulfilled. The same they did by several of their own prophecies (see 1 Pet. i. 11, 12).

That he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem.] See Jer. xxv. 11, 12, xxix. 10. The seventy years mentioned both here and in Jeremy, are to be dated from the end of the third, or beginning of the fourth, year of Jehoiakim (compare Jer. xxv. 1, with Dan. i. 1): from which time to the first year of Cyrus, according to the scripture account, are just seventy years. These desolations began from the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when the city was taken by Nebuchadnezzar (see i. 1), at which time the king of Judah became tributary to the king of Babylon: and they were from time to time increasing, till the eleventh year of Zedekiah, when they were fully accomplished in the burning of the city and temple; after which time it continued desolate till the end of the captivity (2 Chron. xxxvi. 21).

Ver. 3. And I set my face unto the Lord God,] I directed my face towards the place where the temple stood (see vi. 10).

To seek [him] by prayer and supplications.] The promises of God are generally conditional, and the promise of restoring the Jews' captivity after seventy years, had this condition particularly expressed in it, that they should call upon him, and pray unto him, and then he would hearken unto them, Jer. xxix. 12.

this evil is come upon us: yet made we not our prayer before the LORD our God, that we might turn from our iniquities, and understand thy truth.

14 Therefore hath the LORD watched upon the evil, and brought it upon us: for the LORD our God is righteous in all his works which he doeth: for we obeyed not his voice.

15 And now, O Lord our God, that hast brought thy people forth out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand, and hast gotten thee renown, as at this day; we have sinned, we have done wickedly.

16 ¶ O Lord, according to all thy righteousness, I beseech thee, let thine anger and thy fury be turned away from thy city Jerusalem, thy holy mountain: because for our sins, and for the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem and thy people are become a reproach to all that are about us.

17 Now therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplications, and cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate, for the LORD's sake.

18 O my God, incline thine ear, and hear; open thine eyes, and behold our desolations, and 10, cxlviii. 12, Prov. viii. 16). See Lam. i. 12, ii. 13, Ezek. v. 9.

Ver. 13.] A devout acknowledgment of God's justice and providence, in making his judgments exactly fulfil the threatenings denounced many ages before by Moses (see Lev. xxvi. 14, &c. Deut. xxviii. 15, &c.).

Ver. 14.] The same expression is used by the prophet Jeremy in his threatenings against the Jews, xxxi. 28, xlv. 27.

Ver. 15. And now, O Lord our God, &c.] A form of supplication used in several places of scripture, whereby devout persons entreat God to continue his favours, by recounting his former mercies towards them (see Exod. xxxii. 11, 13, Neh. ix. 10, Jer. xxxii. 20). This the Latin tongue expresses by the word obsecratio: of which kind is that form of supplication used in our Litany, By the mystery of thy holy incarnation, &c., which some men's ignorance or prejudice hath misinterpreted, as if it were a sort of conjuration.

We have sinned, we have done wickedly.] The entire sense is, Although we have sinned, and are unworthy of the continuance of thy mercies, yet deal with us according to all thy righteousness, as it follows.

Ver. 16. O Lord, according to all thy righteousness.] The word righteousness is in many places of scripture equivalent to mercy (see 1 Sam. xii. 7, Ps. xxxi. 1, cxliii. 1, Mic. vi. 5, and Dr. Hammond upon Matt. i. 19).

Thy holy mountain.] The temple (see ver. 20, and the note upon Isa. ii. 2).

Ver. 17.] For the sake of the Messias, known by the title of the Lord among the Jews (see Ps. cx. 1): and called "Messiah the Prince," ver. 25 of this chapter. All God's promises are fulfilled in and for the sake of Christ, 2 Cor. i. 20). To this sense some interpret Ps. lxxx. 14, 16, "Behold, and visit this vine; and the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted, even for the sake of the Son, whom thou madest strong for thyself:" expressed afterward by "the Son of man," ver. 18.

Ver. 19.] The seventy years of our captivity are near being expired (see ver. 2): therefore I beseech thee not to defer the accomplishment of the promise thou hast made to restore us to our own country, and the free exercise of our religion. So remarkable a the city which is called by thy name: for we do not present our supplications before thee for our righteousness, but for thy great mercies.

19 O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken and do; defer not, for thine own sake, O my God: for thy city and thy people are called by thy name.

20 ¶ And whiles I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before the LORD my God for the holy mountain of my God;

21 Yea, whiles I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation.

22 And he informed me, and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding.

23 At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am come to shew thee; for thou art greatly beloved: therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision.

turn of providence will very much redound to the honour of thy name (see Ps. lxxix. 9, 10, cii. 15, 16).

Ver. 21. The man Gabriel.] The angel Gabriel appearing under the shape of a man (compare x. 16). At the beginning.] Or "before" (see viii. 16). The word batechillah signifies "before," viii. 1.

Being caused to fly swiftly.] The angels are commonly described as having wings, with respect to their appearance in a bodily shape, to signify their readiness to execute the divine commands (see Isa. vi. 2, Ezek. i. 11).

Touched me [see viii. 18, x. 10] about the time of the evening oblation.] There were three hours of prayer (see vi. 10), but the two most solemn seasons of it were at the time of the morning and evening oblation, that solemn service which was offered daily in the temple in the name of the whole nation (see viii. 11). This service was performed at the third and ninth hours of the day, answering to our nine of the clock in the morning and three in the afternoon. Devout persons that could not attend the temple service, set apart those hours for their private devotions: and we find Elijah made that solemn prayer and sacrifice recorded 1 Kings xviii. 36, "at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice." But upon their solemn days of fasting and humiliation, they continued their devotions from the time of the morning sacrifice till that of the evening was finished. Such was this of Daniel, and that of Cornelius, mentioned Acts x. 30. This custom was continued among the primitive Christians, who did not conclude their prayers or fasts on their stationary days till three in the afternoon (see Mr. Bingham, Eccles. Antiq. book xxi. ch. 3).

Ver. 23. At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth.] God's command to me to instruct thee farther in what should hereafter befall the city and temple of Jerusalem, in whose behalf thou didst pour forth thy supplications. Here was a remarkable completion of that promise, Isa. lxxv. 24, "While they are yet speaking I will hear."

For thou art greatly beloved.] Learned men have observed a near affinity between the prophecy of Daniel and the Revelation of St. John: and we may take notice, that much the same title is given to them both. Daniel is styled "a man greatly beloved," here and x. 11, 19, and the character given to St. John is,

24 Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the most Holy.

that of "the disciple whom Jesus loved," John xxi. 20, 24.

Therefore understand the matter.] Apply thy mind carefully to what is said, for this prophecy contains in it truths of the greatest importance. Our Saviour plainly refers to these words, which are repeated ver. 25, when, explaining the latter part of this prophecy of the final destruction of Jerusalem, he adds, "Let him that readeth understand," Matt. xxiv. 15.

Ver. 24. Seventy weeks] To recite all the different methods chronologers have taken of computing these seventy weeks, would be too large a work for a commentary. I shall only take notice of three opinions, which seem most agreeable to the text. The first is, that of Petavius, Rationar. Tem. par. ii. p. 154, and Archbishop Usher, Annal. V. T. ad An. P. J. 4260. These two learned authors date the beginning of this prophecy from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, when he gave his commission to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem (Neh. ii. 1), from which time they reckon half of the week here specified (ver. 27), to be completed at the death of Christ. But then these authors suppose Artaxerxes to have begun his reign nine years sooner than the historians commonly date it. The second opinion is that of Dr. Prideaux, Connex. of Script. par. i. ad an. A. C. 458, who fixes the date of this prophecy to the seventh year of Artaxerxes, when he gave a commission to Ezra, to settle the state of the Jews at Jerusalem, to which sense he understands the "commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem:" from which time he computes four hundred and ninety years to the death of Christ.

The third opinion is that of the late right reverend and learned Bishop Lloyd, which may be seen in the Chronological Tables, published by his direction, Numb. 3, 4. He supposes the years here specified to consist of three hundred and sixty days: such years he affirms the scripture always makes use of in the computation of time; as appears in the history of Noah's flood, Gen. vii. 11, compared with ver. 24, and viii. 4, and from Rev. xii. 6, compared with ver. 24, and xiii. 5, where twelve hundred and sixty days are reckoned equivalent to three years and a half, and to forty and two months. The same computation of years was generally made use of in ancient times by all nations, particularly by the Chaldeans, where Daniel now lived. The reasons of this opinion are at large set forth by Mr. Marshal, in his treatise upon the Seventy Weeks, par. ii. ch. 4. The bishop proceeding upon this hypothesis, computes the date of this prophecy from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, and reckons sixty-nine weeks of years, or four hundred and eighty-three years, from thence to the year before Christ's death. But then the last or single week that remains to make up the number of seventy he separates from the rest, and begins it from the year of Christ 63, in the latter half of which the "sacrifice and oblation were to cease, and the city and sanctuary to be destroyed by the Romans:" all which was fulfilled in the seventieth year after Christ.

The difference of these three opinions as to the main point, the completion of this prophecy, is not very great; for, as the learned Bishop Chandler hath judiciously observed (Answers to Grounds and Reasons, p. 139): "The commencement of the weeks must be either from the seventh of Artaxerxes, which falls upon the four hundred and fifty-seventh year before Anno Domini, or from the twentieth of Artaxerxes. Add to four hundred and fifty-seven years before Christ, twenty-six years after Christ (which is the number that four hundred and eighty-three years, or sixty-nine weeks, exceeds four hundred and fifty-seven years), and you are brought to the beginning of John the Baptist's preaching up the advent of the Messias: add seven years, or one week, to the former, and you come to the thirty-third year of Anno Domini, which was the year of Jesus Christ's death. Or else compute four hundred and ninety years, the whole seventy weeks, from the seventh of Artaxerxes: by subtracting four hundred and fifty-seven years (the space of time between that year and the beginning of Anno Domini) from four hundred and ninety, and there remains thirty-three, the year of our Lord's death. Let the twentieth of Artaxerxes be the date of the seventy weeks, which is the four hundred and forty-fifth year before A. D. and reckon sixty-nine weeks of Chaldean years; seventy Chaldee years being equal to sixty-nine Julian; and so four hundred and seventy-eight Julian years making four hundred and eighty-three Chaldee years, and they end in the thirty-third year after Christ, or the passover following. Any of these reckonings (adds this learned author) are sufficient for our purpose. It is rather to be wondered, how, at this distance of time, learned men have been able to come to any exactness in these matters."

Seventy weeks are determined] By seventy weeks are to be understood seventy weeks of years, or seventy times seven years; i. e. four hundred and ninety years: each day being accounted for a year, according to the prophetic way of reckoning (see Numb. xiv. 34, Ezek. iv. 6). Daniel distinguisheth between these weeks and the weeks after the common reckoning, by calling the latter "weeks of days," x. 2, according to the sense of the Hebrew, expressed in the margin. And Isaiah distinguisheth a natural year from a prophetic one, by calling it "the year of a hireling," Isa. xvi. 14, xxi. 16.

The Jews numbered their time by sevens of years: every seventh year was a year of release, and after seven times seven years, i. e. forty-nine years, came the year of jubilee. So the computation of time here made use of alludes to Lev. xxv. 8, "Thou shalt number seven sabbaths [or rather weeks] of years, seven times seven years;" the Hebrew word "sabbath" signifying the number seven, as it is rendered ἑβδόμενος by the LXX. in the latter part of the verse: and so the Greek word ἑβδόμενος is used in Luke xviii. 12, xxiv. 1. Daniel, by examining the prophecy of Jeremiah, had discovered how the seventy years of the captivity were near expiring: and here the angel discovers to him another line of time, importing, that after the restoration of Jerusalem it should continue for a period of time, consisting of seventy times seven years, which being expired, it should be finally destroyed. Seventy weeks contain ten jubilees, and ten being the number of perfection, these seventy weeks denote the bringing in the most complete jubilee, or remission, as the LXX. render that word: when all former trespasses should be cancelled, and men should be restored to that heavenly inheritance they had forfeited, by the death of the Messias.

Upon thy people and upon thy holy city,] Daniel in his prayer to God, speaking of the Jews and Jerusalem, had used these expressions, "Thy people, and thy holy city," ver. 18, 19, as if their title to God's favour were indefeasible. To correct this mistake, the angel, directing his discourse to Daniel, returns

25 Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times.

26 And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the him his own expressions, as if the people and the city were rather his than God's. In the same phrase God speaks to Moses, after the sin of the Israelites in making the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 7. At the twenty-sixth verse of this prophecy, the angel tells Daniel how they ceased to be God's people.

To finish the transgression, &c.] This the Messiah did by making an atonement for sin, and absolving men from the guilt of it: by giving men the best rules and assistances for the promoting true and inward righteousness; called here "everlasting righteousness," in opposition to the righteousness of the law, a great part of which consisted in external ordinance, "imposed on them" for a season "till the time of reformation," Heb. ix. 10, where the English text reads, "to make an end of sin:" the margin translates it, to seal up sin, following a various reading in the Hebrew: but the sense comes all to one, for the verb which signifies to seal up, denotes likewise the accomplishing of any thing, and is applied to sin, or the punishment of it, Lam. iv. 22 (see likewise the following note).

To seal up the vision and prophecy.] To fulfil the prophecies of foregoing ages concerning the Messias, and to confirm them, by making the event to answer the prediction, as the setting of a seal confirms the authenticity of any writing. Thus the rabbins upon the text interpret the words, "All the prophecies (say they) shall be fulfilled at the coming of the Messias." Bishop Lloyd explains the sentence of the finishing and completing the prophetic writings of the Old Testament, which he supposes to have been done forty-nine years after the commencement of this prophecy (see the note upon the following verse).

And to anoint the most Holy.] The word "anoint" plainly alludes to the name of Messiah, expressed in the following verse, which signifies in Hebrew, "the Anointed," and is translated "Christ" in Greek (see John i. 41). To "anoint" is the same here as to consecrate the Messiah to be a priest, prophet, and king, all which offices were conveyed by the ceremony of anointing. The Messiah is styled here "the most Holy," upon the account of his unspotted original, as well as his unblamable life (see Luke i. 35, Acts iii. 14, Heb. vii. 26, Rev. iii. 7). The words may be literally translated, "To anoint the holy of holies:" an expression which usually signifies the inner sanctuary, called "the holiest of all," Heb. ix. 3, and it is very properly applied to the Messias, who was "greater than the temple," Matt. xii. 6, because "in him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead," Col. ii. 9, whereupon he calls his body the "temple," John ii. 21.

Ver. 25. Know therefore and understand.] See ver. 23.

From the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem] Or "To build again Jerusalem," as the margin reads, and so the verb shub is translated in the latter part of the verse, and see xi. 10. Daniel had besought God to "behold their desolations, and the ruins of the city which is called by his name," ver. 18. In answer to this his supplication, the angel acquaints him that the city, both the streets and the wall thereof, should be rebuilt. These expressions do very much confirm their interpretation, who date this prophecy from the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, when he gave a commission to Nehemiah to rebuild the city and its walls (Neh. ii. 1); whereas Dr. Prideaux, who dates this prophecy from the seventh year of Artaxerxes, is forced to understand these expressions in a metaphorical sense, for restoring and establishing the church and state of the Jews. Now it is a received rule, that a literal sense is always to be preferred, if it be consistent with the main scope of the text.

Unto the Messiah the Prince] Anointing being the ancient ceremony of investing persons in the highest offices and dignities, the name of "Messias," or "Anointed," was in an eminent manner appropriated to him that was sanctified, or set apart, and sent into the world under the highest character of being the Redeemer of it. By that name he was commonly known unto the Jews, John i. 41, iv. 25, and that title was chiefly given to him from the authority of this prophecy. He is called here the Prince, or Ruler, a title often given to David (see 1 Sam. ix. 16, 2 Sam. v. 2, vii. 8), and applied to the Messiah himself, spoken of under the name of David, Isa. lv. 4. The author of the first book of Chronicles probably alludes to this place of Daniel, v. 2, "Judah prevailed over his brethren, and of him was the chief ruler (the nagid here in the text) to come:" as the words may best be translated. The Messiah was commonly known under the title of "King of Israel," or "King of the Jews" (see Matt. ii. 2, Luke xxiii. 2, 3, John i. 49, xix. 19).

Shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks:] A colon should be placed at the end of this sentence, which is wrong placed in the middle of it in our English bibles. "Seven weeks and threescore and two weeks" put together, make sixty-nine weeks of years, or four hundred and eighty-three years. As the cutting off the Messiah is appropriated to the period of threescore and two weeks in the following verse, so the seven weeks or forty-nine years, here mentioned, must in all probability be assigned to the building of the street and the wall, whether we understand it literally, or metaphorically with Dr. Prideaux, for the restoring and settling the Jewish church and state (see Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra, and ad an. A. C. 409).

Bishop Lloyd, who reckons the date of this prophecy from the twentieth of Artaxerxes, concludes the seven weeks, or forty-nine years, in the eighth year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, at which time he supposes Malachi to have written his prophecy, and thereby finished the Old Testament Canon, or scaled up the vision and prophecy, after whom the Jews were to look for no other prophet till John Baptist (see Mal. iv. 4, 5, compared with Matt. xi. 13, 14).

The street shall be built again, &c.] When the Jews were sorely assaulted by their adversaries, who did all they could to hinder them from rebuilding the city, and fortifying it with a new wall (see Neh. iv. 7, &c., vi. 15). These words, taken in their obvious sense, plainly fix the date of this prophecy to the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, who then gave Nehemiah a commission to repair the city, and raise up the walls and ramparts of it (see Neh. ch. ii.—iv. compared with Ecclus. xlix. 13). Before which time the Jews, that returned from captivity, lived in the cities where their inheritance lay (see Ezra ii. 70, Neh. vii. 4). "The word haruts, translated wall, properly signifies the circuit bounding out the limits of the city, whereon the wall was built, and anciently used to be marked out with a plough making a furrow round about," as Mr. Mede observes (Works, p. 700); and by rechob, the street, or broad place, he understands people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof

the arca, or plat of ground whereon the city was to be built: or else we may suppose the singular put for the plural, an enallage very common in scripture.

Ver. 26. And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off.] Or, "After those threescore and two weeks"—for the he, prefixed to the word shebunim, is emphatical, as the grammarians express it. The common interpretation of the word is, that in the seventieth or last week the Messiah should be put to death. The Hebrew verb here translated cut off, is by the Jewish rabbins interpreted of a death inflicted by the sentence of a judge, which sense they confirm by the use of it in a parallel place, Lev. xvii. 14, to which we may add 1 Sam. xxviii. 9. Our Saviour plainly refers to this text, among others, Luke xxiv. 26, 46.

Bishop Lloyd, who makes a break between the sixty-nine weeks and the seventieth, supposes the sixty-nine to expire in May, A. D. 32, which was the year before our Saviour's passion. In correspondence with this prophecy, our Lord could not survive a whole year after the sixty-nine weeks were expired: nor did he: but since he was to be cut off at the passover, himself being the true paschal Lamb, he died in the following year in the month Nisan, answering to our April, the very same day and hour that the paschal lamb was wont to be killed (see the Chronological Tables above mentioned).

But not for himself.] "The just suffering for the unjust," 1 Pet. iii. 18. The Vulgar Latin renders the words to this sense, "And the people that deny him shall be no longer his." The Hebrew phrase is used in the same sense, xi. 17, Job xxxix. 16. To confirm this interpretation, we are to suppose the word people, which follows, to be understood here, and may with Bishop Lloyd translate this and the following sentence thus: "And the people that deny him shall be no longer his, but the prince's (i. e. the Messiah's, ver. 25) future people shall destroy," &c. And then the Jews will properly be called Lo-ammi, "not my people," Hos. i. 9.

The people of the prince that shall come.] The Romans, under the conduct of Vespasian and his son Titus, who were the generals in that war, and both of them dignified with the title of prince or Cæsar. Bishop Lloyd corrects the common translation thus, "The Prince's (i. e. the Messiah's) future people:" the Hebrew word haba as the Greek ἐρχόμενος, which answers it, often signifying the future, or that which is to come (see Isa. xxvii. 6, xlv. 7, Mark x. 30, Rev. i. 4). This people that learned prelate understands to be the Romans and their empire, which was the seat of the Christian church. So when our Saviour tells us, that before "the end" of the Jewish nation "come, the gospel shall be preached in all the world," Matt. xxiv. 14, and St. Paul speaks to the same purpose, Rom. x. 16, Col. i. 6, 23, we are there to understand the world of the extent of the Roman empire. And our Lord, speaking of the final destruction of the Jewish nation by the Romans, expresseth it by sending forth "his armies to destroy those murderers, and burn up their city" (Matt. xxii. 7): which exactly agrees with the words here following.

Shall destroy the city and the sanctuary.] After that the Romans had burnt both city and sanctuary, they so entirely destroyed them, that it could "scarce be perceived the place had ever been inhabited," as Josephus relates (De Bello, lib. vii. cap.

1, edit. Hudson); and the Jews relate that a plough was drawn over the ground where they both stood (see Dr. Lightfoot upon Matt. xxiv. 2): which were evident accomplishments of our Saviour's prediction, that one stone should not stand upon another, with respect either to the city (Luke xix. 44), or to the sanctuary (Matt. xxiii. 38, xxiv. 2).

And the end thereof shall be with a flood.] The desolations made by an army are often compared to the inundations of a flood, whose violence nothing is able to withstand (compare xi. 10, Isa. viii. 7, 8).

Desolations are determined.] Or, "decreed." That war shall make an utter destruction both of the city and the nation.

Ver. 27. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week.] The former part of the verse may be literally translated thus: "One week shall confirm the covenant with many, and the midst of (or the half part of) the week shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease." Most interpreters suppose the seventy weeks to be completed at the death of Christ, or at least one-half of the seventieth and last of them; accordingly they understand the "confirming the covenant" of the new covenant, and the terms of salvation therein proposed, first by John Baptist, as the forerunner of Christ, and then by Christ himself (compare Isa. xlii. 6, lv. 3, Jer. xxxi. 31, Ezek. xvi. 60—62). They that confine the promulgation of the new covenant to the first half of the seventieth week, understand it of Christ's preaching for three years and a half, and then suffering in the midst of that week. They that understand the confirming the covenant to be of the same extent with the seventieth week, suppose John Baptist's preaching to have taken up three years and a half, before Christ entered on his prophetic office, and translate the following words, In the half part of the week (see the next note but one).

With many.] The same expression is elsewhere used of the universal redemption, or general promulgation of pardon by the gospel covenant (see Isa. liii. 11, Matt. xx. 28, Rom. v. 15, 19, Heb. ix. 28).

In the midst of the week.] Our translation of the words follows their opinion who place the death of Christ in the middle of the last week (see Archbishop Usher's Annals, par. ii. p. 569): whereas they that suppose the whole seventy weeks completed at our Saviour's passion, translate the sentence thus, "In the half part of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease;" understanding it of the latter half (see Dr. Prideaux, ubi supra). The Hebrew word chatsi, signifies properly the half part, and is commonly translated by ἡμισυ in the Septuagint. [In this sense it is to be understood by our translation, xii. 7, of this prophecy.]

He shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease.] Christ, by his "one oblation of himself once offered," shall put an end to all the sacrifices and oblations made in the Jewish temple (compare Heb. x. 5, &c.). Thus the words are expounded by those that suppose the seventy weeks to have been finished at our Saviour's death. To confirm this exposition we may observe, that the putting an end to the temple service by violence, such as was threatened under Antiochus Epiphanes, is expressed in a different manner; viz. by "taking away the daily sacrifice," viii. 11, 12, xi. 31.

Others understand these words of the final destruction of the Jewish temple and worship by the

27 And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations

Romans; and it may be observed, that the word mincha, "oblation," is sometimes used for the daily sacrifice (see 1 Kings xviii. 29, 36). Bishop Lloyd explains the words to this sense: he separates this single, or odd week (so he translates shabua echa, "one week"), from the other sixty-nine; and makes it commence in the sixty-third year after Christ, and to end in the final destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem, which came to pass A. C. 70. It must be granted, that this interpretation agrees better with the letter of the text than the former: and the "abomination of desolation" immediately following it, they may both be reasonably thought the express characters of one and the same week, viz. the seventieth, "determined upon Daniel's people and city."

The same learned prelate understands the words, "He shall confirm the covenant with many—of the prince's future people," mentioned in the foregoing verse, viz. the Romans: who, by their general Corbulo, made a peace with the Parthians, Medes, and Armenians, that they might be better at leisure to make an entire conquest of Judea: of which Tacitus speaking, saith, "There never was so firm a peace as now" (Annal. lib. xv.).

There is one difficulty which attends this explanation; viz. that instead of setting forth one continued "line of time," from the "going forth of the commandment to rebuild Jerusalem," to the conclusion of the events here foretold, it makes a considerable break, or interval of time, between the fulfilling one part of the prophecy and the other. Whereas the other interpretations suppose the destruction of the city and temple to run beyond the computation of the seventy weeks, and to be immediately subjoined to the death of Christ, as we see they are, ver. 26, to show what shall be the catastrophe, or final punishment, which shall attend so great a wickedness.

And for the overspreading of abominations, he shall make it desolate,] Mr. Mede translates the words thus, "And being a desolater," he shall command "over a wing of abominations" (Works, p. 407). Bishop Lloyd, with some little variation, renders them, "And upon the battlements (shall be) the idols of the desolater." They both understand by the phrase the Roman army, which is the interpretation Christ himself gives of it (Luke xxi. 20, compared with Matt. xxiv. 15). The word kenaph, translated in the English "overspreading," properly signifies a "wing," and may either signify an army, as it is used, Isa. viii. 8, or else stand for the battlements of the temple, as the Greek πτερύγεσσι, which answers to it, plainly does, Matt. iv. 5. Here the Romans, after they had set the temple on fire, placed the idolatrous ensigns of their army over against the eastern gate of the temple, and offered sacrifice to them, as Josephus expressly tells us (Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 6, edit. Hudson). The word shikutsim, "abominations," is commonly used for idols (see 1 Kings xi. 5, 7, 2 Kings xxiii. 13); and the "abomination of desolation" set upon the altar by Antiochus (1 Macc. i. 54), is explained by the idol-altar, ibid. ver. 59. So the abominations here spoken of do very properly signify the ensigns, or standards, or the Roman legions; each standard having stamped upon it the image of the tutelary god of that legion, to whom they offered sacrifice. Tacitus he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate.

calls the eagle, and the other ensigns, Propria legionum numina, the "deities which were peculiar to their legions" (Annal. lib. ii.). Tertullian's words are to the same purpose: Religio tota castrens signa veneratur, signa jurat, et Diis omnibus præponit: "All the religion of the army consists in paying divine worship to their standards, in swearing by them, and preferring them before all other deities" (Apol. cap. 16).

Even until the consummation,] Till God's indignation be accomplished, as the same sense is expressed, xi. 36.

And that determined [or which is decreed] shall be poured upon the desolate.] Compare ver. 11 of this chapter. Mr. Mede translates it, "shall continue upon the desolate," p. 709. The words briefly declare those terrible calamities which made an entire destruction of that city and people, and were executed upon them in a most dreadful manner that any nation ever suffered, and with the most evident tokens of a divine vengeance upon them, according to the relation of their own historian Josephus, who was an eye-witness of these desolations. And ever since their posterity have been dispersed all the world over, living only upon sufferance in their several dispersions, and very often exposed to grievous oppressions and persecutions, enough to have extinguished their race, unless they had been preserved by providence, on purpose to verify the truth of those prophecies which foretold these calamities: and particularly those words of Christ, which have a plain aspect upon the text before us (Luke xxi. 22—24), "These be the days of vengeance: that all things that are written may be fulfilled—for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon this people; and they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and be led away captive unto all nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the gentiles, until the times of the gentiles be fulfilled:" i. e. till the times of the fourth monarchy, spoken of ch. ii. vii. are expired (see the note upon xii. 7).

Bishop Lloyd renders the last word shomem, "desolate," in an active sense, "the desolater," or him that makes desolate: in which sense the word is plainly taken, viii. 13, xii. 11. The sense he gives of the sentence is much the same with the former: viz. that the divine vengeance shall continue upon the Jews, till it be returned upon the author of their desolations, which he interprets of the Roman government, as it was exercised under the seventh head (see Rev. xvii. 11).

Having given a particular account of the most probable expositions of this famous prophecy, I need not take any notice of Sir John Marsham's explanation of it in his Chronicus Canon, p. 568, since a learned writer, Mr. Marshal, in his Treatise upon the Seventy Weeks, lately published, hath shown it to be inconsistent with itself, as well as with the undoubted monuments both of sacred and profane history. The late author of Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, hath thought fit to mention Sir J. M.'s hypothesis with approbation: but it is to be presumed that this writer took it upon trust, without ever examining it, and was glad to find an opinion prejudicial to Christianity countenanced by so great a name.

CHAPTER X.

1 IN the third year of Cyrus king of Persia a thing was revealed unto Daniel whose name was called Belteshazzar; and the thing was true, but the time appointed was long: and he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision.

2 In those days I Daniel was mourning three full weeks.

3 I ate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth, neither did I anoint myself at all, till three whole weeks were fulfilled.

4 And in the four and twentieth day of the first month, as I was by the side of the great river, which is Hiddekel;

5 Then I lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and beheld a certain man clothed in linen, whose loins were girded with fine gold of Uphaz:

6 His body also was like the beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, and his arms and his feet like in colour to polished brass, and the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude.

7 And I Daniel alone saw the vision: for the men that were with me saw not the vision; but a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves.

8 Therefore I was left alone, and saw this

CHAP. X.

ARGUMENT.—The three following chapters contain the last vision of Daniel's prophecy, wherein the several successions, both of the Persian and Grecian monarchies, are represented, together with the wars that should be raised between the kings of Syria and Egypt under the latter monarchy, as far as the times of Antiochus Epiphanes: who being the type and forerunner of antichrist (as hath been observed upon ch. viii.) the latter part of the vision from xi. 86, seems chiefly to relate to the persecutions of the church in the times of antichrist, till its being finally cleansed from all those profanations, as the temple of Jerusalem was purified from the pollutions of Antiochus: after which we will follow that kingdom of the saints mentioned vii. 18, 27 of this prophecy.

Ver. 1. In the third year of Cyrus king of Persia] Daniel must now have been above ninety years of age; he could not be less than twenty when he was carried captive (see the Preface to this Commentary), and that was seventy-three years before the date of this vision: which was the last Daniel saw, and it is not likely he himself survived it long.

Whose name was called Belteshazzar;] See i. 7.

The thing was true,] Or certain (see ver. 21, xi. 2, and compare viii. 26, Rev. xix. 9).

But the time appointed was long:] See ver. 14, and the note upon xii. 4.

And he understood the thing,] He had a clear view of the succession of the Persian and Grecian monarchies, and of the series of the kings of Syria and Egypt under the latter of them: although the remaining parts of the vision were obscure, especially with respect to their final event (see xii. 8).

Ver. 2. I Daniel was mourning] The reason of Daniel's fasting and mourning seems to be, because the adversaries of the Jews began to obstruct the building of the temple (see Ezra iv. 4, 5). This made Daniel deprecate God's judgments in so solemn a manner.

Three full weeks.] The Hebrew reads, "Three weeks of days." So we read of "a month of days," Gen. xxix. 14, Numb. xi. 20, where the English reads, "a whole month." But the phrase may be used here to distinguish them from the weeks of years prophesied of in the ninth chapter.

Ver. 3. I ate no pleasant bread, &c.] This is expressed by "chastening himself," ver. 11, and by "afflicting the soul" with fasting, Lev. xvi. 29, xxiii. 27, Isa. lviii. 3.

Neither did I anoint myself] As the Persians used to do constantly (see Plin. Nat. Hist. lib. xiii. ch. 1).

Vol. III.—E5

Ver. 4. In the four and twentieth day of the first month,] According to the Jewish computation, which was the month Nisan, beginning about our 10th of March. The commentators observe from hence, that Daniel's fast fell upon the time of the paschal solemnity; and therefore the Jews did not think themselves obliged to keep their solemn festivals anywhere but in their own country, and at the place appointed by God for that purpose.

I was by the side of the great river, which is Hiddekel;] The same with Tigris (see Gen. ii. 14). This was near Shushan, where Daniel probably resided (see the note upon viii. 2).

Ver. 5. I lifted up mine eyes,] Being by the river side in a deep contemplation, I looked up and saw a person appear before me, placed in the air above the waters, or hovering over them (see xii. 6, and compare Rev. x. 2, 5).

Behold a certain man clothed in linen,] He appeared in the habit of a high-priest (see Exod. xxviii. 4, 39, xxix. 5). The description St. John gives of Christ as high-priest of the church, Rev. i. 15, seems to be taken from this place of Daniel, which proves that the person here described can be no other than the Son of God: which may be farther confirmed by comparing the person described here, and xii. 5, 6, with Rev. x. 2, 5, 6, who is there represented as "setting his right foot upon the sea, and his left upon the land," as sovereign Lord of both elements (compare Matt. xxviii. 19).

Concerning the "fine gold of Uphaz," see the note upon Jer. x. 9.

Ver. 6. Like the beryl,] Of an azure, or sky-colour, mixed with a bright green (see Ezek. i. 16).

His arms and his feet like—to polished brass,] Of a bright flaming colour (see Ps. civ. 4, Ezek. i. 7, Rev. i. 15, x. 1).

And the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude,] Great and powerful (compare Ezek. i. 24, Rev. i. 15, x. 3).

Ver. 7. A great quaking fell upon them, &c.] They were seized with such terror and astonishment, that they made what haste they could to get out of the reach of such an amazing sight (compare Acts ix. 7).

Ver. 8. There remained no strength in me:] I fell into a swoon or fainting fit (see ver. 9).

My comeliness was turned in me into corruption,] Or, "my vigour," as the margin reads to a better sense. So the word is used Prov. v. 9, where our translation renders it, "thine honour," but it should be translated "thy strength," or vigour, as appears great vision, and there remained no strength in me: for my comeliness was turned in me into corruption, and I retained no strength.

9 Yet heard I the voice of his words: and when I heard the voice of his words, then was I in a deep sleep on my face, and my face toward the ground.

10 ¶ And, behold, an hand touched me, which set me upon my knees and upon the palms of my hands.

11 And he said unto me, O Daniel, a man greatly beloved, understand the words that I speak un-by comparing that verse with the parallel text, Prov. xxxi. 3.

Ver. 9.] The very sound of his words put me into a fainting fit (see viii. 18).

Ver. 10.] This seems to be a distinct appearance from that described ver. 5, not so terrible, but nearer approaching to a human form (see ver. 16): and may probably be supposed to be the angel Gabriel, who had been sent to Daniel upon the like occasions (see viii. 17, 18, ix. 21). The Logos, or Son of God, in the representations made of him in the Old Testament, usually appears with a retinue of angels attending him (see Gen. xviii. 2). And in this prophecy (viii. 13, &c.), we have a vision of several angels attending upon one principal one (compare xii. 5). The same retinue of angels may be observed in Zechariah's visions, i. 8—10, 12, 13, ii. 3, 4, 8, iii. 2, 4, 7. The angel who now appeared to Daniel, putting forth his hand, raised him from the ground, and restored him to his former strength in some degree (see viii. 18, ix. 21, Jer. i. 9, Ezek. ii. 2, Rev. i. 17).

Ver. 11. O Daniel, a man greatly beloved,] See ix. 23.

Understand the words that I speak unto thee—for unto thee am I now sent.] Though this angel was inferior to that eminent person described ver. 5, yet he being the angel that informs Daniel of all those matters contained in the following chapter, and the beginning of the twelfth (the man clothed in linen, speaking nothing but what is related xii. 7), he may properly take the whole business of the vision upon himself, as he does here and in the following verse.

Ver. 12. And I am come for thy words.] To give an answer to thy requests, by the direction of that divine person (ver. 5), upon whom I attend (compare viii. 15—17, ix. 23).

From the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand, &c.] As God graciously answered those prayers thou madest in thy former humiliation, occasioned by thy searching out the time allotted for the captivity of thy people (see ix. 2, 22, 23): so now God is pleased, in answer to thy repeated humiliation and solicitous concern for thy people, to send me to inform thee what shall be their state and condition in after times.

Ver. 13. But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me] The princes of the kingdom of Persia and Grecia, mentioned here and ver. 20, are generally supposed to be the guardian or tutelar angels of those several countries. That there were such tutelar angels, not only over private persons (see Acts xii. 15), but likewise over provinces and kingdoms, was an opinion generally received. The four spirits mentioned Zech. vi. 5, seem to be the guardian angels of the four great empires. Every heathen nation thought their country under the peculiar protection of some tutelar deity: and they looked upon the God of the Jews to be no other than that deity who presided over that nation (see 1 Sam. iv. 8, 1 Kings to thee, and stand upright: for unto thee am I now sent. And when he had spoken this word unto me, I stood trembling.

12 Then said he unto me, Fear not, Daniel: for from the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand, and to chasten thyself before thy God, thy words were heard, and I am come for thy words.

13 But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days: but, lo, Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me; and I remained there with the kings of Persia.

xx. 23, 28, 2 Kings xviii. 33—35, Isa. x. 10, 11). This notion was very much countenanced by a passage in Deuteronomy xxxii. 8, where the Septuagint translate the text thus: "When the most High divided the nations their inheritance—he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the angels of God, for the Lord's portion is his people." As if the sense were, That the government of other nations was committed to so many tutelar angels, whereas Israel was under the immediate care and government of God himself. The opinion I have been hitherto explaining supposes the presiding angels here mentioned to have been good angels; from whence it follows, that the occasion of their contention was because neither party was as yet acquainted with the divine will, to which they were already to submit (see this point largely treated of by Petavius, Dogm. Theolog. tom. iii. de Angelis, cap. 8).

But others suppose those princes or angels who opposed Michael and Gabriel to be evil spirits, such as are described by St. Paul under the names of the rulers of the darkness of this world, having their residence in the lower regions of the air (Eph. ii. 2, vi. 12). These evil spirits are sometimes represented as part of the heavenly host, both in respect to their original station, and because these are the instruments of providence, and have a command over the inferior world, as far as God thinks fit to permit (see 1 Kings xxii. 19, &c. Job i. 6, 12, &c.). They are likewise represented as accusers of good men before God, and as aggravating their faults, in order to have them delivered over to them, as the executioners of God's judgments (see Job i. 11, ii. 5, Zech. iii. 1, Rev. xii. 10). If we follow this opinion, the contest here will be of the same nature with that of the angel and Satan, Zech. iii. 1, and with the dispute that Michael the archangel had with the devil "about the body of Moses," mentioned in St. Jude's Epistle, ver. 9.

The prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days:] The Persians upon the solicitation of the Jews' enemies, had put a stop to the building of the temple, all the time of Daniel's humiliation (see the note upon ver. 2). And the tutelar genius of that empire still insisted that they might be kept under those hardships, while the angel Gabriel was doing them all the good offices he could. In like manner, Satan is represented as eagerly opposing the rebuilding the temple, and the restoration of the Jewish nation, Zech. iii. 1, 2.

But, lo, Michael, one of the chief princes,] Michael is styled an archangel by St. Jude, ver. 9, and "a great prince that stands up for the children of thy people," xii. 1 of this prophecy. Christ himself, as he is often represented under the character of an angel, so he is described under the name of Michael, Rev. xii. 7. But in this and the parallel texts of Daniel, the name rather denotes some principal angel, 14 Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days: for yet the vision is for many days.

15 And when he had spoken such words unto me, I set my face toward the ground, and I became dumb.

16 And, behold, one like the similitude of the sons of men touched my lips: then I opened my mouth, and spake, and said unto him that stood before me, O my lord, by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me, and I have retained no strength.

17 For how can the servant of this my lord talk with this my lord? for as for me, straightway there remained no strength in me, neither is there breath left in me.

whom the Jews looked upon as the guardian angel of their nation (see ver. 21. and xii. 1).

And I remained there with the kings of Persia.] I still continued to oppose any motions the tutelar genii of Persia might make in prejudice of the Jews. The word king is equivalent in Hebrew to prince or governor (see vii. 17, Jer. xxv. 20, &c., 1 Kings xxii. 47).

Ver. 14.] Daniel was solicitous about the present state of his people (see ver. 2). The vision informs him, first, that the empire shall be translated from the Persians to the Greeks (xi. 3), and then what should be the condition of the Jews under Alexander's successors, the kings of Syria and Egypt: one of which, viz. Antiochus Epiphanes, should be a figure of antichrist, who should disturb the state of the Christian church in the latter times of the world (see ver. 1, and compare xii. 4, 8).

Ver. 15.] I was perfectly astonished, and deprived of all sense (see ver. 16, 17, and compare viii. 18).

Ver. 16. One like—the sons of men] One that appeared in a human form, the same angel that touched me with his hand before (see ver. 10), restored my speech to me, which my fright and concern had quite deprived me of.

And said unto him that stood before me,] Compare viii. 15. This angel stood upon the earth near Daniel, not above the waters of the river, as the person did whose appearance was so glorious: ver. 5.

O my lord, &c.] See ver. 8.

Ver. 17. How can the servant of this my lord talk with this my lord?] How can thy servant, a poor mortal man, maintain a discourse with a person of your rank and dignity (see Noldius, p. 353)? The words may be translated thus, "How can the servant of this my lord, talk with that my lord?" i. e. with the other person that first appeared to me with so majestic a presence; at whose sight I was perfectly confounded (ver. 5, 9): the pronoun ach, when it is doubled, often signifies two distinct persons or things (see Exod. xiv. 20, Eccles. vi. 3, vii. 14, 18, Isa. vi. 3).

18 Then there came again and touched me one like the appearance of a man, and he strengthened me, 19 And said, O man greatly beloved, fear not: peace be unto thee, be strong, yea, be strong. And when he had spoken unto me, I was strengthened, and said, Let my lord speak; for thou hast strengthened me.

20 Then said he, Knowest thou wherefore I come unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia: and when I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come.

21 But I will shew thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth: and there is none that holdeth with me in these things, but Michael your prince.

Ver. 19. O man greatly beloved, fear not: peace be unto thee,] Thou needest not be under such terrible apprehensions, as if this vision did portend thee some mischief (see Judg. vi. 22, xiii. 22); for it is a peculiar token of God's favour to thee (see ver. 11).

Ver. 20. Knowest thou wherefore I come unto thee?] viz. "To make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days" (ver. 14).

Now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia:] Or, "I shall again fight," or contend, "with the prince of Persia:" in which sense the verb shub, return, is often used (see ix. 25).

When I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come.] When I am gone forth from the divine presence the tutelar angel of the Grecian empire will appear in the court of heaven, and offer his reasons for translating the empire from the Persians to the Greeks, that the Jews may enjoy the benefits of their dominion: as a government that will be more favourable to them than the Persian emperors were. Alexander and some of his successors bestowed many favours upon the Jews, as may be seen in Josephus's Antiq. lib. xi. cap. ult. lib. xii. cap. 2, 3.

Ver. 21. I will shew thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth:] Or, "In the writing of truth:" i. e. what is certain and irrevocable. God's decrees are spoken of as if they were committed to writing, and registered in a book (see Deut. xxxii. 34, Ps. lvi. 8, Isa. lxxv. 6, Mall. iii. 16).

There is none that holdeth with me in these things, but Michael your prince.] None of the guardian or tutelary angels, who have the care and presidency of other nations committed to them, join with me in defending the cause of the Jewish nation, but Michael your prince and protector (see xii. 1). St. Jerome, in his Commentary upon the thirteenth verse, supposes the prince of Persia to oppose the Jews upon account of their sins, which reason may be applied to other guardian angels or ministering spirits.

CHAPTER XI.

1 ALSO I in the first year of Darius the Mede, even I stood to confirm and to strengthen him.

CHAP. XI.

See the Argument of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 1.] This verse should have been joined to the last chapter: the angel adds, that as he now joins with Michael in defending the cause of the

2 And now will I shew thee the truth. Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Per-

Jewish nation; so, at the time of the overthrow of the Babylonish empire, he assisted Michael in advancing Darius to the succession, which was the occasion of restoring the Jewish captivity. The word him may relate either to Michael or Darius, and the sense, taking it either way, is much the same.

sia; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all: and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia.

3 And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will.

4 And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven; and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he ruled:

Ver. 2. Will I shew thee the truth.] What is contained "in the scripture," or writing "of truth," x. 21. Or, I will show thee the succession of the Persian and Grecian empire in plain and naked truth, not in symbolical or figurative representations, as it was shown before, ch. viii.

There shall stand up yet three kings in Persia;] After Cyrus, shall succeed Cambyses, Smerdis, and Darius Hystaspes. So Ezra mentions two kings, whom he calls Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes (names which were common to most of the Persian kings in the Jewish history), who reigned between Cyrus and Darius Hystaspes (Ezra iv. 6, 7).

The fourth shall be far richer than they all:] This plainly mean Xerxes, who brought together an army of above four millions, according to Herodotus's account: of eight millions, as others say, to overrun the whole country of Greece. These wars, carried on by Xerxes's successors, ended at last in the conquest of the Persian monarchy by Alexander the Great. Upon this account the angel passes over the rest of the Persian kings; and proceeds immediately to relate the successes of Alexander: it being the chief design of the former part of this vision to foretell the translation of the empire from the Persians to the Greeks (see x. 20). St. Jerome rightly observes upon the fifth verse of this chapter, "That it was not the design of the scripture to give us a historical narrative of the actions of heathen princes any farther than the affairs of the Jewish nation were concerned in them." In like manner, at the thirty-sixth verse, the angel breaks off the succession of the Syrian kings after Antiochus, to describe antichrist, of whom the former was the type and forerunner. [So viii. 9, the prophet passes over all the successors of Alexander to Antiochus Epiphanes, whose reign had a particular influence upon the Jewish affairs.]

Ver. 3.] Compare ver. 16. This denotes Alexander the Great, whose success was so uninterrupted, that nobody was able to put a stop to the progress of his victories (see viii. 5).

Ver. 4. When he shall stand up,] When he shall be in the height of his prosperity.

His kingdom shall be broken,] See viii. 8.

Not to his posterity,] Alexander had a brother, Arideus, and two sons, Alexander and Hercules: these were all cut off in a few years after his death, to make way for his generals, who divided his empire among themselves.

Nor according to his dominion which he ruled:] They did not immediately take upon them the title of kings (see Dr. Prideaux, ad an. A. C. 301); and his dominion being divided, lost much of that strength and power which the empire had when it was united in the person of Alexander (see viii. 22).

His kingdom shall be plucked up,] Alexander's four great successors were Ptolemy, Cassander, Lysimachus, and Seleucus (see the note upon viii. 8); but others beside them came in for a share of his dominions, such as Eumenes, Philotas, and others.

5 ¶ And the king of the south shall be strong, and one of his princes; and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion.

6 And in the end of years they shall join themselves together; for the king's daughter of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement: but he shall not retain the

The word translated plucked up, is the same as rooted up, or destroyed, and is opposed to planting, or making to thrive; Jer. i. 10, xxiv. 6, xxxi. 28, or the phrase may allude to the feathers of a bird being plucked and scattered abroad (compare vii. 4).

Ver. 5. The king of the south,] By the "king of the south" in this and the following verses, is meant the king of Egypt; and by the "king of the north," the king of Assyria. These two kings came at length to have the principal share of Alexander's dominions, and make the greatest figure among his successors. But the reason why they are only mentioned here is because they only were concerned in the affairs of the Jews: Judæa bordering upon each of their dominions, and sometimes belonging to one, and sometimes to the other of those princes. The "king of the south," mentioned in this verse, denotes Ptolemy the first, the son of Lagus, called, by way of distinction, Ptolemy Soter. The text saith of him, that he should be strong: for he had all Egypt and the adjacent parts of Lybia under his dominion, besides Palestine, Cælo-Syria, and most of the maritime provinces of the lesser Asia.

One of his princes; and [or even] he shall be strong above him,] Another of the successors of Alexander, who took upon them the style of kings, or princes (see note on ver. 4). This was Seleucus Nicator, the first king of the north, or of Syria; who, by the conquest of Lysimachus king of Thrace, and Demetrius king of Macedon, obtained the name of Nicator, i. e. conqueror.

His dominion shall be a great dominion.] He had under his dominion all the countries of the east, from Mount Taurus to the river Indus: and from thence westward to the Ægean sea; whereupon Appianus the historian reckons him the most potent of all Alexander's successors.

Ver. 6. In the end of years they shall join themselves together;] In process of time the successors of these two kings, viz. Ptolemy Philadelphus, the son of the former Ptolemy, and Antiochus Theus, the grandson of Seleucus Nicator, shall enter into a league or confederacy with each other.

For the king's daughter of the south] This league shall be concluded by the marriage of Berenice, daughter to Ptolemy Philadelphus, with Antiochus Theus king of Syria, although he had another wife Laodice, and two children by her, Seleucus Callinicus and Antiochus.

She shall not retain the power of the arm;] She shall not be able to keep her power or interest with Antiochus; for as soon as her father Ptolemy was dead, Antiochus divorced her, and recalled his former wife Laodice and her children.

Neither shall he stand, nor his arm:] Nor shall Antiochus himself long survive, for Laodice, being jealous of his fickle temper, procured him to be poisoned, and concealed his death till her son Seleucus had secured the succession.

She shall be given up, and they that brought her,] Berenice, after she had shut herself up in the asy-power of the arm ; neither shall he stand, nor his arm : but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times.

7 But out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his estate, which shall come with an army, and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north, and shall deal against them, and shall prevail :

8 And shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, with their princes, and with their precious vessels of silver and of gold ; and he shall continue more years than the king of the north.

9 So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom, and shall return into his own land.

lum, or place of sanctuary, at Daphne, was betrayed into her enemies' hands, and basely murdered with all those that attended her out of Egypt.

He that begat her.] If we follow this translation, see the explication of it in the next note : but the marginal reading gives the better sense, He whom she brought forth ; her son who was slain with her ; the Hebrew, yoled, is in the form of the participle active ; but the same form is sometimes used in a passive sense ; of which we may produce an instance from ix. 27 of this prophecy, where the word shqmem is rendered, in a passive sense, desolate, by most interpreters.

He that strengthened her in these times.] Her father, who should have supported her with his interest under these difficulties, but died himself a little before.

All these particulars, and what are mentioned in the following notes, are fully related in the historical accounts of those times, as may be seen by those who will consult the authors referred to by St. Jerome, in his commentaries upon Daniel, and Dr. Prideaux, in his second part of his Script. Connexion.

Ver. 7.] One of the same stock or original with Berenice ; viz. her brother, Ptolemy Euergetes, shall succeed his father in the government of Egypt, and shall revenge his sister's quarrel, by invading the frontiers or territories (see ver. 10) of Seleucus, and prevail against him.

Ver. 8. And shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, &c.] St. Jerome tells us out of writers extant in his time, that Ptolemy made himself master of all Syria and Cilicia, and passing the Euphrates, conquered as far as Babylon ; and carried back into Egypt vast plunder from all the conquered provinces together with two thousand five hundred Egyptian idols, which Cambyses upon his conquering Egypt had carried into Persia. This action of his so highly obliged the Egyptians, that they gave him the title of Euergetes, or, the Benefactor.

He shall continue more years than the king of the north.] Ptolemy outlived Seleucus the space of four years.

Ver. 9.] Ptolemy shall return home without molestation, and quietly enjoy what he had gotten by his victories.

Ver. 10. His sons shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude] The sons of Seleucus, Seleucus Ceraunus, and Antiochus, called afterward the Great, shall assemble a mighty army, in order to recover all that their father had lost.

One shall certainly come, and overflow, and pass through.] Antiochus shall certainly overrun Judea and Cælo-Syria, with other provinces belonging to the king of Egypt ; taking the advantage of Ptolemy 10 But his sons shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces : and one shall certainly come, and overflow, and pass through : then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress.

11 And the king of the south shall be moved with choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north : and he shall set forth a great multitude ; but the multitude shall be given into his hand.

12 And when he hath taken away the multitude, his heart shall be lifted up ; and he shall cast down many ten thousands : but he shall not be strengthened by it.

13 For the king of the north shall return, and Euergetes's death, and the succession of his son Ptolemy Philopator, a weak and profligate prince : under whose reign he attempted the recovery of Syria. We may observe the text here speaks only of a single person, viz. Antiochus, for his brother Seleucus died in the beginning of this enterprise, having scarce reigned three years. The devastations of an army are fitly compared to inundations (see ver. 22, 40, and ix. 26).

Then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress.] Or, "He shall again be stirred up," &c. (see note upon ix. 25). At the spring of the next year he shall take the field again, and encamp at Raphia, a frontier town on the borders of Egypt (see the history of this engagement in Polybius, lib. v. p. 573, edit. 8vo).

Ver. 11. The king of the south shall be moved with choler.] Ptolemy Philopator, the young king of Egypt, being enraged at the attempts of Antiochus, shall come with a great army to encounter him.

He shall set forth a great multitude.] If we understand the words of Ptolemy's army, that consisted of seventy thousand foot, five thousand horse, and seventy-three elephants ; Antiochus's was little inferior to his, for he had sixty-two thousand foot, six thousand horse, and sixty-two elephants.

The multitude shall be given into his hand.] The army of Antiochus was discomfited by Ptolemy, ten thousand being slain, and four thousand taken prisoners. The author of the third book of Maccabees ascribes this victory to the passionate importunity of Arsinoe, Ptolemy's sister, who ran about the army with her hair about her shoulders, and by promises and entreaties engaged the soldiers to fight with more than ordinary resolution.

Ver. 12. His heart shall be lifted up ;] So far as to offer to force his passage into the holiest part of the Jewish temple, when he came to Jerusalem to offer sacrifices there, after his victory : the story is related at large in the forementioned third book of the Maccabees, ch. i.

And he shall cast down many ten thousands : but he shall not be strengthened by it.] Or, "Though he shall cast down—he shall not be strengthened by it." He shall content himself with recovering the provinces of Cælo-Syria and Palestine, and make no farther advantages of his victory ; being willing to agree to a peace, that he might securely follow his pleasures (see Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. ad ann. A. C. 217).

Ver. 13. For the king of the north—shall certainly come after certain years with a great army] Fourteen years after the ending of the former war, upon the death of Philopator, and the succeeding of his infant son Ptolemy Epiphanes, Antiochus the king of the north shall return into Cælo-Syria and Palestine for shall set forth a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come after certain years with a great army and with much riches.

14 And in those times there shall many stand up against the king of the south: also the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision; but they shall fall.

15 So the king of the north shall come, and cast up a mount, and take the most fenced cities: and the arms of the south shall not withstand, neither his chosen people, neither shall there be any strength to withstand.

16 But he that cometh against him shall do the recovery of those provinces, and shall bring with him a greater army than he had in the former war, the same which he brought out of the east, at his late return from thence.

After certain years] The Hebrew reads, "At the end of times, even years:" which expression confirms the interpretation given before of the word times in this prophecy (see the note on iv. 16).

With much riches.] With abundant supply of all necessary provisions for an army: and especially with beasts of burden for removing their baggage: for that is the proper sense of the word recush.

Ver. 14. In those times there shall many stand up against the king of the south:] Antiochus, king of Syria, and Philip, king of Macedon, entered into a league, to divide the dominions of Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, being then an infant of six years of age. Agathoclea, his father's concubine, and her brother Agathocles, who managed everything under Ptolemy Philopator, were framing projects to keep the regency in their own hands during the minority of this prince. And Scopas, one of his generals, some time afterward formed a design of usurping the sovereignty over Egypt.

The robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision; but they shall fall.] The apostates from the Jewish law shall exalt themselves under the favour of the king of Egypt and his ministers, to accomplish what is said in the writings of the prophets concerning the persecutions that should befall God's people, and the punishments that should at length overtake those that forsake the truth. These apostates accordingly did fall, and were cut off by Antiochus; for in the ninth year of Epiphanes's reign, Antiochus made himself master of Jerusalem, and cut off or drove from thence all those Jews that were of Ptolemy's party, and bestowed particular favours upon those that persevered in the observance of the law. Josephus, Antiq. lib. xii. ch. iii. gives us a copy of Antiochus's decree in favour of their temple, and the service therein performed, and to secure it from being profaned.

Ver. 15. The king of the north shall come,—and take the most fenced cities:] Antiochus having vanquished the king of Egypt's army under Scopas at Paneas, near the fountain-head of the river Jordan, he besieged and took first Zidon and Gaza, then all the other cities of that district, viz. Abila, Samaria, and Gadara: and afterward became master of the whole country. The word soltelah, translated, a mount, does likewise signify battering engines for throwing stones, and such-like offensive artillery (see 2 Kings xix. 32, Jer. xxxii. 24, xxxiii. 4).

The arms of the south shall not withstand, neither his chosen people.] Neither the king of Egypt's best generals, such as Scopas and others that came to relieve him, nor his choicest troops, shall prevail or be able to withstand Antiochus.

according to his own will, and none shall stand before him: and he shall stand in the glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed.

17 He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, and upright ones with him; thus shall he do: and he shall give him the daughter of women, corrupting her: but she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him.

18 After this shall he turn his face unto the isles, and shall take many: but a prince for his own behalf shall cause the reproach offered by him to cease; without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him.

Ver. 16. He that cometh against him shall do according to his own will,] Nobody being able to oppose him in Celo-Syria or Palestine (compare viii. 4, 7, and ver. 36 of this chapter).

He shall stand in the glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed.] He shall make himself master of Judea (see note upon viii. 9), which shall be consumed by the foraging and plundering of his soldiers; Jerusalem itself receiving great damages during the siege of the garrison which Scopas left there: as appears by Antiochus's decree for repairing the ruins of the city, in Josephus, ubi supra. In the contests between the kings of Syria and Egypt, Judea lying in the middle between them, whoever were conquerors, that country was sure to suffer: Josephus compares its condition to that of a ship in a storm, which is beaten by the waves on both sides (Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 3, init.). The Greek interpreter renders the former part of the sentence, "And he shall stand in the land of Sabi:" which Dr. Moore in his notes upon the place supposes to be a name of the God of Israel: and I have offered some arguments to support that conjecture, in the notes upon Jer. iii. 19.

Ver. 17. He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom,] Antiochus will likewise design to invade Egypt with all his forces, and make an entire conquest of it.

And upright ones with him;] Or rather, And he shall make agreements with him; yesharim here probably signifying the same as mescharim does ver. 6, i. e. he shall make proposals of concluding a marriage between his own daughter Cleopatra and king Ptolemy, to be consummated when they come of age: which offer made by Eucles of Rhodes was accepted, and a contract fully agreed between them.

Thus shall he do:] Or, "He shall succeed," as the word is taken, ver. 28, 32. He shall succeed in this his proposal.

Give him the daughter of women, corrupting her:] In making this proposal of marriage, his intent was that she should betray her husband to him, and by that means become master of Egypt. She is called "the daughter of women," κατ' ἐσοχην, by way of excellence, either upon the account of her quality, or else because of her great beauty.

But she shall not stand on his side,] When she was married to Ptolemy, she forsook the interest of her father, and embraced that of her husband: and we find her joining with him in an embassy to the Romans, to congratulate the victory they had obtained over her own father, as Dr. Prideaux observes out of Livy, lib. xxxvii. (see Script. Connex. par. ii. ad ann. C. 187).

Ver. 18. After this shall he turn his face unto the isles, and shall take many:] Antiochus shall set out a great fleet for reducing the lesser Asia, which sailing along the coasts of Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, and Caria, took a great many of the maritime cities of 19 Then he shall turn his face toward the fort of his own land: but he shall stumble and fall, and not be found.

20 Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom; but within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle.

21 And in his estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom: but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries.

those provinces, and the islands adjoining. All countries lying upon the sea-coasts are called islands, in the Hebrew dialect, as hath been observed in the notes upon Isa. xi. 11.

But a prince for his own behalf shall cause the reproach offered by him to cease, &c.] Or, "But a prince shall cause to cease his [i. e. Antiochus's] reproach against him: moreover, he shall cause his reproach to return upon him" (compare Hos. xii. 14). The particle bilti, translated without, signifies likewise moreover (see Noldius, p. 202). Lucius Scipio, the Roman consul, made the reproach which Antiochus had offered to the Romans by that invasion, to return upon his own head, by overthrowing him in battle at mount Sipylus, and forcing him to quit all the conquests he had made in the lesser Asia. From this great victory, whereby Asia was delivered out of the hands of Antiochus, this Scipio had the surname of Asiaticus: this action is at large related by Livy, in the thirty-seventh book of his history.

Ver. 19. He shall turn his face toward the fort of his own land: but he shall stumble] After this great defeat, Antiochus returned back to Antioch, the chief seat and fortress of his kingdom. From whence going into the eastern provinces, to raise the money he was by agreement to pay the Romans, and attempting to rob the temple at Elymais, for that purpose, he was slain there, and never returned again into Syria.

Ver. 20. Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom:] Seleucus Philopator, the son of Antiochus, shall succeed in the kingdom of Syria (compare ver. 7). His father by the treaty of peace was obliged to pay a thousand talents for twelve years together to the Romans: and it was the main business of his son's reign to raise this money upon his subjects. His necessities put him upon offering to seize the treasures which were laid up in the temple at Jerusalem; for which attempt his treasurer Heliodorus, was miraculously punished, as the story is told at large, 2 Macc. iii. 4, &c.

Within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle.] Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. Script. Connex. at the end of the second book, translates this sentence, "Within few years he shall be destroyed:" the word yamin, days, often signifying years: which sense suits better with the event here foretold. For Seleucus reigned but eleven years, which may properly be called a few, in comparison of the thirty-seven years of his father's reign: and he came to his end neither by war abroad, nor by a sedition at home, but was poisoned by Heliodorus his treasurer, who designed to usurp the kingdom to himself, as Appian relates it.

Ver. 21. In his estate [or place] shall stand up a vile person.] This is a description of Antiochus Epiphanes, the great persecutor of the Jewish nation and religion. He is called here a vile person, not for any 22 And with the arms of a flood shall they be overflowed from before him, and shall be broken; yea, also the prince of the covenant.

23 And after the league made with him he shall work deceitfully: for he shall come up, and shall become strong with a small people.

24 He shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places of the province; and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers; he shall scatter among them the prey, and spoil, and riches: yea, and he shall want of wit or parts, but for the extravagance of his life and actions, which made many doubt whether he had more of the fool or the madman in him: so, instead of Epiphanes, the Illustrious, they called him Epimanes, the Madman (see the Fragments of the twenty-sixth book of Polybius, p. 1492, of the Leyden edition).

To whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom:] The right of succession did belong to Demetrius, the son of Seleucus Philopator, and nephew to Antiochus: but he being sent a hostage to Rome by his father, Antiochus took advantage of his absence, and by courting Eumenes king of Pergamus, and Attalus his brother, with flattering speeches and great promises of friendship and assistance against the Romans, prevailed with them to stand by him against the usurper Heliodorus, and so came peaceably into the possession of the kingdom.

Ver. 22. With the arms of a flood shall they be overflowed] Compare ver. 10. Antiochus, by the assistance of Eumenes and Attalus, shall vanquish all the forces that opposed his pretensions, both those raised by the usurper Heliodorus, and those which Cleopatra, mother to Ptolemy Philometor, had got together to assist her son's right, as being nephew to the deceased king Seleucus.

The prince of the covenant.] Onias the high-priest, as several interpret it, whom they suppose to be meant by "the prince of the host," viii. 11, where the prophet speaks of the persecution of the Jews, of which the same Antiochus was the author. This Onias was deposed and banished by him, and afterward murdered by one of his lieutenants (2 Macc. iv. 10, 24). But the following verse inclines me to think, that Ptolemy Philometor is meant here, for he it is with whom the league there mentioned is made; and he was the principal person that opposed Antiochus chiefly in his pretension to Cælo-Syria and Palestine: in whose name a war was carried on against Antiochus, the success of which is foretold in the following verses.

Ver. 23. After the league made with him he shall work deceitfully.] This league was made between Ptolemy Philometor and Antiochus, in the lifetime of Cleopatra his sister, and mother of Ptolemy. But when the king of Egypt's ministers demanded the restitution of Cælo-Syria and Palestine, as belonging to the king of Egypt, by virtue of the marriage-articles between Ptolemy Epiphanes and Cleopatra, Antiochus, without any regard to the league he had made with Philometor his nephew, marched his army towards the frontiers of Egypt, and having obtained a victory over the Egyptian army in a battle fought between mount Casius and Pelusium, he the next year made himself master of the greatest part of Egypt, Philometor himself falling into his hands: whom he pretended to take care of as his nephew, and to manage his affairs as his tutor and guardian. But this belongs to his second expedition, mentioned ver. 25.

Shall become strong with a small people.] His forces then were but small, as St. Jerome observes out of Sutorius, a historian extant in his time: at least forecast his devices against the strong-holds, even for a time.

25 And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the south with a great army; and the king of the south shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army; but he shall not stand: for they shall forecast devices against him.

26 Yea, they that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow: and many shall fall down slain.

27 And both these kings' hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table; in comparison of those he brought with him in his second expedition (see the note upon ver. 25).

Ver. 24. He shall enter peaceably even upon the fat-test places] By his clemency towards the Egyptians, and civil treatment of Philometor, he shall succeed in his attempts upon Egypt, beyond all his predecessors, the former kings of Syria: viz. Antiochus Thesus, Seleucus Callinicus, and Antiochus surnamed the Great, whose actions are specified in the foregoing part of the chapter: all these had a design of getting Egypt into their hands, but none of them ever succeeded so far in the attempts upon it as Epiphanes: who miserably plundered the whole country, and divided the riches of it among his followers (see I Macc. i. 19, St. Jerome in his notes upon the place, and Athenæus, Deipnosophist. lib. v. and x.). Epiphanes was in himself of a profuse and prodigal temper, as the author of the first book of Maccabees, iii. 30, and several other historians agree in giving his character, from whence he gained the name of Munificent and Liberal, as Josephus informs us, Antiq. lib. xii. cap. 11.

He shall forecast his devices against the strong-holds.] He shall not only seize upon the richest parts of Egypt, but shall likewise make himself master of the chief places of strength in that country, keeping Pelusium in his hands, which was the key of Egypt, and laying siege unto Alexandria.

Even for a time.] See ver. 27.

Ver. 25.] The preparations here described belong to Antiochus's second expedition into Egypt, as the author of the second book of Maccabees rightly calls it, v. 1, when he invaded that country with great forces both by sea and land, as that expedition is described, I Macc. i. 17, 18, where the historian adds, that "Ptolemy fled from him, and many of his army were wounded to death: thus they got the strong cities in the land of Egypt, and he took the spoils thereof." After which victory Ptolemy Philometor surrendered himself into Antiochus's hands, as was observed before: whereupon the Alexandrians set up his brother upon the throne, whom they surnamed Euergetes.

Ibid. and ver. 26. But he shall not stand:—they that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him.] The ill success of Philometor's expedition was chiefly owing to the maladministration of Lenæus, Eulaeus, and other ministers and officers employed under him, and to the treachery of Ptolemy Macron, who forsook Philometor's interest, and went over to Antiochus.

His army shall overflow:] The arms of Antiochus shall overrun the whole kingdom of Egypt, like a sudden inundation (see ver. 10, 22).

Ver. 27. Both these kings' hearts shall be to do mischief.] These two kings shall meet at Memphis, and frequently eat at the same table as friends; Antiochus pretending to take care of the interests of his nephew Philometor, especially after the Alexandrians had proclaimed his brother Euergetes king: and Philometor seemingly confiding in his uncle's protection.

but it shall not prosper: for yet the end shall be at the time appointed.

28 Then shall he return into his land with great riches; and his heart shall be against the holy covenant; and he shall do exploits, and return to his own land.

29 At the time appointed he shall return, and come toward the south; but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter.

30 ¶ For the ships of Chittim shall come against him: therefore he shall be grieved, and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant: so shall he do; he shall even return,

But herein they both designed to impose upon each other; Antiochus's design being to seize the kingdom of Egypt to himself, and Philometor's to disappoint those designs of his, by coming to an agreement with Euergetes and the Alexandrians. So this pretended friendship broke out into open war, wherein Antiochus subdued all the country as far as Memphis, and marched to Alexandria to besiege that city.

For yet the end shall be at the time appointed.] These wars and calamities are not yet come to an end, but shall be determined at the time of God's appointment (see ver. 29, 35, 36, viii. 19).

Ver. 28. Then shall he return into his land with great riches;] Having taken the spoils of Egypt, I Macc. i. 19 (see the note upon ver. 24). This return of Antiochus into his own dominions, is the same which is again mentioned at the end of the verse: so the sense might be more clearly expressed thus: "Then shall he return into his land with great riches, having had his heart stirred up against the holy covenant, and having finished his designs, he shall even return into his own land."

His heart shall be against the holy covenant;] While Antiochus was in Egypt, a false report was spread over Judea that he was dead, whereupon Jason with his party made himself master of Jerusalem, in order to regain the office of high-priest, from which he had been turned out by the fraud of his brother Menelaus. Upon this, Antiochus, supposing the whole nation had revolted from him, marched with all haste out of Egypt into Judea to quell this rebellion: and taking Jerusalem by force of arms, he slew forty thousand of the inhabitants in three day's time, profaned the temple, and took away all its ornaments and treasures (see I Macc. i. 20, 23, 2 Macc. iv. 23, 24, v. 11, 20).

He shall do exploits, and return to his own land.] Or, having finished his designs, he shall return, &c. (see the last note but one, and compare ver. 30, 32, viii. 12). After having satisfied his revenge upon the Jews, he shall return to Antioch, the chief seat of his empire, with the spoils of the temple at Jerusalem (besides those of Egypt, amounting to eighteen hundred talents (2 Macc. v. 21)).

Ver. 29.] Antiochus shall make a third expedition into Egypt, in order to reduce Alexandria: but this attempt shall not be attended with the same success as the two former, for the reason mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 30. For the ships of Chittim shall come against him: therefore he shall be grieved, and return.] The ambassadors Popilius Lænas and his companions, coming in ships from the coasts of Macedonia and Greece, shall come to him, bringing peremptory demands from the Romans, that he should desist from making war against Egypt, otherwise they would denounce war against him. This message will make him, to his great grief, return out of Egypt, and quit his designs upon that country. "The isles of Chittim," Jer. ii. 10, Ezek.

31 And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate.

32 And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall he corrupt by flatteries: but the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits.

33 And they that understand among the people shall instruct many: yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days.

34 Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help: but many shall cleave to them with flatteries.

35 And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end: because it is yet for a time appointed.

36 And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things xxvii. 6, signify the coasts of the Mediterranean sea, so as to comprehend both Italy and Greece.

And have indignation against the holy covenant:] Being enraged at this disappointment, he shall vent his fury and indignation against the Jewish church and nation; and send Apollonius with an army of seventy-two thousand men to lay Jerusalem waste, and cause the temple worship to cease there: this happened two years after the first taking of Jerusalem by Antiochus (compare 1 Macc. i. 29, 40, with 2 Macc. v. 24—26).

So shall he do [or, he shall prosper in his undertakings: see ver. 23]; he shall even return,] At his return from Egypt, he shall practise with the deserters of the Jewish religion, such as Menelaus and the like apostates, and make use of them as instruments in making converts to heathenism (see 1 Macc. i. 43, 52, 2 Macc. v. 15).

Ver. 31. And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice,] His arms shall so prevail, as to make an entire conquest over the Jews, to profane the temple, and cause the service daily performed there to cease (compare viii. 11, 1 Macc. i. 39, &c. 2 Macc. v. 2, 5). The temple is called the “sanctuary of strength,” because it was a token of the divine protection, being the place of God’s especial residence (see Ps. lxxxviii. 61, xcvi. 6, Ezek. xxiv. 21, 25).

They shall place the abomination that maketh desolate,] Idols are commonly called abominations in scripture, as hath been observed upon ix. 27. In agreement with that usage of the word, “the abomination of desolation” must signify the idol which was placed upon the altar of burnt-offerings (see 1 Macc. i. 54, 59). As the temple itself was dedicated by the heathen to Jupiter Olympius, 2 Macc. vi. 2, so the idol was probably the image of Jupiter. This idol is said to make desolate, because it banished the true worship of God and his worshippers from the place (see 1 Macc. iv. 38).

Ver. 32. Such as do wickedly against the covenant shall be corrupt by flatteries:] Such as Jason and Menelaus, who had bought the high-priesthood of him, and became his instruments in spoiling and profaning the temple (see 2 Macc. iv. 13, 14, v. 15), and such other apostates whom the king by fair words and promises brought over to comply with his designs (see 1 Macc. i. 52, 2 Macc. vi. 21).

But the people that do know their God shall—do exploits,] Or, shall prosper (see ver. 28, 30). They that have a sense of their duty shall courageously resist these attempts, and behave themselves valiantly (see 1 Macc. i. 62, ii. 41—43, iii. 43, &c. 2 Macc. v. 27).

Ver. 33. They that understand among the people shall instruct many:] They that know their duty, and are zealous in doing it, will arm others against the temptations whereby the wicked would persuade them to forsake the true religion. Such were Matthias and his family, 1 Macc. ii. 1, &c. Eleazar, 2

Macc. vi. 18, 19, and the mother and her seven children, 2 Macc. vii.

Yet they shall fall by the sword,] It was death for any person to observe the law, and disobey the king’s command: and accordingly many suffered for their constancy in adhering to their religion (see 1 Macc. i. 50, 63, 2 Macc. vi. 9—11, 19, 30, vii. 1, &c.).

By flame,] This was remarkably verified in the torments inflicted upon the seven brethren recorded 2 Macc. vii. 3, 5. Burning alive was a punishment usual in those countries (see iii. 6).

By captivity, and by spoil,] By banishment and loss of goods.

Many days,] For three years and a half, as the time is computed by Josephus, reckoning from the first beginning of the persecution till the sanctuary was cleansed (see the note upon vii. 25). The persecution may be enlarged to a longer time, if we date it from the beginning of this apostasy (see the note upon viii. 14).

Ver. 34. When they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help:] That of Judas Maccabeus and his followers (see 1 Macc. iii. 10, &c. iv. 14, 2 Macc. viii. 1).

Many shall cleave to them with flatteries,] Not sincerely: such were Joseph and Azarias, who engaged in the common cause out of ambition, and a desire of fame (1 Macc. v. 56, 62): such were they who after their death were found with idols consecrated under their clothes, 2 Macc. xii. 40. Such was Rhodocus, who disclosed their secrets to the enemy, ibid. xiii. 21.

Ver. 35. Some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, &c,] Some of the principal men for piety and knowledge shall fall under this persecution (see ver. 33), for the trial of their faith and patience, and to purge them from lesser corruptions, which are the usual effects of prosperity (compare 1 Pet. i. 7). The persecutions which shall befall the church under antichrist, are designed for the same purpose, as appears by comparing xii. 10, with the words here: Antiochus’s persecution being a type and figure of that under antichrist (see the note upon viii. 14, 23, 24, and the thirty-first verse here, with xii. 11).

It is yet for a time appointed,] Till the time appointed by God for an end of those calamities shall come (compare ver. 27, viii. 19). Mr. Mede refers the latter part of the sentence to the following verse, and so connects the following prophecy with what went before, to this sense: “This persecution shall last to the time of the end: for as yet for a time appointed a king shall do according to his will” (see his works, p. 903). [To the same sense the Vulgar Latin translates it, Quia adhuc aliud tempus erit.]

Ver. 36. The king shall do according to his will:] Antiochus was a type and forerunner of antichrist, as hath been observed; so the angel makes a sudden transition from the type to the antitype, or the description of antichrist himself: the words in the against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished: for that that is determined shall be done.

37 Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any god: for he shall magnify himself above all.

38 But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces: and a god whom his fathers knew not four following verses being not at all applicable to Antiochus. And several passages in the twelfth chapter show that some parts of this prophecy belong to the latter times, or ages, of the world (see Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. book iii. towards the end). We may observe such a sudden transition in our Saviour's discourse, Matt. xxiv. from a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, to a description of the general judgment.

The [or, a] king shall do according to his will [see ver. 16], and he shall exalt himself.] Compare vii. 25, viii. 11, 25. St. Paul describes antichrist almost in the same words, 2 Thess. ii. 4, "Who exalteth himself above all that is called God" (compare Rev. xiii. 5, 6).

And shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished.] He shall succeed in his attempts of aggrandizing himself, and asserting his own supremacy, till the time of God's indignation be accomplished (compare ver. 27, 35); i. e. "for a time, times, and a half," as it is expressed, vii. 25, xii. 7.

Ver. 37. Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers.] Antichrist is described as the seventh head of the Roman empire, Rev. xvii. 11, and as the sixth head revived, Rev. xiii. 3, 14. But before he arrived at his dominion, the worship of the heathen gods, which had prevailed under the sixth head, was destroyed by the Christian emperors.

Nor the desire of women.] Mr. Mede hath observed in his Works, p. 668, that the expression properly signifies "a desire of wives," i. e. of a married state, which should be discountenanced by the king here described. In like manner, "forbidding to marry" is a character of some antichristian teachers, 1 Tim. iv. 3. The word desire signifies that affection which married persons have for each other (see Gen. iii. 16, Cant. vii. 10, Ezek. xxiv. 16).

Nor regard any god.] He will dispense with the laws of God, and make religion subservient to his own greatness and interest.

Ver. 38. But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces.] I prefer Mr. Mede's translation of this and the following verse, as giving a clearer sense, and more agreeable to the original: this verse he thus interprets: "But (or for) together with God in his seat shall he honour Mauzzims." This last word, the Greek, the Vulgar Latin, and several other translations, retain without interpreting it. The word imports protection, or a protector, the abstract being often used for the concrete (see Ps. xxvii. 1, xxviii. 8, xxxi. 3, 5), and is often rendered ὑπερασπιστής, by the LXX. The same learned person supposes the word here to denote saints and angels, in whom the votaries of the church of Rome place a great trust and confidence, and fly to their protection in their distress, and assign to some of them the patronage of whole countries, as is more fully expressed in the following verse. To these, saith this interpretation of the text, shall the king here described give honour and worship in the places dedicated to the service of that God whom his fathers knew not, as it follows.

A god whom his fathers knew not shall he honour with gold.] Mr. Mede translates the sentence thus:

shall he honour with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and pleasant things.

39 Thus shall he do in the most strong-holds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory: and he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the land for gain.

40 And at the time of the end shall the king

"Even together with the god whom his fathers knew not (see ver. 37), shall he honour [them] with gold and silver;" &c. i. e. with the most costly ornaments.

Pleasant things.] The Hebrew word hamudoth, is used by the prophet Isaiah (xlv. 9), to signify the costly ornaments wherewith the heathens decked their images.

Grotius and some others explain this verse of Antiochus's setting up the statue of Jupiter Olympius within the precincts of the temple (1 Macc. i. 54, 2 Macc. vi. 1). But I do not apprehend how he can be called "a god whom Antiochus's father knew not," since he was worshipped under the name of Baal by the Phœnicians many ages before.

Ver. 39. Thus shall he do in the most strong-holds with a strange god.] According to Mr. Mede, the words should be thus translated: "And he shall make the strong-holds [or fortresses] of the Mauzzims jointly with [or to] the strange [or foreign] god:" i. e. He shall consecrate his temples and religious places jointly to the honour of God and of his saints. Temples may fitly be called strong-holds, or places of defence, as being, in the opinion of those that pay their devotions there, the earnestness of that protection which they expect in answer to their prayers. So the Jewish temple is called "the sanctuary of strength," ver. 31 of this chapter, the word mauz being used in both places (compare Ps. xxvii. 5).

A "strange god" in the Old Testament, usually signifies a false god: but the phrase being here used in opposition to the gods who were worshipped by the gentile ancestors of the Romans, it may properly denote the true God, whom the Athenians called by the name of a strange God, Acts xvii. 23. For the entire inscription of that altar St. Paul takes notice of there, is supposed to be, "To the unknown and strange God:" whom St. Paul tells them, "they ignorantly worshipped," as not knowing him to be the one supreme God.

And shall divide the land for gain.] Or, "Distribute the earth for a reward;" i. e. he shall assign whole provinces and kingdoms to the protection of several saints and angels, to whom they may have recourse as their patrons: and shall give them suitable titles and honours, as a reward of their care and protection.

Ver. 40. At the time of the end] At God's appointed time (see ver. 35); or, in the latter days (see xii. 8).

The king of the south—and the king of the north shall come against him] They that understand this and the following verses of Antiochus Epiphanes and Ptolemy Philometor, suppose that the angel recapitulates what he said before at large, from ver. 23. It is certain these and the following words cannot be explained of any farther wars between the kings of Egypt and Syria; for Antiochus never made any farther attempt upon Egypt, after that peremptory demand of the Roman ambassador, requiring him to desist from that enterprise, mentioned ver. 30. Whereupon venting all his indignation against the Jews upon that disappointment, he afterward took a journey into Persia, where he died (1 Macc. vi. 1, 6, 2 Macc. ix. 1, 28).

of the south push at him: and the king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow and pass over.

41 He shall enter also into the glorious land, and many countries shall be overthrown: but these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom, and Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon.

42 He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries: and the land of Egypt shall not escape.

tion, Mr. Mede, p. 674, and 816, by the king of the south understands the Saracens, and by the king of the north the Turks, who should both at different times afflict the western parts of the world, where he supposes the seat of antichrist to be; the former being denoted by the locusts, Rev. ix. 3, and the latter by the Euphratean horsemen described in the same chapter, ver. 15, &c., as two woes or plagues sent to chastise the corrupt part of Christendom, ver. 12. The Saracen is called the “king of the south,” because that people were inhabitants of Arabia Felix, which lay southward of Palestine, whereas the Turks were originally Tartars or Scythians.

Like a whirlwind,] Compare Isa. xxi. 1, Zech. ix. 14.

With chariots, and with horsemen,] This answers the description given of them in the forementioned place, Rev. ix. 16. And the army of Gog and Magog, which may probably mean the Turks, is described as consisting principally of horsemen, Ezek. xxxviii. 4, 15, the strength of the Turkish armies consists chiefly in the number of their cavalry: which makes them carry a horse-tail before their chief officers, as an ensign of honour.

Shall overflow and pass over.] See ver. 10, 22.

Ver. 41. He shall enter also into the glorious land,] The land of Judea (see ver. 16, and viii. 9). If we understand this of Antiochus Epiphanes, his invasion of Judea hath been described at large, ver. 31, &c. If we expound it of the Turk, with Mr. Mede, he hath had possession of the Holy Land for several ages.

But these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom, &c.] Grotius expounds the words to this sense; That Antiochus did not make war upon these people, because they readily complied with his commands, and joined with him against the Jews: for which cause Judas Maccabeus made war upon them, 1 Macc. v. 3, 4. Mr. Mede understands the words of Arabia Petraea, whose inhabitants were never subdued by the Turks.

Ver. 42, 43.] If we understand this of Antiochus, the notes upon ver. 24, show how its has been completed. Mr. Mede expounds the words of the final conquest of Egypt by the Turks, A. C. 1517, after it had held out against them for a great while under the Mamalukes.

Ver. 43. The Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps.] Shall readily obey him, and follow his commands (compare Exod. xi. 8, Judg. iv. 10, 1 Kings xx. 10). Cushim is here rightly translated 43 But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt: and the Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps.

44 But tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him: therefore he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many.

45 And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.

Ethiopians, being joined with Libyans or Africans, as they are in some other places (see 2 Chron. xii. 3, xvi. 8, and the note upon Jer. xiii. 23. St. Jerome observes upon the place, that it is not recorded of Antiochus Epiphanes, that he ever marched so far as into these countries, or had any footing there. So Mr. Mede more probably expounds the place of the Turks, who have extended their dominions into these parts of the world.

Ver. 44.] This Dr. Prideaux explains of Antiochus thus: That in the east, i. e. in Persia, his taxes were not duly paid, which engaged him to take a journey into Persia, to gather up the arrears due to him there: and in the north Artaxias, king of Armenia, had revolted from him. They that understand the words of later times, suppose them not yet fulfilled, and so not capable of a certain interpretation.

Ver. 45. And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain;] If we apply the words to Antiochus, the sense will be, that he shall place the ensigns of his sovereignty as a conqueror at Jerusalem (compare ver. 41, and Ps. xlviii. 2): which city was placed upon a mountainous situation, between the Mediterranean sea and the sea of Sodom, near the middle of Judea, which had those two seas for its boundaries (see Joel ii. 20, Zech. xiv. 8). To “plant the tabernacle of his palace” or pavilion at Jerusalem, is an expression denoting an entire conquest, and is applied to Nebuchadnezzar in that sense, Jer. xliii. 10, where the Hebrew word shaphrir, translated pavilion, is expounded in the Chaldee paraphrase by apadan, the word used in the text here. The holy mountain oftentimes denotes the Christian church in the prophetic writings (see the note upon Isa. ii. 2): and if we apply this text to antichrist, we may compare it with the boasts of that proud prince, who is supposed to be the figure of antichrist, Isa. xiv. 13, where he saith, “I will sit in the midst of the congregation, in the sides of the north:” and we may explain both these texts by those words of St. Paul, who describes antichrist as “sitting in the temple of God,” 2 Thess. ii. 4, meaning the Christian church, as that phrase commonly signifies in St. Paul’s writings (see 1 Cor. iii. 16, 2 Cor. vi. 16, Eph. ii. 20, 1 Tim. iii. 15).

Yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.] He “shall be broken without hand;” i. e. by a judgment immediately inflicted by God, as is said of Antiochus, viii. 25. The like judgment is denounced against antichrist, 2 Thess. ii. 8.

CHAPTER XII.

1 AND at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book.

2 And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.

CHAP. XII.

ARGUMENT.—See the Argument of the tenth chapter.

Ver. 1. At that time shall Michael stand up.] See x. 13, 21. He, as the protector of the Jewish nation, “contended with the devil about the body of Moses,” as St. Jude informs us from some ancient writing or tradition, Jude, ver. 9. He is probably that archangel who shall make that awful summons to the day of judgment, mentioned 1 Thess. iv. 16, and as several angels will be employed “in gathering together God’s elect,” Matt. xxiv. 31, so we may collect from this place of Daniel, that it will be his province to assemble those of the Jewish nation.

There shall be a time of trouble.] The scriptures speak of the extraordinary appearance of God’s kingdom, as ushered in by great tribulations (see Isa. xxvi. 20, 21, Jer. xxx. 7, Matt. xxiv. 21): so the saints are said to have “come out of great tribulation,” Rev. vi. 14. This some learned men suppose to relate to the times of the last vial, Rev. xvi. 18, when “there was a great earthquake,” saith the text, “such as was not since men were upon the earth.”

Every one that shall be found written in the book.] That is, in the book of life (compare Exod. xxxii. 32, Ps. lxxix. 28, Ezek. xlii. 9, Phil. iv. 3, Rev. iii. 5, xiii. 5, xx. 12). The phrase alludes to the registers that used to be kept of the members of any city or corporation: the privileges of which society none can lay a claim to but those whose names are found in such registers.

Ver. 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust—shall awake.] A plain description of the general resurrection both of the just and unjust; the belief of which St. Paul speaks of, as grounded upon the writings of the law and the prophets, Acts xxiv. 15, 16, xxvi. 6—8, and there is no text so full to that purpose as this before us. The word many is sometimes equivalent to all, as hath been observed in the notes upon ix. 27.

Some to shame and everlasting contempt.] In this life men may so far harden themselves in sin as to be past shame; but this shame shall be doubled upon them in the world to come, when they shall be convicted of their sins in such a manner, as neither to be able to deny or excuse them; and shall thereupon become objects of scorn and contempt to God and all his saints. And “as a thief is ashamed when he is found,” or taken in the very fact, “so shall the wicked be ashamed” and confounded at that time, as the prophet Jeremiah makes the comparison, Jer. ii. 26.

Ver. 3.] The words allude to xi. 33, 35, and import, that they who have been the great lights of the world, who have instructed others by their doctrine, and confirmed them in the truth by their sufferings and example, shall have an eminently glorious reward at the day of judgment. So the mar-

3 And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever.

4 But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end: many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.

5 ¶ Then I Daniel looked, and, behold, there stood other two, the one on this side of the bank tyrs are described as having a share in “the first resurrection,” Rev. xx. 4. Our Saviour’s words plainly allude to this text, Matt. xiii. 43.

Ver. 4. Shut up the words, and seal the book] To shut up a book, and to seal it, is the same with concealing the sense of it, and hiding its meaning from common understandings, as hath been observed upon viii. 26. And the same reason is assigned in both places for this command, viz. because there would be a long interval of time between the date of the prophecy and the final accomplishment of it (compare x. 1, with both these texts). But the nearer that time approached, the more light should men have for understanding the prophecy itself, as is implied in the following words.

Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.] Many shall be inquisitive after truth, and keep correspondence with others for their better information; and the gradual completion of this and other prophecies, shall direct observing readers to form a judgment concerning these particulars which are yet to be fulfilled.

From hence we may learn the reason of the obscurity of several prophecies in scripture; and it may be observed, that generally those prophecies are most obscure, the time of whose completion is farthest off. For the same reason, in interpreting the prophecies relating to the latter times of the world, the judgment of the latter writers is to be preferred before that of the ancients; because the moderns living nearer the times when the events were to be fulfilled, had surer marks to guide them in their expositions. Bishop Andrews hath a remarkable passage to this purpose, in his Tortura Torti, p. 186, in the following words: Neque vero mirum, si ista quæ dixi [de Roma sede, antichristi], tam vel clarum, vel certam interpretationem in scriptis patrum non habeant. Signatus adhuc erat liber prophetiæ; verissimum autem verbum est, ænigma esse prophetiam omnem, cum nondum completa est; ut quamvis prisci illi omni genere charismatum, vitæ vero sanctimonia longo nos intervallo superarint, mirari tamen non debeat quis, si non illis tum adeo explicita omnia fuerint, quam nobis per Dei gratiam jam sunt, qui consummatam jam prophetiam illam quotidie oculis usurpamus. “It is no wonder that what I have said concerning Rome’s being the seat of antichrist, described by St. John, is not clearly asserted in the commentaries of the ancient fathers upon the Revelation: that book of prophecy was then sealed; and it is a certain rule, that every prophecy is a riddle before its completion; so that though we grant those ancient worthies to have far exceeded us, both in gifts and in holiness, yet it is not to be wondered if they had not such clear apprehensions concerning this matter, as we of later times have, by the grace of God, attained, who see this prophecy every day fulfilled in our sight.”

Ver. 5.] I saw two other angels on the bank side of the river, and the other on that side of the bank of the river.

6 And one said to the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?

7 And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and swore by him that liveth for ever that it shall be for a time, times, and an half; and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished.

of the river Hiddekel, attending upon that supreme angel, or the Son of God, who appeared in that glorious form described x. 4, 5 (see the note upon x. 10).

Ver. 6. And one [of them] said to the man—which was upon the waters of the river,] Or rather, “above the waters of the river” (see note upon x. 5).

How long shall it be to the end?] So the inferior angel inquires of the superior concerning the accomplishment of the events foretold, viii. 13.

Ver. 7. I heard the man clothed in linen—when he held up his right hand and left hand unto heaven,] “Holding up the hand” was a ceremony anciently used in taking an oath (see Gen. xiv. 22, Deut. xxxii. 40). St. John plainly alludes to this place, Rev. x. 5, 6, and by the description he gives of the angel, that “he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left upon the earth,” ver. 2, he can be no other than Christ, who had “all power given to him in heaven and in earth.”

That it shall be for a time, times, and an half;] Or, “the dividing of time,” as it is expressed in the Chaldee (vii. 25), which contains, in the literal sense, “three years and a half;” during which time the public sacrifices and worship were discontinued during the persecution of Antiochus, the figure of antichrist (see the note there). But this line of time is expressly applied to the antichristian persecution, Rev. xii. 14, and is farther explained in that chapter, ver. 6, by “twelve hundred and sixty days;” which is “three years and a half,” reckoning “three hundred and sixty days” to a year (see note upon ix. 24). And if we suppose each day to signify a year, which is the prophetic sense of the word day, this period of time denotes twelve hundred and sixty years (see note upon viii. 14, ix. 24).

When he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, &c.] When the Jews’ dispersions shall be ended, then the most remarkable events contained in this prophecy shall be fulfilled. The restoration of the Jewish nation is foretold by the prophets as one of those signal events to be brought to pass in “the latter days,” or times, of the world (see Isa. xi. 11, xxvii. 12, 13, lxi. 10, &c., Jer. iii. 18, xxiii. 5, 8, xxx. 3, &c., xxxi. 1, 4, Ezek. xx. 38, 41, xxviii. 25, xxxiv. 13, xxxvi. 24, &c., xxxvii. 12, &c., Hos. i. 11, iii. 5, Joel iii. 1, Amos ix. 14, 15, Obad. ver. 17, &c., Micah vii. 14, 15, Zeph. iii. 14, Zech. viii. 7, 13, x. 6, xii. 10, xiv. 8, &c.). Mr. Mede makes the text before us parallel with those words of Christ, Luke xxi. 24, “Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the gentiles, until the times of the gentiles be fulfilled:” i. e. till the times of the fourth monarchy be expired (see his Works, p. 709, 744, 753).

Of the holy people,] See viii. 24.

Ver. 8. I heard, but I understood not;] I did not understand what time was allotted for bringing to pass this event, viz. the restoration of the Jewish nation.

What shall be the end of these things?] See ver. 6.

8 And I heard, but I understood not: then said I, O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?

9 And he said, Go thy way, Daniel: for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end.

10 Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly; and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand.

11 And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that

Or, as Mr. Mede translates the words, “What are these latter times” thou speakest of (compare x. 14)?

Ver. 9.] Be content with what has been made known to thee (see ver. 13); for the fuller explication of this prophecy is deferred till the time of its accomplishment draws near (see ver. 4).

Ver. 10. Many shall be purified,] The persecutions of the faithful are designed for the trial of their faith, and purifying their lives (see xi. 35).

But the wicked shall do wickedly:] And for those that are obstinately bent upon following the corrupt practices to which they have been accustomed, neither the exhortations nor threatenings of God’s word, nor the judgments they see overtake others, will prevail with them to forsake their evil practices (see Rev. ix. 20, xxii. 10).

None of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand.] The holy writers often repeat this maxim; That an honest and good heart is a necessary qualification for the receiving and understanding divine truths (see Isa. vi. 9, &c., Hos. xiv. 9, John viii. 47, x. 27, xviii. 37).

Ver. 11.] The same expressions made use of to describe Antiochus’s persecution, xi. 31, are here applied to the desolations made by antichrist, of which the former was a figure (see note upon viii. 14, 23, 24, xi. 26).

Ibid. and ver. 12.] Here the time allotted for the persecutions of antichrist, till the church be entirely cleansed and purified, is enlarged from one thousand two hundred and sixty days, denoted by “time, times, and an half,” ver. 7, to one thousand two hundred and ninety days; and then to one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days. Mr. Mede wisely forbears giving an interpretation of these particulars, telling us that time would make them manifest (see his Works, p. 674). However, we may venture to say, in general, that there may be a considerable space of time between the fall of antichrist, and the last judgments which shall be inflicted upon him. Some learned men, who have compared the prophecies of Daniel and the Revelation together, suppose the interval of time between the one thousand two hundred and sixty days, and the one thousand three hundred and thirty-five days, to be included within the times of the seventh trumpet, during which the seven last plagues will be fulfilled (see Rev. xi. 15, 18, and xv. 1, 7, 8).

Ver. 12.] Some expositors suppose St. John to allude to these words, Rev. xx. 4, where he saith, “Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection:” in like manner the prophet here pronounceth those blessed, who, after a patient expectation of the fulfilling of God’s promises, come to have a share in the enjoyment of them (compare ver. 1—3 of this chapter).

Ver. 13. Go thou thy way till the end be:] Be content with that state and condition which God shall maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days.

12 Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days.

appoint thee till the finishing of all these wonderful events (ver. 4, 6, 8).

For thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days,] The prophet was now ninety years of age at least (see note upon x. 1): so he could not expect to live much longer; and the angel here tells him, that after his life was ended, he should rest in peace with the souls of the righteous (compare Isa. lvii. 2, Rev. xiv. 13), and at the resurrection, foretold ver. 2, of this chapter, he should obtain a share of that happiness which is reserved for the faithful servants of God, and shall be actually conferred upon them at the conclusion of the times here specified, ver. 12.

The righteous are said “to stand in the judgment of the last day” (Ps. i. 5), and to “have boldness in the day of judgment” (1 John ii. 28, iv. 17), whereas the wicked are described as “hiding themselves for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his majesty, when the great day of his wrath is come (Isa. ii. 10, Rev. vi. 15—17).

The word lot signifies a state or condition of life, Jer. xiii. 25, and is often used for an inheritance, because the land of Canaan was divided by lot among the Israelites; as the promised land was a figure of that better and heavenly country, which all the good men among the Jews expected, so here it signifies that heavenly inheritance which belongs “to the heirs of salvation.”

OF

THE PROPHET HOSEA.

GENERAL PREFACE

MINOR PROPHETS.

THE twelve minor prophets were always comprised in one book, called the “book of the prophets,” by St. Stephen, Acts vii. 42, and the “book of the twelve prophets,” by St. Cyprian, Epist. 59. The son of Sirach speaks of them under one and the same character, Eccclus. xlix. 12, “Let the bones of the twelve prophets flourish out of their place.” And both Jewish and Christian writers, particularly Josephus (lib. i. contr. App.) and St. Jerome (Prolog. Galeat.), when they mention the canonical books of the Old Testament to be in number twenty-two (a number equal to the letters of the Jewish alphabet), comprehend the twelve minor prophets under one book.

These twelve prophets are not placed exactly in the order of time when they lived, either in the Hebrew or Greek copies; for Jonah, who was the eldest of them, is placed the sixth in order both in the Hebrew and Greek Bibles: there being in other respects some little difference between them: the series of them standing thus in the Greek—Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, Jonas; but no variation as to the rest.

Hosea, who is placed the first in order, is as ancient as any of them, except Jonah: having prophesied before the captivity of the ten tribes, to whom he chiefly directs his prophecy, and threatens them with a sudden destruction for their great and crying sins, which he, in all probability, lived to see brought upon them.

CHAPTER I.

1 THE word of the LORD that came unto Hosea, the son of Beeri, in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah,

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—Under the figure of a wife living in whoredom, and bearing illegitimate children, is represented the great idolatry of the ten tribes, which provoked God to cast them off utterly: yet with the promise of repairing that loss, by bring-and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel.

2 The beginning of the word of the LORD by ing in the gentiles into the church: and afterward of uniting Israel and Judah under one head, the Messias. The prophet does likewise foretell the extinction of Jehu's family.

Ver. 1.] Jeroboam the son of Joash, who was the second king of Israel of that name, and was contem-

Hosea. And the LORD said to Hosea, Go take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms: for the land hath committed great whoredom, departing from the LORD.

3 So he went and took Gomer the daughter of Diblaim; which conceived, and bare him a son.

4 And the LORD said unto him, Call his name Jezreel; for yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel.

5 And it shall come to pass at that day, that I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel.

6 ¶ And she conceived again, and bare a daughter. And God said unto him, call her name Lo-ruhamah: for I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them away.

7 But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the LORD their God, and will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen.

8 ¶ Now when she had weaned Lo-ruhamah, she conceived, and bare a son.

9 Then said God, Call his name Lo-ammi: for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God.

10 ¶ Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to porary with Uzziah, is here mentioned, because this prophecy does chiefly concern the kingdom of Israel. And there was no need of mentioning the names of any of the succeeding kings of Israel, because Hosea mentioning his prophesying from the times of Uzziah to Hezekiah, it follows from thence, that he prophesied all the reigns of those kings of Israel who succeeded Jeroboam, the reign of Hezekiah bearing date from the third year of Hoshea, the last of those kings. From whence we may conclude, that Hosea, who often foretold the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes, lived to see an end put to that kingdom by Salmaneser king of Assyria, as we read 2 Kings xviii. 10.

Ver. 2. The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea.] The first prophecy or message which came from God to Hosea, was as follows.

Go, take unto thee a wife of whoredoms.] This may be properly understood of a wife, who after marriage should prove false to her marriage vow: this would make the case more exactly parallel with that of the Israelites, who had departed from the true God, and polluted themselves with idolatry, called often in scripture by the names of whoredom and fornication (see particularly the sixteenth and twenty-third chapters of Ezekiel). Taking the words in this sense, there will be no inconvenience in supposing this relation to be literally true, and not barely a figure or parallel, as some commentators understand it, and particularly the Chaldee paraphrast, who thus expresses the sense: "Go, utter a prophecy against the rebellious city." This question is handled at large in Dr. Pocock's commentary upon this place.

Ver. 3.] This probably might be a legitimate son, according to the sense given of the foregoing verse (see the following words).

Ver. 4. Call his name Jezreel.] The word signifies either "the arm of God," or, "the seed of God:" and is taken in both those senses in the following verses. It does not seem proper to make an illegitimate child the earnest of such acts of God's justice or mercy as are implied in any of those senses.

I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu.] The blood of Joram the son of Ahab, whom, with all the rest of Ahab's family, Jehu slew in Jezreel (see 2 Kings x. 11). God made Jehu the instrument of destroying the house of Ahab (ibid. ver. 10, 30), but yet he was prompted to it by his own ambition and cruelty, without any regard to God's glory, whose worship he forsook, and maintained that idolatry which Jeroboam had first set up.

Wicked men are called a "sword in the hand of God," Ps. xvii. 11, to execute his judgments upon those who are as bad or worse than themselves: but when they have fulfilled God's purposes he often punishes them for the outrages they have committed, which their own evil dispositions prompted them to do, but it was God's providence allotted upon whom the execution should fall.

And will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel.] This may be a prophecy of the destruction of the whole kingdom of Israel, which was in a declining condition from the death of Jeroboam; but it rather denotes the ceasing of the kingdom in his family, according to God's promise to Jehu, "That his children should sit upon the throne of Israel to the fourth generation," 2 Kings xv. 12.

Ver. 5. At that day.] Quickly after the extinction of Jehu's family: "at that day," in the prophets, commonly signifies a season marked out by providence for some extraordinary act of God's justice or mercy (see note upon Isa. iv. 2).

I will break the bow [i. e. the armies, or strength] of Israel] This is commonly understood of that invasion of Israel which Tiglath-pileser made, and is mentioned 2 Kings xv. 29, wherein he subdued a great part of the kingdom, and carried the inhabitants away captive; the Assyrian army having routed the Israelites in the valley of Jezreel, which is mentioned Josh. xvii. 16, xix. 18, Judg. vi. 33, as being in the border of Issachar. But the expression may mean no more than the place where God's arm, or strength, will appear in subduing the Israelites, which is one signification of the word Jezreel. So Joel calls the place where God will gather all nations "the valley of Jehoshaphat," the word signifying "the valley of God's judgment," iii. 2, 12.

Ver. 6. I will no more [or, no longer: see Noldius p. 682] have mercy upon the house of Israel, &c.] I will carry them into captivity, never to return any more to their own land (2 Kings xvii. 6, 23): and will utterly put an end to that people, considered as a distinct kingdom from Judah (compare ix. 15 of this prophecy).

Ver. 7.] I will deliver the kingdom of Judah out of the hands of Sennacherib, not by any human means, but by the stroke of an angel destroying his whole army (see 1 Kings xix. 35, compare Zech. iv. 6). Interpreters observe the expression may allude to the salvation to be accomplished by the Messiah, who is God as well as man; the Lord being spoken of as a distinct person from the principal author of the salvation here promised (compare Isa. xxxv. 4, xl. 9). To this sense the Chaldee paraphrases it, "I will save them by the Word of the Lord their God:" a title he elsewhere gives to the Messiah (see the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity, ch. 2, p. 70).

Ver. 9. Ye are not my people.] Since you have disowned the covenant relation I had to you, by pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God.

11 Then shall the children of Judah and the apostatizing from my service, I will no more own you for my people, nor continue my protection over you (compare Lev. xxvi. 12, Ezek. xi. 20, xiv. 11).

Ver. 10.] Though God casts off the ten tribes, yet he will, in due time, supply their loss, by bringing in great numbers of true Israelites into the church, not only of the Jews, but also of the gentiles, and making them, who before were "strangers to the covenants of promise, fellow heirs" with the Jews (see Rom. ix. 25, 29, 1 Pet. ii. 10).

Ver. 11. Then shall the children of Judah and—Israel be gathered together,] When "the fulness of the gentiles is come in," this will be a means of converting the Jews, and bringing them into the church (see Rom. ix. 25, 26).

Appoint themselves one head,] Upon this will follow the restoration of the Jewish nation, when they shall return into their own country, from the several dispersions where they were scattered, and become one nation or kingdom under the Messias, their head and king (compare Ezek. xxxvii. 21, 22, Mic. ii. 13). Israel and Judah are joined together where this general restoration is foretold (see note upon Jer. iii. 18).

For great shall be the day of Jezreel.] The word Jezreel signifies both the "seed of God" and the "arm of God," as was before observed: in both senses, great will be the day of Jezreel: God will signally exert his arm, and show his power, in the restoration of his ancient people, and subduing their enemies; and thereby a numerous offspring of the seed of Abraham shall be added to the church.

CHAPTER II.

1 SAY ye unto your brethren, Ammi; and to your sisters, Ruhamah.

2 Plead with your mother, plead: for she is not my wife, neither am I her husband: let her therefore put away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts;

3 Lest I strip her naked, and set her as in the day that she was born, and make her as a wilderness, and set her like a dry land, and slay her with thirst.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet reproves the ten tribes for their ingratitude to God, their great benefactor, and giving the glory of all the good things they possessed to their idols; for which he threatens them with severe judgments, yet gives them some hopes of obtaining mercy and reconciliation.

Ver. 1.] Several interpreters join this verse with the foregoing chapter, to this sense; When that general restoration of the Jewish nation shall come to pass, ye may alter your style in speaking to those of your brethren and sisters, whom I had before disowned, and you may call them my people, and such as have obtained mercy (see ver. 23). This interpretation gives the plainest and easiest sense. However, other expositors join this verse with the following words, and translate it thus, "Ye that are my people, and have obtained mercy, speak to your brethren and sisters, and plead with your mother." But this sense I think not so agreeable with the context, which threatens the ten tribes with the miseries of their ensuing captivity.

Ver. 2. Plead with your mother, plead;] The words are directed to those pious persons that still remained among the ten tribes, who are required to reprove, and use their best endeavours to reform that general corruption which the nation had contracted by its idolatry: whereby they have broken the covenant I had made with them (frequently expressed in the prophets by a marriage contract; see Jer. iii. 1, 8, xxxi. 32), and made a separation or divorce between them and me (see Isa. l. 1).

4 And I will not have mercy upon her children; for they be the children of whoredoms.

5 For their mother hath played the harlot: she that conceived them hath done shamefully: for she said, I will go after my lovers, that give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax, mine oil and my drink.

6 ¶ Therefore, behold, I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall, that she shall not find her paths.

her leave off her idolatries, usually expressed by the fondness and caresses which pass between unchaste lovers (compare Ezek. xvi. 25, &c.).

Ver. 3. Lest I strip her naked,] The punishment commonly inflicted upon harlots was to strip them naked and expose them to the world (see ver. 10, Jer. xiii. 22, 26, Ezek. xvi. 37). So God threatens to deal with the nations or kingdom of Israel; to deliver her into the hands of her enemies, who shall strip her of all her wealth and ornaments, and carry her away naked into captivity (see ver. 9), in as forlorn and desolate a condition as she was in during her bondage in Egypt (see Ezek. xvi. 4, compare likewise ver. 37, 41, of the same chapter.)

Make her as a wilderness.] The state of captivity is fitly compared to being placed in a wilderness, in want of common necessities (compare Ezek. xix. 13).

Ver. 4.] As an injured husband has no regard for the children his wife has brought by another man; so neither will I take pity of thy children which are trained up to practise thy idolatries.

Ver. 5.] By lovers are meant, in the first place, the idols with whom the Israelites committed spiritual fornication (see Jer. iii. 1); and then the idolatrous nations, whose alliance the Israelites courted, and in order to it practised their idolatries (see ver. 10, and the note upon Ezek. xvi. 37). The word may be understood here in both senses; they ascribed all the plenty they enjoyed chiefly to the favour of the idol gods which they worshipped (see Jer. xlv. 17); and then they placed their trust and confidence in the confederacies they had made with their neighbouring idolaters, and thought the peace and plenty they possessed was very much owing to their protection and alliance.

7 And she shall follow after her lovers, but she shall not overtake them; and she shall seek them, but shall not find them: then shall she say, I will go and return to my first husband; for then was it better with me than now.

8 For she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal.

9 Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof, and will recover my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness.

10 And now will I discover her lewdness in the sight of her lovers, and none shall deliver her out of mine hand.

11 I will also cause all her mirth to cease, her feast days, her new moons, and her sabbaths, and all her solemn feasts.

12 And I will destroy her vines and her fig-trees, whereof she hath said, These are my rewards that my lovers have given me: and I will make them a forest, and the beasts of the field shall eat them.

13 And I will visit upon her the days of Baalim, wherein she burned incense to them, and she decked herself with her earrings and her jewels, and she went after her lovers, and forgot me, saith the LORD.

14 ¶ Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her.

15 And I will give her her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope: and she shall sing there, as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt.

Ver. 6.] I will bring her under great calamities, that she shall not know which way to turn herself, or get out of them (compare Job iii. 23, xix. 8, Lam. iii. 7, 9).

Ver. 7. She shall follow after her lovers.] She shall seek for help of her idols, but shall receive none.

She shall seek them, but shall not find them.] A proverbial expression, denoting lost labour, when persons receive no assistance from those whose help they implore (see v. 6, Prov. i. 28).

I will go and return to my first husband.] Her afflictions will bring her to a sense of her duty, and the happiness she enjoyed as long as she cleaved steadfastly unto God (see v. 15, and compare Luke xv. 18).

Ver. 8.] Or, bestowed upon Baal (compare 2 Chron. xxiv. 7). "She did not consider," so the first part of the sentence should be translated (compare vii. 9), that all the necessities she enjoyed, as well as her riches and ornaments, were my gift, which yet she ungratefully bestowed upon the service of her idols (compare viii. 4, and Ezek. xvi. 17—19).

Ver. 9. Take away my corn, &c.] For a punishment of her ingratitude, I will take away the good things I have given her; at the very season when she expects to receive the fruits of the earth, her enemies shall invade her and destroy them.

And will recover [or take away] my wool and my flax given to cover her.] They shall strip her of her very clothes, and carry her away captive: without leaving her any covering for her nakedness (see note upon Isa. iii. 17).

Ver. 10.] The filthiness of her idolatries shall appear by the punishments I will inflict upon her, which shall be so remarkable, that it shall be taken notice of by the idolatrous nations round about her (see ver. 5, and Ezek. xvi. 37, xxiii. 20).

Ver. 11.] The public festivals are frequently called days of joy and gladness; the observation of several of these festivals was retained in the worship of the golden calves (see 1 Kings xii. 32, Amos viii. 5). God here threatens them, that, under their captivity, they should have no opportunity to celebrate them, since they had so much abused those solemn seasons of divine worship (see ix. 4, 5, Amos viii. 10, and the note upon Dan. x. 4).

Ver. 12. These are my rewards] See ver. 5, and ix. 1.

The beasts of the field shall eat them.] I will give up their lands unto their enemies, who shall destroy the fruits of it, or else leave it desolate, for the beasts of the field to devour (compare Ps. lxxx. 12, 13, Isa. v. 7).

Ver. 13. I will visit upon her the days of Baalim.] I will punish her for all the idolatries she has committed from the days of Jeroboam, who first set up the worship of false gods (see xiii. 1). The chief god of every country was called by the name of Baal; so Baal-peor was the god of the Moabites; Baal-zebub was the god of Ekron (2 Kings i. 2); Baal-herith the god of the Phœnicians (Judg. viii. 33). Those several deities are called in the plural number Baalim (see Judg. iii. 7).

She decked herself with her earrings and her jewels.] She put on her richest ornaments in their idolatrous festivals (see Ezek. xxiii. 40, 42).

Ver. 14. Therefore.] Here is a plain alteration of the style, from threatenings to promises; so the first word of this verse should be translated, nevertheless (see the note upon Isa. xxx. 18).

I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, &c.] Or, "After I have brought her into the wilderness." The state of the Jews' captivity is elsewhere expressed by a wilderness state (see the note upon Ezek. xx. 35). It probably means here the dispersions of the ten tribes, ever since their first captivity by Shalmaneser, 2 Kings xvii. 6.

The words, "I will allure her, and speak comfortably to her," allude to the practice of fond husbands, who, forgetting past offences, use all the arts of endearment to persuade their wives, who have parted from them, to return to them again; so God will use the most powerful persuasions to bring the Israelites to the acknowledgment of the truth, notwithstanding all their former abuses of the means of grace. This verse, and the following part of the chapter, import a general promise of the restoration of the Jewish nation; which is a subject often treated of by the prophets; particularly by Ezekiel, ch. xxxiv. xxxvi. xxxvii.

Ver. 15. I will give her her vineyards from thence.] Or, "From that time;" for so the word misham may be rendered (see the notes upon Isa. xlviii. 16, lxxv. 20). Then I will restore her vineyards and fruitful fields, which I had taken from her (ver. 12).

Valley of Achor for a door of hope.] As at the Israelites' first entrance into Canaan, their taking possession of the fruitful valley of Achor (see Isa. lxxv. 10), gave them encouragement to hope they should become owners of that whole land, flowing with milk and honey: the same auspicious tokens of the divine favour should accompany them at their return into their own country.

16 And it shall be at that day, saith the LORD, that thou shalt call me Ishi; and shalt call me no more Baali.

17 For I will take away the names of Baalim out of her mouth, and they shall no more be remembered by their name.

18 And in that day will I make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground: and I will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the earth, and will make them to lie down safely.

19 And I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness,

She shall sing there, as in the days of her youth.] She shall express her joy in God, as her forefathers did at their first coming out of Egypt, after their deliverance at the Red sea, when I espoused them for my peculiar people, and entered into a covenant with them at mount Sinai: where they solemnly promised an entire obedience to me, Exod. xix. 5, 8 (compare xi. 1, Jer. ii. 2, Ezek. xvi. 8, 22, 60).

Ver. 16. Thou shalt call me Ishi; and—no more Baali.] Whereas God had formerly renounced any marriage relation with Israel by reason of their idolatry (see ver. 2); he now declares himself reconciled to them again (see ver. 20); and permits them to call him by the name of Ishi, i. e. "husband," but not of Baali, i. e. "Lord." The word Baali often signifies a husband, and is particularly spoken of God, as he was by his covenant relation a husband to his people (see Isa. liv. 5, Jer. iii. 14). But because the word Baal had been so much profaned by being given to idols, he forbade it to be applied any more to himself (see the following verse).

Ver. 17.] The Jews were forbidden to mention the names of heathen idols (see Exod. xxiii. 13, Josh. xxiii. 7, Ps. xvi. 4, compare Zech. xiii. 2, and see the note upon xiv. 2). Baalim is sometimes equivalent to Baal (see 1 Kings xviii. 18, compared with ver. 21, and 2 Chron. xxiv. 4, compared with 2 Kings xxiii. 4), so Baalim and Ashtaroth, Judg. x. 6, 7, is the same with Baal and Ashtaroth, ii. 13, for the plural number in the Hebrew language sometimes expresses an excellency, as in the word Elohim. In like manner Baal was called Baalim by his worshippers, to denote that he was a principal object of their worship; but the word likewise signifies the several Baals which the idolaters worshipped under so many distinguishing characters; such as Baal-peor, Baal-berith, Baal-zebub, and the like; and, in general, it signifies the many strange gods of the heathens (see 1 Sam. vii. 3, 4, 2 Chron. xxiv. 7, Jer. ii. 23).

Ver. 18. Make a covenant for them with the beasts] I will protect them from that violence and annoyance which beasts and birds of prey or venomous creatures might threaten them with (compare Job v. 23, Ezek. xxxiv. 25).

I will break the bow and the sword] A universal peace and freedom, both from foreign and domestic enemies, is mentioned by the prophets as a concomitant of that flourishing state of the church, which shall commence from the restoration of the Jews, and the coming in of the gentiles (see Isa. ii. 4, xi. 6, 9, Zech. ix. 10).

Make them to lie down safely.] As flocks do when they are secure from beasts of prey (see Ezek. xxxiv. 25, Zech. iii. 13, Jer. xxiii. 6, xxx. 10).

and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercies.

20 I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness: and thou shalt know the LORD.

21 And it shall come to pass in that day, I will hear, saith the LORD, I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth;

22 And the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oil; and they shall hear Jezreel.

23 And I will sow her unto me in the earth; and I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy; and I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God.

Ver. 19, 20. And I will betroth thee unto me for ever.] I will enter into a new covenant with my church, consisting of the converted Jews, and increased by the coming in of the fulness of the gentiles (see ver. 23), which covenant is described as if it were a marriage contract (see the note upon ver. 2), wherein I will eminently display my attributes of righteousness and equity, of loving-kindness, mercy, and faithfulness.

Thou shalt know the Lord.] One especial part of the new covenant shall consist in imparting to the faithful a more perfect knowledge of God's will, and their own duty (see Jer. xxxi. 34).

Ver. 21. I will hear [or answer], saith the Lord.] I will graciously answer all the petitions my people make to me (compare Isa. lxxv. 24, Zech. xiii. 9). Or the words may be referred to what follows.

Ibid. and ver. 22. I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth, &c.] All creatures shall answer the desires and wants of my people: the heavens shall answer the wants of the earth in sending down seasonable showers, and the earth shall answer the wants of mankind in bringing forth corn and wine, and other necessities of life, and the very fruits of the earth shall answer the wishes of my people, now returned into their own land, by giving them due nourishment. The same sense is more plainly expressed in Zechariah, viii. 12, "The seed shall be prosperous, the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things." Spiritual blessings are often described under the emblems of fruitfulness and plenty (see the note upon Isa. iv. 2, and compare vi. 3 of this prophecy).

They shall hear Jezreel.] This new state of the church, increased by a numerous accession, both of Jews and gentiles, is fitly called by the name of Jezreel: the word importing both the seed and "the arm of God" (see note upon i. 11).

Ver. 23. I will sow her unto me in the earth;] Here is a plain allusion to the word Jezreel mentioned just before, which signifies the seed of God; the prophet foretells a plentiful increase of true believers, like to that of corn sowed in the earth (compare Zech. x. 9).

I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy;] Compare i. 6. I will have mercy both on the Jews and gentiles, who shall become true converts to the Christian faith. This was in part fulfilled at the first preaching of the gospel (see Rom. ix. 24—26), but shall receive its completion at the restoration of the Jews, and the coming in of the "fulness of the gentiles" (compare i. 10, 11).

CHAPTER III.

1 THEN said the LORD unto me, Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress, according to the love of the LORD toward the children of Israel, who look to other gods, and love flagons of wine.

2 So I bought her to me for fifteen pieces of silver, and for an homer of barley, and an half homer of barley;

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—Under the figure of the prophet's receiving his adulterous wife home again, and her continuing there in a state of widowhood, yet with hopes of reconciliation, is signified that Israel (the ten tribes especially) shall be for several ages without any external form of civil government, or public worship; yet with a promise of being restored to their ancient dignity and privileges in the later ages of the world.

Ver. 1. Love a woman beloved of her friend, yet [or, although] an adulteress.] This is probably the same woman mentioned i. 3, who, upon her ill life, was parted from her husband, who yet had a kindness for her still, and was willing to receive her upon conditions of her better behaviour. The Hebrew word reang, friend, is used for a husband, Jer. iii. 20, Cant. v. 16.

According to the love of the Lord toward—Israel, who look to other gods, and love flagons of wine.] Hosea's dealing thus with a wife who had injured him, exactly resembles the favour which God hath shown towards the Israelites, who, notwithstanding all their obligations to him, retain an incurable propension to idolatry, often called by the name of spiritual whoredom.

The words which our translation renders "flagons of wine," may be translated "cakes made of (dried) grapes." Such were the cakes, probably, which the Jews offered to the "queen of heaven." Jer. vii. 18, xlv. 19. So, Cant. ii. 5, the word ashish might rather signify cakes, or comfits, than flagons: as our translation renders it. The expression signifies, in general, those entertainments which they were partakers of in the idol temples (Amos. ii. 8, 1 Cor. x. 7, 21).

Ver. 2.] The expression alludes to the custom anciently practised of men's buying their wives: and it implies, that the prophet made a new espousal or contract with her; as God intended to betroth Israel a second time, ii. 19, and the meanness of the price offered, shows of how little value the Israelites were in God's sight, since their apostasy from the worship of God to idolatry (compare Zech. xi. 13). A homer was about ten bushels (see the note upon Ezek. xlv. 11).

Ver. 3. Thou shalt abide for me many days;] Thou shalt continue in a solitary condition (see Deut. xxi. 13), for a considerable time, that I may make some proof of thy amendment.

Thou shalt not be for another man;] The word another is not in the Hebrew, so the sentence may be thus translated more agreeably to the original, "Thou shalt not have a husband, neither will I have thee" [to my wife]; i. e. thou shalt continue some time in a state of widowhood. The Hebrew phrase Lo tehi laish properly signifies, "Thou shalt not have a husband;" and so it is rendered by our interpreters, Ezek. xlv. 25, and to the same sense without the negative particle, Ruth i. 12. The 3 And I said unto her, Thou shalt abide for me many days; thou shalt not play the harlot, and thou shalt not be for another man: so will I also be for thee.

4 For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim:

LXX. render it to the same sense, Οὐδὲ μὴ γένη ἀνδρῶν, and so it is used by St. Paul, Rom. vii. 3.

Ver. 4. Israel shall abide many days, &c.] This threatening was fulfilled upon the ten tribes immediately upon their captivity by Shalmaneser (compare ix. 4), and upon the two remaining tribes at the destruction of their temple and commonwealth, during the Babylonish captivity. The later Jews thus express the sense of those exiles in the Song of the Three Children, as it is found among the apocryphal writings, ver. 14, "Neither is there at this time, prince, or prophet, or leader, or burnt-offering, or sacrifice, or oblation, or incense, or place to sacrifice before thee, and find mercy." This threatening was still more remarkably fulfilled upon the whole nation of the Jews, from the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian unto this day. From that time they have had no republic or civil government of their own; but live everywhere, like so many exiles, only upon sufferance; they have had neither priests nor sacrifice, their temple being destroyed where only they were to offer sacrifice: and yet the want of a place where to perform the most solemn part of their public worship, does not tempt them to idolatry, or make them fond of image worship, or any such idolatrous practice, which was the epidemical sin of their forefathers. This seems the general import of this remarkable prophecy: but the several expressions must be more particularly explained.

Without a king,] A king in the Hebrew language signifies any sort of governor or magistrate: it is applied to Moses, Deut. xxxiii. 5, and to the judges, Judg. xvii. 6, and to the four successive monarchies, Dan. vii. 14. So in the New Testament, Rev. xvii. 10, the seven kings are commonly explained of seven sorts of governments: so here a king means any civil magistrate with supreme authority.

Without a prince,] The word may be equivalent to the former: if we suppose it to denote a distinct authority, it may be fitly explained of the high-priest, and the heads of the priestly courses: called "the princes of the sanctuary," Isa. xlvi. 8, and "governors of the house of the Lord," Jer. xx. 1. Taking the word in this sense, it fitly follows, "And without a sacrifice," which could only be offered by the priests.

Without an image,—an ephod, and without teraphim;] Some interpreters suppose these words to denote the several ways of lawful worship, or means of inquiring after the will of God; and by the word matzebah, they understand an altar: this sense agrees very well with the word sacrifice, going before: the same word is joined with an altar erected to God's worship, Isa. xix. 19, and signifies in that place such a religious memorial as Jacob set up, Gen. xxviii. 18. Teraphim they suppose to signify the same with the urim, or the oracle placed in the breast-plate of the high-priest, and therefore fitly joined with the ephod, which often signifies the whole priestly habit, and is particularly mentioned

when there is occasion of consulting God by the high-priest, 1 Sam. xxiii. 9, xxx. 7. This interpretation is followed by the LXX. and it makes an easy and natural sense of the text, viz. that God will deprive the Jews of the principal offices, for the enjoyment of which they chiefly valued themselves, viz. that of the priesthood, and that of prophecy. The Jews had no succession of prophets for a considerable time before Christ's coming (Ecclus. xxxvi. 15, 1 Mace. iv. 46, ix. 27, xiv. 41): and both kingdom and priesthood were taken away within forty years after Christ's death. Dr. Spencer carries this interpretation so far, as to be very positive that teraphim means the same with the urim, and that both words denote an image enclosed within the folds of the high-priest's breast-plate, which uttered oracles by a voice (lib. iii. De Legib. Hebr. Dissert. ult.). This opinion is strenuously opposed by Dr. Pocock in his notes upon this place, to which I refer the reader. Other learned men agree with Dr. Pocock, in observing that the word teraphim is, in other places of scripture, used for a sort of divination practised by idolaters, and therefore think it unlikely that the prophet should express an oracle of God's own appointment by so infamous a name: whereupon they suppose, that Hosea here speaking to the ten tribes, means some idolatrous kind of divination practised by the priests at Dan and Bethel, after Jeroboam's schism; as if he had threatened them, that in a short time they should have neither king, nor priest, nor sacrifice, nor any degree of prophecy or foreknowledge of what is to come. This interpretation exactly agrees with that state of the people's widowhood, described ver. 3.

To this interpretation it may be objected, that it cannot be thought a proper punishment to threaten the taking away an idolatrous sort of worship. But to this they answer, that the prophet here conforms his speech to the sentiments of those he speaks to, and threatens them with the loss of what they were extremely fond of.

Ver. 5. Afterward shall—Israel return, and seek the Lord] They shall be touched with a true remorse for their former errors (especially that of rejecting the Messias), and shall desire to be instructed in the knowledge of the truth (compare Jer. 1. 4). The expression of "seeking the Lord," alludes to the custom of the Jews going up in companies to celebrate their solemn feasts at Jerusalem (compare v. 6, Ps. cv. 4, Jer. 1. 4, 5).

David their king:] The Messias is often called so by the prophets, as being the person that was to spring from his loins, and in whom all the promises made to David were to be fulfilled (see Isa. lv. 3, 4, Jer. xxx. 9, Ezek. xxxiv. 23, xxxvii. 24). So the Chaldee paraphrase expounds this and the parallel texts. David was a type of the Messias (see Ps. lxxxix. 20, 36); who therefore is called by the name of David: so John Baptist is called Elias, Mal. iv. 5, because he was to resemble him, and to succeed him in his office of reproofing the people, and exhorting them to repentance. The expression cannot be literally understood here, David himself having been dead long before the uttering of this prophecy.

And shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days] The goodness of God in making them partakers of the mercies of the gospel, shall engage them to yield an entire obedience to him (compare Jer. xxxii. 9): and this will come to pass in the latter days or times of the world. The "latter days" are often spoken of the times of the gospel (see note upon Isa. ii. 2, Dan. ii. 28). But the phrase does sometimes denote the very last days of the gospel age, near which time probably the conversion of the Jews will be brought to pass (see Deut. iv. 30, Jer. xxx. 21, Ezek. xxxviii. 8, 16).

CHAPTER IV.

1 HEAR the word of the LORD, ye children of Israel: for the LORD hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land.

2 By swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, they break out, and blood toucheth blood.

3 Therefore shall the land mourn, and every one that dwelleth therein shall languish, with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven;

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet denounces judgment against the sins both of the people and priests of the ten tribes; and exhorts Judah to take warning by Israel's calamity.

Ver. 1. The Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants] The expression is taken from the actions or pleas which one man hath against another for injuries or damages received: so here God is represented as entering into judgment with the inhabitants of the ten tribes for their impieties, as being so many injuries to his honour, for which he demands satisfaction (compare xii. 2, Isa. iii. 13, v. 3, 4, xliii. 26, Jer. xxv. 30).

Ver. 2. By swearing,—and scaling,] Stealing, and swearing, i. e. false-swearing, are elsewhere joined together: because in the Jewish courts of justice men that were suspected of theft, were obliged to purge themselves by oath: and they often ventured to forswear themselves rather than discover the truth (see Prov. xxix. 24, xxx. 9, Zech. v. 4).

They break out,] There is an inundation of all manner of wickedness, and all law and right are broken through and violated.

Blood toucheth blood,] Compare v. 2, vi. 9. This may more particularly relate to the murder of their kings, that were slain by their successors: as Zechariah by Shallum, Shallum by Menahem (2 Kings xv. 10, 14). In such civil broils a great many of their friends and dependants are commonly slain with the kings themselves (see 1 Kings xvi. 11).

Ver. 3.] These civil wars and commotions make the whole land look dismally: the inhabitants are either destroyed, or forced to leave their habitations, and languish under want of all things; the beasts of the field, and fowls of the air, are consumed by famine or pestilence: and the fishes of the rivers and great waters (called seas in the Hebrew language) are killed through drought, or the waters being tainted by the infection of the air, or corrupted by the blood of the slain (compare Jer. iv. 25, Zeph. i. 3). The prophets sometimes describe a general desolation by yea, the fishes of the sea also shall be taken away.

4 Yet let no man strive, nor reprove another: for thy people are as they that strive with the priest.

5 Therefore shalt thou fall in the day, and the prophet also shall fall with thee in the night, and I will destroy thy mother.

6 ¶ My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge: because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me: seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God, I will also forget thy children.

7 As they were increased, so they sinned against me: therefore will I change their glory into shame.

8 They eat up the sin of my people, and they set their heart on their iniquity.

9 And there shall be, like people, like priest: and I will punish them for their ways, and reward them their doings.

an enumeration of particulars (compare Isa. xix. 5. 8).

Ver. 4.] The prophet speaks of the Israelites as one that despaired of their amendment, and thought it lost labour to reprove them, they being of that refractory temper, as not to hearken to instruction, and even to quarrel with their priests themselves, when they admonished them of their duty. This seems to be a proverbial expression to denote a stubborn and incorrigible temper; for it was a capital offence by law for any to behave themselves in a presumptuous manner against the injunctions of the priest (see Deut. xvii. 12).

Ver. 5. Therefore shalt thou fall in the day, and the prophet—in the night.] Thou shalt be destroyed both by open violence and by secret treachery (compare Jer. vi. 4, 5, xv. 8): and the false prophets shall be involved in the same destruction (compare ix. 7. 8).

I will destroy thy mother.] The Hebrew reads, “I will cut off thy mother;” i. e. the whole state or kingdom of Israel (compare ii. 2, Jer. vi. 2, xv. 8).

Ver. 6. My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge.] The ignorance of the true principles of religion, which prevails among the people of the ten tribes, is the occasion of those sins which draw down such heavy judgments upon them: the Levites who are placed in every tribe by God’s appointment for the better instructing of the people, are turned out of their possessions by Jeroboam and his successors, and none left to teach them their duty (see 2 Chron. xi. 14).

I will also reject thee.] This is spoken to Jeroboam’s priests, who, being taken “out of the lowest of the people” (1 Kings xii. 31), were very ignorant themselves, and therefore unable to teach others.

I will also forget thy children.] I will not look upon them any longer “as the seed of Abraham,” and children of my covenant.

Ver. 7. As they were increased, so they sinned against me.] Or, “The more they were increased, the more they sinned against me” (see Noldius, p. 436). The greater were the favours I heaped upon them, the more presumptuously they sinned against me (compare xiii. 6). Therefore I will divest them of all those glories for which they pride themselves, and lead them away in a poor and miserable condition into captivity.

Ver. 8.] These idolatrous priests, mentioned ver.

10 For they shall eat, and not have enough: they shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase: because they have left off to take heed to the LORD.

11 Whoredom and wine and new wine take away the heart.

12 ¶ My people ask counsel at their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them: for the spirit of whoredoms hath caused them to err, and they have gone a whoring from under their God.

13 They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks and poplars and elms, because the shadow thereof is good: therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses shall commit adultery.

14 I will not punish your daughters when they commit whoredom, nor your spouses when they commit adultery: for themselves are separated with whores, and they sacrifice with harlots: therefore the people that doth not understand shall fall.

6, live upon the sin-offerings of the people; and are so far from restraining them, that they take delight in seeing them commit iniquity; because the more they sin, the greater is the number of their sin-offerings, which are the priests’ portion.

Ver. 9.] As they are alike in sinning, so shall they be in punishment.

Ver. 10. And not have enough.] Or, “Not be satisfied;” as the word is elsewhere translated (see Lev. xxvi. 26, Mic. vi. 14). The expression may signify either, their food shall not afford due nourishment, for want of God’s blessing accompanying it (compare Deut. viii. 3, Hag. i. 6); or else the words imply a threatening them with famine, when they shall not have food enough to satisfy a craving appetite (compare Lev. xxvi. 26, Amos iv. 8, Mic. vi. 14). The contrary phrase, “To eat, and be full,” or satisfied, denotes plenty (see Lev. xxvi. 5, Deut. vi. 11, viii. 10, xi. 15, Ps. xxii. 26, Joel ii. 26.)

Ver. 11.] Deprive men of their judgment, and darken their understandings. So a gift is said to “destroy the heart,” Eccles. vii. 7, to bereave men of the use of their discerning faculties.

Ver. 12. Ask counsel at their stocks.] Of their idols; for so the word nets elsewhere often signifies (see Jer. ii. 27, x. 8, Hab. ii. 19).

Their staff declareth unto them.] This, learned men suppose to be the same kind of divination with that made by arrows, which is described, Ezek. xxi. 21 (see the note upon that place).

For the spirit of whoredoms hath caused them to err.] This is to be understood of idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom (compare v. 4).

Ver. 13. They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains.] The sacrificing upon mountains and shady groves was an ancient piece of idolatry, often mentioned and reproved by the prophets (see Isa. i. 29, Ezek. vi. 13, xx. 20, and the notes upon those places).

Your daughters shall commit whoredom.] God delivers men up to vile affections, as a punishment of their idolatry (see Rom. i. 28).

Ver. 14. I will not punish your daughters when they commit whoredom.] I will suffer them to “fall from one degree of wickedness to another” (see the foregoing verse).

They sacrifice with harlots.] The word rendered harlot signifies such as prostituted themselves in an idol-temple, in honour of the idol: such lewd practices were frequent in the gentile temples dedicated.

15 ¶ Though thou, Israel, play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend; and come not ye unto Gilgal, neither go ye up to Beth-aven, nor swear, The Lord liveth.

16 For Israel slideth back as a backsliding heifer: now the Lord will feed them as a lamb in a large place.

to Venus, and such-like impure deities (see Baruch vi. 23): from thence the Jews learned those filthy customs (see 1 Kings xiv. 23, 24, xv. 12.) The LXX. render the word very properly παραστρέφω; such as are initiated into the service of the idol by lewd rites.

That doth not understand shall fall.] See ver. 1, 6. Ver. 15. Yet let not Judah offend;] The kingdom of Judah still retained the worship of the true God, and the ordinances of the temple-service: so the prophet exhorts that people not to be led away by the ill example of their brethren of the ten tribes.

Come not ye unto Gilgal, neither go ye up to Beth-aven.] Gilgal was a remarkable place for the renewing of the rite of circumcision (Josh. v. 9): there the people afterward used to offer sacrifice (1 Sam. xv. 21): after Jeroboam's setting up of idolatry, it was noted for the worship of false gods, as appears by comparing this text with ix. 15, xii. 11, Amos iv. 4, v. 5. In those places of Amos, as well as in this verse, it is joined with Beth-el, noted for the worship of one of Jeroboam's calves; called here Beth-aven, and x. 5. Beth-el originally signifies "the house of God;" that name was given to it by Jacob, because of God's appearing to him there, Gen. xxviii. 17. But when it became the seat of idolatry, it was called Beth-aven, i. e. the house of vanity.

Nor swear, The Lord liveth.] As long as ye continue to worship idols, I will not have my name mentioned by your polluted lips, inasmuch as there is no fellowship between God and idols. Many of the Israelites halted between God and Baal, and the other idols, sometimes serving one, and sometimes the others (see 1 Kings xviii. 21, Ezek. xx. 39, xxiii. 38, 39, Zeph. i. 4, 5). Some understand the words, of their swearing by the name of the true God, which is a solemn act of religious worship (see Deut. x. 20), and yet meaning by it the god that is worshipped at Beth-el. This God forbids as a profanation of his name (see Amos viii. 14).

Ver. 16. Israel slideth back as a backsliding heifer:] The word translated slideth back, properly signifies being headstrong and untractable: it is a metaphor from oxen or heifers that draw their neck back, and will not put it under the yoke (see Jer. vii. 24). The expression alludes to the calves called heifers by the Septuagint, which they worshipped.

17 Ephraim is joined to idols: let him alone.

18 Their drink is sour: they have committed whoredom continually: her rulers with shame do love, Give ye.

19 The wind hath bound her up in her wings, and they shall be ashamed because of their sacrifices.

Now the Lord will feed them as a lamb in a large place.] The expression seems ironical; as if the prophet had said, they were like headstrong cattle, that would not be managed by their leaders or drivers: so God will suffer them to be scattered as sheep without a shepherd in the large country of Assyria, whither they shall be led captive.

Ver. 17.] Ephraim signifies the same with Israel, or the ten tribes (see v. 3). It is to no purpose to take pains to reclaim him (see ver. 4).

Ver. 18. Their drink is sour:] The phrase may be metaphorical, to express the corruption of their manners (compare Deut. xxxii. 32, Isa. i. 22): or else, if we join it in sense with the remaining part of the verse, it imports their excessive drinking, till their liquor turn sour in their stomachs: and so the whole verse taxes them for three great vices, drunkenness, whoredom, and bribery.

They have committed whoredom] This may be understood of idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom (see ver. 12), but the literal sense agrees very well with the rest of the verse.

Her rulers with shame do love, Give ye.] i. e. Are continually asking or expecting bribes (compare Prov. xxx. 15): are still greedy of filthy lucre (see Mic. iii. 11, vii. 3).

The Hebrew word translated rulers, properly signifies shields: it is taken for rulers in Ps. xlviii. 9, as well as here.

Ver. 19.] The words threaten them with going into captivity: for it is common with the prophets to express what is future by the preter-perfect tense (see the note upon Isa. xxi. 9): God's anger is often expressed by a blustering or tempestuous wind (see xiii. 15, Jer. iv. 11, 12, li. 1). This wind is said here to carry them away out of their country: and then they will have reason to be ashamed of their idolatrous sacrifices, which have brought such severe judgments upon them.

CHAPTER V.

1 HEAR ye this, O priests; and hearken, ye house of Israel; and give ye ear, O house of the king; for judgment is toward you, because ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor.

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter and the next to the fourth verse, threatens judgments both against Israel and Judah for their manifold sins, till they repent: upon which they may conceive hopes of pardon.

Ver. 1. O priests:] Or rather, "O princes;" which reading better agrees with "the house of the king" that follows; the Hebrew word is of both significations. So Gen. xlii. 45, and Exod. ii. 16, where it is in the text "priest of On and Midian;" but the margin reads "the prince of On and Midian" (compare vi. 9).

For judgment is toward you (or against you), because ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor.] Ye have laid snares for others to seize upon them and kill them (see ver. 2); just as hunters spread their nets upon mountains and hills in order to catch their prey. Mizpah and Tabor were two noted mountains; the former on the hither side of Jordan, the other on the farther side of it, the same with Gilead (see Gen. xxxi. 25, 40, 49).

Ver. 2. The revolvers are profound to make slaughter] The ringleaders in idolatry and other wickedness lay deep designs to ensnare men's lives (compare iv. 4, vi. 9).

slaughter, though I have been a rebuker of them all.

3 I know Ephraim, and Israel is not hid from me: for now, O Ephraim, thou committest whoredom, and Israel is defiled.

4 They will not frame their doings to turn unto their God: for the spirit of whoredoms is in the midst of them, and they have not known the Lord.

5 And the pride of Israel doth testify to his face: therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity; Judah also shall fall with them.

6 They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord; but they shall not find him; he hath withdrawn himself from them.

7 They have dealt treacherously against the

I have been a rebuker of them all.] By my prophets (compare vi. 5).

Ver. 3. I know Ephraim, and Israel is not hid from me:] I know him and his doings; Ephraim is equivalent to Israel, as distinct from Judah, in this prophecy, and comprehendeth the ten tribes, ver. 5, 12, 14, iv. 17, vi. 4, 10, vii. 8, 11, viii. 9, and in several other places. Ephraim was the head of the ten tribes, both for its numbers, and because Jeroboam had placed the seat of his kingdom in that tribe (1 Kings xii. 25).

Ibid. and ver. 4. Ephraim, thou committest whoredom,] See iv. 12.

Ver. 5. The pride of Israel doth testify to his face:] Their indecent behaviour towards God, whose worship they despise, doth discover itself in all their behaviour; and convicts them of the just desert of their sins (compare Isa. iii. 9).

Ver. 6. They shall go with their flocks—to seek the Lord:] “The sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord;” as the scripture often observes (see Prov. xv. 8, Isa. i. 15). This verse is meant of the people of Judah, mentioned in the latter part of the foregoing verse; who, though they did frequent the temple-worship, yet came thither without any true sense of religion; for which the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah particularly reprove them (see Isa. i. 11, &c. Jer. vii. 3, &c.).

He hath withdrawn himself from them.] God is said to hide and withdraw himself, when he will not answer men's prayers, nor afford them seasonable relief in time of need (see 1 Sam. xxviii. 16, Ps. cii. 2, Lam. iii. 44, and compare Mic. iii. 4).

Ver. 7. They have dealt treacherously] The verb bagad, to deal treacherously, signifies properly a wife's being false to her husband (see Jer. iii. 20): from whence it is applied to the sin of idolatry, so often styled spiritual whoredom (compare vi. 7, Isa. xlvi. 8, Jer. v. 11).

Begotten strange children:] “Strange children” may either mean children begotten of heathen women, whom they took to marriage, contrary to the law (Exod. xxiii. 32, Deut. vii. 2), or it may signify such children as are bred up in the idolatrous practices of their fathers.

Now shall a month devour them] If we understand this verse of Judah (which interpretation the foregoing and following verses favour), the words may be expounded of the invasion made upon Judah by Pekah, king of Israel; of which, see 2 Chron. xxviii. 6. By “a month's devouring them,” is meant a sudden and speedy destruction (compare Zech. xi. 8).

— Ver. 8. Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah:] This imports the sounding an alarm to give notice of the approaching enemy (compare Joel ii. 1), which threatens to invade the kingdom of Judah (see the foregoing verse). These were towns in the tribe of Benjamin, that lay upon the frontiers of that kingdom.

8 Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah: cry aloud at Beth-aven, after thee, O Benjamin.

9 Ephraim shall be desolate in the day of rebuke: among the tribes of Israel have I made known that which shall surely be.

10 The princes of Judah were like them that remove the bound: therefore I will pour out my wrath upon them like water.

11 Ephraim is oppressed and broken in judgment, because he willingly walked after the commandment.

12 Therefore will I be unto Ephraim as a pare Joel ii. 1), which threatens to invade the kingdom of Judah (see the foregoing verse). These were towns in the tribe of Benjamin, that lay upon the frontiers of that kingdom.

Cry aloud at Beth-aven,] To give notice of the approach of the enemy (compare Isa. x. 30). Beth-aven may either mean Beth-el (see iv. 15), or a town of that name near to it (see Josh. vii. 2).

After thee, O Benjamin.] The enemy is just behind thee: or, Let him that is after thee, or behind thee, O Benjamin, prepare himself to battle; i. e. the tribe of Judah, which lay next to Benjamin.

Ver. 9. Ephraim shall be desolate] God's judgments shall likewise overtake Israel, or the ten tribes (see note on ver. 3), as well as Judah.

Have I made known that which surely shall be.] I have denounced my judgments against the whole kingdom of Israel as well as that of Judah, and given them warning that they may escape them by a timely repentance.

Ver. 10. The princes of Judah were like them that remove the bound:] They have violated the most sacred laws of God, upon which not only the ordinances of his worship, but likewise the rights and properties of men depend; and are become guilty of the same injustice and confusion with those that remove the ancient bounds and landmarks (see Deut. xix. 14). Critics observe, that the note of similitude is sometimes in sense equivalent to a strong affirmation. So Isa. xiii. 6, “It shall come as a destruction from the Almighty:” i. e. it shall be an apparent instance of the divine vengeance. John i. 14, “We beheld his glory, as of the only-begotten of the Father:” i. e. such as proved him to be the only-begotten of the Father.

Pour out my wrath upon them like water.] Which shall overwhelm them like a deluge. Great calamities are often compared to the overflowing of water (see Ps. xxxii. 6, lxix. 1, cxiv. 7, Isa. xxx. 28, Dan. ix. 26).

Ver. 11. Ephraim is oppressed] He is delivered over to oppressors by God's just judgment: such were Pul and Tiglath-pileser, kings of Assyria (2 Kings xv. 19, 29, compare Deut. xxviii. 33).

He willingly walked after the commandment.] This is commonly explained of Jeroboam's command to his subjects of forsaking the worship of the true God; which they readily complied with. Of the same kind were the statutes of Omri, which are mentioned Mic. vi. 16. But the LXX. render it, “He walked after vanity;” i. e. idolatry: either reading it shave for save; or else supposing the latter word put for the former; as there are frequent instances in the Hebrew text, that letters which are near the same sound are often changed one for another.

Ver. 12.] My judgments shall consume both Israel moth, and to the house of Judah as rottenness.

13 When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb: yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound.

14 For I will be unto Ephraim as a lion, and and Judah, as a "moth fretteth a garment" (see ver. 3).

Ver. 13. When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah his wound.] When the king of Israel saw himself too weak to contend with Pul, king of Assyria, he sent an embassy to make him his ally, and in order to it became his tributary, that "his hand might be with him to confirm his kingdom to him" (2 Kings xv. 19); which king is therefore called king Jareb, i. e. the king that should plead for him, or defend his cause against any that should oppose him. So in like manner shall Ahaz, king of Judah, implore the assistance of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, against his enemies (2 Kings xvi. 7, 2 Chron. xxviii. 16—18).

Yet could he not heal you.] Yet neither of these alliances afforded any lasting benefit or succour to those that desired their help; Menahem's son being as a young lion to the house of Judah: I, even I, will tear and go away; I will take away, and none shall rescue him.

15 ¶ I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early.

after a short reign killed by Pekah; and Ahaz being rather distressed than helped by Tiglath-pileser (2 Chron. xxviii. 21).

Ver. 14.] I will pour out my judgments upon both kingdoms without mercy (compare xiii. 7, 8, Ps. 1. 22, Lam. iii. 10).

Ver. 15. I will go and return to my place.] I will withdraw myself from them (see ver. 6), till by a sincere humiliation they implore my favour. The Chaldee paraphrase expresses the sense thus: "I will take away my majestic presence, or Shechinah, from among them, and will return into heaven." Ezekiel describes the destruction of the temple and kingdom, by God's removing his glory from the sanctuary and the city (see Ezek. x. 4, xi. 23).

They will seek me early.] i. e. Earnestly, with great diligence and assiduity (see Prov. i. 28, Ps. lxxviii. 34).

CHAPTER VI.

1 COME, and let us return unto the LORD: for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and will bind us up.

2 After two days will he revive us: in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight.

3 Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the LORD: his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth.

4 ¶ O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? O Judah, what shall I do unto thee? for your goodness is as a morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away.

5 Therefore have I hewed them by the prophets; I have slain them by the words of my mouth: and thy judgments are as the light (that) goeth forth.

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.—The first three verses of this chapter should have been joined to the fifth, as was observed in the argument of that chapter: in the following verses God complains of their incorrigibility, and threatens his judgments as a just consequent of their sins.

Ver. 1. Come, and let us return, &c.] A form of supplication which the prophet dictates to them, as very proper for the occasion (compare xiv. 2). The LXX. add the word λέγοντες, "saying," to the end of the foregoing verse.

He hath torn, and he will heal us;] The same God that punisheth us, can only remove his judgments, and show us mercy (compare Deut. xxxii. 39, 1 Sam. ii. 6). The expression, "he hath torn," relates to what is said, v. 14.

Ver. 2.] A deliverance from such miseries or calamities, from whence men despair of a recovery, is often represented as restoring them to life after death (see Ps. xxx. 3, lxxi. 20, lxxxvi. 13). Particularly the restoration of the Jewish nation is often described, as if it were a new life from the dead: see the note upon Ezek. xxxvii. 11. Two or three in scripture denotes a small number (see Isa. xvii. 6, Matt. xviii. 20), accordingly here it signifies a short space of time (compare Luke xiii. 32, 33). Dr. Wells thinks the words primarily foretell Hezekiah's recovery from his dangerous sickness on the third day (2 Kings xx. 5): but it is certain, taking the expression in its true and natural sense, it is a plain prediction of our Lord's resurrection, and referred to by St. Paul as a proof of it, 1 Cor. xv. 4. The prophets, when they predicted temporal deliverances, were often carried out beyond themselves and their first subject, if I may so express it, to foretell the more signal mercies relating to the times of the gospel.

Ver. 3. Then shall we know, if we follow on] God will bless our sincere endeavours to know his will with a proportionable success (compare Isa. liv. 13).

His going forth is prepared as the morning;] The comforts of the gospel are here expressed by two things, which are very proper to enliven and exhilarate our spirits, a fair morning, and a kindly season, wherein the earth plentifully yields her increase, by a due intermixture of rain and sunshine (compare 2 Sam. xxiii. 4, and see the note upon ii. 22). Concerning the former and the latter rain, see the note upon Joel ii. 23.

Ver. 4. What shall I do unto thee?] Or rather, "What shall I do for thee" (see x. 3)! How can I show either Israel or Judah any mercy or favour, since there is nothing of true or solid goodness to be found in you.

Ver. 5. I hewed them by the prophets; I have slain them by the words of my mouth.] The verb rendered hewed, signifies likewise to cut off, or destroy (see Isa. li. 9). The prophets are said to do things, when they declared God's purpose of doing them (see Jer. i. 10, v. 14, Ezek. xliii. 3). God's word is described as "sharper than a two-edged sword," Heb. iv. 12, Rev. i. 16, because his judgments denounced by his mes-

6 For I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings.

7 But they like men have transgressed the covenant: there have they dealt treacherously against me.

8 Gilead is a city of them that work iniquity, and is polluted with blood.

9 And as troops of robbers wait for a man, so sengers are like the sentence of a judge, which shall be certainly followed with execution.

Thy judgments are as the light that goeth forth.] Thou wilt make the justice of thy judgments, O God, appear as clear as the light of the rising sun. It is frequent in the Hebrew language to change the discourse from the first to the second or third person.

Ver. 6. And not sacrifice;] i. e. Rather than sacrifice; I am better pleased with true goodness, than with the exactest observance of the external duties of religion, unless they proceed from a sincere principle of obedience (see Mic. vi. 6—8). The Jews used to express comparisons by negatives, or rejecting the thing less worthy: so we are to understand that expression of the prophet Joel (ii. 13), “Rend your heart, and not your garments:” and those words of Christ (John vi. 27), “Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that which endureth to everlasting life;” i. e. for this rather than the former; and that text of St. Peter (1 Pet. iii. 3, 4), “Whose adorning, let it not be the outward adorning of plaiting the hair, or wearing gold; but let it be the hidden man of the heart.”

Ver. 7. But they like men [Hebrew, like Adam] have transgressed the covenant:] Which I solemnly contracted with them; just as Adam did in Paradise.

There have they dealt treacherously against me.] In that very instance of my loving-kindness, they made the most unsuitable returns (see v. 7).

Ver. 8.] The iniquity which Gilead is here accused of is, probably, idolatry, as appears by comparing this verse with xii. 11. The Hebrew word aven, used in both places, frequently signifies so; and the blood which is said to be polluted with, may the company of priests murder in the way by consent: for they commit lewdness.

10 I have seen an horrible thing in the house of Israel: there is the whoredom of Ephraim, Israel is defiled.

11 Also, O Judah, he hath set an harvest for thee, when I returned the captivity of my people.

mean the blood of their children which they sacrificed to Moloch. Dr. Wells interprets the verse of those Gileadites who assisted Pekah in the murder of Pekahiah, 2 Kings xv. 25. The Hebrew phrase translated here “polluted with blood,” literally signifies “with bloody footsteps,” being taken from such as are found with their shoes stained with the blood they have shed (compare 1 Kings ii. 5).

Ver. 9. The company of priests murder in the way by consent:] The word cohanim, priests, does likewise signify princes (see v. 1): who are often reproved by the prophets as guilty of great injustice and oppression (see Ezek. xxii. 27, Zeph. iii. 3).

They commit lewdness.] Or, enormity: as the margin reads to a better sense.

Ver. 10. I have seen an horrible thing] Such an apostasy from God as cannot be mentioned without horror (compare Jer. ii. 11. 12, v. 30).

There is the whoredom of Ephraim.] This may be understood, both in a literal and a metaphorical sense, for idolatry (see iv. 12—14).

Ver. 11. O Judah, he hath set an harvest for thee,] Or, a harvest is appointed for thee; the active is used for the impersonal (see the note upon Isa. xlv. 18); i. e. thou hast made thyself ripe for destruction (compare Jer. li. 33, Joel iii. 13, Mic. iv. 12, Rev. xiv. 15).

When I returned the captivity of my people.] The sense would be plainer if the words were rendered, “When I would have turned away the captivity of my people:” when I would, upon their repentance, have averted my judgments, which will end in their captivity. The Hebrew language wants the potential mood, which is supplied by the tenses of the indicative.

CHAPTER VII.

1 WHEN I would have healed Israel, then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered, and the wickedness of Samaria: for they commit falsehood; and the thief cometh in, and the troop of robbers spoileth without.

2 And they consider not in their hearts that I remember all their wickedness: now their own doings have beset them about; they are before my face.

3 They make the king glad with their wickedness, and the princes with their lies.

4 They are all adulterers, as an oven heated

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet reproves the sins of the princes and great men of Israel, and denounces judgments against the people in general for their hypocrisy.

Ver. 1: When I would have healed Israel, then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered, &c.] When God was just averting his judgment from Israel, the people gave him new provocations, especially the inhabitants of Samaria, the principal seat of the kingdom (see ver. 5).

For they commit falsehood, &c.] Both great and small seize other men's properties by the secret methods of fraud, and the open violence of rapine and oppression (see v. 1, vi. 10).

Vol. III.—59

Ver. 2. Their own doings have beset them about;] They shall be taken in their own wickedness (see Ps. ix. 16, Prov. v. 22), and their sin shall bring its own punishment with it.

Ver. 3. They make the king glad with their wickedness,] They study to please their kings and great men by complying with the idolatry they have set up. The LXX. read, kings, in the plural number, meaning the succession of kings of Israel from Jeroboam.

Princes with their lies.] Which they speak to please and flatter them. But the word lie sometimes signifies an idol, and the practice of idolatry, as being set up in direct opposition to the true God (compare ver. 13, ii. 4, x. 13, xi. 12, Hab. ii. 18, Rom. i. 25, Rev. xxii. 15). This sense agrees very well with the scope and design of the place.

Ver. 4. They are all adulterers,] The expression by the baker, who ceaseth from raising after he hath kneaded the dough, until it be leavened.

5 In the day of our king the princes have made him sick with bottles of wine; he stretched out his hand with scorers.

6 For they have made ready their heart like an oven, whiles they lie in wait: their baker sleepeth all the night; in the morning it burneth as a flaming fire.

7 They are all hot as an oven, and have devoured their judges; all their kings are fallen: there is none among them that calleth unto me.

8 Ephraim, he hath mixed himself among the people; Ephraim is a cake not turned.

9 Strangers have devoured his strength, and he knoweth it not: yea, grey hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth not.

10 And the pride of Israel testifieth to his may be metaphorical, implying that they were apostates from God, to whose service they were engaged by the most solemn bond and covenant (compare Jer. ix. 2, Matt. xiv. 4, James iv. 4). If the words be understood literally, the prophet compares the heat of their lust to the flame of an oven; as it follows.

Who ceaseth from raising after he hath kneaded the dough,] When an oven is sufficiently heated, the baker doth not raise any more fire, but thinks what he has made, enough to keep the oven hot, till the dough be fit to put into the oven. Some render the latter part of the sentence thus, "Who ceaseth from waking, or watching" (his oven); to the same sense with that of ver. 6, "Their baker sleepeth all the night."

Ver. 5. Made him sick with bottles of wine;] Or, "With being overheated through wine;" so the word chamath signifies, IIab. ii. 15. The day of the king's birth or inauguration was kept with riot and excess.

He stretched out his hand with scorers.] He encouraged mean and loose people to converse too familiarly with him, forgetting his rank and dignity.

Ver. 6.] This verse pursues the metaphor begun in ver. 4. As the baker, when he has thoroughly heated his oven, if he lays himself to sleep in the night, finds all in a flame in the morning: so the great men of the land kindle evil desires in their hearts, and at the first opportunity their hidden designs break out like a flame into open action.

Ver. 7.] The flame of civil discord is spread among the people in general: this hath been the destruction both of the inferior magistrates and of their kings too; an anarchy continuing for eleven years after the death of Jeroboam the second; and afterward his son Zechariah, and his successors Shallum and Pekahiah, being slain by conspiracies formed against them (2 Kings xv. 10, 14, 25.) And yet these confusions have not brought either kings or people to a due humiliation for their sins.

Ver. 8. Ephraim, he hath mixed himself among the people;] Whereas Israel was by God's institution to be his "peculiar people," Deut. vii. 6, he has mixed or joined himself with idolaters (see Ps. cvi. 35); and he shall have a just punishment for his sins, he shall be carried away captive to dwell among them (see ix. 3, Jer. xvi. 12, 13).

A cake not turned.] Baked only on one side: i. e. serving God by halves, and halting between his service and the worship of idols. The Chaldee paraphrast interprets it, "Before it is baked on both sides, it is devoured by its greedy enemies;" the face: and they do not return to the Lord their God, nor seek him for all this.

11 ¶ Ephraim also is like a silly dove, without heart: they call to Egypt, they go to Assyria.

12 When they shall go, I will spread my net upon them; I will bring them down as the fowls of the heaven; I will chastise them, as their congregation hath heard.

13 Woe unto them! for they have fled from me: destruction unto them! because they have transgressed against me: though I have redeemed them, yet they have spoken lies against me.

14 And they have not cried unto me with their heart, when they howled upon their beds: they assemble themselves for corn and wine, and they rebel against me.

15 Though I have bound and strengthened their arms, yet do they imagine mischief against me.

metaphor being taken from the ravenousness of a hungry stomach. This sense agrees very well with what follows.

Ver. 9. Strangers have devoured his strength, and (or yet) he knoweth it not:] The Syrians, in the time of Jehoahaz, reduced them very low (see 2 Kings xiii. 7): afterward they became tributaries to Pul king of Assyria (2 Kings xv. 20), and at length were carried captive by Shalmaneser (2 Kings xvii.). And yet all these afflictions do not make them sensible of the ill state of their affairs, and that the hand of God is against them (see ii. 8, and the following verse: Isa. xlii. 25).

Grey hairs are here and there upon him.] He still declines in strength and power, like a man worn out with age, and ready to give up the ghost.

Ver. 10. The pride of Israel] See v. 3.

They do not return to the Lord] See ver. 9.

Ver. 11.] Like an unwary dove which falls into the snare that is laid for it; so the Israelites betake themselves for refuge to their enemies: sometimes they apply themselves to the king of Egypt for succour; at other times they trust to the aid of the Assyrians (see 2 Kings xv. 19, xvii. 4).

Ver. 12. I will spread my net upon them;] Whithersoever they betake themselves for safety, they shall no more escape than birds can escape the snares of the fowler (see the foregoing verse).

I will chastise them, as their congregation hath heard.] I will bring those calamities upon them, which I have denounced in my laws against the whole people of Israel, whenever they forsake me (see Lev. xxvi., Deut. xxviii. compared with 2 Kings xvii. 13, 14). The Chaldee paraphrast renders the latter part of the verse thus, "I will chastise them because they have followed their own counsels:" as if he had read in the original la asatham, instead of laadatham (compare x. 6, xi. 6).

Ver. 13. Though I have redeemed them.] Though I have redeemed them out of Egypt (see Mic. vi. 4), and afforded them many other signal deliverances, yet they have not given me the glory; but have represented me by their golden calves, and "changed my truth into a lie," Rom. i. 25 (see the note upon ver. 3).

Ver. 14. When they howled upon their beds:] When they were bemoaning their calamities, as sick men bewail themselves upon a bed of sickness, yet they did not call upon me heartily and sincerely (compare Jer. iii. 10, Ps. lxxviii. 34, 36).

They assemble themselves for corn and wine, and they rebel against me.] When they assembled them-fall by the sword for the rage of their tongue: this shall be their derision in the land of Egypt.

selves to deprecate a famine, they still retained the same disobedient temper towards me.

Ver. 15.] Though I have bound up their wounds, and given them new strength and vigour, yet they are continually devising some new idolatrous invention, whereby they may dishonour me.

Ver. 16. They are like a deceitful bow:] Their conversion is only outward, not inward and sincere: they are like an ill-contrived bow, which never directs the arrow to the mark (compare Ps. lxxviii. 57).

Their princes shall fall by the sword for the rage of their tongue:] For the dishonour they have done me by blasphemous speeches against me (see ver. 13).

This shall be their derision in the land of Egypt.] Their blasphemies and other enormities shall be a just cause of their reproach to them, when they are exiles in Egypt, whither many of them fled or were carried away captive (see ix. 3, 6; compare viii. 13, and see the notes upon Ezek. xxxvi. 20).

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Set the trumpet to thy mouth. He shall come as an eagle against the house of the LORD, because they have transgressed my covenant, and trespassed against my law.

2 Israel shall cry unto me, My God, we know thee.

3 Israel hath cast off the thing that is good: the enemy shall pursue him.

4 They have set up kings, but not by me: they have made princes, and I knew it not: of their silver and their gold have they made them idols, that they may be cut off.

5 ¶ Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off; mine anger is kindled against them: how long will it be ere they attain to innocency?

6 For from Israel was it also: the workman made it; therefore it is not God: but the calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces.

7 For they have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind: it hath no stalk: the bud shall

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.—God's judgments are denounced both against Judah and Israel, for their idolatries and other impieties.

Ver. 1. Set the trumpet] Give notice of the approaching enemy (see v. 8): who is coming with speed and fierceness, like a bird of prey (see Deut. xxviii. 49), against the city and temple of Jerusalem. By "the house of the Lord" may be meant God's people in general, whom he formerly took a peculiar care of as his own family (compare ix. 15). This may probably denote Sennacherib's invasion, 2 Kings xviii. 17.

Ver. 2.] Israel is placed in the Hebrew the last word in the verse: So Dr. Wells joins it to the next verse, and understands this verse of Judah; who shall cry unto God as their protector, in the times of their fears, when the invasion mentioned in the foregoing verse threatened them (see v. 15). If we understand the words of Israel, according as ours and most other translators render them, the sense of them is, that the ten tribes still acknowledged the true God to be their God, and pretended that they had forsaken him, but worshipped him at Dan and Beth-el, though under sensible representations: as we see Jehu still pretended a great zeal for the Lord, at the same time that he worshipped the golden calves, 1 Kings x. 16, 29.

Ver. 3.] Whereas they have really cast off the true worship of God, and with that everything that is good: and as a punishment of their impiety, their enemy the king of Assyria shall pursue them like a wild beast, and they shall become a prey to him (compare Ps. cxliii. 3, Lam. iii. 66, v. 5). Dr. Wells reads the verse according to the division he has made of this and the foregoing verse: "As for Israel, Israel hath cast off the thing that is good," &c.

Ver. 4. They have set up kings, but not by me:] Shallum, and Menahem, and Pekah, usurped the kingdom by murder and treason (2 Kings xv. 13, 14, 25): not by any declaration of my will, as Jeroboam and Jehu had done, or consulting me by any prophet.

Of their silver and their gold have they made them idols,] They have abused their wealth to idolatry, which will be the occasion of their destruction (see ii. 8).

Ver. 5. Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off;] As the people of Samaria (see ver. 6) have cast off that which is good (ver. 3), so the calf which they worship shall not protect or deliver them from the evils coming upon them, now my anger is kindled against them.

How long will it be ere they attain to innocency?] I shall no longer show any patience towards them, since it is in vain to expect any reformation from them.

Ver. 6. From Israel was it also:] This calf, as well as that made in the wilderness (Exod. xxxii.), was an invention of the Israelites, not borrowed from any of their neighbouring idolaters.

The calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces.] "And carried for a present to the king of Assyria," x. 5, 6. The sense would run better, if the words were rendered, "Therefore the calf of Samaria," &c. so the particle ki often signifies. The "calf of Samaria" denotes the calf of Beth-el, in the kingdom of Samaria (compare x. 5). Samaria being the chief seat of the kingdom of Israel, is often put for that kingdom (see 1 Kings xiii. 33, xxi. 1, 2 Kings v. 3, xxiii. 19).

Ver. 7. They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind:] A proverbial expression, to signify, that as men's works are, so must their reward be: that they who "sow iniquity shall reap vanity," Prov. xxii. 8, their labour shall be fruitless, or shall turn to their hurt and damage (see Eccles. v. 16, and x. 13, of this prophecy). All the pains the kings of Israel and their subjects take to enrich themselves and to strengthen their kingdom, being built upon the foundation of apostasy and idolatry, shall turn to no better account than countrymen expect from a blasted crop of corn: and whatever advantage they make, it shall at last be a prey to yield no meal: if so be it yield, the strangers shall swallow it up.

8 Israel is swallowed up: now shall they be among the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure.

9 For they are gone up to Assyria, a wild ass alone by himself: Ephraim hath hired lovers.

10 Yea, though they have hired among the nations, now will I gather them, and they shall sorrow a little for the burden of the king of princes.

11 Because Ephraim hath made many altars to sin, altars shall be unto him to sin.

eigners, to the kings of Syria and Assyria (see 2 Kings xiii. 3, 4, xv. 29, xvii. 6).

Ver. 8. Israel is swallowed up:] i. e. Shall as certainly be carried captive by the Assyrians, as if he was already gone into captivity (see the note upon Isa. xxi. 9).

As a vessel wherein is no pleasure.] They shall be despised as a vessel or utensil that is broken and becomes useless (compare Jer. xxii. 28, xlviii. 38).

Ver. 9. They are gone up to Assyria.] To engage Pul, king of Assyria, to be their confederate (2 Kings xv. 19).

A wild ass alone by himself:] As a wild ass, which is altogether untractable, and will go its own way (see Job xxxix. 5, Jer. ii. 24). The particle as is frequently understood (see note upon Isa. xxi. 8).

Ephraim hath hired lovers.] Procured foreign allies with great expense, and depends upon them for succour and protection, and not upon God (see ii. 10, v. 13, xii. 1, Jer. xxii. 20, 22).

Ver. 10. Though they have hired [allies] among the nations, now will I gather them,] I will make their own allies turn their enemies, particularly the Assyrians (see note upon Ezek. xvi. 37).

They shall sorrow a little for the burden of the king of princes.] They shall feel the burdens and oppressions laid upon them by the king of Assyria, who styles himself king of kings, as having kings and princes his tributaries (see note upon Isa. x. 8). The word menat signifies "in a little time" here, as it does Hag. ii. 6.

Ver. 11.] Or, "A punishment for his sin:" he shall fall from one degree of wickedness and idolatry to another; and his sin shall bring its own punishment along with it (compare x. 8, Deut. iv. 28, 12 I have written to him the great things of my law, but they were counted as a strange thing.

13 They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifices of mine offerings, and eat it; but the Lord accepteth them not; now will he remember their iniquity, and visit their sins: they shall return to Egypt.

14 For Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples; and Judah hath multiplied fenced cities: but I will send a fire upon his cities, and it shall devour the palaces thereof.

Jer. xvi. 13), and be the occasion of bringing my severest judgments upon him.

Ver. 12.] That law which I gave them by Moses, containing rules excellent in themselves, and such as would have made them great in the eyes of their neighbours (Deut. iv. 6, 8), they have disregarded, as if it had neither reason nor authority.

Ver. 13. They sacrifice flesh—but the Lord accepteth them not;] Their sacrifices are not acceptable to God, being not brought with a religious mind (see cv. 6, ix. 4, Amos iv. 4). The Chaldee paraphrast renders the expression zibche hababai, "the sacrifices of mine offerings," as if it meant "the sacrifices of extortion," such as were gotten by bribes and rapine, which still adds to the wickedness of the offerers (compare Amos ii. 8).

Now will he remember their iniquity,] See ix. 9, Amos viii. 7.

They shall return to Egypt.] As into a second bondage there, which God threatens the Jews as one of the severest judgments he could inflict upon them (Deut. xxviii. 68, see vii. 16, ix. 3, 6 of this prophecy). Or the expression may denote, that they shall go into a state of captivity and bondage, as bad as that which they suffered in Egypt. "Going into Egypt" was a proverbial speech for extreme misery (see note upon Zech. v. 11).

Ver. 14. Buildeth temples;] To his idols, at Dan and Beth-el.

Judah hath multiplied fenced cities:] Judah puts greater confidence in their fortifications than in God's protection: but God's judgments shall destroy them as surely as if a fire had been kindled in them (compare Amos i. 4, &c.). God's vengeance is often compared to fire (see note upon Ezek. xxx. 8).

CHAPTER IX.

1 REJOICE not, O Israel, for joy, as other people: for thou hast gone a whoring from thy God, thou hast loved a reward upon every corn-floor.

2 The floor and the wine-press shall not feed them, and the new wine shall fail in her.

3 They shall not dwell in the Lord's land;

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.—The captivity of the ten tribes is foretold as a judgment for their manifold sins.

Ver. 1. Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy,] The joy here mentioned may properly mean those rejoicings which were commonly made among all people at the end of harvest, when the gentiles offered sacrifices of thanksgiving for the plenty they enjoyed. The prophet tells the Israelites they had more highly offended by their apostasy, than the gentiles did by their ignorance (compare Ezek. xvi. 47, 48).

Thou hast gone a whoring from thy God,] Thou hast broken the covenant God made with thee, by serving other gods (see iv. 12, v. 4, 7), and hast offered the first-fruits, or tithes of thy increase, to idols, as an acknowledgment that the plenty thou enjoyest was their gift (see ii. 12, Jer. xlv. 17).

Ver. 2.] I will take away their plenty of corn and wine, as a just punishment of their ingratitude (see ii. 9, 12).

Ver. 3.] God will turn them out of that inheritance he gave to their fathers, and they shall be carried into captivity and bondage a second time into Egypt (see viii. 13). Their circumstances in captivity will but Ephraim shall return to Egypt, and they shall eat unclean things in Assyria.

4 They shall not offer wine-offerings to the LORD, neither shall they be pleasing unto him: their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners; all that eat thereof shall be polluted: for their bread for their soul shall not come into the house of the LORD.

5 What will ye do in the solemn day, and in the day of the feast of the LORD?

6 For, lo, they are gone because of destruction: Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them: the pleasant places for their silver, nettles shall possess them: thorns shall be in their tabernacles.

7 The days of visitation are come, the days of recompense are come; Israel shall know it: the prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad, for the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great hatred.

8 The watchman of Ephraim was with my God: but the prophet is a snare of a fowler in all his ways, and hatred in the house of his God.

9 They have deeply corrupted themselves, as in the days of Gibeah: therefore he will remember their iniquity, he will visit their sins.

10 I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness; I saw your fathers as the first-ripe in the fig-tree at her first time: but they went to Baal-peor, and separated themselves unto that shame; and their abominations were according as they loved.

not permit them to observe the rules of that law relating to unclean meats, and they will be forced to partake of such meats as have been offered to idols (compare Ezek. iv. 13, Dan. i. 8). The ten tribes were carried captive into the dominions of Assyria, 2 Kings xvii. 6 (compare xi. 11 of this prophecy).

Ver. 4. They shall not offer wine-offerings] A more particular explanation of that threatening denounced, iii. 4, that they should be "without a sacrifice:" that they should have no opportunity in their captivity to offer meat-offerings, or drink-offerings to God, as they did upon the high-places, or in their idolatrous temples (see Amos iv. 4, 5); and sometimes, perhaps, in the temple at Jerusalem (see ver. 15). They themselves shall be in the condition of mourners for the dead, and by that means be unqualified to offer anything to God; nor will their offerings be acceptable (see Deut. xxvi. 14).

All that eat thereof shall be polluted] As those are who come near the dead (Numb. xix. 11), who are thereby unqualified to attend upon God's service (see Lev. xxi. 1, 6).

Their bread for their soul shall not come into the house of the Lord] The offerings they make for the expiation of souls (see Lev. xvii. 11) shall not be fit to be brought into the house of the Lord, and the temple itself shall be left desolate.

Ver. 5.] Ye shall have no opportunity of observing any of your solemn feasts in your captivity (see ii. 11).

Ver. 6. Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them] A great many of the ten tribes went into Egypt for fear of the captivity threatened by Shalmaneser (see vii. 16, viii. 13): accordingly the prophecies which foretell their restoration, mention their return from Egypt (see xi. 11, Isa. xi. 11, xxvii. 12, Zech. x. 10, 11). The prophet threatens those that went down thither, that they should have no better a fate than their brethren, who were carried away into Assyria; but they should die there and never see their native country any more.

Egypt shall gather them up] Or, "gather them," as the word is translated, Ezek. xxix. 5. It signifies in both places the same with their being buried, expressed in other places by "being gathered to their people."

The pleasant places for their silver] Or, "Places desirable for their silver;" either as being repositories for their treasure or their plate, or as being adorned with silver.

Nettles shall possess them] They shall be uninhabited and fall to ruin (compare x. 8, Isa. xxxiii. 13, xxxiv. 13).

Ver. 7. The days of visitation are come—Israel shall know it] God's judgments (see ver. 9) upon the ten tribes shall be so evident, that the most incredulous shall not be able to deny it.

The prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad] The false prophets (see ver. 8) that pretend to speak by the Spirit of God, and foretell nothing but peace, shall be convinced of their folly and madness, when they see things fall out otherwise than they had foretold (see Jer. vi. 14, xxii. 16, 17, Ezek. xiii. 10, Mic. ii. 11, Zeph. iii. 4).

For the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great hatred] God has delivered this people up to those delusions, as a just punishment of their many sins, and the great hatred they have against God and his worship (see the following verse).

Ver. 8.] The true prophet, like a watchman sent by God, gave warning to Israel of their approaching calamities (see Jer. vi. 17, Ezek. iii. 17, xxxiii. 2, Mic. vii. 4). But the words of the false prophet are like a snare laid on purpose to entrap men into mischief and destruction (see v. 1): and his false prophecies he utters purely out of hatred to God and his worship, and to deter those that hearken to him from attending upon God's worship at the temple.

Ver. 9.] The men of Gibeah are described in the same characters as those of Sodom are (compare Judg. xix. 22, with Gen. xix. 4), to which they added the villany of forcing the Levite's concubine (ibid. ver. 25, &c.).

Ver. 10. I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness] After I had miraculously redeemed Israel out of Egypt, and brought them into the wilderness, their obedience was as grateful to me as early grapes, or the first ripe figs, are to a thirsty traveller (compare Isa. xxviii. 4, Mic. vii. 1). This relates to their first entering into covenant with God, and their promises of a ready obedience (see Exod. xix. 8, xxiv. 3, Deut. v. 27—29, and compare ii. 15, xi. 1 of this prophecy).

But they went to Baal-peor, and separated themselves unto that shame] The Hebrew word, yinnazern, were separated, alludes to the order of the Nazarites, who were in a peculiar manner set apart for God's service (see the note upon Amos ii. 11), such as were Samson and John Baptist: whereas these dedicated themselves to the service of that filthy idol Baal-peor, that shame or shameful thing, as it is expressed Jer. xi. 13. Bosheth, shame, was a nickname for Baal: so Jerubbaal is called Jerub-besheth, 2 Sam. xi. 21.

Their abominations were according as they loved] They followed their own imaginations in the several 11 As for Ephraim, their glory shall fly away like a bird, from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception.

12 Though they bring up their children, yet will I bereave them, that there shall not be a man left: yea, woe also to them when I depart from them!

13 Ephraim, as I saw Tyrus, is planted in a pleasant place: but Ephraim shall bring forth his children to the murderer.

14 Give them, O Lord: what wilt thou give? give them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts.

idolatries which they committed (see Numb. xv. 39, Deut. xxix. 19, Amos iv. 5).

Ver. 11.] The multitude of their people, in which they pride themselves (see x. 13), shall vanish out of sight like a bird (compare Prov. xxiii. 4): their women shall not be so fruitful as they have been heretofore.

Ver. 12. Though they bring up their children, yet will I bereave them,] If after the hazards of conception and childbearing, they should breed up their children to man's estate, yet will I make them childless; the sword without, and famine and pestilence within, shall make an entire riddance of them and their posterity (see Deut. xxviii. 62, xxxii. 25, Jer. xvi. 3).

Woe also to them when I depart] They shall feel what miseries shall befall them, when I withdraw my protection from them (see Deut. xxxi. 17, 2 Kings xvii. 18, 23).

Ver. 13.] The situation of Ephraim, and particularly of the royal city of Samaria situate in that tribe, is as pleasant as that of Tyre (see Ezek. xxvii. 3). But though Tyre held out against the siege of Shalmaneser, as Josephus relates (Antiq. lib. ix. cap. ult.), yet Ephraim and the whole kingdom of Israel (see v. 3) shall be subdued by him, and many of their children shall be a prey to his murdering sword.

Ver. 14.] The prophet speaks as if he were in 15 All their wickedness is in Gilgal: for there I hated them: for the wickedness of their doings I will drive them out of mine house, I will love them no more: all their princes are revolvers.

16 Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up, they shall bear no fruit: yea, though they bring forth, yet will I slay even the beloved fruit of their womb.

17 My God will cast them away, because they did not hearken unto him: and they shall be wanderers among the nations.

suspense, their condition being so desperate, that nothing could relieve them. But, saith he, rather let their women be barren, than bring forth children only for the slaughter (see the foregoing verse and compare Luke xxiii. 29).

Ver. 15. All their wickedness is in Gilgal (see iv. 15): for there I hated them:] Or, "Therefore I hated them:" so the particle sham sometimes signifies (see Noldius, p. 766).

I will drive them out of mine house,] Compare i. 6. I will not any longer treat them as my domestics, but debar them of the privilege of living in my land (ver. 3), of coming to my temple (ver. 4, 5), or enjoying any marks of my favour (ver. 17).

All their princes are revolvers.] Their rulers and magistrates revolt from my worship, and break all the rules of justice and honesty (compare iv. 8, Isa. i. 23, Ezek. xxii. 27, Mic. iii. 11, Zech. iii. 3).

Ver. 16. They shall bear no fruit:] They are like a tree that is blasted and dead at root, and only fit to be cut down.

Though they bring forth, &c.] See ver. 13.

Ver. 17.] He will no more own them for his people, but leave them to wander and be dispersed among the other nations. They were afterward called by the name of the Δαυρι, or dispersed among the gentiles (see John vii. 35, James i. 1, 1 Pet. i. 1).

CHAPTER X.

I ISRAEL is an empty vine, he bringeth forth fruit unto himself: according to the multitude of his fruit he hath increased the altars; according to the goodness of his land they have made goodly images.

2 Their heart is divided; now shall they be found faulty: he shall break down their altars, he shall spoil their images.

3 For now they shall say, We have no king, because we feared not the Lord; what then should a king do us?

4 They have spoken words, swearing falsely

They have made goodly images.] See ii. 8, viii. 4.

Ver. 2.] They think to divide their duty and affections between God and idols (see 1 Kings xviii. 21). This will manifestly appear in the punishment of their sin, when God shall destroy all the monuments of their idolatry (see ver. 5, 6, 8).

Ver. 3.] This verse relates to the time of anarchy, or an interregnum, which continued for eight or nine years, between the murder of Pekah and the settlement of Hoshea in the throne (compare ver. 7, 15, and see Archbishop Usher's Annals. ad A. M. 3265, 3274).

What then should a king do to us?] Or rather, for us, as the phrase signifies, vi. 4, i. e. a king cannot protect us, if God be against us.

Ver. 4. Swearing falsely in making a covenant:] This may either relate to their breaking their solemn covenant with God (see v. 7): or their treachery towards their kings, against whom they had formed

CHAP. X.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet continues to threaten destruction to the ten tribes and their idols, but withal exhorts them to repentance and reformation.

Ver. 1. Israel is an empty vine,] The Hebrew word bokek is capable of two contrary significations; it may either signify empty, or emptying (i. e. casting) the fruit it giveth, the sense which our translators follow: or else it may signify nourishing: in which sense the LXX. and Vulgar Latin understand it, and which Dr. Pocock confirms from the use of the word in Arabic: and then the words will import, that though Israel, like a flourishing vine, abounded with plenty of all things, yet he brought forth no fruit unto God, but abused his blessings to the encouragement of sin and idolatry; as it follows in the next words.

in making a covenant: thus judgment springeth up as hemlock in the furrows of the field.

5 The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear because of the calves of Beth-aven: for the people thereof shall mourn over it, and the priests thereof that rejoiced on it, for the glory thereof, because it is departed from it.

6 It shall be also carried unto Assyria for a present to king Jareb: Ephraim shall receive shame, and Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel.

7 As for Samaria, her king is cut off as the foam upon the water.

8 The high places also of Aven, the sin of several conspiracies (see 2 Kings xv. 10, 14, 25, 30).

This judgment springeth up as hemlock] Injustice being publicly countenanced, encourages the same practices in private men's dealings: thus, instead of judgment and fair dealing, injustice increases everywhere, as bitter and poisonous weeds grow up in a field, where there is no care taken to destroy them (compare Amos v. 7, vi. 12). The word rosh is sometimes translated gall, and in other places hemlock; and signifies some bitter poisonous herb expressed by a "root of bitterness," Heb. xii. 15.

Ver. 5. Samaria shall fear because of the calves of Beth-aven:] Samaria here signifies the kingdom of Israel, of which Samaria was the capital city (see viii. 5, 6). The inhabitants of that kingdom shall be seized with fear and confusion when the calf of Beth-el (see iv. 15) shall be carried away as a present to Shalmaneser (ver. 6), when he made the king and kingdom of Israel tributary (2 Kings xvii. 3). The Jewish writers have a tradition, that the golden calf at Dan was taken away by Tiglath-pileser, when he subdued Galilee (2 Kings xv. 29), and the other at Beth-el by order of Shalmaneser. The plural number of the word calves, is an enallage for the singular: for the same idol is in this verse spoken of in the singular number (compare xiii. 2).

The priests thereof that rejoiced on it,] Dr. Pocock observes, that the word yagilu, translated rejoiced, is also used in a contrary signification, as several Hebrew words are, for mourning, or being sorrowful; in which sense it is probably used, Job iii. 32, Ps. ii. 11, and then the sentence here may be word for word translated, "and the priests thereof shall sorrow over it." Both priests and people shall mourn and be sorrowful, when they see its glory departed from it (1 Sam. iv. 21), and it is no more the object of religious worship. The word kemanim, rendered priests, is translated "idolrous priests," 2 Kings xxiii. 5, but the original word is retained in our translation of Zeph. i. 5, which are all the places in which it occurs in the scriptures. From this word the Latin camillus is derived, which in the primary signification denotes a priest.

Ver. 6. For a present to king Jareb:] King Jareb is a king that can plead their cause, and take them into his protection, as the phrase is explained, v. 13, where it probably means Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, unto whom Menahem betook himself for safety; and here it seems to denote Shalmaneser, who took the Israelites into his protection by making them tributaries (see note on ver. 5).

Ephraim shall receive shame,] They shall see the unsuccessfulness of Jeroboam's policy in setting up of this idolatrous worship, and their complying with it; and shall be ashamed to find that the idol in which they trusted, could not defend itself (compare xi. 6).

Israel, shall be destroyed: the thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars; and they shall say to the mountains, Cover us; and to the hills, Fall on us.

9 O Israel, thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah: there they stood: the battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not overtake them.

10 It is in my desire that I should chastise them; and the people shall be gathered against them, when they shall bind themselves in their two furrows.

11 And Ephraim is as an heifer that is taught, and loveth to tread out the corn; but I passed

Ver. 7.] This may probably be understood of Pekah, who was slain by Hoshea (see ver. 3). The king of Israel is styled king of Samaria, 1 Kings xxi. 1, 2, 2 Kings i. 3, as being the capital city of that kingdom.

Ver. 8. The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed:] Aven is the same with Beth-aven, ver. 5. The idolatrous temples were usually placed upon mountains (see iv. 13); so was that at Beth-el, called the high places, the plural number being often used in the Hebrew to express a thing spoken of to be eminent or remarkable in its kind. The idolatry here practised is called the sin of Israel, as being such in an eminent manner (see Dent. ix. 21). So Jeroboam is said to "make Israel to sin," by setting up this idolatrous worship (see 1 Kings xii. 30, xiii. 34).

The thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars:] Such usually growing among ruins (see ix. 6).

And they shall say to the mountains, Cover us, &c.] The words express the great consternation of the wicked, when God's judgments overtake them; whose guilt prompts them to cast about where to hide themselves (compare Isa. ii. 19, Luke xxiii. 30, Rev. vi. 16).

Ver. 9. Thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah:] See ix. 9. Some render it, "More than in the days of Gibeah."

There they stood:] The other tribes set themselves in array of battle against the Benjamites, who refused to deliver up the men who had been guilty of so much lewdness (see Judg. xx. 13).

The battle in Gibeah—did not overtake them,] The other tribes did not at first get the better of the Benjamites, though at last they cut all of them off but six hundred (see Judg. xx. 46, 47). But if the same thing were to be done now, you would not have the zeal or courage to encounter any such offenders.

Ver. 10. It is in my desire that I should chastise them:] I shall take pleasure in punishing them for their sins, and shall now "rejoice over them to destroy them," Dent. xxviii. 63.

The people shall be gathered against them,] Either the Assyrians, whose alliance they formerly sought after; or those people whose idolatry they had complied with (see Ezek. xvi. 37).

When they shall bind themselves in their two furrows,] The LXX. give a much plainer and easier sense of the words, who follow the marginal reading of the Hebrew, and render it, "When I shall chastise them for their two iniquities;" viz. the calves of Dan and Beth-el (compare ver. 8).

Ver. 11.] The sense would run easier if we read it, "Ephraim is as a heifer that is teachable—so I passed over her fair neck. I caused Ephraim to ride, Judah did plough, and Jacob did break the clods." God sets over upon her fair neck : I will make Ephraim to ride ; Judah shall plow, and Jacob shall break his clods.

12 Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy ; break up your fallow ground : for it is time to seek the LORD till he come and rain righteousness upon you.

13 Ye have plowed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity ; ye have eaten the fruit of lies : be-forth the gentle and easy methods he used to bring both Israel and Judah to a sense of their duty ; treating them with gentleness, as a husbandman does young bullocks or horses, stroking them, and encouraging them, till they are accustomed to the yoke ; then he gave them his law, and prescribed them rules for the several duties and offices of life, and expected they should bring forth fruit answerable to the several helps and advantages which he had given them. Men's improvements in grace are often compared to the manuring of ground, in order to make it fruitful : so the church is styled " God's vineyard," Isa. v. 9, and his " husbandry," 1 Cor. iii. 9.

Ver. 12. Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy ; Employ yourselves in works of justice and righteousness : and by God's mercy you may still hope to reap the fruits of your repentance and reformation.

Break up your fallow ground : You have lain a long while uncultivated, so it is time for you to repent and bring forth the fruits of good living : and you shall not fail of God's blessing upon your sincere endeavours, to make you more and more fruitful.

Ver. 13. Ye have plowed wickedness, &c. As your thoughts and designs have been evil, such has been the fruit and reward of your labours (compare viii. 7).

Ye have eaten the fruit of lies : You have received the just rewards of your idolatry (see note on vii. 3).

Thou didst trust in thy way, See ix. 11, xiii. 15. This way may signify that way of worship which thou hast devised : so the word is taken, Amos viii. 14 (see note there).

Ver. 14. A tumult arise among thy people, This points at the taking Samaria, after a three years' cause thou didst trust in thy way, in the multitude of thy mighty men.

14 Therefore shall a tumult arise among thy people, and all thy fortresses shall be spoiled, as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle : the mother was dashed in pieces upon her children.

15 So shall Beth-el do unto you because of your great wickedness : in a morning shall the king of Israel utterly be cut off.

siege, by Shalmaneser king of Assyria ; which put a final period to the kingdom of Israel (see 2 Kings. xvii. 6).

As Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel The prophet compares the destruction of Samaria with another terrible desolation, which the same Shalmaneser, called here Shalman, made at Beth-arbel, a place in Armenia (famous afterward for the defeat of Darius, the last king of Persia, by Alexander), where all the inhabitants were put to the sword, without any distinction either of sex or age (compare xiii. 16).

Ver. 15. So shall Beth-el do unto you because of your great wickedness : The idolatry set up at Beth-el shall be in like manner the cause of your ruin. The Hebrew reads, " Because of the evil of your evil : " that language expresses the greatness of anything by repeating the word over again. The same expression is used by St. Paul (Rom. vii. 13), " That sin might become exceeding sinful ; " i. e. hereby it might appear how full of evil our natural corruption is.

In a morning shall the king of Israel utterly be cut off. Suddenly shall Hoshea be deprived of his kingdom, and an end put to the whole state and government of Israel. The expression in the Hebrew denotes the " first appearing of the morning," to signify that it shall be done early and without delay : so we read, Ps. xlv. 3, " God shall help her, and that right early : " when the Hebrew reads, " At the appearing of the morning : " and again, Ps. xc. 14, cxliii. 8. The same thing is elsewhere expressed by " rising early," Jer. vii. 13, xxxv. 15. The expression here may allude to the destruction of Pharaoh and his army when " the morning appeared," Exod. xiv. 27.

CHAPTER XI.

1 WHEN Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt.

2 As they called them, so they went from

CHAP. XI.

ARGUMENT.—A continuation of threatenings against Israel, but yet with promises of showing them mercy.

Ver. 1. When Israel was a child, then I loved him, When this people was in a state of childhood, i. e. in the patriarchal times, and during their continuance under the Egyptian bondage, from whence I delivered them.

And called my son out of Egypt. Israel is called God's son and his first-born, Exod. iv. 22, 23, and therein was an eminent figure of the Messiah, in whom all " God's promises are fulfilled." This prophecy is applied by St. Matthew, ii. 15, to our Lord's return out of Egypt, after his flight thither in his infancy : and the literal sense of the words does more properly belong to him than to Israel :

them : they sacrificed unto Baalim, and burned incense to graven images.

3 I taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by which is observable in many other prophecies, which can but improperly be applied to those of whom they were at first spoken, and taking them in their true and genuine sense, are only fulfilled in Christ (see particularly Ps. xxii. 16, 18).

Ver. 2. As they called them, so they went from them : Or, " The more they called them," or " they were called (the active being often used for the impersonal), so much the more they went from him," (see Noldius, p. 436). The more earnestly the prophets called upon them to cleave steadfastly to the true God (see ver. 7), the more they were bent to depart from him to the worship of idols.

They sacrificed unto Baalim, See the note upon ii. 13, and xiii. 1.

Ver. 3. I taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by their arms : In this time of childhood (ver. 1) I bare him, and carried him " as a man doth bear his son," Dent. i. 31 ; or, As a mother doth teach her their arms; but they knew not that I healed them.

4 I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love: and I was to them as they that take off the yoke on their jaws, and I laid meat unto them.

5 ¶ He shall not return into the land of Egypt, but the Assyrian shall be his king, because they refused to return.

6 And the sword shall abide on his cities, and shall consume his branches, and devour them, because of their own counsels.

7 And my people are bent to backsliding from me: though they called them to the most High, none at all would exalt him.

child to go, leading it by the arms; protecting him, and providing for him in the wilderness (see Deut. viii. 2).

But they knew not that I healed them.] They considered not (see ii. 8, vii. 9), that the health and safety they enjoyed was owing to me (compare Exod. xv. 26, xxiii. 25).

Ver. 4. I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love.] I made use of those means of drawing them to myself, which were most proper to work upon their reason and ingenuity; viz. the methods of loving-kindness and good-will towards them.

I was to them as they that take off the yoke.] I removed the yoke or bondage of Egypt from off their heads (compare Lev. xxvi. 13).

I laid meat unto them.] I provided manna to sustain them in the wilderness.

Ver. 5.] Though many of them have gone into Egypt for refuge against the invasion of Shalmaneser (see viii. 13, ix. 3), yet they shall not have any further opportunity of betaking themselves thither, but the king of Assyria shall carry them away captive; because they refused to return to me, notwithstanding so many calls I had given them in order to their repentance.

Ver. 6. The sword shall—consume his branches.] Both cities and villages shall be destroyed by the conqueror's sword. The word translated branches, signifies also bars: and may denote the valiant men that should defend them against the enemy's forces; so the Chaldee understands it, and in this sense the word is used, Isa. xvi. 6, Jer. xlviii. 30.

Because of their own counsels.] See x. 6.

Ver. 7. My people are bent to backsliding from me.] See iv. 16. The original word meshubak, is the same which Jeremy often uses, speaking of this subject (see Jer. iii. 6, 8, &c., viii. 15, xiv. 7, and compare xiv. 4 of this prophecy). The words are thus translated by some, "My people are in suspense because of their backsliding from me." Either they are in continual anxiety because of my displeasure; or else they are irresolute, and halt between God and their idols (compare x. 2).

Though they called them to the most High.] This may relate to the several calls God gave them by his prophet (see ver. 2). Dr. Wells understands it of the invitation Hezekiah made to the people of Israel to join with him in celebrating the passover, which some of the ten tribes accepted of, but others refused (2 Chron. xxx. 1, 11).

Ver. 8. How shall I give thee up,] God's mercies are here pathetically described as contending with his justice, to show that he does "not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men," Lam. iii. 33.

How shall I make thee as Admah?] How shall I

8 How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim? mine heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together.

9 I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger, I will not return to destroy Ephraim: for I am God, and not man; the Holy One in the midst of thee: and I will not enter into the city.

10 They shall walk after the Lord: he shall roar like a lion: when he shall roar, then the children shall tremble from the west.

11 They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt, and as a dove out of the land of Assyria: and I will place them in their houses, saith the Lord.

give thee up to be a perpetual desolation (compare Deut. xxix. 23).

Mine heart is turned within me,] Thus God's compassion towards sinners is elsewhere expressed by the sounding or yearning of his bowels, Isa. lxiii. 15, Jer. xxxi. 20, a metaphor taken from the natural affection which parents have for their children.

Ver. 9. I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger, I will not return to destroy.] I will not deal with them like an enraged enemy, who thinks of nothing but satisfying his revenge: I will not, like such a one, "return to destroy," i. e. make a second destruction, so to cut off those that escape the first fury of my vengeance: I do not give way to a blind rage, as men often do; but, as God, am unchangeable, and will still fulfil my gracious promises made to Abraham, and his people, of being their God (compare Mal. iii. 6).

I will not enter into the city.] A second time, in order to make an utter destruction.

Ver. 10. They shall walk after the Lord: he shall roar like a lion.] They shall follow God's call, and comply with his commands; when he shall convert them by an efficacious call of his providence, or powerful preaching of the gospel. God's voice is elsewhere compared to the roaring of a lion, because of the terror which accompanies it (see Joel iii. 16, Amos i. 8, Rev. x. 3).

Then the children shall tremble from the west.] The word tremble describes the motion which a bird makes with her wings when it flies; see the following verse. So the sense is, That at this efficacious call of God, his children, the remnant of Israel, who shall be accounted his children, and heirs of the promises made to their fathers (see i. 10), shall come in haste from the several places of their dispersions, and particularly from the western parts of the world (see Zech. viii. 7); called the sea in the original, and expressed in Isaiah, by "the islands of the sea" (see Isa. xi. 11, xxiv. 14, and the notes there).

Ver. 11. They shall tremble as a bird out of Egypt [i. e. fly with haste; see the foregoing note], as a dove out of—Assyria:] Great numbers of Jews were exiles in Egypt and Assyria: so when the restoration of the Jews is spoken of, Egypt and Assyria are mentioned as countries from whence a considerable number of them should return (see the note upon ix. 3, 6).

I will place them in their houses.] As doves naturally resort to the houses they are used to (see Isa. lx. 18), so shall these return and settle in their own native country (see the note upon Ezek. xxviii. 25).

Ver. 12. Ephraim compasseth me about with lies.] In several translations this verse begins the twelfth chapter, as of right it ought to do: for the reproof

12 Ephraim compasseth me about with lies; and the house of Israel with deceit: but Judah yet ruleth with God, and is faithful with the saints.

which God gives here to Israel belongeth to the subject of the following chapter: and sets forth the ten tribes abounding in all manner of idolatry and wickedness (see the note upon vii. 3).

Judah yet ruleth with God, and is faithful with the saints.] Judah keeps close to that kingly government which God settled in David's family, and faithfully observes those ordinances which God gave to his saints by Moses (see Deut. xxxiii. 3); by which they were to be distinguished to be a holy nation, and God's peculiar people. This relates to the times of Hezekiah.

CHAPTER XII.

1 EPHRAIM feedeth on wind, and followeth after the east wind: he daily increaseth lies and desolation; and they do make a covenant with the Assyrians, and oil is carried into Egypt.

2 The LORD hath also a controversy with Judah, and will punish Jacob according to his ways; according to his doings will he recompense him.

3 ¶ He took his brother by the heel in the womb, and by his strength he had power with God:

4 Yea, he had power over the angel, and prevailed: he wept, and made supplication unto him: he found him in Beth-el, and there he spake with us;

5 Even the LORD God of hosts; the LORD is his memorial.

6 Therefore turn thou to thy God: keep mercy and judgment, and wait on thy God continually.

7 ¶ He is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand: he loveth to oppress.

CHAP. XII.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet reproves both Israel and Judah for their impieties, and puts them in mind of God's favours to their father Jacob, for which they made most ungrateful returns.

Ver. 1. Ephraim feedeth on wind, and followeth after the east wind.] A proverbial expression to signify labour in vain, or pursuing such measures as will bring damage rather than benefit (compare viii. 7). The east wind was a parching wind, which blasted the fruit of the earth: thence it denotes desolation and destruction (see xiii. 15).

They do make a covenant with the Assyrians, &c.] At the same time that they engage themselves to be tributaries to the king of Assyria, they understand send presents to the king of Egypt, that he should assist them in shaking off that yoke (see 2 Kings xvii. 4). The land of Judah had plenty of excellent oil (see Deut. viii. 8, Ezek. xxvii. 17).

Ver. 2.] See iv. 1. Though Hezekiah had abolished idolatry, and restored God's worship in the temple (2 Chron. xxix. 3, xxx. 1), yet there was much hypocrisy and great corruption in the manners of his subjects; for which God's judgments are here threatened, and the invasion of Sennacherib was actually inflicted (2 Kings xviii. 13, &c.).

Ver. 3. He took his brother by the heel in the womb,] From the mentioning of Jacob in the foregoing verse, the prophet takes occasion to put his posterity in mind of the particular favours God had shewn him, and bestowed upon his posterity for his sake. His taking his brother "by the heel" in the womb, denoted that he obtained the right of the first-born, and deprived his brother of it.

Ibid. and ver. 4. By his strength he had power with God: yea, he had power over the angel and prevailed.] The prophet alludes to those words of his, Gen. xxxii. 26, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me;" intimating the strength and prevalence of his prayers for the obtaining a blessing from God. The words, ver. 3, "He had power with God," and those that follow, "He had power over the angel," are equivalent; which plainly prove that this person who assumed a human shape was really God; i. e. "the Son of God," and the "angel of the covenant;" by whom all the divine appearances recorded in the Old Testament were performed; the affairs of the church being ordered by him from the beginning. This subject is learnedly handled by Dr. Alix, in his Judgment of the Jewish Church against the Unitarians, ch. 13—15, by Archbishop Tenison, in his discourse of Idolatry, ch. 14, and by Bishop Bull, Defen. Fid. Nicen. cap. 1, sect. 1.

Ver. 4. He wept, and made supplication unto him.] Jacob's wrestling with the angel was not only a corporal conflict, but likewise a spiritual one: from bodily wrestling he betook him to spiritual weapons; he poured forth tears with earnest supplications and prayers, and strove not so much for victory as for a blessing; the only way for a feeble, impotent creature, to prevail over his Creator. Jacob's supplication and tears may probably relate to those earnest prayers he made, Gen. xxxii. 9—11. The combat here referred to, by which he had power with God, ended in an assurance that his prayers were answered.

He found him in Beth-el,] This relates to God's appearing to Jacob after the former vision, Gen. xxxv. 9, 14, where God renewed his promise of giving the land of Judea to his posterity. The prophet takes particular notice of the place where he appeared, viz. Beth-el, which they had since so miserably polluted by idolatry.

There he spake with us;] The Alexandrian copy of the Septuagint reads, "There he spake with him;" as if the expression alluded to Gen. xxxv. 14, where God is said "to have talked with Jacob:" but the present Hebrew reading yields a very good sense, importing that God did not only speak to him there, but likewise did instruct us not to set up an idol in that place which he had honoured with his presence.

Ver. 5.] Jehovah is the name by which he will be known, and remembered by all his servants, and distinguished from all false gods (see Exod. iii. 5).

Ver. 6.] Return to him and serve him faithfully, and then you may expect the continuance of his favours, and his making good the promises he made to your fathers.

Ver. 7.] Instead of keeping mercy and judgment (ver. 6), he loves those frauds and deceits, which are too commonly practised in buying and selling; and forgets those laws of God, which require the use of "just weights and measures" (see Lev. xix. 35, 36, Prov. xi. 1).

8 And Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance: in all my labours they shall find none iniquity in me that were sin.

9 And I that am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles, as in the days of the solemn feasts.

10 I have also spoken by the prophets, and I have multiplied visions, and used similitudes, by the ministry of the prophets.

11 Is there iniquity in Gilead? surely they are vanity: they sacrifice bullocks in Gilgal; yea, their altars are as heaps in the furrows of the fields.

12 And Jacob fled into the country of Syria, and Israel served for a wife, and for a wife he kept sheep.

13 And by a prophet the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt, and by a prophet was he preserved.

14 Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly: therefore shall he leave his blood upon him, and his reproach shall his Lord return unto him.

Ver. 8. Yet I am become rich.] He pleaseth himself with the thoughts that his riches increase, notwithstanding his unjust dealings; and from thence concludes that God is not displeased with him, nor will lay his injustice to his charge.

They shall find none iniquity in me that were sin.] Or, "They shall find neither iniquity nor sin:" the particle asher is sometimes taken in a copulative sense (see Eccles. v. 13). The words translated iniquity and sin are equivalent (see Ps. xxxii. 5).

Ver. 9. I that am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt.] Who brought thee out from thence, and have still continued my favours towards thee (compare ver. 13, xiii. 4).

Will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles.] I will in aftertimes return thy captivity, and give thee quiet possession of thy own land again, where you shall thankfully acknowledge your former delivery out of Egypt, and your settlement in your own country; which was the intent of keeping the feast of tabernacles (see Lev. xxiii. 42, 43, 2 Macc. x. 6). It was a feast observed with extraordinary expressions of joy by the Jews, as appears from Neh. viii. 17, Zech. xiv. 16, John vii. 37.

Ver. 10.] Here are three species of prophecy or divine revelation distinctly mentioned: first, immediate suggestion or inspiration, when God dictates or suggests the very words which the prophet was to deliver: secondly, visions, or a representation made of external objects to the imagination in as lively a manner as if they were conveyed by the senses; and, thirdly, parables, or apt resemblances; such as that of God's church to a "vineyard," Isa. v. 1, of the destruction of Jerusalem to a "forest set on fire," Ezek. xx. 46, 49, and to a "seething-pot," xxiv. 3. Hosea himself was a parable or type to the Jews in taking a "wife of whoredoms" to represent the idolatries of the house of Israel, whereby they went a whoring after strange gods, and forsook the Lord their king and husband. It was an ancient custom in the eastern parts of the world, to convey instructions under symbols and sacred hieroglyphics: Pythagoras learned this method in his travels in the east, and the conversation he had there with the Jews, and other wise men of those parts. God saith here, that he had inspired his prophets in these different ways to bring his people to repentance, but all in vain. Some interpreters understand the words in the future tense, "I will also speak by the prophets;" as if God had promised to give some new effusion of his Spirit in the latter days to facilitate the Jews' conversion (see the note upon Isa. liv. 13).

Ver. 11. Is there iniquity in Gilead?] If we read the former part of the sentence with an interrogation, it might be more significantly rendered, "Is there not iniquity in Gilead?" So the particle im signifies, Esth. iv. 14, Jer. xxxi. 20. However, the words are in sense a vehement affirmation, importing that the idolatry practised in Gilead (see vi. 8), could not preserve him from being carried away captive by Tiglathpileser (2 Kings xv. 29).

They sacrifice bullocks in Gilgal.] Notwithstanding this judgment of God upon Gilead, and the country on the other side Jordan, they continue to offer sacrifices to their idols in Gilgal (see iv. 15). Their altars stand so thick, that they are discernible as stones gathered up and laid in heaps in the fields (see viii. 11, x. 1). Some understand the sentence as containing a threatening, that their altars should be demolished, and become so many ruinous heaps (2 Kings xix. 25). The word gulum, heaps, alludes to Gilgal, just before mentioned, a name derived from the same original. Some commentators explain the whole verse to this sense; That the whole kingdom of Israel, that part which is beyond Jordan, where Gilead stood, as well as the other parts on this side that river, and particularly Gilgal, are polluted with idolatry.

Ver. 12.] In this, and the following verse, the prophet reproves their ingratitude, by putting them in mind from what small beginnings God raised them to be a mighty nation; that their ancestor Jacob (mentioned before, ver. 3, 4), was fain to fly for his life to Laban in Syria, and sustain himself, and raise his family by keeping his uncle's flock (compare Deut. xxvi. 5).

Ver. 13.] And afterward, when his posterity were detained in a miserable bondage in Egypt, God delivered them hence, and miraculously preserved them at the Red sea, and in the wilderness, by the hand of Moses (compare xiii. 4, 5).

Ver. 14. Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly.] Notwithstanding all my favours shown to these people and their ancestors, they have provoked me by their idolatries, and other sins, in a most outrageous manner. The word tamrurim, translated "most bitterly," Schindler renders, "by his heaps;" i. e. his altars, which stood as heaps in the field, ver. 12 (compare Jer. xxxi. 21).

Therefore shall he leave his blood upon him.] Or, "His blood shall return upon him," as the Chaldee paraphrase renders it: his wickedness will be the cause of his destruction (see xiii. 9).

His reproach shall his Lord return unto him.] He has reproached and dishonoured God by word and deed, and God shall in a just recompence make him a reproach and by-word among the heathen (see vii. 16, Deut. xxviii. 37; compare Dan. xi. 18).

CHAPTER XIII.

1 WHEN Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel; but when he offended in Baal, he died.

2 And now they sin more and more, and have made them molten images of their silver, and idols according to their own understanding, all of it the work of the craftsmen: they say of them, Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves.

3 Therefore they shall be as the morning cloud, and as the early dew that passeth away, as the chaff that is driven with the whirlwind out of the floor, and as the smoke out of the chimney.

4 Yet I am the LORD thy God from the land of Egypt, and thou shalt know no god but me: for there is no saviour beside me.

CHAP. XIII.

ARGUMENT.—A continuation of God's threatenings for their sins; to which are added gracious promises of deliverance from death, to be fulfilled under the gospel.

Ver. 1. When Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel;] While he behaved himself submissively and obediently towards God, he was reckoned among the principal tribes of Israel. Here Ephraim is spoken of as distinct from Israel; in other places of this prophecy he is put for the whole kingdom of the ten tribes (see v. 3).

But when he offended in Baal, he died.] When he gave himself to idolatry, his strength immediately declined, and had manifest symptoms of ruin and destruction; as when a man falls into a languishing condition, it is the certain forerunner of death. The word Baal is here taken in a general sense, for all false gods, or idolatrous ways of worship; so as to comprehend the worship of the golden calves, though they were designed for symbolical representations of the true God: in which sense the word Baalim may be understood, ii. 13, xi. 2. To the same sense we may most probably explain that text, 1 Kings xix. 18, "Yet have I left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal;" meaning that small remnant of the faithful in Israel, who had stuck close to the worship of the true God, when the whole body of the people had complied with that idolatry which Jeroboam set up and authorized as the national religion (compare Tobit i. 5).

Ver. 2. And have made them molten images—according to their own understanding,] Or, "according to their invention," or fancy. They please themselves with some new piece of idolatry, as their fancy or imagination suggests (compare x. 1).

They say of them [or, to them] Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves.] Compare 1 Kings xix. 18. The word adoration properly signifies kissing the hand, and making obeisance to the object of worship: so Job describes the adoration which the ancient idolaters paid to the heavenly bodies, xxi. 26. Afterward the same outward act of worship was paid to images; as appears by a noted passage at the beginning of Minucius Felix's Octavius. Sometimes they kissed the image itself; as appears by the description Cicero gives of Hercules's image, which Verres had taken away, act 4, in Verrem, and by those noted verses of Lucretius, lib. i.

5 ¶ I did know thee in the wilderness, in the land of great drought.

6 According to their pasture, so were they filled; they were filled, and their heart was exalted; therefore have they forgotten me.

7 Therefore I will be unto them as a lion: as a leopard by the way will I observe them:

8 I will meet them as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps, and will rend the caul of their heart, and there will I devour them like a lion: the wild beast shall tear them.

9 ¶ O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help.

10 I will be thy king: where is any other that may save thee in all thy cities? and thy judges

"———tum portas propter athena
Signa manus dextras ostendunt attenuari
Sæpe salutantum tactu."

Some translate zibche adam, "the sacrifices of men;" i. e. those who offered human sacrifices: but this was an execrable piece of worship paid to Moloch, but never practised, that we find, at Dan or Beth-el. Our interpreters render the words zibche adam, very properly, "the men that sacrifice;" as the phrase ebijone adam, signifies "the poor among men," Isa. xxix. 19.

Ver. 3.] Comparisons that express their sudden disappearing and coming to nothing (compare vi. 4, Dan. ii. 35).

Ver. 4.] In thy distress thou betookest thyself to other gods, expecting relief from them; but thou shalt find that none will be able to save thee but myself, whenever thou wilt sincerely turn to me (compare xii. 9, Isa. xliii. 11). This and the following verse are an introduction to the gracious promises that follow, ver. 9, 14, and ch. xiv. and import, that God will never utterly forget the promises made to their fathers (see Rom. xi. 29).

Ver. 5.] I took especial care of thee, fed and sustained thee for forty years in the wilderness, a place destitute of all conveniences of life: the words are taken out of Deut. ii. 7. To know, often signifies, in the scripture phrase, to have a regard for, or take care of. See Exod. ii. 25, Ps. i. 7, xxxi. 8, cxliii. 3, Prov. xii. 10, Nah. i. 7, where our translation renders it regard.

Ver. 6.] The more care I took to provide plentifully for them, both before and after they came into the land of promise, the more perverse they showed themselves towards me; their pride made them forget me their great benefactor. The expression alludes to Dent. viii. 12, 14 (see likewise xxii. 15).

Ver. 7, 8.] I will utterly consume them from being a nation, and give them up into the hands of such enemies as will show them no mercy (compare ver. 16, and Jer. v. 6).

Ver. 9.] Thy own sins have brought down destruction upon thee; and it is from me only thou canst expect any help, which I will in due time afford thee (see the note upon ver. 4).

Ver. 10. I will be thy king: where is any other that may save thee] God promises to be their immediate protector upon their repentance. But the words may better be translated, "Where is thy king now, that he may save thee?" &c. In this sense the LXX. understand the words, and several other interpreters; the word ehi being taken for ajeb, by a freof whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes?

11 I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath.

12 The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up; his sin is hid.

13 The sorrows of a travelling woman shall come upon him: he is an unwise son; for he should not stay long in the place of the breaking forth of children.

14 I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, quent transposition of letters, as it is used again, ver. 14. The words either relate to the anarchy, which continued for some years, between the murder of Pekah and the succession of Hoshea (see x. 3); or else to the time when Hoshea was deposed and imprisoned by the king of Assyria (see 2 Kings xvii. 4).

Give me a king and princes?] They desired a king to judge them like other nations, attended by his judges and proper officers (see 1 Sam. viii. 5, 12).

Ver. 11. I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away (or, will take him away) in my wrath.] I complied with your request in giving you your first king Saul, though I was justly displeased at it (see 1 Sam. viii. 7, x. 19). And of later times I have suffered you to set up new kings, after you had murdered their predecessors (see viii. 4): and now I will take your present king Hoshea, and at the same time put an end to your kingdom and nation.

Ver. 12.] Our translators seem to understand the verse in a favourable sense, as if God hath promised not to execute that vengeance upon Israel which was due to their sins: but the words rather imply a contrary meaning, and may be better translated, "The iniquity of Ephraim is treasured up; his sin is laid up:" i. e. it is laid up in my memory: and though the punishment due to it has been respited for some time, yet now the season is come when it shall be put in execution. The sentence is equivalent to that expression in Job, xiv. 17, "My transgression is sealed up in a bag;" i. e. thou keepest an exact account of it, as men do of money, which they seal up in a bag, to be forthcoming at a proper occasion. To the same purpose are those words of Moses, Deut. xxxii. 34, 35, "Is not this laid up in store for me, and sealed up among my treasures? To me belongs vengeance," &c. (compare Rom. ii. 5).

Ver. 13. The sorrows of a travelling woman shall come upon him:] Great calamities are often compared to the pains of child-birth (see Isa. xii. 8, Jer. xxx. 6, Ps. xviii. 4, and so the Greek word ῥῆμα is used, Acts ii. 24).

For he should not stay long in the place of the breaking forth of children.] The old translation reads it to a plainer sense, "Else he would not stand still like a still-born child." As a child, if it could be supposed to have understanding, would deliver itself out of the straits of the womb, and not tarry there to the manifest danger of itself and the mother (compare 2 Kings xix. 3): so if Ephraim, or Israel had acted wisely, they would have prevented their approaching destruction by a speedy reformation.

Ver. 14. I will ransom them from the power of the grave;] If we apply this to Ephraim, or the Israelites spoken of before, it may signify, that though they be in never so hopeless and desperate a condition, God will, in due time, deliver them out of it

I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from mine eyes.

15 ¶ Though he be fruitful among his brethren, an east wind shall come, the wind of the Lord shall come up from the wilderness, and his spring shall become dry, and his fountain shall be dried up: he shall spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels.

16 Samaria shall become desolate; for she hath rebelled against her God: they shall fall by the sword: their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child shall be ripped up.

(see the like expressions, Ps. xxxi. 3, lxxi. 20, lxxxvi. 13). But there is a more sublime and spiritual sense contained in the words, as will appear by the following note.

O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction.] It is usual for the prophets, when they foretell temporal deliverances, to be carried away beyond their first views by the impetus of the prophetic spirit, to predict the greater mercies and deliverances which belong to the gospel state: so here the prophet takes occasion from foretelling temporal mercies, to enlarge his views, and set forth that great and final deliverance of the faithful from the power of sin and death, which shall be completed by Christ at his second coming, when he shall "swallow up death in victory," 1 Cor. xv. 54. St. Paul understood the words in this sense in the following verse of that chapter, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?" This will appear to any one, that compares that place with the Septuagint translation here. The word ehi, translated I will, they render where, as it signifies, ver. 10 of this chapter. The apostle, indeed, seems to quote this text from his memory, and rather represents the sense of it, than keeps close to the letter. However, the learned Dr. Pocock is of opinion, in his comment upon this place, that the Hebrew word debareka, rendered by our interpreters thy plagues, and by the LXX. thy plea, sentence, or judgment, is very properly translated thy sting by St. Paul; the word denoting, in Arabic, "the sharp point of a bird's claw;" and the word deborah, a bee, being probably so called from its sting.

Ver. 15. Though he be fruitful among his brethren, an east wind shall come, &c.] The word Ephraim denotes fruitfulness (see Gen. xli. 52). This tribe answered his name, being the most numerous and potent of all the ten tribes (see the note upon v. 3). Notwithstanding the pride he takes in his fruitfulness (see x. 13), the king of Assyria, a country lying eastward of Judea, shall come with an army, like a parching east wind coming over a large plain or wilderness, and shall blast and wither him, as a tree that is dried up for want of moisture (compare iv. 19, and see the note upon Jer. iv. 11).

He shall spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels.] The same enemy shall plunder all their treasures, and take away their rich and costly furniture, as the word kelee is translated, Nah. ii. 9.

Ver. 16. Samaria shall become desolate;] The prophet foretells the final destruction of Samaria for her idolatry and other impieties, by Shalmaneser king of Assyria (see 2 Kings xvii. 6).

Their infants shall be dashed in pieces,] These are the barbarous practices of conquerors, when they take cities by storm, to put all to the sword, without distinction of age or sex (see x. 15, 2 Kings viii. 12, xv. 16, Isa. xiii. 16, Amos i. 13, Nah. iii. 10).

CHAPTER XIV.

1 O ISRAEL, return unto the LORD thy God; for thou hast fallen by thine iniquity.

2 Take with you words, and turn to the LORD: say unto him, Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously: so will we render the calves of our lips.

3 Asshur shall not save us: we will not ride upon horses: neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods: for in thee the fatherless findeth mercy.

4 ¶ I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely: for mine anger is turned away from him.

5 I will be as the dew unto Israel: he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon.

6 His branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive tree, and his smell as Lebanon.

7 They that dwell under his shadow shall return: they shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine: the scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon.

8 Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols? I have heard him, and observed him: I am like a green fir tree. From me is thy fruit found.

9 Who is wise, and he shall understand these

CHAP. XIV.

ARGUMENT.—The prophecy concludes with an earnest exhortation to repentance, and God's gracious promises of pardon and blessing upon it.

Ver. 1. Thou hast fallen by thine iniquity.] Thy sins have been the cause of thy destruction (see xiii. 9).

Ver. 2. Take with you words, and turn to the Lord.] The prophet prescribes them a form of confession very proper to be used upon their repentance and conversion, beseeching God to pardon their past sins, and receive them graciously upon their repentance. Such another form we have, Joel ii. 17.

And receive us graciously.] The latter part of the sentence may be rendered, "And give us what is good:" bestow thy grace and blessing upon us. Many Hebrew verbs have two contrary significations, as hath been observed upon Isa. xxii. 18. To the instances there collected, we may add one taken out of xi. 8, of this prophecy; where the verb migen signifies to deliver up, whereas its usual signification is to protect. So the verb lakach here used probably signifies to give, as well as to receive: as appears from Ps. lxxviii. 18, where our translation reads, "Thou hast received gifts for men:" but the LXX. render it, "Thou hast given gifts unto men;" which sense St. Paul follows, Eph. iv. 8, and which best agrees with the scope of the text.

So will we render the calves of our lips.] Instead of the sacrifices of calves or bullocks, we will offer to thee the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, which is "the fruit of our lips," our "reasonable service," and such as properly belongs to the times of the gospel. So that this form of confession will be most suitable for the Jews to use upon their conversion to Christianity. St. Paul applies the words to the eucharist (Heb. xiii. 15) the true Christian sacrifice; and follows the Septuagint translation of them, which expresses the sense rather than the words.

Ver. 3. Asshur shall not save us;] The first part of the people's repentance is described as consisting in relying solely upon God's protection, and not putting their trust in human strength; and then in renouncing all idolatrous worship. The Israelites had formerly made an alliance with the Assyrians (see v. 13, viii. 9, xii. 1), and they are often upbraided by the prophets for their courting foreign alliances, and particularly strengthening themselves with horses from Egypt or Assyria (see 2 Chron. xvi. 7, Isa. xxx. 16, xxxvi. 8).

Neither will we say—to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods.] Another part of their repentance consists in renouncing all sorts of idol-worship; which is often spoken of in the prophets, as an introduction to that state of the church which is to commence from the time of the Jews' conversion (compare ii. 17, and see the note on Isa. i. 29). God interprets all image-worship, or creature-worship, as terminating in the image or creature to which it is offered.

For in thee the fatherless findeth mercy.] It is the property of God to be the "helper of the friendless," or fatherless (see Ps. x. 10). The Chaldee expresses the sense very well, "Thou didst take pity upon our forefathers, when they were like fatherless children in Egypt" (compare Ps. lxxviii. 5).

Ver. 4.] God's gracions answer to their professions of repentance; assuring them of his being reconciled to them, and as a token of it freeing them from their sins, and the punishment due to them (compare xi. 7,) and embracing them with a true love and affection, without any remembrance of their former provocations (compare Zeph. iii. 17).

Ver. 5. I will be as the dew unto Israel.] This and the following verse contain gracious promises of God's favours and blessing upon Israel's conversion, represented by different metaphors; described in this sentence by the refreshment which large dews give to the grass in the heats of summer (compare Job xxxix. 19, Prov. xix. 12).

Cast forth his roots as Lebanon.] As a tree of Lebanon, as the Chaldee paraphrase explains it.

Ver. 6. His beauty shall be as the olive tree.] Compare Ps. lii. 8, exxviii. 3, Ecclus. xxiv. 12, l. 10.

His smell as Lebanon.] From the trees of Lebanon came many sweet spices, particularly frankincense, called Lebonah in Hebrew, from whence some derive the word Lebanon (compare Cant. iv. 11).

Ver. 7. They that dwell under his shadow shall return.] Most interpreters translate the sentence thus: "They shall return and dwell under his shadow;" i. e. They shall return into their own country, and rest safely under the shadow or protection of the Almighty (compare Ps. xci. 1, and see the note upon i. 11).

The scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon.] As fragrant and as pleasing as the richest wines, such as were made near Lebanon; where there was a city called by the Greeks Ampeloessa, for the excellency of its wine; as is related by Pliny, lib. v. cap. 18.

Ver. 8.] This verse contains a dialogue between God and Ephraim, or Israel his people (see v. 3) after their conversion. They begin with declaring their utter aversion to idolatry (see ver. 3). To which God graciously replies, that he has heard them confessing their sins, and expressing their abhorrence of them things? prudent, and he shall know them? for the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them: but the transgressors shall fall therein.

(compare Jer. xxxi. 18), and will observe them (for the verb asharena is in the future tense); i. e. will guide them with the eye of his providence and mercy, as the LXX. and Chaldee paraphrase express the sense.

I am like a green fir-tree. From me is thy fruit found.] Ephraim or Israel gratefully acknowledges that he is in a flourishing and thriving condition: and then God puts him in mind that his fruitfulness is wholly owing to the divine blessing. Naturalists observe, that the fir-tree is of itself unfruitful.

Ver. 9.] Whosoever is truly wise will be convinced of this great and important truth, viz. that they who are sincerely desirous to know and do God's will, will be fully satisfied of the reasonableness of God's laws, and the methods of his providence, and will readily comply with the directions of both, to the securing their own eternal happiness: whereas men of perverse and disobedient tempers take offence at God's commands, and repine against his providence, to their own ruin and perdition. The same sense is expressed in that observation of the son of Sirach, Ecclus. xxxix. 24, "As God's ways are plain to the holy, so are they stumbling-blocks to the workers of iniquity." To the same purpose are those words of Christ, "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice," John xviii. 37, and "He that is of God heareth God's words," viii. 47. And St. Peter says, that "Christ is become a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence to the disobedient," 1 Pet. ii. 5. The observation of Grotius is very remarkable on this subject, De Verit. Christian. Relig. lib. ii. cap. ult., where he says, that the doctrine of the gospel was designed to be tanquam lapis lydius, ad quem ingenia sanabilia explorarentur: "as a touch-stone, to try the tempers of men, whether they were corrigible or not."

OF

THE PROPHET JOEL.

PREFACE.

If it were certain that the minor prophets were placed in the order of time wherein they lived, we might conclude that Joel prophesied before Amos, who was contemporary with Uzziah king of Judah. Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, ad A. M. 3197, makes the same inference, because Joel foretells that drought (ch. i.) which Amos mentions as actually come to pass (iv. 7—9). But to that argument it may be answered, that the drought there spoken of might probably be peculiar to the kingdom of Israel. And as to the precedence which the present Hebrew copies give to Joel, the LXX. place him the fourth in order, and put Amos and Micah before him.

If we consider the main design of his prophecy, we shall be apt to conclude, that it was uttered after the captivity of the ten tribes; for he directs his discourse only to Judah, and speaks distinctly of the sacrifices and oblations that were daily made in the temple. Israel is indeed mentioned, iii. 2, but it is in relation to future times, not to their present condition at the time when Joel prophesied.

CHAPTER I.

1 THE word of the LORD that came to Joel the son of Pethuel.

2 Hear this, ye old men, and give ear, all ye inhabitants of the land. Hath this been in your days, or even in the days of your fathers?

3 Tell ye your children of it, and let your children tell their children, and their children another generation.

4 That which the palmer-worm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—A description of a terrible famine that is coming on the land, occasioned by a long drought, and the locusts, and other noxious vermin which that produced: with an exhortation to proclaim a fast to be observed by the people, that they may humble themselves under the hand of God, and avert his judgments.

Ver. 2, 3.] The prophet shows how great and unparalleled this dearth is, by appealing to the memory of the ancients, and the observation of the present generation, whether they ever knew or heard anything like it; so that it deserved to be recorded as a warning to aftertimes (compare ii. 2).

Ver. 4.] A succession of noxious creatures hath made a perfect riddance of all the fruits of the earth, which makes this judgment so strange and remarkable.

Ver. 5.] This calamity should particularly affect those that spend their time in jollity and excess, and left hath the cankerworm eaten; and that which the cankerworm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten.

5 Awake, ye drunkards, and weep; and howl, all ye drinkers of wine, because of the new wine; for it is cut off from your mouth.

6 For a nation is come up upon my land, strong, and without number, whose teeth are the teeth of a lion, and he hath the cheek teeth of a great lion.

7 He hath laid my vine waste, and barked my fig tree: he hath made it clean bare, and cast it away; the branches thereof are made white.

8 ¶ Lament like a virgin girded with sackcloth for the husband of her youth.

9 The meat-offering and the drink-offering is cut off from the house of the LORD; the priests, the LORD's ministers, mourn.

10 The field is wasted, the land mourneth: for the corn is wasted: the new wine is dried up, the oil languisheth.

11 Be ye ashamed, O ye husbandmen; howl, make that the chief business of their life (compare Isa. xxiv. 7—9, 11). It carries along with it evident tokens of being sent as a punishment for their disorders.

Ver. 6. For a nation is come up upon my land,] Insects are described as a nation, or people marching in order under their leaders, both by sacred and profane writers, because of their power to do mischief, and their being irresistible by human strength or art (compare ii. 2, 25, Prov. xxx. 25—27).

Whose teeth are [as] the teeth of a lion,] So the locusts are described, Rev. ix. 8. They devour everything that comes in their way, like a lion, and none can rescue it. The particle as is frequently understood (see the note upon Isa. xxi. 1). The word labi is sometimes rendered a great lion, as it is here: lions being common in Judea, the Hebrew language hath particular words to express the several ages and sizes of that creature.

Ver. 7.] Bochart, De Animal. par. ii. p. 469, n. 447, observes out of Pliny and other writers, that locusts and such noxious creatures will not only destroy the leaves and the fruit, but even devour the very bark and stock of those trees upon which they fasten (compare ver. 12). The word translated barked, is read but in this one place of the bible; so the LXX. and some others, render it to break off; and understand it of the upper branches of the tree; in which sense it is used in the Arabic language.

Ver. 8.] The words are an apostrophe to the land of Judea: the prophet puts her in mind that she ought to be deeply affected with the sore strokes of the divine vengeance, and express her inward sense of those calamities, with the same outward expressions of mourning, as a young virgin that was betrothed to a husband, and should lose him before they had lived together, would lament such an untimely loss. It was common among the Jews for persons who were espoused to spend some time together in the house of the woman's friends, before the husband took her home to live as man and wife together (see Gen. xix. 14). The "husband of her youth" is a woman's first husband, called elsewhere the "guide of her youth," Prov. ii. 17, Jer. iii. 4; as the "wife of thy youth," Mal. ii. 15, is the first wife.

Ver. 9.] The meat-offering and drink-offering always accompanied the daily sacrifice (see Numb. xxviii. 4, 7). The word mincha, commonly trans-

O ye vine-dressers, for the wheat and for the barley; because the harvest of the field is perished.

12 The vine is dried up, and the fig tree languisheth; the pomegranate tree, the palm tree also, and the apple tree, even all the trees of the field, are withered: because joy is withered away from the sons of men.

13 Gird yourselves, and lament, ye priests: howl, ye ministers of the altar: come, lie all night in sackcloth, ye ministers of my God: for the meat-offering and the drink-offering is withholden from the house of your God.

14 ¶ Sanctify ye a fast, call a solemn assembly, gather the elders and all the inhabitants of the land into the house of the LORD your God, and cry unto the LORD, 15 Alas for the day! for the day of the LORD is at hand, and as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come.

16 Is not the meat cut off before our eyes, yea, joy and gladness from the house of our God?

17 The seed is rotten under their clods, the lated meat-offering, properly signifies the bread-offering; being made of flour (see the note upon Isa. xliii. 23). The dearth had destroyed both the corn and the wine, ver. 10—12, and thereby disabled the performing the necessary parts of God's daily worship in the temple. This was a new cause of grief to the priests, as well as to all pious persons.

Ver. 10.] The fields and the whole land have a mournful appearance, being altogether bare and destitute of food, either for man or beast (see ver. 18).

Ver. 11.] Your being disappointed of your expectations, and the fruits of your labour, is enough to cover you with shame and confusion (compare Jer. xiv. 3): especially when you consider these calamities as the just effects of the divine indignation.

Ver. 12. Joy is withered away] That joy they used to show at the gathering in of the fruits of the earth (see Isa. ix. 3, xiv. 10, Jer. xlviii. 33).

Ver. 13. Gird yourselves [with sackcloth], and lament, ye priests:] See ver. 9.

Lie all night in sackcloth,] Those priests whose turn it is to keep the night-watches in the temple (see Exod. xxvii. 21, 1 Sam. iii. 3, 1 Chron. ix. 33, Ps. cxxxiv. 2). Let them cover themselves with sackcloth, as is usual in times of the greatest calamity, and not put it off when they take themselves to rest; but sleep in sackcloth instead of their ordinary garments (see Dr. Lightfoot's Temple Service, ch. 9, at the beginning).

Ver. 14. Sanctify ye a fast, &c.] In order to avert God's wrath, and deprecate his judgments (see ii. 15, 16).

Into the house of the Lord] The house where God hath placed his name, and where he hath promised to hear the prayers which are made to him by his people, when they are afflicted with judgments of this kind (see 1 Kings vii. 37, &c.).

Ver. 15.] We have just cause to lament our sins which have brought these judgments upon us, which, if not averted by our repentance, will end in our utter destruction, as coming from a God that is infinite in power, and terrible in his judgments.

Ver. 16.] The dearth has discontinued our public sacrifices (ver. 9, 13), and has deprived us of those rejoicings wherewith we used to keep our solemn feasts at Jerusalem, and partake of the sacrifices garners are laid desolate, the barns are broken down; for the corn is withered.

18 How do the beasts groan! the herds of cattle are perplexed, because they have no pasture; yea, the flocks of sheep are made desolate.

19 O LORD, to thee will I cry: for the fire which were there offered (see Deut. xii. 6, 7, xvi. 10, 11, 14, 15, Ps. cv. 3).

Ver. 17.] The corn which is sown dies away, and rots in the ground: so the barns and granaries become useless and desolate.

Ver. 18.] The beasts themselves are sensible of these calamities, and pine away for want of sustenance.

Ver. 19.] The fiery drought hath burnt up all the hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness, and the flame hath burned all the trees of the field.

20 The beasts of the field cry also unto thee: for the rivers of waters are dried up, and the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness.

pasture-grounds (see ii. 3). The wilderness is sometimes opposed to the hills or mountains, and then it signifies the plains and places for pasture (see Isa. lxiii. 13, Jer. ix. 10).

Ver. 20.] They express their want of food by the mournful noise which they make; which is their natural way of making known their wants unto thee (compare Ps. civ. 21, Job xxxviii. 41).

CHAPTER II.

1 Blow ye the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain: let all the inhabitants of the land tremble: for the day of the LORD cometh, for it is nigh at hand;

2 A day of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness, as the morning spread upon the mountains: a great people and a strong; there hath not been ever the like, neither shall be any more after it, even to the years of many generations.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet describes the locusts, and other noxious insects, which were the cause of the famine mentioned ch. i. as if they were a mighty army, sent by God to destroy the fruits of the earth; and continues to exhort the people to repentance, promising the removal of these calamities, and a return of God's blessings upon their reformation.

Ver. 1. Blow ye the trumpet in Zion.] The prophet describes the locusts and the caterpillars as God's army, ver. 11, in pursuance of which metaphor he exhorts the people to prepare to meet them, in the same terms as if they were alarmed to encounter an enemy, which was by sounding of a trumpet (see Jer. iv. 5, 6, 19). This ceremony was not only used to give notice of an approaching enemy, but likewise to publish the times of the solemn assemblies for the worship of God (see Numb. x. 3, 9, 10). And this is the chief use they were to make of it upon this occasion (see ver. 15): for there was no other way to avert the impending judgment, but humbling themselves before God with fasting and prayer (see ver. 15).

Let all the inhabitants of the land tremble.] Let them be seized with as terrible an apprehension of this approaching judgment, as if they saw an enemy invading their country (see ver. 11).

Ver. 2. A day of darkness and of gloominess.] A day wherein everything will look dark and dismal (see Amos v. 18, 20). The locusts will intercept the light of the sun, and diffuse a darkness over the land, in as swift a manner as the light spreads itself in the morning. Travellers inform us, that these insects will of a sudden cover the sky like a cloud (see Bochart De Animal. lib. iv. cap. 4. 5, compare ver. 10). The LXX. and Chaldee paraphrase join this sentence to the following words: "As the morning spread upon the mountains, a people great and strong."

VOL. III.—90

3 A fire devoureth before them; and behind them a flame burneth: the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness; yea, and nothing shall escape them.

4 The appearance of them is as the appearance of horses; and as horsemen, so shall they run.

5 Like the noise of chariots on the tops of mountains shall they leap, like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble, as a strong people set in battle array.

A great people, and a strong;] See i. 6.

There hath not been ever the like, &c.] The locusts which plagued Egypt are described after the same manner, Exod. x. 14, "Before them there were no such locusts, neither after them shall be such." In both places we are to take it for a proverbial expression, to set forth the extraordinary greatness of the judgment, and not understand it too strictly according to the grammatical sense of the word. So we read of Hezekiah, that "after him there was none like him, among all the kings of Judah, nor any that went before him," 2 Kings xviii. 5, and yet the same character is given to Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 25.

Ver. 3. A fire devoureth before them; and behind them a flame burneth.] The locusts and the drought which ushered them in (see i. 19), have in a manner devoured everything that comes in their way; and leave sad tokens of destruction wherever they have been. Those that have travelled in the eastern countries, inform us, that wherever the swarms of locusts light, they make such a destruction, that "there remains not any green thing in the trees, or in the herbs of the field," as Moses speaks concerning the locusts in Egypt, Exod. x. 15.

The land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness.] The land of Judea, so famous for its fertility and pleasantness before this calamity, is now turned into a desolate wilderness, by the ravages they have made. The "garden of Eden" is a proverbial expression for a place of pleasure and fruitfulness, as we commonly use the word paradise (see Gen. xiii. 10, Isa. li. 3).

Ver. 4.] See the same comparison, Rev. ix. 7. Bochart observes that locusts resemble horses, not only in their swiftness, but also in the shape of their heads (see his Hierozoicon, par. ii. p. 474).

Ver. 5. Like the noise of chariots on the tops of mountains.] Compare Rev. ix. 9. Chariots anciently were a part of warlike preparations, as appears by many passages in scripture. The text says, that 6 Before their face the people shall be much pained: all faces shall gather blackness.

7 They shall run like mighty men; they shall climb the wall like men of war; and they shall march every one on his ways, and they shall not break their ranks:

8 Neither shall one thrust another; they shall walk every one in his path: and when they fall upon the sword, they shall not be wounded.

9 They shall run to and fro in the city; they shall run upon the wall, they shall climb up upon the houses; they shall enter in at the windows like a thief.

10 The earth shall quake before them; the heavens shall tremble: the sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining:

11 And the LORD shall utter his voice before his army: for his camp is very great: for he is strong that executeth his word: for the day of the LORD is great and very terrible; and who can abide it?

12 ¶ Therefore also now, saith the LORD, turn ye even to me with all your heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning:

13 And rend your heart, and not your garments, and turn unto the LORD your God: for he is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil.

14 Who knoweth if he will return and repent, and leave a blessing behind him; even a meat-offering and a drink-offering unto the LORD your God?

15 ¶ Blow the trumpet in Zion, sanctify a fast, call a solemn assembly:

16 Gather the people, sanctify the congregation, these locusts shall resemble them in their swiftness, noise, and terror. Tanto volant pennarum stridore, ut aliæ alites credantur: "Their wings make such a noise, as if they were winged fowls," saith Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. xi. cap. 29.

Of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble,] Which burns up combustible matter without resistance.

As a strong people] See ver. 2, and i. 6.

Ver. 6.] The inhabitants of the land shall be in great pain and anguish under the apprehension of their coming; they shall be seized with such a dread and fear, as shall make their visage look black and ghastly, like persons who are dying (compare Jer. viii. 21, Nah. ii. 10).

Ver. 7.] They shall march in such a swift and orderly manner, that no place shall be inaccessible to them, nor any force be able to withstand them.

Ver. 8. Neither shall one thrust another, &c.] Of the regular and orderly motion of these insects, St. Jerome gives this account from his own experience, in his notes upon the place: Hoc nuper in hac provincia vidimus: cum enim locustarum agmina venirent, et aerem inter cælum et terram occuparent, tanto ordine ex disposito Dei judicio volitant, ut instar tessellarum, quæ in pavementis artificum figuntur manu, suum locum teneant, et ne puncto quidem, ut ita dicam, aut ungue transverso, declinant ad alterum. "This we lately saw in our part of the country: for when swarms of locusts came and filled the lower region of the air, they flew in such order, by the divine appointment, and kept their places as exactly, as when several tiles or party-coloured stones are skilfully placed in a pavement, so as not to be a hair's-breadth out of their several ranks."

When they fall upon the sword, they shall not be wounded.] By reason of their nimbleness, and the outward coat of their skin being so hard and smooth, no offensive weapon can touch them.

Ver. 9.] We may have recourse to St. Jerome again for explaining this passage: Nihil locustis inivium est, cum et agros, et sata, et arbores, et urbes, et domos, et cubiculorum secreta penetrent. "Every place (saith he) lies open to them; for they infect not only the fields and the fruits of the earth, but creep into cities, houses, and the most secret recesses."

Ver. 10.] The inhabitants of the earth shall be seized with a horrible dread at their approach (see ver. 6, and compare Amos ix. 5). The heavens shall put on the appearance of fear by looking dark and dismal, because these noxious creatures shall come in such swarms as to intercept the rays of the sun, and the light of the moon and stars (see ver. 2). Pliny saith of them, that "they sometimes darken the sun;" ubi supra. And Moses saith of the locusts in Egypt, that "the land was darkened" by them, Exod. x. 15. It is likewise to be observed, that God's particular judgments being an earnest and forerunner of the general judgment, the same expressions are common to both (compare ver. 31, and iii. 15, Matt. xxiv. 29, and see the note upon Isa. xiii. 10).

Ver. 11. The Lord shall utter his voice before his army.] Like a leader or general, he shall command or encourage this his army, and can make the meanest parts of the creation the instruments of his vengeance. God's voice sometimes denotes his anger: the most terrible way of declaring his will is when he speaks to us by his judgments (compare iii. 16, Jer. xxv. 30, Amos i. 2).

His camp is very great.] See ver. 25.

The day of the Lord is great.] The time of God's particular judgments, as well as that of his general one, is commonly expressed by the "day of the Lord," the former being an earnest and imperfect representation of the latter.

Ver. 12.] Testify your inward repentance by outward expressions of true sorrow.

Ver. 13. Rend your heart, and not your garments.] Rending of the garments was customary in times of great sorrow and affliction (Gen. xxxvii. 34, Job i. 20, 2 Sam. i. 11). The prophet does not forbid men using this outward sign of mourning, but puts them in mind to add an inward contrition to it. The Hebrew writers sometimes signify the preference that is due to one thing above another, in terms which express the rejecting of that which is less worthy: thus we read, Hos. vi. 6, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice:" i. e. rather than sacrifice. To the same sense we are to understand the text before us.

He is gracious and merciful.] The words allude to God's own declaration of himself, Exod. xxxiv. 6, compared with Jonah iv. 2.

Ver. 14. Who knoweth if he will return and repent.] God's own nature, and the former instances we have found of his merciful disposition, encourage us to hope, that our sincere repentance may avail to avert God's wrath, and engage him to restore his blessings upon us and our land (compare 2 Sam. xii. 22, Jonah iii. 9).

Even a meat-offering and a drink-offering.] At least sufficient provision to supply the necessary parts of God's public worship; which, since the dearth, have been necessarily omitted (see i. 9, 13).

Ver. 15. Blow the trumpet in Zion.] The signal for assemble the elders, gather the children, and those that suck the breasts: let the bridegroom go forth of his chamber, and the bride out of her closet.

17 Let the priests, the ministers of the LORD, weep between the porch and the altar, and let them say, Spare thy people, O LORD, and give not thine heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them: wherefore should they say among the people, Where is their God?

18 ¶ Then will the LORD be jealous for his land, and pity his people.

19 Yea, the LORD will answer and say unto his people, Behold, I will send you corn, and wine, and oil, and ye shall be satisfied therewith:

assembling the people at the solemn times of public worship (see Numb. x. 3, 9, 10).

Sanctify a fast, &c.] See i. 14.

Ver. 16. Sanctify the congregation.] Take care that they be purified from those legal pollutions which render persons unqualified to approach God's temple or worship (see Lev. xv. 31, Numb. xix. 13, 20).

Assemble the elders, gather the children.] Compare 2 Chron. xx. 13. Let both young and old join in this general humiliation: all ages joining in it adds much to the solemnity of it, and is very proper to work in men's minds that sincere contrition, which may avert those judgments which threaten the whole nation, and wherein their posterity may suffer.

Let the bridegroom go forth of his chamber, and the bride out of her closet.] Let them prepare themselves for this solemn humiliation, by retiring into separate apartments, and abstaining from the enjoyment of each other (compare 1 Cor. vii. 15, Zech. xiii. 14).

Ver. 17. Let the priests,—weep between the porch and the altar.] A principal part of the priests' office was to attend upon the altar, and offer the sacrifices there. For which reason the open court just before the porch of the temple, where the brazen altar stood (see 2 Chron. viii. 12), was called the priests' court, where the greatest part of those whose course it was gave their attendance. Hereupon this is mentioned as the most proper place for the priests to make their prayers and intercessions to God in behalf of the people, where they might best be heard of all the assembly, and where they had before offered the sacrifices proper for such an occasion, which were the most solemn way of calling upon the Lord (see Gen. xii. 4, 1 Sam. vii. 8, 9), and being joined to their prayers, were the most effectual means to make an atonement for sin, and avert the divine displeasure.

Let them say, Spare thy people, O Lord.] It was usual to prescribe certain forms of prayer, or praise, to the priests in their public ministrations (see 1 Chron. xvi. 36, Hos. xiv. 2). Such was this herein-mentioned, wherein they beseech God to deliver his people, not for any merit of theirs, but for the glory of his own name, lest the heathen round about them should take occasion to blaspheme his name, as if he were not able to protect his people (compare Ps. xlii. 20, lxxix. 10, cxv. 2).

That the heathen should rule over them.] This translation of the Hebrew verb marshal favours their interpretation, who expound the army described at the beginning of the chapter of a hostile invasion: but if we understand those expressions only as a metaphorical description of that grievous destruction the locusts and other venomous insects should make in the land (which I take to be the truer exposition), then this sentence is to be translated, "That the heathen and I will no more make you a reproach among the heathen:

20 But I will remove far off from you the northern army, and will drive him into a land barren and desolate, with his face toward the east sea, and his hinder part toward the utmost sea, and his stink shall come up, and his ill savour shall come up, because he hath done great things.

21 ¶ Fear not, O land; be glad and rejoice: for the LORD will do great things.

22 Be not afraid, ye beasts of the field: for the pastures of the wilderness do spring, for the tree beareth her fruit, the fig tree and the vine do yield their strength.

23 Be glad then, ye children of Zion, and reshould use a by-word against them," as our margin reads; should make them the subject of their scorn and derision, as if they were forsaken by the God whom they worshipped: and the verb marshal is indifferently taken in either signification (see Deut. xxviii. 37).

Ver. 18.] He will be concerned for the honour of that land, which he hath made the lot of his own inheritance, and have so much pity for it, as not to suffer it or its inhabitants to be the subject of reproach to the heathen (see ver. 17, 19, and compare Zech. i. 14).

Ver. 19. I will send you corn, &c.] I will restore your former plenty, and the nations about you shall have no more occasion to reproach your desolate condition (ver. 17).

Ver. 20. I will remove—the northern army.] The locusts are described like an army in the former part of the chapter (see ver. 11), and here they are called the northern army, because they entered into the land at Hamath, one of the northern borders of it, and passed quite through it, till they came to the southern parts about the lake Asphaltites, which was barren and desolate ever since the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah; and there they were either famished or devoured in the lake, as the Egyptians were in the Red sea (see Exod. x. 19).

With his face toward the east sea, and his hinder part toward the utmost sea.] In the Hebrew language all lakes or confluences of water are expressed by the name of seas. Here the lake Asphaltites, or the sea of Sodom, is called the east sea (compare Ezek. xlvii. 8, 18, Zech. xiv. 8), and opposed to the utmost, or western sea, which is the Mediterranean (see Deut. xi. 24).

His stink shall come up.] St. Jerome, upon the place relates, that in his own time the heaps of locusts which were driven by the winds into the sea, afterward putrefied upon the shore, and so corrupted the air as to bring a pestilence.

Because he hath done great things.] Or rather, "Although he hath done great things:" though this army of insects by God's appointment has made such destruction in the land, yet it shall come to this shameful end.

Ver. 21. The LORD will do great things.] God will magnify himself as much in acts of mercy, as he did before in the strokes of his justice.

Ver. 22.] As the cattle had their share in the dearth, i. 18, 20, so now they shall receive comfort in the return of plenty.

Ver. 23. For he hath given you the former rain moderately.] The season for the former rain was about the middle of our October (see Dr. Lightfoot's Horæ Hebr. upon Luke iii. 25). The Hebrew word rendered moderately, literally signifies, "according to righteousness," and is equivalent with "accord joyce in the LORD your God: for he hath given you the former rain moderately, and he will cause to come down for you the rain, the former rain, and the latter rain in the first month.

24 And the floors shall be full of wheat, and the fats shall overflow with wine and oil.

25 And I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten, the cankerworm, and the caterpillar, and the palmerworm, my great army which I sent among you.

26 And ye shall eat in plenty, and be satisfied, and praise the name of the LORD your God, that hath dealt wondrously with you: and my people shall never be ashamed.

27 And ye shall know that I am in the midst ing to judgment," Jer. x. 23, or "in measure," Jer. xxx. 11. But some interpreters translate it here plentifully. Our margin reads a "teacher of righteousness," which sense is followed by the Chaldee paraphrast, and the Vulgar Latin, and may be a proper introduction to the promise which follows (ver. 28) of "pouring God's Spirit upon all flesh."

The latter rain in the first month.] Which was Nisan, partly answering to our March: the regular season for this rain was "three months before harvest" (Amos iv. 7), i. e. before wheat-harvest, which was later than barley-harvest in Judea (see Ruth ii. 23, 2 Sam. xxi. 9).

Ver. 25. I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten.] The fruit of those years which the venomous insects have devoured (see i. 4).

My great army] See ver. 11.

Ver. 26. Ye shall eat in plenty, and be satisfied.] Ye shall "eat bread to the full," as it is expressed, Lev. xxiv. 5, Deut. vi. 11, viii. 10. "Times of scarcity are expressed by "eating and not being satisfied," Lev. xxvi. 26, Amos iv. 8, Mic. vi. 14.

Ver. 27. Ye shall know that I am in the midst of Israel.] God's giving tokens of his especial blessing and protection to his people is expressed by his "dwelling among them," or "in the midst of them;" see iii. 17, Lev. xxvi. 11, 12, Ezek. xxxviii. 26. This is a favour he never promises but upon their sincere and steady obedience, as appears in the forecited places; and then the promises contained in this and the foregoing verse, will punctually be fulfilled.

That I am the Lord your God.] You will then be convinced that I am always ready to protect you, and you need not apply yourselves to any other gods, in your wants or troubles (compare Isa. xlv. 5, 21).

My people shall never be ashamed.] Shall not be any more disappointed of the trust they place in me; nor be reproached by the heathen, as if I had forsaken them (see ver. 19, compare Isa. li. 22, Nahum i. 15).

Ver. 28. It shall come to pass afterward.] Or, "in the last days," as St. Peter explains the phrase, Acts ii. 17, by which expression Manassch ben Israel tells us, that all their wise men understood the times of the Messias (see the Bishop of Litchfield's Def. of the ancient Prophecies, p. 123). So "afterward" and "in the latter days" are equivalent, Dan. ii. 28, 45.

I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh.] The plentiful effusion of the Holy Spirit is mentioned by the prophets as the peculiar character of the gospel state; and it is elsewhere compared to the pouring waters upon thirsty land, whereby it becomes fruitful (see Isa. xlv. 3, liv. 13, Jer. xxxi. 34, Ezek. xxxvi. 27, compared with John vii. 39). So this text, in analogy to other parallel places, is very fitly applied by St. Peter to the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the first believers, Acts ii. 17. "All flesh" comprehends the of Israel, and that I am the LORD your God, and none else: and my people shall never be ashamed.

28 ¶ And it shall come to pass afterward, that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions:

29 And also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out my spirit.

30 And I will shew wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke.

31 The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the LORD come.

gentiles as well as the Jews; which promise we see was punctually fulfilled, Acts x. 44, xi. 17. The expression of "the last days" is another indication that this prophecy belongs to the times of the Messias: for the Jews agree that prophecy was sealed up with Malachi, and not to be restored till the days of the Messias (see the forementioned discourse).

But we need not confine this prophecy to those early times; but since many prophecies have gradual completions, we may suppose this prophecy to imply, that there shall be another remarkable effusion of the Spirit bestowed upon the Jews in order to their conversion in the latter times of the world (see note upon Isa. liv. 13, Ezek. xxxix. 29). This exposition agrees very well with some expressions in this prophecy, and makes a clearer connexion with the following chapter.

Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy.] The gift of prophecy was bestowed upon some women under the Old Testament, as upon Miriam (Exod. xv. 20), Deborah (Judg. iv. 14), and Huldah (2 Kings xxii. 14). But this gift was more frequently conferred upon them in the times of the New. Thus we read of four daughters of Philip the evangelist, "who did prophesy," Acts xxi. 9, and church history affords us several other instances; such as Perpetua and Felicitas, who were martyrs for the Christian faith, Potamiana mentioned by Eusebius, lib. iv. cap. 5, and others.

Your young men shall see visions.] In visions the inspired person was awake, but his external senses being bound up, and as it were laid in a trance (see Numb. xxiv. 4), he had a distinct knowledge of the things revealed to him, and that sometimes accompanied with external representations: such was that vision of St. Peter's, mentioned Acts x. 11. From visions being applied to young men, and dreams to old, some have observed that the imagination is stronger in those that are young than in the old; so that their senses need not be bound up with sleep, in order to make them capable of receiving heavenly visions.

Ver. 29.] As every age and condition are made partakers of the common benefits of the gospel, so they shall not be excluded from the privilege of the extraordinary gifts of it (see Col. iii. 11, James ii. 5).

Ver. 30.] This and the following verse principally point out the destruction of the city and temple of Jerusalem by the Romans, a judgment justly inflicted upon the Jewish nation for their resisting the Holy Spirit, and contempt of the means of grace. So Malachi, after he had foretold the coming of the Messias (iii. 1), immediately adds, that his coming should be attended with terrible judgments upon the disobedient, iii. 2, 3, 5, iv. 1. The prophet here takes notice of the extraordinary signs which will be the forerunners of that destruction; such were the great slaughters of men, and burning of the towns and cities of Judea, which preceded that last and finishing stroke of the divine vengeance; and chiefly the comet which hung over their city, and the fearful sights seen in the air some time before; which are mentioned by Josephus, De Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 31, and foretold by Christ, Luke xxi. 11.

32 And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the LORD shall be delivered: for in mount Zion and in Jerusalem

Ver. 31.] Compare Mal. iv. 5. Particular judgments upon kingdoms and nations are often described in such terms as properly belong to the general judgment; as hath been observed upon the tenth verse of this chapter. The expressions here used, in the literal sense, import the failing of light in the sun and moon, whether by eclipses (when the moon looks of a bloody colour), or any other cause: and here they denote the dark and melancholy state of public affairs at the destruction of the Jewish nation by the Romans: and the utter overthrow of that state and government (see the note upon Isa. xiii. 10).

Ver. 32. Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered.] This St. Paul, Rom. x. 13, explains of those who give themselves up to Christ, and profess themselves his disciples; that being the most effectual means of escaping the judgments coming upon the unbelieving Jews, and likewise of being "delivered from the wrath to come" (see Luke xxi. 22, 1 Thess. ii. 16).

For in mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance,] The gospel is described as taking its rise from Jerusalem, and being from thence spread abroad into the world (see Ps. cx. 2, Isa. ii. 3). Accordingly Christ commanded his disciples to preach the gospel "to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem," Luke xxiv. 47. The words may also imply, that the Christian church, often denoted by mount Zion and Jerusalem, is the only place of salvation (see likewise Obad. ver. 17).

As the Lord hath said,] By me his prophet. Or the words may relate to the several promises made in the Psalms, and elder prophets, relating to the church, under the names of Zion and Jerusalem (see particularly Ps. xiv. 7, and several texts in Isaiah); for we cannot certainly conclude in what time Joel lived.

And in the remnant whom the Lord shall call.] Or, "Among the remnant:" this may partly be understood of those who were converted by the preaching of Christ and the apostles, and thereby escaped the vengeance which involved the rest of the nation (see Acts ii. 40, 1 Thess. ii. 16). These are called the Σαρκίνοι, "such as should be saved," or delivered, Acts ii. 47. But there is another remnant of the Jews included in this promise, who shall be converted at the end of the world (when the obstinate and incorrigible shall be destroyed), and return home from their several dispersions. In this sense "the remnant" is often understood (see Isa. xi. 11, 16, Jer. xxxi. 7, Mic. iv. 7, v. 3, 7). This conversion of the Jewish nation is frequently mentioned in the prophets (see Jer. xxx. 3, &c., xxxvi. 25, &c., Ezek. xx. 34, 40, xxviii. 25, Amos ix. 9, and the notes upon these texts). This sense agrees with what follows in the next chapter.

CHAPTER III.

1 For, behold, in those days, and in that time, when I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem,

2 I will also gather all nations, and will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and will plead with them there for my people and for my heritage Israel, whom they have scattered among the nations, and parted my land.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—The following prophecy relates to the latter times of the world; when, upon their conversion, God shall deliver the Jews from their oppressors, and restore them to their own land. The prophet likewise foretells the destruction of their enemies, and other unbelievers, in some decisive battle, such as that mentioned Rev. xvi. 14, and the glorious state of the church that should follow.

Ver. 1. In those days, and in that time.] The time called "the last days," ii. 28, according to St. Peter's interpretation, Acts ii. 17, which comprehends all that time which reaches from the first to the second appearing of the Messias (see the note upon Isa. ii. 1). The context shows, that here is meant the latter part of these last days, or times.

When I shall bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem,] This is to be understood of that restoration of the Jewish nation and their capital city, which shall be brought to pass in the latter times of the world, according to many predictions of the prophets, as has been observed upon the last verse of the foregoing chapter (compare particularly this verse with Jer. xxx. 3). The prophet's mentioning only the kingdom or tribe of Judah, is a probable argument that he was of that tribe, and lived after the captivity of the ten tribes.

Ver. 2. And will bring them down into the valley of Jehoshaphat.] The prophet speaks of a general discomfiture of God's enemies in some decisive battle before the general judgment, as hath been observed in the notes upon Isa. lxvi. 16. Such probably is the battle of Gog and Magog, described Ezek. xxxix., and that of Armageddon, spoken of Rev. xvi. 14, 16. The place of this remarkable action is here called "the valley of Jehoshaphat;" as if the prophet had said, "the place where the Lord will execute judgment," for so the word Jehoshaphat signifies in the original. So the "valley of Jezreel," Hos. i. 4, means where God's arm or strength will exert itself. The expression likewise alludes to the valley of Bera-chah, as it was afterward called, 2 Chron. xx. 26, which was famous for the victory Jehoshaphat and his people obtained there over a great confederacy of their enemies. This valley was not far from Jerusalem, if it be the same with that described, Zech. xiv. 4.

And will plead with them there] God pleads with men, and vindicates the cause of oppressed truth and innocence by his judgments. Then their own consciences fly in the face of the guilty, and force them to acknowledge the justice of those punishments they suffer (compare Ezek. xvii. 20, xx. 35, xxxviii. 22).

For my heritage Israel, whom they have scattered] The prophets in the Old Testament denounce several judgments against Edom, Moab, and other ill neighbours of the Jews, who took advantage of their

3 And they have cast lots for my people; and have given a boy for an harlot, and sold a girl for wine, that they might drink.

4 Yea, and what have ye to do with me, O Tyre, and Zidon, and all the coasts of Palestine? will ye render me a recompense? and if ye recompense me, swiftly and speedily will I return your recompense upon your own heads;

5 Because ye have taken my silver and my gold, and have carried into your temples my goodly pleasant things:

6 The children also of Judah and the children of Jerusalem have ye sold unto the Grecians, that ye might remove them far from their border.

calamities to vent their spite against them (see ver. 19 of this chapter, Jer. xxii. 14, &c., xlix. 1, 2, Ezek. xxv. 3, &c., Amos i. 11, Obad. ver. 10, Zeph. ii. 6). But since all nations are summoned to answer the impeachment here mentioned, we may suppose the word Israel to comprehend the faithful of all ages; and then we may observe, that the judgments denounced against the church's enemies, are chiefly for their hatred and cruelty towards God's servants (see Rev. xi. 18, xvi. 6, xviii. 20, 24).

Ver. 3. They have cast lots for my people;] Without troubling themselves to make any choice among the captives of my people, they have left the matter wholly to the chance of lots, which captive every man should take (see Obad. ver. 11, Nahum iii. 10).

And have given a boy for an harlot,] And have sold their slaves to others, merely to supply their wanton and sinful extravagances.

Ver. 4. O Tyre, and Zidon, and all the coasts of Palestine?] These were some of the Jew's evil neighbours, who took all occasions to distress them (see Amos i. 6, 9, 2 Chron. xxi. 16, xxxviii. 18).

Will ye render me a recompense?] Do you think to vent your spite against me by way of retaliation for the evils you have suffered from my people? Hardened sinners come to that degree of desperate boldness as to proclaim enmity against God, and show their resentment towards him, for the hard usage that they have received at his hands; so Homer describes Achilles's fierce temper at the beginning of the twenty-second Iliad, thus speaking to Apollo:

“Ὡς ἂν δὴ τιμωρῆμιν εἴ μοι δύναις γέ γε παρίει, —“Were it in my power, my vengeful arm should soon return the wrong.”

Ver. 5.] The temple was despoiled of its ornaments, either through the necessities or the wickedness of the kings of Judah, several times (see 2 Kings xii. 18, xviii. 16, 2 Chron. xxviii. 24). It was likewise plundered by the Chaldeans often; once in the reign of Jehoiakim, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 7, then in the short reign of Jehoiachin, 2 Kings xxiv. 13, before the last destruction of it, 2 Kings xxv. 17, 18). Some part of the furniture might perhaps be sold to the merchants of Tyre and Zidon. The profanation of the temple at Jerusalem, and the sacrilegious spoils of its ornaments, have been remarkably punished by God in heathens and infidels (see Jer. i. 28, li. 11): so it was in Belshazzar, Dan. v. 1, in Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Macc. vi. 12, and in Pompey and Crassus afterward; because God had given remarkable proofs of a divine presence in that place; and the heathens themselves might have discovered, by the light of nature, that there was but one true invisible God (see Dan. v. 23).

Ver. 6.] It was customary for the merchants of 7 Behold, I will raise them out of the place whither ye have sold them, and will return your recompence upon your own head:

8 And I will sell your sons and your daughters into the hand of the children of Judah, and they shall sell them to the Sabaeans, to a people far off; for the Lord hath spoken it.

9 ¶ Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles; Prepare war, wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near; let them come up:

10 Beat your plowshares into swords, and your pruninghooks into spears; let the weak say, I am strong.

11 Assemble yourselves, and come, all ye heathen, the neighbouring countries, such were those of Tyre and Zidon here spoken of, to buy the children of Israel for slaves of their conquerors, in order to sell them again (see 1 Macc. iii. 41). It is said, particularly of Javan, i. e. Greece, that they dealt in that sort of traffic, of buying and selling of slaves (Ezek. xxvii. 13). The histories which relate the calamities of the Jews, speak of great numbers of them made captives, and then sold and dispersed into foreign countries: so forty thousand were sold by Antiochus Epiphanes, 1 Macc. v. 14, and the greatest part of ninety-seven thousand at the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (see Joseph. Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 9).

Ver. 7.] I will restore them, or their posterity, which are to be looked upon as making “one natural body,” out of their several captivities, whither their enemies have dispersed them (see Isa. xliii. 5, 6, xlix. 12, Jer. xxiii. 8).

Ver. 8. I will sell your sons and your daughters] This might probably come to pass when Alexander, after the taking of Tyre, sold thirty thousand of the inhabitants for slaves: Gaza, a considerable city upon “the coast of Palestine” (see ver. 4), at the same time was sacked, and the women and children sold for slaves (see Dr. Prideaux's Connex. of Script. Hist. par. i. book vii).

They shall sell them to the Sabaeans, to a people far off:] So the country of Sheba is described, Jer. vi. 20 (see the note there). They are called the “Sabaeans from the wilderness,” Ezek. xxiii. 42, i. e. who came from Arabia Deserta, or the places bordering upon it.

Ver. 9. Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles;] After these particular threatenings against Tyre and Zidon, and that coast, the prophet returns to what he had mentioned, ver. 2, concerning the heathen or unbelieving world, gathering themselves either to oppose the Jews in their return homeward, or some other way to hinder the growth of Christ's kingdom.

Prepare war, wake up the mighty men.] The prophet in an ironical and insulting manner, encourages them to make their utmost effort to oppose the designs of Providence: but it should be all in vain (see the like expressions, Isa. viii. 9, 10, Jer. xlvi. 3, 4, Ezek. xxxviii. 7).

Ver. 10. Beat your plow-shares into swords,] Let not only the military men prepare for war, but even the husbandmen and vine-dressers: all the forces you can muster together will be little enough for the enterprise you are undertaking. Peaceful times are described by the contrary expressions, of “turning swords into plow-shares, and spears into pruning-hooks,” Isa. ii. 4).

Let the weak say, I am strong,] Feebleness, or want of strength, should be no pretence to excuse any from this service. This is still spoken by way of and gather yourselves together round about : thither cause thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord.

12 Let the heathen be wakened, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat : for there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about.

13 Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe : come, get you down ; for the press is full, the fats overflow ; for their wickedness is great.

14 Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision : for the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision.

15 The sun and the moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining.

16 The Lord also shall roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem ; and the heavens and the earth shall shake : but the Lord will be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel.

17 So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain : then shall Jerusalem be holy, and there shall no strangers pass through her any more.

18 ¶ And it shall come to pass in that day, that the mountains shall drop down new wine, and the hills shall flow with milk, and all the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters, and a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord, and shall water the valley of Shittim.

19 Egypt shall be a desolation, and Edom shall be a desolate wilderness, for the violence against the children of Judah, because they have shed innocent blood in their land.

irony, and insulting such a confederacy, and the preparations they make for war.

Ver. 11. Thither cause thy mighty ones to come down,] Thy mighty angels, to discomfit thine enemies. Angels are often described as mighty in strength (see Ps. lxxviii. 25, ciii. 20, Rev. x. 1), and here they are spoken of as chosen warriors proper to execute any enterprise, as they are directed by God (compare Isa. xiii. 3, and see below, ver. 13).

Ver. 12. Let the heathen be wakened,] Let their courage be roused up (see ver. 9).

The valley of Jehoshaphat :] See ver. 2.

Ver. 13. Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe :] God will give his commands to the angels, who are “the reapers,” Matt. xiii. 39, to cut off the wicked by a speedy destruction ; for their iniquities are come to maturity, and are ripe for judgment (compare Jer. li. 33, Hos. vi. 11, Matt. xiii. 38, 41, Rev. xiv. 15).

Come, get you down ;] The angels are again commanded to go down from heaven to the “valley of decision,” ver. 14. The LXX. and the Chaldee paraphrase render the words, Come, tread, deriving the Hebrew word from rudah, which verb still retains that sense in the Arabic, as Dr. Pocock informs us.

For the press is full, the fats overflow ; for their wickedness is great.] The wicked have filled up the measure of their iniquities. The former words allude to the time of the harvest ; these to the season of the vintage (compare Rev. xiv. 19). As the juice of the vine is called the blood of the grape ; in pursuance of the same metaphor, God’s extraordinary judgments are expressed by his “treading the wine-press of his wrath” (see Isa. lxiii. 3, Lam. i. 15, Rev. xiv. 19, 20).

Ver. 14. Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision :] This makes it probable that the battle here spoken of is the same with that of Gog and Magog, described Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix. for there the valley where Gog is said to be buried, is called Hamon Gog ; i. e. “the multitude of Gog,” xxxix. 11, “The valley of decision” is the same with the “valley of Jehoshaphat” above mentioned, the place where the great cause shall be decided between God and his enemies.

The day of the Lord is near] See ii. 1.

Ver. 15.] This particular judgment shall be a forerunner of the general one, when the whole frame of nature shall be dissolved (see the note upon ii. 10, 31).

Ver. 16. The Lord also shall roar out of Zion,] Where he shall give tokens of his especial residence. God’s anger, when he speaks to us by his judgments, is fitly compared to the roaring of a lion (see Jer. xxv. 30, Amos i. 2, iii. 8).

The heavens and the earth shall shake :] Great commotions or convulsions of states and governments are expressed by “shaking the heavens and the earth” (compare Ezek. xxxviii. 19, Hag. ii. 6, 22). But here the words may be understood in a literal sense, because the action here described in this chapter is a forerunner and token of the approaching day of judgment.

The Lord will be the hope of his people,] “Though the heaven and earth pass away, his word” and promise made to his servants “will not pass away” (compare Isa. li. 6, Matt. xxiv. 35).

Ver. 17. So shall ye know that I am the Lord your God] You shall find visible effects of my favour and protection (see ii. 27).

Then shall Jerusalem be holy.] This character belongs to the New Jerusalem (compare Isa. xxxv. 8, lii. 1, lx. 21, Rev. xxi. 27) ; or it may be understood of the earthly Jerusalem, as the metropolis of the converted Jews. As the inhabitants themselves shall be holy, so the city shall be called the holy city, as in former times it was (see Dan. ix. 16, Zech. viii. 3, compare Isa. xxiv. 23, Mic. iv. 17, Obad. ver. 17). It shall no more be subject to be polluted or oppressed by unbelievers (compare Nah. i. 15).

Ver. 18. The mountains shall drop down new wine, &c.] In the millennial state there shall be plenty of all things. Vines were usually planted upon hills (see Isa. v. 1, Ps. lxxx. 11), these shall yield such plenty of wine, as if the mountains flowed down with it. The flocks and the herds that feed upon the hills shall afford the same plenty of milk (compare Amos ix. 14).

The rivers of Judah shall flow with waters.] Rivers shall water the driest and most barren parts of the land, and make them fertile (compare Isa. xxx. 25).

A fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord,] The supplies of grace are often represented by rivers and plentiful streams, both upon account of their cleansing quality, as well as because they enrich the ground, and make it fruitful (compare Isa. xlv. 3, Ezek. xlvii. 1, 11, Zech. xiii. 7, xiv. 8). This fountain is said to come forth of the house of the Lord ; implying that the church is the spring from whence all the means of grace are communicated to believers.

And shall water the valley of Shittim.] So the holy waters (Ezek. xlvii.) are described as running from the altar as far as the Dead sea, or the lake Asphaltites, the east part of which bordered upon the country of Moab, within whose border was the valley of Shittim (see ver. 8, 10 of that chapter). This denotes the plentiful issues of the divine grace; an emblem of which was the streams that issued out of the rock, and followed the Israelites through a great part of the wilderness (1 Cor. x. 4).

Ver. 19.] These two people were remarkable for the spite they bare to the Jews: the Egyptians were their oppressors when they first became a nation, and afterward exercised great cruelties upon them during the reign of the Egyptian kings, who were Alexander's successors. The Idumeans are often reproved, and threatened with judgments by the prophets, for the spite they took all occasions to vent against the Israelites, though nearly related to them (see Jer. xlix. 7, Ezek. xxv. 12, Amos i. 11, Obad. ver. 10). So those two nations are taken, in a general sense, for the enemies of God's people (see the note upon Isa. xi. 14).

21 For I will cleanse their blood that I have not cleansed: for the Lord dwelleth in Zion.

Ver. 20. Judah shall dwell (or continue) for ever.] Free from the annoyance of enemies (see ver. 17, and compare Amos ix. 15).

Ver. 21. I will cleanse their blood that I have not cleansed:] I will thoroughly cleanse them from their sins and pollutions; neither shall they rise up any more in judgment against them. The word blood may signify pollution in general (see Isa. iv. 3, Ezek. xvi. 6). But the words chiefly import, that God will pardon the Jews the great crime of shedding the blood of Christ, upon their sincere repentance; the guilt of which they had imprecated upon themselves and their posterity, Matt. xxvi. 25, and had felt the visible effects of God's displeasure upon that account for several ages.

For the Lord dwelleth in Zion.] See ver. 17.

OF

THE PROPHET AMOS.

PREFACE.

Amos was contemporary with Hosea, though he did not probably live so long, but died before the reign of Hezekiah, and the captivity of the ten tribes. St. Jerome gives him this character, that "though he was rude in speech, yet not in knowledge." Several of his expressions are taken from such observations as are suitable to the employment of a shepherd; as, when he compares God's anger to the "roaring of a lion," i. 2, iii. 8, and the gigantic stature of the Amorites to the "height of oaks and cedars," ii. 9 (see also v. 8). But still there are many beautiful passages in this prophecy, where the expressions are very elegant, and the pathos or rhetoric very moving: such as are ii. 9—11, iv. 6, &c., v. 6, 9, vi. 1, 7, viii. 7, 10, ix. 2, 6.

CHAPTER I.

1 THE words of Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoa, which he saw concerning Israel in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash king of Israel, two years before the earthquake.

2 And he said, The Lord will roar from Zion,

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—In this, and the beginning of the second chapter, the prophet denounces God's judgments against the countries bordering upon Judea; and then prophesies against Judea itself.

Ver. 1. Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoa.] See vii. 14. Tekoa was in the tribe of Judah, six miles from Beth-lehem, as St. Jerome informs us, who lived near it; the "wilderness of Tekoa," mentioned 2 Chron. xx. 20, made it a convenient place for keeping cattle.

Which he saw concerning Israel.] This prophecy relates chiefly to the ten tribes, or kingdom of Israel; though the prophet briefly denounces God's judgments not only against Judah, but likewise against the Syrians, Philistines, and other neighbouring countries.

In the days of Jeroboam.] See vii. 10.

Two years before the earthquake.] Amos uttered his prophecy at that time, though it is probable he did not commit his book, or collection of prophecies, to writing, till after the earthquake mentioned here, and again Zech. xiv. 15, where it is said to have happened "in the days of Uzziah." Josephus relates it as a tradition among the Jews, that this earthquake was sent as a punishment for Uziah's presumption in invading the priest's office, for which he himself was struck with leprosy, as we read 2 Chron. xxvi. 18, 19, and the whole city was terribly shaken with an earthquake (see Joseph. Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 10). This judgment the Jews suppose to have befallen Uziah in the twenty-fifth year of his reign: but Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, ad A. M. 3221, and other later chronologers, think it did not happen till the latter part of Uziah's life and reign, because his son Jo-and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the habitations of the shepherds shall mourn, and the top of Carmel shall wither.

3 Thus saith the LORD; For three transgressions of Damascus, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they have threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron:

4 But I will send a fire into the house of Hazael, which shall devour the palaces of Benhadad.

5 I will break also the bar of Damascus, and cut off the inhabitant from the plain of Aven, and him that holdeth the sceptre from the house of Eden: and the people of Syria shall go into captivity unto Kir, saith the LORD.

6 ¶ Thus saith the LORD; For three transgressions of Gaza, and for four, I will not turn tham took upon him the government, who was not born till after Jeroboam's death; so the earthquake must have happened some time before Uzziah's quitting the government to his son.

Ver. 2. The Lord will roar from Zion.] See note upon Joel iii. 16.

The habitations of the shepherds shall mourn, and the top of Carmel shall wither.] The want of pasture here threatened was occasioned by the drought which is foretold, iv. 7, 8. Carmel was a mountainous tract of ground, which ran through the two tribes of Issachar and Zebulun; it is spoken of as one of the most fruitful places in all Judah (see Isa. xxxiii. 9, xxxv. 2); upon which account the word is sometimes taken appellatively, and translated "a fruitful field," Isa. x. 18, xxix. 17.

Ver. 3. For three transgressions of Damascus, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment] The prophet begins with denouncing his judgments against foreign countries, and then comes to Judah and Israel. The first he threatens is Syria, the head or capital city of which was Damascus (see Isa. vii. 8), for the several transgressions they had committed, expressed by "three transgressions, and four." It is a common way of speaking, to use a certain number for an uncertain. So we read, Job v. 19, "He shall deliver thee in six troubles, yea, in seven no evil shall touch thee" (see the like phrase, Prov. vi. 16, Eccles. xi. 2, Mic. v. 5). So "once and twice" are used, Ps. lxii. 11, "twice and thrice," Job xxxiii. 29.

Because they have threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron.] The way of threshing in the eastern countries was by drawing heavy planks with iron wheels over the corn, having sharp stones fastened on the boards (see Dr. Hammond's notes on Matt. iii. 12). From hence the phrase is used to signify the weak's being crushed by the mighty (see Isa. xli. 15, Jer. li. 33). Here it denotes the cruelties exercised by Hazael and Ben-hadad, kings of Syria; see 2 Kings x. 32, 33, xiii. 3, 7, where the sacred historian, speaking in the phrase of the text, saith, that "he made them like the dust by threshing."

Ver. 4.] God's judgments are often compared to fire (see Ps. lxxviii. 63, and the note upon Ezek. xxx. 8). The word is taken in this general sense in the following verses.

Ver. 5. I will break also the bar of Damascus,] Its gates and fortifications, wherein its strength consists.

And cut off the inhabitant from the plain of Aven,] Or, Bikath-aven: the word signifies "the plain of vanity:" from whence some conjecture it was a place in Syria remarkable for idolatry; as Beth-el away the punishment thereof; because they carried away captive the whole captivity, to deliver them up to Edom:

7 But I will send a fire on the wall of Gaza, which shall devour the palaces thereof:

8 And I will cut off the inhabitant from Ashdod, and him that holdeth the sceptre from Ashkelon, and I will turn mine hand against Ekron: and the remnant of the Philistines shall perish, saith the Lord God.

9 ¶ Thus saith the LORD; For three transgressions of Tyrus, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they delivered up the whole captivity to Edom, and remembered not the brotherly covenant:

10 But I will send a fire on the wall of Tyrus, which shall devour the palaces thereof.

11 ¶ Thus saith the LORD; For three trans-is called Beth-aven for that reason, Hos. v. 15 (see the following note).

And him that holdeth the sceptre from the house of Eden.] "The house of Eden" is equivalent to "the house of pleasure;" so it may denote one of the pleasant palaces belonging to the king of Syria, described by "him that holdeth the sceptre." But Eden was likewise a country bordering upon Syria, mentioned 2 Kings xix. 12, Ezek. xxvii. 23 (see the note there). Mr. Maundrell, in his Travels, observes, that not far from Damascus there is a plain still called the valley of Bocat, which he supposes the same with Bikath-aven here mentioned: and there is a place at this time called Eden near it (see his Corrections upon p. 118).

Him that holdeth the sceptre—and the people of Syria shall go into captivity unto Kir,] This was fulfilled when Tiglath-pileser took Damascus, "and carried the people of it captive to Kir, and slew Rezin" their king, 2 Kings xvi. 9. Kir was a city in Media, mentioned Isa. xxii. 6. The Vulgar Latin renders it Cyrene both here and in the second of Kings: but that does not appear to have been under the king of Assyria's dominion.

Ver. 6. Gaza.] This city was situate upon the coast of Palestine, and is one of those threatened by Joel, iii. 6.

Because they carried away captive the whole captivity,] Gaza was a town belonging to the Philistines, who made frequent invasions upon the Jews, and carried away considerable spoils with them (see 2 Chron. xxi. 16, xxviii. 18).

To deliver them up to Edom.] See ver. 11.

Ver. 7.] Compare Jer. xlvii. 1.

Ver. 8. I will cut off the inhabitant from Ashdod.] Another town belonging to the Philistines, and threatened by the prophets with the same judgments which befell Gaza (see Jer. xxv. 20, Zeph. ii. 4, Zech. ix. 5).

I will turn mine hand against Ekron.] To "turn the hand," is the same as to inflict punishment (see Ps. lxxxi. 14, Isa. i. 25, Zech. xiii. 7).

The remnant of the Philistines shall perish,] These are elsewhere called "the remnant of the sea-coast," Ezek. xxv. 16, and "the remnant of the country of Caphtor," Jer. xlvii. 4 (see the note there).

Ver. 9. For three transgressions of Tyrus, &c.] This is probably to be understood of the destruction of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, foretold by Isaiah, ch. xxiii., by Jeremiah, xlvii. 4, where it is joined with the Philistines, as here; and by Ezekiel, ch. xxvi., xxvii.

gressions of Edom, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because he did pursue his brother with the sword, and did cast off all pity, and his anger did tear perpetually, and he kept his wrath for ever:

12 But I will send a fire upon Teman, which shall devour the palaces of Bozrah.

13 ¶ Thus saith the LORD: For three transgressions of the children of Ammon, and for four,

They delivered up the whole captivity] See ver. 11. And remembered not the brotherly covenant:] That strict league and friendship begun between David and Hiram king of Tyre, 2 Sam. v. 11, and afterward continued by Solomon, 1 Kings v. 1, ix. 11.

Ver. 11. For three transgressions of Edom, &c.] The Idumeans are often threatened for their enmity against the Israelites; who took all occasions to oppress them, and to insult over them in their distress (see 2 Chron. xxviii. 17, Jer. xlix. 7, Ezek. xxv. 12, xxxv. 2, Joel iii. 19, Obad. ver. 1—11).

Because he did pursue his brother with the sword.] They retained the same hatred and animosity against their brethren the Israelites, which their father Esau had expressed against his brother Jacob.

Ver. 12.] Teman and Bozrah were two principal cities of Idumea (see Isa. lxiii. 1, Jer. xlix. 7, Ezek. xxv. 15). This expression imports the entire conquest and destruction of that country, according to the predictions of the prophets before cited; to which may be added, Mal. i. 3, 4. The ancient seat of the Edomites was the same which was afterward called

I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they have ripped up the women with child of Gilead, that they might enlarge their border:

14 But I will kindle a fire in the wall of Rabbah, and it shall devour the palaces thereof, with shouting in the day of battle, with a tempest in the day of the whirlwind.

15 And their king shall go into captivity, he and his princes together, saith the LORD.

Arabia Petraea; from whence they were expelled by the Nabatheans, and never could recover their country, but were forced to settle themselves in the southern parts of Judea (see Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. ad A. C. 165).

Ver. 13. They have ripped up the women with child of Gilead.] Hazael, king of Syria, grievously afflicted the Israelites that lay eastward of Jordan, particularly the Gileadites (see 2 Kings x. 33). The low condition these countries were reduced to, might probably encourage the Ammonites to possess themselves of Gilead, which lay near their own borders, and to destroy the inhabitants in that cruel manner (compare Jer. xlix. 1, Zeph. ii. 8, Hos. xiii. 16).

Ver. 14. I will kindle a fire in the wall of Rabbah.] Compare Jer. xlix. 2. Rabbah was the chief city of the Ammonites (see 2 Sam. xii. 26).

With a tempest in the day of the whirlwind:] The destructions of war are often compared to the devastations caused by whirlwinds and tempests (see Isa. v. 26, Jer. xxv. 32, Dan. xi. 40, Zech. ix. 14).

Ver. 15.] See Jer. xlix. 3.

CHAPTER II.

I Thus saith the LORD; For three transgressions of Moab, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because he burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime:

2 But I will send a fire upon Moab, and it shall devour the palaces of Kiriath: and Moab shall die with tumult, with shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet:

3 *And I will cut off the judge from the midst thereof, and will slay all the princes thereof with him, saith the LORD.

4 ¶ Thus saith the LORD; For three transgressions of Judah, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they have despised the law of the LORD, and have not kept his commandments, and their lies caused them to err, after the which their fathers have walked;

5 But I will send a fire upon Judah, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem.

6 ¶ Thus saith the LORD; For three transgressions of Israel, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they sold the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes;

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—After two short denunciations against Moab and Judah, the prophet proceeds to the main subject of his prophecy, viz. to denounce God's judgments against Israel.

Ver. 1.] Moab and Ammon, as they were nearly related, and bordered upon each other, so they are usually joined together in the threatenings of the prophets (see Jer. xlviii., xlix., Ezek. xxv. 1, 8, Zeph. ii. 8).

Because he burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime:] "To plaster the walls of his house with it," as the Chaldee paraphrase explains the text; which was a cruel insulting over the dead. A piece of barbarity resembling this is told by Sir Paul Rycaut, of the wall of the city of Philadelphia, made of the bones of the besieged, by the prince that took it by storm, in The present State of the Greek Church, ch. 2. Some refer the cruelty reproved in the text, to the story of the king of Moab, related 2 Kings iii. 27. But the story there recited, seems rather to be understood of the king of Moab's own son, than of the king of Edom's.

Ver. 2. Moab shall die with tumult.] His men shall die in the tumult of war (compare Jer. xlviii. 15).

Ver. 3. I will cut off the judge] The word judge denotes the supreme magistrate or governor (see Deut. xvii. 9); and is here equivalent to the king (compare Mic. v. 1).

Ver. 4.] Many of the tribe of Judah have continued in the same idolatry and worship of false gods, which their wicked kings, such as Jehoram and Ahaziah, and their forefathers, have set up, notwithstanding all the warnings I have given them by my prophets (see 2 Chron. xxiv. 17—19.) Idols are often called lies in the scripture (see note upon Hos. vii. 3).

Ver. 6. They sold the righteous for silver, &c.] They perverted the cause of the righteous, and gave an un-

7 That pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor, and turn aside the way of the meek: and a man and his father will go in unto the same maid, to profane my holy name;

8 And they lay themselves down upon clothes laid to pledge by every altar, and they drink the wine of the condemned in the house of their god.

9 ¶ Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of the cedars, and he was strong as the oaks; yet I destroyed his fruit from above, and his roots from beneath.

10 Also I brought you up from the land of Egypt, and led you forty years through the wilderness, to possess the land of the Amorite.

just sentence against him for a bribe of the small-est value (compare v. 11, 12, viii. 6).

Ver. 7. That pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor.] The Vulgar Latin hath given the best sense of this sentence, Qui conterunt super pulverem terræ capita pauperum; "Who tread down the heads of the poor into the dust of the earth;" i. e. they throw them into the dust, and then trample upon them. The Chaldee paraphrase understands the verb shaaph in the sense of despising, which comes near the sense of trampling upon; the LXX. render it by καταπατία, "to tread upon," both here and Ps. lvi. 1, 2, lvii. 3. The verb shoph, which is near akin to shaaph, plainly signifies to tread upon, or bruise, Gen. iii. 15.

A man and his father will go in unto the same maid (or young woman), to profane my holy name.] One man hath cohabited with his father's wife, to the great reproach of my name and religion; being such an instance of fornication, or uncleanness, "as is scarce heard of among the more civilized heathens," as St. Paul observes, 1 Cor. v. 1. And another "hath lewdly defiled his daughter-in-law," as Ezekiel complains, xxii. 11, in contradiction to the express words of the law, Lev. xviii. 8, 15.

Ver. 8. They lay themselves down upon clothes laid to pledge by every altar.] This is to be understood of the feasts which were made of part of their idolatrous sacrifices, and were eaten in some of the apartments of their temples, according to the custom both of the Jews and gentiles (see 1 Sam. ix. 12, 13, 22, Isa. lvii. 7, Ezek. xxiii. 41). The prophet reproves them not only for partaking of things offered to idols, but likewise for making use of other men's furniture, left in their hands for a pledge, to set off their idolatrous entertainments. Here was another instance of their unmercifulness, to detain pledges received from the poor, contrary to the law, Exod. xxii. 26 (see the note upon Ezek. xviii. 7).

The Jews, as well as the Romans, used to lie along at their meals in couches, as appears by this verse, compared with vi. 4. This custom continued in aftertimes, as appears by several places in the gospels, where it is in the original, "Lay down to meat;" though our translation renders it, "Sat down." The custom of sitting at meals seems to have been the more ancient of the two (see Gen. xliii. 33, 1 Sam. ix. 22, xvi. 11, xx. 25).

They drink the wine of the condemned] The drink-offerings, made with wine, were a necessary part of the sacrifices: some of which was likewise reserved for the entertainment that followed (see Exod. xxxii. 6). And this was provided out of the fines or mulcts of such as had been unjustly condemned (ver. 6).

In the house of their god.] In the houses dedicated 11 And I raised up of your sons for prophets, and of your young men for Nazarites. Is it not even thus, O ye children of Israel? saith the Lord.

12 But ye gave the Nazarites wine to drink; and commanded the prophets, saying, Prophecy not.

13 Behold, I am pressed under you, as a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves.

14 Therefore the flight shall perish from the swift, and the strong shall not strengthen his force, neither shall the mighty deliver himself:

15 Neither shall he stand that handleth the bow; and he that is swift of foot shall not delito the calves of Dan and Beth-el, or some other idolatrous temple.

Ver. 9. Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them,] The Amorites include the rest of the Canaanites (see Gen. xv. 16).

Whose height was like the height of the cedars,] Many of them were of a gigantic stature, as appears from Numb. xiii. 32, 33. Virgil makes the same comparison, speaking of the Titans, Æneid. lib. iii. ver. 677.

Concilium horrendum, quales, cum vertice celso
Aeræ quercus, aut coniferæ cyparissi
Constituerunt, sylvæ alta Jovis, lucusve Dianæ.

"A dreadful council, with their heads on high,
Not yielding to the towering tree of Jove,
Or tallest cypress of Diana's grove."

MR. DRYDEN.

Ver. 10. Led you forty years through the wilderness,] Where you wanted for nothing (see Deut. ii. 7, viii. 2—4).

Ver. 11. I raised up of your sons for prophets,] I provided for you a succession of prophets, bred up in schools erected for that purpose (see 2 Kings vi. 1, 2), to be your constant instructors, and to whom you might have recourse in any difficulty.

Of your young men for Nazarites.] A Nazarite signifies one separate, or set apart for the service of God (see Numb. vi. 2, 5). Such were Samson, Judg. xiii. 5, and John Baptist, Luke i. 15. Their vow did often include in it, beside their abstaining from wine, and not shaving their heads, a constant attendance upon God's service, during the time of their separation (see 1 Maec. iii. 49, and the note upon Hos. ix. 10). We read of "women that departed not from the temple," Exod. xxxviii. 8, such as Anna, Luke ii. 37, and there might probably be men that constantly attended upon the service there: and of such I would upon second thoughts understand the Nazarites, mentioned Lam. iv. 7. They are described in that place as remarkable for their youth and beauty: and they are styled young men here. A Nazarite is always mentioned as a title of honour, and Joseph is called, by way of eminence, "a Nazarite among his brethren," as the original imports, Gen. xlix. 26.

Ver. 12. And commanded the prophets, saying, Prophecy not.] See vii. 13, Isa. xxx. 10, Jer. xi. 21, Mic. ii. 6. They would not endure their idolatry and other darling sins should be reproved.

Ver. 13.] Your sins have quite tired out my patience, and I am weary with bearing them (compare Isa. xliii. 24, Mal. ii. 17).

Ver. 14, 15.] The most likely means you can provide for your security, shall prove ineffectual (compare ix. 1, &c.).

ver himself: neither shall he that rideth the horse deliver himself.

aside their upper garments, or the habit proper to their quality or profession (see note upon Isa. xx. 2).

CHAPTER III.

1 HEAR this word that the Lord hath spoken against you, O children of Israel, against the whole family which I brought up from the land of Egypt, saying,

2 You only have I known of all the families of the earth: therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities.

3 Can two walk together, except they be agreed?

4 Will a lion roar in the forest, when he hath no prey? will a young lion cry out of his den, if he have taken nothing?

5 Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is for him? shall one take up a snare from the earth, and have taken nothing at all?

6 Shall a trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid? shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?

7 Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets.

8 The lion hath roared, who will not fear? the Lord God hath spoken, who can but prophesy?

9 ¶ Publish in the palaces at Ashdod, and in the palaces in the land of Egypt, and say, Assemble yourselves upon the mountains of Samaria, and behold the great tumults in the midst thereof, and the oppressed in the midst thereof.

10 For they know not to do right, saith the Lord, who store up violence and robbery in their palaces.

11 Therefore thus saith the Lord God; An adversary there shall be even round about the land; and he shall bring down thy strength from thee, and thy palaces shall be spoiled.

12 Thus saith the Lord; As the shepherd

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter contains a threatening of God's judgments, first against the twelve tribes in general, and then particularly against the kingdom of Israel, whose capital city was Samaria.

Ver. 1.] All that family of which Jacob, or Israel, was the head: family is equivalent to people, here and in the following verse; and so it is taken Jer. i. 15, viii. 3, x. 25, Nah. iii. 4, Zech. xiv. 18.

Ver. 2.] Your punishment shall be exemplary, because you have sinned against a clearer light, and higher obligations. For the same reason the angel is commanded to begin his execution at the sanctuary, Ezek. ix. 6 (compare Matt. xi. 22, Luke xii. 47).

Ver. 3. Can two walk together (as friends), except they be agreed?] So neither can I behave myself towards you as a friend or benefactor, as long as you act in perfect contradiction to my nature and laws by your manifold sins.

Ver. 4.] As a lion doth not use to roar but when he hath his prey in view; so neither doth God denounce his judgments (compared to the roaring of a lion, ver. 8), unless your sins have made you proper objects of his displeasure.

Ver. 5. Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is for him?] God is said to "watch over sinners" to bring evil upon them, Jer. xxxi. 21, Dan. ix. 14, and thus he will deal by his people, unless they repent.

Shall one take up a snare from the earth, and have taken nothing at all?] In like manner you are not to expect that God should remove his judgments till they have attained the proper end, viz. the people's repentance.

Ver. 6. Shall the trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid?] The sounding of the trumpet was the signal of war: such an alarm is apt to strike men with terror (see Jer. iv. 12): and the warnings God gives his people by the prophets, of the judgments hanging over their heads, ought equally to affect them.

Shall there be evil in the city, and the Lord hath not done it?] You may be assured that the calamities you feel, or have just cause to fear, are not the effect of chance, but come upon you by the especial direction of providence (compare Isa. xlv. 7).

Ver. 7.] There was a succession of prophets among the Jews from Samuel's time till the captivity: the people commonly consulted them upon extraordinary occasions, and they gave them counsel and direction what was proper to be done (see ii. 11, 1 Kings xxii. 13, 2 Kings iii. 11, xxii. 13, Jer. xxi. 2, Ezek. xx. 2). The want of this prophetic gift was much lamented in the times of the captivity (see Ezek. vii. 26, Lam. ii. 9, Ps. lxxiv. 9).

Ver. 8.] As the denouncing of the divine judgments ought to terrify you like the roaring of a lion (see ver. 4, and i. 2), so the prophets that are God's messengers must obey those commands and instructions he gives them, with whatever perils the discharge of their duty may be attended (see ii. 12, vi. 12, 13).

Ver. 9.] God calls upon the heathen to be witnesses of his judgments upon his own people, that they may take warning thereby: particularly he gives notice to the Philistines and Egyptians, the Jews' inveterate enemies, that they may assemble themselves, and with pleasure behold the ravages and oppressions which their insulting adversaries will bring upon the kingdom of Israel, whose capital city was Samaria, built upon a hill of the same name (1 Kings xvi. 24): or the "mountains of Samaria" may be equivalent to the "mountains of Israel," mentioned Ezek. xxxvi. 8, xxxvii. 22. Samaria being often taken for the whole kingdom of Israel (see the note upon Hos. viii. 6).

Ver. 10. For they know not to do right,] i. e. They will not know nor learn to do right (see Jer. v. 4, viii. 7, ix. 3).

Ver. 11.] Shalmaneser the king of Assyria shall invade the land on every side, shall dismantle its fortresses, and plunder its wealthy palaces.

Ver. 12. As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs,] When the lion hath for some time ravaged the flock, but is at last frightened away by the taken out of the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear; so shall the children of Israel be taken out that dwell in Samaria in the corner of a bed, and in Damascus in a couch.

13 Hear ye, and testify in the house of Jacob, saith the Lord God, the God of hosts, 14 That in the day I shall visit the transgressions of Israel upon him, I will also visit the altars of Beth-el: and the horns of the altar shall be cut off, and fall to the ground.

15 And I will smite the winter house with the summer house; and the houses of ivory shall perish, and the great houses shall have an end, saith the Lord.

noise of the shepherds and their dogs, or by throwing darts and other offensive weapons at him; in such a case the shepherd can hope to save but only some poor remains of the prey the lion had seized upon. And thus shall it be at the sacking of Samaria; but a small remainder of the inhabitants shall escape the search of their enemies, though they try to hide themselves in their most retired apartments (compare 1 Kings xx. 30, xxii. 25).

And in Damascus in a couch.] The marginal reading gives a better sense, "On the bed's feet." They that follow the reading of the text, explain it of those Israelites who fled for refuge to Damascus, there being a confederacy between Israel and Syria (see Isa. vii. 2), but were seized there, upon the taking of Damascus (see i. 5, 2 Kings xvi. 9, compared with xv. 29). Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, conquered both Israel and Syria (see the places above cited, and compare Isa. vii. 16, xvii. 1—3).

Ver. 13.] The words are directed to the prophets, whom God sends to testify and declare his will.

Ver. 14. I will also visit the altars of Beth-el.] In the general destruction of the ten tribes, God's judgments should be particularly visible upon the places dedicated to idolatrous worship, especially Beth-el, the principal place of that kind (see ix. 1, Hos. x. 5, 6, 8). Altars may stand here for altar; as we read of the "calves of Beth-aven," in that place of Hosea, meaning the calf at Beth-el.

The horns of the altar shall be cut off.] They were squares placed at the four corners of the altar, and hollow in the middle, into which some of the blood of the sacrifices was poured out (see Exod. xxvii. 12, and Dr. Prideaux's draught of the altar, in the first part of his Connex. of Script. Hist.).

Ver. 15. I will smite the winter house with the summer house.] The great men had their different houses or apartments suited to the several seasons of the year (see Jer. xxxvi. 21).

The houses of ivory shall perish.] King Ahab built him "an ivory house," i. e. ceiled or wainscoted with ivory (1 Kings xxii. 39). It is probable other great men followed his example, in adorning their houses after this costly manner. Whereupon the prophet threatens destruction to this piece of pride and state.

CHAPTER IV.

1 HEAR this word, ye kine of Bashan, that are in the mountain of Samaria, which oppress the poor, which crush the needy, which say to their masters, Bring, and let us drink.

2 The Lord God hath sworn by his holiness, that, lo, the days shall come upon you, that he will take you away with hooks, and your posterity with fishhooks.

3 And ye shall go out at the breaches, every cow at that which is before her; and ye shall cast them into the palace, saith the Lord.

4 ¶ Come to Beth-el, and transgress; at Gil-

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet reproveth the ten tribes for luxury and oppression, for idolatry and impenitency, notwithstanding the severe judgments already inflicted upon them.

Ver. 1. Hear ye this word, ye kine of Bashan.] The luxury and insolence of oppressors is often compared to the wantonness of full-fed cattle (see Ps. xxii. 12, lxviii. 30). Bashan was remarkable for the richness of its pastures, and its breed of cattle (Numb. xxxii. 4, Deut. xxxii. 14, Ezek. xxxix. 18). Grotius and some other commentators suppose this to be meant of the women of quality (see ver. 3).

That are in the mountain of Samaria.] See iii. 9.

Which say to their masters, Bring, and let us drink.] If we explain the former part of the verse of women, by their masters, or lords, as the word is sometimes translated, may be understood their husbands (see Gen. xviii. 12); or else by masters we may understand those to whom they sold the poor for slaves (compare ii. 6), and demanded the money due for their purchase, that they might spend it in a luxurious manner. So the text will be equivalent to that in Joel iii. 3, "They have sold a girl for wine, that they may drink."

Ver. 2. The Lord God hath sworn by his holiness.] As sure as he is holy and true, so certainly will he bring the threatened judgment upon this people (compare Ps. lxxxix. 35).

That he will take you away with hooks, and your posterity with fishhooks.] Invaders and spoilers are elsewhere compared to fishers (see Jer. xvi. 16, Hab. i. 15). The words besiroth digah, translated "with fish-hooks," the Targum translates, in fisher-boats; boats made in the fashion of a pot, for the word si-roth properly signifies a pot. The several invaders of Israel, first, Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xv. 29), then Shalmaneser (ibid. xvii. 5), "The Syrians before, and the Philistines behind" (Isa. ix. 12), these coming after one another, will make an entire riddance of the whole nation: so that their posterity, or remainder, as the word may be translated, which hath escaped the first invaders, shall certainly fall into the hands of those that come after.

Ver. 3. Ye shall go out at the breaches, every cow at that which is before her.] The prophet pursues the metaphor taken from the kine of Bashan, ver. 1, and tells the people, that as cattle strive to get out at every breach they can find in a mound or fence, so shall they with all possible haste make their escape at the several breaches which shall be made in the walls of Samaria (compare 2 Kings xxv. 4, Ezek. xii. 12).

Ye shall cast them into the palace.] The sentence may be thus translated, "Ye shall cast out yourselves;" i. e. Ye shall with haste betake yourselves gal multiply transgression; and bring your sacrifices every morning, and your tithes after three years:

5 And offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with leaven, and proclaim and publish the free offerings: for this liketh you, O ye children of Israel, saith the Lord God.

6 ¶ And I also have given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities, and want of bread in all your places: yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord.

7 And also I have withholden the rain from you, when there were yet three months to the harvest: and I caused it to rain upon one city, and caused it not to rain upon another city: one piece was rained upon, and the piece whereupon it rained not withered.

8 So two or three cities wandered unto one city, to drink water; but they were not satisfied: yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord.

9 I have smitten you with blasting and mildew: when your gardens and your vineyards and your fig trees and your olive trees increased, the palmerworm devoured them: yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord.

10 I have sent among you the pestilence after the manner of Egypt: your young men have I slain with the sword, and have taken away your horses; and I have made the stink of your camps to come up unto your nostrils: yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord.

11 I have overthrown some of you, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, and ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning: yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord.

12 Therefore thus will I do unto thee, O Isto Harmon; so the Vulgar Latin: or "to the mountains of Mona;" by which the Chaldee understands Armenia, others the mountains of the Maonites, or Mehunims, as they are called, Judg. x. 12, 2 Chron. xxvi. 7. They are called Minai by Strabo, and reckoned inhabitants of Arabia Felix (lib. xvii. p. 768, edit. Casaub.).

Ver. 4. Come to Beth-el, and transgress;] A permission spoken by way of sarcasm and irony, sharply upbraiding them as incorrigible, and not to be reformed by all the reproofs and admonitions that have been given them: like that of Ezekiel, xx. 39, "Go ye, serve every man his idols" (see the note there).

At Gilgal multiply transgressions;] Gilgal was a place noted for idolatry, as well as Beth-el (see the note upon Hos. iv. 15).

Bring your sacrifices every morning,] According to the law of the daily burnt-offering (Numb. xxviii. 4), which they observed in the worship of the golden calves, intending by that outward representation to worship the God of Israel (compare viii. 5, 10).

Your tithes after three years;] At the end of three years, when the tithe, spent the other two years at Jerusalem, was distributed among the poor (see Deut. xiv. 22, 23, 28). Upon which account the third year is called "the year of tithing;" Deut. xxvi. 12 (see Dr. Wootton upon the Mishna, par. i. p. 115). The Hebrew reads, "After three days," which our margin supplies, "After three years of days." The word yamim, days, often signifies years (see Exod. xiii. 10, Lev. xxv. 29, 1 Sam. i. 3, 2 Sam. xiv. 26, compare Gen. xxiv. 55). So the phrase which we translate, "The yearly sacrifice," is, in the Hebrew, "The sacrifice of days:" 1 Sam. i. 21, xx. 6.

Ver. 5. Offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with leaven,] Or, "with leavened bread;" as the law prescribes, Lev. vii. 13. Beside the cakes which were to be unleavened, because it was an offering made by fire; ibid. ver. 12, 13, and ii. 4, &c.

Proclaim and publish the free offerings;] Or, "free-will-offerings;" as the word is in other places translated (see Lev. xxii. 18, 21). These offerings were such as the sacrificers did partake of; whereupon they gave notice of their intention to their friends, and invited them to the feast (see Deut. xii. 6, 7).

For this liketh you,] Your hearts are so set upon your idolatrous worship, that it is in vain to use any arguments to persuade you to the contrary (see Ps. xi. 12).

Ver. 6. And I also have given you, &c.] Or, "For this cause, I have given you" (see Noldius, p. 337, 338). The famine I have sent upon the cities and territories of Israel hath not brought you to a sense of your sins, or any sincere purposes of amendment.

Ver. 7. I have withholden the rain from you, when there were yet three months to the harvest;] This was called the latter rain, and the season for it was in the first month, answering to our March, which was three months before the wheat-harvest (see note upon Joel ii. 23).

I caused it to rain upon one city, and caused it not to rain upon another] This may import, that God punished them with drought, at the same time when he sent rain upon the cities of Judah; making that remarkable difference between Israel and Judah, as he did formerly between Egypt and the land of Goshen (see Exod. viii. 22, ix. 4, 26, x. 23).

Ver. 8.] They had not enough to quench their thirst: the contrary phrase, To eat or drink, "and be satisfied," denoteth plenty (see the note upon Joel ii. 26).

Ver. 9. I have smitten you with blasting and mildew;] A judgment threatened to their sins by Moses, Deut. xviii. 22.

The palmerworm devoured them;] The palmerworm and other devouring insects, occasioned by the drought before mentioned (compare Joel i. 4).

Ver. 10. I have sent among you the pestilence, after the manner of Egypt;] The several infectious diseases wherewith I plagued Egypt (see Exod. ix. 3, xii. 29, Deut. xxviii. 27, 60).

And have taken away your horses;] The enemy hath seized them (see 2 Kings xiii. 3, 7). Horses were scarce in Judea, and the Jews used to furnish themselves with horses from Egypt: so such a loss was not easily recruited (see 1 Kings x. 29, Isa. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 9).

I have made the stink of your camps to come up unto your nostrils;] The kings of Israel had frequent wars with the Syrians (see 2 Kings xiii. 25, xiv. 28). This made it necessary for them to keep up standing forces; and when diseases spread in their camps, the noisome smell of the carcasses produced a pestilence.

Ver. 11. I have overthrown some of you,] "Your cities are burnt with fire" (Isa. i. 7), and utterly consumed, as Sodom and Gomorrah were, by fire from heaven (Gen. xix. 24, 25).

Ye were as a firebrand plucked out of the burning;] Those that remained, very narrowly escaped. A proverbial expression, used both in sacred and profane authors, to signify a narrow escape out of an imminent danger (compare Zech. iii. 2, 1 Cor. iii. 15, Jude, ver. 23).

Ver. 12. Thus will I do unto thee,] I will send rael: and because I will do this unto thee, prepare to meet thy God, O Israel.

13 For, lo, he that formeth the mountains, and createth the wind, and declareth unto man these several judgments upon thee altogether, till I make an entire destruction of thee.

Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel.] Expect that he will come to take full vengeance upon thee, and consider whether thou art able to contend with him; so the expression of "meeting an adversary" is understood, Luke xiv. 31. Or, if that be impossible, try to avert his anger by thy humiliation and repentance, before it actually breaks out upon thee.

Ver. 13. He that formeth the mountains, and createth the wind.] The former the most solid, the other the most subtle and active part of the material world.

Declareth unto man what is his thought.] Whose knowledge is infinite, as well as his power; who searches the thoughts and intents of the heart; and, what is his thought, that maketh the morning darkness, and treadeth upon the high places of the earth, The Lord, the God of hosts, is his name.

upon some occasions, discovers them for men's conviction (see Dan. ii. 28).

That maketh the morning darkness.] Who turns day into night, overcasting the heavens with clouds (see v. 8); or else, "darkens the earth in the clear days," by an extraordinary eclipse of the sun (see viii. 9): and can in like manner turn the most flourishing condition into a state of misery (compare v. 18, 19). Affliction is often expressed by darkness (see v. 18, Job xxii. 11, Isa. v. 30, viii. 22).

Treadeth upon the high places of the earth.] Who can subdue cities or fortresses of the greatest strength, whose "walls reach up to heaven," as it is expressed Deut. i. 28 (compare xxxiii. 29), and takes delight to humble the great and mighty, denoted elsewhere by the mountains and hills (see Isa. ii. 14, Ps. lxxii. 3).

CHAPTER V.

1 HEAR ye this word which I take up against you, even a lamentation, O house of Israel.

2 The virgin of Israel is fallen; she shall no more rise: she is forsaken upon her land; there is none to raise her up.

3 For thus saith the Lord God; The city that went out by a thousand shall leave an hundred, and that which went forth by an hundred shall leave ten, to the house of Israel.

4 ¶ For thus saith the Lord unto the house of Israel, Seek ye me, and ye shall live:

5 But seek not Beth-el, nor enter into Gilgal, and pass not to Beer-sheba: for Gilgal shall surely go into captivity, and Beth-el shall come to nought.

6 Seek the Lord, and ye shall live; lest he break out like fire in the house of Joseph, and devour it, and there be none to quench it in Bethel.

7 Ye who turn judgment to wormwood, and leave off righteousness in the earth,

8 Seek him that maketh the seven stars and

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.—A pathetic lamentation for the sins of Israel, which, upon their impenitency, the prophet foresaw would end in their destruction: whereupon he earnestly exhorts them to a sincere repentance and reformation, without which all their outward exercises of religion would avail nothing.

Ver. 1.] The words might be better translated thus, "Hear you this word, even a lamentation which I take up over you." The text alludes to the lamentations made at funerals (see ver. 16, Jer. ix. 17, Ezek. xix. 2, xxvii. 2). So the prophet bemoans the state of the kingdom of Israel, as dead and irrecoverably lost.

Ver. 2. The virgin of Israel is fallen; she shall no more rise.] She that never was conquered by any, is fallen from her glory, and shall never be restored to her former state as a kingdom or nation. Those cities or kingdoms are called virgins which were never conquered (see Isa. xxiii. 12, xxxvii. 22). The virgin of Israel may likewise import her that was espoused to God, as a chaste virgin to a husband (see 2 Cor. xi. 2), and had the benefit of being under his protection, but is now, for her idolatries and other sins, delivered up to the will of her enemies (compare Jer. xviii. 13).

She is forsaken upon her land; there is none to raise her up.] Like an infant that is exposed, or fallen upon the ground, and hath none to take it up.

Ver. 3.] A city which was able to furnish out a thousand men fit for war, shall have but a hundred of them left. And so it shall be in proportion for any less number; but one in ten of them shall escape the sword, and other chances of war.

Ver. 4. For [or rather, therefore] thus saith the Lord, Seek ye me, and ye shall live:] i. e. Ye shall be prosperous. Life is taken for prosperity or happiness (see 1 Sam. xxv. 6): as death is used for misery, Exod. x. 17, Hos. xiii. 1.

Ver. 5. But seek not Beth-el.] See iv. 4.

Pass not to Beer-sheba.] A place remarkable for Abraham's dwelling there, and planting a grove for the worship of God (Gen. xxi. 33, xxii. 19). It is likely a grove might still be continued there, and abused to idolatry (see vii. 9, viii. 14). Beer-sheba did formerly belong to Judah (see 1 Kings xix. 3); but it seems in latter times to have been taken from it by some of the kings of Israel.

Gilgal shall surely go into captivity.] There is an allusion in the Hebrew between the word Gilgal and Galah, which signifies captivity. Such paronomasias are now and then used by the sacred writers (see the note upon Isa. xxiv. 17).

Beth-el shall come to nought.] The original runs thus, "Beth-el shall become Aven." Beth-el signifies "the house of God;" when the place was defiled by idolatry, it was named by way of reproach, Beth-aven, i. e. "the house of vanity," or idolatry (see Hos. iv. 15): and it is here called so in another sense, viz. as vanity is the same with a thing of nought, or of no continuance.

Ver. 6. Lest he break out like fire [see i. 4] in the house of Joseph.] The ten tribes are called by the name of Joseph, as they are elsewhere by that of Ephraim, the son of Joseph; because that was the chief tribe of the kingdom of Israel (see Ezek. xxxvii. 19).

And there be none to quench it in Beth-el.] The idol

Orion, and turneth the shadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night: that calleth for the waters of the sea, and poureth them out upon the face of the earth: The Lord is his name:

9 That strengtheneth the spoiled against the strong, so that the spoiled shall come against the fortress.

10 They hate him that rebuketh in the gate, and they abhor him that speaketh uprightly.

11 Forasmuch therefore as your treading is upon the poor, and ye take from him burdens of wheat: ye have built houses of hewn stone, but ye shall not dwell in them; ye have planted pleasant vineyards, but ye shall not drink wine of them.

12 For I know your manifold transgressions and your mighty sins: they afflict the just, they take a bribe, and they turn aside the poor in the gate from their right.

13 Therefore the prudent shall keep silence in that time; for it is an evil time.

14 Seek good, and not evil, that ye may live: and so the Lord, the God of hosts, shall be with you, as ye have spoken.

15 Hate the evil, and love the good, and establish judgment in the gate: it may be that the Lord God of hosts will be gracious unto the remnant of Joseph.

16 Therefore the Lord, the God of hosts, the Lord, saith thus; Wailing shall be in all streets; and they shall say in all the highways, Alas!

you worship will not be able to deliver you, but will itself be involved in the common calamity (see note upon Hos. x. 6).

Ver. 7. Ye who turn judgment to wormwood.] Or, "into hemlock," as the word laannah is translated, vi. 12. Ye that pervert the law which was designed to protect innocence, and under colour of it exercise the greatest oppression.

Ver. 8. Seek him that maketh the seven stars, and Orion.] The Hebrew names of these constellations are Kina and Kesil, which are translated to the same sense, Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 31. These, and other constellations, were commonly thought to have a great influence upon the seasons (see the forementioned place of Job). Whereupon their rising and setting used to be particularly taken notice of by husbandmen and shepherds; whose employments lying abroad, made them more observant of the heavenly appearances. So this is an instance of providence very suitable for one of Amos's profession to mention.

Maketh the day dark with night.] The vicissitudes of day and night, and the light's breaking out of darkness, are just matter of admiration, did not the constant recurrence of them lessen the wonder. Clemens Alexandrinus cites these verses out of Pindar to the same sense:

Θεὸς δὲ δύναται ἐκ μελανίας
Νυκτὸς ἀμικτὸν ἄστρι· ὥς
Κελαινῶ νύκτι δὲ σκότου καλύψει
Καθάρων ἀμίκτος σίλας.

God can create the light
And make it spring from darkest night:
And when he covers o'er the day,
The darkness chases light away.

That calleth for the waters of the sea, and poureth them out.] Who commandeth the seas and the rivers to overflow the earth in great inundations. The Jews call all great bodies of water by the name of seas. The words may likewise be explained of the raising vapours out of the sea, to supply rain for the earth, the clouds retaining none of the saltness of the sea-water (compare Job xxxviii. 34).

Ver. 9.] That giveth strength to him that hath been conquered, and enableth him to subdue his conquerors and become master of their fortifications. And such deliverance God is able to work for Israel (see 2 Kings xiii. 17, &c.).

Ver. 10.] The oppressors of the poor (see ver. 11, 12) hate those magistrates that would punish the injurious, and do right to the oppressed. It was the custom for judges to execute their office sitting in the gates of the city (see the note upon Isa. xxix. 21, and ver. 15 of this chapter).

Ver. 11. Burdens of wheat.] Or, Choice gifts, as the LXX. render it, agreeably to the sense of the Hebrew, where the word massah often signifies a gift or reward (see Jer. xl. 5, Ezek. xx. 40), and bar, the choice or best of any thing.

Ye have built houses—but ye shall not dwell in them.] God often threatens to deprive men of the enjoyment of their ill-gotten substance (see Deut. xxviii. 38, 39, Mic. vi. 15, Zeph. i. 13).

Ver. 12.] Your daring impieties, your sins of the first magnitude, such as idolatry and oppression, reproved in the foregoing part of the chapter; or your numerous sins, as the word may be translated; in which sense it is taken, Isa. xlvii. 9.

Ver. 13.] In such times as these, the wisest way for private persons is not to be too free in reproving public vices; which will bring trouble upon themselves, and do no good upon those who are hardened in their sins (compare Hos. iv. 4, Matt. vii. 6).

Ver. 14. Seek good, and not evil.] See ver. 4. So the Lord,—shall be with you, as ye have spoken.] Ye used to boast of your interest in him, and of the promises he hath made to your fathers: and obedience is the condition required on your part to qualify you for his favour.

Ver. 15. Establish judgment in the gate.] See ver. 10.

It may be that the Lord—will be gracious.] Your case is not so desperate, but repentance may avert God's judgments (compare Jer. xxxvi. 3): and he may be gracious to the small remains of the ten tribes (see ver. 6), after those grievous invasions wherewith the kings of Syria first, and afterward Tiglath-pileser, have wasted them (see 2 Kings xiii. 7, 23, xiv. 26, 27, xv. 29).

Ver. 16. Wailing shall be in all—and they shall call the husbandman to mourning, &c.] There shall be a general lamentation of all orders and degrees of men; of the citizens, for the loss of their wealth and substance, plundered by the conquerors; of the husbandman and vine-dressers, for the loss of the fruits of the earth, destroyed or devoured by a foreign army.

And such as are skilful of lamentation to wailing.] Let such whose profession it is to make lamentation at funerals join in this public mourning, to make it more solemn (see ver. 1).

Ver. 17. In all vineyards shall be wailing.] Where there used to be shouting and rejoicing, when the summer-fruits were gathered in (see Isa. xvi. 10, Jer. xxv. 30, xlviii. 33).

For I will pass through thee.] He will come like alas! and they shall call the husbandman to mourning, and such as are skillful of lamentation to wailing.

17 And in all vineyards shall be wailing: for I will pass through thee, saith the Lord.

18 Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! to what end is it for you? the day of the Lord is darkness, and not light.

19 As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him; or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him.

20 Shall not the day of the Lord be darkness, and not light? even very dark, and no brightness in it?

an enemy, that invadeth and destroyeth a country as he marches through it (compare Exod. xii. 12, Nahum i. 15).

Ver. 18. Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord!] Infidels made a mock of the words of the prophets, when they told them, "the day of the Lord was at hand" (see Joel ii. 2, 11, Zeph. i. 14): and out of a principle of unbelief they expressed their desire of seeing this day, that they might be convinced of the truth of such predictions by ocular demonstration (compare Isa. v. 19, Jer. xvii. 15, Ezek. xii. 22, 27, 1 Pet. iii. 4).

To what end is it for you? the day of the Lord is darkness.] To what purpose should you desire to see the day of the Lord? It will certainly be a very uncomfortable time, when evils shall succeed one another so fast, that he who seeks to escape one shall fall into a worse (compare Joel ii. 2, and see the note upon iv. 13).

Ver. 19. As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him;] You may think that day will put an end to the evils which you now complain of; but it will indeed make your condition worse than it was before: as if a man fled from a lion, a creature that has something of generosity in his nature, and a bear should meet him, which never spares any thing that comes in its way.

Or went into the house—and a serpent bit him.] Or as if a man should go into the house to avoid the severity of the weather abroad; and a viper, whose sting is incurable, should creep out of the wall and bite him.

Ver. 20.] See ver. 18.

Ver. 21. I hate, I despise your feast days, &c.] This and the three following verses are the same in sense with Isa. i. 11, 16, Jer. vi. 20, vii. 21—23, Hos. vi. 6, viii. 13, all which places import, how little the external rites of religion are valuable, unless they are accompanied with a universal obedience.

I will not smell in your solemn assemblies.] Or, "I will not smell the sacrifices of your solemn assemblies." The word chag signifies both a solemn feast, and the sacrifice offered at it (see Exod. xxiii. 18): and by the same reason the word astereth may be capable of both those significations.

Ver. 22. Neither will I regard the peace-offerings of your fat beasts.] They made choice of the fairest and fattest cattle, when they offered peace-offerings, or offerings of thanksgiving. So we read, Ps. lxxvi. 15, "I will offer unto thee burnt-offerings of fatlings with the incense, or burnt fat, of rams."

Ver. 23.] The psalms and hymns were sung in the temple with vocal and instrumental music. As the worshippers at Beth-el imitated the temple worship in other particulars (see iv. 4), so it is likely they did in this part of the public worship (see viii. 3). The prophet calls their songs a noise, like that 21 ¶ I hate, I despise your feast days, and I will not smell in your solemn assemblies.

22 Though ye offer me burnt-offerings and your meat-offerings, I will not accept them; neither will I regard the peace-offerings of your fat beasts.

23 Take thou away from me the noise of thy songs; for I will not hear the melody of thy viols.

24 But let judgment run down as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream.

25 Have ye offered unto me sacrifices and offerings in the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel?

of an untuneful voice, because their melody not proceeding from a true principle of religion, it was not grateful to God.

Ver. 24.] Rather let justice have its free course, so that the meanest persons may feel the benefit of it.

Ver. 25.] When your forefathers offered sacrifices of slain beasts, and added their meat and drink offerings to them, during their abode in the wilderness; they performed these services with as little sincerity and devotion to me as you do at present. To me is the same as to my honour (see Isa. xliii. 23, Zech. vii. 5, Rom. xiv. 6). The prophets often upbraid the Jews with the sins of their forefathers, and threaten them with remarkable judgments upon that account, when their posterity continue in the same or worse impieties (see Hos. ix. 9, 10, x. 9; compare Matt. xxiii. 35).

Ver. 26. But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chiun your images,] Your ancestors' want of true devotion towards me appears from hence, that they were so prone to continue in those idolatrous practices which they learnt in Egypt; to which they added the worship of the idols they saw in the countries through which they travelled (see Lev. xvii. 3, xviii. 3, Numb. xv. 39, xxv. 2, Josh. xxiv. 14, Ezek. xx. 7, 16, xxiii. 3, 8). "The tabernacle of Moloch" was a shrine with the image of the deity placed within it: such were the "silver shrines of Diana," Acts xix. 24, and the Thensæ or Lectica among the Romans. These their votaries carried in procession, as a solemn piece of worship, or a pledge of the presence of their gods among them (see Isa. xlvi. 7). Moloch is an idol often mentioned in scripture; to whom they offered their children in sacrifice. It is probable the Israelites were addicted to this kind of worship in the wilderness, because it is so severely prohibited by Moses, Lev. xx. 2, 5. Chiun is generally supposed by learned men to be the same with Saturn (see particularly Lud. de Dieu, upon Acts vii. 43, and Dr. Spencer, De Legib. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 3). The same idol was called Remphan, or Rephan, by the Egyptians, as you may see proved in the places above cited: for which reason the Seventy interpreters translate Chiun by Rephan; which is an argument that those interpreters were natives, or, at least, inhabitants, of Egypt, as Dr. Hody observes, De Vers. Græc. Auctoribus, lib. ii. cap. 4.

The star of your god,] As the heathens had images that represented the heavenly bodies (see 2 Kings xxiii. 11, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4), so the image of Chiun represented the star Saturn, as that of Moloch did the sun. If we suppose with some learned men that Remphan, or Rephan, was a famous Egyptian king, it was a common opinion among the heathens to suppose the souls of their deified heroes to be placed in the stars. So Virgil speaks of the star that appeared quickly after Cæsar's death, Eclog. ix.

26 But ye have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch and Chiun your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves.

Ecce dionæi processit Cæsaris astrum.

"See Cæsar's star is lighted in the skies."

Ver. 27.] Ye shall be removed farther from your own country, than when Hazael, king of Syria, carried away so many Israelites captives to Damascus (see i. 4), and, consequently, shall have less hopes of returning home. The king of Assyria carried 27 Therefore will I cause you to go into captivity beyond Damascus, saith the Lord, whose name is The God of hosts.

the ten tribes captives as far as Media (2 Kings xvii. 6). St. Stephen, in his speech recorded by St. Luke, expressing rather the sense than the words, reads, I will carry you away beyond Babylon, Acts vii. 43. Media being at a much greater distance than Babylon. Both readings import, that the captivity of the ten tribes would be far worse than that of the two remaining, and with less hopes of returning to their own country.

CHAPTER VI.

1 WOE to them that are at ease in Zion, and trust in the mountain of Samaria, which are named chief of the nations, to whom the house of Israel came!

2 Pass ye unto Calneh, and see; and from thence go ye to Hamath the great: then go down to Gath of the Philistines: be they better than these kingdoms? or their border greater than your border?

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.—A reproof of those who indulge their ease and pleasures without having any sense of God's afflicting hand, which threatens ruin and desolation to the whole kingdom of Israel for their pride and incorrigibleness.

Ver. 1. Woe to them that are at ease in Zion,] Or, "Are secure," as the margin reads: who live fearless of God's judgments, and resolved to indulge themselves in their voluptuousness, notwithstanding the evident tokens of God's displeasure against the whole nation, both Israel and Judah. For these and the following words contain a threatening against both kingdoms, both Israel and Judah (see ver. 2), though the chief design of this prophecy is against the ten tribes, or kingdom of Israel. But the LXX. translate the words thus, "Woe unto them that despise Zion." [But the learned Dr. Grabe conjectures that instead of Ἐξυβρίζοντες, despise, it should be read Εὐδαιμονίζοντες, are prosperous: for so the LXX. render the word shaanannim, Psal. cxxiii. 4. See the Prolegom. to his edition of the Prophets.] The word shaanannim, which our translation renders are at ease, signifying also to be insolent: in which sense the words may fitly belong to the ten tribes, who despised Zion and the temple, which "God chose out of all the tribes of Israel, to place his name there."

And trust in the mountain of Samaria,] In the strength of their capital city, built upon the hill of Samaria (see iv. 1).

Which are named chief of the nations, to whom the house of Israel came!] Zion, or Jerusalem, and Samaria, are the chief seats of the two kingdoms, whither is the greatest resort of the whole nation. The word gojim, nations, usually signifies the heathen nations, but sometimes denotes the Jews, and is equivalent to ammim (see Zeph. ii. 9). The Chaldee interprets it, "Who give names to their children, according to the names of the chief of the heathen, to whom the house of Israel apply themselves for protection." Thus, in the later times, some of the Jews took the names of Alexander, Antipater, Agrippa, and the like, to compliment some great men

3 Ye that put far away the evil day, and cause the seat of violence to come near;

4 That lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall;

5 That chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of musick, like David;

among the Greeks or Romans of those names. The Jews' making alliances with the heathens, is often reproved by the prophets (see 2 Chron. xvi. 7, Isa. xxx. 1, 2, Hos. v. 13, vii. 11, xii. 1).

Ver. 2. Pass ye unto Calneh, and see;] Calneh, called Calno, Isa. x. 9, was a city in the land of Shinar, or the territory of Babylon, Gen. x. 10. St. Jerome supposes it the same with Ctesiphon. This was taken probably by some king of Assyria, not long before the uttering of this prophecy.

Thence go ye to Hamath the great:] St. Jerome supposes this to be the same city which was afterward called Antioch: this was taken too by Sennacherib, or some of his predecessors (see 2 Kings xviii. 34). It is called here Hamath the great, to distinguish it from another Hemath, mentioned ver. 14, which is the boundary of Palestine, and therefore called the "entering in of Hemath" in that verse, and 1 Kings viii. 65, 2 Kings xiv. 25. That town is since called Epiphania.

Then go down to Gath of the Philistines:] Taken by Uzziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6.

Be they better than these kingdoms?] Are they in a better condition than you are, both in Israel and Judah? Or have they a larger and more plentiful country to live in? If they have not, why are you so ungrateful to God, as not to be sensible of those his mercies! The word border is equivalent to country (see note upon Mal. i. 4).

Ver. 3. Ye that put far away the evil day,] Who persuade yourselves that God's judgments will not overtake you so soon as the predictions of the prophets import (see v. 18, ix. 20).

And cause the seat of violence to come near;] Ye take hold of every opportunity of perverting justice, by pronouncing unrighteous decrees, and turning the seat of justice into the seat of oppression (see ver. 12, and compare Ps. xciv. 20).

Ver. 4. That lie upon beds of ivory, &c.] This and the two following verses are an elegant description of the ill uses men too often make of a plentiful fortune: that it shuts out all serious considerations, makes them void of compassion towards those that are in misery, and to regard nothing but the present gratification of their senses. "Lying upon beds of ivory, and stretch-

6 That drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief ointments: but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph.

7 ¶ Therefore now shall they go captive with the first that go captive, and the banquet of them that stretched themselves shall be removed.

8 The Lord God hath sworn by himself, saith the Lord the God of hosts, I abhor the excellency of Jacob, and hate his palaces: therefore will I deliver up the city with all that is therein.

9 And it shall come to pass, if there remain ten men in one house, that they shall die.

10 And a man's uncle shall take him up, and he that burneth him, to bring out the bones out of the house, and shall say unto him that is by the sides of the house, Is there yet any with thee? and he shall say, No. Then shall he say, Hold thy tongue: for we may not make mention of the name of the Lord.

11 For, behold, the Lord commandeth, and he will smite the great house with breaches, and the little house with clefts.

12 ¶ Shall horses run upon the rock? will one plow there with oxen? for ye have turned judgment into gall, and the fruit of righteousness into hemlock:

13 Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought, which say, Have we not taken to us horns by our own strength?

14 But, behold, I will raise up against you a nation, O house of Israel, saith the Lord the God of hosts: and they shall afflict you from the entering in of Hemath unto the river of the wilderness.

ing themselves upon their couches," express the posture they used at their meals (see ver. 7, and ii. 8).

Eat the lambs out of the flock.] The choicest and best of them.

Ver. 5. Invent to themselves instruments of music, like David.] Such variety of music as he appropriated to the service of God (see 1 Chron. xxiii. 5), that they contrive for their own diversion.

Ver. 6. They are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph.] They do not humble themselves under God's afflicting hand, nor lay to heart the miseries the divine judgments have brought upon the kingdom of Israel, called by the name Joseph, and the house of Joseph, v. 6, 15. The words allude to the afflicted state of Joseph, when he was sold by his brethren into Egypt.

Ver. 7. The banquet of them that stretched themselves shall be removed.] Their luxurious way of living shall be at an end (see ver. 4).

Ver. 8. I abhor the excellency of Jacob, and hate his palaces.] Whatever the kingdoms of Israel and Judah value themselves for is hateful to me, as having been abused by them, and made instrumental in dishonouring me. If we understand this of Israel, the ten tribes valued themselves as being the most potent kingdom (see 2 Kings xiv. 9). If we suppose the words comprehend Judah (see ver. 1), they valued themselves for having Jerusalem and the temple situate in their territories, where God had "placed his name;" and is peculiarly called the honour, or excellency of Jacob, Ps. xlvii. 4, Ezek. xxiv. 21.

Therefore will I deliver up the city.] I will deliver up Samaria first, and then Jerusalem, into the hands of their enemies.

Ver. 9.] Those that escape the hands of the enemy shall die by the pestilence (compare Ezek. v. 12).

Ver. 10. A man's uncle [or near kinsman] shall take him up,] His nearest kinsman must be forced to perform the last office for him, and carry him to his burial.

And [or] he that burneth him, to bring out the bones out of the house,] And is equivalent to or here (see Noldius, p. 271). The undertakers of the funeral first burnt the body, in order to carry out the remaining bones to be buried. It was usual to burn the bodies of kings and great persons with odours and spices (see Jer. xxxiv. 5, 2 Chron. xvi. 14), and it may be, they might use the same custom in this case for fear of infection.

Shall say unto him that is by the sides of the house

[in or near the house], Is there yet any with thee?] Alive or dead.

Hold thy tongue: for we may not make mention of the name of the Lord.] Silence best becomes such astonishing calamities: or, It is to no purpose to call upon God, or to implore his help in our afflictions. An expression betokening despair, joined with impenitency: like that of Joram, 2 Kings vi. 33, "What should I wait for the Lord any longer?" The verb zakar, to remember, or make mention, when it is spoken of God, signifies his worship, as Dr. Spencer observes, De Leg. Heb. lib. ii. cap. 5.

Ver. 11.] People of all ranks, high and low, shall be sufferers in the common calamities (see iii. 15).

Ver. 12.] Your perverting of judgment, and thereby making oppression the seeming fruit or effect of righteousness, is as much the inverting the nature and order of things, as it would be to undertake to run a race upon a rock, or to cultivate it by ploughing or sowing there. The word rosh, translated here and in other places gall, signifies a weed growing among corn, as bitter as wormwood: and laanath, rendered hemlock, is translated wormwood, v. 7, and in other places.

Ver. 13. Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought.] Ye pride yourselves in your own strength, which will stand you in no stead, without God's blessing and assistance.

Have we not taken to us horns by our own strength?] A horn is often used in scripture for power, strength, or authority; the metaphor being taken from the horns of an ox or bullock, wherein his strength lies. The boast of the Israelites seems chiefly grounded upon the success their king Jeroboam the Second had in restoring the ancient dominion of Israel, and recovering it from the Syrians, who had brought them very low (see 2 Kings xiii. 3, 7, xiv. 25).

Ver. 14. I will raise up against you a nation,—and they shall afflict you from the entering in of Hemath unto the river of the wilderness.] The prophet means the Assyrians, who should afflict them from one end of the land unto the other. "The entering in of Hemath" was the northern boundary of their country (see note upon ver. 2), and "the river of the wilderness" is the same with the "river of Egypt," Gen. xv. 18, Josh. xv. 47, 1 Kings viii. 65, Isa. xxvii. 12, which arises out of mount Paran, and is the southernmost bound of Judea. It is called the "sea of the plain," as our interpretation renders it, Deut. iii. 17, or "the sea of the wilderness," as it is translated here; the original word Arabah being the same in both places.

CHAPTER VII.

1 THUS hath the Lord God shewed unto me; and, behold, he formed grasshoppers in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth; and, lo, it was the latter growth after the king's mowings.

2 And it came to pass, that when they had made an end of eating the grass of the land, then I said, O Lord God, forgive, I beseech thee: by whom shall Jacob arise? for he is small.

3 The Lord repented for this: It shall not be, saith the Lord.

4 ¶ THUS hath the Lord God shewed unto me: and, behold, the Lord God called to contend by fire, and it devoured the great deep, and did eat up a part.

5 Then said I, O Lord God, cease, I beseech thee: by whom shall Jacob arise? for he is small.

6 The Lord repented for this: This also shall not be, saith the Lord God.

7 ¶ THUS he shewed me: and, behold, the Lord stood upon a wall made by a plumb-line, with a plumb-line in his hand.

8 And the Lord said unto me, Amos, what seest thou? And I said, a plumb-line. Then said the Lord, Behold, I will set a plumb-line in the midst of my people Israel: I will not again pass by them any more:

9 And the high places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste; and I will rise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword.

10 ¶ Then Amaziah the priest of Beth-el sent to Jeroboam king of Israel, saying, Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel: the land is not able to bear all his words.

11 For thus Amos saith, Jeroboam shall die by the sword; and Israel shall surely be led away captive out of their own land.

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.—By three several visions God represents to Amos the judgments he is bringing upon Israel, which are mitigated by the intercession of the prophet; who being accused of sedition by Amaziah the priest of Beth-el to king Jeroboam, he denounces judgment against Amaziah and his family.

Ver. 1. He formed grasshoppers in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth; Most commentators suppose this vision to denote the invasion of Pul, king of Assyria, mentioned 2 Kings xv. 19. But this and the following calamities may as probably relate to those tumults and commotions which happened after Jeroboam's death, during an anarchy which lasted eleven years, from that time till his son's settlement on the throne, as appears by comparing the times of the kings of Israel and Judah. This was cutting Israel short, after they had begun to flourish again under the prosperous reign of Jeroboam, and so might fitly be represented by the grasshoppers devouring the latter or second growth of the grass.

It was the latter growth after the king's mowings. The first crop of grass was set apart for the use of the king's stables.

Ver. 2. By whom shall Jacob arise? for he is small. If thou suffer these calamities to proceed to extremity, by what means shall the small remains of the riches and strength of the kingdom be rescued from utter destruction? Some translate the words, Who shall rise up, or stand for Jacob? but the interrogative pronoun, mi, who, may stand for bemi, by whom; as it does, Isa. li. 19.

Ver. 3.] The Lord was pleased to hearken to my earnest supplication, and to promise, that the threatened judgment should not proceed to an utter destruction of the whole kingdom.

Ver. 4.] This represents a sorer judgment than the former, and in the opinion of most expositors denotes the invasion of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who carried a great part of Israel away captive (2 Kings xv. 29), and so was properly represented by a raging fire, which consumed the sea by turning it into vapours, and then devoured a great part of the land.

Ver. 7, 8. The Lord stood upon a wall made by a plumb-line, &c. God's judgments are sometimes represented by a line and a plumbet, to denote that they are measured out by the exactest rules of justice (see 2 Kings xxi. 13, Isa. xxviii. 17). The instruments which are designed for building are sometimes used to mark out those places which are to be pulled down or destroyed (see 2 Sam. viii. 2, Isa. xxxiv. 11, Lam. ii. 8). This vision imports that as God formerly built up his people, he would now pluck them down and destroy them (see Jer. i. 10, xxxi. 28).

Ver. 8. I will not again pass by them any more; I will not any longer pass over their transgressions (compare viii. 2, Mic. vii. 18). Or, I will not pass through them to destroy them any more (see v. 17), because I will do it once for all (compare Nahum i. 9).

Ver. 9. The high places of Isaac shall be desolate, The altar and grove at Beer-sheba, where Isaac dwelt and built an altar (Gen. xxvi. 25, xlv. 1). This place was afterward abused to idolatry (see the note upon v. 5).

The sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste; The places set apart for idolatrous worship: such were Beth-el, Gilgal, and Beer-sheba (see iii. 14, v. 5). The word sanctuary is used for an idolatrous temple, Isa. xvi. 12.

I will rise against the house of Jeroboam with the sword. This was fulfilled when Shallum conspired against Zechariah the son of Jeroboam, and slew him (2 Kings xv. 10), who was the last of that family who reigned.

Ver. 10. Then Amaziah the priest of Beth-el sent to Jeroboam This was a priest, not of the tribe of Levi, but such a one as those were, whom Jeroboam, the first of that name, had consecrated to perform the idolatrous service at Beth-el (see 1 Kings xii. 31).

Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel: i. e. In an open and barefaced manner. He traduces the prophet as a stirrer up of sedition: the same crime was objected to Jeremiah, Jer. xxvi. 9, 10, to Christ, Luke xxiii. 2, and to St. Paul, Acts xxiv. 5.

The land is not able to bear all his words. The friends of the government cannot patiently hear them, and the enemies of it will take advantage from them to make some disturbance.

12 Also Amaziah said unto Amos, O thou seer, go, flee thee away into the land of Judah, and there eat bread, and prophesy there :

13 But prophesy not again any more at Beth-el : for it is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court.

14 ¶ Then answered Amos, and said to Amaziah, I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son ; but I was an herdman, and a gatherer of sycomore fruit :

15 And the LORD took me as I followed the

Ver. 11. Amos saith, Jeroboam shall die by the sword.] This was a plain perverting of the prophet's words ; for he did not prophecy against the king himself, but against his family or posterity.

Ver. 12.] There thou mayest find better encouragement and reception, than thou art like to do here.

Ver. 13. It is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court.] Beth-el is the place where the king performs his religious worship in person, and often resides there with his court, that he may the better attend upon the service performed at this place (see 1 Kings xiii. 1).

Ver. 14. I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son ;] I was not a prophet by profession, nor bred up in the schools of the prophets, as those usually were who took that office upon them (see 2 Kings ii. 5, &c., iv. 38, vi. 1).

But I was an herdman,] A herdman, or a husbandman, is spoken of as an employment not consistent with that of a prophet, Zech. xiii. 5, except where there is an extraordinary call.

A gatherer of sycomore fruit :] One that gathered a sort of wild fig, by some called an Egyptian fig. They that gathered it opened the skin, that the fruit might ripen the sooner : so the LXX. interpret the Hebrew word boles, κνίζαν συκάμυνα, "opening the sycomore fruit:" which agrees with Pliny's account of ordering this fruit (Nat. Hist. lib. xiii. cap. 7).

flock, and the LORD said unto me, Go, prophesy unto my people Israel.

16 ¶ Now therefore hear thou the word of the LORD : Thou sayest, Prophesy not against Israel, and drop not thy word against the house of Isaac.

17 Therefore thus saith the LORD ; Thy wife shall be an harlot in the city, and thy sons and thy daughters shall fall by the sword, and thy land shall be divided by line ; and thou shalt die in a polluted land : and Israel shall surely go into captivity forth of his land.

Ver. 16. Drop not thy word against the house of Isaac.] The verb hittith, to drop, signifies in its primary sense, to instil doctrine or instruction by easy and gentle degrees (see Deut. xxxii. 2) ; from thence it comes to denote prophecy, being one sort of instruction accompanied with exhortation. See Ezek. xxi. 2, Mic. ii. 6, where the word is translated prophecy by our English interpreters. "The house of Isaac" may be taken in the same sense with the "high places of Isaac," ver. 9, meaning Beer-sheba : or it may be equivalent to Jacob or Israel, in which sense most expositors understand it.

Ver. 17. Thy wife shall be an harlot in the city,] When Beth-el shall be taken by the Assyrians (see Hos. x. 5, 6), the soldiers shall abuse thy wife, and treat her as a common harlot (compare Isa. xiii. 16, Lam. v. 11, Zech. xiv. 2). And this shall befall her as a punishment of her idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom (see Hos. iv. 13).

Thy land shall be divided by line ;] Among the Assyrians : in the division of land it was customary to mark out every one's share by a line (see Ps. lxxviii. 55).

Thou shalt die in a polluted land :] Thou shalt be carried captive out of thine own country, and die in a land where the inhabitants are idolaters, and where it will be impossible to converse without committing legal pollutions (see Ezek. iv. 13, Hos. ix. 3).

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Thus hath the Lord God shewed unto me : and behold a basket of summer fruit.

2 And he said, Amos, what seest thou ? And I said, A basket of summer fruit. Then said the LORD unto me, The end is come upon my people of Israel ; I will not again pass by them any more.

3 And the songs of the temple shall be howlings in that day, saith the Lord God : there shall be many dead bodies in every place ; they shall cast them forth with silence.

4 ¶ Hear this, O ye that swallow up the needy, even to make the poor of the land to fail,

5 Saying, When will the new moon be gone,

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet by a fourth vision gives notice of the certainty and nearness of the destruction of the ten tribes : he reproves them for oppression, and foretells that the sun shall be darkened by an eclipse upon their solemn festivals, which shall turn their present joy into mourning, and shall be esteemed a prognostication of more dismal calamities to come : amongst which "a famine of God's word" here threatened may be esteemed the greatest.

Ver. 1, 2. A basket of summer fruit.] The basket of ripe summer fruit, which Amos saw in a vision, was to denote that Israel's sins were now ripe for judgment ; as the time of judgment is elsewhere expressed by a harvest or a vintage (see Joel iii. 13). The two Hebrew words, kaek, "summer fruit," and kets, "an end," having an affinity in their sound : such paronomasias are to be found in other texts of scripture (see Isa. xxiv. 17, Jer. i. 11, 12). Many instances of this kind are to be found ; Micah i. 10, &c.

I will not again pass by them] See vii. 8.

Ver. 3.] The songs or hymns sung in the temple at Beth-el, shall be turned into howlings or lamentations (see v. 23). This may relate to the time when the golden calf was carried away by Shalmaneser (compare Hos. x. 5, 6). The Assyrians (see ver. 8) will make such a slaughter among the people, that there will be no opportunity of using public mournings or lamentations at their funerals, as was usual in other cases ; but their friends will hurry them to their graves with as much silence and privacy as they can (compare Jer. xxii. 18).

Ver. 4. O ye that swallow up the needy,] Or, Trample upon them (see note on ii. 7).

Ver. 5. When will the new moon be gone,] This that we may sell corn? and the sabbath, that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small, and the shekel great, and falsifying the balances by deceit?

6 That we may buy the poor for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes; yea, and sell the refuse of the wheat?

7 The Lord hath sworn by the excellency of Jacob, Surely I will never forget any of their works.

8 Shall not the land tremble for this, and every one mourn that dwelleth therein? and it shall rise up wholly as a flood; and it shall be cast out and drowned, as by the flood of Egypt.

9 And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord God, that I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day:

was one of their solemn feasts, the use of which they retained with their idolatrous worship (see ver. 10).

Making the ephah small, and the shekel great,] The ephah was the measure wherewith they sold, containing about one of our bushels: this they made smaller than the just standard. The shekel was the money they received for the price of their goods: and by falsifying the balances, when they weighed it, they diminished its just value, and demanded a greater price for their goods. So both ways they overreached those that dealt with them (see Mic. vi. 11).

Ver. 6. That we may buy the poor for silver,] Who must be forced to sell themselves to us for slaves, to satisfy the debts they owe to us (see ii. 6).

And sell the refuse of the wheat?] The traders by these deceitful arts made corn so dear, that people were glad to buy the worst of it, and such as was not fit to make bread.

Ver. 7. The Lord hath sworn by the excellency of Jacob,] By himself, who is truly the glory of Jacob, or Israel (see Ps. lxxviii. 34), whatever other excellency or advantage they may make the subject of their glory (see vi. 8).

I will never forget any of their works.] God is said to remember men's sins when he punisheth them (see Hos. viii. 13, ix. 9, Isa. xliii. 25, Jer. xxxi. 34).

Ver. 8. It shall rise up wholly as a flood;] Or, a river. The LXX. with a very small alteration in the Hebrew points, give a plainer sense of the words, thus: "Destruction shall rise up like a flood:" the calamity of a hostile invasion by the Assyrians shall be like an inundation, which in a short time overruns a whole country (compare Isa. viii. 7, 8, Jer. xlvii. 8, Dan. ix. 26).

It shall be cast out and drowned, as by the flood of Egypt.] Or rather, "The river of Egypt." The inhabitants of the land shall be swallowed up, as Egypt is by the inundation of the river Nile. To this sense the Chaldee paraphrase expounds the place: "He shall make a king come against it [the land] with a numerous army like a flood, and he shall drive out the inhabitants thereof, and [the land itself] shall be drowned, as when the flood of Egypt [overflows]."

Ver. 9.] Calamitous times are expressed by the failing of the light of the sun, and the day's being overspread with darkness (see Isa. xlii. 10, lix. 9, 10, Jer. xv. 9, Job v. 14, xxii. 11). But Archbishop Usher hath observed in his Annals, ad A. M. 2113, that about eleven years after the time when Amos prophesied, there were two great eclipses of the sun, one at the feast of tabernacles,

10 And I will turn your feasts into mourning, and all your songs into lamentation; and I will bring up sackcloth upon all loins, and baldness upon every head; and I will make it as the mourning of an only son, and the end thereof as a bitter day.

11 ¶ Behold, the days come, saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord:

12 And they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east, they shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord, and shall not find it.

13 In that day shall the fair virgins and young men faint for thirst.

the other at the time of the passover: so the text may probably be understood of that darkness; which, to be sure, was looked upon as ominous, and gave men more than ordinary apprehensions by falling out upon these solemn festivals: which if they were not celebrated with such solemnity among the ten tribes, as they were in Judea, where the temple was situate, yet were observed by many of the Israelites, according to the traditions they had received from their fathers (see ver. 5 of this chapter, and iv. 5).

Ver. 10. I will turn your feasts into mourning.] God commanded the Jews to celebrate their festivals with joy and gladness (see Deut. xii. 7, 12, xvii. 14, 15); which it would be impossible for them to do under such melancholy circumstances and prognostications of the divine displeasure.

Your songs into lamentations;] There were particular psalms and hymns that used to be sung at the passover, and other great festivals (see Lightfoot's Temple Service, ch. 13, 14, 16, and Dr. Hammond upon Matt. xxvi. 30).

I will bring up sackcloth, &c.] See Isa. xv. 2, Jer. xlviii. 37, Ezek. vii. 18.

The end thereof as a bitter day.] Those feasts, however, begun in joy, shall end in bitterness: and the calamities which follow them shall still increase the sorrow.

Ver. 11.] It was usual among the Jews to resort to the prophets for counsel under any difficulty (see ii. 11, Ezek. xiv. 7, xx. 1). Amos tells them, that in a little time there will be no prophets for them to consult; and this shall be a just punishment for their despising their former prophets, and their instructions. This was fulfilled upon the whole nation at the time of the Babylonish captivity (see 2 Sam. ii. 9, Ps. lxxiv. 9, Ezek. vii. 26): and after their return from captivity they had no succession of prophets from the time of Malachi till the coming of Christ (see 1 Macc. iv. 46, ix. 27).

Ver. 12. From sea to sea.] From the sea or lake of Sodom, called the eastern sea, to the Mediterranean, which lay upon the western coasts (see Joel ii. 20).

From the north even to the east.] The prophet omits naming the south; because the idolaters to whom he directs his discourse, would choose to inquire anywhere, rather than of the true prophets of the Lord (see 1 Kings xxii. 7, 2 Kings iii. 11), who dwelt in the tribe of Judah, that was situated in the southern parts of the nation.

Ver. 13.] They who are in the bloom of their youth and in the strength of their age shall faint and be dispersed, like those that want necessary refreshment (compare Jer. xlviii. 18). A place that wants the ne-

14 They that swear by the sin of Samaria, manner of Beer-sheba liveth; even they shall and say, Thy god, O Dan, liveth; and, The fall, and never rise up again.

cessaries for life, is expressed by a dry and thirsty land (Ps. lxxiii. 1, Ezek. xix. 13.)

Ver. 14. They that swear by the sin of Samaria,] The calf set up at Beth-el by Jeroboam, who committed a great sin in so doing, and made Israel to sin (1 Kings xii. 30, xiv. 16, compare Mic. i. 5). Swearing is a solemn invocation of the name of God, and, as such, a proper part of divine worship (see Deut. vi. 13, x. 20), and therefore ought not to be given to an idol.

The manner [or way] of Beer-sheba liveth;] The LXX. render it, "The god of Beer-sheba liveth," expressing the sense rather than the words. The way or manner signifies the same with the way of worship: in this sense it is probably taken, Hos. x. 13, and the phrase is often used so in the Acts; particularly xix. 23, xxiv. 14. Here it is taken metonymically for the god or object of their worship. Beer-sheba was a place noted for idolatry, as hath been observed upon v. 5.

CHAPTER IX.

1 I SAW the LORD standing upon the altar: and he said, Smite the lintel of the door, that the posts may shake: and cut them in the head, all of them; and I will slay the last of them with the sword: he that fleeth of them shall not flee away, and he that escapeth of them shall not be delivered.

2 Though they dig into hell, thence shall mine hand take them: though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down:

3 And though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search and take them out thence; and though they be hid from my sight in the bottom of the sea, thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them:

4 And though they go into captivity before their enemies, thence will I command the sword, and it shall slay them: and I will set mine eyes upon them for evil, and not for good.

5 And the Lord God of hosts is he that toucheth the land, and it shall melt, and all that dwell therein shall mourn; and it shall rise up wholly like a flood; and shall be drowned, as by the flood of Egypt.

6 It is he that buildeth his stories in the heaven, and hath founded his troop in the earth; he

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet seeth a fifth vision, representing the final destruction of the kingdom of Israel; but he concludes his prophecy with promises of restoring the kingdom of David, and the Jewish nation, under the Messiah, when the church shall be enlarged by the gentiles coming into it.

Ver. 1. I saw the Lord standing upon the altar:] This may most probably be understood of the altar at Beth-el (compare iii. 14.) God's standing upon the altar, may likewise denote the destruction of the idolaters themselves, as so many victims slain to atone the divine vengeance (compare Ezek. ix. 2, xxxix. 17, Isa. xxxiv. 6). This appearance of God was, by a visible and glorious light, commonly called the Shechinah by the Jewish writers; concerning which the reader may consult Archbishop Tension's Treatise of Idolatry, ch. 14.

Smite the lintel of the door, that the posts may shake:] This denotes the approaching ruin of that idolatrous temple, which should put an end to the worship performed there (see viii. 3). The altar of burnt-offerings probably stood near the outward door of the temple, as it did at Jerusalem.

I will slay the last [or residue] of them with the sword:] I will give them a mortal wound (compare Ps. lxxviii. 21, Isa. li. 9, Hab. iii. 13), so that there shall be no residue or remainder left to escape (compare Ezek. xxiii. 25).

He that fleeth—shall not flee away,] See ii. 14.

Ver. 2.] Though they hide themselves in the deepest holes or caverns of the earth (see Isa. ii. 19.) or take refuge in the highest fortresses, they shall not escape my vengeance.

Ver. 3. Though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel,] There were great caves formed by nature in the tops of some mountains, where men used to secure themselves in the time of danger. Such was the cave in a mountain in the wilderness of Ziph, 1 Sam. xxiii. 14 (see the note upon Ezek. xxxiii. 27, and Dr. Lightfoot's Works, vol. ii. p. 88).

Will I command the serpent,] The word serpent is used for a water animal, Isa. xxvii. 1, and is joined there with leviathan and tannin, which last word signifies not a dragon, as it is translated, but a whale. In like manner the word nahash, used here, may signify some carnivorous fish.

Ver. 4.] The same judgment is denounced against them, Lev. xxvi. 33, Deut. xxviii. 65, compare likewise Ezek. v. 13.

Ver. 5. And [or, for] the Lord God of hosts—toucheth the land, and it shall melt,] The least token of God's displeasure will put the whole frame of nature out of order (compare Isa. lxii. 1, 3, Mic. i. 4, Hab. iii. 10). And when God's hand is visibly stretched out against a land, or people, they become altogether dispirited; the stoutest men lose their courage (see ii. 16), their hearts failing them for fear, and out of a dreadful expectation of the miseries which are coming upon them.

It [this calamity] shall rise up wholly like a flood; and [they that dwell in the land] shall be drowned,] See viii. 8.

Ver. 6. It is he that buildeth his stories in the heaven,] An awful description of God's irresistible power, discovering itself in the works of the creation, particularly in his appointing several regions of the air, as so many apartments that lead to the highest heavens, the seat of his own glory (see Ps. civ. 3).

And hath founded his troop in the earth;] The old English translation hath rendered the sense very perspicuously thus: "and hath laid the foundation of his globe of elements in the earth." The word agudah, troop, signifies the collection of elements and other creatures, which furnish the earth, expressed by the word isaba, the host, Gen. ii. 1. The Chaldee paraphrase expresses the sense thus: "It is he that hath placed his Shechinah or tabernacle of his glory that calleth for the waters of the sea, and pour-eth them out upon the face of the earth: The LORD is his name.

7 Are ye not as children of the Ethiopians unto me, O children of Israel? saith the Lord. Have not I brought up Israel out of the land of Egypt? and the Philistines from Caphtor, and the Syrians from Kir?

8 Behold, the eyes of the Lord God are upon the sinful kingdom, and I will destroy it from off the face of the earth; saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the LORD.

9 For, lo, I will command, and I will sift in the height above, and made his church glorious upon earth."

He that calleth for the waters] See v. 8.

Ver. 7. Are ye not as children of the Ethiopians unto me,] Are ye not under a curse, as the Ethiopians, the posterity of Ham, were (see Gen. ix. 35), by reason of your multiplied sins and apostasies? Cushi, or Cushim, often signifies the Arabians, but it is sometimes understood of the Ethiopians, properly so called, as hath been observed in the notes upon Jer. xiii. 23.

Have not I brought up Israel out of the land of Egypt? and the Philistines from Caphtor,] You may think my former kindness in delivering you out of the Egyptian bondage, and giving you the land of Canaan, obliges me still to continue your protector. But I have shown the like favour to other nations, particularly to the Philistines, who had their original from Caphtor, and afterward dispossessed the old inhabitants of Palestine, and dwelt in their stead (see Dent. ii. 23, and the note upon Jer. xlvii. 4), and yet against these very Philistines I have denounced my judgments for their sins (see the fore-mentioned place of Jeremy, and i. 8 of this prophecy).

And the Syrians from Kir?] Some copies of our English bible read Assyrians, but it is a mistake of the print; the more correct editions read Syrians, which answers the Hebrew Aram. Some understand the words of the new colonies which Tiglath-pileser transplanted from Kir, and placed in Syria in the room of the native Syrians, whom he had carried captive to Kir (see i. 5). But it may be understood of some more ancient removal of the Syrians from Kir, not elsewhere taken notice of.

Ver. 8. The eyes of the Lord God are upon the sinful kingdom, &c.] See ver. 4. God still promises to preserve a remnant in the midst of his heaviest judgments, that he may perform to them the promises he made to their fathers (see Jer. xxx. 11, Joel ii. 32, Rom. xi. 28, 29).

Ver. 9.] I will mingle or scatter the Israelites among all nations, just as good and bad grain are mingled in a sieve; but will so order it, that none of the good grain shall be lost, or fall to the ground (compare Matt. iii. 12).

Ver. 10. Shall die by the sword,] They shall be cut off by some judgment sent from God (see note upon Zech. xi. 17).

Which say, The evil shall not overtake] Who indulge themselves in their carnal security, without any apprehension or dread of the divine judgments denounced against them (compare vi. 3).

Ver. 11. In that day] When I come to make a remarkable difference between the good and the bad (ver. 9). The phrase denotes some extraordinary time or season, prefixed by God, for restoring the good estate of his people the Jews, or bestowing the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth.

10 All the sinners of my people shall die by the sword, which say, 'The evil shall not overtake nor prevent us.'

11 ¶ In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in the days of old:

12 That they may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen, which are called by my name, saith the Lord that doeth this.

13 Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, great blessings upon the world (see the note upon Isa. iv. 2). The sense of it is expressed by Μετὰ ταῦτα, afterward, Acts xv. 16, which phrase is equivalent to "the last days," Joel ii. 28, which both Jews and Christians expound of the days of the Messias.

Will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, &c.] At that time I will restore the kingdom to the house and family of David, in the person of the Messias, so often styled in the prophets the seed or offspring of David, and known by that title among the Jews of our Saviour's age (see Matt. xii. 23, xx. 30, xxi. 9). And whereas that family had been, for several years before his coming, reduced to a mean and obscure condition (see Mic. v. 2, Luke i. 48, 52), it shall now recover its ancient splendour and dignity. "The tabernacle of David" is an expression met with but twice in scripture, here and Isa. xvi. 5. It may allude to his having been a shepherd, and dwelling in tents, before he was advanced to a kingdom, but since that reduced in his family to as low a condition as it was in at first: but I conceive the phrase does mystically denote the church, whereof the Messias, here foretold, was to be the head; which is elsewhere styled God's tabernacle, as being a place of his especial residence, as the tabernacle in the wilderness was (see Lev. xxvi. 11, Ezek. xxvii. 17, compared with Rev. xxi. 3). Tobit understood this text of the days of the Messias, xiii. 10, where he exhorts "Zion to praise God that his tabernacle may again be built in her."

Ver. 12.] [If we follow the English translation, the words foretell the same event which is foretold by Obadiah, ver. 19 of his prophecy; and by Balaam, Numb. xxiv. 18.] The words in the Hebrew are capable of another translation, thus: "The remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen that are (or shall be) called by my name, may possess me," the Lord: i. e. that both those of Edom, which are near neighbours, but fierce enemies to the Jews (see the notes upon Isa. xi. 14), as well as the other gentiles "which were afar off," may be made subjects to the kingdom of David, now again erected. This sense of the text is followed by the LXX. and approved by Lud. De Dieu, and our learned Dr. Pocock, in order to reconcile the Greek translation with the original (see Dr. Pocock's Not. Miscell. cap. 4, p. 46).

But others suppose the LXX. read, with a small alteration from the present Hebrew, yidreshu, seek, for yiresku, possess; and that instead of the particle eth, they read othi, me; and, lastly, instead of Edom, they read Adam, these two words differing only in their points, which are generally acknowledged to be of a much later date than the original. For the fuller explaining the text, I shall refer the reader to the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's learned Defence of the Ancient Prophecies, p. 168.

Ver. 13. The days come,—that the plowman shall that the plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed; and the mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt.

14 And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant overtake the reaper, &c.] As the prophecy in the foregoing verse was to commence from the coming of Christ, but not to receive its utmost completion till the fulness both of Jews and gentiles come in to the church; so this and the following verses ought to be understood of the happy state of the millennium, which may be supposed to begin after the Jews are restored to their country (compare Joel iii. 18). Then the text says, "The ploughman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed:" where the sense would be clearer if the words were translated, "The ploughman shall meet the reaper," &c. So the Chaldee and Septuagint understand the place: to the same sense the word niggash is often translated in the Greek: and then the words import, that there should be such an increase of the fruits of the earth, that as soon as the harvest is got in, it will be time to plough for the next year, which was not usual in those hot countries, where the corn was ripe early in the summer, in the month of May or June at farthest. And in the like manner, the vintage should be so plentiful, that whereas it used to begin in August, it should not be over till the seed-time, the earliest season of which was November.

The mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the vineyards, and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens, and eat the fruit of them.

15 And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the LORD thy God.

hills shall melt.] i. e. Shall flow down with wine or milk (see note on Joel iii. 18). The Chaldee paraphrase, the Septuagint, and Vulgar Latin, understand the Hebrew verb, translated melt, of being cultivated, the stony ground being made softer by ploughing and manuring. The prophets sometimes describe the days of the Messiah in the same terms the poets do the golden age (see Ps. lxxii. 16, Isa. xxxv. 1, xli. 19, lv. 13, Hos. ii. 21, 22).

Ver. 14. I will bring again the captivity of my people] I will restore them to their own country, and settle them in it (see the following verse, and note upon Ezek. xxviii. 25).

They shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them, &c.] Compare Isa. lxi. 4, Ezek. xxxvi. 33, 36. This and the following part of the verse contain a promise to them, that they shall enjoy the fruits of their labours, in opposition to that curse denounced against them, v. 11, Deut. xxviii. 30, that "they should build houses, and not dwell in them" (compare Isa. lxxv. 22).

Ver. 15.] They shall dwell in it secure from any annoyance of enemies (compare Jer. xxiii. 6, xxxii. 41, Ezek. xxxiv. 28, Joel iii. 20, Mic. iv. 4, Zeph. iii. 13).

OF

THE PROPHET OBADIAH.

PREFACE.

GROTIUS, HUETIUS (in his Demonstratio Evangelica), and Dr. Lightfoot (in his Harmony of the Old Testament), are of opinion, that Obadiah was contemporary with the elder prophets, Hosea, Joel, and Amos: the reason they chiefly allege is, that the compilers of the Old Testament canon had a regard to the order of time in their placing the minor prophets. But this reason seems to be of little force, since we find that Jonah is placed the fifth in order, nay, the sixth in the Greek copies, who was confessedly anterior than any of those that are placed before him.

VOL. III.—93

The more probable opinion is, that Obadiah prophesied about the time of the taking of Jerusalem: and thereupon, in foretelling the destruction of Edom, he uses several expressions which Jeremiah had done before him, speaking upon that subject (compare Obad. ver. 1, 8, with Jer. xlix. 9, 14—16). Ezekiel agrees with Jeremiah and Obadiah, in assigning the same reason for the judgments threatened against the Edomites, viz. their insulting over the Jews in the time of their distress (see Ezek. xxv. 12, xxxv. 5, &c.).

Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, ad A. M. 3419, supposes this prophecy to have been fulfilled about five years after the taking of Jerusalem.

1 THE vision of Obadiah. Thus saith the Lord GOD concerning Edom; We have heard a rumour from the LORD, and an ambassador is sent among the heathen, Arise ye, and let us rise up against her in battle.

2 Behold, I have made thee small among the heathen: thou art greatly despised.

3 ¶ The pride of thine heart hath deceived thee, thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock, whose habitation is high; that saith in his heart, Who shall bring me down to the ground?

4 Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the LORD.

5 How art thou cut off! to thee, if robbers by night, (how art thou cut off!) would they not have stolen till they had enough? if the grape-gatherers came to thee, would they not leave some grapes?

6 How are the things of Esau searched out! how are his hidden things sought up!

7 All the men of thy confederacy have brought thee even to the border: the men that were at peace with thee have deceived thee, and prevailed against thee; they that eat thy bread have laid a wound under thee: there is none understanding in him.

8 Shall I not in that day, saith the LORD, even destroy the wise men out of Edom, and understanding out of the mount of Esau?

9 And thy mighty men, O Teman, shall be dismayed, to the end that every one of the mount of Esau may be cut off by slaughter.

10 ¶ For thy violence against thy brother Jacob shame shall cover thee, and thou shalt be cut off for ever.

11 In the day that thou stoodest on the other side, in the day that the strangers carried away captive his forces, and foreigners entered into his gates, and cast lots upon Jerusalem, even thou wast as one of them.

12 But thou shouldest not have looked on the day of thy brother in the day that he became a stranger; neither shouldest thou have rejoiced over the children of Judah in the day of their destruction; neither shouldest thou have spoken proudly in the day of distress.

13 Thou shouldest not have entered into the gate of my people in the day of their calamity; yea, thou shouldest not have looked on their affliction in the day of their calamity, nor have laid hands on their substance in the day of their calamity;

ARGUMENT.—The prophet, after having denounced utter destruction upon Edom for their unnatural enmity against the Jews, foretells their restoration and flourishing state in the latter times.

Ver. 1. An ambassador is sent among the heathen [or nations], &c.] The prophets sometimes represent Almighty God as summoning armies, and setting them in array of battle, against those people he designs to destroy (see Jer. li. 27, 28). And here, according to the custom of earthly princes, he is described as sending ambassadors to invite the nations to join in a confederacy against the Idumeans (compare Jer. xlix. 14). The words are the same in both places, only what Jeremiah speaks in the singular number is expressed here in the plural, to intimate that Obadiah had received the same commission from God which was signified to Jeremiah before.

Ver. 2. I have made thee small among the heathen [or nations]:] Thou art contemptible in the sight of the Chaldeans and their confederates, who think they can easily subdue thee. This verse and the two following are almost word for word the same with the fifteenth and sixteenth verses of the forty-ninth chapter of Jeremiah.

Ver. 3.] Thou valuest thyself too much upon the strength of thy situation, being placed among rocks which thou thinkest inaccessible by the enemy. St. Jerome, who dwelt in that neighbourhood, observes upon the place, that the Idumeans dwelt in caves dug out of the rocks (see likewise Numb. xxxiv. 3, 4, 2 Kings xiv. 7).

Ver. 4. Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle [see note upon Jer. xlix. 16], and though thou set thy nest among the stars,] Upon the highest mountains, that seem to reach up to heaven (compare Isa. xiv. 14, 15, Jer. li. 53, Amos ix. 2, Hab. ii. 9).

Ver. 5. If thieves came to thee,] See Jer. xlix. 9.

Ver. 6. How are his hidden things sought up!] Those treasures and riches which he took all possible care to conceal, that they might not be discovered by the enemy (see Jer. xlix. 10).

Ver. 7. All the men of thy confederacy have brought thee even to the border:] The confederates marched out with thee till they came to the borders of thy country, and then they treacherously joined with the enemy's forces.

They that eat thy bread have laid a wound under thee:] Those that were maintained at thy cost, as thine allies, have given thee a secret blow, which thou wast not aware of.

Ibid. and ver. 8. There is none understanding in him. Shall I not in that day—even destroy the wise men out of Edom,] These two sentences contain the same sense; and instruct us, that when God designs a people for destruction, he deprives them of that discretion and foresight which is necessary for the due management of their affairs (see Isa. xix. 11, 12).

Ver. 9.] A panic fear shall seize those that were remarkable for their courage (compare Deut. xxviii. 25, Isa. xix. 16, Jer. l. 37, Amos ii. 16, Nahum iii. 13). Teman was one of the chief provinces or cities of Idumea, called so from Teman, Esau's grandson (see Jer. xlix. 7, Amos i. 12).

Ver. 10. For thy violence against thy brother Jacob shame shall cover thee,] The prophet uses the expression, "Thy brother Jacob," in allusion to Esau's animosity against his brother (Gen. xxvii. 41). The same reason is assigned in other prophets for God's displeasure against the Edomites (see note upon Amos i. 11).

Thou shalt be cut off for ever.] The Nabatheans drove the Edomites out of their ancient habitations, since called Arabia Petraea; which country they could never afterward recover (see Ezek. xxxv. 9, Mal. i. 3, 4, Dr. Prideaux, par. ii. ad A. C. 165).

Ver. 11. In the day that the strangers carried away captive his forces,] When Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, thou didst join with the enemy (see Ps. cxxxvii.).

And cast lots upon Jerusalem,] What captives fell to the share of each of the commanders (see the note upon Joel iii. 3).

Ver. 12. Thou shouldest not have looked on the day of thy brother] Thou oughtest not to have taken pleasure at the sight of thy brother's calamity. So the 14 Neither shouldest thou have stood in the crossway, to cut off those of his that did escape; neither shouldest thou have delivered up those of his that did remain in the day of distress.

15 For the day of the LORD is near upon all the heathen: as thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee: thy reward shall return upon thine own head.

16 For as ye have drunk upon my holy mountain, so shall all the heathen drink continually, yea, they shall drink, and they shall swallow down, and they shall be as though they had not been.

17 ¶ But upon mount Zion shall be deliver-expression of "looking upon an enemy," signifies the beholding his fall with satisfaction, Ps. liv. 7, lix. 10, xcii. 10, cxii. 8. Our translators render it in those places "See my desire upon mine enemies" (compare Mic. iv. 11, vii. 10).

The day of thy brother] "The day of his calamity," as it is expressed ver. 13 (compare Ps. xxxvii. 13, cxxxvii. 7). When he was driven from his own inheritance, and went captive into a strange land.

Ver. 14. Neither shouldest thou have delivered up those—that did remain] Or, "Shut up those," as the margin reads. The word signifies, to shut up all the ways of escaping to the conquered, in order to take them and deliver them up to the enemy (see Ps. xxxi. 8.). So the Greek word which answers it is taken, Gal. iii. 23. Συγκλεισμένοι εἰς τὴν μέλλουσαν πίστιν ἀπικλυθήναι, which should be translated, not shut up, but "delivered over to the faith, which should afterward be revealed:" just as a schoolmaster delivers up his scholar when he comes to age; as the comparison there follows.

Ver. 15. For the day of the Lord is near upon all the heathen:] "If judgment begin at the house of God," we may certainly conclude, that they who are more professedly wicked shall not escape (compare Jer. xxv. 15, 29, xlix. 12, 1 Pet. iv. 17).

As thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee:] Others shall rejoice at thy calamities, as thou hast insulted over theirs. As thou hast spoiled and plundered thy neighbours, thou shalt be served thyself (see Ezek. xxxv. 15, Hab. ii. 8).

Ver. 16. As ye have drunk upon my holy mountain, so shall all the heathen drink continually.] Since ye, O my people, have drunk the cup of my wrath, which has been executed upon you in mount Zion (see ver. 17) and at Jerusalem, where my name was placed; there is no reason that those who are strangers and foreigners to my name and worship should expect to be excused (see the note upon ver. 15). The prophet speaks of the Jews here, as already under a state of captivity; as they actually were, before this prophecy was fulfilled. God's judgments are commonly represented by a cup of intoxicating liquors (see note upon Jer. xxv. 15).

They shall be as though they had not been.] They shall be utterly destroyed (compare Ezek. xxvi. 21).

Ver. 17. Upon mount Zion shall be deliverance.] This was remarkably verified at the first preaching of the gospel, when God's "law came forth from Zion" (Isa. ii. 3, Joel ii. 32, Ps. cx. 2): and there shall be another completion of it, at the restoration of the Jewish nation, which is spoken of in this and the following verses.

There shall be holiness:] See Joel iii. 17.

Ver. 18.] The Jews, when they are restored to their own land, shall devour all their enemies that shall give them any disturbance there (see Isa. xi.

ance, and there shall be holiness; and the house of Jacob shall possess their possessions.

18 And the house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Esau for stubble, and they shall kindle in them, and devour them; and there shall not be any remaining of the house of Esau; for the LORD hath spoken it.

19 And they of the south shall possess the mount of Esau; and they of the plain the Philistines: and they shall possess the fields of Ephraim, and the fields of Samaria: and Benjamin shall possess Gilead.

20 And the captivity of this host of the chil-

14, xxxi. 9, Joel iii. 19, Mic. v. 8, Zech. xii. 6, Ezek. xxxviii. 14, 23).

Ver. 19. They of the south shall possess the mount of Esau:] They that dwell in the southern parts of Judea shall possess the mountainous country of Edom (see Mal. i. 3), elsewhere called mount Seir (see Ezek. xxxv. 2, 3). The tribe of Judah, which inhabited the southern part of Judea, bordered upon Edom (see Josh. xv. 21). Here it is foretold they should enlarge their borders that way.

They of the plain the Philistines:] The plain lay lower and was better watered, than the south part of Judea, and it lay towards the Philistines' country (see Josh. xv. 33, 45, and the note upon Zech. vii. 7). These were likewise ill neighbours to the Jews, whom they should at last conquer, and possess their land, as the prophet here foretells (compare Zeph. ii. 7).

They shall possess the fields of Ephraim, and the fields of Samaria:] The prophet speaks of those places as possessed by idolaters, for so they were in his time; viz. that colony which the king of Assyria settled here, "who served their own idols, together with the god of the land," 2 Kings xvii. 24, 33. So the words import the conquest of the Jews over their idolatrous neighbours (see the note upon ver. 18).

Benjamin shall possess Gilead.] Benjamin, although one of the smallest tribes, shall enlarge his borders as far as the land of Gilead beyond Jordan.

Ver. 20. The captivity of this host—shall possess that of the Canaanites, even unto Zarephath:] The ten tribes, when they shall return from their captivity, shall possess all the country where the Canaanites formerly lived, even unto Zarephath, or Sarepta, a city near Sidon, in the northern borders of Judea, 1 Kings xvii. 9. The Canaanites, properly so called, were ancient inhabitants of that district (see Judg. i. 32, 33, Matt. xv. 21, 22).

The captivity of Jerusalem, which is in Sepharad, shall possess the cities of the south.] Dr. Lightfoot, in his Chorographical notes upon St. Luke, chap. ii. supposes Sepharad to be a part of the country of Edom, and explains the text of the Jews who were captives in Edom, that they should possess the cities of the south that lay near that country (see the beginning of the nineteenth verse). Others translate the sentence thus, "The captivity of Jerusalem shall possess that which is in Sepharad, and the cities of the south." In the former part of the verse the prophet mentioned the re-settlement of the ten tribes after their restoration: here he mentions that of Judah, under the name of Jerusalem. Israel and Judah are commonly joined together, as equally sharers in the general restoration of that nation (see the note upon Jer. iii. 15). Of the latter it is here foretold, that they should possess the country called Sepharad. If that word be taken as an appellative, it signifies a border, and may denote that part of dren of Israel shall possess that of the Canaanites, even unto Zarephath; and the captivity of Jerusalem, which is in Sepharad, shall possess the cities of the south.

Arabia which bordereth upon the south of Judea, or the "cities of the south," here mentioned.

Ver. 21. And saviours shall come up on mount Zion to judge the mount of Esau; By saviours may be understood the leaders of the Jews, who shall fight their battles, and vanquish their enemies, denoted by the inhabitants of mount Esau. In this sense the word saviour is taken, Judg. iii. 9, Isa. xix. 20. Or we may understand the word in a spiritual sense, for the preachers of salvation, whose office it is to convert unbelievers and aliens to the commonwealth of Israel (compare ver. 17, and Amos ix. 22). Instead of saviours, the LXX., with a small alteration of the Hebrew points, read, those that are saved, or escape: the same with the remnant often mentioned in the prophets, and particularly Joel ii. 32 (see the note upon the place).

21 And saviours shall come up on mount Zion to judge the mount of Esau; and the kingdom shall be the LORD's.

The kingdom shall be the Lord's.] This will be fulfilled when the four monarchies are destroyed, and the stone which smote the image becomes a great mountain and fills the whole earth (see Dan. ii. 35, 44, vii. 14, 27, Zech. xiv. 9, Zeph. iii. 9, Rev. ix. 15).

OF

THE PROPHET JONAH.

PREFACE.

JONAH was the most ancient of all the prophets whose writings are preserved in scripture canon. Bishop Lloyd, in his Chronological Tables, supposed him to have prophesied in the latter end of Jehu's or the beginning of Jehoahaz's reign; at which time the kingdom of Israel was brought very low by the oppressions of Hazael, king of Syria (2 Kings xiii. 22). This might be a proper reason for Jonah to foretell the success which Jehoahaz's grandson, Jeroboam, should have in restoring the coasts of Israel; 2 Kings xiv. 25. He was of Gath-hepher, a town in the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 13), not far from Sephorim, or Dio-cæsarea, as St. Jerome informs us in his Commentary upon Jonah: who adds, that "Jonah's sepulchre was shown there in his time." This town was situate in Galilee, and so confutes that observation of the pharisees, that "out of Galilee there did arise no prophet," John vii. 52. He was sent to Nineveh, to denounce destruction to that city, within forty days' time, if they repented not. But they complying with the summons of the prophet, God deferred the executing his judgments till the increase of their iniquities made them ripe for destruction, about one hundred and fifty years afterward; as we shall see more particularly, when we come to explain the prophecy of Nahum.

CHAPTER I.

1 Now the word of the LORD came unto Jonah the son of Amittai, saying,

2 Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry against it; for their wickedness is come up before me.

3 But Jonah rose up to flee unto Tarshish

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—Jonah, being sent by God to Nineveh, fleeth to Tarshish, meets with a tempest, is thrown into the sea, and swallowed by a fish.

Ver. 1. Now the word of the Lord] The Hebrew reads, "And the word of the Lord:" it is usual in that language to begin a discourse, or a writing, with a particle And (see note upon Ezek. i. 1).

Ver. 2. Arise, go to Nineveh.] See iii. 3.

For their wickedness is come up before me.] "The cry of their wickedness is come up before me;" as the LXX. express the sense (see Gen. xviii. 20, James v. 4, Rev. xviii. 5). For this cause heinous offences are called "crying sins."

Ver. 3. But Jonah rose up [or went away: see Gen. xxv. 34, Numb. xxiv. 25] to flee—from the presence of the Lord.] He might think that that impulse which wrought in the prophets might not exert itself but in the land of Judea: or he might go away out of a sudden fear, as our first parents "hid themselves from the presence of God among the trees of the garden," Gen. iii. 8. It is certain that Jonah, in his sedate thoughts, acknowledged God's omnipresence (see the ninth verse of this chapter, and ii. 2).

from the presence of the LORD, and went down to Joppa; and he found a ship going to Tarshish: so he paid the fare thereof, and went down into it, to go with them unto Tarshish from the presence of the LORD.

4 ¶ But the LORD sent out a great wind into the sea, and there was a mighty tempest in the sea, so that the ship was like to be broken.

5 Then the mariners were afraid, and cried every man unto his god, and cast forth the wares that were in the ship into the sea, to lighten it of them. But Jonah was gone down into the sides of the ship; and he lay, and was fast asleep.

6 So the shipmaster came to him, and said unto him, What meanest thou, O sleeper? arise, call upon thy God, if so be that God will think upon us, that we perish not.

7 And they said every one to his fellow, Come, and let us cast lots, that we may know for whose cause this evil is upon us. So they cast lots, and the lot fell upon Jonah.

8 Then said they unto him, Tell us, we pray thee, for whose cause this evil is upon us; What is thine occupation? and whence comest thou? what is thy country? and of what people art thou?

9 And he said unto them, I am an Hebrew; and I fear the LORD, the God of heaven, which hath made the sea and the dry land.

He found a ship going to Tarshish:] Learned men suppose that there were several places of that name noted for trade; one in Spain, another in India; and this might probably be in Cilicia. "Ships of Tarshish" generally signify any trading or merchant-ships (see the note upon Isa. ii. 16). The reason of Jonah's unwillingness to undertake the delivery of the divine message, shall be considered in the note upon iv. 2.

Ver. 5. Cried every man unto his god,] To their several idols, as being heathens, and ignorant of the true God.

But Jonah was gone down into the sides of the ship;] Into a cabin in one of the sides of the ship. So we read that Jephthah was buried "in the cities of Gilead," Judg. xii. 7, where our interpreters rightly express the sense, "in one of the cities of Gilead."

Ver. 7. Let us cast lots,] This was a usual method of referring things to the appointment or discovery of Providence (see 1 Sam. x. 20, 21, xiv. 42, 44, Prov. xvi. 33, Acts i. 26).

Ver. 9. I fear the Lord the God of heaven,] Or, rather, "Jehovah, the God of heaven;" Jehovah being the peculiar name of the true God, by which he was distinguished from those who had the names of gods and lords among the heathen.

Ver. 10. Why hast thou done this?] You have been guilty of great profanation to disobey his command, whom yourself acknowledge to be Lord and maker of all things.

Ver. 11. For the sea wrought, and was tempestuous.] The Hebrew reads, "The sea went, and was tempestuous;" i. e. "grew more and more tempestuous," as our margin reads. We find the same phrase, Exod. xix. 19, "The trumpet waxed louder and louder;" where it is in the Hebrew, "The trumpet was going and strengthening."

Ver. 14. They cried unto the Lord,] They were 10 Then were the men exceedingly afraid, and said unto him, Why hast thou done this? For the men knew that he fled from the presence of the LORD, because he had told them.

11 ¶ Then said they unto him, What shall we do unto thee, that the sea may be calm unto us? for the sea wrought, and was tempestuous.

12 And he said unto them, Take me up, and cast me forth into the sea; so shall the sea be calm unto you: for I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you.

13 Nevertheless the men rowed hard to bring it to the land; but they could not: for the sea wrought, and was tempestuous against them.

14 Wherefore they cried unto the LORD, and said, We beseech thee, O LORD, we beseech thee, let us not perish for this man's life, and lay not upon us innocent blood: for thou, O LORD, hast done as it pleased thee.

15 So they took up Jonah, and cast him forth into the sea: and the sea ceased from her raging.

16 Then the men feared the LORD exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the LORD, and made vows.

17 ¶ Now the LORD had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah. And Jonah was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights.

convinced by the account Jonah gave of himself, that the God whom he worshipped (ver. 9) had brought this tempest upon them: so they made their petitions to him.

Let us not perish for this man's life,] For exposing this man's life to inevitable danger; since it is done out of extreme necessity to save ourselves, and by his own desire.

Ver. 16. Then the men feared the Lord exceedingly,] They were convinced of the power and greatness of that God whom Jonah worshipped; which appeared both in raising this storm, and so suddenly laying it.

And offered a sacrifice unto the Lord, and made vows.] The words may be translated to a plainer sense, thus, "And offered sacrifice unto the Lord, that is, they made vows" to do it as soon as they had opportunity. The copulative particle vau is sometimes used by way of explication; as hath been observed in the note upon Isa. li. 19 (see Noldius, p. 280). This sense suits best here.

Ver. 17. A great fish] Naturalists give an account of some sorts of fish which are large enough to swallow a man; particularly the canis charcarias, or dog-fish, called by some writers lamia, (see Bochart. De Animal. lib. v. cap. 12).

Jonah was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights.] The Hebrew language hath no one word to express what we call a natural day; so what the Greeks express by ἡμέρας, they denote by "a day and a night." Therefore the space of time, consisting of one whole revolution of twenty-four hours, and part of two others, is fitly expressed in that language, by "three days and three nights." Such a space of time our Lord lay in the grave; and we may from thence conclude, that Jonah, who was an eminent figure of him in this particular, was no longer in the fish's belly.

CHAPTER II.

1 THEN Jonah prayed unto the LORD his God out of the fish's belly.

2 And said, I cried by reason of mine affliction unto the LORD, and he heard me; out of the belly of hell cried I, and thou heardest my voice.

3 For thou hadst cast me into the deep, in the midst of the seas; and the floods compassed me about: all thy billows and thy waves passed over me.

4 Then I said, I am cast out of thy sight; yet I will look again toward thy holy temple.

5 The waters compassed me about, even to the soul: the depth closed me round about, the weeds were wrapped about my head.

6 I went down to the bottoms of the mountains; the earth with her bars was about me for ever: yet hast thou brought up my life from corruption, O LORD my God.

7 When my soul fainted within me I remembered the LORD: and my prayer came in unto thee, into thine holy temple.

8 They that observe lying vanities forsake their own mercy.

9 But I will sacrifice unto thee with the voice of thanksgiving; I will pay that that I have vowed. Salvation is of the LORD.

10 ¶ And the LORD spake unto the fish, and it vomited out Jonah upon the dry land.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—It contains the prayer of Jonah, when he was in the fish's belly, and his deliverance from thence.

Ver. 1.] Those devout thoughts which he had at that time, he afterward digested into the following prayer, and added a thanksgiving for his deliverance at the end of it. So several of David's psalms were probably composed after this trouble was over; but in a manner suitable to the thoughts he had at the time of his affliction, and with a grateful sense of God's mercies for his deliverance out of it (see Ps. liv. cxx).

Ver. 2. Out of the belly of hell] The word sheol signifies the "state of the dead" (see note on Isa. xiv. 9). So it may most properly be rendered the grave here, as the margin reads: the belly of the fish was to Jonah instead of a grave.

Ver. 4.] My first apprehensions were, that as I had justly forfeited thy favour by my disobedience; so thou wouldst cast me out of thy protection (see ver. 7, and compare Ps. xxxi. 22) yet, upon recollecting myself, I thought it my duty not to despair of thy mercy, but direct my prayer towards thy heavenly habitation (see ver. 7).

Ver. 5.] When I was thrown into the sea, I thought myself just ready to be drowned (compare Ps. lxix. 1).

Ver. 6.] I went down to the bottom of the sea, where the foundations of the mountains lie (see Ps. xxiv. 2). I found myself enclosed on every side, so that I had no prospect of deliverance.

Ver. 7. My prayer came in unto thee,] My prayer reached unto heaven, the place of thy peculiar residence (see Ps. xi. 4, xviii. 6, cii. 19, Mic. i. 2, Hab. ii. 20).

Ver. 8.] They that seek to or trust in idols, often called by the names of vanity and lies (see Ps. xxxi. 4, Jer. x. 8, xvi. 19), forsake him who alone is able to show mercy to them, and preserve them in the time of danger.

Ver. 9.] I will offer to thee those thanks which I solemnly promised to pay in the time of my trouble, and which will be as acceptable to thee as the fattest sacrifices of slain beasts (see Ps. l. 14, cxv. 17, 18, Hos. xiv. 2).

Ver. 10.] God's almighty power is represented in scripture as bringing things to pass by his bare will and command (see Gen. i. 3, Rom. iv. 17). Huetius Demost. Evang. prop. iv.) supposes, that Jonah's deliverance from the whale's belly gave occasion to the Greek story of Arion, who, after he was cast into the sea, was conveyed by a dolphin to the port of Corinth.

CHAPTER III.

1 AND the word of the LORD came unto Jonah the second time, saying,

2 Arise, go unto Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee.

3 So Jonah arose, and went unto Nineveh, according to the word of the LORD. Now Nineveh was an exceeding great city of three days' journey.

4 And Jonah began to enter into the city a day's journey, and he cried, and said, Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—Jonah is sent again to the Ninevites, and preacheth to them with good success.

Ver. 3. Nineveh was an exceeding great city] The Hebrew reads, "A city great to God;" so "the mountains of God" are the same with great mountains, Ps. xxxvi. 5, and "the cedars of God" are translated goodly cedars, Ps. lxxx. 10. Diodorus Siculus informs us, that Nineveh was four hundred and eighty furlongs in compass, which makes sixty of our miles (see Dr. Prideaux, ad A. C. 612); so that it was bigger than Babylon; which, according to his account, was but forty-eight. Diodorus's account agrees with the description the prophet gives us, that it was three days' journey in compass: twenty miles was a day's journey in common computation for a foot-traveller (see Casaubon's Notes upon Strabo, lib. i. p. 35).

Ver. 4. Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown,] God was pleased to allow them sufficient time to repent, and give some proof of their reformation. The copies of the LXX. read, three days: it is no easy matter to guess at the occasion of the mistake, although Is. Vossius is willing to believe that this was the original reading (see his book De LXX. Interp. cap. 23). Some copies of Justin Martyr's

5 ¶ So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them.

6 For word came unto the king of Nineveh, and he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered him with sackcloth, and sat in ashes.

7 And he caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh by the decree of the king and his nobles, saying, Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste any thing: let them not feed, nor drink water:

Dialogue with Trypho (p. 316, edit. Lond.), reads forty-three days; but that number is probably owing to the copiers, who joined the two readings of the Hebrew and LXX. together.

Ver. 5.] The fame of the wonderful works God had wrought for the Jews was spread over the eastern parts of the world. This might make the Ninevites hearken to a man of that nation, that came to them as sent by God: and it is likely that he gave them an account of the miraculous circumstances which attended his own mission. But without question, a sense of their own guilt, and their deserving whatever punishment Heaven could inflict, was a principal reason that moved them to have a regard for his message. And by the men of Nineveh's "repenting at the preaching of Jonas," God designed to upbraid the stubbornness of his own people, and shame them, as it were, into repentance, for fear the men of Nineveh "should rise up in judgment against them;" as our Saviour speaks of the Israelites in his own time, Matt. xii. 41.

Ver. 6. For word came unto the king of Nineveh.] Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, ad A. M. 3233, supposes this prince to have been Pul, the king of Assyria. Nineveh being then the capital city of that empire: who afterward invaded the kingdom of Israel, in the days of Menahem (2 Kings xv. 17); it being very agreeable to the methods of providence, 8 But let man and beast be covered with sackcloth, and cry mightily unto God: yea, let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands.

9 Who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not?

10 ¶ And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil, that he had said that he would do unto them; and he did it not.

to make use of a heathen king that was penitent, to punish the impenitency of God's own people, Israel.

Laid his robe from him.] He laid aside all his state, and put on the habit of a penitent.

Ver. 7. Let neither man nor beast—taste any thing.] Such general shows of sorrow add to the solemnity of the humiliation, and may be proper to work upon men's minds, and bring them to a true contrition.

Ver. 8. But let man and beast be covered with sackcloth.] The covering horses and mules with sackcloth, adds to the solemnity of a funeral: in like manner, their mournful garb was an affecting circumstance in this public sorrow and humiliation.

Let them turn every one from his evil way.] Natural religion instructed them, that their earnest prayers, without true amendment, would not avail them before God: nor would their repentance be thought sincere, unless they restored to the true owners what they had gained by violence and injustice.

Ver. 9.] Compare Joel ii. 14, 2 Sam. xii. 22. Even wicked men, upon their repentance, are apt to conceive hopes of obtaining mercy.

Ver. 10. He did it not.] According to the general declaration he hath made of his will in this case, Jer. xviii. 1, therefore the threatenings of temporal evils are to be understood conditionally; viz. unless the execution of them is suspended by men's repentance.

CHAPTER IV.

1 But it displeased Jonah exceedingly, and he was very angry.

2 And he prayed unto the Lord, and said, I pray thee, O Lord, was not this my saying, when I was yet in my country? Therefore I fled before unto Tarshish: for I knew that thou art a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repentest thee of evil.

3 Therefore now, O Lord, take, I beseech thee, my life from me: for it is better for me to die than to live.

4 ¶ Then said the Lord, Doest thou well to be angry?

5 So Jonah went out of the city, and sat on the east side of the city, and there made him a booth, and sat under it in the shadow, till he might see what would become of the city.

6 And the Lord God prepared a gourd, and

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—Jonah repining at God's mercy in sparing the Ninevites, is reproved by the type and figure of the gourd.

Ver. 1.] God's mercy in sparing the Ninevites was very displeasing to Jonah; and he expressed a great impatience under it, lest he should be esteemed a false prophet, and treated as such.

Ver. 2. He prayed unto the Lord.] He uttered his complaint in his prayers to God, wherein he pleaded an excuse for his disobedience to God's first commands.

Therefore I fled before unto Tarshish.] This made me unwilling to go upon this message to the Ninevites, because I knew, by the declaration thou madest to Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 6), and by several instances of thy mercy, that thou dost not always execute the punishments thou threatenest against sinners.

Ver. 3.] I had rather die, than live under the imputation of being a false prophet. Josephus (Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 19) tells a story parallel to this, concerning one Judas, an Essene, who had foretold that Antigonius should be murdered on a certain day at Straton's Tower, which was another name for the town of Cæsarea. On the very same day he saw this Antigonius in the temple, at which he fell into a great passion, and wished himself dead: but before the day was over, he received news that Antigonius made it to come up over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head, to deliver him from his grief. So Jonah was exceeding glad of the gourd.

7 But God prepared a worm when the morning rose the next day, and it smote the gourd that it withered.

8 And it came to pass, when the sun did arise, that God prepared a vehement east wind; and the sun beat upon the head of Jonah, that he fainted, and wished in himself to die, and said, It is better for me to die than to live.

was slain just under that tower of the palace in Jerusalem, which was called Straton's Tower.

Ver. 5. So Jonah went out of the city.] The words should have been translated, "Now Jonah had gone out of the city:" for the particulars related in the foregoing verses happened after his departing out of the city, and sitting somewhere in view of it, expecting some extraordinary judgment should come upon it: but being disappointed, he broke out into that expostulation with God already mentioned.

And sat on the east side] Probably in some solitary place, where he might not be discovered, and which did not lie in the way towards his own country, but quite opposite to it: so that if the Ninevites had a mind to have pursued him, they might not apprehend him.

Ver. 6. God prepared a gourd.] What sort of plant or shrub this should be, was a question before St. Jerome's time, as appears by his commentary upon the place. He translates it ivy, not that he thought it meant so, but in compliance, as he tells us, with some ancient interpreters; although the Septuagint, and all the ancient versions, agree in translating it a gourd.

That it might be a shadow over his head.] From the burning heat of the sun, which still added to his former grief and vexation; the booth which he made at first being withered by the heat.

Ver. 8.] The winds in the hot countries are oftentimes more suffocating than the heat of the sun, when they blow from the sandy deserts; and they make the sun-beams give a more intense heat. The word charishith, vehement, signifies likewise silent, 9 And God said to Jonah, Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd? And he said, I do well to be angry, even unto death.

10 Then said the Lord, Thou hast had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not laboured, neither madest it grow; which came up in a night, and perished in a night:

11 And should not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand; and also much cattle?

as it is translated in the margin. Taking it in that sense, it denotes such a wind, as causes a small motion in the air, and makes it sultry hot.

Ver. 9. Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd?] Dost thou think fit to persist in thine impatience, notwithstanding the punishment I have sent upon thee for thy former guilt in this kind?

I do well to be angry, even unto death.] I have just cause to be angry, even to that degree as to wish myself dead. The prophet here records his own impatience, without concealing any circumstance of it, as Moses and other holy writers have done.

Ver. 10. Thou hast had pity on the gourd.] Thou wast concerned at the loss of that short-lived plant.

Ver. 11. And should not I spare Nineveh.] The lives of so many thousand men are much more valuable than that of a single plant.

Wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left] i. e. Infants, who "know neither good nor evil," as it is expressed, Deut. i. 39, Isa. vii. 15, 16. If we compute these at the fifth part of the inhabitants of Nineveh, the whole sum will amount to six hundred thousand inhabitants; which are as few as can well be supposed to live in a city of such large dimensions.

Also much cattle?] God's providence extends its care to beasts, as well as men (see Ps. xxxvi. 6, civ. 27, 28): so he is willing to spare them, as well as the more noble parts of the creation.

This reason seems to have silenced Jonah's complaints, and made him sensible of his fault, in repining at God's mercies.

OF

THE PROPHET MICAH.

PREFACE.

THE prophet Micah was probably of Judah, because he reckons the time of his prophesying by the reigns of the kings of Judah. He is called the Morasthite here, and Jer. xxvi. 18, from the place of his nativity, Morasthi, which St. Jerome distinguishes from Mareshah, mentioned i. 15, though he places them both in the tribe of Judah (Lib. de Locis Hebr.).

CHAPTER I.

1 THE word of the LORD that came to Micah the Morasthite in the days of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, which he saw concerning Samaria and Jerusalem.

2 Hear, all ye people; hearken, O earth, and all that therein is: and let the Lord God be witness against you, the LORD from his holy temple.

3 For, behold, the LORD cometh forth out of his high place, and will come down and tread upon the high places of the earth.

4 And the mountains shall be molten under him, and the valleys shall be cleft, as wax before the fire, and as the waters that are poured down a steep place.

5 For the transgression of Jacob is all this,

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet begins with an awful description of God's coming to execute his judgments, first upon Samaria, and then upon Jerusalem.

Ver. 1. Concerning Samaria and Jerusalem.] Concerning both the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, whereof Samaria and Jerusalem were the metropolises.

Ver. 2. Hearken, O earth, and all that therein is:] Or, "Hearken, O land [of Israel], and all its inhabitants." A form of speech bespeaking men's attention (see Deut. xxxii. 1, Isa. i. 2). The prophets sometimes address their speech to inanimate things, to upbraid the stupidity of men (see below, vi. 1, 2, Ezek. vi. 2).

Let the Lord God be witness against you,] I call him to witness, that I have forewarned you of the judgments that hang over your heads, unless you speedily repent. And he himself will become a witness against you, and convince you of your sins, in such a manner, that you shall not be able to deny the charge (compare Ps. l. 7, Mal. iii. 5).

The Lord from his holy temple.] From heaven his holy habitation (see the following verse, and the note upon Jonah ii. 7).

Ver. 3. The Lord cometh forth out of his place.] God is described as coming from heaven to judgment because of the visible effects of his power and presence upon earth (see Isa. xxvi. 21).

And will come down, and tread upon the high places of the earth.] When he comes to execute his judgments, he will subdue places of the greatest strength, and bring down the men of the highest rank (see Amos iv. 13).

Ver. 4.] An allusion to God's coming upon mount Sinai, when thunder and lightning shook the mountain, and violent rains, which accompanied this tempest, made the hills look as if they were melted down (compare Judg. iv. 4, 5, Ps. lxxviii. 8, xcvi. 5, Isa. lxiv. 1, 2, Hab. iii. 6, 9, 10). Or the words may be referred to the general judgment, of which all particular judgments are an earnest; when the heavens and the earth shall be dissolved at God's appearing (compare Nah. i. 5, Isa. li. 6).

Ver. 5. What is the transgression of Jacob? is it not Samaria?] Where is the chief cause of Jacob's or Israel's sin and apostasy? Is it not Samaria, the chief seat of that kingdom, the residence of the king and his princes, who have set up the idolatry of the golden calves, and made it the established religion of the kingdom?

VOL. III.—94

and for the sins of the house of Israel. What is the transgression of Jacob? is it not Samaria? and what are the high places of Judah? are they not Jerusalem?

6 Therefore I will make Samaria as an heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard: and I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, and I will discover the foundations thereof.

7 And all the graven images thereof shall be beaten to pieces, and all the hires thereof shall be burned with the fire, and all the idols thereof will I lay desolate: for she gathered it of the hire of an harlot, and they shall return to the hire of an harlot.

8 Therefore I will wail and howl, I will go

What are the high places of Judah? are they not Jerusalem?] Doth not the idolatrous worship, practised in the high places, receive its chief encouragement from Ahaz, and the great men that join with him in that idolatry (see 2 Kings xvi. 4)?

Ver. 6. I will make Samaria as an heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard:] It shall be turned into a heap of ruins (compare iii. 12, 2 Kings xix. 25, Neh. iv. 2). It shall be reduced into such heaps of stones as are laid up together in a field lately ploughed, or a vineyard newly planted, after the stones have been gathered out of it (compare Isa. v. 2, Hos. xii. 11). The Vulgar Latin translates the sentence thus: "I will make Samaria as a heap of stones in a field, when a vineyard is planted."

I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, and I will discover the foundations] Samaria stood upon a hill (1 Kings xvi. 24): so, when it was demolished, many stones would fall down from the high and stately buildings into the valley beneath, and leave the foundations naked and bare (compare Jer. li. 25).

Ver. 7. All the hires thereof shall be burned with the fire,] i. e. The city shall be destroyed; all its wealth and substance shall be consumed in the fire; the increase of which they looked upon as so many rewards of their idolatry (see Hos. ii. 5, 12).

For she gathered it of the hire of an harlot, and they shall return to the hire of an harlot.] She imagines that she gaineth her wealth as a reward of her idolatry, and it shall return or be made a prey to idolatrous Assyrians. Nothing is more abominable than the "hire of an harlot," implying two great wickednesses, covetousness and impurity (see Deut. xxiii. 18).

Ver. 8. I will wail and howl, I will go stripped and naked:] I will sympathize with the calamities of my countrymen (compare Isa. xxii. 4, Jer. iv. 19). I will put on the habit and dress of mourners, whose custom it was to go without their upper garments: or with those they wore, rent and torn. This will fitly denote the naked condition to which the ten tribes will be reduced by their enemies (see Isa. xx. 2—4, and the notes there).

A wailing like the dragons,] The word tannin is often translated a dragon by our interpreters; but it signifies most commonly some great fish, such as a whale or crocodile (see the note upon Isa. xxvii. 1, Ezek. xxix. 3). It seems to be taken for a land-animal here, as Dr. Pocock observes upon the place; and so it is taken Lam. iv. 3, where our English reads "The sea monsters draw out the breast, they give stripped and naked: I will make a wailing like the dragons, and mourning as the owls.

9 For her wound is incurable; for it is come unto Judah; he is come unto the gate of my people, even to Jerusalem.

10 ¶ Declare ye it not at Gath, weep ye not at all: in the house of Aphrah roll thyself in the dust.

11 Pass ye away, thou inhabitant of Saphir, having thy shame naked: the inhabitant of Zaanan came not forth in the mourning of Beth-ezel; he shall receive of you his standing.

suck to their young ones;" but the text must be understood of a land-animal, sea monsters having no breasts.

Mourning as the owls.] Compare Job xxx. 29, Ps. cii. 6. Bochart (De Animal. lib. ii. cap. 14) thinks the word translated owls signifies properly an ostrich. It is generally supposed, that the Hebrew yaanîh is derived from the loud noise this bird maketh. The LXX. translated it here by Συφίρες, σιφύς; by which Vossius understands a sort of wasp or hornet, of a melancholy note; which kind never goes in swarms, but wanders about in a solitary manner (see his Dissert. De Orac. Sibyll. cap. 13).

Ver. 9.] The captivity and desolation of the ten tribes can neither be prevented, because they persist in their impenitence: nor can any relief be applied to it, because it will end in their utter destruction. And one aggravating circumstance attends it, that it is the forerunner of those evils which befall Judah and Jerusalem; whose gates Sennacherib shall attempt to besiege, with a design to make himself master of that city and the kingdom (see 2 Kings xviii. 17, 2 Chron. xxxii. 2, compare ver. 12 of this chapter).

Ver. 10. Declare ye it not at Gath.] The words are taken out of David's lamentation over Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 20. This manner of speech does not imply, in either place, that such ill tidings could be concealed; but only expresseth the prophet's concern, lest the Philistines should take occasion from thence to rejoice over the calamities of his people.

In the house of Aphrah roll thyself in the dust.] Or, "Wallow in the ashes;" as was commonly practised in times of great mourning (see Esther iv. 3, Jer. vi. 20). The word Aphrah signifies dust; and the prophet, it is likely, puts it here for Ophrah a town in the tribe of Benjamin: that the name may better suit their present condition.

Ver. 11. Pass ye away, thou inhabitant of Saphir, having thy shame naked.] Or, "Thy nakedness uncovered." The word Saphir imports a fair and delightful habitation, and denotes either Samaria or Jerusalem. The prophet threatens the inhabitants of that place, that they shall go into captivity in a way very unsuitable to their former softness and luxury; even without so much as a covering to hide their nakedness (see Isa. iii. 17, xlvii. 2, 3, and the notes there).

The inhabitant of Zaanan came not forth in the mourning of Beth-ezel.] The inhabitants of Zaanan were so much concerned to provide for their own security, that they took no notice of the mournful condition of their neighbour: so Beth-ezel signifies. Grotius supposes Zaanan to denote Zion, and Beth-ezel to signify Beth-el, called here by another name, importing "the house of separation," according to his interpretation; because it was the principal seat of idolatrous worship.

He shall receive of you his standing.] The inhabitant of Zaanan shall make a conjecture of his own strength or condition, whether he is like to stand or 12 For the inhabitant of Maroth waited carefully for good: but evil came down from the Lord unto the gate of Jerusalem.

13 O thou inhabitant of Lachish, bind the chariot to the swift beast: she is the beginning of the sin to the daughter of Zion; for the transgressions of Israel were found in thee.

14 Therefore shalt thou give presents to Moresheth-gath: the houses of Achzib shall be a lie to the kings of Israel.

15 Yet will I bring an heir unto thee, O in-fall by the fate which he sees doth befall the people of Beth-ezel.

Ver. 12.] For the inhabitant of Maroth waited carefully for good: but evil came down, &c.] The words may be better translated, "Although the inhabitant of Maroth waited for good, yet evil," &c. So the particle ki is translated when it is repeated in the middle of the sentence, as it is here (2 Sam. xxiii. 5). By Maroth, which signifies bitterness or trouble, Grotius understands Ramoth: there were several Ramahs, expressed sometimes by Ramoth, in the plural number; one in mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. i. 1, another in the tribe of Benjamin, near Beth-lehem, Jer. xxxi. 15.

But evil came down from the Lord unto the gate of Jerusalem.] Such a calamity as stopped not at Ramah, but reached even to Jerusalem; those two places being not far asunder (see Judg. xix. 10. 13).

Ver. 13. Bind the chariot to the swift beast.] In order to flee from the approaching enemy. Lachish was one of the first cities that Sennacherib besieged when he invaded Judea (2 Kings xviii. 13, 14).

She is the beginning of the sin to the daughter of Zion.] She was the first among the cities of Judah which practised those idolatries, which the kings and people of Israel had begun.

Ver. 14. Shalt thou give presents to Moresheth-gath.] Either to defend thee against the enemy, or to receive thee under their protection. Moresheth-gath was probably a place that once belonged to Gath of the Philistines.

The houses of Achzib shall be a lie to the kings of Israel.] Achzib signifies a lie. There is a town of that name belonging to the tribe of Judah, mentioned Josh. xv. 44. This place the prophet foretells will answer its name, and disappoint the kings of Israel that depended upon its strength and assistance [see Chron. xxi. 2, xxviii. 19]. Israel is sometimes used for Judah (see below, iii. 9, 10): so it may probably be taken here, and ver. 15.

Ver. 15. Yet will I bring an heir unto thee, O inhabitant of Marashah.] This is another town belonging to Judah, mentioned Josh. xv. 44. The name signifies an inheritance: so the prophet, by way of allusion, foretells that a new heir shall come and take possession of it, viz. a conquering enemy.

He shall come unto Adullam the glory of Israel.] The enemy shall enlarge his conquests even to Adullam, one of the frontier cities of Judah, fortified by Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xi. 7. Israel is put here for Judah, as in the foregoing verse. The margin reads, "The glory of Israel shall come to Adullam:" i. e. the great and honourable men shall be forced to hide themselves from their enemies, in the cave of Adullam, as David did when he fled from Saul, 1 Sam. xxii. 1.

This may relate to the great depredations which Pekah king of Israel, in conjunction with Rezin king of Syria, made in the kingdom of Judah, in the reign of Ahaz (see 2 Chron. xxviii. 5, 8).

CHAPTER II.

1 WOE to them that devise iniquity, and work evil upon their beds! when the morning is light, they practise it, because it is in the power of their hand.

2 And they covet fields, and take them by violence; and houses, and take them away: so they oppress a man and his house, even a man and his heritage.

3 Therefore thus saith the Lord; Behold, against this family do I devise an evil, from which ye shall not remove your necks; neither shall ye go haughtily: for this time is evil.

4 ¶ In that day shall one take up a parable against you, and lament with a doleful lamentation, and say, We be utterly spoiled: he hath

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—The chapter begins with a reproof for the sins of oppression, and contempt of God's word, but concludes with the promise of a restoration. Some learned men think that the reproofs of this chapter relate to the times of king Ahaz.

Ver. 1. Woe to them that devise iniquity, and work evil upon their beds! Whose thoughts are big with mischief, so that they contrive schemes of wickedness upon their beds, in order to put them in practice when they arise in the morning (compare Ps. xxxvi. 4).

Because it is in the power of their hand. "They make their strength the law of justice," according to the character given of such men, Wisd. ii. 11.

Some take the Hebrew word El to signify God, which is its most usual signification; in which sense the Vulgar Latin translates it, Contra Deum est manus illorum; "their hand is against God." But the phrase in the original is used in the same sense in which our translators understand it, Gen. xxxi. 29, Deut. xxviii. 32.

Ver. 2. So they oppress a man and his house, They take from him both his house and his land.

Ver. 3.] As they devise mischief against others, so will I devise an evil against them, as a due punishment for their sin. As they have unjustly deprived others of their inheritance, so a conquering enemy shall dispossess them, and carry them into captivity (see the following verse). The word family is equivalent to people, as appears from Jer. i. 15; compare viii. 3, x. 25 of that prophecy; where the "families which have not called upon thy name," mean the same with "the kingdoms that have not called upon thy name," Ps. lxxiv. 6.

Ver. 4. Shall one take up a parable against you. A parable denotes a speech out of the ordinary way, as the Greek word παροιμία imports, and illustrated with metaphors or rhetorical figures (see Job xxvii. 1, Ezek. xx. 49, Hab. ii. 1). So "speaking in parables" (for so the words should be translated) is opposed to "speaking plainly," John xvi. 25, 29.

Lament with a doleful lamentation.] The expression alludes to the lamentations made at funerals (see note upon Amos v. 1).

He hath changed the portion of my people: how hath he removed it from me! He hath removed his people out of their ancient inheritance, that portion which he himself had allotted them, and given it away to other owners.

Turning away he hath divided our fields. Turning us into captivity; or, as the margin reads, "instead of restoring us," he hath divided our lands among our enemies.

Ver. 5.] Israel was the Lord's people or congregation (compare Deut. xxiii. 1, 2), they were "the lot of his inheritance" (Deut. xxxii. 9), and he divided their land among them by lot: but now they shall be utterly expelled out of it, and sent captives into a foreign country.

Ver. 6. Prophecy ye not, say they to them that prophecy; They do not care to hear the prophets speak ungrateful truths (see Isa. xxx. 10, Amos vii. 16). The word is the same here which is used in that text of Amos (see the note there). "Say they," is understood by a like ellipsis, Nahum xi. 8.

They shall not prophesy to them, that they shall not take shame. Or rather, For they will not take shame. It is to no purpose to prophecy to them, for they still persist in a shameless course of sin (compare Zech. iii. 5, Jer. vi. 15). The latter part of the sentence may be thus translated, "Their shame shall not depart," or be removed from them; i. e. God hath determined to bring that shame upon them which their sins deserve.

Ver. 7. That art named the house of Jacob, But dost not act suitably to the piety of thy father Jacob.

Is the spirit of the Lord straitened? are these his doings? Is God's hand or power shortened? (compare Isa. lix. 1, Zech. iv. 6.) Are the judgments he brings upon you the genuine effects of his power and goodness? and not rather such acts as your sins do in a manner constrain him to exercise? as punishments are called his strange work, Isa. xxviii. 21. Certainly them that pass by securely as men averse from war.

9 The women of my people have ye cast out from their pleasant houses; from their children have ye taken away my glory for ever.

10 Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest: because it is polluted, it shall destroy you, even with a sore destruction.

11 If a man walking in the spirit and falsehood both his laws and the words delivered by his prophets would turn to your good, if you would obey them.

Ver. 8. Even of late my people is risen up as an enemy:] This Dr. Wells refers to the invasion of Judah by Pekah, and the devastations which followed upon it (see 2 Chron. xxviii. 5, 8).

Ye pull off the robe with the garment from them that pass by securely:] Or, "Ye take the robe from off the garment;" so Noldius translates it, p. 611. By the robe is meant the upper garment, called the cloak, Luke vi. 29, where the phrase seems to be taken from this place. The words import, that the Israelites invaded their countrymen of Judah, who had given them no provocation, and were willing to live peaceably with them; and in a violent manner stripped them of all their substance, even to their wearing apparel.

Ver. 9. The women of my people have ye cast out from their pleasant houses:] This probably relates to the invasion just now mentioned, when the "Israelites carried away captive of their brethren two hundred thousand, women, sons, and daughters," 2 Chron. xxviii. 8.

From their children have ye taken away my glory for ever.] Ye have taken their children captive with a design to sell them to the heathen (see Joel iii. 6), that they may be bred up in idolatry, and forfeit all their right to the privileges of my temple and worship. The temple is called "the beauty of holiness," Ps. xxix. 2, xvi. 9, where the word is the same which is here translated glory. Some understand the words of Pekah and Rezin's design to set up another king in Judah (see Isa. vii. 6), not allied to the house of David, and thereby to defeat the promises made to that family, that the Messiah should descend from thence, and withal deprive the posterity of the Jews of the most glorious part of God's promises to them.

Ver. 10. Arise ye, and depart:] The prophet still directs his discourse to the Israelites that invaded Judah, and tells them, that as a just punishment for their oppressing and spoiling their brethren, they themselves should be carried captive out of their land, where God had promised to give them rest (see Deut. xii. 9, Ps. xcv. 2).

Because it is polluted, it shall destroy you,] The land, being polluted with your sins, shall "spew you out," as it did its former inhabitants, the Canaanites (Lev. xviii. 28).

Ver. 11. If a man walking in the spirit and falsehood] Or, "of falsehood." Noldius gives several instances where the copulative particle supplies the place of the genitive case (see his Concordance, p. 315).

I will prophesy unto thee of wine and of strong drink:] If a prophet pretend to foretell all manner of plenty and prosperity, such a one shall be hearkened to by this people, though it be never so unlikely to come to pass. Such were those that prophesied of peace, whom Jeremiah reproves, vi. 14, viii. 11, and "spoke smooth things," to please their hearers, Isa. xxx. 10. The words may be thus translated, "I will prophesy unto thee for wine and strong drink:" i. e. if it appears, both by his words and actions, that he doth not design the "serving God, but his own belly," do lie, saying, I will prophesy unto thee of wine and of strong drink; he shall even be the prophet of this people.

12 ¶ I will surely assemble, O Jacob, all of thee; I will surely gather the remnant of Israel; I will put them together as the sheep of Bozrah, as the flock in the midst of their fold: they shall make great noise by reason of the multitude of men.

as St. Paul speaks, Rom. xvi. 18, yet such a one shall be followed by those that love soothing teachers (compare iii. 5). Wine and strong drink are often mentioned together; the latter may best be explained in the words of St. Jerome (Epist. 2. ad Nepotianum): Sicera Hebræo sermone omnis potio nuncupatur, quæ inebriare potest, sive illa quæ frumento conficitur, sive pomorum succo; aut cum favi decoquantur in dulcem potionem, aut palmarum fructus exprimuntur in liquorem, coctisque frugibus aqua pinguior coloratur. "The Hebrew word Sheker signifies any strong drink, whether it be made with any sort of grain (like our malt), or with the juice of apples; or when a sweet liquor is made by the infusion of honey, or when a juice is pressed out of the dates of the palm-tree: or water hath a strength and colour added to it by the infusion of any other fruit."

Ver. 12. I will surely assemble, O Jacob, all of thee:] Here follows a promise of mercy, such as is often subjoined to the threatenings of impending judgments. This promise relates to the general restoration of the Jewish nation, which yet is here and elsewhere confined to that remnant, that shall escape the punishments that will come upon the rebellious (see note upon iv. 7).

I will put them together as the sheep of Bozrah,] God is often styled "the shepherd of Israel," and his care over his people is compared to that of a shepherd over his flock, when he gathers them into the fold, and defends them from beasts of prey, while they are there (compare Jer. xxxi. 10). Bozrah is a noted place in Idumæa, where there were large flocks of sheep.

They shall make great noise by reason of the multitude of men.] The noise a multitude makes both discovers their numbers, and is a sign of their being lively and in good condition. The words may be rendered, keeping close to the original, "They shall increase with men:" the same word in the Hebrew signifying both a noise and a multitude (compare Ezek. xxxvi. 37).

Ver. 13. The breaker is come up before them:] He that shall break the bonds of their captivity, or break through all obstacles that hinder their return home. The word ports is usually understood in a bad sense, for a thief or a destroyer; but the context here determines it to a more favourable acceptation. To this sense the vulgar Latin renders it, Pandens iter, "He that opens the way." The Jewish commentators generally understand the breaker, and their king, that follows, of the same person, viz. the Messiah; as may be seen in Dr. Pocock upon the place. Bishop Pearson cites the words of Moses Hadarsan to the same purpose, in his Exposition of the sixth article of the Creed. The words seem parallel to that expression of Zechariah (xii. 8), "As the angel of the Lord before them;" or, at the head of them (see the note there). Some of the Jews, indeed, with a little variation, expound their king of the Messiah, and the breaker of his forerunner Elijah; as Dr. Pocock observes, the Chaldee paraphrase translates it, "Those that are saved;" as if the word were in a passive form.

They have broken up, and have passed through the gate,] The expressions allude to a flock of sheep, who,

13 The breaker is come up before them : they have broken up, and have passed through the gate, as soon as a passage is opened for one to get out, do all of them follow.

Their king shall pass before them, and [or, even] the Lord on the head of them.] The Messiah, who and are gone out by it : and their king shall pass before them, and the LORD on the head of them.

is both their God and their king (see the note upon Isa. vii. 14), shall lead and conduct them as their captain and general (compare Isa. lii. 12, Hos. i. 11).

CHAPTER III.

1 AND I said, Hear, I pray you, O heads of Jacob, and ye princes of the house of Israel ; Is it not for you to know judgment ?

2 Who hate the good, and love the evil ; who pluck off their skin from off them, and their flesh from off their bones ;

3 Who also eat the flesh of my people, and flay their skin from off them ; and they break their bones, and chop them in pieces, as for the pot, and as flesh within the caldron.

4 Then shall they cry unto the LORD, but he will not hear them : he will even hide his face from them at that time, as they have behaved themselves ill in their doings.

5 ¶ Thus saith the LORD concerning the prophets that make my people err, that bite with their teeth, and cry, Peace ; and he that putteth not into their mouths, they even prepare war against him :

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—Both the princes and prophets of Judah are reprov'd for their sins, and the destruction of Jerusalem is foretold, as a punishment for these enormities.

Ver. 1. Ye princes of—Israel ;] Israel stands for Judah here, as appears by ver. 9, 10 (see likewise i. 14, 15).

Ver. 2, 3. Who pluck off their skin, &c.] Who exercise all manner of cruelty upon their inferiors, as if they were so many butchers cutting meat for the shambles.

Ver. 4.] As they have shown no pity to others, God will have no pity for them.

Ver. 5. That bite with their teeth, and cry, Peace ;] Though they speak smooth things, yet are no better than ravening wolves, and bring destruction upon those that are deluded by them (see ii. 11).

He that putteth not into their mouths, they even prepare war against him :] If men will not still caress and maintain them, they bring them into trouble by raising false accusations against them, as if they were enemies to the government (compare Ezek. xiii. 19).

Ver. 6, 7. Night shall be unto you, that ye shall not have a vision, &c.] The false prophets shall see their own prophecies confuted by experience, so that they shall no more pretend to the gift of prophecy, and shall be covered with shame and confusion for making false pretences to it.

The day shall be dark over them.] As they shall have no light or revelation from heaven, so dark days or dismal calamities shall overtake them, as a just punishment for their frauds and impostures (compare Isa. viii. 20, xxix. 10, Jer. xv. 9, Amos vii. 9, 10).

Ver. 7. They shall all cover their lips ; for there is no answer of God.] Men used to cover their mouth, or their face, when they were under any great affliction (see Ezek. xxiv. 17). This likewise showed 6 Therefore night shall be unto you, that ye shall not have a vision ; and it shall be dark unto you, that ye shall not divine ; and the sun shall go down over the prophets, and the day shall be dark over them.

7 Then shall the seers be ashamed, and the diviners confounded : yea, they shall all cover their lips ; for there is no answer of God.

8 ¶ But truly I am full of power by the spirit of the LORD, and of judgment, and of might, to declare unto Jacob his transgression, and to Israel his sin.

9 Hear this, I pray you, ye heads of the house of Jacob, and princes of the house of Israel, that abhor judgment, and pervert all equity.

10 They build up Zion with blood, and Jerusalem with iniquity.

11 The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire, and the prophets that they were utterly silenced, and had nothing to say, either by way of revelation from God, or in behalf of themselves (Job. xl. 4).

Ver. 8.] Whereas I, that am a true prophet, and moved by God's Spirit, have the honesty and courage to reprove the crying sins of the nation, though practised and encouraged by the greatest men in it (see ver. 9), contrary to the base flatterings and soothings of the false prophets (see Ezek. xiii. 10, &c.). Geburah properly signifies might, or courage ; so it is used, Isa. xi. 2 (see the note there).

Ver. 9.] See ver. 1. This address to the great men shows the prophet's courage and impartiality.

Ver. 10.] Who think to increase the wealth, or secure the safety, of the public, by putting the innocent to death (compare Hab. ii. 12).

Ver. 11. The heads—judge for reward,] See vii. 3, Isa. i. 23, Hos. iv. 18, Ezek. xxii. 12, 27, Zeph. iii. 3.

The priests—teach for hire,] It was the duty of the priests to instruct the people, as well as to attend upon the service of the temple ; for which cause they had cities allotted to them in all parts of Judea (see Deut. xxxiii. 10, Ezra vii. 10, Jer. xviii. 18, Mal. ii. 7). The priests, not content with that plentiful revenue which the law allowed them, made a corrupt gain of their office.

The prophets—divine for money,] See ver. 5, Jer. v. 31, vi. 13. This is to be understood of the false prophets (see Zeph. iii. 4, Zech. xiii. 2).

Yet will they lean upon the Lord, and say, Is not the Lord among us [or, in the midst of us] ? none evil can come upon us.] Notwithstanding these general corruptions, they will rely upon God's protection, and think themselves secure, because he hath chosen the temple as the place of his peculiar residence (compare Jer. vii. 4, Zeph. iii. 5). St. Paul alludes to this place when he describes the Jews as "resting or relying upon the law," Rom. ii. 17. The Greek word ἐπ'απαραστήσαντο, is the same which the LXX. use here.

phets thereof divine for money: yet will they lean upon the Lord, and say, Is not the LORD among us? none evil can come upon us.

12 Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest.

Ver. 12.] This prophecy had its utmost completion in the final destruction of the city and temple by the Romans (see note upon Jer. xxvi. 18). The word heaps alludes to the heaps of stones laid up together in fields newly ploughed (see i. 6, compare Ps. lxxix. 1).

The mountain of the house [of the Lord] as the high places of the forest.] The place where the temple stood, which was upon mount Moriah, shall be overrun with grass and shrubs, like a thicket or forest.

CHAPTER IV.

I But in the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the house of the LORD shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and people shall flow unto it.

2 And many nations shall come, and say, Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem.

3 ¶ And he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

4 But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the LORD of hosts hath spoken it.

5 For all people will walk every one in the name of his god, and we will walk in the name of the LORD our God for ever and ever.

6 In that day, saith the LORD, will I assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted;

7 And I will make her that halted a remnant,

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet foretells the proclamation of the gospel, and the increase of Christ's kingdom, in the latter ages of the world: and exhorts God's people not to be discouraged at the apprehension of their approaching captivity, because the church should in due time surmount all difficulties, and break in pieces all the kingdoms of the earth; as Daniel afterward prophesied, ii. 35, 44.

Ver. 1. In the last days] The times of the Messias are usually expressed in the prophets by "the last days" (see note upon the parallel text, Isa. ii. 2).

The mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains.] See iii. 12. The temple standing upon mount Moriah is often styled God's "holy mountain;" from thence the phrase is taken to denote the Christian church in the prophetic writings (see Isa. xi. 9, lxvi. 20, Jer. xxxi. 23, Ezek. xx. 40, Joel iii. 17, Zech. viii. 3.) Our Lord himself compares his church to a "city set on a hill," Matt. v. 14.

People shall flow unto it.] Heathens shall resort thither to be instructed in the ways of salvation (see the following verse).

Ver. 2.] The expressions allude to the Jews' going up in companies to Jerusalem at their solemn feasts (see notes upon the parallel text of Isaiah).

Ver. 3.] See notes upon the same place. It is farther observable, that our Saviour was born at a time when there was peace all the world over; after Augustus, having put an end to the civil wars, had shut up the temple of Janus, in token of his having procured a settled peace.

Ver. 4.] This shall be the effect of that peace, foretold in the foregoing verse, when every man may securely enjoy his own possessions, and the fruits of his labour (see Isa. xxxvi. 16, 1 Kings iv. 25, Zech. iii. 10, compare Jer. xxiii. 4, 6).

Ver. 5.] Or, "Although all nations should walk every one in the name of his god, yet we will walk,"

&c. Since all people are fond of the religion of their forefathers, though false and absurd; it much more becomes us to cleave steadfastly to the service of the true God, and not forsake his laws and ordinances, as we have too often done. And this will be remarkably fulfilled at the general conversion of the Jews, when this prophecy shall receive its utmost completion; as hath been observed in the notes upon the parallel text of Isaiah (see likewise the following verses of this chapter).

Ver. 6. In that day—will I assemble her that halteth.] Or, "I will heal her that halteth" (compare Zech. iii. 19): for so the verb asaph, assemble, is translated 2 Kings v. 3, 6. The word which we render halteth, signifies in general one that is weak and feeble, or bowed down by any disease or calamity (see Ps. xxxv. 15, xxxviii. 17).

I will gather her that is driven out.] This relates to the calling of the Jews from their several dispersions into the church (see the notes upon Ezek. xxxiv. 13, 16): although it may in some degree have been fulfilled in their return from the Babylonish captivity (compare Ps. cxlvii. 2).

Ver. 7. I will make her that halted a remnant.] To this remnant are many promises made, which may in some degree be applied to the state of the Jews after their return from captivity (see Zeph. ii. 9, Zech. viii. 6, 11); but are chiefly to be understood of those who were to be called by the gospel, when the main body of the Jewish nation were rejected (see ii. 12, v. 3, 7, 8, vii. 18, Isa. i. 9, x. 21, 22, Jer. i. 20, Joel ii. 32, Zeph. ii. 9, iii. 13, and notes upon those places).

Her that was cast far off a strong nation.] The Jews, when they return from their several dispersions (see ver. 6), shall be victorious over all their enemies (compare v. 8, Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix., and see note upon Obadiah, ver. 8).

The Lord shall reign over them in mount Zion, from henceforth even for ever.] Compare Joel iii. 17. God will dwell and reign among his saints in the New Jerusalem "that comes down from heaven," Rev. xxi. 2, 3, &c. and then "the kingdoms of the and her that was cast far off a strong nation: and the LORD shall reign over them in mount Zion from henceforth, even for ever.

8 ¶ And thou, O tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion; the kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem.

9 Now why dost thou cry out aloud? is there no king in thee? is thy counsellor perished? for pangs have taken me as a woman in travail.

10 Be in pain, and labour to bring forth, O daughter of Zion, like a woman in travail: for now shalt thou go forth out of the city, and thou shalt dwell in the field, and thou shalt go even to Babylon: there shalt thou be delivered; there earth shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever," Rev. xi. 15, compared with xix. 6, Isa. xxiv. 23, Dan. vii. 27.

Ver. 8.] The church, of which the earthly Jerusalem was but a figure, shall be the seat of this sovereign dominion, which God shall render conspicuous to the whole world, spoken of ver. 7. "The tower of the flock," or of Eder, is best explained by "the strong hold of the daughter of Zion," which follows. The Chaldee paraphrase expounds the words of the Messiah, "in whom the ancient kingdom shall be revived;" i. e. the kingdom of David, the Beth-lehemite, "the tower of Eder" being in or near Beth-lehem (Gen. xxxv. 19, 21). This notion is countenanced by Jonathan's Targum upon Gen. xxxv. 19, where mention being made in the text of "the tower of Eder, beyond which Israel spread his tent," he adds, by way of explanation, "from hence king Messias shall manifest himself in the latter days."

Ver. 9.] Why dost thou cry out, as a woman in the anguish of her travail, as if God himself, thy king and counsellor, had forsaken thee (compare Jer. viii. 19). Some understand it of the time when Zedekiah and his counsellors were seized by the Chaldeans (2 Kings xxv. 6, 18, &c.) Calamities are often compared to the pangs of child-bearing (see Isa. xlii. 8, Jer. xxx. 6, l. 43).

Ver. 10. Be in pain, and labour to bring forth.] There is reason for your being in pain and anguish; but, as the pangs of a woman in travail, they shall have a happy conclusion; as it follows in the next words.

For now shalt thou go forth out of the city, and thou shalt dwell in the field.] The Jews' captivity is expressed by their "going out of the city, and dwelling in the field;" because their city and temple being destroyed, they should live in an obscure state, without any visible form of government and worship. The same condition is elsewhere expressed by their living in the wilderness" (see note upon Ezek. xx. 35, and Hos. ii. 14). So the church under persecution is described as "flying into the wilderness," Rev. xii. 14.

There shalt thou be delivered;] God shall wonderfully restore thy captivity from thence by Cyrus, as he hath foretold by Isaiah, a prophet contemporary with Micah (Isa. xlv. 28, xlv. 1; compare vii. 8, 11 of this prophecy).

11 ¶ Now also many nations are gathered against thee, that say, Let her be defiled, and let our eye look upon Zion.

12 But they know not the thoughts of the LORD, neither understand they his counsel: for he shall gather them as the sheaves into the floor.

13 Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion: for I will make thine horn iron, and I will make thy hoofs brass: and thou shalt beat in pieces many people: and I will consecrate their gain unto the LORD, and their substance unto the LORD of the whole earth.

Ver. 11.] The heathen round about will take occasion to insult the Jews' calamity, will please themselves with seeing the temple profaned, and gratify their spite with viewing Jerusalem in a forlorn condition (see Lam. ii. 16). "To look upon our enemies," is to behold their fall with delight (compare vii. 10, and see the note upon Obad. ver. 12).

Ver. 12.] They are ignorant of God's purpose, which is to punish them with an entire destruction, after he hath executed his judgments upon his own people (see Jer. xxv. 27—29). Great calamities are compared to the thrashing of corn in a floor (see the following verse, and note upon Isa. xxi. 10).

Ver. 13. Arise and thresh, O daughter of Zion: for I will make thine horn iron, and—thy hoofs brass.] The expressions allude to the manner of treading out the corn in the eastern countries, which was by the feet of oxen (see Deut. xxv. 4): so the word horn is equivalent to the hoofs which follow. The words, as they relate to Zion, may be expounded in a spiritual sense, of bringing in the gentiles to the obedience of Christ (see following note). Or else we may suppose this promise will be fulfilled, when all the enemies of the church shall be subdued, and the saints reigning with Christ "shall have power over the nations, and shall rule (the refractory) with a rod of iron," Rev. ii. 26, 27 (compare this text with v. 8, 15 of this prophecy, and with Isa. xiv. 2, xli. 15, lx. 12, xli. 5, and see the notes upon those places).

I will consecrate their gain unto the Lord.] This denotes the conversion of the gentiles, which is elsewhere expressed by their bringing gifts and offerings to God's temple; because that was the most solemn part of religious worship practised among the Jews (see Ps. lxxviii. 29, Isa. lviii. 7, xxiii. 18, lx. 6, 9, and compare Rev. xxi. 24, 26). The word translated consecrate, properly signifies to devote, and alludes to the action of conquerors, who use to dedicate part of their booty to God, as a thankful acknowledgment for their victory.

CHAPTER V.

1 Now gather thyself in troops, O daughter of troops: he hath laid siege against us: they shall smite the judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek.

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet, that he may comfort the Jews under the calamities foretold in the last chapter, foretells the birth of Christ, whose kingdom should at last become victorious over all its enemies.

2 But thou, Beth-lehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting.

3 Therefore will he give them up, until the time that she which travaileth hath brought forth: then the remnant of his brethren shall return unto the children of Israel.

Ver. 1. O daughter of troops:] This verse is to be understood of some foreign invasion of Judea, by a nation that had numerous troops; and may relate to the conquest of Judea by the Babylonians. The "daughter of troops" is a phrase of the same kind with the "daughter of affliction;" i. e. one that is surrounded with affliction; so "the son of death" is one condemned to die, 1 Sam. xx. 31, Ps. cii. 20.

They shall smite the judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek.] This may be understood of Zedekiah, who was treated in a contumelious manner by the Babylonians, as a common captive (2 Kings xxv. 6, 7). Smiting on the cheek, signifies treating one in a despightful manner, Lam. iii. 31, Matt. v. 39. "The judge of Israel" is equivalent to "the king of Israel" (see Amos ii. 5).

Ver. 2. But thou, Beth-lehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah.] Ephrath, or Ephratah, was another name for Beth-lehem in the tribe of Judah (see Gen. xxxv. 19). And both names are joined together, to distinguish it from another Beth-lehem, situate in the tribe of Zebulun, mentioned Josh. xix. 15. It is called "little among the thousands," i. e. among the families, or cities of Judah (compare Judg. vi. 15, 1 Sam. x. 19). The expression is taken from the first division of the people into thousands, hundreds, and other subordinate divisions (see Exod. xviii. 21, 25). Both the city and family of David were in a mean condition at the time of Christ's birth; whereupon the blessed Virgin, in her song, thankfully commemorates God's extraordinary favour, in honouring that low estate to which they were reduced, with the birth of the Messiah (Luke i. 48, 52, 53.)

But the word tsair, "little," hath likewise a contrary signification, as many Hebrew words have (see the note upon Isa. xii. 17), and signifies one of note or esteem; in which sense it is taken by the Chaldee paraphrast upon Jer. xlviii. 4, and by some copies of the LXX. Zech. xiii. 7 (see Dr. Pocock, in his notes upon Porta Mosis, cap. 2, p. 18, 19). And in this sense St. Matthew understands the text, and translates it, "Art not the least among the princes of Judah," ii. 6.

Yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel:] The scribes and pharisees understood this prophecy of the birth of the Messiah, as appears from Matt. ii. 5, 6, and so did the generality of the Jews of that age, who speak of it as an undoubted truth, that "Christ was to come of the seed of David, and of the town of Beth-lehem, where David was" (John vii. 42.) The Chaldee agrees with their sentiments, and expressly applies the prophecy to the Messiah: and our Lord was born at Beth-lehem, by an especial act of providence, that this prophecy might plainly be fulfilled in him (see Luke ii. 4), "to come forth" is the same as to be born (see Gen. x. 14, xvii. 6, xxv. 25, 1 Chron. ii. 53, Isa. xi. 1).

Whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting.] The words do naturally import an original, distinct from the birth of Christ, mentioned in the foregoing sentence: which is here declared to be from all eternity: for so the word mikkedem (translated here "from of old," but rendered "from everlasting," Hab. i. 12) and mine olam, "from the days of eternity," do plainly signify (see Ps. lv. 19, xc. 2, Prov. viii. 23). If we expound it with the Chaldee paraphrast, "Whose name was foretold of old," the expression contains a plain description of the Messiah.

4 ¶ And he shall stand and feed in the strength of the LORD, in the majesty of the name of the LORD his God; and they shall abide: for now shall he be great unto the ends of the earth.

5 And this man shall be the peace, when the Assyrian shall come into our land: and when he shall tread in our palaces, then shall we raise against him seven shepherds, and eight principal men.

Ver. 3. Therefore will he give them up, until the time that she which travaileth hath brought forth.] The particle laken, translated therefore, should be rendered nevertheless, here, and in some other places; as Dr. Pocock hath observed upon the place: and see the note upon Isa. xxx. 18. Notwithstanding the promise of so great a blessing, God will give up his people into the hands of their enemies, or leave them to be exercised with troubles and afflictions, till the appointed time of their deliverance cometh, which shall be greater than that from Babylon (see iv. 10). This deliverance may be understood of the church's bringing forth children by the preaching of the gospel (see Gal. iv. 27): but will be more fully completed in the general restoration of the Jewish nation, to be expected in the latter ages (compare Isa. lxvi. 7, 8).

Then the remnant of his brethren shall return unto the children of Israel.] Or, shall be converted with the children of Israel" (see note upon Mal. iv. 6). Then the remnant of the dispersed Jews (see the note upon iv. 7), upon their conversion, shall join themselves to the true Israelites, and make one church with them. Both the LXX. and Chaldee read, "The remnant of their brethren." But if we follow the present Hebrew, we may understand it of the believers that shall be added to the church, for Christ vouchsafes to call all believers his brethren (see Matt. xii. 50, Heb. ii. 11).

Ver. 4. He shall stand and feed [or, rule] in the strength of the Lord, &c.] Christ shall diligently perform the office of a shepherd or governor over his church (compare vii. 14): and it will appear by the success which attends him, that God is with him, and is "glorified in and by him" (John xiii. 31, 32). For his kingdom shall extend itself all the world over (Ps. ii. 8), and his faithful servants shall continue secure under his protection.

Instead of the verb yashalu, "they shall abide," the Chaldee and Vulgar Latin read, yashubu, "they shall be converted," or return from their captivity; which agrees very well with the sense of the verse foregoing.

For now shall he be great unto the ends of the earth.] The words of the angel, Luke i. 32, allude to this text, "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest," &c. He is dignified with such titles as were never given to any creature, as the apostle at large proves, Heb. i. 4, &c. (compare Isa. lii. 13, and see note there).

Ver. 5. This man shall be the peace.] This title in a peculiar manner belongs to the Messiah, and is spoken of as a blessing attending his kingdom (see Ps. lxxii. 7, Isa. ii. 4, ix. 6, 7, xi. 6, Hag. ii. 9, Zech. ix. 10, Luke ii. 14, Eph. ii. 14, Heb. vii. 2). This

6 And they shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword, and the land of Nimrod in the entrances thereof: thus shall he deliver us from the Assyrian, when he cometh into our land, and when he treadeth within our borders.

7 And the remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as a dew from the Lord, as the showers upon the grass, that tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men.

8 ¶ And the remnant of Jacob shall be among the Gentiles in the midst of many people as a lion among the beasts of the forest, as a young lion among the flocks of sheep: who, if he go through, both treadeth down, and teareth in pieces, and none can deliver.

9 Thine hand shall be lifted up upon thine adversaries, and all thine enemies shall be cut off.

sentence may be best explained as coherent with the former verse.

When the Assyrian shall come into our land:] I take the sense which Mr. Mede hath given to this passage to be most agreeable to the scope and design of the following part of the chapter. See his Works, p. 796, where he expounds the place of the general destruction of some remarkable enemy, or enemies, to God and his truth, which should come to pass before the consummation of all things: an event foretold in several places of scripture (see Ps. cx. 5, 6, Isa. xxvi. 20, 21, xxxiv. 1, &c., lxvi. 16, Jer. xxx. 7, 10, Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix., Joel iii. 9, 14, Obad. ver. 15, &c., Zeph. iii. 8, Hag. ii. 22, Zech. xii. 1, xiv. 8, Rev. xix. 19, xx. 9). This enemy is probably called by the name of the Assyrian by Isaiah, xiv. 25, as well as by Micah here (see the note upon that place). Mr. Mede ingeniously conjectures, that this name was given him by these two prophets, because that ever since the invasion of Sennacherib, the very name of Assyrian carried terror along with it, being esteemed by the Jews as their most formidable enemy.

Then shall we raise up against him seven shepherds, and eight principal men.] Or, rulers. Under his conduct we shall be furnished with commanders sufficient to oppose the enterprises of the enemy. Shepherds are elsewhere equivalent to princes or generals (see Jer. vi. 3, xxv. 34, Nah. iii. 15). The words seven and eight are used for an indefinite number (see Eccles. xi. 2): so once and twice, six and seven, are used, Job xxxiii. 14, v. 19, Prov. vi. 16.

Ver. 6. They shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword, and [or, even] the land of Nimrod In its borders, where its garrisons are, and its chief strength lies. Assyria is called "the land of Nimrod," because he was the first king of that country, as appears from Gen. x. 2, where the marginal reading rightly translates the text, "Out of that land he (i. e. Nimrod, spoken of ver. 9) went out into Assyria," or invaded and conquered it; as the phrase went forth, commonly signifies (see Ps. lx. 10, Zech. xiv. 3).

Ver. 7. The remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many people as a dew That remnant, mentioned ver. 3, and iv. 7, shall be the instruments of converting those gentiles among whom they live (see notes upon Isa. lxvi. 12, 19): and thereupon may fitly be represented by the dews and rains which come from heaven, and are the means of making the earth fruitful (compare Deut. xxxii. 2, Ps. lxxii. 6, Hos. vi. 3).

That tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons

VOL. III 95

10 And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the Lord, that I will cut off thy horses out of the midst of thee, and I will destroy thy chariots;

11 And I will cut off the cities of thy land, and throw down all thy strong holds:

12 And I will cut off witchcraft out of thine hand; and thou shalt have no more soothsayers:

13 Thy graven images also will I cut off, and thy standing images out of the midst of thee: and thou shalt no more worship the work of thine hands.

14 And I will pluck up thy groves out of the midst of thee: so will I destroy thy cities.

15 And I will execute vengeance in anger and fury upon the heathen, such as they have not heard.

of men.] The dews and the rains are the gift of God (see Isa. lv. 10, Jer. xiv. 22), and are spoken of here, by way of distinction from those fountains and canals of water, which men convey into their fields and gardens by their own industry (compare Deut. xi. 10, 11). [Some of the rabbins apply the text to the birth of the Messiah, spoken of ver. 2, who shall be born, not in the ordinary way of generation, but by the miraculous power of God (see the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity, ch. 4, sect. 2). To the same sense we may probably interpret, Ps. cx. 3, "The dew of thy birth is of the womb of the morning."

Ver. 8.] The former verse described the benefits the converted Jews should bring to those gentiles that were disposed to embrace the gospel: this instructs us how terrible adversaries they will prove to such as persist in their enmity to them and to the truth (compare Obad. ver. 18, 19, Zech. xii. 6, and see the note upon ver. 5, of this chapter).

Ver. 10, 11.] I will afford deliverance to my people, not in the ordinary way of second causes, but immediately by myself; so that they shall not need to trust in the strength of their forces or of their garrisons (compare Hos. i. 7, Zech. ix. 10).

Ver. 12—14.] The prophet may be supposed to mention here those sins wherein the Jews of his own age were chiefly faulty, thereby to signify, that, in aftertimes, when the promises here mentioned should be fulfilled, such offences should not be found among them (compare Isa. ii. 6—8, with the context here). We may in general take notice, that the destruction of idolatry is often mentioned in the prophets as a principal circumstance in their descriptions of the flourishing state of the church, which should come to pass in aftertimes (see the note upon Isa. i. 29). This appears to have been the sentiment of the ancient Jews, from that passage in Tobit, xiv. 6, where, speaking of the times of the Messias, he saith, "All nations shall turn and fear the Lord truly, and shall bury their idols." No nation has been more addicted to the several sorts of divination than the Jews, both in ancient and modern times (see Juvenal, Sat. vi. ver. 545, and the note upon Mal. iii. 5): and several of them comply with the idolatries practised in those countries where they are dispersed. See the note upon Zech. xiii. 2, where there is the same prediction of the utter abolishing of idolatry among them.

Ver. 15.] When I have purged my people from their corruptions, I will severely vindicate their cause, to the utter destruction of all their unbelieving enemies (see the notes upon ver. 5, 8).

CHAPTER VI.

1 HEAR ye now what the LORD saith; Arise, contend thou before the mountains, and let the hills hear thy voice.

2 Hear ye, O mountains, the LORD's controversy, and ye strong foundations of the earth: for the LORD hath a controversy with his people, and he will plead with Israel.

3 O my people, what have I done unto thee? and wherein have I wearied thee? testify against me.

4 For I brought thee up out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed thee out of the house of servants; and I sent before thee Moses, Aaron, and Miriam.

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter relates to the prophet's own time; wherein he first upbraids the people for their ingratitude towards God: then he instructs them in the true way of performing acceptable service to him: lastly, he reproves them for their injustice and idolatry, and tells them that these sins are the cause of their being unsuccessful in all their undertakings.

Ver. 1.] God often appeals to inanimate creatures for the justice of his proceedings, thereby to upbraid the stupidity of men (see i. 2, Deut. iv. 26, xxxiii. 1, Ps. l. 4, Isa. i. 2).

Ver. 2.] He will enter into judgment with them for their impieties, as being injurious to his honour, and for which his justice demands satisfaction (see Hos. iv. 1).

Ver. 3.] The words allude to the forms of courts of justice, wherein actions are tried between man and man. God allows his people to offer any plea in their own behalf, and demands what injustice he hath done them, and what grievances they can complain of, either in the laws or the rules of worship which he hath prescribed them (compare Jer. ii. 5, 31).

Ver. 4.] On the other side, God puts them in mind of the great favours he had bestowed upon them, in delivering them out of the Egyptian bondage, by the conduct of Moses, Aaron, and Miriam their sister, who is here mentioned as having been endued with the spirit of prophecy, and by whom upon some occasions God made known his will to the Israelites (see Exod. xv. 20, Numb. xii. 2).

Ver. 5. Remember now what Balak king of Moab consulted,] Remember how Balak sent for Balaam to curse Israel, and he, contrary to his own intentions, blessed them (see Numb. xxiv. 10—12).

From Shittim unto Gilgal; that ye may know the righteousness of the Lord.] To make the sense perfect, we must supply it from the beginning of the verse, as the Chaldee paraphrast doth, "Remember what I have done for you from Shittim unto Gilgal;" i. e. from your encamping in the plains of Moab near Shittim, by Jordan (see Numb. xxii. 1, compared with xxxiii. 48, 49): where you continued till you passed over that river, and encamped in Gilgal in the land of Canaan (see Josh. ii. 1, compared with iv. 19). If you duly consider these things, you will be convinced of God's great goodness to you, and of his faithfulness in fulfilling the promises made to your fathers.

A learned prelate, in his defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, p. 290, supposes the 5 O my people, remember now what Balak king of Moab consulted, and what Balaam the son of Beor answered him from Shittim unto Gilgal; that ye may know the righteousness of the LORD.

6 ¶ Wherewith shall I come before the LORD, and bow myself before the high God? shall I come before him with burnt-offerings, with calves of a year old?

7 Will the LORD be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?

8 He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good phrase, "From Shittim to Gilgal," to be a proverbial expression, for a sudden change of an enemy's wicked passions and designs." And then the words will imply thus much:—Remember how I would not suffer Balaam, though when led to it by his inclinations and interests, to curse you, though he removed from one place to another, to find a seasonable time and prospect for his enchantments, and surveyed the army of Israel, going over them with his eye, from Shittim where they lay encamped, to the utmost extremity of them over against Gilgal, or Jericho, by Jordan (see Josh. iii. 1, compared with iv. 19). "But the Lord thy God made him turn his curse into a blessing," Deut. xxiii. 5.

Ver. 6. Wherewith shall I come before the Lord,] After this reproof of the people's ingratitude, they are introduced by the prophet, as anxiously inquisitive how they may propitiate God's displeasure, and avert his judgments. They declare themselves, in the following verse, ready to offer any expiatory sacrifices, though never so costly, for that purpose.

Shall I come before him with burnt-offerings,] Will God accept of the ordinary sacrifices, such as we offered upon other occasions as an atonement for sin (see Lev. iv. 3, ix. 2).

Ver. 7. With thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil?] Or doth he expect a more costly sacrifice? We are ready, if that will appease him, to offer up to him thousands of rams, and to add in proportion meat-offerings prepared with oil (see Lev. ii. 1, 4, 15); though it should cost us an unmeasurable quantity of that liquor (compare Job xxix. 6).

Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, &c.] They farther declare themselves ready to sacrifice their first-born, though looked upon as the strength and stay of their family, if that would appease God's wrath, and procure their pardon. Such inhuman sacrifices several of the idolatrous Jews offered up to their idols; for which they are severely reproved by the prophets (see 2 Kings xvi. 3, xxi. 6, Jer. vii. 31, xix. 5, Ezek. xvi. 20, 21, xxiii. 37).

These two verses are an exact description of the temper of hypocrites and habitual sinners, who hope to obtain God's favour by performing the external duties of religion; and are willing to purchase their own pardon upon any terms but that of reforming their lives.

Ver. 8. He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good;] Both the dictates of reason, and the laws of God, sufficiently inform men what are the substantial parts of their duty; viz. the practice of justice and mercy, and a reverent behaviour towards God, and looking up to him as our Lord and maker. This is a more and what doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?

9 The LORD's voice crieth unto the city, and the man of wisdom shall see thy name: hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it.

10 ¶ Are there yet the treasures of wickedness in the house of the wicked, and the scant measure that is abominable?

11 Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances, and with the bag of deceitful weights?

12 For the rich men thereof are full of violence, and the inhabitants thereof have spoken lies, and their tongue is deceitful in their mouth.

13 Therefore also will I make thee sick in acceptable service than the most costly sacrifices (compare Deut. x. 12, 13, 1 Sam. xv. 22, Isa. i. 11, &c., Hos. vi. 6).

Ver. 9. The Lord's voice crieth unto the city,] The exhortations God hath given you by his prophets are chiefly directed to the city of Jerusalem and its principal inhabitants, whose injustice and oppression of their neighbours cry aloud for vengeance.

The man of wisdom shall see thy name:] He that is truly wise will easily discover God's authority in such a message. Wisdom, in the Hebrew, is here put for the wise man, the abstract being often used for the concrete: so righteousness signifies the righteous man, Isa. xli. 2. Some translate the sentence thus, "They will learn wisdom [or, shall obtain salvation] who fear thy name." The derivatives from yare, to fear, and raar, to see, are often used promiscuously in the Hebrew language.

Hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it.] Hear what severe judgments are threatened against your sins, and who it is that threatens them, and is able to put them in execution.

Ver. 10.] Notwithstanding all the exhortations and reproofs given you upon this subject, still there are many that use unjust and fraudulent means to enrich themselves, and keep scant measures to sell their goods by, which the law of God often declares to be an abomination to him (see Lev. xix. 35, 36, Deut. xxv. 13, 16, Prov. xi. 1, xx. 10). The word translated measure is ephah in the Hebrew; so the reproof is the same with that of Amos, viii. 5, where he charges the tradesmen with making the ephah small (see the note there).

Ver. 12.] See Hos. xii. 7.

Ver. 13.] The punishment wherewith I will afflict thee shall waste thy strength, like a consuming sickness, which preys upon the vitals.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt eat, but not be satisfied;] Either thy food shall not give thee due nourishment, or else thou shalt not have enough to satisfy a craving appetite.

Thy casting down shall be in the midst of thee:] The miseries that bring thee low, shall be like an incurable disease in thy bowels (see ver. 13).

Thou shalt take hold, but shalt not deliver;] Whatever advantages thou shalt make by thy industry, or whatever thou shalt gain by conquest, thou shalt smiting thee, in making thee desolate because of thy sins.

14 Thou shalt eat, but not be satisfied; and thy casting down shall be in the midst of thee; and thou shalt take hold, but shalt not deliver; and that which thou deliverest will I give up to the sword:

15 Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap; thou shalt tread the olives, but thou shalt not anoint thee with oil; and sweet wine, but shalt not drink wine.

16 ¶ For the statutes of Omri are kept, and all the works of the house of Ahab, and ye walk in their counsels; that I should make thee a desolation, and the inhabitants thereof an hissing: therefore ye shall bear the reproach of my people.

not be able to keep it, but it shall become a prey to thine enemies. A contrary form of speech we read in Isaiah, v. 29, where the prophet, speaking how successful the attempts of their enemies should be, saith, "They shall lay hold of the prey, and shall carry it away safe, and none shall deliver it," or retake it. The rabbins generally interpret the text here to this sense: Thou shalt conceive seed, but shall not be safely delivered of the child; or, if thou be, it shall be slain by the enemy. The verb palat, here used, is spoken of cattle which are safely delivered of their young (Job xxi. 20).

Ver. 15.] Thou shalt not enjoy the fruits of thy labours: a curse often threatened for their disobedience (see Deut. xxviii. 38, 39, Amos v. 2, Zeph. i. 13).

Ver. 16. For the statutes of Omri are kept, and all the works of the house of Ahab,] It is said of Omri, that he "did worse than all that were before him," 1 Kings xvi. 25, and his son Ahab added the worship of Baal to the idolatry of the golden calves, ibid. ver. 32, which is spoken of there as the worse degree of idolatry, because it was the introducing a heathen idol; whereas the golden calves were only an idolatrous representation of the true God. Manasseh followed Ahab in his wickedness (see 2 Kings xxi. 3).

The inhabitants thereof an hissing:] The subject of scorn and derision to their enemies (see 1 Kings ix. 8, Jer. xviii. 16, Lam. ii. 15).

Ye shall bear the reproach of my people.] The prophet still directs his discourse to the great and rich men (ver. 12, 15), and tells them, that since they have given the chief occasion to those reproaches, which unbelievers have thrown out upon God's people, as if they were rejected and cast off by him, therefore they shall bear the principal share of that shame and contempt wherewith their enemies shall treat them (compare Ps. xlii. 10, Isa. xxv. 8). The LXX. read, "The reproach of the people;" to the same sense with those words of Ps. lxxxix. 50, 51, "I bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people, wherewith thine enemies have reproached—" Buxtorf, in his Vindiciæ contra Capellum, shows this interpretation to agree with the Hebrew, supposing the word ammi to stand for ammim in the plural; of which syntax he alleges several instances.

CHAPTER VII.

1 WOE is me! I am: as when they have gathered the summer fruits, as the grape-gleanings of the vintage: there is no cluster to eat: my soul desired the first-ripe fruit.

2 The good man is perished out of the earth: and there is none upright among men: they all lie in wait for blood; they hunt every man his brother with a net.

3 ¶ That they may do evil with both hands earnestly, the prince asketh, and the judge asketh for a reward; and the great man, he uttereth his mischievous desire: so they wrap it up.

4 The best of them is a brier: the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge: the day of thy watchmen and thy visitation cometh; now shall be their perplexity.

5 ¶ Trust ye not in a friend, put ye not confidence in a guide: keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom.

6 For the son dishonoureth the father, the daughter riseth up against her mother, the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law; a man's enemies are the men of his own house.

7 Therefore I will look unto the LORD; I will wait for the God of my salvation: my God will hear me.

8 ¶ Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy: when I fall, I shall arise; when I sit in darkness, the LORD shall be a light unto me.

9 I will bear the indignation of the LORD, because I have sinned against him, until he plead my cause, and execute judgment for me: he will bring me forth to the light, and I shall behold his righteousness.

10 Then she that is mine enemy shall see it, and shame shall cover her which said unto me, Where is the LORD thy God? mine eyes shall behold her: now shall she be trodden down as the mire of the streets.

11 In the day that thy walls are to be built, in that day shall the decree be far removed.

12 In that day also he shall come even to the

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet, speaking in the person of the church, laments the decay of piety, and growth of wickedness; possessing her soul in patience by faith, she foresees her future restoration in the latter times; a subject with which most of the minor prophets conclude their prophecies.

Ver. 1. I am as when they have gathered the summer fruits, &c.] Good men are become like a gleaner after the harvest or vintage, scarce two or three to be found after the most diligent search (compare Isa. xvii. 6, xxiv. 13).

My soul desired the first-ripe fruit.] It would be the same refreshment to me to meet with a truly pious man, as it is to a thirsty traveller to find the early fruits in the summer season (compare Isa. xxviii. 4, Hos. ix. 10).

Ver. 2. The good man is perished out of the earth:] The same complaints we find in other holy writers, lamenting the scarcity of good men, and the increase of the wicked (see Ps. xii. 1, xiv. 2, &c., Isa. lviii. 1).

They hunt every man his brother] They make a prey of their neighbours, and even of their friends and nearest relations (see Hab. i. 14, 15).

Ver. 3. That they may do evil with both hands earnestly,] The words may be translated, "That they may prepare their hands for committing evil:" the verb herib sometimes signifies to fit or prepare (see Exod. xxx. 7, Hos. x. 1).

The prince asketh, &c.] See iii. 11.

So they wrap it up.] The prince, the judge, and the great man, agreeing in their ill designs, make a three-fold cord of iniquity: or they twist one sin upon another, the latter to maintain or cover the former. The Chaldee renders it, "So they deprave or pervert it;" i. e. the soul, or mind; which word is found in the Hebrew of the foregoing sentence.

Ver. 4. The best of them is a brier: the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge:] Those that have the fairest character among them are set upon mischief. Sinners are elsewhere compared to briars and thorns, both upon the account of their unfruitfulness, and because of their hurtful qualities (see notes upon Isa. ix. 18, lv. 13, and compare 2 Sam. xxiii. 6, 7, Heb. vi. 8).

The day of thy watchmen and thy visitation cometh;] The time of vengeance is coming, which hath been foretold by the prophets of former times, as well as the present; called here watchmen, as they are by Ezekiel, iii. 7, and by Hosea, ix. 8, then God will visit for all the sins thou hast committed against him. Watchmen may signify magistrates, as well as prophets (see note upon Isa. lvi. 10): and then the words import the time when God will call both princes and prophets to account for their unfaithfulness in the discharge of their several offices (see iii. 11).

Ver. 7.] The church here expresses her confidence in God alone, since no trust can be placed in man.

Ver. 8, 9.] Let not the enemies of God and his truth insult over me, as if he had utterly forsaken me (see ver. 10, Ps. lxxix. 10). After he hath chastened me for my sins, which I will patiently bear, out of a just sense of my demerits, he will deliver me out of my low and desolate condition, and will cause the light of his countenance to shine upon me, and plead the cause of his oppressed truth (compare Ps. xxvii. 1). This was in some degree fulfilled in their deliverance from the captivity (see ver. 11, and compare iv. 10).

Ver. 10.] As the heathen beheld the desolations of God's church and temple with delight (see iv. 11): so it shall come to my turn to see God's judgments executed upon the Babylonish empire, and that brought down to as low a condition as ever they had reduced God's people (see Isa. li. 26, and compare with the latter part of the sentence, 2 Sam. xxii. 43, Zech. x. 5).

Ver. 11.] When God shall visit his people, and repair their decayed estate (compare Amos. ix. 11), then the tyrannical edicts of their persecutors shall be utterly abolished. This may partly relate to the recalling those edicts which put a stop to the rebuilding the city and temple of Jerusalem (see Ezra iv. 23, 24, vi. 14, Neh. ii. 8, 17).

Ver. 12. In that day] The phrase signifies in the prophets some remarkable time prefixed by God for restoring the Jews' affairs, or some other signal events from Assyria, and from the fortified cities, and from the fortress even to the river, and from sea to sea, and from mountain to mountain.

13. Notwithstanding the land shall be desolate because of them that dwell therein, for the fruit of their doings.

14. ¶ Feed thy people with thy rod, the flock of thine heritage, which dwell solitarily in the wood, in the midst of Carmel: let them feed in Bashan and Gilead, as in the days of old.

of providence (see note upon Isa. iv. 2, and the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity, p. 168).

He shall come even to thee from Assyria, and from the fortified cities, &c.] By the single person he, is meant the people, or the dispersion of Israel: so the Chaldee paraphrast understands it (see ver. 15). I observed in my notes upon Isa. xix. 6, that this text might more perspicuously be translated thus, "He shall come unto thee from Assyria even to the cities of Egypt, and from Egypt even to the river [Euphrates]:" the word matzor, fortress, likewise signifying Egypt; as Bochart observes, Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 24. The words imply, that the Jews shall return from their several dispersions whither they were scattered: this the prophets elsewhere express by their return from Assyria and Egypt (see Isa. xi. 15, 16, xix. 23—25, xxvii. 13, Hos. xi. 11, Zech. v. 10, 11). Jeremish compares the captivity of the ten tribes, who were carried away by Shalmaneser into Assyria, to the bondage of their forefathers in Egypt, and promises them a like deliverance, Jer. xxi. 14, xxiii. 7, 8. This may be the reason of joining Egypt and Assyria together in the forementioned texts: though it be also true, that about the time of Shalmaneser's invasion, many of the Jews fled for refuge into Egypt; as appears from Hos. vii. 16, viii. 13, ix. 3, 6.

Ver. 13. Notwithstanding the land shall be desolate, &c.] The marginal reading is to be preferred, After that the land hath been desolate, &c. The words import, that the general restoration of the Jews shall not be brought to pass till after their land hath lain desolate for some ages, as a testimony of God's displeasure against its ancient inhabitants for their sins, especially that heinous one of rejecting the Messias.

For the fruit of their doings.] The miseries, which are the effects of men's sins, are called the fruit of their ways, or doings (see Prov. i. 31, Jer. xxi. 14).

Ver. 14. Feed thy people with thy rod.] The words contain the prophet's earnest wish or prayer to God that he would send the Messias to perform the office of the good shepherd, in feeding or protecting his flock, the remnant of the "true Israelites, in the age of renovation;" as the Chaldee paraphrase explains it; i. e. in the times of the Messias, when "all things shall become new." The prophets describe the Messias under the character of a shepherd (see above, v. 4, Isa. xl. 11, xlix. 10, Ezek. xxxiv. 23).

Which dwell solitarily.] The expression may relate to the state of the Jews in their dispersions, where they are preserved separate from, and unmixed with, the several nations whither they are scattered. But I rather believe the expression is borrowed from Numb. xxiii. 9, and Dent. xxxiii. 28, where Israel is described as dwelling alone; so our translators render the word badad in both those texts; i. e. in a large and plentiful country, secure under the divine protection, without standing in need of foreign alliances. In this sense the words relate to their nature, happiness and security (compare Jer. xxiii.).

15 According to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt will I shew unto him marvelous things.

16 ¶ The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might: they shall lay their hand upon their mouth, their ears shall be deaf.

17 They shall lick the dust like a serpent, they shall move out of their holes like worms of the earth: they shall be afraid of the Lord our God, and shall fear because of thee.

In the wood, in the midst of Carmel;] The same place is called "the forest of Carmel," Isa. xxxvii. 24, and spoken of there as a place remarkable for its fruitfulness: compare Isa. x. 18, xxxv. 2, where our translation reads, "The glory of his forest and his fruitful field," or his Carmel, as it is in the original. Bashan, which follows here, and Carmel, are joined together as the most fruitful parts of Judea, Isa. xxxiii. 9, Nah. i. 4.

Let them feed in Bashan and Gilead, as in the days of old.] These countries were noted for their rich and fat pastures (see Numb. xxxii. 1, 33, Deut. xxxii. 14). The expressions denote, that the Jews shall enjoy full and free possession of their land after their return to it, with the same security and happiness with which they possessed it, in their most flourishing state, under the reigns of David and Solomon (see 1 Kings iv. 25, compare Zech. x. 10). We are likewise to suppose these temporal blessings to be emblems and figures of the spiritual benefits conveyed by the gospel (compare Isa. lxxv. 10, Jer. l. 19, Zeph. iii. 13, and see the notes there).

Ver. 15.] The words are an answer to the prophet's prayer in the foregoing verse; wherein God tells him, that the wonders he will perform in bringing back his people into their own country, shall be as conspicuous as those which he showed in their deliverance out of Egypt, and giving them the first possession of it. The sense is equivalent to that of Ps. lxxviii. 22, "The Lord hath said, I will bring my people again as I did from Bashan; I will bring my people again from the depths of the sea."

Ver. 16. The nations shall see and be confounded at all their might.] The heathen shall feel the same confusion as men do under a great disappointment, when they shall see that power and force defeated, which they had gathered together to oppose God's people, and hinder them from enjoying the quiet possession of their land (see Ezek. xxxviii. 8, &c.). Others understand their might of the might and power of God's people, whom no force will be able to withstand (see v. 8).

They shall lay their hand upon their mouth, their ears shall be deaf.] The evident tokens of a divine presence with his people shall stop the mouths of their adversaries, so that they shall be struck dumb with admiration and astonishment (see Job xxi. 5, xxix. 9, Isa. lli. 15). They shall hardly believe their own ears, when they hear those wonderful works which God hath wrought for them.

Ver. 17. They shall lick the dust like a serpent.] The enemies of God's people shall be very bumble and submissive, and ready to fall down at their feet (compare Ps. lxxii. 9, Rev. iii. 9, Isa. xlix. 23, lx. 14, and see the notes there). To the same sense we may understand those words of Isa. lxxv. 25, "Dust shall be the serpent's meat:" where the prophet applies the curse threatened to the serpent, Gen. iii. 14, to the times of the millennium; as if then that curse should be completely fulfilled, when the righteous should have an entire victory over Satan and all his offspring, and tread them under their 18 Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage? he retaineth not his anger for ever, because he delighteth in mercy.

19 He will turn again, he will have compassion upon us; he will subdue our iniquities; and thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea.

20 Thou wilt perform the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham, which thou hast sworn unto our fathers from the days of old.

feet, so as never to rise up again to annoy them (compare Rom. xvi. 20).
They shall move out of their holes like worms of the earth:] They shall be afraid to stir out of their lurking holes; and, if they creep out like worms, they shall presently hide their heads again (see Ps. xviii. 45).

They shall be afraid of the Lord our God.] When they see almighty God appear so conspicuously in thy favour. The text is parallel to that of Jer. xxxiii. 9, "They shall fear and tremble for all the goodness, and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it."

Ver. 18. Who is a God like unto thee, that—passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage? The "remnant of God's heritage," are those Jews, which are reserved to be partakers of the benefits which shall be made good to that nation, upon their conversion and restoration here spoken of (compare iv. 7, v. 7, 8). God shall then make manifest his mercy towards them, in pardoning all their former stubbornness and disobedience, and receiving them into his former favour, upon their repentance (see Zech. iii. 10, xii. 10, compare Jer. l. 20): thereby fulfilling that gracious declaration he made to Moses, Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7.

He retaineth not his anger for ever, because he delighteth in mercy.] To the same purpose he is said to "blot out men's iniquities, and not remember their sins," to their condemnation, Isa. xliii. 25, "because he delights in mercy," as it follows here; so acts of judgment are called his "strange work," Isa. xxviii. 21, such as he would not put in execution, if they were not necessary for the great ends of government.

Ver. 19. He will turn again, he will have compassion upon us;] Or, "He will again have compassion upon us;" for the verb shub, to turn, is often used adverbially (see the note upon Isa. vi. 13).

Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea.] Thou wilt utterly abolish them, that "they shall not have dominion over us;" as thou didst destroy Pharaoh and his army in the Red sea (Exod. xiv. 13). This victory will be obtained by the merits of Christ, and the grace of the gospel (see Col. ii. 14, Rom. vi. 14).

Ver. 20.] The promises given to Abraham were made "to him, and to his seed after him," Gen. xvii. 8. So the scripture speaks of the blessings bestowed upon the children, as if they were actually made good to their progenitors (see Gen. xlv. 4, Exod. vi. 4). Thus God is said to "perform his truth unto Jacob, and his mercy unto Abraham;" or to "deal mercifully with our fathers," as the sense runs in the original, Luke i. 72, by fulfilling the promises to their posterity, the whole family being reputed one aggregate body. And these promises will receive their final accomplishment in the conversion and restoration of the Jewish nation in the latter times. That people are said to be "beloved for their fathers' sakes," Rom. xi. 28, and therefore we have reason to expect, that the mercies promised to their fathers should, in God's due time, be made good to them: "for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance," Rom. xi. 29.

OF

THE PROPHET NAHUM.

PREFACE.

THE destruction of Nineveh, here prophesied of, is recorded in the book of Tobit, xiv. 15. It is said there to be taken by Nebuchodonosor and Assuerus; which account Archbishop Usher, in his Annals, A. M. 3378, Dr. Prideaux, Scrip. Connex. p. 47, 48, and other learned men, understand of Nabopolassar, father to Nebuchadnezzar (called in the Greek translation Nebuchodonosor), and Cyaxares king of Media, called by Daniel Ahas-uerus, Dan. ix. 1. This remarkable transaction is placed by Dr. Prideaux in the twenty-ninth year of king Josiah, about twenty-four years before the destruction of Jerusalem; and the fixing it to this time exactly agrees with the account given by the heathen historians, Herodotus and others; as St. Jerome has observed in his preface upon Jonah. The Ninevites would not take warning by Jonah's prophecy; so not only Nahum, who probably lived in the reign of Hezekiah, but also Zephaniah, who lived in the time of Josiah, foretold the destruction of Nineveh, ii. 13.

CHAPTER I.

1 THE burden of Nineveh. The book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite.

2 God is jealous, and the LORD revengeth; the LORD revengeth, and is furious; the LORD will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies.

3 The LORD is slow to anger, and great in power, and will not at all acquit the wicked: the LORD hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet.

4 He rebuketh the sea, and maketh it dry, and drieth up all the rivers: Bashan languisheth, and Carmel, and the flower of Lebanon languisheth.

5 The mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, and the earth is burned at his presence, yea, the world, and all that dwell therein.

6 Who can stand before his indignation? and who can abide in the fierceness of his anger? his fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are thrown down by him.

7 The LORD is good, a strong hold in the day of trouble; and he knoweth them that trust in him.

8 But with an overrunning flood he will make an utter end of the place thereof, and darkness shall pursue his enemies.

9 What do ye imagine against the LORD? he will make an utter end: affliction shall not rise up the second time.

10 For while they be folden together as thorns, and while they are drunken as drunkards, they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry.

11 There is one come out of thee, that imagineth evil against the LORD, a wicked counsellor.

12 Thus saith the LORD; though they be quiet, and likewise many, yet thus shall they be cut

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—“The burden of Nineveh” is the title of this prophecy, being the chief subject of it: though this chapter is in the nature of a preface to the succeeding prophecy; setting forth God’s goodness to his people, and his severity towards his enemies. Concerning the sense of the word burden, see note upon Jer. xxiii. 33.

Ver. 1.] The title of Elkoshite is probably taken from the place where he lived. St. Jerome informs us, that there was a village in Galilee called Elkegai; the ruins of which were shown to him, when he travelled over those parts (see the preface to his comment upon Nahum).

Ver. 2.] As he is very jealous of his honour, so he will not fail to execute his judgment on those that affront and dishonour him: and though he doth not always punish sinners immediately, yet he will exercise his severity upon them in due time.

Ver. 3. The Lord is slow to anger and great [rather, although he be great] in power, and [or, but] will not at all acquit the wicked.] The last sentence runs in the Hebrew, nakkeh, lo ye nakkeh; which is capable of a double interpretation, either as our translation renders it, or else it may be translated, “He will utterly destroy:” in which sense it is taken, Exod. xxxiv. 7, Numb. xiv. 18. The sense which our interpreters follow agrees best with the context here (see note upon Jer. xxx. 11).

The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind] An allusion to his coming down upon Sinai, when darkness and tempests surrounded him (see Exod. xix. 16, 18, Deut. v. 22, 23, compare Ps. xviii. 7, xcvii. 2); and he will come again in the same manner to the last judgment; of which, particular judgments are the earnest (see Ps. l. 3, Dan. vii. 13).

Ver. 4.] The rivers and the sea itself are dried up at his rebuke, as the Red sea and Jordan were of old (compare Isa. l. 2, Hab. iii. 8); and the most pleasant and fruitful countries, such as Bashan, Carmel, and Lebanon, are parched up with drought when he is displeased (see Isa. xxxiii. 9, xxxv. 2, Mic. vii. 14).

Ver. 5.] This may likewise allude to God’s coming down upon mount Sinai (compare Exod. xix. 18, Judg. v. 4, Ps. lxxviii. 8, xlvii. 5, Mic. i. 4); or else it may relate to the last judgment, as the following words plainly do (see the note on ver. 3).

Ver. 6.] God is a “consuming fire,” when he comes to execute his judgments, Deut. iv. 24, and as fire is of a sufficient force to dissolve the hardest rocks, so God’s vengeance can humble the most obdurate sinners.

Ver. 7. He knoweth them that trust in him.] i. e. He takes a particular care of them (compare Ps. i. 7, 2 Tim. ii. 19, and see note upon Hos. xiii. 5).

Ver. 8. With an overrunning flood he will make an utter end] An army’s overrunning a country is often compared to an inundation (see Isa. viii. 7, 8, Dan. ix. 26, xi. 10, 20, 40). Thus God will bring the great city of Nineveh to utter ruin, so that there shall be no remains thereof in aftertimes. For the ruins which are to be seen of Mosul, are on the opposite side of the river Tigris.

The place thereof.] The affix or relative plainly relates to Nineveh, against which city this prophecy is directed, ver. 1.

Darkness shall pursue his enemies.] i. e. Ruin and destruction (compare Isa. viii. 22).

Ver. 9. Affliction shall not rise up the second time.] I will make an utter destruction all at once: When I begin, I will also make an end, as it is expressed 2 Sam. iii. 12. The words may be understood with relation to the destruction of Nineveh prophesied of in the following chapters; viz. that at the same time an end should be put to the family which then reigned over Assyria, and the seat of the empire should be translated to Babylon (see the note upon iii. 18).

Ver. 10. For while they be folden together as thorns.] Or, “For as they are folden together like thorns.” The particle ad translated while, may be a term of comparison (see Noldins, p. 668). The destruction of sinners is elsewhere compared to the burning of thorns (see the note upon Isa. ix. 18).

While they are drunken as drunkards.] Compare iii. 11. God’s vengeance is often called the “cup of his fury,” because it deprives men both of strength and reason (see note upon Jer. xxv. 15).

Ver. 11.] This probably is meant of Sennacherib, that uttered so many reproaches and blasphemies against the true God (see ver. 14, 15). Nineveh was one of his royal seats, at the time when Nahum delivered this prophecy.

Ver. 12. Though they be quiet [or rather prosper-down, when he shall pass through. Though I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee no more.

13 For now will I break his yoke from off thee, and will burst thy bonds in sunder.

14 And the LORD hath given a commandment concerning thee, that no more of thy name be sown: out of the house of thy gods will I cut off ous], and likewise many, yet thus shall they be cut down, when he shall pass through.] Though the Assyrians be never so numerous, and puffed up with their prosperous success against Egypt (see the note upon iii. 8); which will encourage Sennacherib to march directly against Jerusalem; yet God shall cut them off at one stroke by his angel, who slew in one night in the camp of the Assyrians one hundred and eighty-five thousand (2 Kings xix. 25). The verb translated pass through, is often used of a hostile invasion (see Isa. viii. 8, Dan. xi. 10, Joel iii. 17). It is taken in that sense, ver. 15 of this chapter, and in both places is to be understood of Sennacherib, the enemy mentioned ver. 11.

I will afflict thee no more.] Rather, "no longer," by Sennacherib or his forces (see ver. 13, 14). So the particle nud is plainly taken, Ezek. xii. 28, Hos. i. 6, (see Noldius, p. 682).

Ver. 13.] Hezekiah and his people shall no longer be tributaries to the king of Assyria, as they have been for a considerable time (see 2 Kings xvi. 17, xviii. 14).

Ver. 14. The Lord hath given a commandment concerning thee, that no more of thy name be sown.] God had decreed that Sennacherib's family should not long preserve their royal state and dignity: his son and successor, Esar-haddon, was now probably at man's estate; for he succeeded his father in a little time after his defeat (2 Kings xix. 37), and reigned with great felicity almost forty years; but his next successor, or the next but one, was dispossessed of his kingdom by Nabopolassar, father to Nebuchadnezzar, whose family enjoyed the empire of Assyria, or Babylon, as it came then to be called, till the conquest by Cyrus (see Dr. Prideaux, under the graven image and the molten image: I will make thy grave; for thou art vile.

15 Behold upon the mountains the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace! O Judah, keep thy solemn feasts, perform thy vows: for the wicked shall no more pass through thee; he is utterly cut off.

the fifteenth and twenty-ninth years of Josiah. Some explain the words thus: "Thou shalt do no more remarkable actions, whereby thy name may be remembered." So the Chaldee understands it.

Out of the house of thy gods will I cut off the graven image] When God executes his judgments upon any heathen prince or nation, he is said to punish the idols of that people, because the conquerors triumph over their idols as well as their worshippers, and bring in their own idols into the room of those they vanquish (see notes upon Isa. xix. 1, xlvii. 1, Jer. 1. 2).

I will make thy grave; for thou art vile.] We may supply the sense from the former sentence. The house of thine idol shall become thy grave, when thou shalt be dishonourably slain by thine own sons (2 Kings xix. 37), as a just punishment for thy blasphemies against the God of Israel (ibid. ver. 6, 16).

Ver. 15. Upon the mountains the feet of him that bringeth good tidings,] The same words are to be found in Isaiah, lii. 6. There they relate to the joyful news of the Jews' return from Babylon, and in a more eminent sense to the glad tidings of the gospel: here they may be fitly understood of the good tidings of the miraculous defeat of Sennacherib's army and the raising of the siege of Jerusalem, which was the consequence of it; to which the following words do plainly relate.

O Judah, keep thy solemn feasts, perform thy vows.] Thou hast now a free access to the temple, to keep the stated feasts with their usual solemnity, and particularly to perform the vows thou madest to God in thy late distress.

For the wicked [or, the wicked one] shall no more pass through thee;] See ver. 9, 12, 14.

CHAPTER II.

1 HE that dasheth in pieces is come up before thy face: keep the munition, watch the way, make thy loins strong, fortify thy power mightily.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—This and the following chapter contain a description of the taking of Nineveh by the Babylonians and Medes (see the note upon i. 1).

Ver. 1. He that dasheth in pieces is come up before thy face:] An enemy that will break down thy walls and destroy thine inhabitants, O Nineveh, is come to besiege thee. The words may be literally translated, "The hammer is come up against thee;" in the same sense as the Chaldeans are called the "hammer of the whole earth," Jer. 1. 23. The original word indeed is not the same in both places, but they are synonymous.

Keep the munition, watch the way,] There is need of thy utmost industry to defend thyself in strengthening the garrisons, and guarding the passes (compare iii. 13, 14).

2 For the LORD hath turned away the excellency of Jacob, as the excellency of Israel: for the emptiers have emptied them out, and marred their vine-branches.

Make thy loins strong, &c.] Stir up all thy strength and courage.

Ver. 2. For the Lord hath turned away the excellency of Jacob, as the excellency of Israel:] Some translate the words thus, "The Lord hath returned [or, will revenge] the pride, or injurious dealings, against Jacob, and the pride against Israel;" i. e. he will requite the injuries and oppressions which Sennacherib and Shalmaneser, the kings of Assyria, have exercised upon Judah and Israel. This interpretation agrees better with the scope of the text, than that which most translators follow, and suits very well with the Hebrew idiom. Compare Joel iii. 19, Hab. ii. 8, 17, Obad. ver. 10, where the second of two substantives is taken in the same sense by our translators.

For the emptiers have emptied them out, and marred their vine-branches.] The Assyrian conquerors have 3 The shield of his mighty men is made red, the valiant men are in scarlet: the chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation, and the fir trees shall be terribly shaken.

4 The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall jostle one against another in the broad ways: they shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightnings.

5 He shall recount his worthies: they shall stumble in their walk; they shall make haste to the wall thereof, and the defence shall be prepared.

6 The gates of the rivers shall be opened, and the palace shall be dissolved.

7 And Huzzab shall be led away captive, she shall be brought up, and her maids shall lead her as with the voice of doves, tabering upon their breasts.

plundered them of all their wealth, and bereaved them of their children, often compared in scripture to branches (see particularly, Gen. xlix. 22, compared with Deut. xxxiii. 17).

Ver. 3. The shield of his mighty men is made red, the valiant men are in scarlet:] This may be understood either of the colour of their shields and clothes when they were made, or of their being dyed in blood afterward (compare Isa. lxiii. 2).

The chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation.] Or, like flaming torches (see the following verse). The Hebrew particles beth and caph, as they are alike in figure, so they are often in signification (see Noldius, p. 162). Thus those words of Isaiah, xlviii. 10, might be best translated, "I have refined thee, but not as silver;" i. e. not with so fierce a fire.

The fir trees shall be terribly shaken.] The spears and lances made of fir, and which were so long and large that they looked like so many trees.

Ver. 4. The chariots shall rage in the streets.] They shall drive furiously against one another: as it follows.

They shall run like the lightnings.] They shall resemble flames or lightning in their swiftness, and their wheels continually striking fire out of the stones and pavements of the streets (see iii. 2).

Ver. 5. He shall recount his worthies: [but] they shall stumble in their walk;] The king of Nineveh shall muster together his choicest troops; but they shall be disordered, and give way, or be discomfited, as they march against the enemy.

They shall make haste to the wall thereof, and the defence shall be prepared.] On the other side, the besiegers shall make their regular approaches towards the walls of Nineveh, and prepare their defences against the assaults of the besieged.

Ver. 6. Be dissolved.] Or, melt. At length the enemies shall possess themselves of all the avenues towards the several streams of the river Tigris, and so become masters of the city. This shall make the heart of the king and all his court to melt for fear, and quite lose all their courage. To this sense the Chaldee paraphrase explains the latter part of the verse.

Ver. 7. Huzzab shall be led away captive, she shall be brought up.] Rather removed, or taken away (compare Jer. xlviii. 15, Ps. cii. 24). By Huzzab, the Chaldee understands the queen of Nineveh; but the word may probably mean Nineveh itself; the word denoting a strong or impregnable fortress.

Her maids shall lead her] Nineveh is described as 8 But Nineveh is of old like a pool of water: yet they shall flee away. Stand, stand, shall they cry; but none shall look back.

9 Take ye the spoil of silver, take the spoil of gold: for there is none end of the store and glory out of all the pleasant furniture.

10 She is empty, and void, and waste: and the heart melteth, and the knees smite together, and much pain is in all loins, and the faces of them all gather blackness.

11 Where is the dwelling of the lions, and the feeding-place of the young lions, where the lion, even the old lion, walked, and the lion's whelp, and none made them afraid?

12 The lion did tear in pieces enough for his whelps, and strangled for his lionesses, and filled his holes with prey, and his dens with ravin.

13 Behold, I am against thee, saith the Lord

a great princess carried captive with her maids of honour attending her, and bewailing her's and their condition, with beating their breasts, and other expressions of lamentation: denoting the lesser cities under their jurisdiction, that should be sharers with her in the same calamity. So Babylon is represented as "a tender and delicate lady," undergoing the hardships of a captivity. Isa. xlviii. 1, 5, 7, 8. As with the voice of doves.] Birds remarkable for their melancholy note (compare Isa. xxxviii. 14, lix. 11).

Ver. 8. But [or, surely] Nineveh is of old like a pool of water:] The words may be translated, "The waters of Nineveh are as a pool of waters;" i. e. as the city is well watered by being situated upon the river Tigris, so it is vastly populous. A multitude is elsewhere compared to many waters (see Jer. li. 13, Rev. xvii. 1, 15). But they shall all flee for fear of the enemy, and run away like water (compare Ps. lviii. 7). The sense in the LXX. of Dr. Grabe's edition runs very clear, if it can be reconciled with the original, "Nineveh is like a pool of water; waters are her wall, or defence."

Stand, stand, shall they cry;] When the commanders bid them stand to their arms, none shall turn back to make head against the enemy, but shall shift for themselves as fast as they can (see ver. 10, xiii. 17).

Ver. 9.] The enemy may easily plunder the city of all its riches and costly furniture, for there is none to make any resistance.

Ver. 10. She is empty—and the heart melteth.] The inhabitants have no heart nor courage to defend themselves (see iii. 13), but leave the city to be plundered and laid waste by the enemy.

The knees smite together, &c.] Expressions of much fear and terrible apprehensions of the approaching evils (compare Jer. xxx. 6, Dan. v. 6, Joel ii. 6).

Ver. 11, 12. Where is the dwelling of the lions, &c.] What is become of the stately palaces of the king and princes of Nineveh, who like so many lions preyed upon the neighbouring countries, and enriched their city with spoils they took from others (compare Job iv. 10, 11, Ps. xxxiv. 10, Ezek. xix. 2, 7).

The lion—strangled for his lionesses, &c.] The lions provide food for the females, till their young ones are able to shift for themselves.

Ver. 13. I will burn her chariots in the smoke.] They shall be destroyed in the fire which consumes the city (see iii. 15).

The sword shall devour thy young lions:]

ver. 12.

of hosts, and I will burn her chariots in the smoke, and the sword shall devour thy young lions: and

I will cut off thy prey from the earth, and the voice of thy messengers shall no more be heard.

The voice of thy messengers shall no more be heard.] Thou shalt no more send ambassadors to distant countries, either to encourage thine allies, or to terrify thine enemies (see Isa. xviii. 2).

CHAPTER III.

1 Woe to the bloody city! it is all full of lies and robbery; the prey departeth not;

2 The noise of a whip, and the noise of the rattling of the wheels, and of the pransing horses, and of the jumping chariots.

3 The horsemen lifteth up both the bright sword and the glittering spear: and there is a multitude of slain, and a great number of carcases; and there is none end of their corpses; they stumble upon their corpses:

4 Because of the multitude of the whoredoms of the wellfavoured harlot, the mistress of witchcrafts, that selleth nations through her whoredoms, and families through her witchcrafts.

5 Behold, I am against thee, saith the LORD of hosts; and I will discover thy skirts upon thy face, and I will shew the nations thy nakedness, and the kingdoms thy shame.

6 And I will cast abominable filth upon thee, and make thee vile, and will set thee as a gazing-stock.

7 And it shall come to pass, that all they that look upon thee shall flee from thee, and say, Nineveh is laid waste: who will bemoan her? whence shall I seek comforters for her?

8 Art thou better than populous No, that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters round about it, whose rampart was the sea, and her wall was from the sea?

9 Ethiopia and Egypt were her strength, and it was infinite; Put and Lubim were thy helpers.

10 Yet was she carried away, she went into

CHAP. III.

See the Argument of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 1. Woe to the bloody city!] Where princes and great men shed innocent blood to enrich themselves with the spoils of the slain (compare Ezek. xxii. 2, 3, xxiv. 6—9).

The prey departeth not;] They are still increasing their conquests by ruin and oppression, till it will come to their own turn to be spoiled and conquered (compare Isa. xxxiii. 1).

Ver. 2.] See ii. 3, 4, and compare Jer. xlvii. 3.

Ver. 4. The wellfavoured harlot,] Great cities are often called harlots, upon the account of those vices which prevail in them, and infect others by their example (see Isa. xxiii. 16.)

The mistress of witchcrafts,] The arts of luxury which are encouraged in such places are called witchcrafts, because they have a sort of charm in them to draw others aside (compare Isa. xlvii. 9, Rev. xviii. 23).

That selleth nations through her whoredoms, and families] That makes whole nations a prey to their enemies, by teaching them the arts of softness, and effeminacy, and so rendering them weak and defenceless. Families are equivalent to kingdoms (see note upon Jer. i. 15, and comp. Amos iii. 2, Zech. xiv. 18).

Ver. 5. I will discover thy skirts] I will send thee into captivity naked and bare (see Isa. xx. 4, 8, xlvii. 2, 3, Jer. xiii. 22, Mic. i. 11). Thus will I expose thy shame to the world; which was a punishment often inflicted upon harlots (see note upon Ezek. xvi. 37).

Ver. 6.] I will deprive thee of all thine ornaments, and will cover thee with shame and reproach, and make a public example of thee. Such was the usage that common prostitutes met with (see Ezek. xxiii. 25, 26).

Ver. 7. All that look upon thee shall flee from thee,] As being affrighted at the sight of thy dismal condition.

Whence shall I seek comforters for her?] An allusion to the lamentations used at funerals, and performed by persons hired for that purpose (see the notes upon Jer. ix. 17, 18, Ezek. xxviii. 2). The words imply, that if we seek for any mourners to perform this office over departing Nineveh, none will be found to do it; every one rejoicing over her destruction.

Ver. 8. Art thou better than populous No,] Which was sacked, and its inhabitants made captives, as it follows. The Hebrew reads, No Ammon; the same city which is called "Hammon No," Ezek. xxx. 15, and "Ammon Minnu," Jer. xlv. 25, where our English reads, the "multitude of No," as it does render it "populous No" here; though the place probably took its name from Ham, the founder of the Egyptian kingdom (thence called the land of Ham," Ps. cvi. 22), who was worshipped there under the name of Jupiter Hammon: accordingly the LXX. render it Diospolis, upon that place of Jeremiah: it was likewise called Thebes by Homer, who describes it as famous for its hundred gates.

That was situate among the rivers,] Which was defended by the river Nile on the one side, and the Red sea on the other, as by so many walls and ramparts.

Ver. 9. Ethiopia and Egypt were her strength,] Dr. Prideaux's Scripture History, under the fifteenth of Hezekiah, with great reason supposes this calamity to have been brought upon No by Sennacherib, about three years before he besieged Jerusalem, in the time of Hezekiah. At that time Sevechus, the son of Sabaccon, or So, mentioned 2 Kings xvii. 4, was king both of Egypt and Ethiopia; so they are mentioned here as confederates, and Isaiah foretells that they should be vanquished by Sargon, or Sennacherib: Isa. xx. 4. Whereas the destruction of No, foretold by Jeremiah, xlv. 25, and Ezekiel, xxx. 14, was, after this, brought to pass by Nebuchadnezzar.

Put and Lubim were thy helpers,] Put or Phut, is rendered Libya by our translators, Ezek. xxx. 5, and the Libyans, Jer. xlv. 9, but this text proves that they were a distinct people. Phut probably denotes Mauritania (see Bochart's Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 33).

Ver. 10. They cast lots for her honourable men,] The conquerors used to cast lots what captives should captivity: her young children also were dashed in pieces at the top of all the streets: and they cast lots for her honourable men, and all her great men were bound in chains.

11 Thou also shalt be drunken: thou shalt be hid, thou also shalt seek strength because of the enemy.

12 All thy strong holds shall be like fig-trees with the first ripe figs: if they be shaken, they shall even fall into the mouth of the eater.

13 Behold, thy people in the midst of thee are women: the gates of thy land shall be set wide open unto thine enemies: the fire shall devour thy bars.

14 Draw thee waters for the siege, fortify thy strong holds: go into clay, and tread the mortar, make strong the brick-kiln.

15 There shall the fire devour thee; the sword shall cut thee off, it shall eat thee up like the cankerworm: make thyself many as the cankerworm, make thyself many as the locusts.

16 Thou hast multiplied thy merchants above the stars of heaven: the cankerworm spoileth, and fleeth away.

17 Thy crowned are as the locusts, and thy captains as the great grasshoppers, which camp in the hedges in the cold day, but when the sun ariseth they flee away, and their place is not known where they are.

18 Thy shepherds slumber, O king of Assyria: thy nobles shall dwell in the dust: thy people is scattered upon the mountains, and no man gathereth them.

19 There is no healing of thy bruise; thy wound is grievous: all that hear the bruit of thee shall clap the hands over thee: for upon whom hath not thy wickedness passed continually?

come to each man's share (see Joel iii. 3, Obad. ver. 11).

Ver. 11. Thou also shalt be drunken;] See i. 10. Thou also shalt seek strength because of the enemy.] Or, "Thou shalt repair to thy fortress, because of the enemy." Thou shalt not dare to show thyself to the enemy, but shalt betake thyself to thy munitions (see ii. 1), and places of strength (compare ver. 13, 17).

Ver. 12.] As figs drop off when they are ripe, so shall thy strong-holds fall into the enemy's hands, upon the first assault.

Ver. 13.] The several passages by which the enemy may invade thee shall be left defenceless (see ii. 1), so that they may easily set on fire thy fortifications.

Ver. 14. Draw thee waters for the siege,] In order to maintain the siege.

Go into clay,—make strong [or repair] the brick-kiln.] In order to repair the breaches of thy walls, or make new ones within, if the old ones should be taken by the enemy. In those countries they used brick instead of stone (see Gen. xi. 3).

Ver. 15. There shall the fire devour thee;] Whilst thou art repairing the old fortifications, or making new ones, the enemy shall set thy works on fire. The particle sham, there, may signify then (see Noldius, p. 767).

It shall eat thee up like the cankerworm;] The sword of thine enemies, who shall be as numerous and destructive as locusts, or cankerworms, shall destroy thee (see Joel. i. 4).

Make thyself many as the cankerworm,] Though thou multiply thine armies, like locusts or caterpillars, yet the enemy shall destroy them.

Ver. 16. The cankerworm spoileth, and fleeth away.] As the locusts destroy the fruits of the earth, and fly away to another place, so shall thy soldiers pillage all the wealth thou hast gained by traffic, and then leave thee.

Ver. 17. Thy crowned are as the locusts,] The word Minnazaraik may be literally rendered the Nazarites: that title is given to persons remarkable for their youth and beauty (Lam. iv. 7; see note upon Amos ii. 11), and so may not improperly be applied to the officers in the Ninevites' army: these the prophet compares to locusts and grasshoppers, both for their number (see ver. 15), and for another quality, that they shun the heat of battle, just as the grasshoppers do the heat of the sun.

Thy captains] The Hebrew word is taphsir or tiphsar, as it is read Jer. li. 27, which some suppose to be derived from the Persian word Satrapas, the letters being transposed.

Ver. 18. Thy shepherds slumber, O king of Assyria:] By "shepherds" are meant captains or generals (compare Jer. vi. 3, xxv. 34). These are said to slumber, as having lost their courage, or as being gone to their last sleep, are dead and buried (compare Ps. lxxvi. 5, 6). By the "king of Assyria," Dr. Prideaux, in the place above cited, understands Saracus, who was now vanquished by Nabopolassar (who had before possessed himself of the kingdom of Babylon), and Cyaxares the king of Media (see the argument of this prophecy). The fall of this prince is elegantly described by Ezekiel, xxxi. 3, &c. The words of Jeremiah, l. 18, "I have punished the king of Assyria," are to be understood of the same person.

Thy people is scattered] Their generals are called shepherds at the beginning of the verse: the same metaphor is here continued, and the people are said to be dispersed, now their leaders are fled or destroyed, as sheep are scattered where they have no shepherd (compare 1 Kings xxii. 17).

Ver. 19. There is no healing of thy bruise;] Thy destruction is unavoidable. The Chaldee expounds it, "None is sorry or grieved at thy destruction:" which sense agrees very well with the original, and what follows: "They that hear the bruit of thee [and thy fall] clap their hands over thee," as rejoicing over thy calamities (compare Lam. ii. 15, Ezek. xxv. 6, Zeph. ii. 15).

For upon whom hath not thy wickedness passed continually?] All the neighbouring countries have felt the effects of thy cruelties and oppressions.

THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET HABAKKUK.

PREFACE.

THE prophet Habakkuk was probably contemporary with Jeremiah, and prophesied in the reign of Josiah; for the subject of his prophecy is the same with that of Jeremiah, and upon the same occasion; viz, the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, for their heinous sins and provocations. We may observe, as Nahum, the preceding prophet, foretold the destruction of the Assyrians, who carried the ten tribes captive; so Habakkuk foretells the judgments that should come upon the Chaldeans, who completed the captivity of the two remaining tribes.

CHAPTER I.

I THE burden which Habakkuk the prophet did see.

2 O LORD, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear! even cry out unto thee of violence, and thou wilt not save!

3 Why dost thou shew me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance? for spoiling and violence are before me: and there are that raise up strife and contention.

4 Therefore the law is slacked, and judgment doth never go forth: for the wicked doth compass about the righteous; therefore wrong judgment proceedeth.

5 ¶ Behold ye among the heathen, and regard, and wonder marvellously: for I will work a work in your days, which ye will not believe, though it be told you.

6 For, lo, I raise up the Chaldeans, that bit-

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT. — The prophet complaining of the growth of iniquity among the Jews, God fore-shows him the desolations the Chaldeans will make in Judea and the neighbouring countries, as the ministers of his vengeance. The prophet thereupon falls into a holy expostulation with God about these proceedings, moved thereunto, as it seems, by the impatience of the Jews, who justified themselves in comparison of their conquerors: to which he receives an answer in the following chapter.

Ver. 1.] The word burden is commonly explained of a burdensome prophecy, big with ruin and destruction (see note upon Jer. xxiii. 33). But a learned prelate, in his Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, p. 10, observes, that the Hebrew, massa, signifies no more than barely a prophecy, and so is translated in our English Bibles, Prov. xxxi. 1, and is often translated by "vision and prophecy" in the LXX. and other ancient versions; the word being used in that sense, from the prophet's bearing or feeling within him the influence of God's Spirit: for which reason they were called in Greek, Θεσφορηται, and Πνευματικοί.

Ver. 2. How long shall I cry—unto thee of violence, and thou wilt not save.] The prophet proposes the common objections against providence, taken from the prosperity of the wicked, and the oppression of the righteous, which has been a stumbling-block even to good men (see Job xii. 1, 6, xxi. 7, Ps. xxxvii., lxxliii., Jer. xii. 1).

Ver. 3. There are that raise up strife and contention.] Or, "There is strife, and contention carries it:" they that are best skilled in the arts of contention carry the cause.

Ver. 4. Judgment doth never go forth.] Or, "doth not go forth to perfection;" is never rightly and duly administered.

Doth compass about] Doth overpower him.

Ver. 5.] For a punishment to such exorbitant practices, behold God's making the heathen, viz. the Chaldeans (ver. 6), instruments of his vengeance: this is a judgment, you despisers of God's prophets will hardly believe, when you consider that at present the Chaldeans are your friends and confederates: as appears by Josiah's fighting with the king of Egypt, as being a confederate of the king of Assyria or Babylon (see 2 Kings xxiii. 29, and Dr. Prideaux, under the thirty-first year of Josiah). St. Luke, quoting this text according to the LXX.'s translation, Acts xiii. 41, reads it thus, "Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish." The learned Dr. Pocock, in his miscellaneous notes in Portam Mosis, cap. 3, shows, that the interpretation is agreeable to the present Hebrew copy: the word bagojim, which we translate "among the heathen," he derives from the verb baga, which still signifies, in Arabic, to be proud, or scornful: the following words the same translation renders, "And wonder and perish;" which sense he proves the word tamah will admit.

ter and hasty nation, which shall march through the breadth of the land, to possess the dwelling-places that are not their's.

7 They are terrible and dreadful: their judgment and their dignity shall proceed of themselves.

8 Their horses also are swifter than the leopards, and are more fierce than the evening wolves: and their horsemen shall spread themselves, and their horsemen shall come from far; they shall fly as the eagle that hasteth to eat.

9 They shall come all for violence: their faces shall sup up as the east wind, and they shall gather the captivity as the sand.

10 And they shall scoff at the kings, and the princes shall be a scorn unto them: they shall deride every strong hold; for they shall heap dust, and take it.

11 Then shall his mind change, and he shall pass over, and offend, imputing this his power unto his god.

Ver. 6.] Who should make several invasions into Judea, and at last utterly conquer it (see 2 Kings xxiv., xxv). They are said here to be cruel in their temper, and vigorous in their warlike expeditions (compare ver. 8).

Ver. 7. Their judgment and their dignity [or authority] shall proceed of themselves. They will be their own judges of what is right or wrong. The marginal reading in our English bible does not seem to agree with the original.

Ver. 8. Their horses—are more fierce than the evening wolves:] Or, Are swifter than evening wolves, when they go out for their prey, and are pinched with hunger (see Ps. civ. 20, Jer. v. 6). The words might be translated to an easier sense: "Their horsemen are fiercer than evening wolves, and shall spread themselves," or shall be multiplied.

Their horsemen shall come from far; they shall fly as an eagle, &c.] The words plainly allude to Deut. xxviii. 49, 50 (compare Jer. v. 15). The Chaldeans are said to come from far in respect of their neighbours the Philistines, Syrians and Moabites, who used to infest Judea.

Ver. 9. Their faces shall sup up as the east wind,] They shall destroy everything where they march, as the east wind blasts the fruits of the earth (compare Ezek. xvii. 10, Hos. xiii. 15). Some render the words, "Whatsoever they gather, they shall carry it towards the east," meaning to Babylon, which lay north-east from Judea.

They shall gather the captivity as the sand.] Not only in Judea (see Jer. lii. 28—30), but in all the neighbouring countries which they shall conquer (see the following note).

Ver. 10. They shall scoff at the kings,] The Hebrew uses the singular number as well here as in the following verse; and is to be understood of the king of Babylon, who conquers kings and princes, and treats them with scorn and contempt: so they used Zedekiah and his princes (see 2 Kings xxv. 6, 7, 18, 21), and so they shall serve the kings of Egypt and Tyre, and the princes of Moab, Edom, and the Philistines; who shall all of them successively be conquered by Nebuchadnezzar (see Ezek. xxv., xxvi., xxix., xxxii.).

They shall heap dust, and take it.] Cast up mountains against them, and so take them (see Jer. xxxii. 24, xxxiii. 4).

12 Art thou not from everlasting, O Lord my God, mine Holy One? we shall not die. O Lord, thou hast ordained them for judgment; and, O mighty God, thou hast established them for correction.

13 Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and canst not look on iniquity: wherefore lookest thou upon them that deal treacherously, and holdest thy tongue when the wicked devoured the man that is more righteous than he?

14 And makest men as the fishes of the sea, as the creeping things that have no ruler over them?

15 They take up all of them with the angle, they catch them in their net, and gather them in their drag: therefore they rejoice and are glad.

16 Therefore they sacrifice unto their net, and burn incense unto their drag; because by them their portion is fat, and their meat plenteous.

17 Shall they therefore empty their net, and not spare continually to slay the nations?

Ver. 11.] The prophet speaks of the several kings of Babylon as if they were one and the same person (see the note upon Isa. xxiii. 15); and saith, that he shall change his mind with his fortune, and impute his success to his idol Belus: which was remarkably true of Belshazzar, Nebuchadnezzar's successor (see Dan. v. 4): but we may understand the words of Nebuchadnezzar himself, if we translate the latter part of the verse thus, "This his strength is his God;" i. e. imputing all his success to his own prowess (compare ver. 16): and afterward, for those arrogant words of his, mentioned Dan. vi. 30, he was degraded into a beast.

Ver. 12. Art not thou from everlasting—we shall not die.] Thou that livest for ever, and whose word is as unchangeable as thyself, wilt preserve us from utter destruction, and in due time make good thy promises to us (see Ps. cii. 27, 28).

Thou hast ordained them for judgment;] Thou hast appointed the Chaldeans to be instruments of thy vengeance upon sinners (see 2 Kings xix. 25, Isa. x. 5—7, Ps. xvii. 13, Ezek. xxx. 25).

Ver. 13. Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil,] With any complaisance, or approbation.

Wherefore lookest thou upon them that deal treacherously,] Seemest to connive at, or dost not show any dislike at, the violence of those idolatrous Chaldeans.

Ver. 14, 15. Makest men as the fishes of the sea,] Suffereth the Chaldeans not to treat them better than fishes, who become a general prey to the fisherman's net or angle.

Ver. 16.] They impute all their victories to strength and skill, and make no acknowledgments to God for their success (see ver. 11, Isa. x. 13, Dent. viii. 17, 18).

Ver. 17. Shall they therefore empty their net?] Carry away the riches and treasures of their conquest (see 2 Kings xxiv. 13) in order to undertake more; just as fishermen empty their nets to fill them again. But the words may be rendered, Shall he (see ver. 10) cast or spread his net? The Hebrew verb is used of drawing a sword or spear (see Ezek. xxviii. 7, Ps. xxxv. 3): to this sense the Greek and Chaldee here understand it.

CHAPTER II.

1 I WILL stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what he will say unto me, and what I shall answer when I am reproved.

2 And the LORD answered me, and said, Write the vision, and make it plain upon tables, that he may run that readeth it.

3 For the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie: though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry.

4 Behold, his soul which is lifted up is not upright in him: but the just shall live by his faith.

5 ¶ Yea also, because he transgresseth by wine, he is a proud man, neither keepeth at home, who enlargeth his desire as hell, and is as death, and cannot be satisfied, but gathereth unto him all nations, and heapeth unto him all people:

6 Shall not all these take up a parable against him, and a taunting proverb against him, and say, Woe to him that increaseth that which is not his! how long? and to him that ladeth himself with thick clay!

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—In answer to the complaints of the prophet in the foregoing chapter, God tells him that he will in due time perform the promises made to his people, of deliverance by the Messiah; and that in the mean time good men will support themselves by faith; and then foreshows him the ruin of their great adversary, the Babylonian empire, and the judgment he will inflict upon them for their covetousness, their cruelty, and idolatry.

Ver. 1. I will stand upon my watch, &c.] It was the business of a watchman, in the time of war, to descry from an eminent station what messengers were coming, and to make known the message as soon as possible (see 2 Kings ix. 17, &c.). The prophet puts himself in such a posture, that he may receive God's answer to the complaints he made in the foregoing chapter.

What I shall answer when I am reproved.] Or rather, "What I shall answer as to what I have argued;" viz. to the expostulations I made with God just before.

Ver. 2.] When the prophets are commanded to write anything, it denotes the great importance of it, that the notice of it may be transmitted to posterity (see note upon Isa. viii. 1, xxx. 8). So God here commands the prophet, to write the contents of this vision in such legible characters as were used in public tables that were hung up in temples and market-places, that every one might have cognizance of them.

Ver. 3. For the vision is yet for an appointed time,] God has determined a set time when it shall be fulfilled, and not before (compare Dan. viii. 19, xi. 27, 35, 36). According to the common translation of the following words, by this vision we are to understand the destruction of the Babylonian monarchy, which is plainly foretold from the fifth verse to the end of the chapter, and is a proper answer to the complaint or argument the prophet had made in the foregoing chapter. But the learned Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, p. 160, observes, that the prophet, by way of preface to that prediction, confirms the Jews in the general expectation of their deliverer the Messiah, whose coming had been so often promised, and which profane persons began to question, when they saw God gave up his people into the hands of a cruel and idolatrous nation.

But at the end it shall speak, and not lie:] The same learned prelate, p. 162, observes, that the verb puach properly signifies to break forth, as the morning light does (see Cant. ii. 17, iv. 6); to which sense the LXX. and Vulgar Latin translate it here; so he renders the sentence, "At the end, it (or, he) shall break forth, and not deceive."

Though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry.] There are two different words in the Hebrew, which our English expresses by that one word tarry: so the same learned person translates the sentence thus, "Though he tarry, expect him; because he that cometh will come, he will not go beyond" the appointed time, but will make good the promises of deliverance given to your fathers. To this sense the LXX. render the words, very agreeably to the original; and the apostle follows their interpretation (Heb. x. 37), and understands them of the Messias, who is often called, "He that cometh, or should come, into the world" (see Ps. cxviii. 26, Zech. ix. 9, John vi. 14): the verb stands impersonally in the Hebrew text; but in such a syntax the person is commonly understood.

Ver. 4. His soul which is lifted up is not upright in him:] The Septuagint translate the sentence thus: "If he (i. e. the just, as it follows) draw back, my soul (the present Hebrew copies read his soul, understanding it of God) shall have no pleasure in him." This version bishop Pearson hath proved to be agreeable to the original text, Prolegom. to the LXX. and the apostle confirms this exposition by following that translation, Heb. x. 38.

Ver. 5. Yea also, because he transgresseth by wine, he is a proud man, neither keepeth at home,] If we suppose a new paragraph to begin here, according to the exposition given of the foregoing verses, the sense would run plainer if the words were thus translated, "Moreover he that, like a man transgressing by wine, is proud, shall not continue," or prosper. The copulative joined to the last word in the Hebrew is often redundant. The words would yield a plainer sense, if they were thus translated, "Moreover (like) a man transgressing by wine, he is proud, and shall not continue," or prosper. To this sense, the Chaldee paraphrast and Vulgar Latin explain the words; the particle of comparison, as, being often understood (see the note upon Isa. xxi. 8). The prophet having assured the Jews of a deliverance in God's appointed time, proceeds now to denounce his judgment against the Babylonian monarchy, speaking of it as comprised under one person at the head of it (see the note upon i. 11). Here he describes him as one intoxicated with his successes, and not knowing how to set any bounds to his ambition; but still, as his conquests enlarge, his desire of having more increases. Hell, or death, and the grave, are proverbial emblems of an insatiable temper (see Prov. xxvii. 29, xxx. 16).

But gathereth unto him all nations.] Extends his dominions far and near (see i. 17).

Ver. 6. Shall not all these take up a parable against

7 Shall they not rise up suddenly that shall bite thee, and awake that shall vex thee, and thou shalt be for booties unto them?

8 Because thou hast spoiled many nations, all the remnant of the people shall spoil thee; because of men's blood, and for the violence of the land, of the city, and of all that dwell therein.

9 ¶ Woe to him that coveteth an evil covetousness to his house, that he may set his nest on high, that he may be delivered from the power of evil!

10 Thou hast consulted shame to thy house by cutting off many people, and hast sinned against thy soul.

11 For the stone shall cry out of the wall, him, and a taunting proverb] A parable or proverb signifies a metaphorical or figurative saying out of the common way, as the Greek word παροιμία imports; so it is opposed to speaking plainly, without figure or such like ornament, John xvi. 29. Thus the ancient sages clothed their instructions in apt stories and suitable comparisons: upon which account Solomon joins together "a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise and their dark sayings," Prov. i. 6. Such were the symbols of Pythagoras, and some other celebrated wise men among the gentiles. Of this kind is the parable, or taunting and satirical proverb, here uttered against the king of Babylon, and the insatiable ambition of that monarchy.

Woe to him that increaseth that which is not his!] Woe to him that is still increasing his own dominion by invading his neighbour's; surely he will not continue long so to do without some remarkable check from providence! and so what he thus increases will not be for himself (for so the words in the former part of the sentence may be translated), but for the Medes and Persians, who shall conquer him, and enrich themselves with his spoils (see the following verse).

To him that ladeth himself with thick clay!] His gold and silver, which is nothing originally but earth or clay, shall turn to no benefit, but be rather his burden; adding weight to his sins and punishment.

Ver. 7.] Cyrus took the city of Babylon (and thereby put an end to the Babylonish empire) by a sudden assault, taking advantage of a festival, celebrated by night according to custom, and then draining the river without being perceived, and making it fordable for his army; according to the account Herodotus and Xenophon give of the taking of Babylon, wherein they exactly agree with the prophecy of Jeremiah, ch. l. li. foretelling the same event.

Ver. 8.] As a just return for thy cruelty in the slaughter of many thousands killed by thee in battle; and particularly for the violence offered to the land of Judea, and the city of Jerusalem and its inhabitants. The words might have been more plainly translated, "for the violence against the land," &c. for so the same phrase is rendered, Obad. ver. 10 [compare ver. 17, and Jer. li. 35].

Ver. 9. That he may set his nest on high, &c.] Strong fortresses and citadels are compared, for their height, to nests, which birds are led by their instinct to make upon the tops of trees, to place themselves and their young ones out of the reach of danger (compare Jer. xlix. 6, Obad. ver. 4).

Ver. 10.] Thy cruelty towards others will turn at last to thy own confusion, and utter extirpation of thy family, of which there will be left "neither name nor remnant, son nor grandson;" as God and the beam out of the timber shall answer it.

12 ¶ Woe to him that buildeth a town with blood, and stablisheth a city by iniquity!

13 Behold, is it not of the LORD of hosts that the people shall labour in the very fire, and the people shall weary themselves for very vanity?

14 For the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea.

15 ¶ Woe unto him that giveth his neighbour drink, that putteth thy bottle to him, and maketh him drunken also, that thou mayest look on their nakedness!

16 Thou art filled with shame for glory: drink thou also, and let thy foreskin be uncovered: the threatens Nebuchadnezzar, Isa. xiv. 22. Belshazzar being the last of that family, whose death put an end to the Babylonian monarchy.

Ver. 11.] The houses and towns which have been destroyed by the Chaldeans, shall cry for vengeance against the destroyers. It is a great question, what is the proper signification of the Hebrew capis, being found but in this one place of the bible: our translators render it beam; others think it signifies a brick.

Ver. 12.] Who hath raised the greatness of his capital city Babylon upon the ruins of many other cities, and the destruction of their inhabitants (compare Mic. iii. 10).

Ver. 13.] The latter part of the verse is with very little alteration repeated, Jer. li. 58, where he describes the destruction of Babylon. I observed in my notes upon that place, that the sentence might be better translated thus: "The people shall labour for that which shall be [fuel] for the fire, and the people shall weary themselves for a thing of nought;" i. e. all the pains the Chaldeans have taken in enlarging and beautifying their city, shall be lost in the flames which shall consume their stately buildings (see the notes upon Jer. li. 25).

Ver. 14.] For God's providence in governing the world shall conspicuously appear in the downfall of the Babylonian empire; especially as it is described in the prophets as an earnest and type of the fall of mystical Babylon, which will be a decisive stroke, that will thoroughly vindicate oppressed truth and innocence.

Ver. 15. Woe unto him that giveth his neighbour drink, that putteth thy bottle to him, &c.] The desolation of any country is often compared to drunkenness (see the note upon Jer. xxv. 15): so the king of Babylon, who subdued the neighbouring countries round about him, and perhaps got an advantage over some of them by gifts and presents, or by counterfeit leagues and friendship, is compared to a man that gets an advantage over another by persuading or forcing him to drink too much. The word chemath, translated bottle, signifies likewise that heating or poisonous quality which attends wine taken in excess (compare Hos. vii. 5); and is often taken for any poisonous juice (see Deut. xxxii. 24, 33, Job vi. 4, xx. 16, Ps. lvi. 4).

That thou mayest look on their nakedness!] The too frequent effects of drunkenness, is to engage others to commit lewdness, and thereby expose them to shame; so the king of Babylon intoxicates the minds of his neighbours, by his arts of policy, in order to discover the weakness of their country or government, called "the nakedness of the land," Gen. xlii. 9, and thereby get the better of them.

Ver. 16.] Thy glory shall now be turned into shame: for it shall come to thy turn to feel the fury cup of the Lord's right hand shall be turned unto thee, and shameful spewing shall be on thy glory.

17 For the violence of Lebanon shall cover thee, and the spoil of beasts, which made them afraid, because of men's blood, and for the violence of the land, of the city; and of all that dwell therein.

18 ¶ What profiteth the graven image that of God's judgments, often expressed by "the cup of his wrath;" when thy people shall be made captives, and stripped bare without any covering to their nakedness (see Isa. iii. 17, Nah. iii. 5).

Ver. 17. For the violence of Lebanon shall cover thee,] God shall execute his vengeance upon thee for the violence thou hast offered to the temple at Jerusalem (compare Jer. l. 28, li. 11); which is here compared to the cedars of the forest of Lebanon, for its height and stateliness of its buildings (compare Zech. xi. 1). Or else the prophet compares the cruelty of the Medes and Persians to the violence of wild beasts in the forest of Lebanon: so the following words import.

The spoil of beasts, which made them afraid,] The relative which, added by our translators, obscures the text; which might be more plainly rendered, "The spoil of (or, made by) beasts shall make them afraid, or make thee afraid;" as the Septuagint and the Chaldee, with a very little alteration, read the text. As thou hast spoiled others, without any sense of common humanity, so the army of the conqueror shall deal by thee (see ver. 8); and shall tear thee in pieces, as wild beasts do their prey (see Isa. xiii. 15, 18).

Because of men's blood, &c.] See ver. 8.

Ver. 18. What profiteth the graven image, &c.] The last sin the prophet takes notice of, for which God will execute his judgments upon Babylon, is idolatry (compare Jer. l. 2, li. 44, 47): and he tells the king of Babylon, that when he sees Bel and the rest of his graven images carried away by the conquerors in triumphant procession (see Isa. xlv. 1, 2), he will be convinced that his idols could bring no advantage or protection to their worshippers.

The molten image, and a teacher of lies,] The setting up, and paying adoration to them, tend to encourage the ignorant in their absurd fancy, that the maker thereof hath graven it; the molten image, and a teacher of lies, that the maker of his work trusteth therein, to make dumb idols?

19 Woe unto him that saith to the wood, Awake; to the dumb stone, Arise, it shall teach! Behold, it is laid over with gold and silver, and there is no breath at all in the midst of it.

20 But the Lord is in his holy temple: let all the earth keep silence before him.

God is like the work of men's hands, and that images have some divine power lodged within them: to the same purpose the stock is called, "the doctrine of vanities," Jer. x. 8.

To make dumb idols?] Who "have mouths and speak not," Ps. cxv. 5 (compare 1 Cor. xii. 2).

Ver. 19. Woe unto him that saith to the wood, Awake;] Woe to him that calls upon idols, as if they could awake and hear his prayers, as God is said to awake, when he answers our prayers (see Ps. xlv. 23); or as if they could give their worshippers directions how to escape the evils which threaten them.

It is laid over with gold and silver, and (or, but) there is no breath at all in the midst of it.] They are beautified with a great deal of cost, on purpose to delude their ignorant worshippers, and make them fancy some divinity lodged within them; whereas they are altogether without life or sense.

Ver. 20. But the Lord is in his holy temple:] The true God has his throne in heaven, as the place of his peculiar residence (see Jonah ii. 7); from whence he will answer the prayers of his servants, though the temple of Jerusalem should be destroyed.

Let all the earth keep silence before him.] Or, "Stand in awe before him," as the LXX. render it: the consideration of his sovereignty and dominion should strike them with a reverential awe, and especially should dispose them to a profound submission towards him, when they see him execute his judgments in the world, as he will shortly do upon the Chaldeans. The expression is taken from the reverent behaviour which inferiors show by keeping silence in the presence of their betters; or it alludes to such a silence as is kept in courts of justice, when a judge pronounces the sentence (see Job xxix. 9, 10, Ps. lxxvi. 8, 9, Zeph. i. 7, Zech. ii. 13).

CHAPTER III.

I A PRAYER of Habakkuk the prophet upon Shigionoth.

2 O LORD, I have heard thy speech, and was

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet in this hymn recounts, in a poetical style, God's wonderful works, in conducting his people through the wilderness, and giving them possession of the promised land; from whence he encourages himself, and other pious persons, to rely upon God for making good his promises to their posterity in after-ages.

Ver. 1.] Or, as the marginal reading explains it, "According to the tunes called in Hebrew Shigionoth;" which were musical compositions used in the public service of the temple (compare the title of afraid: O LORD, revive thy work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years make known; in wrath remember mercy.

Ps. vii.). It is called a prayer, because it begins in the form of a supplication, although the following parts are rather in the nature of a hymn, or a thanksgiving.

Ver. 2.] I have heard what thou hast revealed to me concerning thy judgments upon thy people: the terribleness of them strikes me with a reverential awe and dread (compare ver. 16); yet I earnestly beg of thee, if it be thy gracious will, to exert thy power, and renew thy former wonders, for the deliverance of thy people, before the seventy years determined for their captivity be expired: and in the midst of judgment to remember mercy.

Ver. 3.] The prophet, to encourage the faithful

3 God came from Teman, and the Holy One from mount Paran. Selah. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise.

4 And his brightness was as the light; he had horns coming out of his hand: and there was the hiding of his power.

5 Before him went the pestilence, and burning coals went forth at his feet.

6 He stood, and measured the earth: he beheld, and drove asunder the nations; and the everlasting mountains were scattered, the perpetual hills did bow: his ways are everlasting.

7 I saw the tents of Cushan in affliction: and the curtains of the land of Midian did tremble.

still to trust in God, recounts some remarkable instances of the protection he afforded their forefathers in the wilderness, where they were destitute of all visible means of sustaining themselves. First of all, he takes notice of the wonders he did for them when they came near the border of Edom, when the Edomites came out with a mighty force to oppose their passage (see Numb. xxi. 20): the like wonders he had shown in their former journeys from mount Sinai to Paran: Numb. x. 12 (compare Deut. xxxiii. 2).

Ibid. and ver. 4. His glory covered the heavens,—his brightness was as the light;] He manifested his glory by that terrible appearance of his presence upon mount Sinai, where the lightnings shone in the air, Exod. xix. 16, and the pillar of fire enlightened the earth, and conducted them in their journeys: Exod. xiii. 21.

Ver. 4. He had horns coming out of his hand: and there was the hiding of his power.] The Hebrew word keren signifies both horns and rays of light (see Exod. xxiv. 29, 30). So the marginal reading here is to be preferred: “He had bright beams coming out of his side.” The Shechinah or symbol of the divine presence had rays of light issuing out on every side, and yet that was but a hiding or veil to the divine majesty, “who covereth himself with light as with a garment,” Ps. civ. 2.

Ver. 5.] As thunder and lightnings are his harbingers (see Ps. xviii. 8); an emblem of his being “a consuming fire,” Deut. iv. 24, when he comes to execute vengeance upon his enemies; of which the Egyptian plagues, and the discomfiture of Sihon and Og, were a terrible proof.

Ver. 6. He beheld, and drove asunder the nations;] Like a conqueror, he divided the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel; having first scattered and discomfited the former inhabitants.

The everlasting mountains were scattered, the perpetual hills did bow:] The mountains and hills are said to quake at God’s presence, Nah. i. 5, so here the whole land of Canaan is said to tremble, and even the mountains themselves, the most solid and impregnable parts of it, because the hearts of the stoutest of the old inhabitants fainted and lost their courage (see Josh. ii. 24). [By the mountains and hills may be meant the greater and lesser principalities or kingdoms in the land of Canaan, see Ps. lxxii. 3.] The mountains and hills are spoken of as emblems of eternity, because time seems to make no change or alteration in them (see Gen. xlix. 26, Deut. xxxiii. 15).

His ways are everlasting.] His purposes are decreed from all eternity, and will infallibly be executed in their appointed time.

Ver. 7.] I beheld the Arabians, called Scenitæ, from their dwelling in tents, and their neighbours the Midianites, in great consternation, upon the approach of the Israelites towards their borders (see Numb. xxii. 3, Exod. xv. 15), whom they afterward destroyed in battle (Numb. xxxi. 2, &c.).

10 The mountains saw thee, and they trembled: the overflowing of the water passed by: the deep uttered his voice, and lifted up his hands on high.

Ver. 8.] When God dried up the channel of the Red sea (Exod. xiv. 22), and afterward that of the river Jordan (Josh. iii. 16, 17), it was not out of any displeasure against the waters, but for the safety of his people, for whose deliverance he appeared in as illustrious a manner, as if he had been seen riding in the clouds, and carried “upon the wings of the wind,” as in a chariot (compare Deut. xxxiii. 26, Isa. xix. 1, Ps. lxxviii. 4, civ. 3).

Ver. 9. Thy bow was made quite naked, according to the oaths of the tribes, even thy word.] Thou didst fight for Israel, and didst make bare thine arm in their defence, as evidently as if thou hadst been seen with a bow in thine hand; that thou mightest fulfil the oaths and promises thou hadst made to give the tribes of Israel full possession of Canaan: thy word being in itself as immutable, as when it is confirmed by the solemnity of an oath (see Heb. vi. 18).

Thou didst cleave the earth with rivers.] Thou didst cleave the hard rocks, and the earth about them, and make the waters to run down in a great stream or channel, like a river, which followed them a great part of their journey (see Ps. lxxviii. 15, 16, cv. 41, 1 Cor. x. 3).

Ver. 10. The mountains saw thee and they trembled;] Mount Sinai, and the hills adjoining, felt the effects of thy presence (compare Exod. xix. 16, 18, Judg. v. 4, Ps. lxxviii. 8, lxxviii. 16, cxiv. 4).

The overflowing of the water passed by:] Or rather, “The stream of water overflowed;” for in that sense the verb abar is often used (see Isa. viii. 8, Dan. xi. 10).

The deep uttered his voice, and lifted up his hands on high.] The waters gushed out of the bottom of the rock with a mighty noise, as if the fountains of the great deep had been opened (Ps. lxxviii. 16), and forced its way upward, as a man gets up an ascent by the strength of his hands.

Ver. 11. The sun and moon stood still] At the command of Joshua (see Josh. x. 12).

At the light of thine arrows they went,] When the people marched against their enemies, God sent hail-stones and lightnings from heaven to discomfit them (see Josh. x. 11, and compare Ps. xviii. 14, cxliv. 6). Or the words may be translated thus; “Thine arrows went at the light and shining of thy glittering spear.” Hailstones, the artillery of heaven, came down upon the heads of the enemies, accompanied with thunder and lightning. As the blaze of lightning is here elegantly compared to the glittering of a spear, so the lustre of arms is often compared by the poets, particularly Homer, to the flashes of lightning; so we read Iliad. xi. ver. 65.

Πῦξ δ' ἔπερ χαλκῷ

Λάμψ', ὥστε στερπήρ πᾶτρός Διὸς Αἰγυόχοιο.

12 Thou didst march through the land in indignation, thou didst thresh the heathen in anger.

14 Thou didst strike through with his staves the head of his villages: they came out as a whirlwind to scatter me: their rejoicing was as to devour the poor secretly.

15 Thou didst walk through the sea with thine horses, through the heap of great waters.

His brazen arms like flames of lightning shone,
Which the great Thunderer launches from his arm.

The same thought occurs again, Iliad. x. ver. 155 (see note upon Ezek. xxi. 15).

Ver. 12.] i. e. Thou didst subdue them, not only by giving success to the arms of the Israelites, but likewise thyself fighting against them from heaven (ver. 11, 13; compare Isa. xxi. 10, xli. 15, Jer. li. 33).

Ver. 13. Thou wentest forth for the salvation—with thine anointed;] With thy peculiar favourites, such as Moses, Joshua, and David, all set apart by thy appointment to be leaders and rulers of thy people (compare Ps. cv. 15).

Thou woundedst the head out of the house of the wicked,] The heads (see ver. 14), or confederate princes of the Canaanites (see Josh. x. 3, xi. 1).

By discovering the foundation unto the neck.] Or, "Raising the foundation," as the word aroth signifies, Ps. cxxxvii. 7, by undermining them from bottom to top.

Ver. 14. Thou didst strike through with his staves the head of his villages:] Or, "Thou didst strike through the head of his warriors among his tribes," or families. Thou didst discomfit all the petty kings of their several clans, or families, carrying on the war against Joshua (see Josh. xii. 9, &c.). The word perazav, his villages, in our translation, the Septuagint translate warriors, or generals: and so they understand it, Judg. v. 7, 11, which sense agrees best with this place.

They came out as a whirlwind to scatter me:] Armies are elsewhere compared to whirlwinds (see Zech. ix. 14).

Their rejoicing was as to devour the poor secretly.] The metaphor is taken from wild beasts, who carry their prey into their dens, and there devour it.

Ver. 15.] Thou didst conduct thy people through the Red sea and the river Jordan, as safely as if they had rid on horseback (see ver. 5).

Ver. 16. When I heard [thy judgment decreed against thy own people, ver. 2], my belly trembled;] I was all over in a shaking and consternation, and no strength remained in me (compare Jer. xxiii. 9, Dan. x. 8).

That I might rest in the day of trouble, &c.] Noldius, p. 108, 110, of his Concordance, hath given the easiest sense of the latter part of the verse, translating it thus: "Yet I shall rest in the day of trouble, when he shall come up against the people, even he who shall invade them with his troops:" the prophet speaks in the person of the pious man; I shall rest secure under the divine protection, when the Chaldeans shall come to invade Judea (see ver. 17, 18).

Ver. 17, 18.] Though all outward means of nourishment or preservation should fail, yet will I still trust and depend upon God's promises.

Ver. 19. The Lord—will make my feet like hinds' feet,] This verse is taken out of Ps. xviii. 33. He will restore my former strength, nimbleness, and agility, in war, and make me again possessor of the chief places of strength in my native country (see Deut. xxxii. 13, xxxiii. 29, Ps. xviii. 33).

To the chief singer [or musician] on my stringed instruments.] This hymn was designed to be sung in the temple service (see ver. 1), and for that purpose was delivered to the chief musician, to be set to musical notes (compare the title of the fourth Psalm). This direction might probably be given by order of king Josiah.

OF

THE PROPHET ZEPHANIAH.

PREFACE.

THIS prophet lived in the reign of Josiah, as he himself informs us, and prophesieth chiefly against Judah, who continued very corrupt, notwithstanding the king's pious zeal for reformation, and the good example he gave to his subjects.

CHAPTER I.

1 THE word of the LORD which came unto Zephaniah the son of Cushi, the son of Gedaliah, the son of Amariah, the son of Hizkiah, in the days of Josiah the son of Amon, king of Judah.

2 I will utterly consume all things from off the land, saith the LORD.

3 I will consume man and beast; I will consume the fowls of the heaven, and the fishes of the sea, and the stumbling-blocks with the wicked; and I will cut off man from off the land, saith the LORD.

4 I will also stretch out mine hand upon Judah, and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and I will cut off the remnant of Baal from this place, and the name of the Chemarims with the priests;

5 And them that worship the host of heaven upon the housetops; and them that worship and that swear by the LORD, and that swear by Malcham;

6 And them that are turned back from the LORD; and those that have not sought the LORD nor enquired for him.

7 Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord God: for the day of the LORD is at hand: for the LORD hath prepared a sacrifice, he hath bid his guests.

8 And it shall come to pass in the day of the LORD's sacrifice, that I will punish the princes, and the king's children, and all such as are clothed with strange apparel.

9 In the same day also will I punish all those that leap on the threshold, which fill their masters' houses with violence and deceit.

10 And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the LORD, that there shall be the noise of a cry

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet denounces God's severe judgments against Judah for their idolatry, and other heinous sins.

Ver. 1.] Hizkiah is read with the same points in the Hebrew with Hezekiah, the name of the king of Judah: but Zephaniah being here reckoned as the fourth by descent from Hizkiah, that person cannot be the same with king Hezekiah, there being not a sufficient distance of time between them for four descents.

Ver. 2, 3.] A general desolation is threatened, by enumerating the particulars that shall be involved in it (see note upon Hos. iv. 3).

Ver. 3. The stumbling-blocks with the wicked;] Or, Of the wicked, for the particle eth often denotes the genitive case (see Noldius, p. 122). Stumbling-blocks are the same with idols, called "the stumbling-blocks of iniquity," Ezek. vii. 19, xiv. 3, 4.

Ver. 4. I will cut off the remnant of Baal from this place.] Those altars or places of worship, dedicated to the service of Baal, which escaped the reformation of king Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 5, compare Jer. iii. 6.

The name of the Chemarims with the priests;] Or, "The names of the idolatrous priests;" for so the word Chemarim is translated, 2 Kings xxiii. 5 (compare Hos. x. 5). I will destroy these together with the priests of the tribe of Levi, who have joined in the worship of idols (see Ezek. xlv. 10).

Ver. 5. And them that worship the host of heaven] See note upon Jer. xix. 13.

Them that worship and that swear by the Lord, and that swear by Malcham;] That join the worship of idols to that of the true God, who is "a jealous God," and will not admit of any rival in his worship (see Hos. iv. 15). Malcham is the same with Moloch, to whom the people of Judah continued to offer their children, as Jeremiah upbraids them, vii. 31, xix. 5, notwithstanding the reformation that Josiah had made, 2 Kings xxiii. 10. Swearing is an act of religious worship, or a solemn invocation of God, as a witness and a judge (see Dent. x. 20), and therefore expressly forbid to be used to idols (Josh. xxiii. 7).

Ver. 6.] Both those that are apostates to idolatry, and such as live without any sense of religion, and "without God in the world."

Ver. 7. Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord God:] Keep silence in token of an awful reverence towards God, now he is coming to execute his judgments upon the land (compare Ps. lxxvi. 8, 9, Hab. ii. 20, Zech. ii. 13). "Humble thyself under his mighty hand," without repining or murmuring at his corrections, which thy sins do justly deserve (see Ps. xxxix. 9).

For the Lord hath prepared a sacrifice, he hath bid his guests.] The slaughter of the wicked is called a sacrifice, because it is in some sense an atonement to God's justice (compare Isa. xxiv. 6, Jer. xlvi. 10, Ezek. xxxix. 17, Rev. xix. 17). The latter part of the sentence alludes to the custom of those that offered sacrifice, which was to invite their friends to partake of the feast which accompanied it. So God will call the Chaldeans to have a share in this slaughter.

Ver. 8. I will punish the princes, and the king's children,] As having been the enconragers of idolatry, by their authority and ill example. Both the sons of Josiah who succeeded him in the throne, are said to "have done evil in the sight of the Lord," 2 Kings xxiii. 32, 37.

All such as are clothed with strange apparel.] There were peculiar vestments belonging to the worship of each idol (see 2 Kings x. 22). So in aftertimes there were peculiar habits belonging to the priests of Saturn, and priestesses of Ceres, which are mentioned in the martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas, cap. 18, and in Tertullian, De Pallio, cap. 4. The text may likewise be explained of such men as wore women's apparel, and such women as wore that belonging to men; which was contrary to an express law, Dent. xxii. 5, and was a rite observed in the worship of some idols.

Ver. 9. Leap on the threshold,] Or rather, "Leap over the threshold." The expression probably denotes some idolatrous rite, like that which was practised in the temple of Dagon, where the "priests did not tread upon the threshold," 1 Sam. v. 5. To this sense, the Chaldee paraphrast interprets it of those that walk after the laws or rites of the Philistines. Others expound it of those who enter into other men's houses, and take away their goods by violence; according to what follows: "who fill their master's houses with violence and deceit."

Ver. 10. In that day—there shall be the noise of a cry from the fish-gate.] At that time (see ver. 12), there shall be an outcry of the Babylonish army coming to invade the city on the side of the fish-gate; i. e. the gate which stood near the fish market (see 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14, Neh. iii. 3).

from the fish-gate, and an howling from the second, and a great crashing from the hills.

11 Howl, ye inhabitants of Maktesh, for all the merchant people are cut down; all they that bear silver are cut off.

12 And it shall come to pass at that time, that I will search Jerusalem with candles, and punish the men that are settled on their lees: that say in their heart, The Lord will not do good, neither will he do evil.

13 Therefore their goods shall become a booty, and their houses a desolation: they shall also build houses, but not inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, but not drink the wine thereof.

14 The great day of the Lord is near, it is near, and hasteth greatly, even the voice of the day of the Lord: the mighty man shall cry there bitterly.

An howling from the second,] Or rather, "From the middle part of the city" (see 2 Kings xxii. 14).

A great crashing from the hills.] From the mountains of Sion and Moriah, whereon the temple and the king's palace were built (see 2 Chron. iii. 1).

Ver. 11. Maktesh,] A part, or street, of Jerusalem: the Chaldee interprets it of the inhabitants near the brook Kidron.

For all the merchant people are cut down;] They that carry on their trades by going to marts or fairs, with great sums of ready money. The original reads, The people of Canaan, which word signifies a merchant (Hos. xii. 7), but the Chaldee understands it of those who resemble the Canaanites in their idolatries and corrupt manners: so Judah's mother is called a Hittite, and her father an Amorite, because they did after the works of the Canaanites, the ancient inhabitants of the land, Ezek. xvi. 45.

Ver. 12. I will search Jerusalem with candles,] I will deliver up Jerusalem into the hands of the Chaldeans, who shall let no corner of it escape them, but shall diligently search the houses, and plunder the wealth of them (see the following verse).

And punish the men that are settled on their lees:] Who having lived securely in ease and plenty (compare Jer. xlviii. 11), have not "God in all their thoughts," but imagine that he doth not concern himself with the affairs of the world, and that neither good nor evil is brought to pass by his providence.

Ver. 13.] The enemy shall plunder their goods, and then demolish their houses; so that they shall 15 That day is a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, a day of wasteness and desolation, a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness.

16 A day of the trumpet and alarm against the fenced cities, and against the high towers.

17 And I will bring distress upon men, that they shall walk like blind men, because they have sinned against the Lord: and their blood shall be poured out as dust, and their flesh as the dung.

18 Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath; but the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy; for he shall make even a speedy riddance of all them that dwell in the land.

not enjoy these possessions which they have gotten by fraud or violence (see ver. 9, and Amos v. 11.)

Ver. 14. The great day of the Lord is near (compare Joel ii. 1, 11),—even the voice of the day of the Lord, &c.] A great noise and distraction shall attend the taking of Jerusalem (see ver. 10, Isa. xxii. 5). Some translate the latter part of the sentence thus, "The voice of the day of the Lord is bitter: then the mighty man crieth out." The adverb sham, translated there, signifies time as well as place (see note upon Isa. xlviii. 16, Hos. ii. 15).

Ver. 15.] See ver. 18, Joel ii. 2, Amos v. 18.

Ver. 16.] See Jer. iv. 19.

Ver. 17. They shall walk like blind men, &c.] Not knowing whither to go, or which way to take for safety (compare Deut. xxviii. 29, Isa. lix. 10).

Their flesh as the dung:] Or, "Their carcasses as the dung:" so the Chaldee explains the word flesh. The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be slain in the streets of the city, and their carcasses left there to rot and putrefy.

Ver. 18. Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them] This is spoken of the merchants and rich citizens (see ver. 11—13, and compare Ezek. vii. 19).

But the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy:] God's vengeance is frequently compared to fire; see Nahum i. 6. This shall consume the land and its inhabitants for their heinous offences, and chiefly for their idolatry; because that sin does peculiarly entrench upon his honour, which is incommunicable to others, whereupon he is called a jealous God, Exod. xx. 5, xxxiv. 14.

CHAPTER II.

1 GATHER yourselves together, yea, gather together, O nation not desired;

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet exhorts the Jews to repentance before God's judgments overtake them; which he likewise denounces against the neighbouring countries, the Philistines, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Ethiopia, and Assyria; which were all subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, either before or after the captivity of the Jews (see Jer. xxv. 20—22, 26, Ezek. xxv., xxix., xxxi., and Dr. Prideaux, under the twenty-first, thirty-first, and thirty-second years of Nebuchadnezzar).

2 Before the decree bring forth, before the day pass as the chaff, before the fierce anger of the

Ver. 1. Gather yourselves together,] Assemble yourselves in order to make a public humiliation (see Joel ii. 16).

O nation not desired;] The Greek and the Chaldee interpret it, O nation, that will not receive instruction, and is not to be amended but by the discipline of God's judgments. Glassius (Grammat. p. 410) renders it to the same sense, "O nation, not to be moved with desire;" i. e. of growing better. The word niksaph is taken for "having a desire or longing," Gen. xxxi. 30, Ps. lxxxiv. 2.

Ver. 2.] The words are differently translated by LORD come upon you, before the day of the LORD's anger come upon you.

3 Seek ye the LORD, all ye meek of the earth, which have wrought his judgment; seek righteousness, seek meekness: it may be ye shall be hid in the day of the LORD's anger.

4 ¶ For Gaza shall be forsaken, and Ashkelon a desolation: they shall drive out Ashdod at the noon-day, and Ekron shall be rooted up.

5 Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the Cherethites! the word of the LORD is against you; O Canaan, the land of the Philistines, I will even destroy thee, that there shall be no inhabitant.

6 And the sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks.

7 And the coast shall be for the remnant of the house of Judah; they shall feed thereupon: in the houses of Ashkelon shall they lie down in the evening: for the LORD their God shall visit them, and turn away their captivity.

8 ¶ I have heard the reproach of Moab, and the revilings of the children of Ammon, whereby they have reproached my people, and magnified themselves against their border.

9 Therefore as I live, saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, Surely Moab shall be as Sodom, and the children of Ammon as Gomorrah, even the breeding of nettles, and salt-pits, and a perpetual desolation: the residue of my people shall spoil them, and the remnant of my people shall possess them.

10 This shall they have for their pride, because they have reproached and magnified themselves against the people of the LORD of hosts.

11 The LORD will be terrible unto them: for interpreters, but much to the same sense: they may be rendered nearer to the Hebrew thus, "Before the day bring forth the decree, which shall pass away, as chaff" is dispersed before the wind. The judgments of God, consuming the wicked, are often compared to the dispersing of chaff (see Job xxi. 18, Ps. i. 3, Isa. xvii. 13, Hos. xiii. 3).

Ver. 3. Seek righteousness, seek meekness:] Continue to seek and practise them (compare Ps. xxxiv. 14).

It may be ye shall be hid in the day of the LORD's anger.] This is the most likely way of securing the divine protection in the time of a general destruction (see note upon Jer. xxxvi. 3). Such a protection is elsewhere expressed by being hid or covered under the shadow of his wings (compare Ps. xxxii. 7, xci. 1).

Ver. 4. For Gaza shall be forsaken, and Ashkelon a desolation:] There will be no escaping into the neighbouring countries, such as the Philistines are, in particular; for their cities shall likewise become a prey to the forces of Nebuchadnezzar (see Jer. xlvii. 1, with the argument to that chapter).

They shall drive out Ashdod at the noon-day:] The same forces will take the courage to attack Ashdod (another city of the Philistines, 1 Sam. v. 1), in the open day, and not to betake themselves to nightly stratagems (see Jer. vi. 4, xv. 8).

Ver. 5. Woe unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the Cherethites:] The Philistines who live upon the coast of the Mediterranean sea (compare Ezek. xxv. 16), called there as well as here, Cherethites, or Cherethims. The word is translated Κρηταί, Cretans, by the LXX. in this and other places where it is found: they are supposed to have been a colony removed from Crete to Palestine (see note upon Jer. xlvii. 4).

O Canaan, the land of the Philistines,] The Canaanites, properly so called, are the same with the Philistines, and seated in that part of Palestine (see Josh. xiii. 3).

Ver. 6.] A proverbial description of an utter desolation (compare ver. 14, 15, and see note upon Isa. xiii. 20, xvii. 2).

Ver. 7. The coast shall be for the remnant of Judah:] The sea-coast (ver. 5) shall in after times belong to the Jews, who shall possess all the Philistines' country: as it appears they did in the first times of Christianity (see Acts viii. 26, 40). Those that returned from the captivity are called a remnant, Hag. i. 12, ii. 2.

In the houses of Ashkelon shall they lie down] The words are an allusion to what is said ver. 6. As the cities of Gaza, Ashkelon, &c. were places for wild Arabs, or other wandering people to pitch their tents, and feed their flocks; so they shall hereafter become the settled habitations of the Jews (compare Isa. lxx. 10).

For [or, when] the LORD shall visit them, and turn away their captivity.] What is promised in this verse, was partly fulfilled after their return from Babylon, and may hereafter receive a farther completion (see Obad. ver. 19, and note there).

Ver. 8. I have heard the reproach of Moab, and the revilings of Ammon.] These countries were destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem (see the argument to Jer. xlviii). They are threatened with destruction, both here and Jer. xlviii. 17, xlix. 1, and Ezek. xxv. 3, 8, for their insulting over the Jews in their calamities.

Magnified themselves against their border.] Have invaded the territories of the Jews, when they were carried captive (see Jer. xlix. 1), and used the inhabitants with great cruelty, as they had done in former times (see Amos i. 13).

Ver. 9. Surely Moab shall be as Sodom, and the children of Ammon as Gomorrah.] Proverbial expressions of utter desolation (see Deut. xxix. 23, Isa. xiii. 19, xxxiv. 13, Jer. xlix. 18, l. 46).

A perpetual desolation:] Never more to be possessed by its former inhabitants.

The residue of my people shall spoil them, and the remnant of my people shall possess them.] Judas Maccabeus and his brethren subdued the Ammonites, as appears from 1 Macc. v. 6. But this and the seventh verse will receive their utmost completion at the general restoration of the Jewish nation: those that then escape, and return from their several dispersions, are elsewhere called by the name of the residue and the remnant (compare iii. 13, and see note upon Mic. iv. 7).

Ver. 10.] See Isa. xvi. 6, Jer. xlviii. 29.

Ver. 11. For he will famish all the gods of the earth:] He will deprive them of their worship and sacrifices, which the gentiles thought to be the food of their gods (see Deut. xxxii. 38). The LXX. render it, "He will destroy their gods." The destruction of idolatry is usually mentioned when the prophets describe the flourishing state of the church (see note upon Mic. v. 13, 14).

Men shall worship him, every one from his place.] Or, "In his place." And so the phrase may best be rendered Ezek. iii. 12 (see Noldius, p. 553). Men shall worship him every where, and not only in Jerusalem (compare Mal. i. 11, John iv. 21).

he will famish all the gods of the earth; and men shall worship him, every one from his place, even all the isles of the heathen.

12 ¶ Ye Ethiopians also, ye shall be slain by my sword.

13 And he will stretch out his hand against the north, and destroy Assyria; and will make Nineveh a desolation, and dry like a wilderness.

14 And flocks shall lie down in the midst of her, all the beasts of the nations: both the cormorant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it; their voice shall sing in the windows; desolation shall be in the thresholds: for he shall uncover the cedar-work.

15 This is the rejoicing city that dwelt carelessly, that said in her heart, I am, and there is none beside me: how is she become a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down in! every one that passeth by her shall hiss, and wag his hand.

Even all the isles of the heathen.] Or, "The isles of the gentiles," as the phrase is translated, Gen. x. 5 (see note upon Isa. xi. 11, xli. 1). The Jews call all places islands, to which they went by sea.

Ver. 12.] Ye shall be subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, who is a sword in my hand (Ps. xvii. 10), i. e. an instrument to execute my vengeance. The Ethiopians seem to comprehend the Egyptians too, whose confederates they were, and so underwent the same fate with them, when Nebuchadnezzar conquered Egypt (see Jer. xli. 9, Ezek. xxx. 5, 9).

Ver. 13. He will stretch out his hand against the north,] As Nebuchadnezzar subdued the countries lying southward of Judea, Egypt, and Ethiopia (ver. 12), so will he extend his conquests towards the north, and destroy Saracus the king of Assyria, whose royal seat was Nineveh (see the Preface to Nahum, and note upon iii. 18). This action preceded the desolations mentioned in the foregoing verses. Archbishop Usher placeth it in the sixteenth year of king Josiah, and Dr. Prideaux in the twenty-ninth year of the same reign.

Dry like a wilderness.] The inhabitants of Nineveh are compared to many waters, Nahum ii. 8. She shall be now exhausted of her people, and be uninhabited like a wilderness.

Ver. 14. Flocks shall lie down, &c.] See ver. 6.

All the beasts of the nations:] The Chaldee interprets it, "The several kinds of wild beasts:" as if the Hebrew goi, nations, were to be understood of the several species of wild beasts, as the word is used of several sorts of caterpillars, Joel i. 6. In like manner the ants are called "a people," Prov. xxx. 25.

Both the cormorant and the bittern shall lodge in the upper lintels of it;] These birds frequent desolate and forsaken places, and shall take up their habitation in the ruinous houses of that once populous city (compare Isa. xlii. 21, xxxiv. 11, 14).

He shall uncover the cedar-work.] The fine carved work or ceilings made of cedar (see Jer. xxii. 14), shall be exposed to the injuries of the weather, and so quickly come to ruin.

Ver. 15. This is the rejoicing city that dwelt carelessly,] Its inhabitants indulged themselves in their ease and pleasures, and they arrived at that degree of presumption, as to fancy that no strength or power could bring them down from their height, or make them cease to be the capital city of the world. Babylon is charged with the same degree of pride and carnal security, Isa. xlvii. 8.

Shall hiss, and wag his hand.] See Nah. iii. 19.

CHAPTER III.

1 Woe to her that is filthy and polluted, to the oppressing city!

2 She obeyed not the voice; she received not correction; she trusted not in the LORD; she drew not near to her God.

3 Her princes within her are roaring lions;

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—Jerusalem is severely reprov'd and threatened for her sins: yet the righteous are comforted with the hopes of a general conversion and restoration of the nation in God's due time.

Ver. 1. Woe to her that is filthy [or glutinous] and polluted, to the oppressing city.] The city Jerusalem, which is defiled with the sins of luxury and cruelty (see ver. 3, 4).

Ver. 2. She obeyed not the voice;] Of God's messengers, the prophets.

Ver. 3. Her princes within her are roaring lions;] Like so many beasts of prey, they devour the people by oppression and injustice (compare Ezek. xxii. 27, Mic. iii. 9—11, Hab. i. 8, Zech. x. 13).

They gnaw not the bones till the morrow.] They devour all presently, and leave not so much as the bones till the next day, as the most voracious creatures commonly do.

her judges are evening wolves; they gnaw not the bones till the morrow.

4 Her prophets are light and treacherous persons: her priests have polluted the sanctuary, they have done violence to the law.

5 The just LORD is in the midst thereof; he

Ver. 4. Her prophets are light and treacherous persons:] This is to be understood of the false prophets, who seduced the people by lying pretences to inspiration (see Jer. xxiii. 11, 32, Hos. ix. 7, Mic. iii. 11). The LXX. often render the Hebrew nabi, "prophet," by ψευδοπροφήτης, "false prophet," in Jeremiah, and Zech. xlii. 2.

Her priests have polluted the sanctuary, they have done violence to the law.] They have presumed to attend upon my service in the temple after they had polluted themselves with idolatry, and thereby have profaned my holy place (see i. 4); and have broken the ordinances of my law, by not observing the differences that it prescribes between what is clean and unclean (see Ezek. xxii. 26).

Ver. 5. The just Lord is in the midst thereof; he will not do iniquity:] The inhabitants of Jerusalem presume upon God's protection, having placed his name in their temple; so they say, Mic. iii. 11, "Is not the Lord among us?" or "in the midst of us," as the word is here translated; but they should withal will not do iniquity: every morning doth he bring his judgment to light, he faileth not; but the unjust knoweth no shame.

6 I have cut off the nations: their towers are desolate; I made their streets waste, that none passeth by: their cities are destroyed, so that there is no man, that there is none inhabitant.

7 I said, Surely thou wilt fear me, thou wilt receive instruction; so their dwelling should not be cut off, howsoever I punished them: but they rose early, and corrupted all their doings.

8 ¶ Therefore wait ye upon me, saith the LORD, until the day that I rise up to the prey:

consider, that he is just and holy, who will neither do iniquity, nor suffer it, without calling the offender to account.

Every morning doth he bring his judgment to light, he faileth not;] He doth not fail to give us every day fresh evidences of his justice, though the wicked continue hardened in their sins, and are grown past shame (see Jer. vi. 13, Mic. ii. 6). The expression, "every morning," alludes to the custom of administering justice in the morning (see Ps. ci. 8, Jer. xxi. 12).

Ver. 6.] I have executed my vengeance upon that great city Nineveh (ii. 13), and have brought my judgments nearer to you, by giving up your brethren of the ten tribes into the hands of Shalmaneser, who hath put an end to that kingdom, and hath carried its inhabitants captives into a strange land (see 2 Kings xvii. 6).

Ver. 7. Surely thou wilt fear me,] God is introduced as speaking after the manner of men, and expecting what effect such proceedings might in reason have produced (compare Isa. v. 4, Jer. viii. 6). In this sense we may most probably understand that expression of Isaiah (lxiii. 8), "He said, Surely they are my people, children that will not lie; so he was their Saviour:" i. e. God might justly conclude, that after such experience of his goodness, they would not prove false or treacherous to him.

So their dwelling should not be cut off, howsoever I punished them:] Or, "Whereinsoever I punished them" (see Noldius, p. 175). I might reasonably expect, that lesser corrections might reform them; and I need not be forced to proceed to such an utter excision, as I executed upon the ten tribes (see ver. 6).

They rose early, and corrupted all their doings.] They still increased their corruptions, notwithstanding all the advances king Josiah made to a general reformation (see the notes upon i. 4, 5). The phrase "rising early," denotes diligence and assiduity (see Jer. vii. 13, xxv. 3, xxxv. 15).

Ver. 8. Therefore wait ye upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey:] The connexion of this verse with what went before would better appear, if we translate the particle taken, nevertheless; as it plainly signifies Jer. v. 2, Mic. v. 3, and in other places. Notwithstanding these provocations, saith God, I exhort the godly among you to expect the fulfilling the promises I have made of restoring the Jewish nation to my wonted favour, in the latter ages of the world; in order to which great crisis, I will execute remarkable judgments upon the unbelievers and disobedient (see note upon Mic. v. 5).

My determination is to gather the nations,] This may perhaps be meant of the same general summons which Joel speaks of, when the nations shall be gathered "into the valley of Jehoshaphat" (see Joel iii. 2, 12, and notes there).

for my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms, to pour upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger: for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy.

9 For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the LORD, to serve him with one consent.

10 From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering.

11 In that day shalt thou be ashamed for all thy doings, wherein thou hast transgressed

For all the earth shall be devoured] The tender regard I have for my honour, which hath particularly been injured by that idolatry which is spread over the world, will provoke me to execute my vengeance upon the whole earth (see i. 18).

Ver. 9. For then will I turn to the people a pure language.] Or, "I will restore to the people a pure language:" i. e. I will turn them from their idolatry and other wickedness (see ver. 13), to glorify me "with one mind, and one mouth." The same thing is expressed by "speaking the language of Canaan," Isa. xix. 18. This is a blessing reserved for the latter ages, after the conversion of the Jews, and the coming in of the fulness of the gentiles, when "there shall be one Lord, and his name one," Zechar. xiv. 9.

To serve him with one consent.] The Hebrew reads, "With one shoulder." The metaphor is taken from beasts drawing together under one yoke; or men setting their shoulders together to carry the same burden.

Ver. 10.] The Jews who are dispersed into the most distant countries, such as was Ethiopia, which lay beyond Egypt, shall come into the Christian church, and make their religious acknowledgments there. The expression, "From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia," may be translated, "From the borders of the rivers of Ethiopia," both here and Isa. xviii. 1, where the same phrase occurs; the word in the Hebrew signifying indifferently the hither, or further side of a river. Ethiopia is described in both places as lying among the rivers, which may probably be understood of the several sluices and channels which the inhabitants are forced to keep open, thereby to prevent the Nile from overflowing their own country, or Egypt (see Dr. Heylin's Geography, in Ethiopia).

"The daughter of my dispersed," is the same with my dispersed, as the "daughter of Zion" is equivalent to Zion (see the note upon Jer. iv. 31). The phrase of bringing an offering, is taken from the sacrifices and oblations brought to the temple; and is in other places of the prophets applied to those that come into the Christian church (see Isa. xviii. 7, lx. 6, 7, 9, Mal. i. 11).

Ver. 11. Shalt thou not be ashamed for all thy doings,] Or, "Thou shalt not be put to shame for all thy doings" (compare ver. 19). Thou shalt not be made a public example by such remarkable judgments (see ver. 15), which have formerly made thee a reproach among the heathen (see Amos iii. 2, Mic. vi. 16, and notes there).

I will take away out of the midst of thee them that rejoice in thy pride,] I will purge out of thee those hypocrites who continued in their sins, and relied upon their outward privileges, such as being of the stock of Abraham, or having the temple of the Lord placed among them, as if these would secure them.

against me : for then I will take away out of the midst of thee them that rejoice in thy pride, and thou shalt no more be haughty because of my holy mountain.

12 I will also leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the LORD.

13 The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity, nor speak lies ; neither shall a deceitful tongue be found in their mouth : for they shall feed and lie down, and none shall make them afraid.

14 ¶ Sing, O daughter of Zion ; shout, O Israel ; be glad and rejoice with all the heart, O daughter of Jerusalem.

15 The LORD hath taken away thy judgments, he hath cast out thine enemy : the king of Israel, even the LORD, is in the midst of thee : thou shalt not see evil any more.

16 In that day it shall be said to Jerusalem, from guilt or punishment ; and thereupon despised the gentiles as not worthy of the same favours with themselves (see notes upon Mic. iii. 11).

Ver. 12. I will also leave—an afflicted and poor people,] Or, “A meek and poor people :” the blessings of the gospel are peculiarly promised to the poor (see Isa. xi. 4, xiv. 32, lxi. 1, Zech. xi. 11). Christ and his apostles apply these promises to those that were converted by their preaching, Matt. v. 3, xi. 5, 1 Cor. i. 26, 27, James ii. 5, which texts are meant of such as are endued with a true spirit of poverty, such as consists in a lowliness of mind, contempt of the world, and a resigned will. Afflictions are very useful to produce such a temper of mind, and therefore are often the lot of true disciples (see Acts. xiv. 22, Heb. xii. 7, 1 Pet. i. 7). By the afflicted may be meant those that “come out of great tribulation” (see Ezek. xxxviii. 8, and the note upon Isa. iv. 2).

Ver. 13. The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity,] The “remnant of Israel” is explained in the note upon Mic. iv. 7. These shall be holy ; the “rebels being purged out of them” (Ezek. xx. 38), as Jerusalem itself shall then be holy (compare Isa. xxxv. 8, lx. 21, Joel iii. 17, 21, Zech. xiv. 21, and see notes there).

For [or, therefore] they shall feed and lie down,] The great shepherd the Messiah shall both feed and protect them (compare Ezek. xxxiv. 28, Mic. iv. 4, v. 4, vii. 14).

Ver. 14.] These hymns of joy properly belong to the times of the gospel, and especially to the triumphant state of the church (compare Isa. xii. 6, liv. 1, Zech. ii. 10, xi. 9).

Ver. 15. The Lord—hath cast out thine enemy :] God hath removed thine enemies, who were the instruments of his vengeance.

The Lord, is in the midst of thee :] He gives manifest tokens of his presence in thee, and protection over thee (compare ver. 5, 17, Isa. iv. 5, 6, Rev. vii. 15, xxi. 3).

Thou shalt not see evil any more.] For all thine

Fear thou not : and to Zion, Let not thine hands be slack.

17 The LORD thy God in the midst of thee is mighty ; he will save, he will rejoice over thee with joy ; he will rest in his love, he will joy over thee with singing.

18 I will gather them that are sorrowful for the solemn assembly, who are of thee, to whom the reproach of it was a burden.

19 Behold, at that time I will undo all that afflict thee : and I will save her that halteth, and gather her that was driven out ; and I will get them praise and fame in every land where they have been put to shame.

20 At that time will I bring you again, even in the time that I gather you : for I will make you a name and a praise among all people of the earth, when I turn back your captivity before your eyes, saith the LORD.

enemies shall he subdued (see the former part of the verse, and compare Isa. xxxv. 10, li. 22, Joel. iii. 17, Rev. xxi. 4).

Ver. 16. Let not thine hands be slack.] Or weak, as the word is rendered in the parallel text, Isa. xxxv. 3. The prophet “comforts the feeble minded,” those whose spirits were sunk under their former afflictions ; and exhorts them to perform their duty with cheerfulness and diligence, as being assured of God’s assistance and protection (compare Heb. xii. 12).

Ver. 17.] He will take pleasure in doing thee good (compare Deut. xxx. 9, Isa. lxii. 5, lxxv. 19, Jer. xxxii. 41). He will rest, or take satisfaction in continuing his favour towards thee (compare Hos. xiv. 4).

Ver. 18.] I will assemble those Israelites who are dispersed in their several captivities, both that of Babylon and those of following times, who mourn for the loss of the public assemblies (compare Lam. ii. 6), and were grieved at the reproaches wherewith their enemies upbraided them, as if they were utterly forsaken of God (compare Ps. xlii. 3).

Ver. 19. Save her that halteth,] See Mic. iv. 6, 7. I will get them praise and fame in every land] God will give visible tokens of his care over them, in gathering them from their several dispersions over the world, and bringing them back into their own country (see Ezek. xxxviii. 8, 12, and the following verse).

Ver. 20. At that time will I bring you again,] I will gather you from your several dispersions, in order to bring you back into your own land (compare Isa. xi. 12, xxvii. 12, lvi. 8, Ezek. xxviii. 25, xxxiv. 13, Amos ix. 14).

For I will make you a name and a praise among all people of the earth,] I will make you the subject of men’s praise and admiration, who shall be induced to glorify God, when they shall see the wonderful works he hath wrought for you, in restoring you from your several dispersions, and giving you a joyful meeting together.

OF

THE PROPHET HAGGAI.

PREFACE.

OF what family this prophet was, he hath given us no intimation: but the time when he prophesied he has distinctly noted, viz. in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes. The occasion of this prophecy was the stop that was put to the building of the temple, after the foundation had been laid, according to the commandment of Cyrus, about seventeen years before.

CHAPTER I.

1 IN the second year of Darius the king, in the sixth month, in the first day of the month, came the word of the LORD by Haggai the prophet unto Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and Joshua the son of Josedec, the high priest, saying,

2 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, saying, This people say, The time is not come, the time that the LORD's house should be built.

3 Then came the word of the LORD by Haggai the prophet, saying,

4 Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses, and this house lie waste?

5 Now therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts; Consider your ways.

6 We have sown much, and bring in little; ye eat, but ye have not enough; ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink; ye clothe you, but there is none warm; and he that earneth wages earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes.

7 ¶ Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Consider your ways.

8 Go up to the mountain, and bring wood, and build the house; and I will take pleasure in it, and I will be glorified, saith the LORD.

9 Ye looked for much, and, lo, it came to

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet reproveth the people's delays in rebuilding the temple, and tells them, this their neglect was the cause they prospered no better: he encourageth them to set about it, and promiseth God's assistance in it.

Ver. 1. In the second year of Darius] Compare Ezra iv. 24, v. 12. This is the same Darius who is called in the heathen writers Darius Hystaspes; as shall be proved in the note upon ii. 3, and Zech i. 12.

Came the word of the Lord by Haggai—unto Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel,] Called Zorobabel the son of Salathiel, Matt. i. 12, Luke iii. 27. He was grandson to Jeconiah king of Judah, who was carried captive to Babylon (see 1 Chron. iii. 17, 19); whom king Cyrus made Æchmalotarches, or “governor of the Jews,” who returned from the captivity; as being the eldest person of the royal family: he had the name of Shezbazzar given him by the Chaldeans (see Ezra i. 8, compared with ii. 2), as Daniel was called by them Belteshazzar (Dan. i. 7).

Joshua the son of Josedech,] Called Jeshua in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah: his father Josedech or Jehozadah, was carried captive to Babylon (see 1 Chron. vi. 15).

Ver. 2.] They pretended they had not the encouragement and protection of the king of Persia. This prophecy seems to be delivered before Darius had granted his decree for building the temple (compare Ezra v. 1, with vi. 1).

Ver. 4.] You complain of the times; yet they have not been so difficult, but that you have found means and opportunity to build fine houses for yourselves, though you are content to let the house of God lie in ruins. It argues a great contempt of God and religion, when men think no cost or finery too much to bestow upon themselves, and the meanest accommodation good enough for the service of God.

Ver. 5, 6. Consider your ways. Ye have sown much, and bring in little;] Consider both your ingratitude in thus neglecting to restore my house and worship, and what you have got by these your dealings, viz. how none of your undertakings thrive, or are successful: nor do you enjoy the fruits of your labours (see Mic. vi. 15, compare Ezek. viii. 10).

He that earneth wages earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes.] Whatever gains he makes, they are followed by such losses, as leave him no richer than he was before: or provisions are so dear (see ver. 11), that men can but just live by their labour.

Ver. 8. Go up to the mountain, and bring wood,] Go to any of the forests upon the mountains (see Neh. ii. 8), and cut down timber to carry on the building. They entered upon the work before they had any decree from Darius to forward the work (see Ezra v. 2, 3). It is probable, that afterward they had leave to fetch cedar from mount Lebanon (see Ezra iii. 7).

little; and when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it. Why? saith the LORD of hosts. Because of mine house that is waste, and ye run every man unto his own house.

10 Therefore the heaven over you is stayed from dew, and the earth is stayed from her fruit.

11 And I called for a drought upon the land, and upon the mountains, and upon the corn, and upon the new wine, and upon the oil, and upon that which the ground bringeth forth, and upon men, and upon cattle, and upon all the labour of the hands.

12 ¶ Then Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, with all the remnant of the people, obeyed the

I will be glorified,] Or, “I will place my glory there,” as the Chaldee expounds it (see ii. 7).

Ver. 9. Ye looked for much,] See ver. 6, and ii. 16. I did blow [or, I had blown] upon it.] I had blasted the fruits of the earth, while they were in the field (see ver. 11, and ii. 17).

Ye run every man unto his own house.] Ye make what haste ye can to build your own houses, and let mine lie in ruins.

voice of the LORD their God, and the words of Haggai the prophet, as the LORD their God had sent him, and the people did fear before the LORD.

13 Then spake Haggai the LORD’s messenger in the LORD’s message unto the people, saying, I am with you, saith the LORD.

14 And the LORD stirred up the spirit of Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and the spirit of Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, and the spirit of all the remnant of the people; and they came and did work in the house of the LORD of hosts, their God, 15 In the four and twentieth day of the sixth month, in the second year of Darius the king.

Ver. 10, 11. The heaven—is stayed from dew, &c.] I have punished you with great drought, wherein the dew itself ceases to fall (see 1 Kings xvii. 1). This blasted and withered the fruits of the earth; a curse formerly denounced against you for your disobedience (see Lev. xix. 24, Deut. xxviii. 23).

Ver. 12. Then Zerubbabel] Compare Ezra v. 2.

Ver. 13. Haggai the Lord’s messenger] Or, prophet (compare Isa. xlii. 26, Mal. iii. 1).

CHAPTER II.

1 IN the seventh month, in the one and twentieth day of the month, came the word of the LORD by the prophet Haggai, saying,

2 Speak now to Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, governor of Judah, and to Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest, and to the residue of the people, saying,

3 Who is left among you that saw this house in her first glory? and how do ye see it now? is it not in your eyes in comparison of it as nothing?

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet encourageth the builders by a promise, that the glory of the second temple should be greater than that of the first; and that in the following year God would bless them with a fruitful harvest. In the conclusion he foretells the setting up the kingdom of Christ, under the name of Zerubbabel.

Ver. 3.] When the foundation of the house was laid in the second year of Cyrus, many of the ancient men that had seen the first house, wept to see how much the second temple would fall short of the glory of the first (Ezra iii. 12). The second year of Cyrus was fifty-three years after the destruction of the first temple; so the oldest men among those that returned home might very well remember how glorious that was. The prophecy was uttered fifteen years after the foundations of the second temple were laid; so there might some still survive that saw the first. This is an evident proof, that the Darius mentioned in this prophecy must be Darius Hystaspes: for they that suppose Darius Nothus to be here meant, must allow the distance of one hundred and sixty-six years between the destruction of the first temple and the time of this prophecy: and it cannot be

4 Yet now be strong, O Zerubbabel, saith the LORD; and be strong, O Joshua, son of Josedech, the high priest; and be strong all ye people of the land, saith the LORD, and work: for I am with you, saith the LORD of hosts:

5 According to the word that I covenanted with you when ye came out of Egypt, so my spirit remaineth among you: fear ye not.

6 For thus saith the LORD of hosts; Yet once it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land;

imagined, that any number of men could be capable of comparing the difference between the two temples at that distance of time: see this farther proved in the note upon Zech. i. 12.

Ver. 5.] I will fulfil those promises I made with you, when I delivered you out of Egypt; that, upon your obedience, I would not “leave you, nor forsake you,” but guide and prosper you in all your undertakings (see Neh. ix. 20, Isa. lxiii. 11).

Ver. 6. Yet once, it is a little while,] Or, “Once more,” as the LXX. render it, whom St. Paul follows, Heb. xii. 26. The phrase implies such an alteration as shall not give way to any farther change, as the apostle there expounds it. The space of time from this prophecy to the coming of the Messias may be called “a little while,” in comparison of the several ages expired since the first promise of a Redeemer. A learned prelate, in his excellent Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies (p. 88), translates the words to this sense: “After one kingdom [viz. the Grecian, which succeeded the Persian monarchy, at this time subsisting] it is but a little while; and [or, after that] I will shake all nations,” &c.

I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land;] Great commotions and changes in the world are expressed by shaking the heavens and the earth (see Ezek. xxv. 15, xxxviii. 19, Joel iii.

7 And I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come : and I will fill this house with glory, saith the LORD of hosts.

8 The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the LORD of hosts.

9 The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the LORD of hosts : and in this place will I give peace, saith the LORD of hosts.

10 ¶ In the four and twentieth day of the ninth month, in the second year of Darius, came the word of the LORD by Haggai the prophet, saying,

11 Thus saith the LORD of hosts ; Ask now the priests concerning the law, saying,

12 If one bear holy flesh in the skirt of his garment, and with his skirt do touch bread, or pottage, or wine, or oil, or any meat, shall it be holy ? And the priests answered and said, No.

13 Then said Haggai, If one that is unclean by a dead body touch any of these, shall it be unclean ? And the priests answered and said, It shall be unclean.

14 Then answered Haggai, and said, So is this people, and so is this nation before me, saith the LORD ; and so is every work of their hands ; and that which they offer there is unclean.

15 And now, I pray you, consider from this day and upward, from before a stone was laid upon a stone in the temple of the LORD :

16 Since those days were, when one came to an heap of twenty measures, there were but ten : when one came to the pressfat for to draw out fifty vessels out of the press, there were but twenty.

17 I smote you with blasting and with mildew and with hail in all the labours of your hands ; yet ye turned not to me, saith the LORD.

18 Consider now from this day and upward, from the four and twentieth day of the ninth month, even from the day that the foundation of the LORD's temple was laid, consider it.

16). These expressions may denote here the great commotions that should be in the Roman empire (see the last note), from the death of Julius Cæsar till near the birth of Christ : or it may in general signify the introducing such a kingdom or religion, of which the Messiah is to be the head ; which shall in the end "break in pieces," and destroy all the other dominions of the world (see the notes upon ver. 21, 22).

Ver. 7. The desire of all nations shall come :] He shall come to this house, that shall answer the wishes and desires of mankind, by supplying all those defects that hindered them in the performance of their duty. Such a guide and director, as the wisest men among the heathens wished for, and whose coming was the hope of Israel and completion of all the promises made to their fathers : Acts xxvi. 6, xxviii. 20, see Gen. xii. 3, xlix. 10, where the old translations read the latter part of the verse to this sense : "His (or, to him) shall be the expectation of the people," Mal. iii. 1.

I will fill this house with glory,] Though it wants the "cloud of glory" overshadowing the mercy-seat, which was a symbol of the divine presence peculiar to Solomon's temple (see Ps. lxxx. 1), yet I will honour this second temple with a much greater glory ; viz. the presence of the Messiah, in whom shall "dwell all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," Col. ii. 9, where he shall publish his saving doctrine to the world (see Luke xix. 47, xx. 1, xxi. 38, John xviii. 20).

Ver. 8.] Solomon's temple was more richly adorned with silver and gold than this ; and I, that am the Lord of all the world, could easily command the riches of it, and bring them together, for beautifying this, my house, if I took delight in richness of ornaments.

Ver. 9.] The glory of this second temple shall exceed that of the former, not in riches or costly ornaments, but in this respect, that there the "Prince of peace" shall make his appearance, and the "gospel of peace" shall be preached and published (see Isa. ix. 6, Mic. v. 5, Eph. ii. 14). The modern Jews expect a third temple, in which this prophecy will be verified ; whereas the prophet plainly speaks of the same temple which they then saw, and was in their eyes as nothing, in comparison of the former. The ancient Jews speak of the temple, from the time of Zerubbabel to its destruction under Vespasian, as one and the same temple ; particularly Josephus, De Bello Jud. lib. viii. cap. 18 (see the above cited treatise).

Ver. 11. Ask now the priests] Whose office it was to "put a difference between holy and unholy, and between clean and unclean" Lev. x. 10.

Ver. 12. If one bear [or, carry] holy flesh in the skirt of his garment,] By the rules of the law, things immediately dedicated to God's service did convey some degree of holiness to common things that touched them ; so the "altar sanctified the gift" that was laid upon it, Exod. xxix. 37, and "whatsoever touched the flesh of the sin-offering was holy," Lev. vi. 27. But this rule did not extend so far as to make the garment that touched any of the offerings capable of conveying holiness to any thing else.

Ver. 13.] The law was plain in that case (see Numb. xix. 11). The least defect is sufficient to make a thing evil or sinful ; whereas to make it good and perfect, a concurrence of all good qualities is requisite.

Ver. 14.] In like manner, saith God, the inward contempt and disregard of my worship, which this people discover by their backwardness to carry on the building of my temple, makes every thing they undertake, and even the sacrifices they offer on my altar, hateful and unacceptable.

Ver. 15. From before a stone was laid upon a stone in the temple of the Lord :] From the time that a stop had been put to the building of the temple, after the first foundations of it were laid (compare Ezra v. 3).

Ver. 16.] The fruits of the earth did not yield their usual increase, because of the unkindly seasons wherewith I punish them (see the following verse, and i. 2, Zech. viii. 10).

Ver. 17. Yet ye turned not to me,] Ye did not lay my judgments to heart, nor consider that they were inflicted for your sin, in neglecting to rebuild my temple, and restore my worship in it.

Ver. 18. Consider now from this day and upward,] The word mollah, upward, signifies likewise forward, (see 1 Sam. xvi. 13), and so it should be translated here. In the fifteenth verse the prophet exhorted them to reflect upon the calamities they had suffered from the time the building of the temple was left off ; now he bids them look forward from the day the building was renewed (see i. 15), and they would find a visible change of their affairs for the better.

From the day that the foundation—was laid,] The 19 Is the seed yet in the barn? yea, as yet the vine, and the fig-tree, and the pomegranate, and the olive-tree, hath not brought forth: from this day will I bless you.

20 ¶ And again the word of the LORD came unto Haggai in the four-and-twentieth day of the month, saying,

21 Speak to Zerubbabel, governor of Judah, saying, I will shake the heavens and the earth;

22 And I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms, and I will destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen; and I will overthrow the chariots, and those that ride in them; and the horses and their riders shall come down, every one by the sword of his brother.

23 In that day, saith the LORD of hosts, will I take thee, O Zerubbabel, my servant, the son of Shealtiel, saith the LORD, and will make thee as a signet: for I have chosen thee, saith the LORD of hosts.

prophet expresses the carrying on of the building as if it were a new foundation, because the work had been so long interrupted (compare Zech. viii. 9).

Ver. 19.] Is the harvest already laid up in the barn? or any fruits of the earth gathered in? No, certainly: this is but the ninth month (answering to our November), when no judgment can be made what will be the increase of the year following; yet from this time I promise you the blessing of a fruitful year; as an encouragement to you to carry on the building (compare Zech. viii. 12).

Ver. 21. Speak to Zerubbabel, governor of Judah.] The same title which is given to him, i. 1, wherein he was the type of the Messiah, to whom the following words belong.

Ibid. and ver. 22. I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms, &c.] This prophecy plainly relates to the second coming of Christ, or to that illustrious appearance of his kingdom, which shall put a period to the kingdoms of the earth, and "the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdom of the Lord and his Christ" (see Dan. ii. 44, Rev. xi. 15).

I will overthrow the chariots, &c.] Compare Mic. v. 5, 10, and see notes there.

Ver. 23.] I will invest thee with my power and authority, as the head of my church, and judge of the world. So kings depute their viceroys by giving them their signet (see Gen. xli. 42), which was particularly the custom of the Persian monarchs, whose deputy Zerubbabel was (see Esth. iii. 10, viii. 2); or else the expression may denote one particularly near and dear unto God, who was always under his eye and care (compare Jer. xxii. 24, Cant. viii. 6). This could not be fulfilled in Zerubbabel, who did not, in all likelihood, live many years after the finishing of the temple; and, to be sure, did not see any of those great changes here foretold: and therefore the Messiah must be here described under the name of Zerubbabel; as he elsewhere is under that of David (see the above cited treatise, p. 248)

OF

THE PROPHET ZECHARIAH.

PREFACE.

ZECHARIAH was the son of Barachiah, and the grandson of Iddo: he is called the son of Iddo, Ezra v. 1, vi. 14, the grandson being often called the son in the scriptures; as hath been observed upon Dan. v. 2. He was contemporary with Haggai, and prophesied in the second year of Darius Hystaspes (see the note upon Hag. ii. 3, and upon Zech. i. 10). There is an Iddo mentioned Neh. xii. 4, among those Levites that came from Babylon with Zerubbabel; from whence Dr. Alix infers, that the prophet Zechariah his grandson must have prophesied some considerable time after the first return from the captivity, and therefore would understand the Darius here mentioned to be Darius Nothus. This argument is altogether inconclusive; for if Iddo was advanced in years when he returned, he might have a grandson thirty years of age in the second year of Darius Hystaspes, which was sixteen or seventeen after the first of Cyrus. And it appears that Zechariah was a young man when he saw the vision related at the beginning of this prophecy (see ii. 4). Beside, there is no necessity of supposing the Iddo that was grandfather of Zechariah to be the same person that is mentioned in Nehemiah. In the books of Ezra and Nehemiah there is mention of two Ezras (compare Ezra vii. 1, with Neh. xii. 1), of two Nehemiahs (compare Neh. i. 1, with iii. 16), and there is a Daniel mentioned Ezra viii. 16, a distinct person from the famous prophet of that name: and it may as well be supposed that there were two Iddos.

The design of the first part of this prophecy is the same with that of Haggai, viz. to encourage the Jews to go on with rebuilding of the temple, by giving them assurance of God's assistance and protection; from whence he proceeds to foretell the glory of the Christian church, the true temple or house of God, under its great high-priest and governor Christ Jesus, of whom Zerubbabel and Joshua the high-priest were figures. The latter part of the prophecy, from ch. ix. probably relates to the state of the Jews under the Maccabees, and then foretells their rejecting the Messias, and their conversion afterward, and some remarkable passages that should happen to them in the latter ages of the world.

CHAPTER I.

1 IN the eighth month, in the second year of Darius, came the word of the LORD unto Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo the prophet, saying,

2 The LORD hath been sore displeased with your fathers.

3 Therefore say thou unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Turn ye unto me, saith the LORD of hosts, and I will turn unto you, saith the LORD of hosts.

4 Be ye not as your fathers, unto whom the former prophets have cried, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Turn ye now from your evil ways, and from your evil doings: but they did not hear, nor hearken unto me, saith the LORD.

5 Your fathers, where are they? and the prophets, do they live for ever?

6 But my words and my statutes, which I commanded my servants the prophets, did they not take hold of your fathers? and they returned and said, Like as the LORD of hosts thought to do unto us, according to our ways, and according to our doings, so hath he dealt with us.

7 ¶ Upon the four and twentieth day of the eleventh month, which is the month Sebat, in the second year of Darius, came the word of the LORD unto Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, the son of Iddo the prophet, saying,

8 I saw by night, and behold a man riding upon a red horse, and he stood among the myrtle trees that were in the bottom; and behind him were there red horses, speckled, and white.

9 Then said I, O my lord, what are these? And the angel that talked with me said unto me, I will shew thee what these be.

10 And the man that stood among the myrtle trees answered and said, These are they whom the LORD hath sent to walk to and fro through the earth.

11 And they answered the angel of the LORD that stood among the myrtle trees, and said,

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—After an exhortation to repentance, the prophet relates two visions shown to him, implying the restoration of the Jewish state, and security from their enemies, while they were rebuilding the temple.

Ver. 1. Second year of Darius.] See the Preface.

Ver. 2.] Though God hath been justly displeased with your fathers, and punished them and their children with seventy years' captivity, yet now he declares himself willing to be reconciled to you upon your repentance.

Ver. 4.] Such exhortation the former prophets gave your forefathers, particularly Jeremiah, whose words are here referred to (see Jer. xxv. 5, xxxv. 15). Do not imitate them in their obstinacy.

Ver. 5, 6.] Though the prophets, and those to whom they delivered their message, are dead, yet the commandments delivered by their ministry still continue in full force; which appears by the judgments which came upon your fathers for transgressing them, as they themselves could not but acknowledge. And the same punishments will overtake you, if ye continue disobedient.

Ver. 6. Like as the Lord of hosts thought to do unto us.] Your fathers were forced to acknowledge with sorrow, that God had exactly fulfilled all his threatenings denounced against them (see Lam. ii. 17).

Ver. 7. The eleventh month, which is the month Sebat.] This is the Chaldean name of the eleventh month; as Nisan, Elul, Chisleu, Tebeth, and Adar, are the names of other months mentioned in the books written after the captivity. The Jews distinguish their months only by the order of their succession, as the first, second, &c. So that if the books of Kings were writ by Jeremiah, as some suppose, the Chaldean names of the months which occur 1 Kings vi. 2, 38, viii. 2, were added afterward by Ezra.

Ver. 8. A man riding upon a red horse.] A red horse is an emblem of war and bloodshed (see Rev. vi. 4). The man, or angel (ver. 11), riding upon him, denotes the Logos, or Son of God, appearing as "the captain of God's hosts," or armies (see Josh. v. 13, 14, and notes upon ver. 12, 13, 20).

He stood among the myrtle trees that were in the bottom;] As if he and his companions were refreshing themselves in a shady valley, after the fatigues of war. The vision denotes the peace which ensued after Darius had executed God's vengeance upon the inhabitants of Babylon, and made himself master of their city by the stratagem of Zopyrus (compare ver. 11, and see Dr. Prideaux, under the fourth, fifth, and sixth years of Darius.)

Behind him were there red horses, speckled, and white.] These may denote the various successes of Darius's arms during his reign, which were sometimes fortunate, at other times not so.

Ver. 9. The angel that talked with me] The angel that made known this night vision to me: so an angel is said to "speak with Jacob in a dream," Gen. xxxi. 11.

Ver. 10. The man that stood among the myrtle trees] This was an angel of an order superior to him that was mentioned ver. 9, who prevents that angel, and takes upon him to return an answer to the prophet's question; or else sends his answer to Zechariah by that angel mentioned ver. 9, as Christ sent his Revelation to St. John "by an angel," Rev. i. 1.

These are they whom the Lord hath sent to walk to and fro through the earth.] To these angels he hath entrusted the administration of the affairs of the Persian empire (see vi. 10).

We have walked to and fro through the earth, and, behold, all the earth sitteth still, and is at rest.

12 ¶ Then the angel of the Lord answered and said, O LORD of hosts, how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem and on the cities of Judah, against which thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years?

13 And the LORD answered the angel that talked with me with good words and comfortable words.

14 So the angel that communed with me said unto me, Cry thou, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with a great jealousy.

Ver. 11. They answered the angel of the Lord that stood among the myrtle trees.] They answer this man, (ver. 8), or angel, as if he were their superior and commander (see ver. 10); he is distinguished from the other "angel of the Lord," ver. 12, by the circumstance of his "standing among the myrtle trees."

All the earth sitteth still, and is at rest.] Now all the enemies of the Persian empire in general, and of all the Jews in particular (see ver. 9), are quiet; so this seems a proper time for setting forward the building of the temple, which hath been so long interrupted.

Ver. 12. Then the angel of the Lord answered and said, O Lord of hosts,] The angel mentioned ver. 9, makes his supplication to the superior angel, ver. 8, 10, who was indeed the Logos, or Son of God, being called by the name of Jehovah, here and ver. 13, 20 (compare iii. 1, 2, xii. 8, 10).

How long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem and on the cities of Judah.] Cyrus only gave orders for the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra i. 3, vi. 3), so a great part of the city lay in ruins till Nehemiah procured an order from Artaxerxes for rebuilding it (see Neh. i. 3, ii. 3, 8, 17, vii. 4). The Jews, after the captivity, repaired to the several cities where their inheritance lay (Ezra ii. 70), but had not ability to rebuild or fortify them in a regular manner.

Against which thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years!] There are three ways of computing the seventy years' captivity taken notice of in scripture. The first is, beginning from the fourth year of Jehoiakim to the first of Cyrus; this is Jeremiah's account, Jer. xxv. 1, 11, which Daniel follows, Dan. ix. 2. Another may be computed from the besieging of Jerusalem, in the ninth year of Zedekiah, and in the tenth month, for which a solemn fast was kept by the Jews (compare 2 Kings xxv. 1, with Zeck. viii. 19), this computation ends in the second year of Darius, which is the reckoning Zechariah here follows. Or, lastly, if we compute the beginning of the seventy years from the destruction of Jerusalem and the first temple, which came to pass in the eleventh year of the same reign (ibid. ver. 2), they will be accomplished in the fourth year of Darius; and this computation agrees with what is said below, vii. 1, 5. The last two ways of reckoning the seventy years may be reduced to one, only by supposing, that the prophet in this verse sets down a complete number for an incomplete, and calls that space of time seventy years, which wanted very little of it; a way of speaking, of which several instances may be produced.

Ver. 13.] The Lord answered] "The Lord of hosts" mentioned in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 14. I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with a great jealousy.] Or, "I am zealous for Jeru-

15 And I am very sore displeased with the heathen that are at ease: for I was but a little displeased, and they helped forward the affliction.

16 Therefore thus saith the LORD; I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies: my house shall be built in it, saith the LORD of hosts, and a line shall be stretched forth upon Jerusalem.

17 Cry yet, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; My cities through prosperity shall yet be spread abroad; and the LORD shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem.

18 ¶ Then lifted I up mine eyes, and saw, and behold four horns.

19 And I said unto the angel that talked with salem with great zeal;" for so the word kinnah often signifies. See Isa. ix. 7, xxvi. 11, lxiii. 15, where the translators read, "Their envy at the people;" but the words might be better rendered, "Thy zeal for the people." God here tells the prophet by his angel, that he has a great concern for the welfare of his people, of which he will give evident proofs.

Ver. 15. I am very sore displeased with the heathen that are at ease:] Who have not yet felt the severity of my judgments, but they shall not escape unpunished. This may be understood of the Babylonians, Samaritans, and other neighbours of the Jews, who had not been made such examples of God's severity, as the Jews were (compare Jer. xxv. 29).

For I was but a little displeased, and they helped forward [or, increased] the affliction.] I made the Babylonians instruments of my vengeance upon the Jews, but they exceeded their commission, and acted as they were prompted by their own ambition and cruelty (compare Isa. xlvi. 6, and see note there). The former part of the verse may be thus translated; "For I was but for a little time displeased;" I punished them with a seventy years' captivity: a short punishment in comparison of the many years that they had offended me; but these their many enemies have brought new troubles upon them after their return home, and hindered them from rebuilding their temple (see Ezra iv. 1, 4, &c.).

Ver. 16. I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies:] I am returned to dwell in Jerusalem, and will remove all former marks of my displeasure, and will cause the temple to be rebuilt in it for the place of my residence (see ii. 10), which I had for some time forsaken.

A line shall be stretched forth upon Jerusalem.] In order to rebuild the streets and walls of it (see ii. 2).

Ver. 17. My cities through prosperity shall yet be spread abroad;] The lesser cities shall likewise be multiplied, and increased in inhabitants.

The Lord shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem.] The Lord shall comfort Zion by showing his wonted kindness to her after her affliction (compare Isa. li. 3), and making Jerusalem the place of his residence (see ver. 16).

Ver. 18.] Horns often signify the power and strength of princes or people; the metaphor being taken from those cattle whose strength lies in their horns. The four horns may denote the Samaritans, the Arabians, the Ammonites, and the Philistines, who were the great hinderers of the Jews rebuilding the temple (see Neh. iv. 7), or else they may signify in general those their enemies, among whom they were dispersed to the four winds of heaven (ii. 6).

Ver. 19. These are the horns which have scattered Judah, Israel,] Israel being mentioned distinctly me, What be these? And he answered me, These are the horns which have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem.

20 And the LORD shewed me four carpenters.

21 Then said I, What come these to do? And from Judah, means those of the ten tribes, which were carried away into Babylon with the tribe of Judah, and returned with them (see note upon viii. 13).

he spake, saying, These are the horns which have scattered Judah, so that no man did lift up his head: but these are come to fray them, to cast out the horns of the Gentiles, which lifted up their horn over the land of Judah to scatter it.

Ver. 20. The Lord [see ver. 13] showed me four carpenters.] Or, smiths, according to the number of the horns. These were to repair the destructions which the horns had made.

CHAPTER II.

1 I LIFTED up mine eyes again, and looked, and behold a man with a measuring line in his hand.

2 Then said I, Whither goest thou? And he said unto me, To measure Jerusalem, to see what is the breadth thereof, and what is the length thereof.

3 And, behold, the angel that talked with me went forth, and another angel went out to meet him,

4 And said unto him, Run, speak to this young man, saying, Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls for the multitude of men and cattle therein:

5 For I, saith the LORD, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—The flourishing state of Jerusalem is foretold, and the Jews still remaining at Babylon are warned to leave it, that they may not be involved in the calamities which are coming upon it.

Ver. 1. A man with a measuring line in his hand.] An angel in human appearance: see ver. 3. This angel appeared with a measuring line in his hand, to take the proportions of the city, in order to the re-building it, as architects used to do (see Ezek. xi. 3).

Ver. 3. The angel that talked with me] See i. 9. And another angel went out] Or, “The other angel;” i. e. the angel “with the measuring line in his hand.”

Ver. 4. And said unto him, Run, speak to this young man.] The second angel spoke to the former, to inform me farther concerning the flourishing state of Jerusalem. Zechariah might probably be a young man when he was first honoured with the gift of prophecy, as Jeremiah and Daniel were (see Jer. i. Dan. i. 17).

Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls for the multitude of men and cattle] The inhabitants of Jerusalem will multiply so fast, that the houses within the walls will not be able to contain them, and their cattle will increase in proportion (see Jer. xxxi. 27). Under the captivity the land was made a desolation “without man or beast” (Jer. xxxiii. 12); now the contrary blessing is promised.

Ver. 5.] Its inhabitants may safely live without the walls of the city (ver. 4), for I the Lord will defend it by my angels, as so many flames of fire surrounding it (Ps. cvi. 4), as I did Elisha against his enemies (2 Kings vi. 17). And my especial presence shall be its protection, of which the “cloud of glory” in the first temple was a figure. This promise will receive its utmost completion in that New 6 ¶ Ho, ho, come forth, and flee from the land of the north, saith the LORD: for I have spread you abroad as the four winds of the heaven, saith the LORD.

7 Deliver thyself, O Zion, that dwellest with the daughter of Babylon.

8 For thus saith the LORD of hosts; After the glory hath he sent me unto the nations which spoiled you: for he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye.

9 For, behold, I will shake mine hand upon them, and they shall be a spoil to their servants: and ye shall know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me.

10 ¶ Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion: for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the LORD.

Jerusalem described Rev. xxi. 10, where the “glory of God and the Lamb” are said to be “the light thereof,” ver. 11, 23 (compare Isa. lx. 19).

Ver. 6. Come forth, and flee from the land of the north.] Chaldea, and Babylon the principal city of it, are called by that name, because they lay northward of Judea (see Jer. i. 14, iv. 6, vi. 1). The Jews who still remained in Babylon and the country thereabout, are exhorted to return with all speed from thence, for a reason assigned, ver. 9.

For I have spread you abroad [or, scattered you] as the four winds] Compare Ezek. xvii. 21. As I have scattered you and your brethren of the ten tribes all the world over, so in due time I will gather you from your several dispersions, of which your present restoration from Babylon shall be an earnest.

Ver. 7.] “The daughter of Babylon” is the same with Babylon (see Ps. cxxxvii. 8, and note upon Jer. iv. 31).

Ver. 8. After the glory hath he sent me unto the nations which spoiled you.] After I have given you the promise of restoring Jerusalem to such a glorious state (so the Chaldee explains it), I, the prophet Zechariah, am sent to execute God’s judgments upon the Chaldeans, who spoiled you of all your wealth and ornaments.

He that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye.] God is very sensible of every injury offered to his people (compare Ps. cv. 15): it is like hurting the eye, which is the most tender and sensible part of the body (see Ps. xvii. 8). And though he made the Babylonians instruments of his vengeance, yet now he will call them to account for exceeding their commission (see note upon i. 15).

Ver. 9. I will shake mine hand upon [or, over] them, and they shall be a spoil to their servants.] The words are a continuation of God’s message, who proceeds to speak thus to the Jews by Zechariah: I will hold my rod over the Babylonians (compare

11 And many nations shall be joined to the LORD in that day, and shall be my people: and I will dwell in the midst of thee, and thou shalt know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me unto thee.

Isa. xi. 15, xix. 16), and I will deliver their city into the hand of the Persians, who were formerly their servants (see note upon Isa. xxii. 6), who shall become masters of its wealth. This threatening was fulfilled when Darius took Babylon after a siege of twelve months, beat down its walls, and put three thousand of the principal citizens to death (see Dr. Prideaux, under the fifth and sixth years of Darius).

Ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me.] These words are to be understood as spoken by the prophet himself; when this judgment is executed upon the Chaldeans, it will be an undoubted sign and proof of the truth of my mission (compare Ezek. xxxiii. 33).

Ver. 10.] Here God speaks again to his people, and saith, he will give them manifest tokens of his presence among them (see note upon ver. 5, and compare Lev. xxvi. 12, Ezek. xxxvii. 27).

Ver. 11. Many nations shall be joined to the Lord] The church shall be enlarged by the accession of the gentiles to it; and shall receive a farther increase, when, upon the conversion of the Jews, the fulness of the gentiles shall be brought into it. This promise relates chiefly to the latter times (compare viii. 21—23).

12 And the LORD shall inherit Judah his portion in the holy land, and shall choose Jerusalem again.

13 Be silent, O all flesh, before the LORD: for he is raised up out of his holy habitation.

Thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto thee.] The fulfilling of these my words, saith the prophet, shall be an undeniable evidence of the truth of my mission (see ver. 9).

Ver. 12.] God shall give visible tokens that the land of Judea and its inhabitants are his peculiar people; according to the tenor of that covenant he made with their fathers, "The land is his," Lev. xxv. 32, and therefore is called "the holy land," as Jerusalem is named "the holy city:" where the temple shall again be built, a token of his presence: and as the people shall constantly profess themselves his worshippers, so he will afford them gracious instances of his favour and protection. This may perhaps be more fully verified at the general restoration of that nation.

Ver. 13.] Let all men be silent in token of the profoundest reverence and submission (see Hab. ii. 20), when God comes down from heaven (compare Mic. i. 3), or gives visible signs of his appearance to execute judgment upon his adversaries, or to show mercy unto his servants. Heaven is called "the habitation of God's holiness," Deut. xxvi. 15, Isa. lxiii. 15.

CHAPTER III.

1 AND he shewed me Joshua the high priest standing before the angel of the LORD, and Satan standing at his right hand to resist him.

2 And the LORD said unto Satan, The LORD rebuke thee, O Satan; even the LORD that hath chosen Jerusalem rebuke thee: is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?

3 Now Joshua was clothed with filthy garments, and stood before the angel.

4 And he answered and spake unto those that

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—Under the figure of Joshua the high-priest, clothed with new priestly attire, is set forth the glory of Christ, as the corner-stone of the church.

Ver. 1. And he shewed me Joshua the high-priest standing before the angel of the Lord,] The "angel that talked with me" (ii. 3) represented to me a new vision: viz. that of "Joshua the high-priest standing before the angel of the Lord," or the Logos, mentioned i. 11. He is called the Lord in the following verse.

Satan standing at his right hand to resist him.] i. e. To be his accuser, as the devil is called, Rev. xii. 10, so here he is represented as aggravating the faults, or infirmities of Joshua, the representative of the whole body of the Jews (see the following words); by this means to prevail with God to permit the Jews to be still under the power of their adversaries. So the prince, or tutelar angel, "of the kingdom of Persia," is represented as resisting the angel Gabriel, Dan. x. 13, 20. It was the custom in courts of judicature, for the accuser to stand at the right hand of the accused (see Ps. cix. 6).

Ver. 2. The Lord said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan;] The Logos, or Son of God, said unto Satan, The Lord, even God the father, rebuke thee, and not suffer thy mischievous imagination against Jerusalem and the temple to prosper: he that hath chosen that place for his especial residence. This text seems parallel with Gen. xix. 24, where it is said, "The Lord rained fire from the Lord out of heaven;" a text alleged, both by ancient and modern writers, to prove, that a distinction of persons in the blessed Trinity was a doctrine delivered in the Old Testament, though but imperfectly. The words may be rendered, "The Lord hath rebuked thee," or rejected thy plea; having long ago chosen Jerusalem.

Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?] Is not this small remnant returned from captivity, miraculously rescued from utter destruction, like "a brand plucked out of the fire?" And can it be thought that God will not preserve them? (compare Amos vi. 11, Jude, ver. 23).

Ver. 3. Joshua was clothed with filthy garments,] Denoting the sins and pollutions of the people, of whom he was the representative (see ver. 2, 4). The sins particularly taken notice of, might be their "marrying with strangers," contrary to the law (see Ezra ix. 2, 11, 12, Neh. xiii. 24), so the Chaldee understands it.

Ver. 4. Spake unto those that stood before him,] To the inferior angels that were in his retinue (compare ver. 5, 7, i. 8—11, and see note upon Dan. x. 10).

Unto him [i. e. Joshua] he said,—I will clothe thee with change of raiment.] In token of my pardoning the public and national sins of the Jews, and that I will restore them to a more prosperous condition, I have commanded the angels, my attendants, to clothe thee with new and clean raiment, an emblem of purity (Rev. xix. 8), as well as of joyfulness and prosperity (see Eccles. ix. 8, Isa. lxi. 10). The word rendered in our English "change of raiment," the LXX. translate ἡδίστην, "a garment down to the foot," meaning stood before him, saying, Take away the filthy garments from him. And unto him he said, Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment.

5 And I said, Let them set a fair mitre upon his head. So they set a fair mitre upon his head, and clothed him with garments. And the angel of the LORD stood by.

6 And the angel of the LORD protested unto Joshua, saying, the linen ephod, which was the priests' habit; regarding the sense rather than the literal signification of the word.

Ver. 5. And I said,] i. e. I, the Lord, farther said, or commanded.

Let them set a fair mitre upon his head, &c.] As the new garments put upon Joshua were such as belonged to the high-priest, and were contrived for glory and beauty (Exod. xxviii. 2), so the mitre was the proper ornament for his head (ibid. xxix. 6).

And the angel of the LORD stood by.] The angel that talked with me (see ver. 6, and ii. 3), still stood by, or attended, and made that solemn protestation which follows.

Ver. 7. If thou wilt keep my charge, &c.] If thou wilt take care that the several offices which belong to the service of my temple, be carefully performed by thyself, and the priests and Levites placed under thy command, then thou shalt exercise all that authority and jurisdiction which belongs to the high-priest's office, in respect of those controversies and questions which are brought before him to determine (see Lev. x. 10, Deut. xvii. 12, Jer. xviii. 18, Mal. ii. 7); and thou shalt preside as chief over my house, without any interruption, or molestation. The word mishmar, charge, is often used in the book of Numbers, to denote the several offices and duties of the priests and Levites.

Among these that stand by.] Or, "Stand before me" (see iv. 14). Hereafter I will give thee a place in heaven among these angels my attendants. The priesthood under the Old Testament, and the evangelical ministry under the New, is compared to the angelical office (see Mal. ii. 7, Rev. i. 20): so they that discharge this office well, shall have an eminent degree of glory in heaven, and be made equal to the angels themselves (see Matt. xix. 28, xxiv. 47, Luke xxii. 29, 30).

Ver. 8. Hear now, O Joshua] The angel directs his speech to Joshua and his assessors, or assistants in council, of whom Zerubbabel without question was one. The rabbins call these the heads of the captivity, and the men of the great synagogue: by whom they suppose the Jewish affairs, both ecclesiastical and civil, to have been settled after the captivity, and the canon of the Old Testament to have been completed. The angel bespeaks their attention to what follows, as containing matter of great importance.

They are men wondered at:] The margin reads, "Men of wonder." The word mophet signifies not only a wonder, but likewise a sign, or a type. Thus Isaiah's "walking naked and barefoot was for a sign and wonder [or rather, a type or example] to Egypt and Ethiopia" (Isa. xx. 3); i. e. a sign or emblem that they should be carried away captive without any covering to their nakedness: so the word is used again, Isa. viii. 18. So when Ezekiel was commanded to "dig through the wall and carry out his goods in the twilight," xii. 7, he was therein a sign [mophet], ver. 11, 12, to the Jews, and to Zedekiah

7 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; if thou wilt walk in my ways, and if thou wilt keep my charge, then thou shalt also judge my house, and shalt also keep my courts, and I will give thee places to walk among these that stand by.

8 Hear now, O Joshua the high priest, thou, and thy fellows that sit before thee: for they are men wondered at: for, behold, I will bring forth my servant the BRANCH.

9 For behold the stone that I have laid before Joshua; upon one stone shall be seven eyes: be-himself; foreshowing what he and they should do, when Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldean army. So, likewise, Ezek. xxiv. 24, he is said to be a sign unto them in not mourning for the death of his wife; because according to all that he had done, should they do; where the same word is used in the original. The word is to be understood in this sense in the text before us, which should be translated, They are men intended for signs or tokens, they are typical men, as a learned prelate very properly translates the phrase, in his Defence of Christianity from the Ancient Prophecies, ch. 3, sect. I, 4. To the same sense the Vulgar Latin translates it, Viri portendentes: "Men that foreshew something to come." They, with Joshua the high-priest at the head of them, are a figure of the restoration of the church under the government of the Messias.

For, behold, I will bring forth my servant the BRANCH.] I will point out, or foretell, the coming of the Messias into the world, as a person altogether distinct from Joshua, or any other present among you, and I will make him known to you under the name of the Branch; a title often given to the Messias in the prophets, as descending from the stock of David; see Isa. iv. 2, Jer. xxiii. 5, and again in this prophecy, vi. 12, in all which places the word in the original is Tsemach. The Chaldee explains every one of these texts of the Messias: who is elsewhere called God's servant, in an eminent sense, because he was sanctified and sent into the world upon a message of the highest importance (see Isa. xlii. 1, xlix. 3, lii. 13, liii. 11, Ezek. xxxiv. 23, 24). The word Tsemach, Branch, the LXX. render here and in most of the parallel texts, Ἀνατολή, the East, or sun rising; from whence it is applied to Christ, Luke i. 78, and is translated there the day spring: thence the name of Oriens was probably given to the supposed king of the Jews, in the Roman writers (see Tacit. Hist. lib. v. cap. 13).

Ver. 9. For behold the stone that I have laid before Joshua;] I have ordered a principal stone (see the following note) to be laid before Joshua (in allusion to the present building of the temple, about which his thoughts are employed); denoting the Messias, represented by the former prophets as a "corner-stone (or foundation) elect and precious" (see Ps. cxviii. 22, Isa. xxviii. 16).

Upon one stone shall be seven eyes:] As it is usual to adorn the principal stones of a building with carvings and hieroglyphics, such as heads, eyes, and the like: so will I perform in reality what artists do in imagery: viz. I will appoint the seven angels of the highest order to attend upon the Messias, represented by this stone, and to execute his commands all the world over, for the good of his church (compare iv. 10, Rev. v. 6). The one stone here mentioned is the same with the head stone, iv. 7, and might be better translated here the chief or principal stone, in which sense the word achad is used, Gen. xlviii. 22, as the Chaldee there explains it.

And I will remove the iniquity of that land in one hold, I will engrave the graving thereof, saith the LORD of hosts, and I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day.

day.] I will proclaim a free pardon of sins by the publishing of the gospel (see Jer. xxxi. 34), or the words may relate to the pardoning the Jews upon their general conversion (compare xiii. 1, Jer. i. 20, Mic. vii. 18, 19). The following verse favours this exposition.

Ver. 10. In that day,] At that remarkable time, when I will forgive all your iniquities, ver. 9 (see the note upon xii. 3).

10 In that day, saith the LORD of hosts, shall ye call every man his neighbour under the vine and under the fig tree.

Shall ye call every man [to] his neighbour] Men shall call or discourse with their neighbours in a friendly and sociable manner, as they are sitting at ease under the shadow of their vines and fig-trees. A proverbial expression, denoting peace and plenty; compare Mic. iv. 4, where the words follow the promise of a universal peace (see the notes there, and upon Isa. ii. 4).

CHAPTER IV.

1 AND the angel that talked with me came again, and waked me, as a man that is wakened out of his sleep.

2 And said unto me, What seest thou? And I said, I have looked, and behold a candlestick all of gold, with a bowl upon the top of it, and his seven lamps thereon, and seven pipes to the seven lamps, which are upon the top thereof:

3 And two olive trees by it, one upon the right side of the bowl, and the other upon the left side thereof.

4 So I answered and spake to the angel that talked with me, saying, What are these, my lord?

5 Then the angel that talked with me answered and said unto me, Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, No, my lord.

6 Then he answered and spake unto me, saying, This is the word of the LORD unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the LORD of hosts.

7 Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain: and he shall bring forth the headstone thereof with shoutings, crying, Grace, grace unto it.

8 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

9 The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house; his hands shall also finish it; and thou shalt know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me unto you.

10 For who hath despised the day of small things? for they shall rejoice, and shall see the plummet in the hand of Zerubbabel with those

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—Under the figure of the golden candlestick and the two olive-trees, is represented the success of Zerubbabel and Joshua, in rebuilding and finishing the temple.

Ver. 1.] The last vision was so pleasing to me, that it cast me into a deep sleep (compare Jer. xxxi. 26); from which the angel that before had talked with me (ii. 3), awakened me, to discover to me the following vision.

Ver. 2. I have looked, and behold a candlestick all of gold, &c.] This figured the temple service, and the whole polity of the Jewish constitution, which depended upon the restoration of the temple (see the note upon ver. 14).

And his seven lamps thereon,] According to the fashion of the golden candlestick in the temple (Exod. xxv. 37). As that candlestick figuratively signified the church, whose office it was to enlighten others (see Rev. i. 20): so the seven lamps mystically represented the seven spirits of God (Rev. iv. 5), i. e. the various dispensations of his providence over it (compare ver. 10 of this chapter).

Ver. 3.] Which did in a secret unperceivable manner convey oil for supplying the lamps (see ver. 6).

Ver. 5. Knowest thou not what these be?] The words may be rendered, both here and ver. 13, “Knowest thou what these be?” (see the note upon Jer. xxxviii. 15, and Noldius’s Concord. p. 256).

Ver. 6.] Zerubbabel and Joshua, with the Jews under their conduct, shall finish the temple, and re-establish the Jewish state, not by force of arms, or of human power, but by the secret assistances of my providence; just as the lamps are supplied with oil, in a secret and invisible manner (see ver. 12, 14).

Ver. 7. Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain:] “Removing mountains,” and “levelling them into plains,” are proverbial expressions, to denote the overcoming the greatest difficulties, and removing all obstacles that lie in our way (see Isa. xl. 4, Matt. xxi. 21): so the angel here encourages Zerubbabel to go on with his undertaking, assuring him that nothing shall be able to withstand him.

And he shall bring forth the headstone, &c.] He shall put the top or finishing stone upon the walls of the temple, which action the standers-by shall accompany with their wishes and prayers, that God’s grace and favour may protect that holy place, so happily finished, and with such joyful acclamations as they used at laying its foundations (see Ezra iii. 10, 11). The chief, or principal, stone, mentioned iii. 9, denoted the Messiah, called the Branch, ver. 8, and the words before us mystically represent the same person: viz. that God shall bring forth, or bring him into the world, as the top or head-stone, the last and finishing ornament and perfection (expressed by Grace, grace, i. e. the chief grace) of the church, God’s spiritual house (Eph. ii. 21). To this sense the Chaldee paraphrase expounds the words, “His Messiah shall come forth, who was named from all eternity, and shall obtain the empire of all the kingdoms of the earth:” and St. Jerome tells us upon the place, that the ancient Jews explained it so.

Ver. 9.] He shall have the happiness of seeing the great work which he had begun, finished and brought to perfection (Ezra iii. 10, vi. 15). See Zech. ii. 9.

seven; they are the eyes of the LORD, which run to and fro through the whole earth.

11 ¶ Then answered I, and said unto him, What are these two olive trees upon the right side of the candlestick and upon the left side thereof?

12 And I answered again, and said unto him, What be these two olive branches which through

Ver. 10. For who hath despised the day of small things? Or, "For whoso hath despised the day of small things, they shall rejoice," &c. The particle mi is sometimes used, without an interrogation, for whosoever (see Noldius, p. 602.) Whoever despised the small beginnings of this building, when the foundations of the temple were first laid, may now utter their joyful acclamations, when they see, under the conduct of Zerubbabel, the walls rise, and the top-stone laid upon them in order to their finishing (ver. 7).

With those seven; they are the eyes of the Lord, &c.] The LXX. translate the words to a better sense, taking them for a distinct sentence from what goes before, "These seven are the eyes of the Lord," &c. The sentence relates to the head-stone (ver. 7), upon which these seven eyes were to be engraved (iii. 9), hieroglyphically representing the angelical ministry, which always attend upon this head or prince of the church. The scriptures mention this as a prerogative of the Messias, that the angels were to minister to him (see Ps. xci. 11, 12, Matt. iv. 11, John i. 51, 1 Tim. iii. 16): and it is a saying recorded by the oldest writers among the Jews, that the Messias should be higher than the angels; a doctrine often delivered by St. Paul, Eph. i. 21, Phil. ii. 10, Heb. i. 4.

the two golden pipes empty the golden oil out of themselves?

13 And he answered me and said, Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, No, my lord.

14 Then said he, These are the two anointed ones, that stand by the LORD of the whole earth.

Ver. 11. Then answered I, and said unto him,] The verb anah is not only used of answering to a question, but likewise signifies to begin or continue a discourse (see Job iii. 2), and so the word answer is used, Matt. xi. 25.

Ver. 12. What be these two olive branches? Young olives (see ver. 3).

Which through the two golden pipes, &c.] There were two greater pipes in the candlestick through which the oil was conveyed into the five lesser (see ver. 3).

Ver. 14. These are the two anointed ones, that stand by [or, before] the Lord] These signify the kingdom and the priesthood, as they are exercised at present by Zerubbabel and Joshua (and belong to their respective families), who having finished the temple, and restored the public worship of God, will constantly attend upon his service, and take care that it be duly performed there. The candlestick represented the Jewish church and temple (ver. 2), and these two, Zerubbabel and Joshua, supply the place of the two olive-trees, that fed it with oil and kept it bright and burning. To stand before the Lord (for so the words should be rendered, as they are vi. 5) and to minister to him, are the same (see Deut. x. 8, 1 Kings xvii. 1).

CHAPTER V.

1 THEN I turned, and lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and behold a flying roll.

2 And he said unto me, What seest thou? And I answered, I see a flying roll; the length thereof is twenty cubits, and the breadth thereof ten cubits.

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.—By the representation of a flying roll, God's judgments are denounced against robbery and perjury: and the Jews are warned against such sins as occasioned their former captivity, for fear of incurring the same, or a worse calamity.

Ver. 1. I turned, and lifted up mine eyes,] Or, "again I lifted up mine eyes:" for the Hebrew verb shub, to return, is often used adverbially (see Eccles. iv. 1, ix. 11, and the note upon Isa. vi. 13).

A flying roll.] "The roll of a book," as it is expressed, Jer. xxxvi. 1, Ezek. ii. 9. The ancient way of writing being upon long scrolls of parchment. It is described as flying, to denote the swiftness of God's judgments.

Ver. 2.] Such scrolls were usually longer than they were broad; so this was represented as ten yards in length, and five in breadth. The curses therein contained, might probably be writ in capital letters (see the note upon Isa. viii. 1).

Ver. 3. Over the face of the whole earth:] Or rather "of the whole land;" meaning the land of Ju-

3 Then said he unto me, This is the curse that goeth forth over the face of the whole earth: for every one that stealeth shall be cut off as on this side according to it; and every one that sweareth shall be cut off as on that side according to it.

4 I will bring it forth, saith the LORD of hosts, dea. This roll contained the curses; i. e. the judgments denounced against the Jews who were guilty of the sins here specified (compare viii. 17, Deut. xi. 29, xxviii. 15, xxx. 19, Neh. x. 29).

For every one that stealeth shall be cut off as on this side according to it, &c.] The roll was written upon both sides, as that mentioned Ezek. ii. 10. On one side was contained the judgments against stealing, and on the other against false swearing. These two sins are joined together, because in the Jewish courts men were compelled to purge themselves by oath, in the case of theft; so they often would forswear themselves rather than discover the truth (see Hos. iv. 2, Prov. xxix. 24, xxx. 9). Stealing may here particularly denote the defrauding the temple of the tithes and offerings that were to be brought thither for the maintaining of God's worship; a sin for which the Jews of that age are severely reprov'd (see Mal. i. 8, &c., iii. 8, 9, Neh. xiii. 10, 11).

Ver. 4.] The curse denounced in this roll, or book, shall take hold of the man and his family, and shall never leave them till they are utterly consumed. It shall be like the leprosy that infects a house, and cannot be purged till the house itself be pulled down and it shall enter into the house of the thief, and into the house of him that sweareth falsely by my name: and it shall remain in the midst of his house, and shall consume it with the timber thereof and the stones thereof.

5 ¶ Then the angel that talked with me went forth, and said unto me, Lift up now thine eyes, and see what is this that goeth forth.

6 And I said, What is it? And he said, This is an ephah that goeth forth. He said moreover, This is their resemblance through all the earth.

7 And, behold, there was lifted up a talent of lead: and this is a woman that sitteth in the midst of the ephah.

(see Lev. xiv. 45). The oracle at Delphi denounced a like punishment against perjury, as it is recorded by Herodotus, lib. iii.

—Κρατινὸς δὲ μετρήσεται, εἰς οὗ πᾶσαν
 Συμμέρψαι δαίη γυνήν καὶ οἶκον ἵπαντα.

"The curse shall swiftly enter, and shall bring
 The man himself, and all his house to ruin."

Ver. 5. Then the angel that talked with me [see iv. 1] went forth.] Or, "went on." The verb yatsa signifies to go, to go on, or forward: so it is used 2 Chron. xxi. 19, Jer. xxv. 32, and so it may signify at the end of this verse, and in the next, where it occurs again.

Ver. 6. This is an ephah.] Dr. Wells observes, that this vessel or barrel was made in the shape of an ephah: yet it was of a much bigger size, large enough to contain a woman in it; which was the reason Zechariah did not know what it was. An ephah contained about the quantity of our bushel, and being the measure of dry things, denotes the Jews' unjust dealings in buying and selling (see Amos viii. 5).

This is their resemblance through all the earth.] Or, "through all the land." By this you may make an estimate of their unjust dealings all the land over (compare ver. 3, 4). The LXX. give a very easy sense of the words: "This is their iniquity throughout all the land;" changing only one letter in the original text, and reading onam for enam.

Ver. 7. There was lifted up a talent of lead:] To denote the weight or severity of the judgments here threatened.

And this is a woman that sitteth in the midst of the ephah.] What thou seest besides, is a woman in the midst of, or within, the ephah; as Noldius interprets it, Concordant. p. 83. The Hebrew reads one woman, but the adjective one is sometimes equivalent to the article a, or the, commonly placed before substantives (see Dan. viii. 3, x. 5).

Ver. 8. And he said, this is wickedness.] Public states or societies are oftentimes represented by women, and as the mothers of their people or inhabitants, as we see in the ancient coins. By the same analogy corrupt societies are figuratively expressed by harlots, and women of lewd characters; such are Aholah, and Aholibah, described Ezek. xxiii.; so here the corrupt state of the Jews is set forth by a wicked woman.

8 And he said, This is wickedness. And he cast it into the midst of the ephah; and he cast the weight of lead upon the mouth thereof.

9 Then lifted I up mine eyes, and looked, and, behold, there came out two women, and the wind was in their wings; for they had wings like the wings of a stork: and they lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven.

10 Then said I to the angel that talked with me, Whither do these bear the ephah?

11 And he said unto me, To build it an house in the land of Shinar: and it shall be established, and set there upon her own base.

And he cast it into the midst of the ephah [or, within the ephah, see ver. 7]; and he cast the weight of lead on the mouth thereof.] To signify that when a people have filled up the measure of their iniquity they sink under the weight of their sins, and cannot escape the judgment of God.

Ver. 9. I—looked, and, behold, there came out [or appeared] two women, &c.] These may probably signify the empires of Assyria and Babylon. Empires and kingdoms are commonly described as having wings to denote the swiftness of their conquests (see Deut. xxviii. 49, Jer. xlix. 22, Hos. viii. 1).

And they lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven.] i. e. The Assyrians carried away captive the ten tribes, and then the Babylonians took away the remainder of the Jews, and made an entire riddance of the people of the land.

Ver. 11.] Or, "To build her," i. e. the woman, "a house," &c. The design of the vision is to instruct the Jews, that as their fathers were carried into a seventy years' captivity to Babylon; so, if their posterity should not take warning by their punishment, a worse captivity should befall them, one of so long a continuance, as should make them despair of ever returning home, and resolve to settle themselves in those countries where they were dispersed. This is expressed by removing them to Babylon; which was a proverbial expression for utter ruin and desolation: just like that of sending them into Egypt, which God threatens the Jews with in the prophets, as a judgment of which they had the most dreadful apprehension; so it became a proverbial speech, for extreme misery (see Deut. xxviii. 64, Isa. x. 24, Hos. viii. 13, ix. 3). [A learned prelate in his Vindication of the Defence of Christianity, b. i. chap. I, sect. 4, supposes the vision to denote the translation of sin or punishment from Judea to Babylon, of which the two kingdoms of Media and Persia were the instruments; denoted by the two women who had the wings of a stork. Babylon itself being signified by the woman enclosed in an ephah, or bushel, and covered with a leaden lid, implying that it was sealed up there, and irrecoverably doomed to destruction, agreeably to the other prophecies denounced against Babylon. See Isa. xiii. 19, Jer. l. 40.]

CHAPTER VI.

I AND I turned, and lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and, behold, there came four chariots out from between two mountains; and the mountains were mountains of brass.

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.—The first vision in this chapter, of the four chariots drawn by several sorts of horses, denotes the succession of the four empires. The second, concerning the crowns put upon the head of Joshua, sets forth the glory of Christ the

2 In the first chariot were red horses; and in the second chariot black horses;

3 And in the third chariot white horses; and in the fourth chariot grised and bay horses.

4 Then I answered and said unto the angel that talked with me, What are these, my lord?

5 And the angel answered and said unto me, These are the four spirits of the heavens, which go forth from standing before the LORD of all the earth.

6 The black horses which are therein go forth into the north country; and the white go forth after them; and the grised go forth toward the south country.

7 And the bay went forth, and sought to go that they might walk to and fro through the earth: and he said, Get you hence, walk to and fro through the earth. So they walked to and fro through the earth.

8 Then cried he upon me, and spake unto me, saying, Behold, these that go toward the north country have quieted my spirit in the north country.

9 ¶ And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

10 Take of them of the captivity, even of Heldai, of Tobijah, and of Jedaiah, which are come from Babylon, and come thou the same day, and go into the house of Josiah the son of Zephaniah;

11 Then take silver and gold, and make crowns, and set them upon the head of Joshua the son of Josedech, the high priest;

12 And speak unto him, saying, Thus speak—branch, who is to be both king and high-priest of the church of God.

Ver. 1.] Horses and chariots are the usual emblems of conquerors (see Isa. xxi. 7, 9, and x. 3 of this prophecy). The four chariots denote the four great empires, which subdued the biggest part of the then known world. And they are represented as coming from between two mountains; because mountains are the natural barriers which divide kingdoms, which are here, though they be as strong as brass, supposed to be broken through by those that invade and conquer their neighbours. And it is observable, that some of the mighty conquerors owed the beginning of their greatness to their successful passage through the straits of mountains, where a small force might have maintained the passes against a powerful army. So the beginning of Alexander's success against the Persians, was his passing through the Portæ Ciliciæ without any opposition: the like success the Roman emperor Severus had against Pescenninus Niger at the same place: and the great incursions the Turks made through Portæ Caspiæ, was the first step towards making them appear formidable in the world.

Ver. 2. In the first chariot were red horses;] To signify the bloody cruelties of the Babylonish empire, especially towards the Jews (see i. 15, Jer. li. 34, Hab. i. 6, 10, 11, viii. 12; compare i. 8, Rev. vi. 4).

In the second chariot black horses;] Black is the colour of mourning (compare Rev. vi. 5); so this denotes the sad and mournful estate of the Jews under the successors of Cyrus in the Persian empire, when their enemies forged calumnies against them, and thereby put a stop to the building of the temple (see Ezra iv. 4, &c., Neh. iv. 1, 2, 4, &c., ix. 36, 37); and the whole nation was in danger of being destroyed by the interest of Haman in the Persian court.

Ver. 3. And in the third chariot white horses;] Signifying the victories of Alexander, the third great monarch, and his kindness to the Jews in confirming their religion, laws, and liberties (see Dr. Prideaux, under the fourth year of Darius Codomanus). Conquerors use to ride on white horses in the days of triumph (see Rev. vi. 2).

And in the fourth chariot grised and bay horses.] Or, Strong horses, as the Vulgar Latin renders the word. These may denote the various forms of the Roman government, the fourth empire (compare Dan. ii. 33, 40, 41, and see ver. 6, 7).

Ver. 5.] The angels which preside over each of these monarchies (see the note upon Dan x. 13). Who receive their commission from the supreme Lord of all, to govern the affairs of these empires according to his direction (see iv. 14, 1 Kings xxii. 19).

Ver. 6. The black horses—go forth into the north country;] The black horses which thou sawest in the vision belonging to the second chariot, and denoting the Persian empire, go forth to conquer the Babylonians, often expressed by the north in the prophets (see Jer. i. 14, iv. 6, vi. 1, Ezek. i. 4). The angel saith nothing of the red horses, belonging to the first chariot, because that empire was at an end.

The white go forth after them;] Alexander and his armies go forth to conquer the Persians.

And the grised go forth toward the south country.] This probably denotes the Romans conquering Egypt, frequently called the south country in scripture (see Dan. xi. 6, &c.). This was the last country the Romans subdued under Augustus, whereby they became masters of the greatest part of the known world.

Ver. 7. And the bay went forth, and sought to go, &c.] These seem to signify another branch of the Roman empire, that extended their conquests in the latter times: and these can be no other than the Goths and Vandals, whose power rose out of the ruins of the first Roman empire, and who set up the kingdom of the ten horns, mentioned Rev. xiii. 1, xvii. 3.

So they walked to and fro through the earth.] They took possession of it (see Gen. xiii. 17).

Ver. 8. Then cried he upon [unto] me,] These words are uttered by God, appearing out of the Shechinah (see the note upon i. 13, 20).

Behold, these that go toward the north country have quieted my spirit [or, my wrath] in the north country.] The black horses, denoting the Persian empire, that have conquered the Babylonians (see ver. 6), have appeased my wrath by executing that vengeance upon them which they deserved for their cruelty towards my people (see ver. 2). The word ruach, spirit, often signifies anger (see Judg. viii. 3, Eccles. x. 9).

Ver. 10, 11. Take of them of the captivity,—which are come from Babylon,—Then [or, even] take silver and gold, &c.] The exiles who remained in Babylon, showed their regard for the temple that was then in building, by sending their gifts and oblations to Jerusalem for carrying on the work, and adorning the temple after it was built. These offerings they sent by the persons here named, as they did afterward by Ezra and his companions (see Ezra vii. 16, viii. 25, 26).

Ver. 11. Then [rather, even] take [the] silver and [the] gold, &c.] There is no necessity of supposing the silver to be used in making those crowns: that is mentioned to show the liberality of the offerers, and might be laid up for the ornament or service of the temple (see Ezra. viii. 24, 30, Hag. ii. 8, 9). The use of the gold is here specified: a plate or crown of gold was an ornament placed upon the mieth the LORD of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is The BRANCH; and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the LORD:

13 Even he shall build the temple of the LORD; and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and he shall be a priest upon his throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both.

tre of the high priest (see Exod. xxviii. 36. xxix. 6, Lev. viii. 9). Two such crowns of gold are ordered here to be made, and both of them to be placed upon the head of Joshua, to signify that the Messiah, the branch spoken of in the next verse, of whom Joshua was a type, should be both a king and a priest, and so should have a right to wear the two crowns that belong to each of those officers.

Ver. 12. Behold the man whose name is the The BRANCH;] See, in the person of Joshua the high-priest, the type or representation of the man whose name is the Christ that shall be revealed, as the Targum paraphrases the text (see the note upon iii. 8).

And he shall grow up out of his place,] The Hebrew phrase doth literally signify, Shall grow up from under him; i. e. as a branch or twig grows out of the stock of a tree; so the Messiah should spring from the family of David: or the expression may mean, that he shall succeed Joshua in the high-priesthood, which shall be unchangeably fixed in his person.

And he shall build the temple of the Lord;] Zerubbabel was to build the material temple (see iv. 9), but the building God's spiritual temple, the church, was a work reserved for the Messiah (see Matt. xvi. 18, Eph. ii. 20—22, Heb. iii. 3). This text the Chaldee paraphrast understands of the Messiah, and so it was understood by the Jews in the time of our Saviour. Herod at that time had a mind to be thought the Messiah: his flatterers had put this thought into his head, who from thence were called the Herodians (Matt. xxii. 16), as many of the ancient writers suppose. This put him upon rebuilding the temple, a work foretold in this place to be undertook by the Messiah.

Ver. 13.] This is a plain description of Christ, who was foretold to be both a king and priest (Ps. cx. 4), who should bear the glory of a king, and with-

14 And the crowns shall be to Helem, and to Tobijah, and to Jedaiah, and to Hen the son of Zephaniah, for a memorial in the temple of the LORD.

15 And they that are far off shall come and build in the temple of the LORD, and ye shall know that the LORD of hosts hath sent me unto you. And this shall come to pass, if ye will diligently obey the voice of the LORD your God.

al perform the office of a priest. The ancient Jews expected their Messiah should retain both these characters. The author of the first book of Maccabees informs us, xiv. 41, that in gratitude to Simon the brother of Judas Maccabeus, they appointed him their "governor and high-priest for ever (i. e. himself and his posterity), until there should arise a faithful prophet," or, till the faithful prophet should arise, meaning the Messiah (compare Heb. iii. 2).

And the counsel of peace shall be between them both.] The kingdom and priesthood being joined in the same person, there shall be no more clashing of jurisdictions between those two offices, represented by the two olive trees, iv. 12, 14.

Ver. 14.] The crowns, when they have been set upon Joshua's head (ver. 11), shall be delivered to the persons here mentioned, that they may be laid up for a memorial in the temple, for what use they had been made; as there were several gifts laid up in the temple in aftertimes, which were presents offered there by the kings of Egypt, and other great men, out of respect to the place. Helem, here mentioned, is probably the same person with Heldai, and Hen with Josiah; such variety of names belonging to the same person may be often observed in the books of the Kings and Chronicles.

Ver. 15. And they that are far off shall come and build in the temple [or, build the temple] of the Lord.] The gentiles shall be added to the church (compare Isa. lvii. 19), and shall make a considerable increase of this spiritual building. See ii. 11.

And this shall come to pass, if ye will diligently obey the voice of the Lord your God.] And ye of the Jewish nation shall be first sharers in the benefits arising from Christ's kingdom and priesthood (and then those that are afar off), if you diligently hearken to the voice of God, speaking to you both by his prophets and by his Son.

CHAPTER VII.

1 AND it came to pass in the fourth year of king Darius, that the word of the LORD came unto Zechariah in the fourth day of the ninth month, even in Chisleu;

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.—Some Jews were sent from Babylon to inquire of the priests and prophets, whether they were obliged to continue the fasts that had been appointed upon the occasion of the destruction of Jerusalem and the ensuing captivity. The prophet is commanded to take this occasion of enforcing upon them the observance of the weightier matters of the law, viz. judgment and mercy, for fear of their incurring the same calamities their fathers suffered upon their neglect of those duties.

Ver. 1.] See the note upon ver. 5.

2 When they had sent unto the house of God Sherezer and Regem-melech, and their men, to pray before the LORD.

3 And to speak unto the priests which were in

Ver. 2.] The verb in the Hebrew is in the singular number, "He had sent:" but our interpreters understand it plurally, by an enallage of the number, which is frequent in the Hebrew; and the Vulgar Latin interprets it to the same sense. According to this syntax, the words might be as well translated thus, "when Sherezer and Regem-melech, and their men, had sent unto the house of God." These, probably, were men of some note among the Jews that still continued at Babylon, who either came of their own accord, or were sent by the exiles there to the temple at Jerusalem, to offer up sacrifices at the altar, and make prayers for themselves and their friends in the temple, where the building was carrying on with good the house of the Lord of hosts, and to the prophets, saying, Should I weep in the fifth month, separating myself, as I have done these so many years?

4 ¶ Then came the word of the Lord of hosts unto me, saying,

5 Speak unto all the people of the land, and to the priests, saying, When ye fasted and mourned in the fifth and seventh month, even those seventy years, did ye at all fast unto me, even to me?

6 And when ye did eat, and when ye did drink, did not ye eat for yourselves, and drink for yourselves?

7 Should ye not hear the words which the Lord hath cried by the former prophets, when Jerusalem was inhabited and in prosperity, and the cities thereof round about her, when men inhabited the south and the plain?

success. The temple was the only place where they could offer sacrifice, to which their solemn prayers were always joined (see 1 Sam. xiii. 12, Ezra vi. 10).

Ver. 3. And to speak unto the priests which were in the house of the Lord—and to the prophets. It was the office of the priests to resolve any doubts that might arise, and the people were commanded to consult them, and to follow their determination (Deut. xvii. 9—11, Mal. ii. 7). And since the prophets Haggai and Zechariah were at this time residing at Jerusalem it was proper to inquire of them, who might probably give them an immediate answer from God himself.

Should I weep in the fifth month, separating myself, as I have done these so many years? The fast of the fifth month was kept, because in the fifth month, answering to our month of July, the city and temple were burnt by the Chaldeans (2 Kings xxv. 8); in memory of which grievous judgment, the Jews at Babylon had kept a solemn fast, from that time until now; refraining from all worldly business and pleasure, and employing themselves in the religious exercise of prayer and humiliation (see xii. 12—14). The question they now proposed was, Whether it were proper for them still to continue this fast, when the ecclesiastical and civil state was in a great measure restored, and the judgment for which they mourned was removed.

Ver. 5. Speak unto all the people What I am going to say equally concerns both priests and people.

When ye fasted and mourned in the fifth and seventh month. The Jews observed four solemn fasts, in relation to the calamities that attended the captivity: two of them are mentioned in this chapter, and two in the next, ver. 19. Besides the fast in the fifth month, taken notice of ver. 3, they kept another in the seventh month, answering chiefly to our September, in memory of the murder of Gedaliah, which happened in that month (2 Kings xxv. 25); whereupon all the remainder of the Jews were dispersed into several lands, and the desolation of Judea completed (Jer. xli. 17, 18).

Even those seventy years. Those “many years” mentioned ver. 3, which, if we reckon from the destruction of Jerusalem, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, to the fourth year of Darius Hystaspes, are just seventy years; as hath been observed in the note upon i. 12.

Did ye at all fast unto me, Did you fast upon religious motives, and for your better improvement in the duties of repentance and amendment, the only true end of fasting (compare Rom. xiv. 6).

8 ¶ And the word of the Lord came unto Zechariah, saying,

9 Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, Execute true judgment, and shew mercy and compassions every man to his brother:

10 And oppress not the widow, nor the fatherless, the stranger, nor the poor; and let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart.

11 But they refused to hearken, and pulled away the shoulder, and stopped their ears, that they should not hear.

12 Yea, they made their hearts as adamant stone, lest they should hear the law, and the words which the Lord of hosts hath sent in his spirit by the former prophets: therefore came a great wrath from the Lord of hosts.

13 Therefore it is come to pass, that as he cried, and they would not hear; so they cried, and I would not hear, saith the Lord of hosts:

Ver. 6.] Ye sought your own pleasure and convenience, not my glory. The sense of these two sentences is much the same with that of St. Paul, 1 Cor. viii. 8, “Meat commends us not to God: for neither, if we eat, are we the better; neither, if we eat not, are we the worse:” i. e. eating, or abstaining from meat, is in its own nature indifferent, nor is it acceptable to God, any farther than it is subservient to advance the true ends of religion. The prophet first reproves the hypocrisy of their fasts, before he gives them a direct answer to the question proposed to him; which he does, viii. 19.

Ver. 7.] Or, “Are not these the words?” as the margin reads. The prophet puts them in mind of those exhortations the prophets before the captivity gave them, that they may lay them to heart, and not be guilty of the same sins, for fear of incurring the same penalties.

When men inhabited the south and the plain? The south was that tract of land called “the wilderness of Judea,” Matt. iii. 1, part of which, or near to it, was the hill-country, mentioned Josh. xxi. 11, Luke i. 39. The LXX. here render it Ὀρεινὴ, “the hill-country.” The “plain” is that open country, which is called “the plains of Jericho,” 2 Kings xxv. 5, and “the plain of the valley of Jericho,” Deut. xxxiv. 3, and reached as far as the salt sea, or the lake of Asphaltites, called “the sea of the plain,” Deut. iii. 17 (compare Jer. xvii. 26).

Ver. 9.] I often put your fathers in mind, that judgment and mercy were more acceptable to me than fasting, or any external performances (see Isa. lviii. 6, 7, Jer. vii. 22—24); and I repeat the same admonition to you of the present age.

Ver. 10.] Do not employ your thoughts in devising mischief against others, in order to put it in execution when opportunity serves (compare Ps. xxxvi. 4, Mic. ii. 1).

Ver. 11.] But your fathers refused to hearken to the admonitions of the former prophets (ver. 12), and are often reproved by them for their refractory temper. The metaphor is taken from oxen, that refuse to put their necks under the yoke (see Neh. ix. 29, Jer. vii. 24, and the note there).

Ver. 12.] So that no arguments could make any impression upon them (compare Ezek. xi. 9). The same thing is expressed by men’s hearts being hardened. See ver. 14.

Ver. 13. So they cried, and I would not hear, I would not hearken to the prayers they made to me in their distress (see Jer. xi. 11, xiv. 12, Mic. iii. 4).

14 But I scattered them with a whirlwind among all the nations whom they knew not. Thus the land was desolate after them, that no

Ver. 14. I scattered them with a whirlwind] My anger dispersed the ten tribes like a tempest, into the distant countries of Assyria, Media, &c. from whence they never returned; and the two remaining tribes into Babylon, where they lived like exiles. God's vengeance is often compared to a whirlwind; see the note upon Jer. xxiii. 19.

Thus the land was desolate.] There was an entire riddance made of the inhabitants of Judea, in the man passed through nor returned: for they laid the pleasant land desolate.

twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar (see Jer. lii. 30), so that the "highways were desolate," as was threatened, Lev. xxvi. 22 (compare 2 Chron. xv. 5), and the "land enjoyed her sabbaths," as it is expressed 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21, from that time, till their return from their captivity under Cyrus.

The pleasant land] The holy writers often call the land of promise by the name of the "pleasant land" (see the note upon Dan. viii. 9).

CHAPTER VIII.

1 AGAIN the word of the LORD of hosts came to me, saying,

2 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; I was jealous for Zion with great jealousy, and I was jealous for her with great fury.

3 Thus saith the LORD; I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem: and Jerusalem shall be called a city of truth; and the mountain of the LORD of hosts the holy mountain.

4 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; There shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, and every man with his staff in his hand for very age.

5 And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof.

6 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; If it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? saith the LORD of hosts.

7 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Behold, I will save my people from the east country, and from the west country;

8 And I will bring them, and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, in truth and in righteousness.

9 ¶ Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Let your hands be strong, ye that hear in these days these words by the mouth of the prophets, which were in the day that the foundation of the house of the LORD of hosts was laid, that the temple might be built.

10 For before these days there was no hire for

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.—God promises the continuance of his favour to those that are returned from captivity; so that upon the removal of his judgments, they need no longer continue the fasts they had observed during the captivity: and withal promises in due time a general restoration of his people, and the enlargement of his church by the coming in of the gentiles.

Ver. 2. I was jealous for Zion with great jealousy,] Or, "I have been zealous for Zion with great zeal" (see the note upon i. 14).

And I was [or, have been] jealous for her with great fury.] I expressed my concern for her welfare, by the severe punishments I brought upon the Babylonians, their oppressors (compare Ezek. xxxvi. 5, 6).

Ver. 3.] See ii. 10. Jerusalem shall be again the seat of truth and justice, her magistrates being restored to execute their authority there: and the temple upon mount Moriah shall be again dedicated to God's worship, and honoured with his presence (compare Isa. i. 26, Jer. xxxi. 23).

Ver. 4.] Whereas before the captivity the inhabitants were cut off in the midst of their years, by the sword, the famine, and the pestilence (see Jer. xiv. 12, xv. 2, Ezek. v. 12).

Ver. 5.] As in the time of perfect peace and security.

Ver. 6.] Because "The things which are impossible with men are possible with God." Luke xviii. 27. Concerning the remnant, see the note upon Mic. iv. 7.

Ver. 7.] The words of the original may be literally translated thus, "From the rising to the going down of the sun;" which signifies, from all parts of the world (compare Ps. l. 1, cxiii. 3, Mal. i. 11). This denotes the general restoration of the Jewish nation from their several dispersions (compare ver. 13, 20, 23), an event foretold by most of the prophets of the Old Testament (see the note upon Isa. xi. 11). The west country here mentioned hath a particular relation to their present dispersion, great numbers of them being in these latter ages settled in the western parts of the world (see the note upon Isa. xxiv. 14, and upon Hos. xi. 10).

Ver. 8. They shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem:] They shall be restored to their own country, and inhabit their capital city of Jerusalem, as in old time (see the note upon Ezek. xxviii. 25, 26).

And they shall be my people, and I will be their God.] They shall constantly serve and worship me, and I will bless and protect them (see xiii. 9).

In truth and in righteousness.] If we refer these words to God, the word righteousness is equivalent to mercy, as it is often used; and, joined with truth, implies God's faithfulness in performing his gracious promises: or the word may be understood of the people, that as God was faithful to them, so they will live in obedience to him.

Ver. 9. Let your hands be strong.] Take courage to go on with the building of the temple, from these comfortable promises which are recited in this chapter, and which ye have formerly heard from the mouth of the prophets, Haggai (ii. 4) and Zechariah (iv. 9).

Which were in the day, &c.] Or, Who spake in the day, &c. Which makes the sense plainer. The prophet speaks of carrying on the building, as if it were laying a new foundation (see Hag. ii. 18).

Ver. 10. For before these days there was no hire or man, nor any hire for beast; neither was there any peace to him that went out or came in because of the affliction: for I set all men every one against his neighbour.

11 But now I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days, saith the LORD of hosts.

12 For the seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew; and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things.

13 And it shall come to pass, that as ye were a curse among the heathen, O house of Judah, and house of Israel; so will I save you, and ye shall be a blessing: fear not, but let your hands be strong.

14 For thus saith the LORD of hosts; As I thought to punish you, when your fathers provoked me to wrath, saith the LORD of hosts, and I repented not:

15 So again have I thought in these days to do well unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah: fear ye not.

16 ¶ These are the things that ye shall do; Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbour; man, nor any hire for beast;] Or rather, "There was no reward for man, nor any reward for beast:" so the word sekar often signifies (see Isa. xl. 10, lxii. 11): i. e. the fruits of the earth would not pay the labour of those that manured it (see Hag. i. 9—11, ii. 16, 17).

For I set all men every one against his neighbour.] The people of the land that dwelt amongst the Jews were continually molesting them (see Ezra iv. 3, &c.).

Ver. 11.] Now you carry on the building of the temple (see ver. 6, 9, 10).

Ver. 12.] Compare 1 Kings xvii. 1. I will take away the curse I formerly sent upon the fruits of the earth (see Hag. i. 10).

Ver. 13. As ye were a curse among the heathen.] A standing monument of the divine vengeance; so that the heathen used this as a common form of imprecation, "God do so to me as he did to the Jews" (see Isa. lxxv. 15, Jer. xxix. 22).

O house of Judah, and house of Israel;] This may be understood of the Jews belonging to the ten tribes, of whom several joined themselves to the tribe of Judah before the captivity, and were carried away with them to Babylon, and returned with them from thence (compare i. 19, ix. 13, x. 6, with 2 Chron. xi. 16, xxxiv. 33, Ezra vi. 17). But the mentioning both Judah and Israel, which had been so long separated, shows that both the curse and the blessing here spoken of, in its ultimate sense, belongs to the whole body of the Jews, who, as they are a public instance of God's judgments now, so shall they be hereafter of his blessings; viz. at the general restoration and conversion of that nation: to which several promises in this chapter relate (see ver. 7, 8, 20, 23, and the note upon Isa. xi. 13).

So will I save you, and ye shall be a blessing:] See Isa. xix. 24, 25, and the note there.

Ver. 14, 15. As I thought [or, resolved] to punish you, &c.] As I resolved to punish your fathers for their sins, and put my decrees in execution (compare Jonah iii. 10); so now I have determined to be favourable to you, and protect you from all your enemies (compare Jer. xxxi. 28).

Ver. 16, 17.] These promises are conditional, and execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates:

17 And let none of you imagine evil in your hearts against his neighbour; and love no false oath: for all these are things that I hate, saith the LORD.

18 ¶ And the word of the LORD of hosts came unto me, saying,

19 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; The fast of the fourth month, and the fast of the fifth, and the fast of the seventh, and the fast of the tenth, shall be to the house of Judah joy and gladness, and cheerful feasts; therefore love the truth and peace.

20 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; It shall yet come to pass, that there shall come people, and the inhabitants of many cities:

21 And the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the LORD, and to seek the LORD of hosts: I will go also.

22 Yea, many people, and strong nations shall come to seek the LORD of hosts in Jerusalem, and to pray before the LORD.

23 Thus saith the LORD of hosts; In those days it shall come to pass, that ten men shall take the performance of them will depend upon your observing the rules of justice and righteousness which I commanded your fathers by the prophets, as the weightier matters of the law, and now again enjoin them to you (see vii. 9, 10).

Ver. 16. Execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates:] Let those who have the public administration of justice, make it their chief intent to uphold truth and integrity, and maintain the public peace, by giving every man his due. The judges used to execute their office at the gates of the city (see Deut. xxi. 19).

Ver. 17. And love no false oath:] See v. 3, 4.

Ver. 19. The fast of the fourth month, and the fast of the—tenth.] Besides the two fasts mentioned vii. 5, the Jews observed two others, that of the fourth month, answering to our June, wherein Jerusalem was taken (Jer. lii. 6, 7), and that of the tenth month, answering our December, when the Babylonian army began the siege of it (ibid. ver. 4). The prophet tells them in answer to the question proposed (vii. 3), that they may now disuse these fasts, and lay aside the mournful circumstances with which they were solemnized; the judgments which occasioned them being removed.

Therefore love the truth and peace.] God values an upright conversation before the exactest care of outward performances (see ver. 16, and the note upon vii. 9). These instructions prepared men's minds for receiving the gospel, whose laws chiefly recommend purity of heart and life (see Jer. xxxi. 33).

Ver. 20, 21. There shall come people, and the inhabitants of many cities—saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord, &c.] A prophecy of the gentiles coming into the church, the expressions alluding to the Jews going up in companies to Jerusalem at their solemn feasts (compare Isa. ii. 2, 3, Mic. iv. 1, 2).

I will go also.] So every single person shall express his willingness to go along with them.

Ver. 22.] Compare xiv. 16, Isa. lxvi. 23.

Ver. 23. Ten men—out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you:] Christians are some-hold out of all languages of the nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, say-times called by the name of Jews, as being those to whom the promises made to the fathers of the Jewish nation do chiefly belong (see Rom. ii. 28, 29, Rev. ii. 9). In this sense the word is here to be understood. The text imports the heathen applying themselves to the Christians, especially to the pastors and ministers of the church, for instruction, in order to qualify themselves for admittance into the church. Ten ing, We will go with you: for we have heard that God is with you.

men, is a figurative expression, putting a certain number for an uncertain (see Eccles. xxv. 9); so the number seven is used, Isa. iv. 1, Mic. v. 5. "To take hold" of another, is a gesture of entreating his friendly assistance (see Isa. iii. 6, iv. 1).

For we have heard that God is with you.] There are manifest tokens of the divine grace and presence with you (see 1 Cor. xiv. 25).

CHAPTER IX.

1 THE burden of the word of the LORD in the land of Hadrach, and Damascus shall be the rest thereof: when the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel, shall be toward the LORD.

2 And Hamath also shall border thereby; Tyrus, and Zidon, though it be very wise.

3 And Tyrus did build herself a strong hold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets.

4 Behold, the LORD will cast her out, and he will smite her power in the sea; and she shall be devoured with fire.

5 Ashkelon shall see it, and fear; Gaza also shall see it, and be very sorrowful, and Ekron;

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.—This chapter begins a new prophecy: foretelling the conquests of Alexander the Great over Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine; and God's providence over his temple during this turbulent state of affairs. From thence the prophet takes occasion to describe, as in a parenthesis, the humble and peaceable coming of the Messiah; and then, returning to his former subject, declares the conquests of the Jews, particularly the Maccabees, over the princes of the Grecian monarchy.

Ver. 1. The burden of the word of the Lord in [or, against] the land of Hadrach,] "The burden of the word of the Lord," is a burdensome prophecy, threatening ruin and destruction (see Jer. xxiii. 33, Nah. i. 1). Hadrach is not elsewhere mentioned as the name of a country: the context shows it must mean some part of Syria, of which Damascus was the capital city. The words may most probably be understood of Alexander the Great's conquering Syria; Damascus being at the same time betrayed to him, and all Darius's treasure, which was laid up there, delivered into his hands: as Dr. Prideaux relates the story, out of Arian and Curtius; par. i. book vii., under the third year of Darius Codomannus.

And Damascus shall be the rest thereof:] The words may signify, that Damascus was the chief stay and support of Syria, whose strength they relied upon for their security: or that the judgment here threatened should particularly afflict Damascus: in which sense the verb nuach is used, Isa. xxx. 32, where the text may be literally translated, "The staff or stroke which the Lord shall cause to rest upon him" (see likewise xxv. 10 of the same prophecy).

When the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel, shall be toward the Lord.] The words may be translated, "When the eyes of man, even of all the tribes of Israel," &c. When the Jews saw the conqueror approach, it was proper for them to look up to God, and to implore his protection; which Jaddua the high-priest did, when Alexander besieged Tyre; and was directed by a vision to meet the conqueror in his pontifical robes, who received him very graciously; as the story is told with very remarkable circumstances by Josephus, Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8. Some translate the sentence, "For the eyes of the Lord are upon man, as well as upon all the tribes of Israel;" i. e. God will punish the heathen nations for their sins, as well as his own people.

Ver. 2. And Hamath also shall border thereby;] The sense would be plainer thus, "And against Hamath also, which borders thereby;" importing, that Hamath shall not escape the conqueror's forces. There were two Hamaths: here is probably meant that Hamath which was the northern border of Judea, and is spoken of in the text as a bordering city (see the note upon Amos vi. 2, 14).

Tyrus, and Zidon, though it be very wise.] Or, "Against Tyre and Zidon," &c. They both shall be involved in the same calamity, although the Zidonians value themselves as the first inventors of letters and sciences, and are famous for their skill in navigation.

Ver. 3. And Tyrus did build herself a strong hold,] After the demolishing of Old Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, foretold by Isaiah, xxiii., and Ezekiel, xxvi.—xxviii. New Tyre was built in an island at the distance of half a mile from the shore; so its situation was very strong, and it was fortified with a wall round it a hundred and fifty feet high (see Dr. Prideaux, in the forecited place).

And heaped up silver as the dust, &c.] By her merchandise she had gained immense riches (Ezek. xxviii. 4, 5).

Ver. 4.] The Lord will dispossess her inhabitants, and the Carthaginians shall not be able to assist her with their naval forces; but the conquerors shall subdue her fortifications, though she be surrounded with the sea; and lay her stately buildings in ashes (see Dr. Prideaux, under the fourth year of Darius).

Ver. 5. Ashkelon shall see it, and fear, &c.] The cities of the Philistines, Ashkelon, Gaza, and Ekron, shall be very much terrified at the news of Tyre's being destroyed, from whence they hope for succours against the enemy.

And the king shall perish from Gaza.] That city was taken by Alexander after a two months' siege: ten thousand of the inhabitants slain, and the governor Betis dragged round the city till he was dead. King is a general word for any governor, in Hebrew, as hath been before observed. Strabo, speaking of Gaza (lib. xvi.), saith, "It was formerly a city of note, but was destroyed by Alexander the Great, and remained desert or uninhabited." And so it is called, Acts viii. 26, and is to be distinguished from Gaza the seaport, otherwise called Majuma; the old Gaza being a mile from the sea (see St. Jerome de Locis Hebr.).

Ver. 6.] By a bastard, the LXX. and most interpreters understand foreigners, such as were not the native inhabitants of the place: and they understood for her expectation shall be ashamed; and the king shall perish from Gaza, and Ashkelon shall not be inhabited.

6 And a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod, and I will cut off the pride of the Philistines.

7 And I will take away his blood out of his mouth, and his abominations from between his teeth: but he that remaineth, even he, shall be for our God, and he shall be as a governor in Judah, and Ekron as a Jebusite.

8 And I will encamp about mine house because of the army, because of him that passeth it either of Alexander's conquests in those parts of Palestine where the natives were destroyed, or expelled out of their habitations, and strangers placed in their room; or else of the exploits of Judas Maccabeus against the Philistines (1 Macc. v. 68), and of Jonathan, who set fire to Azotus, and burnt and destroyed eight thousand men there (ibid. x. 84, 85). To this sense the Chaldee paraphrase understands the text, and renders it, The family of Israel shall dwell in Ashdod, who before were in it as strangers. A collection or succession of persons is sometimes expressed in the singular number (see the note upon xi. 16.)

Ver. 7. And I will take away his blood out of his mouth.] He shall be brought down so low that he shall not be in a condition to oppose his neighbours, as he did formerly; but they shall be delivered from his cruelty, just as the prey is taken out of the mouth of a wild beast, when he is just about to devour it.

But he that remaineth, even he, shall be for our God.] Many of the Philistines became proselytes to the Jewish religion, after Alexander Jannæus had subdued their principal cities, and made them part of his own dominions (see Josephus, Antiq. lib. xiii. cap. 23).

And he shall be as a governor in Judah, and Ekron as a Jebusite.] They shall be equally capable of places of honour and trust with the Jews themselves, who shall look upon the Philistines as their fellow-citizens, just as the Israelites treated the Jebusites, the ancient inhabitants of Jerusalem (see Judg. i. 21).

Ver. 8. And I will encamp about mine house, &c.] Compare vii. 14. During these military commotions the angels, who are God's host, shall be a guard to the temple at Jerusalem (see ii. 5), and I will turn the heart of Alexander that he shall show favours towards the Jews, when he intended to humble them, and shall offer sacrifice to me in my temple. See this remarkable passage related at large out of Josephus by Dr. Prideaux, Script. Connex. under the fourth year of Darius Codomannus.

No oppressor shall pass through them any more.] Or, "Any longer;" so the word should be rendered, Isa. li. 22, Nahm i. 12 (see Noldius. p. 682). None of those that now threaten to invade or oppress them, shall prosper in their attempts against them (see more in note upon x. 4).

For now have I seen with mine eyes.] I am not regardless of them, but look upon their condition with an eye of pity and compassion (compare xii. 4, Exod. ii. 25, 2 Sam. xvi. 12).

Ver. Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem.] From the promise contained in the foregoing verse, of God's protecting his church and temple, the prophet, in a sudden transport, takes occasion to break forth into a joyful representation of the coming of the Messiah.

Behold, thy king cometh unto thee.] He that is so often described in the prophets as the King of Israel (see Ps. ii. 7, Jer. xxiii. 5), was known by that name by, and because of him that returneth: and no oppressor shall pass through them any more: for now have I seen with mine eyes.

9 ¶ Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation: lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass.

10 And I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem, and the battle bow shall be cut off: and he shall speak peace unto the heathen: and his dominion shall among the Jews in our Saviour's time (see John i. 49), and called elsewhere by the name of "David their king" (Jer. xxx. 9, Hos. iii. 5). He will certainly come in God's appointed time (compare Isa. lxii. 11).

He is just, and having salvation.] Or, "He is righteous, and the Saviour." He is that "righteous Branch," and "the Lord our righteousness, who shall execute judgment and justice in the earth;" as he is described by Jeremiah, xxiii. 5, and "the righteousness" and "salvation," i. e. the righteous one and Saviour, promised Isa. lxii. 1. The word nashang, "having salvation," though it be a participle passive, is rendered a Saviour in all the ancient versions; several instances of the same kind may be seen in Pool's Synopsis.

Lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass.] Or, "Even upon a colt," &c. the copulative particle being sometimes used by way of explanation (see note upon Isa. li. 19, and Noldius's Concordance, p. 281): for it appears by the evangelists, that "our Lord rode upon a young ass, or a colt, whereon never man sat" (John xii. 14, Luke xix. 30); wherein he showed his lowliness, not affecting the pomp of the world, but coming with the same primitive simplicity as the patriarchs and judges used of old (see Gen. xxii. 3, Judg. v. 10, x. 4). When horses grew common among the Jews by their traffic with Egypt (see 2 Kings x. 28, Isa. xxxi. 1, 2), then riding upon asses was thought below the dignity of great persons. A learned prelate I have often had occasion to mention, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies, p. 105, hath fully proved, that the ancient Jews explained this prophecy of the Messiah; and it is plain from the gospels, that the Jews in Christ's time understood it so. For when our Lord applied this prophecy to himself, by entering into Jerusalem upon an ass, it so affected the multitude, that they "spread their garments and palm branches in the way," as at the reception of some great prince (Matt. xxi. 8, 9); nay, his disciples took occasion from this sight to "rejoice and to praise God with a loud voice, for all the mighty works they had seen," concluding that now the "kingdom of David," in the person of the Messiah, would "immediately appear," Mark xi. 10, Luke xix. 37, 38.

Ver. 10. And I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, &c.] Peace is mentioned as the distinguishing character of Christ's church or kingdom (see note upon Isa. ii. 4), here it is joined with freedom from annoyance both from foreign and domestic enemies, as it is elsewhere (see Hos. ii. 18, Mic. v. 5, 10, Hag. ii. 22). These prophecies, as they foretell the outward peacefulness of Christ's church or kingdom, relate to the flourishing state of it, in the latter times of the world (see notes upon those texts). Ephraim, or the ten tribes, is mentioned as distinct from Jerusalem, or the tribe of Judah (compare ver. 13, and x. 6, 7, and see note upon viii. 13).

And his dominion shall be from sea—to sea.] The words are taken from Ps. lxxii. 8, where David debe from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth.

11 As for thee also, by the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water.

12 ¶ Turn you to the strong hold, ye prisoners of hope: even to day do I declare that I will render double unto thee;

13 When I have bent Judah for me, filled the bow with Ephraim, and raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and made thee as the sword of a mighty man.

14 And the Lord shall be seen over them, and his arrow shall go forth as the lightning: and the Lord God shall blow the trumpet, and shall go with whirlwinds of the south.

15 The Lord of hosts shall defend them; and they shall devour, and subdue with sling stones; and they shall drink, and make a noise as through wine; and they shall be filled like bowls, and as the corners of the altar.

16 And the Lord their God shall save them in that day as the flock of his people: for they shall be as the stones of a crown, lifted up as an ensign upon his land.

17 For how great is his goodness, and how great is his beauty! corn shall make the young men cheerful, and new wine the maids.

scribes the extent of Solomon's kingdom, that it should extend from the Red sea to the Mediterranean, and from the river Euphrates to the border of Egypt (compare Exod. xxiii. 31, Deut. ix. 24, 1 Kings iv. 21). This was a figurative description of Christ's kingdom, as may be proved from several expressions in that Psalm: which should be enlarged towards the four quarters of the world.

Ver. 11. As for thee also.] The prophet, speaking in the name of God, directs his discourse either to the church of the faithful, which sense best agrees with the present Hebrew copies; where the pronoun and the affixes are in the feminine gender: or, if we suppose an enallage of the gender, it may be understood of Christ. Both the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin read, Thou by the blood of thy covenant hast sent forth thy prisoners.

By the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water.] The words import the deliverance of mankind from the bondage of sin and Satan, by virtue of the covenant sealed with the blood of Christ (compare Heb. xiii. 20). The condition of men enslaved by sin and ignorance is often compared to that of prisoners confined in chains and darkness (see Isa. xlii. 7, lxi. 1). By the pit is meant the lowest part of the prison, called the dungeon (compare Isa. li. 14); and so the Hebrew word bor is translated Jer. xxxvii. 16, xxxviii. 6, Lam. iii. 53, 55, and its having no water, is a description of such a dungeon as that into which Jeremiah was thrown.

Ver. 12. Turn you to the strong hold, ye prisoners of hope.] Ye that are under any bondage or oppression do not despair (see Isa. xlix. 9), but rely upon God's promises for deliverance; apply yourselves to him who is a strong tower of deliverance, apply yourselves to him who is a strong tower of defence in time of trouble.

Even to-day do I declare that I will render double unto thee.] I now declare, as I have formerly done by Isaiah, lxi. 7, that I will make you abundant amends for all the evils ye have suffered. The words allude to God's blessing Job after his affliction, when he gave him double to what he had before (Job xlii. 10).

Ver. 13. When I have bent Judah for me, filled the bow with Ephraim.] When I have made Judah my bow, and Ephraim my arrow; used them as my instruments of war. In the Hebrew phrase the bow is said to be filled with the arrow, when the arrow is fitted to it: see 2 Kings ix. 24, where the Hebrew reads, "Jehu filled his hand with a bow," i. e. by a usual hypallage, filled a bow with his hand: where the English expresses the sense, "He drew a bow with his full strength." Judah and Ephraim are equivalent to Judah and Israel (see note upon viii. 13). The men of Ephraim were expert archers (see Ps. lxxviii. 9), to which the expression here may probably allude.

And raised up thy sons, O Zion, &c.] Enabled the Jews under the conduct of the Maccabees to destroy the forces of the Syrian kings, Antiochus Epiphanes and others, who were the successors of Alexander, the founder of the Grecian monarchy (see Dan. viii. 22, 1 Macc. i. 10).

Made thee as the sword of a mighty man.] Given success to your arms, that none should be able to withstand thee.

Ver. 14. The Lord shall be seen over them.] He shall give conspicuous tokens of his presence with them, and his presiding over them, and directing them in all their enterprises.

And his arrow shall go forth as the lightning.] Their force shall be irresistible: the lightning is often called God's arrow (see Ps. xviii. 14, lxxvii. 18, cxliv. 6).

The Lord God shall blow the trumpet.] He shall give the signal of war, and shall encourage his soldiers to the battle.

Shall go with whirlwinds.] Shall discomfit his enemies, as a whirlwind tears in pieces every thing that stands in its way (see the note upon Isa. xxi. 1).

Ver. 15. The Lord of hosts shall defend them; &c.] The hand of God shall visibly appear in protecting the Maccabees, and enabling them to conquer their enemies with as unequal a force as that of David was in respect of Goliath, when he subdued him with a sling-stone (1 Sam. xvii. 50).

And they shall drink, and make a noise as through wine, &c.] They shall feast and rejoice for their victories; they shall offer sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, sprinkle the blood upon the horns of the altar (see Lev. iv. 25), and fill the howls with the rest of it, to be poured out at the foot of it (see xiv. 20, Deut. xii. 27). Or, their courage shall be increased as when men's spirits are raised with wine (see Ps. lxxviii. 65), and they shall be filled with the blood of their enemies, as the bowls and corners of the altar are with the blood of the sacrifices.

Ver. 16.] God shall make it known to the world how precious they are in his sight (compare Isa. lxii. 3, Mal. iii. 17), and his favour towards them shall be an encouragement to others to become proselytes to the true religion.

Ver. 17.] Some begin a new chapter here, and suppose the prophet to return to what he had promised, viii. 12. The words magnify God's goodness and favour towards his people, in bestowing all sorts of plenty upon them: so that a fruitful harvest shall rejoice the hearts of the young men that bring it in, and a plentiful vintage shall make the maids cheerful that gather the grapes (compare Isa. xvi. 10, Jer. xlviii. 33). New wine is put here for the grapes which make it (compare Jer. xl. 12), as bread signifies bread-corn, Isa. xxviii. 28, xxx. 23. But the words may be understood to denote that plenty which some of the prophets speak of as a concomitant of the reign of the Messias (Joel iii. 18, Amos ix. 14).

CHAPTER X.

1 Ask ye of the LORD rain in the time of the latter rain; so the LORD shall make bright clouds, and give them showers of rain, to every one grass in the field.

2 For the idols have spoken vanity, and the diviners have seen a lie, and have told false dreams; they comfort in vain: therefore they went their way as a flock, they were troubled, because there was no shepherd.

3 Mine anger was kindled against the shepherds, and I punished the goats: for the LORD of hosts hath visited his flock the house of Judah, and hath made them as his goodly horse in the battle.

4 Out of him came forth the corner, out of him the nail, out of him the battle bow, out of him every oppressor together.

5 ¶ And they shall be as mighty men, which tread down their enemies in the mire of the streets in the battle: and they shall fight, because the LORD is with them, and the riders on horses shall be confounded.

CHAP. X.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet deters the Jews from seeking to idols, by putting them in mind of the calamities idolatry brought upon their forefathers. Afterward he foretells a general restoration of the Jewish nation.

Ver. 1. Ask ye of the Lord rain in the time of the latter rain; The fulfilling of the promise of fruitful seasons (ix. 17) depends upon the people's asking them from God; who will hear their petitions, and give them both the former rain, and also the latter, in its season. This usually fell in the first month (Joel ii. 23), and was very useful for plumping the corn, and therefore very much desired (see Job xxix. 23, Prov. xvi. 15).

So the Lord shall make bright clouds, and give them showers of rain; Or lightnings, as the margin reads, and as the word is rendered, Job xxviii. 25. Great rains usually accompany thunder and lightning (see Jer. x. 13).

Ver. 2. For the idols have spoken vanity, &c. Whenever you or your fathers consulted idols or diviners, when they wanted rain (see Jer. xiv. 22), or in any other time of distress, neither the priests who delivered answers from the idols, nor the diviners who pretended to direct men by the help of dreams or visions, have been any way beneficial to them. The word translated idol, is teraphim in the original: concerning the sense of it, see the note upon Hos. iii. 4. The idols are said here to speak vanity; i. e. by the answers the priests gave in their name: for elsewhere they are called dumb idols (Hab. ii. 18), which have mouths and speak not (Ps. cxv. 5).

Therefore they went their way as a flock, &c. They went into captivity, and came into great distress; as sheep are driven away and scattered, that have no shepherd to guide or protect them (compare Jer. l. 17, Ezek. xxxiv. 5).

Ver. 3. Mine anger was kindled against the shepherds; I was justly displeased with the Jewish rulers, both ecclesiastical and civil (see the notes upon Isa. lvi. 2, Jer. xxiii. 1, Ezek. xxxiv. 2), as I had severely threatened them by my prophets, before the captivity which came upon the whole nation as a judgment for their sins, especially upon those wicked Jews who were their instruments in oppressing the people (see Ezek. xxxiv. 17).

An eminent divine understands these three verses of the Jews that remained in Babylon, who either consulted the idols of the gentiles, or else such false prophets among the Jews there, as were addicted to divination, and such like idolatrous practices (compare Jer. xxix. 8, 15, 24). These all prophesied drought, famine, and such like calamities to those Jews that should return into Judea; and therefore are called vain comforters: such as Job complained of, xvi. 2. By this means some of the people were detained at Babylon without any form of government among themselves, and were as a flock without a shepherd. Shepherds and goats, mentioned ver. 3, he explains of the great men of the Jews who stayed behind at Babylon: these he distinguishes from those that returned home, who are called God's flock, in the following words.

For [or rather, but] the Lord of hosts hath visited his flock, &c. But now God hath given his people manifest tokens of his favour and protection (see ix. 16), in prospering their arms under the conduct of Judas Maccabeus, and making them victorious over their enemies. The chief use which the Jews made of horses was in war (see Prov. xxi. 31, Isa. xxxi. 1, 2).

Ver. 4. Out of him came forth [or. shall come forth] the corner, &c. It is owing to God's favour that they have a captain, or ruler, to support their commonwealth; such was in an eminent manner Judas Maccabeus; that they have a settled state and government, whereupon private men may rely for the security of their lives and properties: the word pitnah, translated corner, signifies likewise a prince or a leader; and so it is taken, Numb. xxiv. 17, Judg. xx. 2, 1 Sam. xiv. 38, Isa. xix. 13. The word rendered nail signifies any person on whom others have a dependence (see Isa. xxii. 23, 25), as also the public settlement of a state (Ezra. ix. 8).

Out of him every oppressor together. As the Greek word tyrant was at first equivalent in signification to a king, but afterward degenerated into a worse denomination: so the Hebrew nogesh usually signifies an oppressor, but is sometimes taken in a general sense for a prince or governor: so it probably signifies, Isa. lx. 17, where our English renders it, Make thine exactors righteousness: but the Chaldee paraphrase expresseth it by skullanim, princes: the LXX. translate it ἐπισκοπῶντες, over-seers; which made some of the fathers apply that text to the bishops of the Christian church. This sense of the word agrees best with the scope of this place, and the Chaldee understands it so here. Thus the word may be understood, ix. 8, so as to signify the commander or general of an army.

Ver. 5. And they shall be as mighty men, which tread down their enemies [God shall inspire them with courage to subdue their enemies, and trample upon their carcasses (compare Ps. xviii. 42, Isa. xli. 25)]. This may be understood either of the Maccabees, or of the victories which the Jews should obtain over their enemies in the latter times (see xii. 6), to which the following part of the chapter seems to relate.

6 And I will strengthen the house of Judah, and I will save the house of Joseph, and I will bring them again to place them; for I have mercy upon them: and they shall be as though I had not cast them off: for I am the LORD their God, and will hear them.

7 And they of Ephraim shall be like a mighty man, and their heart shall rejoice as through wine: yea, their children shall see it, and be glad; their heart shall rejoice in the LORD.

8 I will hiss for them, and gather them; for I have redeemed them: and they shall increase as they have increased.

9 And I will sow them among the people: and they shall remember me in far countries; and they shall live with their children, and turn again.

10 I will bring them again also out of the land of Egypt, and gather them out of Assyria; and I will bring them into the land of Gilead and Lebanon; and place shall not be found for them.

11 And he shall pass through the sea with affliction, and shall smite the waves in the sea, and all the deeps of the river shall dry up: and the pride of Assyria shall be brought down, and the sceptre of Egypt shall depart away.

12 And I will strengthen them in the LORD; and they shall walk up and down in his name, saith the LORD.

The riders on horses shall be confounded.] Compare xii. 4. We may expound this of the discomfiture of Antiochus's armies by the Maccabees, whose strength lay chiefly in their horse (see Dan. xi. 40), as that text is understood by several commentators.

Ver. 6.] This promise is probably to be understood of the general restoration of the Jewish nation upon their conversion; a subject often treated of by the prophets in the Old Testament, where Judah and Israel are spoken of as equal sharers in this blessing (compare Ezek. xxxvii. 16, &c. and see the note upon Isa. xi. 11). See xiii. 9.

Ver. 7. They of Ephraim] Ephraim is equivalent here to the ten tribes, as the house of Joseph is, ver. 6 (see the note upon Hos. v. 3).

Their heart shall rejoice as through wine:] Which raises men's spirits and courage (see ix. 15).

Yea, their children shall see it, &c.] Their successes shall end in a lasting peace, for which their posterity shall have occasion to return thanks to God (see ver. 9).

Ver. 8. I will hiss for them, and gather them;] I will summon them from distant countries by a certain signal, as a shepherd calls his flock together with his whistle (compare Isa. v. 26, vii. 18), which shall assemble them together, in order to bring them back into their own country (ver. 10), for I will redeem them out of the land of their enemies. The prophets often speak of a thing future, as if it were already accomplished (see the note upon Isa. xxi. 9).

And they shall increase as they have increased.] In the most flourishing times, such as were the reigns of David and Solomon.

Ver. 9. I will sow them among the people:] I will multiply them among the nations, where they are dispersed (compare Hos. ii. 23).

And they shall remember me in far countries;] "From among all the nations where they are scattered," as the prophets elsewhere express it (see Deut. xxx. 1, 4, Jer. xxx. 10, 11, Ezek. xi. 16, xxviii. 25, xxxiv. 13). As men are said to forget God when they forget their duty to him, so remembering him denotes their returning to their obedience.

And they shall—turn again.] They shall return to their own country, and enjoy it, they and their posterity (see Isa. lxx. 23, Ezek. xxviii. 25, Amos ix. 14).

Ver. 10.] And I will bring them again also out of Egypt, and—Assyria;] Egypt and Assyria were two potent kingdoms which bordered upon Judea, so that by turns they were either allies to the Jews, or their conquerors: and the Jews either went thither for refuge, or were carried thither captives (see Hos. ix. 3); whereupon the prophets, when they foretell the general restoration of their nation, often express it by their returning from Egypt and Assyria (see Isa. xi. 15, 16, xix. 23—25, xxviii. 13, Hos. xi. 11). We may likewise observe, that God's bringing his people again from Egypt, was a proverbial expression, to signify any deliverance, as great or greater than that (see Ps. lxxviii. 22, Mic. vii. 15). So here the words of the following verse allude to the Israelites passing through the Red sea.

The land of Gilead and Lebanon;] Two countries remarkable for their fruitfulness (see Jer. xxii. 6, Mic. vii. 14).

And place shall not be found for them.] They shall multiply so fast, that there shall not be room enough in Judea to receive them and their families (compare Isa. xlix. 20).

Ver. 11. And he shall pass through the sea with affliction, &c.] The sense might be more properly expressed thus, "And he (Israel) shall pass through the straits of the sea;" so the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin understand it, meaning a branch of the Red sea: "and (God) shall smite the waves of the sea," &c. The expressions allude to the miraculous passage of the Israelites over an arm of the Red sea, when God dried up the waters of that sea, or river, before them (see Exod. xiv. 21, Josh. ii. 10). And this imports, that God would do as great things for them as he did formerly for their fathers: to this sense the Chaldee expounds the words (see the note upon the foregoing verse, and compare Isa. xi. 15). If we would distinguish betwixt the sea and the river, we may understand the river of Jordan, whose waters were dried up to make a passage for the Israelites into the land of promise (see Josh. iv. 23).

And the pride of Assyria shall be brought down, &c.] By Assyria and Egypt are meant in general the enemies of God and of his truth, who shall all be subdued, and broken in pieces by the kingdom of Christ, when he shall come in glory to set up his kingdom on the earth (see Dan. ii. 33, 34, Isa. lx. 12). The Assyrian is taken in this sense, Isa. xiv. 25, Mic. v. 5, and both Egypt and Assyria may probably be so understood, Isa. xix. 23 (see the notes upon those texts).

Ver. 12. I will strengthen them in the Lord;] God shall be their strength and protection (see ver. 5).

They shall walk up and down in his name.] Or, "Walk in his name;" i. e. their lives and actions shall be under the conduct of his laws, and he shall give them success answerable to their upright intentions.

CHAPTER XI.

1 OPEN thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars.

2 Howl, fir tree; for the cedar is fallen; because the mighty is spoiled: howl, O ye oaks of Bashan; for the forest of the vintage is come down.

3 ¶ There is a voice of the howling of the shepherds; for their glory is spoiled: a voice of the roaring of young lions; for the pride of Jordan is spoiled.

4 Thus saith the LORD my God; Feed the flock of the slaughter;

5 Whose possessors slay them, and hold themselves not guilty: and they that sell them say, Blessed be the LORD; for I am rich: and their own shepherds pity them not.

6 For I will no more pity the inhabitants of the land, saith the LORD: but, lo, I will deliver the men every one into his neighbour's hand, and into the hand of his king: and they shall smite the land, and out of their hand I will not deliver them.

7 And I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you, O poor of the flock. And I took unto me

CHAP. XI.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet, representing the person of the Messiah, declares the ungrateful requitals the Jews had made him, when he undertook the office of a shepherd, in guiding and governing them: how they rejected him, and valued him and his labours at the mean price of thirty pieces of silver. Hereupon he threatens to destroy their city and temple, and to give them up into the hands of such governors as should have no regard either for their spiritual or temporal welfare.

Ver. 1.] By Lebanon most interpreters understand the temple, whose stately buildings resemble the tall cedars of that forest. Thus the word is commonly understood, Hab. ii. 17. There is a remarkable story mentioned in the Jewish writers to this purpose: "Some time before the destruction of the temple, the doors of it opened of their own accord; a circumstance attested by Josephus (Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap. 12). Then R. Johanan, a disciple of R. Hillel, directing his speech to the temple, said, "I know thy destruction is at hand, according to the prophecy of Zechariah; open thy doors, O Lebanon," &c.

The words may likewise denote the destruction of Jerusalem, elsewhere called by the name of a forest: her lofty buildings resembling the stately ranks of trees in a forest (compare Jer. xxi. 14, xxii. 7, 23, Ezek. xx. 46).

Ver. 2. Howl, fir tree; for the cedar is fallen;] By the several sorts of trees are meant the several orders and degrees of men, who shall be sharers in the common destruction (see Isa. ii. 13, x. 33, 34, and the notes there).

The forest of the vintage] Or, "The defended forest," as it is in the margin, according to a different reading of the Hebrew text, which gives a proper representation of Jerusalem, with the fortifications about it. If we follow the reading of the English text, the "forest of the vintage" may probably mean Carmel (see the note upon Isa. xxxvii. 24), which being placed in the north-west parts of Judea, and joined here with Bashan that lay south-east, may denote that the calamity shall be general. Bashan was famous for its stately oaks (see Isa. ii. 13).

Ver. 3. Shepherds;] By shepherds are meant the chief rulers of the Jews (see note upon x. 3).

The roaring of young lions;] So he calls the princes and governors of the Jews, because they devoured the people by their oppressions (see Zeph. iii. 3). So Achilles calls Agamemnon ἀνδροφάγοι βασιλεῖς, "a blood-sucking king," (Iliad. i).

The pride of Jordan is spoiled.] The lion may be called the pride of the forest, as being the stateliest beast that rules there; as beasts that prey upon others are called "the children of pride," Job xli. 34. Lions are styled here "the pride of Jordan," because they lay in the thickets about the banks of Jordan. The words may be rendered, "the swelling of Jordan," as they are translated, Jer. xlix. 19. At the time of the swelling, or overflowing of Jordan, the lions were raised out of their coverts, and infested the country (see note upon that text).

Ver. 4.] A learned prelate, in his Defence of Christianity from the ancient Prophecies (chap. iii. 1), observes, that the actions of the prophets are sometimes typical; i. e. they represent in themselves the persons and circumstances of others (see the note upon iii. 8). So here Zechariah was commanded by God to act the part of Christ, the "good shepherd," and to "feed the flock of the slaughter," that flock which their shepherds destroyed, instead of feeding them.

Ver. 5.] Whose rulers deal with their flock as so many butchers: and think they have a right to slay or sell them, and thank God that they have a good market; or believe that they may lawfully make merchandise of their souls for their own lucre and advantage (compare 2 Pet. ii. 3, Rev. xviii. 13).

Ver. 6.] Nor shall their condition at all grow better, saith God, for I will show no more pity for the main body of the people than their rulers do. "The inhabitants of the land" are to be distinguished from the "poor of the flock" in the following verse. As to the former, God declares by his prophet, that he will leave some of them to perish by their mutual and intestine divisions (see ver. 9), as many of the Jews did when the Roman army invaded Judea. Others of them he would deliver into the hands of Vespasian, whose predecessor the Jews had owned for their king, at the same time when they disclaimed their Messiah, and disowned his right to reign over them (John xix. 15), and his army shall smite the land with utter destruction (compare Mal. iv. 6).

Ver. 7. And [or, but] I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you, O poor of the flock.] Or, "even, or especially, the poor of the flock." Zechariah, representing the person of Christ the true shepherd, saith, he entered upon his office, and undertook the care of the "slaughtered flock," chiefly out of a regard to the meek and humble among them; for to such are the benefits of the gospel peculiarly promised (see Isa. xi. 4, lxi. 1, Zeph. iii. 12, and notes upon these texts).

I took unto me two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands;] A staff or crook is the proper ensign of a shepherd; the shepherds of old time had two rods or staves; one turned round at top, that it might not hurt the sheep: this was for counting them, and separating the sound from the diseased (see Lev. xxvii. 32); the other had an iron hook at the end of it, to pull in the stray sheep, and hold them fast while the shepherd corrected them, the psalmist mentions both these, Ps. xxiii. 4, "Thy rod and thy staff comfort me."

two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands; and I fed the flock.

8 Three shepherds also I cut off in one month; and my soul loathed them, and their soul also abhorred me.

9 Then said I, I will not feed you: that that dieth, let it die; and that that is to be cut off, let it be cut off; and let the rest eat every one the flesh of another.

10 ¶ And I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break my covenant which I had made with all the people.

The first staff he called Beauty, or delight, as the word Naom may be rendered, i. e. his favour, gentleness, or kindness, towards his people; so the word signifies, Ps. xc. 17, and this was remarkably verified in our Saviour Christ, whose "gracious" words and beneficial works were conspicuous through the whole course of his life. The other staff he called Bands, by which is meant that "bond of the new covenant" (as the words of Ezekiel may be understood, xx. 37), whereby he intended to unite both the kingdoms of Israel and Judah under himself as their head and king (see Ezek. xxxvii. 22), and then afterward to unite the Jews and gentiles into one church, by "breaking down the partition wall that was between them" (see John x. 16, Eph. ii. 14).

Ver. 8. Three shepherds also I cut off in one month;] We may probably explain these three shepherds of the chief priests, scribes, and elders, of the Jews. Christ exposed these as blind guides, and thereby lessened their authority among the people; which contributed very much to the spreading of the gospel (see John xii. 19): one month seems a proverbial expression for a short time (see Hos. v. 7).

My soul loathed them, and their soul also abhorred me.] Or "My soul was straitened towards them," as the Hebrew may be literally translated; i. e. I was straitened in my affections to them: so the Greek word στενωχρᾶσθαι, "to be straitened," is used, 2 Cor. vi. 12, which exactly answers the Hebrew katsar. I was less tender towards them, than towards "the poor of the flock," because they showed themselves averse to my person and doctrine. the Hebrew word bachala, abhorred, is never met with but here: Maimonides supposes that it alludes to Chebel or Chobelin, Bands, ver. 7, the two words differing only by a transposition of letters (More Nevoch. lib. ii. cap. 43). Such allusions are frequent in scripture (see notes upon Isa. xxiv. 17, Jer. i. 11, 12).

Ver. 9.] I found in a little time that my labour did not meet with a suitable return, a great part of my sheep proving untractable: so I resolved to be their shepherd no longer, but leave them to be consumed by the common calamities of death, famine, &c. or to be cut off by their enemies, the Romans, just as the lesser cattle are pushed and gored by the greater (see Ezek. xxxiv. 21), and those that escape those calamities shall destroy one another by their civil discords (see ver. 6, and compare Isa. ix. 21, xlix. 20). The word translated cut off, signifies likewise being consumed, or ready to perish (see ver. 16).

Ver. 10.] Thus the covenant which I had made with the whole nation of the Jews was broken, and I excluded them from having any benefit in the second covenant, that of the gospel: they were to be my people no longer (see Dan. ix. 26, Hos. i. 9, and the note upon xiii. 9 of this prophecy).

Ver. 11.] Or, "And in that day it was broken: the poor of the flock," &c. The few believing 11 And it was broken in that day: and so the poor of the flock that waited upon me knew that it was the word of the LORD.

12 And I said unto them, If ye think good, give me my price; and if not, forbear. So they weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver.

13 And the LORD said unto me, Cast it unto the potter: a goodly price that I was prized at of them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them to the potter in the house of the LORD.

14 Then I cut asunder mine other staff, even

Jews that attended upon my preaching (ver. 7), were convinced that this was God's doing, and the fulfilling those judgments which he had threatened by his prophets.

Ver. 12. I said unto them,] Or, "I had said unto them;" i. e. before I broke my staff, called Beauty, or delight, ver. 10.

Give me my price [or, my hire]; and if not, forbear.] Christ still persists to act the character of a shepherd, and, in an humble manner, demands of the Jews what price they put upon his labour. He was resolved to use no constraint, but leave it to themselves to continue or discharge him. In the same style our Lord himself speaks (John xii. 47), "If any man hear my words and believe not, I judge him not."

So they weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver.] To show how little they cared for me or my service, they valued it but at "thirty shekels" of silver, the price of the meanest slave (see Exod. xxi. 32).

Ver. 13. Cast it unto the potter:] God commanded the prophet in a vision, as personating Christ, to cast the money in a contemptuous manner to the potter, as a reward only suitable to his labour, and a price only fit for such wares as he sold, which were of the meanest value (see Lam. iv. 2).

And cast them to [or, for] the potter in the house of the Lord.] I cast them back into the treasury in the temple, where afterward they were laid out for the use of the potter. This whole transaction performed by Zechariah in a vision, was designed to be an exact representation of the several circumstances that attended the betraying the Messiah by Judas, the price the chief priests put upon him (to whom as the governors of the temple the money was returned), and the use to which the money was applied (see Matt. xxvii. 6, 10). This whole prophetic scene is represented in the single person of Zechariah, just as Ezekiel sustains the type or figure both of the Chaldean army that should besiege Jerusalem, and of the Jews themselves that were besieged (Ezek. iv. 1, 12).

This is one of those prophecies, whose literal sense is fulfilled in our blessed Saviour, and cannot be applied to any other person, but in a very remote or improper sense. The like instances may be seen in Ps. xxii. 16, 18, lxi. 21, Hos. xi. 1. The Jews themselves have expounded this prophecy of the Messiah. Christoph. Helvicus, in his Elenchus Judæorum, quotes Beresith Rabbi on Gen. xlix. as bringing in the Messiah speaking the very words of the twelfth verse here, in his own person. And Dr. Alix, against the Unitarians, p. 336, cites Rabbi Menahem, applying the "selling the just for silver," mentioned here and Amos ii. 6, of the "selling the Shechinah," by which they understood the Messias, whom they often speak of as being the true God (see the same author, p. 286).

Ver. 14.] As they refused to be united under me their head, so in breaking my other staff, I foreshadowed Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel.

15 ¶ And the Lord said unto me, Take unto thee yet the instruments of a foolish shepherd.

16 For, lo, I will raise up a shepherd in the land, which shall not visit those that be cut off, neither shall seek the young one, nor heal that the destruction of Jerusalem, the bond and cement of all their tribes, being the seat and centre both of their civil power and of the divine worship (see Ps. cxxxii. 3—5. The consequence of that was the entire dissolution of the nation, and the dispersion and confusion of all their tribes, whose families could no longer be distinguished after the loss of their genealogies.

Ver. 15. Take unto thee yet [or, once more] the instruments of a foolish shepherd.] As Zechariah in the foregoing vision had acted the part of the true shepherd, so here he is commanded to take upon him the character and furniture of a foolish or unprofitable shepherd (see ver. 17). Folly in scripture is equivalent to wickedness; so it may mean not only unskilful, but likewise ill-designing governors, who should only intend their own advantage, and have no regard for the good of the flock, or people, committed to their charge. The instruments of such a shepherd must be suitable to his own indiscretion; viz. a scrip with holes, and a stick or crook made to push and hurt the flock, not to protect or defend them.

Ver. 16. I will raise up a shepherd in the land.] A shepherd in the singular number denotes a succession of such governors as are described in the following words: so the succession of priests is represented under the single person of Levi, Mal. ii. 5, 6. Since the Jews had rejected the true shepherd, God threatens to send, or permit, such shepherds to rule over them, as should be notorious for their negligence and avarice, their cruelty and oppression. This may be understood either of the blind guides, who conducted their consciences with avarice and tyranny, or of the false Christs and false prophets, who often misled them to their ruin [or it may be meant of the miseries which they suffered under Hadrian, and other Roman emperors, as St. Jerome interprets it]; or else it may be expounded of the latter times of the

that is broken, nor feed that that standeth still: but he shall eat the flesh of the fat, and tear their claws in pieces.

17 Woe to the idol shepherd that leaveth the flock! the sword shall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye: his arm shall be clean dried up, and his right eye shall be utterly darkened.

Roman empire, during its administration under the ten horns (Rev. xvii. 12), by whom they have been at divers times plundered, persecuted, and destroyed, without mercy; as may be seen particularly in Basnage's History of the Jews, book vii.

Which shall not visit those that be cut off.] The LXX. render it, "that which is missing;" and it may signify, "that which is ready to perish" (see ver. 9).

Neither shall seek the young one.] Or, "That which is scattered," or wandering. So all the ancient interpreters render it, reading noar in the Hebrew, where the word is now pointed naar.

Nor feed that that standeth still.] Which continues in the flock sound and well, in opposition to those that wander, or are diseased. The words may be translated, "Nor number that which standeth still." It is the business of a careful shepherd to number his flock, and see that none be wanting.

He shall eat the flesh of the fat, and tear [or, break] their claws] i. e. He shall enrich himself by oppressing those that are of substance, and deprive them of all ability of defending themselves (compare Ezek. xxxiv. 3).

Ver. 17. Woe to the idol shepherd that leaveth the flock.] Who taketh no care of the flock, and minds nothing but making his own profit out of them. Such a shepherd is no better than "an idol, that is profitable for nothing" (Isa. xlv. 10), and hath only the outward form and appearance of a shepherd. The sentence may be rendered, "Woe to the shepherd of no value;" so the word elil is translated, Job xiii. 4.

The sword shall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye.] As he has abused his power and his understanding, signified by his arm and his right eye, God shall in his just judgment deprive him of the use of both those faculties. A sword is put for any instrument of the divine vengeance: so it is used, xiii. 7, Jer. i. 35—37, Amos ix. 10, and in other places.

CHAPTER XII.

1 THE burden of the word of the LORD for Israel, saith the LORD, which stretcheth forth the heavens, and layeth the foundation of the earth, and formeth the spirit of man within him.

2 Behold, I will make Jerusalem a cup of

CHAP. XIII

ARGUMENT.—The former part of this chapter and several passages in the fourteenth, relate to an invasion made upon the inhabitants of Judea and Jerusalem, in the latter times of the world, probably after their return to, and settlement in, their own land, which is often spoken of by the prophets. It is probably the same attempt that is more largely described in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of Ezekiel. Mr. Mede and several other learned men are inclined to understand that prophecy of the Turks and their confederates. See the Argument to those chapters, and particularly xxxviii. 8, 12, where the expressions seem to point out the time when that and the parallel prophecies are to be fulfilled.

VOL. III.—101

Ver. 1. The burden of the word of the Lord for Israel.] Or, "Toward Israel." The Hebrew word massa is often translated a burden; i. e. a burdensome prophecy (see ix. 1): but it likewise signifies a prophecy in general, as it does particularly in this place, also Lam. ii. 14, and Mal. i. 1, and is sometimes interpreted vision, in the Chaldee paraphrase.

Which stretched forth the heavens, &c.] These are mentioned as undeniable instances of God's power, and are made use of as arguments to encourage men to rely on his word for fulfilling such promises, which seem to human understanding most unlikely to be brought to pass (compare Isa. xlii. 5, xlv. 24, xlv. 18, xlviii. 13).

Formeth the spirit of man within him.] He that creates the soul, and unites it to the body) see Numb. xvi. 22, Eccles. xii. 7, Isa. lvii. 16, Heb. xii. 9).

trembling unto all the people round about, when they shall be in the siege both against Judah and against Jerusalem.

3 ¶ And in that day will I make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people: all that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces, though all the people of the earth be gathered together against it.

4 In that day, saith the LORD, I will smite every horse with astonishment, and his rider with madness: and I will open mine eyes upon the house of Judah, and will smite every horse of the people with blindness.

5 And the governors of Judah shall say in their heart, The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be my strength in the LORD of hosts their God.

6 ¶ In that day will I make the governors of Judah like an hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf; and they shall

Ver. 2. I will make Jerusalem a cup of trembling unto all the people round about.] The nations that besiege Jerusalem shall be in the same condition with those that are overcome with poisonous or intoxicating liquors, and thereby bereaved of their strength and understanding (see ver. 4, and compare Isa. li. 17, 22).

When [or, even although] they shall be in the siege both against Judah and against Jerusalem.] Even although they be so numerous as to invade Judah and besiege Jerusalem at the same time. By comparing this place with xiv. 14, we may conjecture, that some of the Jews shall return before the rest, and possess themselves of Jerusalem; they shall no sooner be seated there, but all the Mahometan nations shall confederate against them; then the other Jews shall fly home "like doves to their windows," or nests (Isa. lx. 8), where they shall all be attacked by multitudes of Turkish forces and their confederates.

Ver. 3. In that day] The same expression is repeated, ver. 4, 6, 9, 11, and xiii. 1, 2, 4, xiv. 6, 8, 20. The phrase signifies, in the prophets, an extraordinary season, remarkable for some signal events of providence (see the note upon Isa. iv. 2). This prophecy may probably be understood of the invasions which the enemies of God and his truth shall attempt against the Jews after their conversion (compare xiv. 1—3, 13, 14, Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix., Mic. v. 8, &c.).

Will I make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people.] St. Jerome upon the place thinks that "a burdensome stone" is an expression taken from an exercise kept up in Judea to his time, "where young men used to make trial of their strength by lifting great stones as high as they could." In such an exercise, where men undertook to lift a stone too heavy for their strength, they were in danger of its falling upon them, and bruising or crushing them to pieces. To the same sense Christ saith, "On whomsoever this stone shall fall, it will grind him to powder" (Matt. xxi. 44). The same danger shall they incur, who enter into acts of hostility with the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

All that burden themselves with it shall be cut in pieces.] All that undertake to contend with it, shall have their flesh torn and bruised like men that let a heavy stone fall upon them.

Ver. 4. I will smite every horse with astonishment, &c.] The Turks are famous for their cavalry, wherein the strength of their armies consists; so, in order to their discomfiture, God will send a distraction among the horses and their riders, who devour all the people round about, on the right hand and on the left: and Jerusalem shall be inhabited again in her own place, even in Jerusalem.

7 The LORD also shall save the tents of Judah first, that the glory of the house of David and the glory of the inhabitants of Jerusalem do not magnify themselves against Judah.

8 In that day shall the LORD defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and he that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David; and the house of David shall be as God, as the angel of the LORD before them.

9 ¶ And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem.

10 And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications: and they shall shall be put into such a confusion as to fall foul one upon another (see xiv. 13), and not be able to distinguish between their friends and their foes; they shall be as if they were struck with blindness, just as the Syrian army was when they surrounded the door of Elisha (2 Kings vi. 18).

I will open mine eyes upon the house of Judah.] I will have an especial concern for their preservation (compare ix. 18).

Ver. 5.] The marginal reading is to be preferred, "There is strength to me, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem in the LORD of hosts our God." God doth visibly interpose for our deliverance, and thereby encourage us to rely on his protection.

Ver. 6. The governors of Judah like an hearth of fire, &c.] They shall devour all their enemies that annoy them (see ver. 9, Obad. ver. 18, and the note upon that place).

On the right hand and on the left.] i. e. Southward and northward (see the note upon Ezek. xvi. 46, so Isa. ix. 20). The right hand and the left, is explained in the Targum by the south and the north.

Jerusalem shall be inhabited again.] See xiv. 10.

Ver. 7.] This shall be the order whereby this victory shall be accomplished; the LORD shall first give success to the body of the Jewish nation that encamp in the open country, that the valour of the house of David, and of the people that defend Jerusalem from within, may not eclipse the courage of the people without the walls, and puff up one party against the other. The inhabitants of Jerusalem used to value themselves above their brethren, because their city was the place of God's residence, and the seat of the royal family; to take away all occasion of such an emulation, God will first appear in behalf of those Jews that live in the open country.

Ver. 8. He that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David.] He shall inspire those within the city with unusual courage, so that the feeblest among them shall do as great exploits as David did of old.

As the angel of the LORD before them.] Or, "At the head of them." The Messiah, who is the principal branch of the house of David, shall lead them on, as he formerly went before the Israelites in the wilderness, and conducted them to the land of Canaan, by the name of the "angel of God's presence" (see Exod. xxiii. 20, &c., Isa. lxiii. 9, and note there).

Ver. 9.] See ver. 3, 6.

Ver. 10. I will pour upon the house of David,—the spirit of grace and of supplications.] I will bestow a plentiful share of grace upon the descendants of Da-look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him, as one that is in bitterness for his firstborn.

11 In that day shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon.

12 And the land shall mourn, every family

vid's family, and the rest of the Jews, whereby they shall be brought to a deep humiliation for their own sins, and a true compunction of heart for the great sin of their forefathers in crucifying me their Lord and Saviour. The conversion of the Jews is compared by St. Paul to "life from the dead," Rom. xi. 15, and therefore must be effected by an extraordinary and uncommon degree of grace, which shall then be given them (see Isa. liv. 13, Ezek. xxxix. 29, Joel ii. 28, and the notes upon those places): such an efficacious call as may bring them to a due sense of their own and their fathers' sins, and a hearty lamentation for them (see Jer. xxxi. 9, l. 4, Ezek. xvi. 61, 63, xx. 43, xxxvi. 31, and notes there).

They shall look upon me whom they have pierced,] The words point out the outward means whereby their conversion shall be wrought; viz. that the Lord, i. e. the Messiah, "shall come" (xiv. 5): i. e. Christ shall appear in the heavens, "sitting on a bright cloud," as his coming is described, Rev. xiv. 14 (compare i. 7, Dan. vii. 13). This is probably meant by "the sign of the Son of Man in heaven," mentioned Matt. xxiv. 30, compared with Mark xiii. 26. This sight shall strike them with horror and astonishment for their sin in rejecting me their God, whom their fathers put to an ignominious death, and themselves have by their blasphemies crucified afresh. Then they shall beg pardon for their own and their fathers' sins, with the deepest signs of mourning and humiliation, expressed by a proverbial speech, as equal to the mourning of a father for an only son (compare Jer. vi. 26, Amos viii. 10).

The Jews themselves have applied this text to the Messiah, as may be seen in Grotius's notes upon the place, and Bishop Pearson's Exposition of the fourth article of the Creed. David did before describe his sufferings under the figure of "piercing his hands and his feet," Ps. xxii. 16, and Isaiah foretold he should be wounded for our transgressions, liii. 5. This text is at large explained and vindicated in the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity from the Ancient Prophecies, p. 107.

Ver. 11.] Josiah was slain at, or near Megiddo (2 Kings xxiii. 29); it may be the field where the battle was fought might be called Hadadrimmon. St. Jerome saith, it was a place near Jezreel, called in his time Maximianopolis. The valley or plain of Jezreel was a large plain (see Josh. xvii. 6) called the plain apart; the family of the house of David apart, and their wives apart; the family of the house of Nathan apart, and their wives apart;

13 The family of the house of Levi apart, and their wives apart; the family of Shimei apart, and their wives apart;

14 All the families that remain, every family apart, and their wives apart.

of Esdraelon, Judith i. 8; it comprehended the valley of Megiddo in it. There the lamentation for Josiah began, which was continued from thence to Jerusalem, whither his body was brought to be buried, where all Judah mourned for him, and appointed an anniversary commemoration and lamentation for him (2 Chron. xxxv. 24, 25). So the mourning for Josiah became a proverb for a public and solemn lamentation. Such a national humiliation shall the Jews observe for their crucifying the Messiah.

Ver. 12. The land shall mourn, every family apart;] The whole land shall mourn in a most solemn manner; and every family shall sequester themselves from business and conversation for that purpose (compare vii. 3).

The house of David apart, and their wives apart;] Those of the royal family who have rejected Christ shall lead the way. Even husbands and wives shall abstain from each other's company, as is usual in times of solemn humiliation (see Joel ii. 16): or, as a very learned person suggests, in solemn processions it was usual for the several orders of men to go distinctly, and likewise for the women to go in ranks by themselves; this was in all likelihood used in funeral mournings, where each tribe or order of men and women used a distinct form of lamentation. For example, the tribe of Judah lamented, "Ah, my brother!" the rest of the tribes answered, "Ah, Lord!" (see Jer. xxii. 13). This probably was done in the mourning for Josiah (see 1 Esdras i. 32), and observed in the times after the return from captivity (see 2 Chron. xxxv. 25, compared with xxxvi. 22), to which ceremony the expressions of the text allude.

The family of the house of Nathan] David had a son named Nathan (2 Sam. v. 14, Luke iii. 31). This branch of the royal family seems here meant.

Ver. 13. The family of Shimei apart,] Some suppose that this family was noted for breeding up persons eminent in the knowledge of the law; such was Sameas, a noted rabbi, who lived in our Saviour's time, as St. Jerome informs us in his commentary on Isa. viii. The LXX. read the "house of Simeon;" which tribe was intermixed with that of Judah (Josh. xix. 9).

Ver. 14. All the families that remain,] The prophet having mentioned the tribes and families of chiefest note in his time, comprises the rest under this general expression.

CHAPTER XIII.

1 In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness.

CHAP. XIII.

ARGUMENT.—A general promise of pardon proclaimed to the Jews upon their conversion, and particularly of their being cleansed from idolatry, and the false pretences to prophecy, upon their belief in Christ; whose death is foretold, and the saving of a third part of that people, after a severe trial.

2 ¶ And it shall come to pass in that day, saith the LORD of hosts, that I will cut off the names of the idols out of the land, and they shall

Ver. 1.] The "house of David," with the other "inhabitants of Jerusalem," upon their solemn humiliation, described xii. 13, 14, and "believing in him whom they had crucified and rejected," shall obtain a full and free pardon of all their sins, being admitted into the church of Christ by baptism (see Acts ii. 38, 39, xiii. 38, 39). The word fountain properly expresses the Christian baptism, which no more be remembered: and also I will cause the prophets and the unclean spirit to pass out of the land.

3 And it shall come to pass, that when any shall yet prophesy, then his father and his mother that begat him shall say unto him, Thou shalt not live; for thou speakest lies in the name of the Lord: and his father and his mother that begat him shall thrust him through when he prophesieth.

4 And it shall come to pass in that day, that the prophets shall be ashamed every one of his vision, when he hath prophesied: neither shall they wear a rough garment to deceive:

5 But he shall say, I am no prophet, I am an husbandman; for man taught me to keep cattle from my youth.

6 And one shall say unto him, What are these wounds in thine hands? Then he shall answer, Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends.

7 ¶ Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts: smite the shepherd, and the sheep was often administered in fountains and rivers; and likewise alludes to the Jewish washings, which were usually performed in running waters, and were prescribed for the expiation of legal pollutions, expressed here by the word niddah, which properly signifies separation from the company of others; a censure inflicted by the law upon unclean persons. Kimchi understands it of the captivity or destruction of the Jews, inflicted upon them for their sins, which sequestered them from their own land, and made them unfit to attend upon God's worship; as unclean persons were excluded from the precincts of the temple (compare Ezek. xxxvi. 17).

Ver. 2. I will cut off the names of the idols out of the land.] The Jews were forbidden to mention the names of the heathen idols, if they could avoid it (see Exod. xxiii. 13, Josh. xxiii. 7, Ps. xvi. 4), so when idolatry should be utterly extirpated, the names of idols should be buried in oblivion. In the popish countries many of the Jews comply with the idolatry there practised, as some of their own writers confess (see note upon Isa. lxxv. 7). Manasseh ben Israel (De Termino Vitæ, lib. iii. 4), expounds that threatening (Dent. xxviii. 64), that "they shall serve other gods, which neither they nor their fathers have known, wood and stone," as if it should be fulfilled in their captivity under the Romans, which they suppose is not yet expired. Here it is foretold, that this sort of idolatry shall be abolished upon their conversion: or else we may understand it of the putting down that idolatry now practised in Judea, both by the Greek and Latin Christians, before the Jews come to be settled in their own country (compare this text with Mic. v. 12—14).

I will cause the prophets and the unclean spirit to pass out of the land.] By the prophets are here meant the false prophets, as the LXX. translate it, who understand the word nabi in that sense, in several places of Jeremiah (compare Mic. iii. 11, Zeph. iii. 4). The unclean spirit is the same with a lying spirit, or a false pretence to prophecy and inspiration (compare 1 Kings xxii. 22, Rev. xvi. 13). The Jews were always very much addicted to sorcery, charms, and other sorts of divination, as is observed in the note upon Mal. iii. 5, and it is probable that several pretenders to prophecy will arise among them, near the time of their future restoration, to discourage their return home.

Ver. 3.] These false pretenders to prophecy, who discouraged their brethren's conversion and return, were confuted by experience; things falling out quite otherwise than they had foretold (see ver. 4). This shall raise a just zeal against such impostors, so that even their parents shall be forward to put in execution against them the penalties inflicted by the law upon false prophets and seducers (Dent. xiii. 6, 8, 9, xviii. 20). They shall treat such a one in the same manner as their fathers did the true Prophet, the Messiah, shall "pierce or thrust him through;" for the same verb is used in the Hebrew here, and xii. 10.

Ver. 4. The prophets shall be ashamed every one of his vision.] The event proving quite otherwise than they had prophesied.

Neither shall they wear a rough garment to deceive.] The prophets used to wear hairy or rough garments (see Isa. xx. 2), this they did, partly in imitation of Elijah, that was so clad (2 Kings i. 8), and partly because it was a despicable or mournful habit, and suitable to their office, which was to denounce God's judgments against pride and luxury. [John Baptist wore such a garment as was suitable to the office of a preacher of repentance.] The words import, that these prophets shall disown their former pretences, and no longer wear such a garment, as a badge of their profession.

Ver. 5.] To save themselves from punishment (ver. 3), each of them shall profess husbandry, and say that his employment from a child had been to look after cattle or "till the ground," as the verb hiknani may be translated.

Ver. 6.] When such a severe inquisition is made against false prophets, every one shall be ready to observe what marks or characters are printed upon the hands of such a pretender, and to ask him, How they came there? And he shall answer in his own justification, This is not the mark or character of any idol, but only a token that I am a servant belonging to such a family. It was an ancient custom for masters to set a mark upon their slaves or goods; and there was sometimes a particular character imprinted upon the worshippers of certain idols: so we read in the third book of Maccabees, that the worshippers of Bacchus had an ivy-leaf imprinted upon their bodies. Such impressions were often made upon the hands, to which that expression alludes (Rev. xiii. 16). of "receiving the mark of the beast upon the right hand." Several interpreters understand this verse of the wounds of Christ; but I conceive the following words more properly belong to that subject.

Ver. 7. Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against—my fellow.] Here begins a new prophecy, importing that the Messiah, the great shepherd, as he is described in this prophecy (xi. 4, &c., and in Isa. xl. 11, Ezek. xxxiv. 23), though with respect to his divine nature he be "equal with God the Father" (Phil. ii. 6), yet shall be delivered up to death, by God's "determinate counsel" and appointment (see Acts ii. 23, iv. 28). A sword is put for any instrument of the divine justice, as hath been observed upon xi. 17.

Smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered.] This our Lord applies to his disciples being "scattered every man to his own," upon his being apprehended and put to death (Matt. xxvi. 31, John xvi. 32).

I will turn mine hand upon the little ones.] This sentence may be translated in two contrary senses.

shall be scattered: and I will turn mine hand upon the little ones.

8 And it shall come to pass, that in all the land, saith the LORD, two parts therein shall be cut off and die; but the third shall be left therein.

The Hebrew phrase rendered here "turn mine hand," may signify either to punish, or to spare; in the former sense it is taken, Ps. lxxxi. 14, in the latter, Ezek. xx. 22, where our translators render it, "I withdrew my hand." In like manner the word isair signifies great as well as little, as hath been observed upon Mic. v. 2, viz. it is translated to this sense in some copies of the LXX. and so Dr. Pocock understands it here (Not. in portam Mosis, cap. 2). If we follow our English translation, the sense may be, I will show mercy to my little flock, dispirited by the death of their Master, and will quickly show him to them alive again, to their joy and comfort. If we translate the words, "I will turn my hand upon the great ones," they denounce a severe judgment against the Jewish rulers, for their sin in crucifying Christ; agreeably to the import of the following words.

Ver. 8.] Those severe judgments which our Saviour foretold should come upon them (Matt. xxiv.) shall consume two parts in three of the nation, but a third part shall escape the general destruction, and 9 And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried; they shall call on my name, and I will hear them. I will say, It is my people: and they shall say, The LORD is my God.

be left to be dispersed over the world to preserve a posterity to future generations.

Ver. 9. I will bring the third part through the fire,] I will make them pass through the "furnace of affliction" (Isa. xlviii. 10): the wicked among them shall be consumed as dross, and they that repent and believe shall be saved (see Ezek. xx. 38, and note there).

They shall call on my name, and I will hear them:] When I have "poured upon them the spirit of grace and supplication" (xii. 10), they shall humbly implore pardon for their sins, and I will graciously hear and answer their prayers (compare x. 6, Isa. lxxv. 24, Hos. ii. 21, Joel ii. 32).

I will say, It is my people: and they shall say, The Lord is my God.] For their disobedience "I broke my covenant with them" (xi. 10), and they were no longer my people; but upon their repentance and conversion, "they shall be as though I had not cast them off" (x. 6), and I will renew my covenant relation with them (compare viii. 8, Lev. xxvi. 12, Jer. xxx. 22, Ezek. xi. 20, xxxvi. 28, xxxvii. 27).

CHAPTER XIV.

1 BEHOLD, the day of the LORD cometh, and thy spoil shall be divided in the midst of thee.

2 For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished; and half of the city shall go forth into captivity, and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city.

3 Then shall the LORD go forth, and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle.

4 ¶ And his feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south.

CHAP. XIV.

ARGUMENT.—The beginning of the chapter is a continuation of the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans; then follows the Jews' final victory over their enemies in the latter times. The prophecy concludes with a description of the glorious state of Jerusalem which should follow.

Ver. 1.] A day remarkable for the execution of his judgments upon Jerusalem, and her inhabitants (compare Joel ii. 31), when their riches shall become a prey to the conquerors.

Ver. 2.] I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle;] The Romans being lords of the known world, had the strength of all nations united in their forces; as Nebuchadnezzar is said to "fight against Jerusalem with all the kingdoms of the earth of his dominion," Jer. xxxv. 1.

The city shall be taken, &c.] The Roman army shall exercise those acts of lust and violence which are too frequent among conquerors (see Isa. xliii. 13, Amos vii. 17).

Half of the city shall go forth into captivity,] It is said, xliii. 8, that "a third part of the land shall be left therein," which is very well consistent with "half the city's going into captivity."

The residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city.] God shall preserve the other half of the citizens from being cut off by the enemy. There were "forty thousand of the inhabitants suffered to go whither they would," saith Josephus, De Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap. 15.

Ver. 3. Then [or, afterward] shall the Lord go forth to fight, &c.] In aftertimes God shall discomfit the posterity of these nations, viz. the Latin idolaters, who probably will be joined in alliance with the Mahometans (see xii. 2, 8), and will go forth against them in as visible a manner as he appeared in behalf of Israel, when he overthrew the Egyptians in the Red sea, or when the ark of God's presence led their armies in the land of Canaan (Josh. vi. 6). It is no unusual thing for the holy writers to speak of two events together which happen at a great distance from each other: so we read, 1 Cor. xv. 23, "Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming."

Ver. 4. His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives,] The glory of the Lord, i. e. the Shechinah, or symbol of God's presence, when it departed from the city and temple, settled itself upon the mount of Olives (Ezek. xi. 23), so, when God shall return to Jerusalem, and make it the seat of his presence again, it shall return by the same way it departed (see Ezek. xliii. 2). We may add, that when our Lord ascended from the mount of Olives, the angels told his disciples "he should come again in like manner:" i. e. in a visible and glorious appearance at the same place, Acts i. 11, 12.

5 And ye shall flee to the valley of the mountains; for the valley of the mountains shall reach unto Azal: yea, ye shall flee, like as ye fled from before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah king of Judah: and the LORD my God shall come, and all the saints with thee.

6 And it shall come to pass in that day, that the light shall not be clear nor dark:

7 But it shall be one day which shall be known to the LORD, not day, nor night: but it shall come to pass, that at evening time it shall be light.

8 And it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem; half of them toward the former sea, and half of them toward the hinder sea: in summer and in winter shall it be.

9 And, the LORD shall be king over all the earth: in that day shall there be one LORD, and his name one.

10 All the land shall be turned as a plain from

The mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof—and there shall be a very great valley:] By an earthquake, such as was in the time of king Uzziah (see Amos i. 1), the middle of mount Olivet shall cleave asunder, and sink into a deep valley, so as to leave the two points or tops of the hill, north and south, still standing. Mount Olivet had three tops, or eminences, one on the north point, another on the south, and the third in the middle, from whence Christ ascended, and where Christians in aftertimes erected a cross in memory of his ascension there (see Maundrell's Travels, p. 103).

Ver. 5. Ye shall flee to the valley of the mountains, &c.] When ye see the mount of Olives cleave asunder, ye shall flee towards the valley for fear. The margin reads, “The valley of my mountains,” which may be understood of Zion and Moriah. But the Chaldee and LXX. reading the text with a small alteration of the points, render the sense thus; “The valley of the [or, my] mountains shall be filled up; for the valley of the mountains shall join, or touch, even to Azal; it shall even be filled up, as it was filled by the earthquake in the days of Uzziah.” Josephus writes (Antiq. lib. ix. cap. 11), “That upon the earthquake, the mountain before Jerusalem, i. e. mount Olivet, cleft on the west side, and then removed for about half a mile towards the east part of the hill, and there stopped.” Azal is probably a name by which part of the hill was called.

The Lord my God shall come, and all the saints [or holy ones] with thee.] Or, “with him,” as the Chaldee and LXX. read. The words are a description of Christ's coming to judgment, attended with “all the holy angels,” as the writers of the New Testament express it, Matt. xvi. 27, xxv. 31, Mark viii. 38. The word kedoshim, translated saints, elsewhere signifies angels (see Deut. xxxiii. 2), so the word saint is used in the New Testament, 1 Thess. iii. 13, and St. Jude, ver. 14, quoting the prophecy of Enoch, saith, “Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints,” or holy ones; a place exactly parallel with that of the text. The name Jehovah, Lord, is often applied to the Messias by the prophets (see note upon Isa. vii. 14, Hosea i. 7, and compare xii. 8, 10 of this prophecy). The time here specified may probably be the season when the Jews shall “look upon, or behold, him whom they have pierced,” xii. 10.

Ver. 6.] It shall not be clear in some places, and dark in other parts of the world: i. e. there shall not be that succession of day and night as there is now.

Ver. 7.] At the consummation of all things, a time predetermined by God, but known to no creature (Matt. xxiv. 36), there shall not be any vicissitude of day and night, but one uninterrupted day, without any evening or twilight (compare Isa. lx. 19, 20, Rev. xxi. 23, xxii. 5).

These two verses may be expounded with respect to the Jews, that their condition shall be for some time not altogether prosperous, nor yet quite desperate. The great crisis of their affairs shall be in a day which God alone knows; unlike to our days; dark at the beginning and clear in the end, when the light is not expected.

Ver. 8. Living waters shall go out from Jerusalem:] The supplies of grace are often represented in scripture by rivers and streams of water, which both cleanse and make fruitful the ground through which they pass (see Ezek. xlvii. 1, Joel iii. 18). Here they are described as coming out of Jerusalem: in Ezekiel and Joel they are said to come out of the temple; both descriptions intimating that the church is the spring from whence all the means of grace are communicated to believers.

Half of them toward the former sea, and half of them toward the hinder sea:] The same Hebrew phrase is translated, the east sea, and the utmost sea, Joel ii. 20. The first of these denotes the sea or lake of Sodom, being towards the east country (Ezek. xlvii. 8), the latter signifies the Mediterranean, or western sea (see Deut. xi. 24). The expression imports, that the whole land shall have a plentiful share of these blessings, which are here described under the metaphor of “living waters.”

In summer and in winter shall it be.] They shall be the same in all seasons of the year; neither failing in summer nor overflowing in winter.

Ver. 9.] Upon the conversion of the Jews, and the coming in of the fulness of the gentiles, the name of God shall not be given to any idol, idolatry being utterly abolished (xiii. 2), and God shall be glorified “with one mind and one mouth” all the world over (compare Mic. v. 12, 14, Zeph. iii. 9, Rev. xi. 15.) The stone which represents Christ's kingdom, shall then “become a mountain, and fill the whole earth,” Dan. ii. 35.

Ver. 10. All the land shall be turned as a plain from Gebah to Rimmon south of Jerusalem:] The mountains about Jerusalem (see Ps. cxv. 2) shall be levelled, perhaps by the earthquake before mentioned, from Geba northward to Rimmon southward of Jerusalem. The expressions may signify, that all impediments shall be removed that oppose the advancement of Christ's kingdom (compare iv. 7, and Isa. xl. 4).

It shall be lifted up, and inhabited in her place,] The mountains that obstructed the prospect of Jerusalem being removed, the city shall be seen by passengers afar off, like “the city set on a hill,” to which the church is compared, Matt. v. 14, and it shall be inhabited as formerly (see xii. 6).

From Benjamin's gate unto the place of the first gate, [even] unto the corner gate,] “Benjamin's gate” was on the north side of the city, the tribe of Benjamin lying northward in respect of Jerusalem. The prophet foretells that the city shall be inhabited from Benjamin's gate northward, to the first or old gate, southward, mentioned Neh. iii. 6, xii. 39, and still farther on to the corner gate, situate on the southwest part of the city (see Dr. Lightfoot's Description of Judea, chap. 26).

From the tower of Hananeel unto the king's wine-presses.] The “tower of Hananeel” was on the south Geba to Rimmon south of Jerusalem: and it shall be lifted up, and inhabited in her place, from Benjamin's gate unto the place of the first gate, unto the corner gate, and from the tower of Hanneel unto the king's winepresses.

11 And men shall dwell in it, and there shall be no more utter destruction; but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited.

12 ¶ And this shall be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite all the people that have fought against Jerusalem; Their flesh shall consume away while they stand upon their feet, and their eyes shall consume away in their holes, and their tongue shall consume away in their mouth.

13 And it shall come to pass in that day, that a great tumult from the Lord shall be among them; and they shall lay hold every one on the hand of his neighbour, and his hand shall rise up against the hand of his neighbour.

14 And Judah also shall fight at Jerusalem; and the wealth of all the heathen round about shall be gathered together, gold, and silver, and apparel, in great abundance.

15 And so shall be the plague of the horse, of the mule, of the camel, and of the ass, and of all the beasts that shall be in these tents, as this plague.

16 ¶ And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles.

17 And it shall be, that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain.

18 And if the family of Egypt go not up, and come not, that have no rain; there shall be the plague, wherewith the Lord will smite the heathen that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles.

19 This shall be the punishment of Egypt, and part of Jerusalem, as the same writer observes, and "the king's wine-press" on the north part (compare this verse with Jer. xxxi. 38, 39).

Ver. 11. There shall be no more utter destruction;] The city shall never be utterly destroyed, as it was by the Chaldeans and Romans (compare Jer. xxxi. 40). The latter part of the sentence may be translated, "there shall be no more curse." In the new state of things here foretold, the curse which sin brought into the world shall be removed. The same words are repeated by St. John, Rev. xxii. 3, and seem to be taken from this place.

But Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited.] A promise often repeated in the prophets (see Jer. xxiii. 6, and the note there).

Ver. 12.] Those that die not in the battle, nor fall by the hand of their brethren (see ver. 13), shall be destroyed by famine or consumption.

Ver. 13.] Or, "A great discomfiture," as the word is translated, 1 Sam. xiv. 20. The LXX. render it an ecstasy: such a terror or confusion shall seize them, as shall take away the use of their reason (see xii. 4); or there shall be misunderstandings among them, so that they shall fall foul one upon another, as the army of the Philistines and Moabites did, 1 Sam. xiv. 20, 2 Chron. xx. 23 (compare Ezek. xxxviii. 21). The prophet goes back to give an account how God would discomfit those that come against Jerusalem (ver. 3).

Ver. 14. Judah also shall fight at [or rather for] Jerusalem;] the Lord shall save the tents of Judah first (xii. 7), and then they shall join their forces against the common enemy, when he comes against Jerusalem (see xii. 2).

The wealth of all the heathen round about shall be gathered together, &c.] As they came with an intent to make a prey of Jerusalem, so the wealth which they brought with them shall become a spoil to the Jews (compare Ezek. xxxviii. 12, xxxix. 10).

Ver. 15.] This is to be joined to the twelfth verse, the thirteenth and fourteenth being joined in a parenthesis. Both man and beast in that army shall be consumed in one common destruction.

Ver. 16. Every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem] Those that were not in the army that marched against Jerusalem. The words may be translated, "Every one that is left from among all the nations," &c. and then they may be understood of the Jews that remained behind, and did not go to Judea to fight for Jerusalem. The Jewish Commentators follow this sense.

Shall even go up from year to year to worship the king, &c.] i. e. They shall join the solemn acts of Christian worship. The prophets often describe the state of the gospel by the usages of their own times (compare ver. 20, 21 of this chapter, and viii. 21, 22; see likewise Isa. lx. 7, 9, lvi. 23, with the notes upon those places). The "feast of tabernacles," being observed in remembrance of God's conducting and preserving the Jews in the wilderness for forty years, was observed with extraordinary expressions of rejoicing (compare Hos. xii. 9). The Jews have a tradition, that the defeat of Gog and Magog, which seems to be the same discomfiture which is here described, shall fall out upon the feast of tabernacles; or, as others say, that the "seven months' cleansing of the land" (Ezek. xxxix. 12), shall be finished at that time.

Ver. 17. Even upon them shall be no rain.] For want of which they shall suffer a famine.

Ver. 18.] Though the fruitfulness of Egypt, especially the upper part of it (see Herodotus, lib. iii. cap. 10), depends not upon rain (compare Dent. xi. 10, 11); yet if the Jews that dwell there, or the rest of the inhabitants, do not join in the solemn acts of Christian worship (see ver. 16), they shall suffer the same plague of famine with which others are threatened, i. e. the "Nile shall not overflow," as the Targum explains it; from whence a famine will ensue. The words may be translated more exactly to the Hebrew thus; "If the family of Egypt go not up, shall there not be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite the heathen that come not up?" The particle velo is often taken interrogatively, as Noldius observes, p. 342. The word family is equivalent to kingdom (see the note upon Jer. i. 15).

[That have no rain;] The upper parts of Egypt, beyond Thebes, have no rain: beside the testimony of Herodotus, referred to in the last note, Seneca affirms the same (Nat. Quæst. lib. iv. cap. 2); "In ea parte quæ in Æthiopiâ vergit, aut nulli imbres sunt, aut rari." Our learned countryman, Mr. Graves, in his Pyramidographia, sect. 2, tells us, "That while he lived at Alexandria, a great deal of rain fell there in the months of December and January; but in the upper part of Egypt, about Syene, and the cataracts of the Nile, the inhabitants affirmed that they seldom had any rain."] the punishment of all nations that come not up to keep the feast of tabernacles.

20 ¶ In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD; and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar.

Ver. 20. In that day shall there be upon the bells [or bridles] of the horses, HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD;] A very learned person supposes, that this and the following verse imply in them the promise of a universal peace, a blessing often spoken of in the prophets, as concomitant of the flourishing state of Christ's kingdom. Taking this to be the general import of the place, the first part of the verse implies, that the bridles, or trappings, of the horses, as the Chaldee explains the word metsilloth, i. e. the necessary furniture of war, shall no more be applied to its proper use, but shall be looked upon as sacred, and laid up in the armory of God's house for a memorial of the good success he had given his people against their enemies (see 2 Chron. xxiii. 9).

The pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar.] In pursuance of this interpretation, by the word siroth, pots, we are to understand helmets, called so because of their shape, being made like a pot. These, saith the text, shall be like the bowls, or vials, before the altar; no more to be profaned in war or bloodshed. In the Hebrew, words made up of letters of the same origin, have often an affinity of sense. So sarah, a word near akin to siroth, signifies a coat of mail: and the words she-riah and sherion are used in the same sense.

Ver. 21. Every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness] Even every private helmet in Judah and in Jerusalem, shall be as useless to the purposes they were formerly employed in, as the most sacred things in the temple.

All they that sacrifice shall come and take of them,

21 Yea, every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness unto the Lord of hosts: and all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them, and seethe therein: and in that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts.

and seethe therein:] The helmets shall arise to such a number, that if every one that sacrificeth were to seethe separately, they would suffice for pots for every one's use. If this interpretation be not accepted, we may suppose the words set forth the abundant measure of grace and holiness which shall then be bestowed upon all believers, they being all made "priests unto God" (see Isa. lxi. 6, Rev. v. 10, xx. 6); set apart to attend upon God's service, as the priests were under the law, whose office it was to seethe, or boil, the sacrifices (see 2 Chron. xxxv. 13).

There shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord] If we understand the former words of a universal peace, the sense of these will be, that no stranger, or unbelieving enemy, shall give any annoyance to the servants or worship of God (see Joel iii. 17). The Christian church is often called the house or "temple of God" in the New Testament (see Eph. ii. 20, &c., 1 Tim. iii. 15, Heb. iii. 6, 1 Pet. iv. 19). If we follow the common interpretation, the words import, that no hypocrite or unclean person shall have any share in the society of the faithful (see Rev. xxi. 27, xxii. 15). The Chaldee and Vulgar Latin translate the words, "There shall be no more any merchant in the house of the Lord of hosts." There shall be such plenty of all provisions at home that there will be no need of being supplied by any traffickers from abroad. Taking the words in this sense, they are equivalent to those descriptions of plenty foretold in the days of the Messias, Joel iii. 18, Amos ix. 13.

OF

THE PROPHET MALACHI.

PREFACE.

THE prophet Malachi was, in all likelihood, contemporary with Nehemiah. His prophecy supposes the temple to be built, and the worship of God settled there; but blames the priests and Levites for not attending upon the public worship (i. 10), and the people for offering the lame and the blind (ibid. ver. 7, 8), and "robbing God of his tithes and offerings" (iii. 10), which agrees very well with the abuses we read of, Neh. x. 33, 39, xiii. 10—12, as his reproofing them for "marrying strange wives" (ii. 11), exactly answers Neh. x. 30, xiii. 23, &c.

Bishop Lloyd dates this prophecy something later than Nehemiah's time, about three hundred and ninety-seven years before Christ; at which time, according to his computation, the first seven of Daniel's weeks, or forty-nine years, were expired: which time, as his lordship explains the words, was allotted for "sealing up the vision and prophecy" (Dan. ix. 24); i. e. for completing the canon of the Old Testament. The words of Malachi, iv. 4, 5, import, that after him the Jews were not to expect a succession of prophets: whereupon he exhorts them carefully to observe the law of Moses, and to look for no other prophet till Elias, the forerunner of the Messias, should come.

CHAPTER I.

1 THE burden of the word of the LORD to Israel by Malachi.

2 I have loved you, saith the LORD. Yet ye say, Wherein hast thou loved us? Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the LORD: yet I loved Jacob,

3 And I hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste for the dragons of the wilderness.

4 Whereas Edom saith, We are impoverished, but we will return and build the desolate places; thus saith the LORD of hosts, They shall build, but I will throw down; and they shall call them, The border of wickedness, and, The people against whom the LORD hath indignation for ever.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—God reproves the Jews for their ingratitude, and blames both priest and people for their irreverent and careless performance of the public worship.

Ver. 1.] The word burden is sometimes equivalent to prophecy, and in this sense it is taken here, and is so interpreted in the Syriac version (see note upon Zech. xii. 1). Israel stands here for Judah, as it does ver. 5. ii. 11, Mic. i. 14, iii. 1, 8, 9, that being the only remainder of the Jewish nation which enjoyed any of the blessings promised to their fathers.

Ver. 2. I have loved you,] I have chosen you for my peculiar people, out of pure love and kindness, without any antecedent merits on your side (see Deut. vii. 8, x. 15).

Ibid. and ver. 3. Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord: yet I loved Jacob, and I hated Esau.] I have all along shown a particular kindness to Jacob and his family, above that of Esau, though they were both the sons of Isaac: and have lately given a signal proof of it in that I have restored you to your country again, after your captivity; whereas I have scattered the Edomites, and dispossessed them of mount Seir, their ancient inheritance (Deut. ii. 5), by the Nabatheans, to which they shall never be restored again (compare Jer. xlix. 18, Ezek. xxxv. 7, 9). Hating is sometimes used comparatively for a less degree of love (see Gen. xxix. 31, Luke xiv. 26). St. Paul alleges this text, Rom. ix. 13, to prove that God might justly reject the Jews for their rejecting the gospel, notwithstanding his promises made to Abraham's seed; since he had from the beginning freely bestowed particular favours upon one branch of his posterity, from which others were excluded.

For the dragons of the wilderness.] The word tannin, or tannoth, signifies any large creature of the creeping kind, whether by land or sea (see note upon Mic. i. 8). Here it is taken for a great serpent, such as are commonly found in deserts and desolate places (compare Ps. xlv. 19, Isa. xlii. 22, Jer. ix. 11, li. 37).

Ver. 4. We are impoverished [or destroyed, compare Jer. v. 17], but we will return] They hoped to be restored to their own country again, as the Jews had been.

They shall build, but I will throw down;] Or, "If they shall build, yet I will throw down" (see Noldius, Concord. p. 90). They shall never succeed in their attempts to recover their own country, and shall be finally subdued by Hyrcanus, and the name

5 And your eyes shall see, and ye shall say, The LORD will be magnified from the border of Israel.

6 ¶ A son honoureth his father, and a servant his master: if then I be a father, where is mine honour? and if I be a master, where is my fear? saith the LORD of hosts unto you, O priests, that despise my name. And ye say, Wherein have we despised thy name?

7 Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar; and ye say, Wherein have we polluted thee? In that ye say, The table of the LORD is contemptible.

8 And if ye offer the blind for sacrifice, is it not evil? and if ye offer the lame and sick, is it of the Edomite utterly extinguished (see Dr. Prideaux, ad an. A. C. 129).

They shall call them, The border of wickedness, &c.] They shall be spoken of as a remarkable example of God's severe judgments upon a sinful people. The word border is equivalent to country here, and in the following verse: so it is used, Jer. xxxi. 17, Ezek. xi. 10, Amos. vi. 2.

Ver. 5.] Though you ungratefully forget God's former mercies, he will give you fresh instances of his favour towards you, so that ye shall be forced to acknowledge that he continues to make his name and power illustrious in your preservation.

Ver. 6. A son honoureth his father, &c.] Those degrees of respect that are due to human authority, are in a more eminent manner to be paid to the supreme Lord of all: so the priests who are dedicated to my service in a peculiar manner, behave themselves very undutifully, in that disrespect which they show to my name and worship (see the following verse).

Ye say, Wherein have we despised thy name?] Or, yet ye say: they impudently persist in justifying themselves (compare ii. 14, 17, iii. 7, 8, 13).

Ver. 7. Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar—the table of the Lord] The words altar and table denote the same thing (compare Ezek. xli. 22). What was consumed upon the altar was God's portion, and is called the "bread of God," Lev. xxi. 6, and the "food of the Lord," iii. 11, 16, as our translation renders it, but it is in the Hebrew, "the bread of the Lord." So by "polluted bread" is meant maimed and blemished sacrifices, as it is particularly expressed, ver. 8.

In that ye say, The table of the Lord is contemptible.] By your actions you declare how little value you have for the worship of God, since you care not in how slight and contemptuous a manner it is performed.

Ver. 8. If ye offer the blind for sacrifice, is it not evil?] The beasts to be offered in sacrifice were required to be perfect and without blemish (Lev. xxii. 21, 22).

Offer it now unto thy governor; will he be pleased with thee,] It argues a great contempt of almighty God, when men are less careful in maintaining the decencies of his worship, than they are in giving proper respects to their superiors.

Ver. 9.] This irreverent performance of God's worship is a national sin, for which we may expect some public judgment. It is the priests' office to intercede with God, to be merciful to his people (see Joel ii. 17): and you are more especially obliged to not evil? offer it now unto thy governor; will he be pleased with thee, or accept thy person? saith the LORD of hosts.

9 And now, I pray you, beseech God that he will be gracious unto us: this hath been by your means: will he regard your persons? saith the LORD of hosts.

10 Who is there even among you that would shut the doors for nought? neither do ye kindle fire on mine altar for nought. I have no pleasure in you, saith the LORD of hosts, neither will I accept an offering at your hand.

11 For from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same my name shall be great among the Gentiles; and in every place incense shall be offered unto my name, and a pure do this, because this wickedness has been occasioned by your neglect, although it is much to be feared he will not regard your prayers or intercession.

Ver. 10.] You do not attend upon my service in the temple, out of any zeal or affection for it, but purely with a regard to your own profit and advantage, which makes both your persons and your offerings unacceptable unto me: and under the gospel I will put an end both to your priesthood and the sacrifices which you offer (see the following verse). The words for nought, at the end of the first sentence, are not in the Hebrew, but are supplied by our interpreters. The LXX. render the sentence to this sense, "It is through you (or, through your fault) that the doors will be shut;" i. e. you would be content to have the doors of the temple quite shut up, and God's worship wholly intermitted.

Ver. 11. In every place incense shall be offered to my name, and a pure offering:] The prophet describes the Christian sacrifice of prayer and thanksgiving, by the outward rites of the Jewish worship (see note on Zech. xiv. 16). Incense was looked upon as a figure or emblem of prayer by the Jews themselves (see Ps. cxli. 2, Luke i. 10). This spiritual service, the prophet saith, shall be offered up "in every place," whereas the Jewish worship was confined to the temple. The words of Christ are a commentary on this text, John iv. 21, 23, "The hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father: but the true worshippers shall worship him in spirit and in truth." Where the spirit is opposed to the car-nal ordinances of the Jewish service, such as meats and drinks and bloody sacrifices; and truth is used by way of distinction from the same external rituals, which were only "shadows of things to come." The Hebrew word mineha, offering, is commonly translated by our interpreters meat-offering, but should rather be rendered bread-offering; it being that offering of fine flour which always accompanied the other sacrifices (see Lev. ii. 1, ix. 17). It seems to signify the daily sacrifice, by a synecdoche, in the thirteenth verse of this chapter, and ii. 12, 13, as it does 1 Kings xviii. 29, 36. Mr. Mede thinks the word is used here to denote the sacrament of the Lord's supper, which may be properly called a commemorative sacrifice (see his discourse of the Christian Sacrifice).

Ver. 12.] But ye have profaned mine altar, and in your careless performance of my service there, offering: for my name shall be great among the heathen, saith the LORD of hosts.

12 ¶ But ye have profaned it, in that ye say, The table of the LORD is polluted; and the fruit thereof, even his meat, is contemptible.

13 Ye said also, Behold, what a weariness is it! and ye have snuffed at it, saith the LORD of hosts; and ye brought that which was torn, and the lame, and the sick; thus ye brought an offering: should I accept this of your hand? saith the LORD.

14 But cursed be the deceiver, which hath in his flock a male, and voweth, and sacrificeth unto the LORD a corrupt thing: for I am a great King, saith the LORD of hosts, and my name is dreadful among the heathen.

you do as good as say, there is no difference between what is offered upon it, and other common meats: thus you render my sacrifices contemptible in the sight of the people. The word nib, fruit, is applied to sacrifice, see Isa. lvii. 19, where the "fruit of the lips" is explained of the "sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving," Heb. xiii. 15. The oclo, his meat, may be understood either of that part of the sacrifice which was immediately offered upon the altar, and is called the food of the Lord (see the note upon ver. 7), or else of the remainder of the sacrifice which God allotted to the priest, and to those that made the offering, but was still esteemed a hallowed thing, as having been consecrated to God (see Numb. xviii. 9, 10, Lev. xix. 8).

Ver. 13. Ye said also,—what a weariness is it!] Ye have complained of the constant attendance upon my altar, as a wearisome employment, as if ye were over-burdened with the care of purifying yourselves, and the nice inspection of the sacrifices brought thither; so you have by your outward gestures expressed your contempt of my service.

Ye brought that which was torn.] See ver. 8.

Ye brought an offering:] See note upon ver. 11.

Should I accept this of your hand?] God hath declared in Lev. xxii. 20, that he will not accept a sacrifice any way blemished or imperfect.

Ver. 14. But cursed be the deceiver, which—sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing:] The former reproofs related only to the priests; here the prophet reproves the people, that would offer to deceive almighty God by putting him off with the worst they had. Dr. Pocock thinks the words are to be understood of such offerings as of their own accord they vowed to God, which were to be males (Lev. xxii. 19): and if they would not perform their vows, in such a manner as God directed, it were better they did not vow at all (see Deut. xxiii. 21).

It was in this respect that Abel's sacrifice was preferred before Cain's, that he offered of the best of his substance. Thus much is implied in the words of St. Paul, Heb. xi. 4, where the apostle saith, "Abel offered πρέζοντα θυσίαν, a sacrifice better" in its kind than Cain.

For I am a great King,—and my name is [or, shall be] dreadful among the heathen.] As God is the "great King over all the earth," and will be acknowledged as such among the gentiles under the gospel (ver. 11); so men's religious services ought to be performed with a reverence suitable to the greatness of his majesty.

CHAPTER II.

1 AND now, O ye priests, this commandment is for you.

2 If ye will not hear, and if ye will not lay it to heart, to give glory unto my name, saith the LORD of hosts, I will even send a curse upon you, and I will curse your blessings: yea, I have cursed them already, because ye do not lay it to heart.

3 Behold, I will corrupt your seed, and spread dung upon your faces, even the dung of your solemn feasts; and one shall take you away with it.

4 And ye shall know that I have sent this commandment unto you, that my covenant might be with Levi, saith the LORD of hosts.

5 My covenant was with him of life and peace; and I gave them to him for the fear wherewith he feared me, and was afraid before my name.

6 The law of truth was in his mouth, and iniquity was not found in his lips: he walked with me in peace and equity, and did turn many away from iniquity.

7 For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth: for he is the messenger of the LORD of hosts.

8 But ye are departed out of the way; ye have caused many to stumble at the law; ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi, saith the LORD of hosts.

9 Therefore have I also made you contemptible and base before all the people, according as ye have not kept my ways, but have been partial in the law.

10 Have we not all one father? hath not one

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—The beginning of the chapter is a continuation of God's reproof to the priests for their unfaithfulness in their office. From the tenth verse he proceeds to reprove the people for marrying strange women, and even divorcing their former wives, to show their fondness of such unlawful marriages.

Ver. 1, 2. This commandment is for you—to give glory unto my name,] Which you have despised, by your irreverent performance of my service (i. 6, &c.).

I will curse your blessings;] Turn your blessings into curses, or rather remove your blessings, and send curses and calamities in their stead.

Ver. 3. I will corrupt your seed,] The seed wherewith you sow your ground, so that there shall not be wherewith to furnish the meat-offerings requisite for the daily sacrifice (see iii. 11, Joel i. 13).

And spread dung upon your faces,] Ye shall become as contemptible, as if one had covered your faces with dung and filth.

One shall take you away with it,] You shall be esteemed as so many nuisances, only fit to be removed out of sight as dung is (compare I Kings xiv. 10).

Ver. 4. Ye shall know that I have sent this commandment,] By the punishments which will follow upon your neglecting to observe the commandment here enjoined you, ver. 1, 2.

That my covenant might be with Levi,] That the covenant that I made with the tribe of Levi, that they should be mine (Numb. iii. 45, viii. 15, xvi. 9), may continue firm to your posterity. Some render it, "Because my covenant was with Levi:" for the breach of which you are accountable. So the particle le sometimes signifies (see Noldius, p. 457).

Ver. 5. My covenant was with him of life and peace;] The prophet speaks of the succession of the ancient priests, such as Aaron, Elcazar, Phinehas, and their successors, as of one single person under the name of Levi (compare Zech. xi. 16), and saith, I gave him my covenant of happiness and security, or, I promised him a secure enjoyment of his office of the priesthood. The words allude to Numb. xxv. 12, 13, where God speaks to Phinehas, "I give him my covenant of peace; and he shall have it, and his seed after him, even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood." Where peace signifies the same with security, as it often does: i. e. a secure possession of the priesthood, without any disturbance or interruption, expressed by an "everlasting priesthood" in the following words. In which sense the phrase is used, Ezek. xxxiv. 25, xxxvii. 26.

For the fear wherewith he feared me,] As a reward of his fear and reverence towards me, of which the holy writings give us two remarkable instances; the zeal of the Levites against the worshippers of the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 26, 29), and that zealous act of Phinehas, mentioned Numb. xxv. (compare Deut. xxxiii. 8, 9).

Ver. 6. He walked with me in peace and equity, &c.] He directed all his actions by the rule of my laws (compare Gen. v. 22, vi. 9), and he discharged his duty with fidelity, and without any disturbance or offence, and was a means of "converting sinners from the error of their ways."

Ver. 7. For the priest's lips should keep knowledge,] As it is the priests' duty to understand the meaning of the law, so the people ought to resort to them for instruction in any difficulty that arises concerning the sense of it (see Lev. x. 11, Deut. xxii. 9, 10). For this reason the Levites had forty-eight cities allotted to them among the several tribes, that the people might more easily consult them upon every occasion (see Numb. xxxv. 7).

He is the messenger of the Lord of hosts,] God has appointed the priests his ordinary messengers, to declare his will unto the people, as the prophets are his extraordinary ambassadors. The word messenger, in the usual sense of it, is equivalent to prophet (see Isa. xlii. 19, xlv. 26, Hag. i. 13), it signifies the same with an interpreter of the divine will, Job xxxiii. 23.

Ver. 8. Ye have caused many to stumble at the law;] You have either perverted the sense of the law, or encouraged others to break it by your ill example (see ver. 12, and compare Rom. xiv. 21).

Ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi,] By your evil practices you have broken that covenant whereby I placed you in a near attendance to myself (see ver. 4, and compare Neh. xiii. 29).

Ver. 9. But have been partial in the law,] Or, "Accepted persons in the law," as the Hebrew literally signifies; i. e. have wrested the sense of the law, in favour of particular persons, to excuse or alleviate their breaches of it.

Ver. 10. Have we not all one father? hath not one God created us?] Here a new section begins, where-

God created us? why do we deal treacherously every man against his brother, by profaning the covenant of our fathers?

11 ¶ Judah hath dealt treacherously, and an abomination is committed in Israel and in Jerusalem; for Judah hath profaned the holiness of the LORD which he loved, and hath married the daughter of a strange god.

12 The LORD will cut off the man that doeth this, the master and the scholar, out of the tabernacles of Jacob, and him that offereth an offering unto the LORD of hosts.

13 And this have ye done again, covering the altar of the LORD with tears, with weeping, and with crying out, insomuch that he regardeth not in the prophet severely reproves the people's sin of "marrying strange wives," which grew much in practice in Ezra and Nehemiah's time, who express a great detestation of it (Ezra ix. 1, Neh. xiii. 23). The prophet here begins his expostulation with putting them in mind, that they owned one God and Father, in opposition to the idols of the heathen, and therefore should deal with one another as brethren, being nearly allied by spiritual as well as fleshly relation.

Why do we deal treacherously every man against his brother, &c.] By these marriages with strangers, we deal falsely and injuriously with our brethren and countrymen, by the ill treatment of their daughters or sisters whom we took to marriage (see ver. 14); and we violate that covenant God made with our fathers, whereby he separated us from the rest of the world; and in order to preserve that distinction, forbid us to intermarry with idolaters (Deut. vii. 3).

Ver. 11. Judah hath profaned the holiness of the LORD which he loved.] This sin implies the profanation of God's holy people, which he set apart for his own worship and service; a profanation of the temple, when the priests who officiated there were guilty of the same crime (see ver. 12); and, lastly, profanation of that covenant God made with the Jews (ver. 10): God hath expressed a tender regard for these three sorts of holiness, and threatened severe punishment to those that break the laws made to preserve them.

Married the daughter of a strange god.] God calls himself the Father of his own people, and owns them under the relation of sons and daughters (see ver. 10, Jer. xxxi. 1, 2 Cor. vi. 18), and by consequence idolaters bear the same relation to the gods whom they worship.

Ver. 12. The master and the scholar, out of the tabernacles of Jacob.] He that persuades or instructs others that these marriages are lawful, and he that follows such advice; the expression seems to comprehend both the priest and the people. The words may relate to one of the priests of Joiada's family, who had contracted such a marriage, and by his example given encouragement to that wicked practice (Neh. xiii. 28, 29). The Hebrew reads, "He that wakes, and he that answers:" it seems to be a proverbial speech, denoting a master and scholar, as our interpreters render it: an instructor is described as one that "wakeneth the ear" of his disciple (Isa. i. 4).

Him that offereth an offering unto the Lord.] This is a particular threatening to the priests, who were guilty of this crime: such a one was Joiada's son (Neh. xiii. 28, 29).

Ver. 13. This have ye done again.] The words should be translated, "This second thing have ye done;" the prophet proceeds to reprove them for the offering any more, or receiveth it with good will at your hand.

14 ¶ Yet ye say, Wherefore? Because the LORD hath been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth, against whom thou hast dealt treacherously: yet is she thy companion, and the wife of thy covenant.

15 And did not he make one? Yet had he the residue of the spirit. And wherefore one? That he might seek a godly seed. Therefore take heed to your spirit, and let none deal treacherously against the wife of his youth.

16 For the LORD, the God of Israel, saith that he hateth putting away: for one covereth violence with his garment, saith the LORD of hosts:

another crime added to the former; viz. to show how much greater affection they had for strangers, they divorced themselves from their Jewish wives (see the following verse).

Covering the altar of the Lord with tears.] This injurious treatment of your wives has made them fill the courts of the temple, even as far as the altar itself, with their lamentations, and importuning heaven for relief against your oppressions: so that God will no more accept the sacrifices there offered by those that show so little regard for common justice and humanity.

Ver. 14. Yet ye say, Wherefore?] Ye impudently persist in justifying yourselves (see i. 6).

Because the Lord hath been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth.] The wife whom you now divorce, was one whom you made choice of when you were in the prime of your age, and you promised to live with her in true love and affection: but now you cast her off without any regard to that solemn contract and covenant between you, of which you called God to be a witness (compare Prov. ii. 17).

Ver. 15. And did not he make one? Yet had he the residue of the spirit. And wherefore one? That he might seek a godly seed.] Among various interpretations of the words, this seems most probable, That the prophet puts the Jews in mind of the first institution of marriage in Paradise (as Christ did afterward upon a like occasion, Matt. xix. 5) and tells them, God made but one man at first, and made the woman out of him, when he could have created more women if he had pleased; to instruct men that this was the true pattern of marriage, ordained for true love and undivided affection, and best serving the chief ends of matrimony, viz. the religious education of children; whereas in polygamy the children are brought up with more or less care, in proportion to the affection men bear to their wives.

Take heed to your spirit.] Do not give way to an inordinate and irregular passion.

Ver. 16. For the Lord—saith that he hateth putting away:] He allowed the Jews the liberty of divorce only for the "hardness of their hearts" (Matt. xix. 8), not that it was a thing pleasing to him. Some render the words, "If he hate (her), let him put her away:" i. e. rather than use her ill. But the former sense is more agreeable to the scope of the place.

For one covereth violence with his garment.] Or, "And when one puts violence upon his garment," or, "covers his garment with violence," as Dr. Poock translates it; who have given the clearest sense of this phrase, and shown out of several eastern writers, that they usually call a wife by the name of a garment: the expression of Moses, Deut. xxii. 30, agreeing with this way of speaking. According to therefore take heed to your spirit, that ye deal not treacherously.

17 ¶ Ye have wearied the Lord with your words. Yet ye say, Wherein have we wearied this interpretation, the sense of the text will be, that God hates divorcing a former wife to take in one of a strange nation; and he hates that any should bring into his family an illegitimate wife over and above one that he had legally married before.

Ver. 17. Ye have wearied the Lord with your words.] You have tired his patience by your blasphemous speeches, charging his providence with injustice (compare Isa. xliii. 24, Amos ii. 13). The words begin a new discourse, and more properly him? When ye say, Every one that doeth evil is good in the sight of the Lord, and he delighteth in them; or, Where is the God of judgment?

belong to the next chapter, where an answer is given to the objection proposed, ver. 2, 3, 5, 18.

Wherein have we wearied him?] See i. 6.

When ye say, Every one that doeth evil is good, &c.] A repetition of the old objection against providence, taken from the prosperity of the wicked, which implied, as they thought, either that their works were pleasing to God, or else that he disregarded human affairs, and would never call men to account for their actions.

CHAPTER III.

1 BEHOLD, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in: behold, he shall come, saith the Lord of hosts.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—This and the next chapter, which are not divided in some translations, contain a prophecy of the coming of the Messiah, and his forerunner John Baptist, under the name of Elias; and the terrible judgments which shall come upon the Jews for their rejecting the gospel.

Ver. 1. I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me.] To silence the cavils of unbelievers, mentioned in the last verse of the foregoing chapter, the prophet here foretells the coming of the Messiah, who should set all things right; and of his harbinger, who should prepare men for his reception. Whoever compares this verse with Isa. xl. 2, &c., may easily discern that they both speak of the same event. The messenger, whose office it is to “prepare the way before the Lord,” who is said here to be “coming suddenly” after this his forerunner, is described in Isaiah as “preparing the way of the Lord,” who is spoken of as coming, and his glory just ready to be revealed (ver. 5, 9). This proves that this prophecy is justly applied by all the evangelists to John Baptist, who is described under the person of Elias, in the following chapter, whom all the Jews, both ancient and modern, expected should come as a forerunner of the Messiah (see the note there). The messenger, or prophet (see the note upon ii. 7), here foretold to be the Lord’s harbinger, was to be as much inferior to the Lord himself, as servants are to a great person, of whose arrival they give notice. This John Baptist often confessed (Matt. iii. 11, John i. 26, iii. 25), and so much appears by the following words.

And the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in.] The person whose coming is so solemnly proclaimed, is first described by the name of the Lord; Adon in the Hebrew, the same whom David called his Lord (Ps. cx. 1), and who is Lord of the temple, where he will make his appearance. He is farther described as the “messenger,” or “angel of the covenant:” the same who is called the “angel of God’s presence,” Isa. lxiii. 9, the angel that delivered the law upon mount Sinai, as St.

2 But who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiner’s fire, and like fullers’ sope:

3 And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may

Stephen speaks, expressing the sense of the Jews of his time (Acts vii. 38), and is appointed to be the Mediator of the new covenant, which the prophets foretold should take place under the Messiah (Isa. xlii. 6, lv. 3, Jer. xxxi. 31). Another character given of him is, that he is the person “ye delight in,” whose coming is so much desired, the time of it being the subject of your search and inquiry, and the expectation of it your comfort and delight. This great person, saith the prophet, shall “come to his temple,” which ye have despised and profaned (i. 7, &c.), and make the “glory of the latter house greater than that of the former,” Hag. ii. 9 (see the note there). He shall choose this place to publish his doctrine, and do several of his miracles (see Matt. xxi. 12, 14, Luke xix. 47, xxi. 38, John xviii. 10, 11, 15, 16).

Ver. 2. But who may abide the day of his coming?] The coming of Christ here, and in several other places, comprehends all the effects and consequents of his coming; and denotes not only a time of mercy to those that embrace the gospel, but likewise a time of judgment upon the disobedient. In the same manner, John Baptist describes the coming of Christ (Matt. iii. 7, 12), “Who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? His fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.” To the same purpose are the words of St. Paul (Rom. i. 18), “The wrath of God is revealed” by the gospel “against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men.”

The day of God’s judgment, whether general or particular, is here described to be so terrible, that if he should be “extreme to mark what is done amiss,” not only the wicked, but even the righteous themselves, could not stand or abide so severe a trial. The words do probably point out the destruction of the Jewish nation by the Romans, upon their crucifying the Messiah, and rejecting his gospel; when those words of Christ were fulfilled (Luke xix. 27). “Those mine enemies that would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me.”

For he is like a refiner’s fire, and like fullers’ sope.] The divine judgments are often called a fiery trial, such as separates the pure metal from the dross, purifies the former, and consumes the latter (see Isa. i. 25, iv. 2, Zech. xiii. 9). The word borith is translated offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness.

4 Then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord, as in the days of old, and as in former years.

5 And I will come near to you to judgment; and I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow, and the fatherless, and that turn aside the stranger from his right, and fear not me, saith the Lord of hosts.

6 For I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed.

soap here, and Jer. ii. 22. St. Jerome informs us, it was an herb the fullers used to take spots out of clothes.

Ver. 3.] He shall perform the office of a refiner and purifier; and whereas the miscarriages of the sons of Levi have been very great (particularly those which are taken notice of, and reprov'd, in the foregoing chapters), the Messiah, when he comes, will reform these abuses, and purify the worship of God from such corruptions. The sense of the verse, as applied to the Christian church is, that all Christians, being made "a holy priesthood," shall offer up with pure hearts and minds "spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God" (1 Pet. ii. 5). And as all that profess the religion of Christ are commanded to "be holy in all manner of conversation" (ibid. i. 15), so a blameless behaviour is more strictly required in the Christian priesthood.

Ver. 4. Then shall the offering—be pleasant unto the Lord,] The prophet describes the Christian worship by an expression taken from the Jewish service, being what they were acquainted with (see i. 11).

As in the days of old,] As in the days of David and Solomon, before idolatry prevailed, and withdrew a great part of the people from God's worship. The reign of David and Solomon was a proverbial speech for happy days (see 2 Chron. xxx. 26).

Ver. 5. I will come near—to judgment;] In answer to their demand, "Where is the God of judgment?" (ii. 17). God tells them, he will hasten the time of judgment, and it shall come speedily upon those sins that are epidemical among them; and if they repent not upon the preaching of the gospel, he will proceed to the utter excision of the nation.

I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, &c.] God will be both the witness and the judge, he will convict them of their guilt, as having been present when they committed these sins, though they were acted never so secretly: and then he will condemn them, and punish them accordingly (see iv. 1). The sins here mentioned, seem to have been commonly practised in Malachi's time. Diviners, dreamers, and such as consulted oracles at the idols' temples, are reprov'd, Zech. x. 2, as are the false pretenders to prophecy, Neh. vi. 12—14. False swearing and oppression are complained of, Zech. v. 4, Neh. v. 3, &c. Their marrying strange women, and putting away their former wives to make room for them, was no better than adultery (see Mal. ii. 11, 14, compared with Neh. xiii. 23, 29), and a breach of that solemn oath with which they had bound themselves, Neh. x. 29, 30. The same sins were as frequently committed from the time of our Saviour's appearance till the destruction of Jerusalem. No nation was more given to charms, divinations, and fortune-telling, than the Jews about that time, as Dr. Lightfoot shows out of their own authors, upon Matt. xxiv. 24. Adulteries were then so common, that the Sanhedrim ordained

7 ¶ Even from the days of your fathers ye are gone away from mine ordinances, and have not kept them. Return unto me, and I will return unto you, saith the Lord of hosts. But ye said, Wherein shall we return?

8 ¶ Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings.

9 Ye are cursed with a curse: for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation.

10 Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and that the trial of an adulteress, prescribed Numb. v. should be no longer put in practice, as the same author observes out of the Talmud, vol. ii. of his Works, p. 1080, 1111. Josephus informs us, that magicians swarmed in Judaea under the government of Felix, and afterward (Antiq. lib. xx. cap. 2, 6, 7, 11): such was Theudas, the Egyptian sorcerer, the imposter under Festus, and others, foretold by the name of "false Christs" and "false prophets" (Matt. xxiv. 24).

Ver. 6. For I am the Lord, I change not;] Or, "Because I am the Lord, I change not," &c. Because I am "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever," as my name Jehovah imports, and am true to my former promises (see Exod. vi. 3, 4, 6), therefore you still continue a people, and are not consumed, as your iniquities deserve. And I will still preserve a remnant of you, to make good to them the promises I made to your fathers (see Rom. xi. 29).

Ver. 7. Return unto me, and I will return unto you,] I am ready to be reconciled to you upon your repentance (see Zech. i. 3).

But ye said, Wherein shall we return?] You persist in your own justification; and your words, or at least your actions, show that you have no remorse for your former sins, nor any purpose of forsaking them (compare i. 6).

Ver. 8. Will a man rob God? yet ye have robbed me.] One might reasonably think such a presumption could not enter into any man's thoughts, as to rob God of those things which are dedicated to his service; when he considers that he hath received all things from him, and therefore ought in gratitude to set apart some share of his substance for the maintaining his worship, and the public exercises of religion. Yet ye have been guilty of this sin, which heathens have dreaded to commit, as being apprehensive of the divine vengeance which commonly follows it (see note upon Dan. v. 5).

But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings] Because they pleaded ignorance of this sin charged upon them, God instructs them wherein their guilt lay: viz. in detaining their tithes, the first-fruits of their ground and cattle, and other offerings, expressly set apart for God's use in the law of Moses, and which they had lately entered into a solemn engagement to observe (see Neh. x. 32, &c.).

Ver. 9.] The scarcity you complain of, ver. 11, is a just judgment upon you, for detaining the tithes and offerings appropriated to God's service.

Ver. 10. Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house,] Make good your solemn engagement (Neh. x. 29, &c.), of bringing in all the tithes of your increase into the storehouses appointed for that purpose (see Neh. xii. 44, xiii. 5, 12), that there may be a sufficient provision for the meat-offerings, sacrifices, and other religious services to be performed in my temple (see Neh. x. 33), and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it.

11 And I will rebuke the devourer for your sakes, and he shall not destroy the fruits of your ground; neither shall your vine cast her fruit before the time in the field, saith the LORD of hosts.

12 And all nations shall call you blessed: for ye shall be a delightsome land, saith the LORD of hosts.

13 ¶ Your words have been stout against me, saith the LORD. Yet ye say, What have we spoken so much against thee?

14 Ye have said, It is vain to serve God: and what profit is it that we have kept his ordinance, and that we have walked mournfully before the LORD of hosts?

for the maintenance of the priests and Levites who attend there, that they may not be tempted to forsake my service (see Neh. xiii. 10).

And prove me now herewith—if I will not open the windows of heaven, &c.] You complain of dearth and scarcity (see the following verse), but I would have you try the experiment, and see whether your plenty will not be in proportion to the free will wherewith you bring in your tithes and offerings (see 2 Chron. xxxi. 10). To “open the windows of heaven” expresses God’s showering down plenty (see 2 Kings vii. 2), as the “shutting up heaven” denotes scarcity (Deut. xi. 17, Hag. i. 10).

That there shall not be room enough] Or, “Till there be enough;” or, Till you shall say there is enough, as Noldius translates the phrase, in his Concordance, p. 673.

Ver. 11.] Whereas you complain of great dearth (see Neh. v. 3), which I sent as a punishment of your sacrilege (ver. 9 of this chapter), I will promise upon your amendment no more to destroy the fruits of the earth by locusts, and such like devouring insects (compare Amos iv. 9), neither shall your fruit-trees be blasted with blighting winds, and cast their fruit before the time.

Ver. 12. Your country shall be again known by the name of the “pleasant land,” as it was formerly called (see note upon Dan. viii. 9).

Ver. 13. Your words have been stout] Impudent, or blasphemous; void of all reverence and duty.

What have we spoken so much against thee?] They impudently denied the charge (see ver. 8), therefore the prophet renews it against them in the following words.

Ver. 14. Ye have said, It is vain to serve God:] The prosperity of the wicked made them conclude, that it was to no purpose to govern their lives by the laws of God, or to humble themselves for their offences against him (see Ps. lxxiii. 13).

Ver. 15. And now we call the proud happy:] This makes us, say they, think and call those men happiest who live in open defiance to God and his laws (compare iv. 1, Ps. x. 4).

They that work wickedness are set up:] The Hebrew reads, “are built:” which word sometimes signifies the advancing men and their families to riches and honour (see Prov. xiv. 1, xxiv. 3).

They that tempt God are even delivered.] They that are resolved to try God’s patience by their pro-

15 And now we call the proud happy; yea, they that work wickedness are set up; yea, they that tempt God are even delivered.

16 ¶ Then they that feared the LORD spake often one to another: and the LORD hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the LORD, and that thought upon his name.

17 And they shall be mine, saith the LORD of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him.

18 Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not.

vocations (see Ps. xcvi. 9), are delivered out of those dangers and calamities, wherein better men are involved.

Ver. 16. Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another:] Or, “Spake to one another;” the word often is not in the Hebrew. By their pious discourses they confirmed each other in goodness, and armed themselves against the impressions such wicked suggestions might make upon their minds.

The Lord hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him,] God took especial notice of what these pious persons did and said: it was as safely laid up in his memory, as if it had been entered into a register, in order to be produced at the day of judgment, to their praise and honour (compare Ps. lvi. 8, Isa. lxv. 6, Dan. vii. 10, Rev. xx. 12).

Ver. 17. They shall be mine,—in that day when I make up my jewels:] It shall appear how dear they are to me, when the time comes that I separate the precious from the vile, “the vessels of honour from those of dishonour” (2 Tim. ii. 20). But the words may more properly be translated thus, “They shall be to me a peculiar treasure, in the day that I shall make” or appoint for that purpose (compare iv. 3). At which time I will set a mark of distinction upon those my favourites. The word segullah, in its primary sense, denotes that privilege and pre-eminence which the Jews had above all other nations, of being God’s peculiar people:” so it is used, Exod. xix. 5, Deut. vii. 6, Ps. cxxxv. 4, expressed in the Greek by λαὸς περιούσιος, from whence it is applied to Christians by St. Peter, 1 Epist. ii. 9, and St. Paul, Titus ii. 14, all the privileges of the Jewish church being, in an eminent manner, transferred upon the Christians.

I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him.] I will preserve them from those calamities which shall fall upon the unbelievers (iv. 1), with the same tenderness which a father shows to a dutiful son.

Ver. 18. Then shall ye return, and discern, &c.] Or, “Then shall ye again discern,” &c., the verb shub, to return, being often used adverbially (see note upon Isa. vi. 13, and Dan. ix. 25). This will give you a new proof that I put a difference between the good and the bad, and thereby fully answer the objections you have made against providence (ver. 14, and ii. 17).

CHAPTER IV.

1 For, behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the LORD of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch.

2 ¶ But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall.

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—The prophet foretells the general destruction of the Jewish nation, for rejecting the Messias: he comforts the well-disposed among them, and exhorts them to prepare themselves for his coming, by a strict observance of the law of Moses in the mean time; since no prophet was hereafter to be expected till the great one, who is to be Christ's forerunner.

Ver. 1. The day cometh that shall burn as an oven;] "That great and terrible day of the Lord," as it is called, Joel ii. 31 (compare here ver. 5). God is described as "a consuming fire," when he comes to execute his judgments, Deut. iv. 24. And this was remarkably verified, when, upon the taking the city and temple of Jerusalem by the Roman army under Titus the emperor, they were both destroyed by such flames as no industry could quench (see Josephus Bell. Jud. lib. vi. cap. 10).

All the proud,] Those spoken of, iii. 15.

It shall leave them neither root nor branch.] A proverbial expression of utter destruction; as if a tree were plucked up by the roots, and thereupon the branches withered (compare Amos ii. 9.)

Ver. 2. Unto you that fear my name] See iii. 16.

Shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings;] The Messias is elsewhere called the east, or sun-rising (see Isa. lx. 1, 2): and the Hebrew word Tsemach, translated Branch in our English, is rendered the east by the Chaldee and LXX. (see note upon Zech. iii. 8). So the church is described, Rev. xii. 1, as "clothed with the sun;" i. e. adorned with graces communicated to her by Christ. He is called here the "Sun of righteousness, with healing in his wings;" to signify, that his light consists in clearing up men's understanding, and chasing away the darkness of their minds; whose rays and kindly warmth will heal all the diseases of their souls.

Ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall.] You shall be warned of God to go forth out of Jerusalem, before it be molested by the Roman army (see Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. 5); by which means you shall be rescued from the common destruction that shall come upon the unbelievers, and shall continue thriving and vigorous (compare Ps. xcii. 14), when the rest of your nation shall be consumed with divers kinds of death.

Ver. 3. Ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet] The righteous shall triumph in the destruction of the ungodly, as conquerors trample upon the carcasses of those that are slain in battle (compare 2 Sam. xxii. 43, Mic. vii. 10, Zech. x. 5). The wicked are compared to ashes, because the judgment that consumeth them is resembled to fire, ver. 1.

4 ¶ Remember ye the law of Moses my servant, which I commanded unto him in Horeb for all Israel, with the statutes and judgments.

5 ¶ Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the LORD:

pared to ashes, because the judgment that consumeth them is resembled to fire, ver. 1.

In the day that I shall do this,] Or, "In the day that I shall appoint" for executing my vengeance: the same phrase is used, iii. 17, Ps. cxviii. 24.

Ver. 4. Remember ye the law of Moses—in Horeb, &c.] You are not to expect any succession of prophets for the time to come, till the forerunner of the Messias appears: so your chief care must be to attend upon the instructions Moses has given to all Israel in his law, the most solemn part of which was delivered to him in an audible manner upon mount Horeb (Exod. xix. 9, Deut. iv. 10). This your lawgiver plainly speaks of the Messias, and instructs you to expect his coming, and to obey his commands (Deut. xviii. 15). It was the sense of ancient Jews that the gift of prophecy was sealed up with Malachi: the son of Sirach, having before mentioned Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, speaks of the twelve minor prophets, as completing that part of the Old Testament canon, Eccclus. xlix. 10, and the latter Jews agree with him in this sentiment, as appears by the authorities cited in the Right Reverend the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield's Defence of Christianity, p. 83.

Law, statutes, and judgments, are words promiscuously used; as appears from several places of the hundred and nineteenth psalm.

Ver. 5. I will send you Elijah the prophet] The same person who is called the messenger or forerunner of the Messias, iii. 1. It was the unanimous sense of the Jews that "Elias should first come and restore all things" (Mark ix. 12, John i. 21). This they understood of the coming of Elias in person, as appears from Eccclus. xlviii. 10, where the author, speaking of the true Elias, saith, "Who was ordained (or, written of) for reproofs in aftertimes, or, for appointed times [ἐν καιρῷ], to pacify the wrath of the Lord, before it break out into fury, and to turn the heart of the father to the son (alluding to this text), and to restore the tribes of Jacob;" answering to the words of St. Mark. The LXX. following the received tradition among the Jews, add here the Tishbite, by way of explication. [It is in this sense that John Baptist denies himself to be Elias, John i. 21.] The Jews to this day earnestly pray for "the coming of Elias," upon the supposition, that the Messias must immediately follow his appearing. This form of prayer they received from their ancestors, as it is recorded in their liturgies (see the Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, ibid. p. 67): which shows that the ancient Jews understood the words of Malachi here, and iii. 1, of the coming of the Messias.

Our Saviour hath interpreted this Elias to be John Baptist, Matt. xi. 14, xvii. 12, 13, who is called by

6 And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.

the name of Elias, because "he came in the spirit and power of Elias" (Luke i. 17); he resembled him in his office of reproving the Jews, and exhorting them to repentance; just as the Messiah is called by the name of David in the prophets, because all the promises made to David were to be fulfilled in him (see note upon Hos. iii. 5).

Before the coming of the great and dreadful day] Compare ver. 1, iii. 3; Joel ii. 31, and the notes upon those texts. The words import the utter destruction of the Jewish nation (see the following verse), but they may properly be applied to the general dissolution of all things; a way of speaking usual among the prophets (see note upon Isa. xiii. 10).

Ver. 6. He shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children,] It will be his office to put an end to those religious differences (such was that of the Pharisees and the Sadducees), which divided the nearest relations from each other, and to make them all join in the duties of repentance and reformation, and thereby prepare themselves for the reception of the Messiah (see Matt. iii. 7). This was the design of his mission, though his preaching did not always meet with success, no more than the true Elias had in the time of Ahab.

This seems the most probable explication of the words, taking them in that sense wherein our translation and the LXX. understand them, which is followed by St. Luke, i. 17. But a more easy sense may be given of them, if we translate the Hebrew preposition al, not to, but with; in which sense it is often used (see Noldius, p. 695). Then the sentence will run thus, "He shall turn the heart of the fathers with the children, and the heart of the children with their fathers:" i. e. his preaching shall produce a general reformation in the minds and manners of all sorts of persons (see Matt. iii. 5, xxi. 32). Dr. Hammond and Lud. De Dieu are of opinion, that the preposition ἐν in St. Luke, may be understood in the same sense.

Lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.] The words might be better translated, "Lest I come and smite the land (of Judea) with utter destruction." So the word cherem is translated by our interpreters, Numb. xxi. 2; Deut. vii. 2, xiii. 15; Josh. vi. 21; Zech. xiv. 11. The utter destruction of the Jewish nation and country is here threatened, upon their rejecting the preaching of John Baptist, and refusing to hearken to his testimony concerning the Messiah, that should come after him.

TO THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD,
THOMAS,

BY DIVINE PROVIDENCE,

LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK;

PRIMATE OF ENGLAND, AND METROPOLITAN; AND ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY COUNCIL.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR GRACE,

To accept the following sheets, which are formed upon the plan of Bishop Patrick and Mr. Lowth, as an Appendix to, and continuation of, their useful design. I am far from thinking that I am engaged in a work equal to the nature of their subjects, nor can I flatter myself with any hopes that this performance, with its many defects, will meet with the like favourable acceptance.

I was encouraged to pursue this design, from the many excellent things which are spoken of the Book of Wisdom by the fathers, and most early writers; and as our church has given a sort of sanction to its usefulness by allowing it, in conformity to ancient custom, to be read in her public service, I hope this consideration will justify the present attempt, and apologize in some measure for my presumption in offering to your Grace an Apocryphal book, and placing it under the protection of your great name; especially as I consider the uncanonical books upon the footing only of such primitive ecclesiastical writings as many prelates, of the first eminence in the republic of letters, have not thought it beneath them to employ their learned labours about.

Was I permitted to observe the common practice in addresses of this kind, and to speak in the language of modern complaisance, the world might expect that I should dwell upon all those great qualities in which your Grace excels; but I shall only beg leave to observe, that your rising merit early drew the eyes of a very discerning and learned prelate (Bishop Fleetwood) upon you, and when, through age and infirmities, he was at length hindered from labouring in the word and doctrine, like David stricken in years, he transferred his charge upon no less able a successor, and the same great accomplishments reviving in your Grace, made the loss less sensible and regretted; and equally endeared you to the same learned society, and to that illustrious name in particular, which now fills the highest station in law with the most consummate abilities. And, as if a double portion of the spirit of that Elijah rested upon you, in you we admire the same justness of sentiments, clearness of expression, beauty of language, and well-conducted zeal; in you we trace his affectionate manner, sweet elocution, just action, and those other moving graces of the preacher, which command the passions, and charm the attention, so that "being dead he yet speaketh."

Nor are you, my Lord, less distinguished by an affable and obliging temper, which shines forth, and is displayed, in that easiness of access, and condescending goodness, which endear you to the love and esteem of all, and must render you particularly amiable to that province, over which, by the designation of Providence, you preside with so general an applause.

As the great qualities at length conducted you so deservedly to the episcopate, so your speedy advancement, as it were from glory to glory, to the present high station which you fill, is an instance of your superior merit, and consummate modesty: both of which illustriously stand confessed, as you neither asked or solicited this eminence; it rather sought you out, and seemed to court you, so that I might justly draw the parallel between you and some celebrated names of antiquity, whose ambition was retirement, and their preferment a sort of violence. What the historian says of that great general, Epaminondas, is truly applicable to your Grace, "That he never made any interest for preferment, but was courted to accept it, and often forced into it; and he always discharged his trust in such a manner as to do greater honour to his station than he received from it."*

* Recusanti omnia imperia ingesta sunt, honoresque ita gessit ut ornamentum non accipere, sed dare ipsi dignitati videretur. Justin. lib. vi. cap. 8.

I could enlarge, with equal pleasure and truth, upon so copious and inviting an occasion, but to say more would, I fear, give offence to your Grace, and to say less, would have been the highest injustice in me; nor should an eloquence less than your own attempt to display your character.

That your Grace may long preside over the church, under the happy conduct and blessing of that wisdom, in whose right hand is length of days, is the sincere prayer of,

My Lord,

Your Grace's most obedient and dutiful servant,
RICHARD ARNALD.

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

THERE have been so many excellent commentaries published upon the Holy Scriptures, and every one of the sacred books have been illustrated by the labours of so many learned and judicious persons, that it may be presumed nothing has escaped their inquiry, or seems necessary now to be added to their discoveries: but the Apocryphal books, though they are placed next to the canonical ones in the same common volume, and have some of them been esteemed, even by many protestant writers, as second only to them for the usefulness of the matter and variety of instructions contained in them,* have hitherto received, though they confessedly stand in great need of light and illustration, very little help and advantage of this nature. The following Commentary, therefore, upon the Book of Wisdom, which the ancients had in so great esteem, and our church has thought not unworthy to be read in her public service, will, I flatter myself, be the more favourably received, and appear the more necessary, as there is no comment upon this, or, indeed, any of the Apocryphal writings extant, that I know of, in our language, and such as have wrote upon it in other languages, being generally popish expositors, have perverted many passages to countenance their favourite opinions, which I have occasionally taken notice of in the course of this work, to prevent any mischief from such an abuse.

That there are some exceptionable places in the book itself, I do not deny, and what book merely human is entirely without them? nor, because I have undertaken the illustration of it, shall I be so disingenuous as to patronise, or even palliate, its errors, much less cry it up as all perfection: and, therefore, as I shall neither with the Romanists pretend that it is canonical, and to be put upon the same level with the inspired writings, against which opinions there are insurmountable difficulties, both internal and external, so neither can I persuade myself, with too many protestants, to deery it as useless and of no authority, for no other reason, probably, but because the church of Rome has paid too great a deference to this, and other writings confessedly apocryphal, which I cannot think are all of them of equal value, but that the didactical books, as they are called, viz. Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus, claim abundantly the preference, as in fact they are universally well spoken of and esteemed, and I believe have as many admirers as they have readers, and may therefore, I hope, without any imputation or reflection, be as laudably commented upon as any of the primitive ecclesiastical writings.

The Book of Wisdom, in particular, to which the following sheets only relate, especially that part of it which refers to God's dealing with the Egyptians, is an epitome of the history of Exodus; it abounds with useful sentiments and instructive morals; we see in it repeated proofs of God's patience and long-suffering towards sinners, of his mercy and loving-kindness to his faithful servants, especially in their distress, and many lively instances of his justice and severity upon obstinate and irreclaimable transgressors: such are the following memorable events recorded in it—"The establishment of the kingdom of death upon the earth through the sin of our first parents; the destruction of the old world by the deluge for its wickedness, after the repeated menaces of at least an age; the miraculous manner in which Noah's family were alone preserved from perishing by the waters; the fire which came down from heaven upon the unrighteous cities, and the whole kingdom of Egypt, punished at different times by ten terrible plagues. In what manner wisdom conducted the patriarchs, and other holy souls, the friends and favourites of God in their several ages, inciting them to the most laudable actions, and, as a reward of their labours, reaching forth to them a glorious kingdom, and a beautiful crown from the Lord's hand; how by it Moses obtained a good report, became the servant of God, and commissioned by him to dispense his mercies and judgments; the sea opening a passage for the Israelites, and closing again to overwhelm Pharaoh and his army; the former sustained miraculously with manna for forty years, and drinking of the brook which flowed from the hard rock, and the Egyptians perishing through the calamity of their river stained with foul blood; the former covered with a cloud from the scorching of the mid-day sun, and conducted by night with a light of fire, and the latter perishing by a continued darkness, whose horror was increased by the glare of spectres and apparitions; an army of hornets marching before the people of God, to drive the Canaanites from their possessions, and the Egyptians destroyed by as dreadful a persecution of locusts; the clouds, at several times, converted into a shower of hailstones to overthrow the wicked, and at other times, the elements suspending their known qualities in favour of God's chosen." Such important facts recorded in this book, manifesting God's displeasure against sin, and his acceptance and reward of obedience, show the great usefulness of it, and that it was not without reason approved of by the church, and appointed to be read in it, for instruction and edification. And hence we may presume Dr. Raynolds, who wrote so learnedly against the authority of the Apocryphal books, was induced to speak so favourably of this and Ecclesiasticus, calling them, "Valde bonos et utiles, et omnibus tractationibus, præferendos (which is the language also of St. Austin, De Prædest. Sanct. lib. i.) proximumque illis locum deberi post scripturam sacram" (Præf. 7. 74).

The original text of this book is in Greek, nor are there reasons sufficient to induce us to conclude, that it was ever extant in Hebrew: but though the author wrote Greek well and was acquainted with approved writings, both of philosophers and poets, in that language, yet in all the editions which I have carefully consulted and compared, there seem to be many faulty and suspicious passages. Junius has the like observation upon all the Apocryphal books: "Per multi ubique inveniuntur loci varii, distorti, depravati. Depravati autem? imo profigati, æque in contextu Græco atque in translationibus, quos quidem locos partim ex canonicorum scriptorum auctoritate, partim ex ipsorum auctorum secum, aut aliorum cum ipsis comparatione, partimque ex judicio necesse fuit emendare" (Præf. ad Lib. Apoc). From him, therefore, I promised myself no little assistance; but neither Junius, nor the many commentators I have occasionally consulted, give that light which one might have expected in the most difficult passages. And though they could not but perceive, and often do acknowledge, the Greek text to be corrupt, yet they content themselves with giving a general guess at the author's meaning, without strictly and minutely examining the original, whether it would warrant and justify such a sense, or might be, by some happy conjecture, altered to afford a better. There is, indeed, thus much to be said in the behalf of some of them, that being Romish commentators, the very text itself was sacred to them; but why the few protestant expositors, whom we find among the sacred critics, should be generally so sparing of their learned labours, as to attempt scarce a single emendation, when the badness of the original text in so many places called for their assistance, can be resolved into no truer cause than what is mentioned before, viz. that the Apocryphal books having been too much extolled by the Romanists, and even made a part of the canon, and many of their erroneous tenets pretended to be warranted, from thence these have been as remarkably regardless of them, and through an over cautious delicacy have gone into the other extreme; which probably may be the reason, joined to the scarcity of useful notes and observations upon the Apocryphal books, that the learned Poole has taken no notice of these in his Synopsis. But as this way of reasoning against the general usefulness of a thing, from a particular abuse of it, is allowed on all hands to be illogical and inconclusive, there is the less occasion to enlarge on this head.

As there are many passages which to me seem faulty in the original, and have hitherto passed unaltered, and even unattempted, I have endeavoured to restore these by the most easy and natural helps; sometimes by a different point only, sometimes by the change of a few letters; mistakes, which might arise probably at first from the carelessness of transcribers, or the likeness and affinity of sound: but have been cautious of indulging too much liberty and wantonness this way; and when any criticism is attempted, and an emendation of the original text offered, which I was induced to, either by the sense of the context, or the badness of the present construction, or the authority of the ancient versions, which I have constantly consulted, I have always supported such an alteration with reasons at least probable, and have not obtruded any favourite criticism dogmatically, but submitted it, with great deference, to superior judgment, being ready to retract any mistake, and to acknowledge my obligation for any friendly information. Nor have I boldly attempted any transposition, however inclined or induced to it, by the confusion and perplexity of some passages in their present state, such as ch. i. 16, xii. 27, not having authority from manuscripts, or the ancient versions: for though a conjecture of a transposition may be sometimes admitted in books which are confessedly wrote in prose, yet, as some learned men have been of opinion (see Grabe's Proleg. tom. ult. cap. 1, 2. Calmet's Diction. in voce Wisdom), that this book, and that of Ecclesiasticus, were originally wrote in metre, and there may, perhaps, seem some countenance for it from the many poetical terms here used, and from their being wrote stichwise in the Alexandrian manuscript, in the same manner as the book of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiasticus, and Canticles are, to which some of the old Latin translations, and Dr. Grabe, in his late edition, probably for the same reason, have joined them; I was, on this account, less disposed to indulge any conjectural transposition, as, in metrical books, mistakes of that nature could not so easily happen; though nothing certain can be built upon this, even though we should suppose, with some others, that this book was originally wrote in Hebrew. Thus much I can assert, with great truth and sincerity, that as it was my design to make the work useful in all possible particulars, I have purposely confined myself to explain, as indeed all expositors should, the most difficult passages, nor have I designedly left any one difficulty which respects either the sense, or the reading of the original text itself, unattempted at least. And this I have done by minutely examining the Greek text, collating the several editions and their various readings, consulting the oriental versions, and the several ancient English translations, comparing the author's account with the scripture history, and collecting what was parallel, or would give an additional light, from Josephus, Philo, Spencer, Selden, &c., and to these helps I have occasionally added some material notes and observations of those celebrated commentators, Messieurs of Port-royal, and Calmet; the former give us the sentiments of the fathers, and their exposition and reflections upon particular important points; and the latter, in the explanatory way, exceeds all the commentators that went before, and almost supersedes the use of any other. Such as would see a short marginal paraphrase upon this book, will probably find satisfaction from a small one in 12mo, published in 1706. And that the following sheets may be useful to every class of readers, I have likewise studied plainness and clearness, and inserted in their proper places many moral reflections, such as arose naturally from the subject, which, as they tend to discourage vice, and show the fallacy of libertine or epicurean principles, so they serve likewise to enliven the work, and are a sort of relief and entertainment after a dry criticism.

The English translation of the Apocryphal books, which the church now uses, is that which was made by the command of king James I.; but though seven very considerable persons were employed in the work, yet it is surprising to observe in how many places it is faulty and imperfect. In that of the book of Wisdom, the language is not only bad, but the sense often obscure and intricate: and though some allowance may be made upon account of the faultiness of the original text, which might in particular passages occasion the obscurity of our version, yet often, where the original is pure, clear, and intelligible, the translators have not only fallen short of the force and beauty of it, but have unaccountably mistaken the sense; and where the Greek happens to be equivocal, and will admit of different meanings, have frequently taken the worst, and most foreign to the context. The translation of the first part is much the best executed, but the last three chapters betray great negligence, and seem to come from a hasty, I had almost said an unskilful, hand. In all such faulty instances I have helped our version, and given the true rendering; nor is the number of emendations attempted in the Greek text less considerable: how far I have succeeded in the critical part is submitted to the judgment of the learned, but hope it will meet with more candour, being the first essay. If what I now offer to the public shall be favourably received, I shall be induced to publish, in due time, the like commentary upon the book of Ecclesiasticus, which is already in some forwardness.

That nothing might be wanting that could give any insight into the book itself, or contribute to the discovery of its author, I have prefixed two Dissertations of Calmet's, which I purposely translated from the French, as they are drawn up with great judgment, and will be found very useful for the better understanding this writer; one upon the book itself, the other containing the opinions and conjectures of learned men about the author. In the former, the style, sentiments, method, and subject-matter of the book of Wisdom are so judiciously treated of, that it is needless to attempt to add to it; but, as the conclusion contains some bold assertions of the canonicalness and inspiration of the Apocryphal books, which are not warrantable, and which, unanswered, through the authority of so great a name, might have done harm,—I mean his appeal to these pretended councils, in whose decrees the Romanists take shelter, and this learned commentator so much triumphs in,—I thought it incumbent upon me, however unequal to the challenge, to examine and confute this pretence, which I have done in the clearest manner that the nature of such a controversy will admit of, and by authorities and reasons so full and cogent, that I trust an antidote is provided against any possible poison that can be conveyed. In the latter, he recounts the several supposed authors of this book mentioned by antiquity, and the arguments urged in their behalf, but at length he leaves the point undetermined; so that from him we rather learn who is not, than who is, the real author of it. But the reasons which he produces in favour of Philo the Jew, it must be confessed, are very strong; so strong, that it seems not improbable he would have adjudged this book to him, if the canonicalness of it would not have been endangered thereby. The two principal arguments urged against Philo by him are, his not being inspired, and the difference of style. The former he himself acknowledges is of no force to such as do not own the canonicalness of this book; and the latter he has answered, when he observes, that this may be occasioned by the difference of the subject-matter, according to which, the same writer often varies his style, and seemingly differs from himself; which is particularly true of Philo, for sometimes his pieces are allegorical, sometimes literal, sometimes between both extremes, and yet, from some resemblance in the features, one may easily know that they belong to the same parent.

"Facies non omnibus una,
Nec diversa tamen; qualis decet esse sororum."

Such a variation of style, therefore, if there were no other arguments against him of more weight, no more concludes against Philo, than a change of dress, according to the exigency of a man's business and occasions, infers a real change of his person.

St. Jerome acquaints us that many of the ancients supposed this book to be wrote by Philo (Prol. in lib. Sap.), and some very considerable moderns are of the same opinion. Dr. Raynolds contends, that it was wrote by Philo in the time of the emperor Caius, who would have his statue set up and adored in the temple of Jerusalem (Sueton. in vit. Calig. 22), and that the Jews sent this very Philo, as their ambassador, to intercede with him not to profane their temple, but the emperor ordered Petronius to see the orders about his statue complied with. This, he says, is perfectly agreeable to the argument and drift of the book of Wisdom; and from hence he accounts for those precepts in the first and sixth chapters, which contain the duty of princes, that they were inserted with a view to Caius, to admonish him how he ought to act or to instruct his successors. Hence, likewise, those fine observations upon the reward of virtue, the happy exit of good men, and the torment which awaits the wicked, especially those in power, in the second, third, fourth, and fifth chapters, designed, as he supposes, for the comfort of the distressed Jews, and as a warning and terror to evil and tyrannical princes. Hence, lastly, those severe remarks upon the original, progress, mischief, and downfall of images and idols, and those threatenings against them, their makers, and worshippers, which are to be found at large in the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters (Cens. Lib. Apoc. tom. i. Præl. 22).

Junius thinks the book of Wisdom was composed from some fragments of Solomon, and that it is an extract from his writings, which the seventh, eighth, and ninth chapters may seem to favour, and that Philo was the compiler; and so takes the middle way, between those who assign it to Solomon, and those who ascribe it to Philo. Bishop Cosin concurs in giving this book to Philo (Schol. Hist. sect. 36), and refers in the margin to the following authorities, as confirming this opinion, S. Basil, Ep. ad Amphilocho. S. Hier. Præf. in lib. Sol. Beleth De Div. Offic. cap. 60. Jo. Sarisbur. Epist. 172. Aquin. in Dionys. De Divin. Nom. cap. 4. Lect. 9. Bonavent. in lib. Sap. Lyran. in eundem. These farther authorities in favour of Philo, joined to Calmet's arguments, though stronger than any hitherto alleged for any other person, must yet be allowed to amount only to a bare probability.

As there is not sufficient light for determining with any certainty the real author of the book of Wisdom, or the precise time in which he wrote, I shall set down only what is most generally agreed on with relation to this book, viz. that it was not wrote by Solomon, though the title carries his name, nor originally in Hebrew; that it was wrote by a Hellenist Jew, for the style shows that it was a Greek that composed it, as St. Jerome observes, "Stylus ipse Græcam eloquentiam redolet" (Prol. in lib. Sap.), and from some circumstances in the book itself, it seems most probable to be wrote by a Hellenist Jew of Alexandria in particular. That it was wrote long after Malachi, and the ceasing of prophecy, even a considerable time after the LXX. interpreters, and therefore not by one of them. We may, I think, come still nearer its true date, if we place it after the times of the Maccabees, and consequently that it is much later than the book of Ecclesiasticus: for what Grotius urges from its being placed in all the copies before that of Ecclesiasticus, is of little weight to determine its era, nor is the order of books, as it occurs in our Bibles, any rule for settling the precedence in point of time. For does not the book of Job follow after the Pentateuch, and other books confessedly later? and yet the learned suppose it to be wrote before any of the books of Moses, and probably the oldest book we have now remaining (see Origen. cont. Cels. lib. i. Euseb. Demonstr. Evang. lib. i. cap. 6. Selden. De Jure Nat. &c. cap. 11. Bishop Sherlock, Dissert. ii). In a word, allowing the uncertainty of the author, and of the exact time when this book was wrote, yet, as it certainly precedes the most primitive ecclesiastical writings in point of time, and cannot, without manifest injury, be supposed inferior to them in point of worth, it ought at least to be put upon the same level with them, and challenge as high a regard.

What a late learned metropolitan says of the authority of the writings of the apostolical fathers, belongs in an equal, if not higher, degree to the Apocryphal books, especially the didactical ones: "We cannot doubt but that what was universally approved of and allowed, not by a few learned men, but the whole church in those days, what was permitted to be publicly read to the faithful for their comfort and instruction, must by this means have received the highest human approbation, and ought to be looked upon by us, though not of equal authority with those books, which the same church has delivered to us as strictly canonical, yet as standing in the first rank of ecclesiastical writings" (Archbishop Wake's Prelim. Disc. to the Transl. of Apost. Epist. p. 119).

CALMET'S PREFACE

TO

THE BOOK OF WISDOM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

CUSTOM and the language of the church have always given to the books attributed to Solomon, the title of Sapiential books. The fathers often cite them under the general name of The Wisdom of Solomon, and in ecclesiastical language, The Book of Wisdom comprehends not only all the undoubted works of that prince, but likewise Ecclesiasticus, and that which we are now going to explain, which by a peculiar privilege hath been called by way of eminence, The Book of Wisdom: or, as the Greek expresses it, The Wisdom of Solomon. Not that Solomon was the author of this book, scarce any learned men are of that opinion; but it has been looked upon as a summary of his sentiments, and as containing some of his most weighty and important maxims. Some of the ancients quote it also by the Greek name Panaretos, i. e. a treasury of all virtue, or a collection of useful instructions to bring us to it. And in this sense we must understand wisdom in this author, as synonymous to religion, piety, justice, and the fear of God; a sense widely different from that in which wisdom is understood in the writings of the heathen philosophers, where it has but little concern or connection with religion, and the practice of real virtue, aiming only to enlighten and improve the understanding, and to give it a sort of fruitless knowledge of general truths of a very imperfect morality founded wholly upon nature.

The principal end proposed by the author of this book is, the instruction of kings, nobles, and judges of the earth; he addresses his discourse to them, accommodates his rules to their circumstances and occasions, and exhorts them to a serious and diligent study of wisdom. And to incline them the more effectually to it, he assumes the name of Solomon, and speaks to them as in his person with an air of authority, but without haughtiness or affectation. He proposes this great prince to them as a pattern, and recounts by what means he arrived to that height of glory, riches, knowledge, and eloquence; he declares, that it is to wisdom alone he is indebted for all these blessings, and that whoever will imitate him, may arrive to the same happiness and perfection. And to engage them the more effectually to the pursuit, he assures them, that the means of attaining wisdom are not difficult, that to gain her is only asking her of God, that she even prevents those that seek her, and hastens to meet those who sincerely desire her.

He discovers to them, at the same time, the obstacles that they may meet with in the study and pursuit of wisdom, which he shows are chargeable on men themselves, rather than on God; that therefore they wrongfully accuse nature, and to no purpose urge their own weakness and infirmities. For death and sin made not their first entry into the world through the will of God, but by the fraud of the devil, and through the fault of men themselves. At first man was created pure, innocent, and immortal, and was himself the cause of forfeiting these great blessings and prerogatives. But notwithstanding his fall, wisdom is still possible to be attained by him, and, through the assistance of God, he may acquire it. But to engage God to be his friend, he must avoid, above all things, sin, debauchery, and deceit, for God will be served faithfully, and with an upright heart, nor will wisdom ever enter into or dwell in a deceitful and corrupt soul.

He expressly confutes those who believe the soul to be mortal, and who place their sovereign happiness in the pleasures of sense, and says, they deservedly brought death upon themselves, by siding with the devil, and ranging themselves in his party who, through envy, brought men into this degenerate and unhappy state. He represents the righteous man as reviled, hated, persecuted, condemned unjustly, and at length put to death, and in such terms as suit admirably with the sufferings and passion of Jesus Christ. He threatens the wicked with the judgments of God, and extreme punishment in another life, and represents them in a state of despair at seeing the happiness of the just, which they shall be witnesses of. On the other side he describes the blessed condition of the saints in a future state, as a condition of joy, peace, and glory, and represents them as kings and judges, who shall shine in heaven, and exercise there a jurisdiction as glorious as their humiliation was on earth contemptible. He commends virginity, and opposes it to the many disorders of lust and incontinence, and in particular inveighs against the sin of adulterers, whose posterity he shows to be unfortunate, and of short continuance.

He speaks of wisdom in the most magnificent and pompous terms, in such a manner, that he often attributes to her what in strictness belongs only to the Divinity itself, of whom she is a ray and emanation. He gives her the name of the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit, Creator, which fills and knows all things, and is almighty; one in essence, but manifold and diversified in her operations. He says, that wisdom is a sort of efflux or vapour which issues and proceeds from the sovereign virtue of God, an emanation of his splendour, the brightness of the everlasting light, the spotless mirror of the majesty of God, and the express image of his goodness; that being but one, she can do all things, and continuing the same, renovates, or makes all things new. That none are beloved of God who are not filled with wisdom; that she is always about his throne, and was present at, and assisted in, the first creation of man. He prays to the Lord to send her down from heaven, that she may instruct him, and be his guide and assistant.

He shows the advantages which wisdom procures to men by his own happy experience; that Adam, who fell at the beginning, recovered himself by wisdom; that through her Noah had the happiness to please God, and to preserve himself pure and un-spotted in the midst of a wicked and perverse generation; that it was wisdom which preserved Abraham from the general corruption of the world, and Lot in the destruction of Sodom. He relates the history of Jacob and Joseph; that of Moses and the Hebrews in Egypt and in the desert; and the principal miracles that God wrought in their favour, and always ascribes to wisdom the glory of them. He draws an elaborate and judicious parallel of the different manner in which God treated the Egyptians and the Hebrews, and compares the just severity of God towards the former, with the many signal instances of favour shown to the latter. He enlarges upon the original of idolatry, and shows its folly, progress, fatal consequences and effects, and foretells its ruin and downfall. That idolaters are the most senseless of all men, and their blindness absolutely inexcusable, in not discovering and finding out the true God by the help and scale of the creatures. And in general it may be said, that in no other book of scripture, nobler and more grand conceptions of the Deity are to be met with than in this.

There are some particular sentiments in this book, which have made some doubt of the inspiration of the author, and of the canonicalness of the book itself. We shall examine, in a particular Dissertation, what he says about the original of idolatry. There is some difficulty in what he asserts with respect to his own soul, that it, being naturally good, had the happiness to light into a body likewise pure and undefiled (viii. 20). We have examined the passage in the course of this work, and shown that he speaks there only of natural parts, and not of any moral qualities or endowments.

He says, in another place, that Joseph had the sceptre of Egypt, which is not mentioned in the books of Moses, and that the Hebrews, whilst they remained there under the bondage of Pharaoh, were a just and irreproachable people, which is contrary to what Ezekiel and other prophets say of them, who accuse them of idolatry in that very country. He approves of the Hebrews spoiling the Egyptians of their goods, as being only the just recompense of their labour, which before was so badly requited. He adds likewise many particulars to Moses's account: he seems to believe that Abraham lived at the time of the building the tower of Babel, and that wisdom prevented him from consenting to that bold and presumptuous design, and kept him free from idolatry, which, like an inundation, overspread the earth. He accuses the Canaanites of magic, eating human flesh, worshipping flies and insects, which the scripture does not charge them with. It is true, indeed, that the Philistines adored Beelzebub, the god of flies; but these people were not of the race of Canaan, nor of his extraction.

He says, that the fire which fell with hail and rain upon Egypt, spared those animals which plagued the Egyptians, supposing that the frogs, flies, and locusts were still subsisting at that time, which is contrary to the account of Moses. He speaks of manna, as a food prepared in heaven, as the nourishment of angels, and in which the Hebrews found every thing agreeable to their palate that they could wish for; whereas Moses tells us, that the taste of manna was like that of wafers, or bread prepared with oil; that the Israelites were so surfeited with it, that they disliked the very sight of it. He makes apparitions and spectres to haunt the Egyptians during the three days' darkness in Egypt, supposing them to be visible by the light of some sudden and occasional flashes; and adds some circumstances about the Israelites' passage through the Red sea which seem fabulous, as what he says of grass and flowers appearing at the bottom of it, to make their journey more easy and delightful; and, in fine, seems to believe, that the quails which fell in the wilderness round about the camp of the Hebrews, was a miraculous production, like that of the flies and frogs which Moses brought upon the land of Egypt.

But to all this we may answer in general, 1. That it is a piece of natural justice due to an author, that is not living nor capable of explaining his own sentiments, to understand his expressions in the most favourable sense, and not to impute a bad meaning to him, as long as one is not forced to it by the plain evidence of his own words: now we have shown in the comment, that there are none of these passages which have been excepted against, but what may be understood in a good and consistent sense. 2. With respect to the additions which are complained of, it is common, we know, both in sacred and profane history, for one writer to supply what hath been omitted by another.

"This answer will hold (it may be replied) when two authors contemporary, or nearly so, record the same fact; but the case is quite otherwise here, as the author of this book lived many ages after Moses." To this we rejoin, that there are two ways by which the memory of events may be transmitted to posterity, viz. by scripture, or by tradition. If the author could not come to the knowledge of these particulars by the first of these ways, he might learn them by the second.—But if this author was inspired, as we assert and shall hereafter show, there is no withstanding the force of his evidence, unless there could be found in his account of things some manifest contradiction to the sacred history, or sentiments contrary to truth and religion, which can never be shown.

For, with regard to Joseph's having the sceptre of Egypt, it is not to be understood of a kingdom or sovereignty properly so called; it means only that he was the second person in the kingdom, and had a very extensive rule over all that country. And do not Joseph's own brethren say as much? "Joseph is yet alive, and is ruler over all the land of Egypt." As to the Hebrews, who lived under the cruel bondage of Pharaoh, loaded and overwhelmed with hardships, they were just and irreproachable with respect to that king and his subjects, who had cruelly enslaved them, though not so indeed in regard to God, who permitted their slavery to punish their idolatry.—The spoil of the goods of the Egyptians by the Hebrews is not condemned anywhere in the scripture, and such as have written on that subject justify the action by many substantial reasons.—What this author says of the Canaanites is but too true. The description which the scripture gives of their abominations, is much more shocking than any thing said of them in this book. We have already answered in general to the objection drawn from the addition to the sacred account, the rest will be discussed in the Commentary itself. Some have raised an argument from the author himself, "If he is not the real Solomon, why does he endeavour to pass for that prince? Can the Holy Spirit inspire a writer to personate what he is not?" We answer, that such an artifice in this writer, whoever he be, is neither fraudulent nor false. It is no more than a sort of prosopopœia, an ingenious fiction, whereby a writer, to give more weight and authority to the instructions delivered, assumes the name and person of another more ancient. The woman of Tekoah speaks in such a disguised manner when she pretends before the king to have lost one of her sons, 2 Sam. xiv. 4. By the same artifice, one of the sons of the prophets feigns himself wounded for having let a prisoner escape, 1 Kings xx. 35. Thus Nathan reproved David for his sin with Bathsheba, under the significant parable of the ewe-lamb. And thus the prophets introduce God, Moses, Abraham, as occasionally talking, to render their discourses, by such a fiction, the more lively and affecting.

The author of this book designed to give the heathens a just idea of the original and end of true wisdom. The Greeks were passionately fond of Philosophy; but they knew not its true origin, ascribing it to their own industry and pains, which the wise man, in his treatise, shows to be the gift of God. They make it to consist in fruitless speculations, or in rules of a morality merely chimerical (as was that of the Stoics, which exceeded the power of human nature), or one purely natural, which went no farther than common honesty, and the doing such actions as were agreeable to right reason. But this writer proposes to them supernatural wisdom, having God for its end, and holiness for its object. He overthrows idolatry, by showing its ridiculous rise, sad consequences, and the horrors and abominations which accompanied it; that therefore men, and above all, philosophers, are inexcusable, in not knowing and acknowledging God, and transferring to creatures that honour which is due to the Creator only. In a word, he destroys the opinions of the Epicureans and Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the soul, a future judgment, the reality of hell, and the punishments and rewards of another life. After this manner he opposes the principal mistakes of the philosophers, and gives here the plan of a true and sound philosophy. Original sin, the fall, repentance, and recovery of the first man, the rewards and punishments in a future state, are as well, or perhaps more clearly, described in this book than in any of the Old Testament, which is of great consequence, to establish the truth of these opinions, and to show the antiquity of such a belief among the Jews.

The first six chapters of this book are as a preface to the rest of the work; they are a sort of an abridgment of the first nine chapters of the book of Proverbs. In them kings and nobles are exhorted earnestly to the study of wisdom. In the seventh and eighth chapters, the author, assuming the name of Solomon, proposes himself as a pattern, and shows what means he employed to attain true wisdom. One sees there the description of his happy reign, and of his consummate knowledge, agreeably to what is said of it in the first book of Kings. The ninth chapter is a paraphrase on the prayer which Solomon made to God in the beginning of his reign, which is mentioned 1 Kings iii. 6—9. The tenth chapter, to the end of the book, is a continuation of the same prayer, where he enlarges upon the power of wisdom, and its effects, the evils which accompany the wicked and inconsiderate, and the rewards of the truly wise and righteous, which he confirms by various instances and examples. The work seems not to have been finished, or at least the conclusion of it has not reached us, for the author does not finish his prayer, as it is natural to suppose he should, according to his first design.

We shall not enlarge here upon the writer of this book, nor the time in which it was written; we shall do that in a particular Dissertation. The original text is in Greek, which is yet preserved, and it does not appear that it was ever extant in Hebrew, notwithstanding what some authors have thought to the contrary. We find none of those Hebraisms, which are hardly to be avoided by those who translate from the Hebrew, nor any turns but what are usual in the Greek tongue. The author manifestly had read the heathen writers, and wrote Greek well; he even borrows some expressions which are peculiar to them—as, the giants being drowned in the waters of the deluge, the river of Forgetfulness, or Lethe, the kingdom of Pluto or Hades, ambrosia, &c.; there are some passages in which he plainly appears to have imitated Plato, and one clearly perceives that he had studied that philosopher. His style is swelling, abounds with epithets, often obscure, and almost throughout poetical and figurative. The Jewish writers had some knowledge of him, and have quoted him sometimes; Rabbi Moses ben Nachman cites particularly vii. 7, which he gives in Syriac, or such Hebrew as was spoken at Jerusalem in the time of our Saviour.

The author often quotes scripture, and always according to the Septuagint. Thus v. 10, 13, he compares the life of man to a shadow, to a vessel cutting the waves, to a bird which parts the air, and to an arrow shot at a mark, which is taken from Prov. xxx. 19, where the wise man says, according to the LXX. that “there are four things which are hard to be known; the way of an eagle in the air, the way of a serpent upon a rock, the way of a ship in the midst of the sea, and the way of a young man in his youth;” but in the Hebrew the last clause is, “and the way of a young man with a virgin.” So that passage in ii. 12, “Let us lie in wait for the righteous, because he is not for our turn,” is taken from Isa. iii. 10, where the Septuagint read, “let us bind the righteous, because he is disagreeable to us;” but in the Hebrew it is, “Say ye to the righteous that all shall be well with him. In his account of the plagues of Egypt, he follows the LXX. particularly in what he says of the flies and locusts. And when he speaks of idols in the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters, he almost word for word copies what we have in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Baruch, and the Psalms on that subject.

The Latin translation which we have of this book is not St. Jerome's; it is the ancient Vulgate, used in the church before the time of that father, and made from the Greek in the first ages of the church, by an author unknown. The translator does not seem well acquainted with the purity of the Latin tongue, often making use of words that are not used by approved authors in that sense; as honestas for riches; honestus for a rich man; respectus or visitatio for the punishment which God inflicts upon the wicked; supervacuitas for vanity or vain-glory; animalia supervacua for dangerous and noxious animals. The translation keeps very close to the text, and is strictly exact in rendering every single word faithfully, neglecting all ornaments of speech, and the beauties of the Latin idiom. St. Jerome, in his preface to the books of Solomon, says, that he corrected Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, from the ancient version of the LXX. but did not meddle with the translation of this book, or Ecclesiasticus. There are not many various readings in the Greek copies, but a much greater number in the Latin ones. The Complut. edition, that of Antwerp, and of Sixtus V. in 1590, afford a great variety, which are corrected in the Bibles of Clement VIII. and in the Vulgate. We have marked them at the bottom of each page in the Commentary.

The Book of Wisdom was not always received by the church as canonical, as not being admitted into the Jewish canon of scripture among those books which were written in their language, and passed through their hands to the Christian church without any doubt or exception. But such as were written in Greek, as Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus, have been disputed and contested, and the church, always cautious and wary in her decisions, did not decree to admit them for canonical, till after mature judgment and long deliberation; which slowness in her proceedings and determination shows, that she did not admit them hastily or by chance. The scarcity of books in the beginning of Christianity, the great distance of churches from one another, the difficulty of assembling general councils, made each church keep to its own tradition, to admit, or not to admit books, till the truth was at length discovered.

The principal reasons brought against the canonicalness of this book are, 1. That there is no appearance that Philo the Jew, to whom very many authors ascribe it, was inspired; he lived and died a Jew without any knowledge of Jesus Christ, or receiving his gospel. 2. The doubts of some ancient fathers who have ranked it in the number of disputed writings: that several particular churches left it out of their canon, and even some late interpreters, as Lyranus, and Cajetan, did not admit it as indisputably canonical. 3. The Jews not admitting it into their canon, for it does not appear to have been known among them before the time of Jesus Christ. 4. Internal evidence in the book itself to reject it, as plain imitations of the gospel, and writings of the apostles; the opposition of some passages to the undoubted scriptures; and the addition of others, which appears to have been made on purpose. All that can be objected on this head, we have mentioned before in the body of this preface; and will examine, in the Dissertation upon the author of this book, the objections with respect to Philo, and those passages in the gospel and writings of the apostles, which resemble some in this book. We have also answered, both in the Commentary and in this preface, the accusation of untruth, which has been urged against this writer. There remains only the difficulty which arises from the Jews not acknowledging it to be canonical, and some of the ancients not receiving it.

The authority of the Jews hath never been of any great weight in the church, particularly of the modern Jews, whose malice and unfair dealing, in everything relating to our faith and holy religion, is open and notorious. The apostles, whose authority is of infinitely more weight than theirs, have taken quotations and proofs from this book.* And it is begging the question to say, that this writer copied from them. They recommended it to the faithful, who have ever since preserved, read, and cited it as inspired scripture, so that we cannot now form any reasonable doubt about its canonicalness. To the testimony of those few among the ancients, who have disputed its authority, we oppose a crowd of witnesses in all ages of the church, who have acknowledged and quoted it as divine scripture. In short, to the scruples of those who, seeing antiquity wavering upon this point, have found some difficulty to persuade themselves to admit this book into the canon, we oppose the third council of Carthage, in 397; that of Sardica, in 347; that of Constantinople, in Trullo, in 692; the eleventh of Toledo, in 675; that of Florence, in 1438; and, lastly, the fourth session of the council of Trent; all which expressly admitted this book into the class of holy scripture. And there is scarce any ancient father who has not quoted and commended it. Many of them attribute it to Solomon, others to some prophet, and all to an inspired writer.† We may therefore reasonably urge upon this occasion, the argument of prescription against our adversaries, and let them produce their title against our quiet possession. Let them attack and confute, if they can, so many councils,‡ and those learned echieros, in Catech. sect. 4. Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. vi. cap. 25. Rufin. in Expos. Symb).

‡ As the Romanists lay the stress of their cause upon these councils, and this learned commentator triumphs in them as their bulwark, it seems proper, and even necessary, to examine into the authority of these councils, and consider how far they prove the point they are brought for. I shall take them in the order as they stand in this preface. With respect to the third council of Carthage, whereat St. Austin, they say, was present, we reply, 1. This council was not œcumenical, but only a provincial one. 2. The forty-seventh canon (according to Binius), which they urge against us, was not originally in the acts of this council, but added in the time of Pope Boniface. For if this council was held under the consulate of Cæsar and Atticus in the year 397, as the inscription or title of this council in all copies has it, there can be no such canon in it; for Boniface, to whom this canon refers, was not at that time pope of Rome, nor above twenty years after, not till 418. 3. The great and general council of Chalcedon, consisting of six hundred and thirty bishops, confirmed the code of the universal church; in that code were contained the canons of the council of Laodicea, wherein we have the catalogue of the canonical books of scripture; but the canons of the council of Carthage were not confirmed by it, as not having yet any place in it. And therefore we may safely conclude, that neither Pope Leo the first (whose legate subscribed the council for him), nor any of the bishops there gathered together, acknowledged any other books of canonical scripture, than what the council of Laodicea (which left out all these books) had declared to be received, and read for such in the church, before their time. 4. The Romanists themselves do not generally allow the authority of this council, to determine what books are canonical: for Wisdom and the rest of the Apocryphal books have been since rejected by many great and considerable persons among them, as Isidore, Nicephorus, Rabanus Maurus, Hugo, Lyran, Cajetan (see Limborch's Theol. Christ. lib. i. cap. 3. Melch. Canus. Loc. Theol. lib. v. cap. ult. Baron. Ann. tom. viii. ad ann. 692).

The next is that of Sardica, or Sardis, in 347, which was so far from a general council that it was only a western synod. The canons of this council were never received by the catholic church as general laws, they were never put into the code of the canons of the universal church, which was approved by the great council of Chalcedon, but were first added to the code by Dionysius Exiguus, as those of the council of Carthage likewise were. The east never received these canons, nor would the bishops of Africa own them. The popes only used them, and cited them under the name of the council of Nice, to give them the greater weight and authority (see Dupin's Eccl. Hist. vol. ii. p. 261).

As to that at Constantinople in Trullo, this is only cited by them as confirming the council of Carthage; for in other respects, the canons of this council are not so agreeable to the Roman writers, who represent them as falsified and corrupt. They do not relish the thirty-sixth canon, which makes the bishop of Constantinople equal to the bishop of Rome, nor the fifty-fifth, which lays some restraints upon the church of Rome. But it is to be well observed, that the two hundred and twenty-seven bishops here assembled, in the second canon, confirmed also the council of Laodicea (which was thirty-seven years before that of Carthage, which they urge), which reckons the canonical books of scripture as we do, and excludes the rest, in canon fifty-nine, as not properly belonging to them. When therefore in the same second canon they allow also the council of Carthage, they cannot be supposed immediately to contradict themselves, but that they understood the Laodicean council to be taken in one sense, and the council of Carthage in another: the latter extended, in a large and improper acceptation of scripture, to the ecclesiastical books, and the former, in a more strict and proper sense, took in only those books that were really authentic and divine. For in one and the same sense they cannot both be taken, nor otherwise be confirmed and stand together (see Cosin's Schol. Hist. sect. 104. Episcop. Instit. Theol. lib. vii. cap. 7). There is still less to be said in favour of the eleventh council of Toledo, which was subscribed only by the archbishop of Toledo, sixteen bishops, two deacons, two bishops' deputies, and seven abbots. A number too small and contemptible to make a council!

That of Florence in 1438, is of so modern a date, that it can be of no great weight. It was assembled by the authority of the pope, and under his influence and management. In the large tomes and editions of the councils, no such canon, as is pretended, is to be found; it is a decree added by some impostor, probably the epitomizer or abridger of the councils, and is supposed with reason to be a forgery, for nothing was mentioned at this council concerning the canon of scripture. Nor can it be called a general or œcumenical council, even in respect of the Latin churches only: many of which neither acknowledge Eugenius, or his council, and the council of Basil, then sitting, condemned this of Florence as a schismatical assembly. And the Greeks, as soon as they were returned, and got to Constantinople, would stand to nothing that their own fears and the pope's persuasion had before led them into (see Cosin's Schol. Hist. sect. 160).

The last is the famous decree of the council of Trent, wherein forty-three, or some few persons more were only assembled, and cursed all other persons in the world, that did not receive their new canon of scripture in such manner and form as they were then first pleased to appoint it. To establish this œcumenical decree, as they most unwarrantably called it, of the Greek church they had not one; of the English as few; of the Helvetian, German, and northern churches none; of the French scarce two; of the Spanish not many. All the rest were Italians, and they in no great number; among whom some were the pope's pensioners, and sent thither to overbalance the votes of others, many of them titular, and some unlearned. And was it ever heard in the world before, that forty bishops of Italy, assisted perhaps with half-aeclesiastical writers* which are the bulwarks of our cause : they must overthrow all these, before they will be able to reach us.

† Some of the later fathers, as St. Jerome, St. Austin, &c. give indeed very honourable titles to the Book of Wisdom, and the other Apocryphal Books, calling them canonical, sacred, divine; but then they mean not by canonical, as the church of Rome does, canones fidei, a perfect rule of faith; but canones morum et historici, such as are profitable only for instruction, and to inform men in the history of the Jewish church (see Dupin's Biblioth. Pat. tom. i. p. 1). Nor, when they call them sacred or divine, do they mean to equal them to divine scripture, strictly so called, or to make them of the same sovereign authority with the undoubted canonical books themselves, for the establishing matters of faith, or determining controversies in religion (see St. Jer. epist. 7. ad Lat. Epist. ad Paul. Pref. in lib. Sol. Aust. De Doctr. Christ. lib. ii. cap. 8. Retract. lib. ii. cap. 10. De Civit. Dei, lib. xv. cap. 23. Cyril.

score others, should make up a general council for all Christendom? (see Cosin's Schol. Hist. sec. 194.) Wherein, as there was not any one greatly remarkable for learning, that voted the canonical authority of the Apocryphal books, which the eastern and western churches ever held as suspected and uncertain; so some of them (as Father Paul observes, whose testimony upon this occasion must be allowed of great weight, and less exceptionable) were lawyers, eminent, perhaps, in their own profession, but of little skill and understanding in controverted points of religion; and such divines as were among them, were of low parts, and less than ordinary sufficiency: the greater number were courtiers, and bishops of such small places, or dignities only titular, that supposing every one to represent the clergy and people from whence he came, it could not be said that one in a thousand in Christendom was represented in this pretended council (see Brent's Transl. of the Hist. of the Council of Trent, b. iv. p. 153). I mentioned just above, that the eastern and western churches looked upon the Apocryphal books as suspected and uncertain. Those that are curious may see this matter very minutely discussed by a particular detail of the sentiments of the several churches, extracted chiefly from the writings of the bishops that presided over the respective sees, which Episcopus has happily executed, Instit. Theol. lib. iii. cap. 7, in such a clear manner, and so exact a method as to time, place, and persons, that we see the judgment of these two great ecclesiastical bodies, as it were, in one view, and without any confusion or perplexity.

* This may be disproved by almost an infinity of testimonies in Bp. Cosin's Scholastical History, wherein by an historical disquisition of the universal tradition of the church of God unanimously delivered in all ages from the apostles' time (and before) to ours, and by a very particular enumeration of the testimonies of the ancient ecclesiastical writers through the several centuries, it appears, that neither the ancient fathers, bishops, nor ecclesiastical writers, taught or believed otherwise than we now hold. So that it seems strange, that so learned a writer as Calmet, should either be so greatly deceived in a point of such consequence, or one in other respects so fair and candid, should knowingly triumph in false evidence and unsupported authorities: nor is it less strange, that he should not give the incomparable book of this prelate a place in his Bibliotheca Sacra, as the nature of that work required: but we may suppose that he either did not know it, being wrote in English, or did not care to have it known and read, the answers of it being so engent against the Romanists, and the book itself the strongest bulwark of the protestant cause in this controverted point betwixt us.

The prophecies which are to be met with in this book, and which have been acknowledged as such by the fathers, are still farther proofs of its canonicalness. All that is mentioned here of the future downfall of idolatry, and of the terrible judgments which God will inflict upon the wicked, may be considered as a true prophecy. But the place upon which the ancients have fixed with most attention is, where the author describes the punishments of the just man, in terms so resembling the sufferings of Jesus Christ, that Grotius imagines these passages to have been added to the book by some Christian interpolator, after the death of our Saviour; which is not at all probable, as they are so linked and interwoven with the context, that they are not to be separated without manifest violence. The fathers had quite a different opinion of them, and have made use of them against Jews and heathens, and shown the complete accomplishment of them in the person of Jesus Christ.

The Jews themselves do not absolutely reject this book; I have before observed, that a learned rabbi quotes a passage from it in his preface to the Pentateuch. John Picus of Mirandola asserts, that the Jews read a Book of Wisdom in Hebrew, composed, as they thought, by Solomon, as the marrow and quintessence of the law of Moses. But it is very different from this book. Isidore, Sixtus of Sienna, Christopher a Castro, Gonsalve a Cervantes, Lorin, in their prefaces to this book, maintain that it was wrote at first in Hebrew, and afterward translated into Greek: many affirm, that it was wrote by Solomon, and translated after into Greek by the LXX. But these last opinions go too far. If the Jews were acquainted with and read this book, it must have been translated into their language from the Greek, and we must indeed agree that they never received it as canonical.

CALMET'S DISSERTATION

UPON THE

AUTHOR OF THE BOOK OF WISDOM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

If the dispute which hath been raised about the author of the Book of Wisdom was only among catholic writers, and all parties were agreed upon its canonicalness, and the inspiration of the author, we should have given ourselves no more trouble about this, than some others of the sacred books, whose canonicalness is acknowledged by all the churches, even those which are separated from our communion, though the writers of them are doubtful and unknown. When once it is agreed that the Holy Spirit is the original author of a book, one need not be so solicitous who the person employed as the instrument is. But in the question before us, many of those who dispute about the writer of this work, attempt to destroy its authority; and, by diminishing the credit of its author, would take the liberty to reject it as apocryphal. To oppose this is the design of the present Dissertation, wherein we shall endeavour to show, that though the author of the Book of Wisdom be not certainly known, the book itself does not cease on that account to be authentic, inspired, canonical.

Many catholic writers suppose the author of this book to be Solomon himself. "He wrote it (say they) in Hebrew, from whence it was translated in Greek by the LXX. interpreters, together with the other works of that prince: the ancient fathers quote it often under his name, and it has generally that title in the Greek copies. The author plainly assumes this character throughout, and the true Solomon stands confessed in as clear a manner as in any other of his books. Everybody agrees that it is not unworthy of his consummate wisdom, and high reputation, and that his sentiments and maxims are comprised in it: that though this piece is not now to be met with in the Hebrew, it cannot be concluded from thence, that it was never wrote in that language: for how many works have we in the versions and translations only, the originals of which are not now to be found? and how many are ascribed to particular authors, as indisputably theirs, which have less marks to ascertain them to belong to such writers, than this has of being the genuine work of Solomon?" This is what they plausibly urge in behalf of this opinion.

But to these reasons it may be replied, that if this work was really Solomon's and was in Hebrew in the time of the LXX. interpreters, the Jews would not have forgot or neglected it as they have done, nor excluded it their canon. It is entirely unknown in that language to Josephus, Philo, St. Jerome, and Origen; so that in all appearance it never was in that language. Add to this, that the turn of the phrase and expressions are in the manner of the Greeks, and very different from the genius of the Hebrew tongue. The author quotes the scripture in it according to the LXX. and borrows passages from books, which were not wrote till a long time after Solomon. To pretend that the Jews have suppressed the original, out of hatred to the Christians, who make use of its authority to convince them, that they have accomplished, in the murder of our Saviour, what was foretold of him in this book, is to advance what is incredible, and raising an objection which has been a hundred times confuted, and more difficult to maintain, than what they would avoid by this plea. For, could the Jews have suppressed it, if they would? and if they could, what service would they have done them, since they have left it us in Greek, with so many other books, as strong at least as this, to establish the truth of our religion?

The authority of the fathers is decisive, to prove a point of faith, and the authenticalness of any text; but then their testimony must be constant and uniform; but in a matter of criticism, and where their judgments are divided, their opinion does not always determine the case. Now here the ancients do not speak in a uniform manner; some absolutely deny Solomon to be the author, others speak doubtfully, and none affirm it in express words. They cite indeed this work according to the usage of the church, which comprehends under the name of the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon, not only Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, but also this book and that of Ecclesiasticus. The title of the book in the Greek copies is no stronger an argument than the name of king, which this author assumes in the body of the work, or the port and appearance of Solomon, with which he would set himself off. The ancients often call their books by the names of persons whom they introduce speaking, as Plato gives to his Dialogues the names of Socrates, Timæus, Protagoras; and Cicero, to his Book of Famous Orators, that of Brutus, and to another that of Hortensius. Xenophon too calls the history, in which he gives the model of a complete prince, by the name of Cyrus, who is the principal character drawn in it. But nobody will say, that these pieces were wrote by those whose names they bear, for it is known and confessed on all hands, that it was Plato, Cicero, Xenophon, who wrote them under such fictitious names. St. Jerome says expressly, that the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon carries a false and borrowed title.

The resemblance that is to be found in the thoughts and expressions of this book with those of Solomon, is so far from proving him to be the writer of it, that it furnishes a strong argument to the contrary. This prince would never have copied from himself, nor have repeated here, what he had already said in some other work; nor would he have cited passages from Isaiah and Jeremiah, who lived so long after him. We do not design or endeavour to decry the book, or to diminish its real worth and value; we readily own, that it is not unworthy of the wisdom of Solomon himself, and we have given it an author more great and noble than that prince—it is the Holy Spirit, which inspired this writer, as he did Solomon. I shall not repeat here, what I have said elsewhere, with respect to some terms used in this book, which are borrowed from the heathens, such as ambrosia, the river of Forgetfulness, or Lethe, the kingdom of Pluto or Hades, &c. These fables are apparently of later date than Solomon, as well as the chaplets and crowns of roses, mentioned ii. 8.

St. Austin was once of opinion, that Jesus the son of Sirach was the author of the books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus; but he did not long continue under that mistake; he recants as to the book of Wisdom, Retract. lib. ii. cap. 4. and without explicitly saying who is the author, owns that it is more probable that Jesus the son of Sirach did not write it: he says in another place, that it was by no means likely to be wrote by Solomon; but he does not doubt but that it and Ecclesiasticus were both written by inspiration.* And he elsewhere observes, that the primitive writers of the church, nearest the times of the apostles, fetched proofs from this book, as being of divine authority; that there can be no pretence for not receiving it, and placing it in the rank with the other scriptures.

St. Jerome informs us, that some ancient writers ascribed the Book of Wisdom to Philo the Jew; which words have afforded much matter of dispute to authors that came after. Some have looked upon it as a dangerous opinion, which tends to destroy the whole authority of the book, by ascribing it to a Jewish writer, and one who was never reckoned inspired. Others have adopted him without any limitation, but the greater part add this restriction, that the Philo whom St. Jerome mentions, is not that Philo whose writings we have, who is commonly known by the name of Philo the Jew, but some other more ancient. For they pretend that there were several authors of this name: the first, as they say, lived under Ptolemy Philadelphus, and was one of the LXX. interpreters; the second is Philo of Biblos, who is cited by Eusebius and Josephus; the third is Philo the Jew; the fourth is one who lived under the second temple, and wrote a book about the soul.

The first Philo is unknown to antiquity, nor is there any reason to place him in the time of Ptolemy and the Seventy interpreters. In all appearance there never was such an author, since he is not mentioned by any ancient writer. The second was a Pagan, a native of Biblos, who translated the history of Phœnicia into Greek. Josephus places him in the same rank with Demetrius and Eupolemus, who, not being of the Jewish religion, could not have acquired a sufficient knowledge of their books to give any true and just idea of their history, and can with less reason be supposed to be the author of sacred and prophetic books. The next then is the famous Philo, the Jew of Alexandria, who lived in the first age of the church, and was deputed by the Jews of that place to the emperor Caius, about the year 40 of the common era. He wrote many books in his youth, but in the latter part of his time was employed in public and national affairs, and was of great service to his countrymen. Eusebius and St. Jerome write, that in a second embassy which he was sent upon to the emperor Claudius, he contracted an acquaintance and friendship with St. Peter. Photius says, that he even embraced Christianity, but quitted it again out of discontent or disgust. Josephus mentions him as a very considerable person. His works are in a style admirable for its beauty and plainness, but his method of expounding scripture is allegorical. Photius thinks, that it was from him the custom was first introduced into the church of explaining the scriptures allegorically, and it is certain that some of the fathers have followed his method. As to Philo's being a Christian, that opinion is now exploded by all learned men, as well as his pretended intimacy with St. Peter.

There are four ways to judge whether Philo, to whom many of the ancients have ascribed this book, be really the author of it. 1. A conformity of sentiments and methods. 2. A resemblance of style. 3. An agreement with the person and character of Philo, and the times wherein he lived. 4. The authority of those writers who have ascribed this book to him. We shall examine these particulars in their order.

The author of the Book of Wisdom represents God as the creator and preserver of all things, of infinite wisdom and justice, and whose providence watches over and extends unto all his works. A God who aims only at the good of his creatures, who created them originally pure and innocent, and does not proceed to punish them till their wickedness is incorrigible, and at its full height: who is the author of true wisdom, and all other blessings, and communicates them freely to such as sincerely ask for them. Philo agrees in all these sentiments; but as this is nothing extraordinary in a Jewish writer, I shall not stop to draw the parallel, which would be of no service here.

The soul of man, according to the Book of Wisdom, is immortal, and linked to a corruptible body, the weight of which draws it to the earth, and presses it downwards; it is capable of eternal happiness, but when it gives itself up to the pursuit of sin and wickedness, it brings upon itself punishments and misery without end; it is inexcusable, when it continues ignorant of its Creator, who is so loudly proclaimed by his works. Philo says much the same, "That the soul of man is clothed with the body as with a garment, but that of a wise man with his virtues;" and in another place, "That while we continue in this world, we are in a state of pilgrimage; but a wise man looks upon himself, when in the body and upon the earth, as in some strange place, considering heaven as his only true country, and his proper native place."

Philo supposes two sorts of souls, some of which descend into and inhabit bodies, and others are at a great distance and very remote; of those that enter into bodies, and continue there, some apply themselves to, and are trained up in, a philosophy wholly sublime, which, after the death of the body, they continue to pursue, to purchase a life eternal and incorruptible: the other sort, overwhelmed with the weight of the flesh, neglect the study of wisdom, and giving themselves up to the caprice of fortune, are attached to things sensible and corporal, to the pursuit of vanity, glory, riches, &c. which very much resembles what the author of the Book of Wisdom, speaking in the person of Solomon, says, viii. 19, 20, "that he had a good spirit," or rather, "that being good, he came into a body undefiled;" wherein he supposes a pre-existence of souls, some good, others wicked, not by nature, or through any fate or necessity, but voluntarily and by inclination, which is certainly the opinion of Philo in many places.

The high encomiums this author gives of wisdom are likewise to be met with in Philo, who says, "That she is a pure gift from the bounty of God, who communicates her to souls well disposed, which love contemplation; that she existed before all ages, and by her the world itself was created; that she is as the mother and God the father of it; that the wise alone are truly worthy to reign, to have command and sovereignty, and only these are truly rich; that wisdom is all divine, and nothing more easily to be acquired, being always ready to communicate herself; that she never shuts her school, but is willing and disposed to receive those who desire instruction. These she enchants, and as it were inebriates, with sweet and agreeable draughts of her doctrines; she invites them to come and improve themselves by her lessons, and promises them infinite advantages and blessings." According to Philo, kings should distinguish themselves by their wisdom, and their ambition, happiness, and glory, should centre in this; that a prince should be well versed and instructed not only in human and secular affairs, but likewise in spiritual and divine, and should appear to his subjects as an animated oracle, and a living law; which agrees admirably with the idea which the wise man here gives of a perfect and consummate prince.

The author of this book speaks of the Word, or the Word of the Lord, as a distinct person from him that generated and sent him. He ascribes to him divine attributes, particularly omnipotence. It was this Word which fed the Israelites in the wilderness, cured the bitings of the serpents, slew the first-born of the Egyptians, and, in fine, created the world. Philo resembles our author more on this head than in any other particular; and some have pretended that he had even knowledge of that divine Word of which St. John speaks in the beginning of his gospel; and others have advanced, but against all reason, that this holy evangelist took his doctrine and expressions from him. He says, that the invisible Word which created all things is the express image of God, above all the world, more ancient than it, and superior to all creatures. That this word was employed to separate and divide the elements, and to range all the parts and matter of the universe into form and order according to his own will. That this Word was begotten of God, was the Creator of the universe, and has a dominion and sovereignty over all the kingdoms of the world. In speaking of Isaac, he says, that this patriarch never departed from his duty to God, but that he attached himself to the Word, that divine Mediator, which instructs us in those things which are best for us, and came down to, and condescended to converse with us, to teach us what is most convenient and proper for us in all circumstances: for, continues he, God disdains not to be known to, and intimate with, such as love virtue, and sends his Word to support and succour them.

The punishment and sufferings of the wicked in another life, and the rewards and glory of the righteous, are admirably described in the Book of Wisdom. Philo speaks of them in as plain and distinct a manner. He says, that the elements,—the air, fire, and water, all conspire to the punishment of the wicked; God, by his almighty power, employing those very things, which he designed for the benefit and use of man, as his instruments and scourges to punish the ingratitude and wickedness of his creatures. He observes, speaking of Cain, that men imagine temporal death to be the greatest of all misfortunes, not reflecting upon the terrible tribunal of the sovereign Judge which will succeed, with respect to which, in the judgment of God himself, death may be considered only as the commencement of their misery. And what is their misery? It is to live, as continually dying, or rather to be dying always, without ceasing to live: a death always renewing, and in some sense immortal. For there are two sorts of death: the first is that of the body, which is an indifferent thing, it may be either good or bad; but the second is, to die without ceasing, the greatest and most terrible of all calamities and misfortunes.

He says, in another place, that the wicked are always dead, though they should chance to live even to extreme old age, and that the righteous, on the contrary, though dead and departed this life, through bodily sufferings, are really living, and enjoy a life permanent, and without end; and the instances in Nadab and Abihu, who being dead betimes, enjoy immortality, and a life incorruptible before God.* He elsewhere observes, that long life does not consist in a number of years, but in a course of goodness, expressions exactly agreeing with these of the Book of Wisdom: "Though the righteous be prevented with death, yet shall he be in rest; for honourable age is not that which standeth in length of time, nor is measured by the number of years; but wisdom is gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age. That God took his beloved [Enoch] from the world in the flower of his age, lest wickedness should alter his understanding, or deceit beguile his soul; and that being made perfect in a short time, he fulfilled a long time, or had all the real advantages of old age." Ch. iv. 7—9, 11, 13.

What the writer of the Book of Wisdom says of idolatry and idolaters in the thirteenth chapter, is so like what we find in Philo in the beginning of his treatise, De Monarch., that one perceives plainly that they had both the same sentiments, and did not copy the one from the other. They both show the folly and mistake of those who deified the stars, instead of exalting their hearts, and paying their devotions to Him who is the great creator and rules over them. In his piece upon the decalogue, there is a passage entirely agreeable to that of Wisdom, xv. 15, where the ridiculousness of those pretended deities is exposed, which "neither have the use of eyes to see, nor noses to draw breath, nor ears to hear nor fingers of hands to handle; and as for their feet they are slow to go." There is no end of multiplying instances of the agreement between Philo and the Book of Wisdom; but these that we have produced may be sufficient to show the conformity of their sentiments.

Let us now examine the facts mentioned by the author of the Book of Wisdom, which seem to differ from the account of Moses. Philo, speaking of Joseph, says, that he was made viceroy, or, to speak more properly, king, of Egypt. And in the description of the plagues of that country, he says, that in the parts beyond Memphis there is no rain, nor do they know what winter is. But at the command of Moses, nature changed her appearance, and the air assumed new qualities, and thunder, lightnings, hail, and rain, were as dreadfully and sensibly felt there as in other regions. And what was very particular, the water did not extinguish the fire in the lightning, nor the fire melt and dissolve the hail: a reflection, which the author of the Book of Wisdom likewise makes in several parts of that work.

Philo remarks, that, during the darkness in Egypt, which lasted three days, no fire could be kindled there, the thickness of the fog extinguishing it immediately; which is agreeable to our author's account. With respect to manna, the expressions of both are very much alike. According to Philo, it is a nourishment produced without the labour of man, sent purposely from heaven, and, in a figurative sense, is the wisdom of God, his word, or commandment; which is very like what Moses says on this occasion, "That man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord" (Deut. viii. 3). He explains in an allegorical manner the vestments of the high-priest, and, like our author, supposes them to be symbolical of the universe; that the habit in general represents the whole world, and each particular answers to, and expresses, the several principal parts of it. The long robe of an azure colour is an emblem of the air; the pomegranates at the bottom represent the water; the ornaments, or flowers, denote the earth; and the bells the harmony which is in the several parts of it, from whence the union of the system proceeds. The Hebrew text speaks only of the pomegranates and bells, but Philo follows the LXX. who seem, Exod. xxviii. 33, to mention flowers. All this is agreeable to, and an explanation of, what our author says in fewer words, "That in the long garment was the whole world" (xviii. 24).

* Calmet here translates Philo literally; the passage referred to is in his treatise, De Profugis. Οἱ μὲν ἱερεῖς Ναδάβ καὶ Ἀβίουδ, ἵνα ζήσωσιν ἀποθνήσκουσιν, θνητῆς ζωῆς ἀφάρτων ἀντικαταλλάττονται βίον, καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ γενομένου πρὸς ταύτην ἤντων μεταστάμενοι ἐφ' ὧν τὰ σύμβολα τῆς ἀφθαρσίας ἀέσται, τό, τε ἐτελεύτησαν ἐνώπιον Κυρίου, τὴν τέστιν ἔζησαν. It is surprising, that Philo should produce these two persons as an instance of rewarded piety, who died by the immediate judgment of God, by an extraordinary visitation from heaven, for offering strange fire before the Lord (Lev. x. 1). Had they died instantly, when they had the honour to be called up to God, and to have a sight of him, and to eat and drink in his presence, when he appeared on mount Sinai (Exod. xxiv. 9—11), they might have been thought to have died in God's embraces, as some of the rabbins have asserted of Moses. This mistake seems to arise from his allegorical manner of interpretation. When the text says, they died before the Lord, he renders, ἔζησαν, though the phrase has a quite different meaning in that place (see Patr. in Lev. x.). Philo has the same thought in lib. Quis Rerum Divin. Hæres.

One thing is very observable, that Philo doth not copy the very words of the Book of Wisdom, as he would have done, if he had designed to quote or use it, as the work of another writer. He follows in general the same method, the same sentiments, the same thoughts, but in different terms; as when one and the same author expresses himself upon particular points in different works. From this very great likeness and conformity of opinions, many of the ancients have concluded Philo to be the author of the Book of Wisdom.

The difference of the style of Philo, and that of the Book of Wisdom, is one of the strongest arguments against his being the real author; but the ancients, who were as good judges as the moderns upon this head, it is manifest, laid no great stress upon the difference of style, since it did not hinder them from ascribing this book notwithstanding to Philo. And in spite of the diversity of style, one may observe in several parts of this book the pompous turns of Philo, his exuberance in epithets, and his rich vein displayed by many lively and pathetic descriptions. But as he wrote it under the borrowed name of Solomon, he might disguise his style a little, and appear more sententious in this book, than in his other works: this probably is the true reason of the difference of style, it proceeds from the matter and subject itself. For let the same person write an oration, lessons of morality, an epistle, or a poem, will not a great variety of style necessarily arise from these different characters, though they are all penned, and proceed from one and the same author?

Though the book we are speaking of affords but few hints whereby to form a judgment of the time and place in which it was wrote; yet, as glimmering as the light is, it may be sufficient to give us some idea of both. The author lived in an idolatrous country, and most probably in Egypt, since upon all occasions he inveighs against the ridiculous idolatry of the Egyptians, which consisted in paying adoration to water, fire-serpents, and other beasts the most frightful and mischievous. He lived at a time when the Jews had a great aversion to idolatry; he speaks of its origin, and that one cause of it was the grief of a tender parent for a deceased child, which at length terminated in paying divine honours to him. This remark is more applicable to Egypt than any other country, upon account of that great respect which the Egyptians are remarkable for paying to their dead; and because it is certain that Isis and Osiris, the first deities of this country, had the sovereignty of Egypt, and the former appointed divine honours to the body of her deceased husband. He speaks likewise of the Jews being held in subjection, and persecuted under some idolatrous princes; which agrees very well with the times of Philo, when the Jews suffered greatly, both in Judæa and in Egypt, from the Roman emperors, their deputies, and even the people themselves.

If he wrote it after the death of Jesus Christ, who could not be unknown to him, it is not improbable that he had him in view, when he describes the just man, as reviled, persecuted, and at length put to death; and that seeing the beginning and first essays of Christianity, and the miracles which accompanied the first preaching of the gospel, he foretold the approaching ruin of idolatry. In fine, living under idolatrous and cruel emperors, it is probable he might direct his instructions to them under the person of Solomon, and the more effectually to execute his design, purposely disguised his style to give his work a greater air of antiquity, and to add the more weight to it. And it may be questioned, whether it would have been even safe for him at that time, in the very heart of Alexandria, to have addressed a book in Greek to princes, wherein idolatry is condemned in such a bold and open manner; but by concealing himself and writings under the fictitious name of Solomon, he avoided all danger.

When St. Jerome tells us that some of the ancients ascribed this book to Philo the Jew, he meant, no doubt, Philo of Alexandria, for at that time no other of the name was known. And as the ancients, whom he cites, are the first that acquaint us whom the church attributed this work to, their judgment ought to be of great weight; and so much the more, as, since that time, no one has been assigned in particular as the undoubted author of it. Truths of this nature are generally the more certain, the nearer they approach to the fountain head: now in the time of those ancients whom St. Jerome mentions, this tradition must have been very fresh, and it might have been a received notion in the church, even from the times of the apostles: the great commendations which the ancients give of Philo, show the high idea they had of his merit. We have before mentioned, that Eusebius, St. Jerome, and others believed him to have been a Christian; the former asserts that he was perfectly acquainted with all that related to the doctrine and the laws of his ancestors; he extols his eloquence, the loftiness of his thoughts and sentiments, his exact understanding of the scripture, and his explications of the sacred books. And if St. Jerome, Eusebius, and others, who have drawn up the catalogue of Philo's works, have not inserted the Book of Wisdom in the number, the reason was either that since their time it has been questioned, or, that being received by the generality of churches as an inspired book, it was not proper to range it among the works of a Jewish author.

This is what may be plausibly urged in favour of Philo, but this alone will not be sufficient to induce us to ascribe this work to him; there will always be an invincible argument to the contrary, viz. his religion. Philo died in Judaism many years after the death of Christ; and if he was acquainted with the truths of the gospel, he has not done that justice, or given that honour to it, which he ought. It is not therefore probable that the Holy Spirit should speak by the mouth of such a person, nor that the church should adopt, or receive, as an inspired book, the work of an unconverted Jew. This reason, it must be confessed, is of no force against those who do not look upon the Book of Wisdom as canonical. But there are other reasons which hinder us from ascribing this book to Philo: 1. The difference of style. 2. The silence of the ancients, as Eusebius, St. Jerome himself, Photius, Suidas, and others, who have not placed this book among those of Philo. 3. The passages of this book quoted in the gospels, and the epistles written either before Philo could write this work, or a very little time after. There remains, then, only in his favour tradition, and that but indifferently supported, and a conformity of sentiments, which is not so peculiar to Philo, but the like may be found in Job, Proverbs, Plato, Ecclesiasticus, and in the books of Maccabees. In these we meet with, likewise, the punishments of the wicked after this life, and the future rewards and happiness of the righteous; one finds wisdom represented there as co-eternal with God, and the Word, as Almighty, Omniscient, Creator, Preserver; as instructing, punishing, rewarding. These notions were common at that time among the Jews, and who can be certain that Philo himself did not take these from the books we have just quoted?

Origen has nothing certain about the author of this book, no more than the other fathers which follow him. All then that can be concluded from what we have said is, that Philo was manifestly of the same principles with the author of this book, had the same method, and most of his sentiments; that he wrote in Egypt, and is not very ancient, since it is indisputable that he lived after the version of the Seventy. If we should attempt to reckon up the differences between the Book of Wisdom and Philo, a very considerable number, perhaps, might be produced; the former sets down ten months as the ordinary time for the birth of children, the latter only seven, asserting that children born after that time, suppose in the eighth month, are not commonly long-lived, or born to be happy. Philo also differs from the author of the Book of Wisdom in what he says of the creation of man, and his likeness and resemblance of God. According to the latter, man was created in the similitude and image of God, immortal and innocent, his body formed out of the earth, and will return to earth again, as his soul will likewise to God after death, from whom it originally proceeded; Philo makes the resemblance between God and man to consist in the soul, which God himself created in the beginning, and filled with inclinations for its welfare and happiness, but adds, at the same time, that he called evil angels to assist at the formation of man, who were the authors of those bad dispositions observable in him; which includes that dangerous opinion of two different independent principles, which the Manichees afterward abused in so strange a manner.

Grotius is of opinion, that the Book of Wisdom is the work of a Jew, who wrote it in Hebrew after the time of Esdras, and before the pontificate of the high-priest Simon, and that for this reason it is placed before the book of Ecclesiasticus. It was translated, as he says, into Greek, by some Christian author, who understood that language well enough, but took great liberties in his translation, without confining himself to the words of his original, and even added some strokes and sentiments taken from Christianity. Hence, he says, it proceeds that the universal judgment is taken notice of there, the happiness of the righteous, and the punishment of the wicked, in a manner more distinct and clear than we observe generally in the books of the ancient Hebrews.

These are the sentiments of Grotius, but there is scarce any part of this hypothesis but wants proof. It is mere guess-work to pretend that this book was originally wrote in Hebrew, neither Jews, nor ancient Christian writers, have either seen or known it in that language. If it was really wrote in it, would the Jews ever have suffered it to be lost? or are there any footsteps of Hebraisms, and a foreign construction, discoverable in the Greek translation? Those Christian sentiments which Grotius thought to be foisted into it by the translator, are to be found in the books of Maccabees, and in Philo, and some of them even in Plato. The two former, as likewise Ecclesiasticus, speak very clearly of the everlasting happiness of the just, and the eternal punishments appointed for the wicked. Are we therefore permitted to say, that these books likewise have been corrupted by Christians, who have artfully conveyed their maxims and sentiments into them? That admirable description of the just man, ch. ii. afflicted and tortured with a variety of wretchedness, do we not meet with it in the writings of Plato, lib. ii. de Rep.? from whence Cicero and Seneca both manifestly took it. It is well known how the ancient Greeks, and even the Jewish writers, were attached to the doctrine of that philosopher, and why might not this writer think it proper to preserve, and even consecrate, such a fine thought, and put it in its full light and beauty in this divine work, and hereby set truth at liberty, and give it a freer circulation, which before was, as it were, a prisoner, and confined to the heathen writings? Does not St. Paul himself sometimes borrow the thoughts, and even the words of profane authors?

Cornelius a Lapide believes, that the Book of Wisdom was wrote in Greek by a Jewish author, after the return from the Babylonish captivity, and about the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He even suspects that it might be one of the Seventy interpreters that wrote it for the use of that king, the book being calculated, as has been before observed, for the instruction of princes: for Aristæus relates, that Philadelphus proposed to every one of these interpreters, some question concerning the good government of his dominions. He adds, that the opinion which ascribes this book to Philo, might easily have obtained by the following equivocal terms: Solomon had two names, Solomon and Jedidiah, the last of which signifies the friend of God, and in Greek Philo or Philos signifies a friend; and the rabbins, when they quote Philo, give him the name of Jedidiah; and so people have been led into a mistake to imagine Philo the Jew was meant, when Solomon only was intended under his other name.

But these are conjectures without any certain proof. We will ingenuously acknowledge that this matter is dubious, and that the author of the Book of Wisdom is uncertain and unknown, but it is nevertheless canonical and divine, since it contains in it all that is necessary to deserve that title: it abounds with useful and solid instructions, and paints Jesus Christ and his sufferings in a heavenly manner; and the truths recorded in it are as comfortable to the good and righteous as they are dreadful to the wicked and the sinner: and besides, the church has received and acknowledged it as sacred and canonical.

It is certain that the author lived after the Seventy, since he cites their text even when they depart from the Hebrew. He wrote at a time when allegories were much in vogue, and appears to have read the writings of the philosophers and Greek poets. From these circumstances we are of opinion, that this author cannot be very ancient. He seems to be later than the writer of Ecclesiasticus, whom we have fixed to the times of Ptolemy Epiphanes in Egypt and Antiochus Epiphanes in Syria: and, if this be so, our author should have lived under the government of the Maccabees.

BOOK OF WISDOM.

CHAP. I.

ARGUMENT.—As the title of this book is Wisdom, the author very properly opens it with the recommendation of righteousness, which is a principal part of it; a virtue necessary to be observed by all, but more particularly by the rulers and judges of the earth, this being the chief end of their appointment, the pursuit of this end their great duty, and the attainment of it their true glory. He then proceeds to show in general the necessity of right sentiments of God, and the folly of mistrusting, and murmuring against, his providence; that as he is the searcher of all hearts, no disguise or hypocrisy can impose upon him, nor be concealed from him; that wickedness first brought death into the world, which God unwillingly inflicts upon men, who were originally designed for a blessed state of immortality.

Ver. 1. Love righteousness, ye that be judges of the earth:] We find the like command given to Joshua, when God appointed him to succeed Moses in the government of his people: "The book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success" (Josh. i. 8); where the marginal reading, "thou shalt do wisely," taken from the Hebrew, and confirmed by the LXX. seems far preferable. The same direction is given, Ps. ii. 10, 11, "Be wise now, O ye kings; be instructed, ye that are judges of the earth: serve the Lord with fear," &c. The philosopher assigns two reasons why magistrates should be particularly careful to give public testimony of their goodness—"because the people will be less jealous of suffering an injury from such whom they believe to be righteous, and will be less disposed to attempt an injury against such of whom they entertain the highest opinion" (Polit. lib. v. cap. 11). And it is no improbable conjecture, that one reason why rulers are called gods in scripture (Ps. lxxxii. 6) is, that they ought to imitate the Deity in the perfection of goodness. But besides this common acceptance of "judges of the earth," which indeed is most natural, there is another sense suggested by Messieurs du Port-Royal, "Les saints expliquent ces paroles comme estant dites a tous les fideles," who, according to some of the fathers, will be appointed judges of the earth: and indeed St. Austin thus interprets the very words of this author, οἱ κρίνοντες τὴν γῆν (see Comment. on Ps. ii.), from the Christian doctrine, probably, 1 Cor. vi. 2, "Know ye not that the saints shall judge the world?" τὴν κόσμον κρίνουσι; hence ὁ κριτὴς τῆς οἰκουμένης, became the style of a great saint, and is yet used as the standing title of the patriarch of Alexandria, and perhaps of other eastern patriarchs. That this construction might be intended here seems probable, because the author of this book uses the same expression in the same sense, iii. 8, where, speaking professedly of the saints, or the best of men, he says, κρινούσιν ἐξ ἡν καὶ κρατήσουσι λαόν. Upon which words Grotius and other commentators scruple not to refer to Matt. xix. 28, and Apoc. ii. 26, and other places where the judgment of the world by the saints is mentioned. Both these passages in this writer may easily be accounted for, if there was any foundation for Grotius's observation in the introduction to his notes, viz., that the translator of this book was a Christian, "qui Christiana quædam commodis locis addidit." If that great man had given any proof of his remark, then indeed these passages might be more justly suspected, and esteemed instances of the truth of his observation.

Think of the Lord with a good heart.] Φρονήσατε περὶ τοῦ Κυρίου ἐν ἀγαθότητι. Our translators, because it follows immediately, καὶ ἐν ἀλόγητι καρδίᾳ ζητήσατε αὐτόν, have considered ἀγαθότης, as well as ἀλόγητι, as relating to the heart. But, according to Grotius, sentite de Domino in bonitate, is a Hebraism for bene sentite (which is the sense of Calmet, and the rest of the commentators of Coverdale's and the Geneva bibles,) "think of God justly and worthily," i. e.

have right sentiments of his goodness, power (which the Arabic version understands in particular), and his other attributes; consider what God is, and what ye yourselves are; what great things he hath done for you, and what unworthy returns ye have made him. This certainly is the better construction (if the Hebraism may be depended upon), and comprehends more than our translation of the place. This instruction is very properly inserted in the entrance of this work, because a right opinion concerning God is the basis and foundation of all virtue and goodness. Thus Origen, βίβω γὰρ οἶμαι καὶ ἰδραίωμα πασὼν τῶν ἀρετῶν εἶναι τὴν ἀρετὴν οὖσαν θεῷ δοῦσαν τε καὶ πίστιν (Cont. Marcion. p. 2): "For the better God is understood, with the more rational religion will he be worshipped, and with a homage more agreeable to his nature, free from any mixture of superstition or idolatry."

And in simplicity of heart seek him.] i. e. With sincerity and singleness of heart, as Coverdale renders, in opposition to double-mindedness, which the scripture so frequently condemns, and the Hebrew well expresses by "a heart and a heart," divided as it were betwixt God and the world; and thus St. Bernard seems to understand it. "Seek not any thing (says he) more than God, or so much as God, because he is above every thing; seek not any thing with God, or next unto him, because he alone is sufficient for every thing," (De Div. Serm. 37). A person of such a temper is elegantly called by the son of Sirach, "A sinner that goeth two ways," Ecclus. ii. 12.

Ver. 2. He will be found of them that tempt him not:] Though it is certain that tempting God, is used in scripture not only for presumption and too much confidence, but also for too little confidence, or diffidence and distrust, which latter is the sense that Grotius and Calmet take it in; yet for what reason it should be so taken here (especially as the following words express this very thing, viz., "that he sheweth himself to those that do not distrust him"), is not easy to conceive; unless we will make a difference in the degrees of distrust expressed by πειράζοντι and ἀπιστοῦσιν, as there seems to be in the degrees of discovery God makes of himself, expressed by εὐρίσκειται and ἐμφανίζεται or else interpret ἀπιστοῦσιν of incredulity or slowness of belief, which is the proper meaning of the word. But the most natural construction of the whole verse is given by Messieurs du Port-Royal, who interpret tempting God, of every instance of hypocrisy and disguise, On ne cherche point Dieu avec un cœur simple: this is so agreeable to the ἀλόγητι καρδίᾳ; before mentioned, as well as to all the following verses, that it claims the preference. And then, as it is another proper effect of the "simplicity of the heart," to be as free from suspicions and distrust, as it is from craft or pretence, μὴ ἀπιστοῦσαι, rendered and understood as in our translation, follows most aptly and naturally.

Ver. 3. For froward thoughts] Σκολιοὶ λογισμοί. Σκολιός properly is tortuosus, flexuosus, and when applied to thoughts, must denote crafty, captious, intriguing, subtle, prevaricating, and every thing which is the reverse of ἀπλοῦς. I doubt therefore of the propriety of rendering it by froward, which denotes rather perverseness or obstinacy, as our translators render the word, Prov. xvii. 20, from another sense of σκολιός, viz., "crooked, hard to be reduced to a right line." But this sense of wiliness or dissimulation perfectly agrees with the context, for it is said, "to separate from God;" i. e. God is not to be found by a hypocrite; and the reason follows in the fifth verse.

And his power when it is tried, reproveth the unwise.] This is variously apprehended by the commentators. Clarius would have it, "That the approved virtue of good men renders them the fittest to reprove the ungodly." Badwell says Pronomen ejus adjuncti ut ad Deum referatur. So have our translators inserted it; though his should have been in italic letters, because not in the original. Castalio, the same in sense: so also Grotius understands it, and expounds it, "That there is sufficient experience of the power of God to confute all those who deny his providence." But how does this suit with the context? I think Messieurs du Port-Royal preserve the connection much better. Et lors que les hommes veulent tenter sa puissance (tempt him by their hypocrisy, as above, or, as they explain it here in their notes, en feignant le chercher au meme tems qu'on le deshonoré) elles les convainc de folie;" i. e. as they explain it, God punishes their folly by giving them up to their own unruly affections. The sense of the whole third verse seems to be to this effect: Guileful thoughts set us at a distance from God and his truth; he is too great and powerful a being to be treated with art or craft; and when men presume to treat him so, "recalcitrat undique tutus," (as Horace said of Augustus), they are sure to suffer for their folly. This sense is confirmed by the words immediately following.

Ver. 4. For into a malicious soul wisdom shall not enter; [Εἰς κακότεχνον ψυχὴν. Here again is meant the crafty, designing, evil-plotting soul, and not merely the "malicious soul," as our translators have rendered. And thus Badwell understands κακότεχνος, Anima quæ malum molitur et machinatur. St. Gregory has a just and apposite observation, "Deus de supernis mysteriis illorum mentes radio suæ visitationis illuminat, quos nulla umbra duplicitatis obscurat" (De Cur. Pastor. p. 3). The Syriac and Arabic versions understand it, "of a soul polluted with many sins." And indeed it must be confessed, in favour of this interpretation, that all sin, especially long continued in, indisposes the soul for the reception of divine wisdom, and renders it an incapable subject of divine grace; whereas holiness composes our natures into such a regular temper, as is of all others the most fit to receive religious impressions, and to procure us the presence and aid of God's grace. This sense has some countenance with what follows.

Nor dwell in the body that is subject unto sin. [Not barely subject, or liable unto sin; that cannot be the meaning, for this all persons who live in the midst of temptations must be in danger of committing; but the sense is, divine wisdom will not dwell in such who are bound, or subjected under the dominion of sin; and so the Vulgate renders, Nec habitabit in corpore subdito peccatis; and Coverdale's version has it, "Nor dwell in the body that is subdued unto sin," or rather in bondage, as a debtor, unto sin; for εὐ κακότεχνος, which is a forensic term, properly signifies. What the Jews observe, of the spirit of prophecy, that it dwells not with sadness, is true of divine wisdom, that it dwells not with wickedness, i. e. in a soul subject or enslaved to vicious and irregular passions. And as long as men allow themselves in any known sin, suffer any vice wilfully to remain in them unsubdued, so long they deprive themselves of the presence or inhabitation of this heavenly guest.

Ver. 5. For the holy spirit of discipline will flee deceit. [The Jews apply the name of spirit to several habits of the soul; thus we meet with the spirit of meekness, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, &c. (Isa. ii. 2), and here the "spirit of discipline." But I think, with Calmet, it would be better rendered, "The holy spirit of instruction will flee deceit," that being a more proper word than discipline, which our translators use; for the context requires that precise sense: and discipline has a general and more lax sense in our language; some manuscripts accordingly read ἁγιον πνεῦμα σοφίας, which confirms this. Seneca has a very remarkable passage among his epistles to this purpose: Sacer inest in nobis spiritus, bonorum malorumque custos et observator; et quemadmodum nos illum tractamus, ita et ille nos. "There is a holy spirit residing in us, who watches and observes both good and bad men, and will treat us after the same manner that we treat him." Nor is the reason which is assigned for the residence and abode of a demon, or good genius, with Socrates, after a very extraordinary manner, less worthy of notice: "Do not wonder (says Maximus Tyrius) that such a spirit should dwell with Socrates, whose purity of body, goodness of soul, devotion towards God, and integrity to man, rendered him worthy of such a friend." (Dissert. 26).

And remove from thoughts that are without understanding, and will not abide when unrighteousness cometh in. [Probably the true reading here of the original is ἀπὸ δογματικῶν δυνάμεων and not δυνάμεων, as all the printed copies have it. For the context plainly shows, and even the sentence immediately foregoing, that not silly or weak thoughts, but guileful intentions and deceitful practices, are to be understood. What is here said of the spirit of instruction, with respect to artifice and dissimulation, is no less true of those holy spirits who are the appointed guardians of mankind, with respect to unrighteousness in general; for those who, with much tender concern and affectionate hopes, minister to man's salvation, are forced with regret to leave the care and habitation of the profligate and irreclaimable, and with sorrow cry out to one another, as the angels did in the Jewish temple, when through many profanations it was no longer fit for their charge, μεταβαίνομεν ἐντεύθεν, "Let us depart hence" (Joseph. De Bell. Judaic. lib. vii.). And it is very observable, that when the wickedness of the old world was arrived to its height, God pronounces οὐ μὴ καταμνησθῇ τὸ πνεῦμά μου ἐν τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, (Gen. vi. 3), "My spirit shall not always continue in such men;" the sense of which passage our version expresses imperfectly by "striving with men" (see John xiv. 23).

Ver. 6. For wisdom is a loving spirit; [i. e. A hearty well-wisher to, and promoter of the good of mankind, and in particular a lover of their souls. But how is the punishing a blasphemer, an instance of the great love and philanthropy of this spirit? It seems rather a proof of its severity, than kindness and good nature. The answer and true sense is, that though wisdom be such a kind and merciful spirit, yet her regard to justice is such, that she will not acquit the blasphemer; and so St. Austin, (De Mendacio, cap. 16), explains it. These may be supposed the words, and as it were soliloquy, of a wicked man, comforting himself in the midst of his evil courses against danger, because divine wisdom is a loving and compassionate spirit. And then the words immediately following will contain the answer to this vain subterfuge and weak pretence, viz., that notwithstanding the affectionate tenderness of this spirit, which is confessed on all hands, and displayed everywhere, yet cannot she act so inconsistently and unsuitably to her holy nature, as to excuse a blasphemer. And thus the Syriac version understands it, Amicus est quidem hominum spiritus sapientiæ, at non justificat impium. And Juntus, after having stated the objection, answers it in like manner, Humanus quidem est, fateor; sed tamen non propterea injustus est, qui hominis blasphemi maledicta impune abire sinat (see Comment. in loc.).

And will not acquit a blasphemer of his words: [Or, as the literal rendering of the Greek is, "Hold him guiltless with respect to his lips." Such whose "mouths are full of cursing, deceit, and fraud, and under whose tongue is ungodliness and vanity," who dare be outrageous against God, or deceitful and injurious to their neighbour, shall be answerable for what is not conformable to truth and sincerity. All falsehood and deceit in general, either open or concealed, and whatsoever proceeds from the heart or the lips that may do hurt, is not only detestable to this divine spirit, but will be punished severely by it. This in the book of Proverbs is called "a froward mouth," which the Vulgar Latin translates sometimes "a mouth with two tongues."

For God is witness of his reins, and a true beholder of his heart, and a hearer of his tongue. [The sentiment here is like that in king David's fine charge to Solomon: "And thou, Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart, and with a willing mind, for the Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts" (1 Chron. xxviii. 9). God's judgment alone therefore is infallible as to men's real goodness and inward dispositions; for as men judge of their neighbour's heart by his words or actions, which are often deceitful, God, on the contrary, judges of men's words and actions as he sees their heart, and knows their reins. But the observation in this place relates not so much to God's infinite knowledge in general, as to his discovery of guile and deceit in particular.

Ver. 7. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth the world: [i. e. Is infinite and immense, is not bounded by any place or space, but spreads himself to all places that we can either see or imagine, and infinitely beyond; so that we cannot say, He is here, and not there; thus far he reaches, and no farther. St. Gregory describes God, "intra omnia non inclusus, extra omnia non exclusus, supra omnia non elatus, infra omnia non depressus" (lib. ii. Moral.). or, to speak in the language of the old philosopher, he is a being "whose centre is everywhere, and his circumference nowhere." But nothing can equal what God says of himself, "am I a God at hand, and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord" (Jer. xxiii. 23, 24, see also Ps. cxxxix. 7).

And that which containeth all things hath knowledge of the voice. [Some manuscripts read ὁ ἐνὶ ὅσῳ, which probably is the true reading, (see Calmet and St. Austin in Speculo, and Orig. in Epist. ad Rom. cap. 9, lib. vii.). Thus the Syriac and Arabic versions expound it, the former rendering, Ille qui tenet omnia, scienter habet vocem ipsius; and the latter, Et qui creaturas omnes amplectitur, possidet notitiam vocis. Coverdale's version is to the same purpose, "And the same that upholdeth all things, hath knowledge also of the voice." But the rendering of the Vulgate here is very faulty, and even ungrammatical: as the former sentence respected God's omnipresence, this takes in his infinite knowledge, which extends itself to, and takes cognisance of, what passes everywhere. With respect to our words, that of the psalmist is most full, "Lo, there is not a word in my tongue, but thou, O Lord, knowest it altogether." (Ps. cxxxix. 3): with respect to our actions, that of the prophet Samuel, "The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed;" 1 Sam. ii. 3, where the reading of the LXX. is very observable, Θεὸς γνώσις Κύριος, i. e. "the Lord is a God of knowledges," which as Bishop Pearson expresses it, are so plural, or rather infinite, that "of his understanding there is no number," τῆς συνήσεως ἀριθμὸς οὐκ ἔστιν ἀριθμὸς (see the LXX. in Ps. cxlviii. 5.)

Ver. 9. And the sound of his words shall come unto the Lord for the manifestation of his wicked deeds.] The marginal reading here seems preferable, "For the proving of his wicked deeds." Coverdale's version is to the same effect, "The report of his words shall come unto God, so that his wickedness shall be punished;" to which agrees the rendering in the Geneva Bible, "The sound of his words shall come unto God for the correction of his iniquities." And the Syriac and Arabic versions are to the same purpose. And in this sense even our translators themselves have used ἐλέγω, the very verse before, which they seem here to have forgot.

Ver. 10. For the ear of jealousy heareth all things: i. e. God's jealous ear overhears every thing; especially complaints against the dispensations of his providence cannot be kept secret from him who is jealous of his own honour. The Arabic version therefore of this passage is very just, Ob zeli cansam res omnes audit: hence his name Deus Zelotes. There is no metaphor more frequent in the prophets, than to represent sin as spiritual adultery; jealousy, therefore, in a religious sense, means God's quick sense and keen resentment of his injured honour, that, like a suspicious and abused husband, he is ever inquisitive and watchful, always listening to, and actuated by, every report and whisper, so that nothing can be concealed from, or pass unobserved by him, that reflects the least dishonour upon his judgments or proceedings.

And the noise of murmurings is not hid.] Murmurings here may either respect God, or man; with respect to God, the sense is, that he will listen to, and remember, all hard and ungodly speeches against him, that he will punish the secret complaints or open insults of such who dare to find fault with the wise methods of his providence, or, from any seemingly unequal dispensations of it, call his justice or goodness in question. By murmurings with regard to men, we may understand, that detraction, though a covert method of evil speaking, and generally conveyed by way of whisper, and under the seal of secrecy, yet shall neither be undiscovered or unpunished. And in this latter sense St. Austin understands this passage (De Mendacio, cap. 16), and is pleased with the contrast of the expression, viz.: "The noise of murmurings; which, though imagined to be secret, and the slander of them conveyed privately, and as it were insilled into the ear, yet are as well known (says he) to God, as if they were spoken aloud, or proclaimed with the voice of a trumpet."

Ver. 11. Therefore beware of murmuring, which is unprofitable; i. e. Is very mischievous and hurtful. This figure of speech, called litotes or meiosis, when less is said than is meant, is frequent both in sacred and profane writings. Thus Prov. xx. 23, the wise man saith, "A false balance is not good;" i. e. very bad and hateful to God. Thus idols are called "vain things, which cannot profit;" i. e. things which occasion much mischief. And the most shameful vices are called "things which are not convenient," Rom. ii. 28 (see also Gen. xxxiv. 7). Nor are examples of this kind of speaking wanting in Cicero, Livy, Longinus, and the best writers. Thus Virgil calls the great tyrant Busris, illaudatus; and the Stygian lake, inamabilis; though by this negative of praise, he intended to express a great abhorrence of them (see more instances in Martyn's Notes on the Georgics, lib. iii. p. 210).

And refrain your tongue from backbiting: for there is no word so secret that shall go for nought: and the mouth that believeth slayeth the soul.] We cannot better or more truly interpret this verse, than of those reasonings which are contained in the first five verses of the next chapter; nor can it be so consistently understood any other way; for in the verses referred to, we have all the particulars inserted in this, viz.: the γογγυσμός ἀνοικηλός, the καταλαλή γλώσσης, not backbiting, as our version hath it, but such representations of our mortal state, as are false and injurious to God the Creator—the φθίσμα λαθραίων, in the strictest sense, explained by εἶπον ἐν ταυτοῖς λογισμένοι—and οὐ κενὸν, on account of its pernicious consequences—and, lastly, the στόμα καταφενόμενον, which literally slayeth the soul, by filling it with such vile principles as bring it to destruction. From hence the connection between this and the next chapter is both visible and necessary; nor can we account for this verse so well in any other light. None of the commentators have attended to this, and therefore they expound this verse, either of lying, strictly so called, or of slander in general; but if we understand it of slandering, with the marginal reading and the Geneva Bible, we must confine it rather to a particular branch of it, viz.: the speaking evil of God, good men, or sacred things. St. Bernard's observation, that "slander is like a serpent that at the same time kills several persons," is very just and applicable here; for a slanderer, that takes a wicked pleasure in ridiculing or discrediting things sacred, ruins himself at length by his libertine notions and false principles; he shoots his arrows against heaven, which are sure to fall on his own head; he poisons the persons that listen to him with consent and pleasure, and so draws them after him into the same ruin; and he wounds religion, and consequently God through its sides, by the scandal and groundless suspicions which he impotently endeavours to fasten upon it.

Ver. 12. Seek not death in the error of your life: and pull not upon yourselves destruction with the works of your hands.] The original words ἡθοῦρε and ἐπιστάσεις, intimate, that wicked men labour to be miserable: that they offer a sort of violence to themselves when they commit sin; and thereby oblige God, unwillingly, and, as it were, with reluctance, to inflict death on them. Salvia expresses this in most remarkably strong terms; "God (saith he) is loath to punish men, but they themselves, exigent et extorquent ut perirent, vim etiam faciunt—manus inferunt pictati divinæ, et omni peccatorum scelere, quasi omni telorum genere, misericordiam Dei expugnant" (De Gubern. Dei, lib. i.). As death and destruction proceed thus from the corrupt abuse of men's own natural power and liberty of will, we hence see the origin of evil.—I observed of the former verse, that it was best explained by a reference to the beginning of the next chapter; so the like reference to it is equally proper and necessary in this, for much the same order of sentiments will be found in the cautions here given; "Seek not death;" i. e. court it not; ἐν πλάνῃ σοφίᾳ, which "error of life" is explained in ver. 6—9 of the next chapter: and the following verses there, viz.: 10—12, that express a degree of wickedness which amounts to a "covenant or compact with death," are here cautioned against, by "pull not upon yourselves destruction;" for ἐπιστάν διελθῶν is as much above ἡθοῦν θάνατον, as acts of violence, cruelty, and injustice, are above voluptuousness in the climax of a bad life.

Ver. 13. For God made not death: i. e. He designed not originally the entrance of death into the world. Man, whom God at first made an image of his own eternity, in his state of innocence had the pleasing prospect of immortality; and if he had continued upright, his obedience would have been crowned with it. Bishop Bull hath a most excellent discourse upon the state of man before the fall; it is his opinion there, that "this never-ending life of happiness, promised to our first parents if they had continued obedient, and grown up to perfection under that economy wherein they were placed, would not have been continued in the earthly Paradise, but only have commenced there, and been perpetuated in a higher state; and after such a trial of their obedience, as should seem sufficient to the divine wisdom, they should have been translated from earth to heaven. (Bull's Opera Posth. vol. iv. disc. 5).

Neither hath he pleasure in the destruction of the living.] God does not sport himself, like a merciless tyrant, with the lives of his creatures, but is tender of their welfare, ever disposed to do them good, and ready to communicate happiness to them, if their own obstinacy and evil behaviour do not obstruct it. And therefore if, notwithstanding these gracious intentions of God in their favour, men do finally perish, their miscarriage must be ascribed to their own perverse wills, and sinful abuse of their liberty. And thus God declares expressly in Hosea, xiii. 9, "O Israel, thy destruction is from thyself;" i. e. God is not the cause of any evil, either of sin or punishment; but thy sin, whereby thou destroyest thyself, and thy misery, which is the consequence of it, are both of thy own procuring (see Lowth in loc. and Ezek. xxxiii. 11). Some of the fathers, viz.: 2

Origen, Chrysostom, Theophylact, &c., have a pretty observation, and which is very pertinent to the passage before us, upon Matt. xxv. 41, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." They observe, 1. That the punishment of the wicked is not said here to be "prepared from the beginning of the world," as the blessing is, lest it should be thought that God designed man's punishment before he sinned. 2. That Christ saith, "Come ye blessed of my Father," but not, "Go, ye cursed of my Father;" because God is the author and procurer of men's happiness, but man is the only author of his own misery. 3. That punishment is mentioned as designed originally not for man, but "for the devil and his angels" (see Dr. Whitby in loc.).

Ver. 14. For he created all things, that they might have their being; i. e. God created the world and all things in it for perpetual duration; and that, under the direction of his overruling providence, they might always continue in being; and particularly he designed this favour for mankind, whom at first he created to be immortal (ii. 23). This is the sense of the Syriac version, which renders, Et in ipsa mundi origine vitam expertem mortis veneno.

And the generations of the world were healthful; All things which God made in their several kinds were very good, and designed for the use and benefit of man, and were originally appointed to be serviceable to him; there were naturally no hurtful or noxious qualities in the elements till sin altered the constitution of things; but sin, having made a breach in the world, a sad train of evils entered with it; for the world being made for man, and the place of his residence, it hath felt the effect of God's displeasure to increase his punishment. And since the curse consequent upon the fall, famine, pestilence, deluges, wild beasts, diseases, pains, sicknesses, have been in their turns his scourges and destroyers, as if universal nature was armed against him. Or the meaning may be in particular, that all men (Nationes orbis terrarum, as the Vulgate reads and Coverdale's translation follows) were created originally pure and healthful, both as to soul and body, in the person of Adam, the common root from whence they sprung; and that there was no natural contagion, or hereditary taint, to draw him to disobedience, and, in consequence of that, to destruction; exterminium, as the Vulgate expresses it, aluding probably to Adam's banishment out of Paradise. Had Adam indeed continued innocent, he then, among many other great privileges, had transmitted downwards, by way of natural generation or descent, a healthful and blessed temper of body; but our great protoplast and representative falling, besides the rectitude of his mind, he lost also that blessed constitution of body, which would have been so great a privilege to his offspring.

And there is no poison of destruction in them. Φάρμακον δέειρον. The Greeks often use Φάρμακον in a good sense; thus we read in Homer, Φάρμακα πολλὰ μὲν ἐσθλὰ μεριμένα, πολλὰ δὲ λυγρὰ.

And therefore δέειρον is very properly here added; as in Virgil's Georgics we meet with malum virus, where malum is not to be looked upon as a superfluous epithet, because virus is used in a good as well as a bad sense; as in Statius particularly. And that venenum itself does not always signify something destructive to life, see Virgil's eighth Eclogue, and Martyn on lib. i. Georg. p. 29. St. Austin observes, that briars and thorns were not of the original product of the earth, much less poisonous plants and herbs; and that none of these had grown upon the face of it but for man's disobedience (De genes. cont. Manich. lib. i. cap. 13. and St. Basil, Hexaem. hom. 5.). Accordingly the LXX. render, "Cursed be the ground for thy sake," by ἐπικατάρατος ἡ γῆ ἐν τοῖς ἔργοις σου, i. e. in or by thy works of sin. And Aquila and Theodotion render in like manner. But here it may be asked, How can this observation of our author be true, if in the natural world there are confessedly poisonous plants and drugs; and if what some good writers maintain be just, with respect to the moral world, viz. that the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil was for its specific quality of a poisonous nature both to the soul and body; and that the first man's nature was tainted by tasting or eating of it? Or how can it be justly said, that God did not create death, since he did create that poisonous fruit, by which the human nature was so deadly poisoned. For the solution of this difficulty, see the learned D. Jackson's Works, tom. iii. p. 29.

Nor the kingdom of death upon the earth: Nor would death have had any power, much less sovereignty over the earth, who now reigns absolute in it, hath made it her place of residence, and even fixed her palace in it. For in the original it is not βασιλεία, but βασίλειον, which means not kingdom or dominion, but rather court or palace. Coverdale renders ἄδων βασίλειον, "the kingdom of hell," intimating that the devil's power was usurped, and his sovereignty of man's own erection. Calmet renders, Le roi des enfers n'avoit pas son palais sur la terre.

Ver. 15. For righteousness is immortal: If this verse was included in a parenthesis, the sense of the context would be better connected and more perfect; and I have the pleasure to observe, that Coverdale's translation doth so include it: the meaning seems to be, that obedience would not only have made man immortal, and translated him from an earthly to a heavenly paradise, but, as the verb is in the present tense, it may intimate farther, that righteousness continued in, would have raised man to an unchangeable state of goodness, and his innocence have been crowned with everlasting perseverance; as the angels, who continued in their duty when the rest revolted, are finally established in their integrity and felicity.

Ver. 16. But ungodly men with their works and words called it to them: for when they thought to have it their friend, they consumed to nought, and made a covenant with it, because they are worthy to take part with it. We meet with the like phrase, "of making a covenant with death," Isa. xxviii. 14, 15, and upon the like occasion, I shall transcribe it at large, because it will give great light to this passage: "Because ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us; for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves; therefore thus saith the Lord, Your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it." This passage of Isaiah is certainly alluded to and imitated by our author in this verse. But the words in the original, and in our version, are so perplexed and obscure, that it will be very difficult, I had almost said impossible, to give any translation of this verse, and many others in this book, that shall answer truly to the letter, and yet be free from obscurity. The words, as they now stand, are certainly intricate and confused, and seem by some accident to have suffered a transposition. Was I at liberty to attempt mending the obscurity of this verse, it should be by a transposition too of the Greek words, by altering the place only of ἐτάκηναι καὶ, thus: Φίλον ἡγησάμενοι αὐτὸν συνθήκην ἔθεντο πρὸς αὐτόν, καὶ ἐτάκηναι, ὅτι ἄξιον, &c. i. e. "They called (death) to them, and looking upon it as their friend, they made a covenant with it; and consumed away, because they deserved to share in it." But though this easy transposition would make the construction very clear, yet I dare not warrant it without plainer authority from manuscripts or ancient versions. Let us then see what construction may be put upon this verse, as the present reading is, by attending closely to the context; and from what goes before in the eleventh and twelfth verses, and what follows after in the whole second chapter, we may in general make this observation, that there seems here to be an intended climax, to show the progress of wicked men's attachment to death, like that in Ps. i. 1, to show their progress in iniquity; they first call or "invite death to them;" next they hold it, or "treat it as a friend;" and lastly, they "enter into covenant or strict union with it." And this progress seems to be represented and explained at large in the next chapter; the first step is their reasonings about death, contained in the first five verses, wherein they put it in a false but the most favourable light to themselves that it is capable of; the next step is a debauched life, founded on the foregoing false principles, and recommended in the next four verses; this is, entering into society or friendship with death; and the consequence of it is, they consume and waste away, and shorten their lives, which is represented by ἐτάκηναι. The last step is marked out, ver. 10, by their resolving upon acts of seditious injustice and malicious wickedness; which is as it were entering into "covenant with death," and makes their attachment to it inseparable, viz., "they die for ever." But this will appear more fully, when we explain the particulars of the next chapter. I shall observe here, once for all, that we are not to imagine this book to be only a collection of confused discourses or independent sentences; for, from the little sketch here given, and the argument of the several chapters, to every attentive reader a regular method will appear plain and observable.

CHAP. II.

ARGUMENT.—The author having represented in the former chapter the original of sin and death, as too sadly exemplified in our first parents, proceeds to show the contagious effects and terrible consequences of sin upon their posterity. For this purpose he introduces some libertines' reasoning (if it may be so called) in their loose way, in favour of their darling opinions, "That life is short and uncertain, and therefore its sensual gratifications to be pursued with eagerness, and without delay; that there is no real distinction between good and evil, and therefore all acts of oppression and injustice, such as may best suit men's convenience and interest, are allowable and commendable; that the soul is naturally mortal, and is annihilated with the body; that there is no future state, nor any account to be given hereafter of men's wicked and evil courses in this life;" these poisonous principles are represented from the beginning to ver. 21 of this chapter; and though set out to the best advantage, are not intended to countenance men in bad notions of religion, in false opinions of God, and wrong sentiments of the soul; but are only opinions introduced with an intention to confute them; and therefore, in the very entrance of this chapter, the author, to prevent any possible mistake as to his intention and meaning, pronounces such notions and conclusions to be not right, ver. 1, and at the end of this, and in the three following chapters, confutes them at large, determines in favour of virtue and goodness, and shows the certainty of their reward.

Ver. 1. Our life is short and tedious.] I think the word tedious, which is used by the old English translations, improper here; it occurs very rarely in the sense of our version, refers more generally to time, and rather implies a long duration of it; so that short and tedious seem wrong coupled together; it would have been better rendered, and with less ambiguity, short and painful, and so the original indeed reads, ὀλίγος καὶ λυπηρὸς ὁ βίος ἡμῶν, and is confirmed by the Syriac and Arabic versions. The expression here is like that of Jacob's, "Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been" (Gen. xlvii. 9), and that of Job, "Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble" (xiv. 1), allowing only for the difference of the speakers.

In the death of a man there is no remedy:] There is no prevention of, or remedy against, mortality. Death is the portion of every man, though the particular time is uncertain, according to that of Job, "His days are determined; the number of his months are with thee; thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass" (xiv. 5). But neither does our author, nor this passage of Job, countenance that notion of the predestinarians,—that every particular man's time of life is so absolutely circumscribed, and so strictly and peremptorily assigned him by God, that nothing can shorten or lengthen it beyond such predetermined bounds; for though all things, even the number of our months, are allowed to be foreknown by God, yet does it not from hence, nor from any passage of scripture, appear, that he has predetermined the precise and particular time of any person's death by any absolute decree: for if every man's time of life is unconditionally fixed, to what purposes serve the promises of long life to good and pious persons, where God sees it best for them; or the many threats of a short one to the ungodly and the wicked? Or why does the wise son of Sirach say, that "there is a time when there is success in the hands of the physician," or that "they should pray unto the Lord, that he would prosper that which they give for ease and remedy to prolong life?" (Ecclus. xxxviii. 13, 14). For vain is the help of art, and even prayer itself must be supposed fruitless, where the case is unalterable, and the doom is irrevocable. The Vulgate renders, In fine hominis non est refrigerium, from a corrupted copy probably, which read ταυθς, from ταυθα, refrigerior, lætitia perfundor, instead of ταυς, the true reading. Coverdale's translation follows this mistake.

Neither was there any man known to have returned from the grave.] Both the observation and inference of these vain reasoners are false; for that persons have returned from the grave, appears from several instances under the Old Testament; 1 Kings xvii. 22; 2 Kings iv. 35; xiii. 21. Nor does it follow, if there were no instances of persons returning from thence, that the dead altogether cease to be, or that there is no future life after this, as such libertines would gladly infer (see Anacreon, Ode 59, who has many thoughts and expressions like the loose and jovial ones in this chapter).

Ver. 3. We were born at all adventure:] i. e. We came into the world by chance, without any appointment or direction of Providence; and as we came from nothing (Vulgate reads, Ex nihilo nati sumus, which Coverdale follows), so upon our deaths shall we return to nothing again. This language is very natural and agreeable to the persons here introduced speaking, viz. materialists and infidels.

And a little spark in the moving of our heart:] According to the notions of these false reasoners, the soul was nothing else but a little fire about the heart, the smoke of which was perceivable by our respiration, and the sparks of it by our words; that when this fire was extinguished, as they imagined it was by death, the body was reduced to embers or ashes, and the soul vanished into air. In like manner the atheistical philosophers, who made atoms the principles of all things, thought the soul to consist of some little brisk fiery spirits, which kept in for a while, but were afterward extinguished by death. Hence we find them using the similes of air, fire, or smoke, with respect to the soul. The Latin also and the Hebrew, it is well known, express both spirit and wind by the same word; and from this agreement only in name, some, for want of better arguments, have been so weak as to infer, that they agree likewise in nature, and at last mix together. The true reading of the original, and which occurs in all the copies, and is followed by the oriental and most old English translations, is ὁ λόγος σπυθὴρ; the Vulgate also, with Junius, render it in like manner, by sermo. Our translators, it is certain, made use of a corrupted copy, which read ὀλίγος σπυθὴρ, and have given the sense accordingly. If there was any authority for this reading, or just reason for its preference (see Flamin. Nobil. in loc. ap. Polygl. though it seems to be owing only to affinity of sound,) I should choose to read the whole thus, καὶ ὀλίγος σπυθὴρ ἐκίνησε καρδίαν ἡμῶν; i. e. "a little spark of fire moves, or hath put our hearts in motion."

Ver. 4. Our name shall be forgotten in time.] When we are dead, our names will not live long after us, but our memorial shall perish with us; our actions will not be remembered in the next generation, much less in future ages; so that as to the shame or infamy arising from them, we are quite unconcerned and indifferent as to what posterity may think or say of them. As there is a commendable ambition in good men to be remembered with honour hereafter, which is a spur to virtuous and laudable actions; so a carelessness as to the present or future opinion of mankind is an encouragement to wickedness, and a certain sign of a profligate and abandoned mind.

Our life—shall be dispersed as a mist, that is driven away with the beams of the sun, and overcome with the heat thereof.] Εὐανθεῖσα ὑπὸ θερμότητος αὐτοῦ, "Made heavy with heat;" and so Vulg. a calore illius aggravata—both very improper. "Overcome with heat," according to our version, is not agreeable to the Greek; and "oppressed with heat," as in the margin, is no better. Big with heat has no better pretence to be allowed, because in the sentence immediately foregoing mention is made of dispersion by the rays of the sun. If I might indulge conjecture, I would, to avoid these difficulties, read here μαραινέσθαι ὑπὸ θερμότητος, i. e. "wasted away with the heat thereof." Sophocles applies the same word to time, πάνθ' ὁ μέγας χρόνος μαραίνει τε καὶ φέγει (see Ajax Flagell.).

Ver. 5. For our life is a very shadow that passeth away:] The comparison of life to a cloud, and a shadow, is almost every where to be met with; but Mr. Norris has set this latter resemblance in the best, and as it were a new light; as that "our state here is partly life and partly death; as the other is partly light and partly darkness—that, like a shadow, wherever it passes, it leaves no track behind it—that it seems to be something, when indeed it is nothing—that it is always altering, and ends on a sudden; and when at its full height and prime, is often nearest to its declension, as a shadow is to disappear when at full length" (Miscellanies, p. 178). Hence Pindar calls men ἐφήμεροι "people for a day;" and upon account of the shortness and uncertainty of life, the ancient patriarchs, though their span was much longer than ours, thought it hardly worth while to build houses, but contented themselves to sojourn and grow gray in tents.

For it is fast sealed, so that no man cometh again.] The Arabic version runs; Est enim res obsignata (scil. mors nostra) quam nemo revocaverit. The comparison here is taken from the ancient custom of sealing the grave, or sepulchre, and rolling a great stone to the mouth of it, to make it the more secure and undisturbed (see Dan. vi. 17; Matt. xxvii. 66). Pausanias has a thought which very much resembles this, ὅτι ὁ Πλούτων κλείν, καὶ λέγουσιν ἐπ' αὐτῇ τον καλούμενον "Αἰὶον κεκλεισθέντα ὑπὸ τοῦ Πλούτωνος, καὶ ὡς ἐπὶ τῷ οὐδαί, οἱς ἐξ αὐτοῦ, i. e. "Pluto has a key, and with it, as they say, he locks up the place commonly called Hades, and from thence no man returns;" lib. v. cap. 20 (see apoc. i. 18). Holy Job has the like sentiment upon death (vii. 9, 10), "As the cloud is consumed and vanishes away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more; he shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more." Where it is very observable, that the LXX. express this impossibility of returning by three strong negatives following one another οὐδ' οὐ μὴ ἐντρέψῃ, repeated twice in the same verse.

Ver. 6. Let us speedily use the creatures like as in youth.] i. e. Whilst the good things or creatures are in their prime; or, rather, Whilst we ourselves are vigorous and young, which is the sense of the Syriac and Arabic versions; youth being the season for the high relish of pleasure, for cheering the heart and gratifying the senses: for every aged person may say with Barzillai, "Can I discern between good and evil? Can I taste what I eat or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women?" (2 Sam. xix. 35). There is also a third sense of these words, viz. Let us live as if we were young again; which Grotius prefers, and seems countenanced by the reading of the Alexandrian manuscript.

Ver. 7. Let no flower of the spring pass by us:] Flowers have always been esteemed symbols or emblems of joy, and in the revellings of debauchees they were usually crowned with them; and so peculiar are they to times of public festivity and rejoicing, that they are looked upon as incompatible with mourning. The spring seems more particularly to be mentioned, because it is the chief season of flowers. But some copies, instead of ἔαρον, read, ἄθος ἄθος, which Junius prefers; but if this reason be admitted, I would not with him understand it barely of fine weather, jucundus aer, but rather, "Let no fragrant breath of air, arising from the wine or ointments," just before mentioned, "pass by or escape us." Οἶνος ἀνθοσπίας, vinum odoratum et fragrans (see Hesychius, in voce), was not unusual in such meetings.

Ver. 8. Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they be withered:] It is certain, that not only the guests at the feasts of the ancients, but the rooms, were strewed with flowers, and the waiters, and even the drinking bowls, crowned with them. Roses are mentioned here in particular, because the rose is reckoned to be ἑρμῶος φυτόν, "the plant of love," and was accordingly consecrated to Venus; and rose-buds are symbols of youth, and of the spring, and from their soon withering, the properest emblems of the shortness of life, and the fleeting nature of its pleasures (see Anacreon, Od. 5. de Rosa, and Od. 53).

Ver. 9. This is our portion, and our lot is this.] Coverdale's version is more explicit, "For that is our portion, else get we nothing." This is the language of Epicurus' scholars, the sum of whose ethics was, "Dux vitæ dia voluptas." Life, in the opinion of such libertines, is bare existence without their sinful pleasures: and it is observable, that in Plautus, Catullus, and Martial, and such writers, vivere is generally taken for a merry life, as ἔμμεν is sometimes among the Greeks; and in this sense we are to understand that old inscription, "Amici, dum vivimus, vivamus." Those that are persuaded that the soul is absolutely mortal, their conclusion must be that of these sensualists; such persons act agreeably to their own principles, if they pursue every thing that their appetites are inclined to, be it pleasure or profit. Such maxims, and a conduct suitable to them, may be expected from persons who have no views beyond the grave. And therefore the Epicureans endeavoured to efface the belief of another life out of men's minds, as well knowing that men could never arrive to an undisturbed sensuality, whilst any notions of futurity checked them in the commission of their crimes. Accordingly, "Metus ille foras præceps Acherontis agendus." (Lucret. lib. iii.).

Ver. 11. Let our strength be the law of justice:] The assertion here, that right is founded in might, is a very old opinion, as old probably as Nimrod, but long since confuted by the wisest men and soberest philosophers: "Falsum est (says St. Austin) quod a quibusdam non recte sententibus dici solet, id esse jus, quod ei, qui plus potest, utile est (De Civit. Dei, lib. xix.). Upon which, Ludov. Vives remarks, that this false and dangerous opinion is confuted by Plato, lib. i. De Repub. Hobbes in vain endeavoured to revive this notion, so injurious in its consequences to the property, and destructive of the peace and comfort, of mankind.

Ver. 12. Let us lie in wait for the righteous; because he is not for our turn.] i. e. "Let us lurk privately for the innocent without a cause," as it is expressed, Prov. i. 11, where there is the like consultation of the wicked. It is no wonder that atheists and unbelievers, and persons of such vile and libertine principles, should encourage one another in wickedness, and in attempting the most outrageous acts of violence and injustice, in the manner here represented, especially against such as are most likely to cross or contradict their pleasures, and to reprove them in the sinful use of them. Such a kind monitor is not for the turn of the wicked, he is rather δυσχρηστος, as the original has it, i. e. officious, troublesome, and disagreeable to them. St. Cyprian, who quotes this passage of our author, reads accordingly insuavis, lib. ii. cont. Judæos; and so does St. Austin, lib. xvii. cap. 20. De Civit. Dei. There is exactly the same expression, and upon the same occasion, in Isaiah iii. 10, according to the version of the LXX. ἐθέσωμεν τὸν ἔκκατον, ὅτι δυσχρηστος ἦναι ἱστί, from which this seems to be taken; and it is the more probable, because, in the Greek text of Barnabas, where this passage of the Book of Wisdom is cited, the reading is ἐθέσωμεν τὸν ἔκκατον, and not ἐνέθροσωμεν, as in the common editions.

Ver. 14. He was made to reprove our thoughts.] Εὐγένο ἡμῶν εἰς ἐλεγχον ἐννοῶν ἡμῶν. Our version seems here neither just nor proper; the meaning is, He is a reprover of our schemes and designs. The Arabic renders it, Consilia nostra; and the Syriac, Est nobis objurgator cogitationum nostrarum. Thus I would understand εὐγένο, and not in the sense of our translation.

Ver. 15. He is grievous unto us even to behold; for his life is not like other men's.] The very sight of him is uneasy and disagreeable to us; for the presence of a good man is a check to the proceedings of the wicked; and his virtuous example, and singular goodness, is a living reproof which they do not relish in their sight. Hence the many attempts and combinations of ungodly men against the life of the righteous, so frequent to be met with in sacred and profane history. Thus Joseph's virtue was an eye-sore to his brethren, and therefore they conspired his destruction. Thus David, for his superior excellence and uncommon merit, was persecuted by Saul. Hence St. Peter observes of the wicked, that it is their custom to speak evil of, and abuse, "such as run not with them to the same excess of riot" (1 Pet. iv. 4). And St. John asks this question, "Wherefore did Cain, who was of that wicked one, slay his brother?" and returns for answer, "Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous" (1 John iv. 12). The like may be observed of the primitive martyrs and confessors, who were persecuted, afflicted, tormented, because, instead of countenancing fashionable and popular vices, they chose rather to reprove and rebuke them. Tacitus assigns this as the cause of the death of Thraseas Pætus, "That Nero could not bear even the sight of that senator, who was of so unblemished a character, that his life was as it were animated virtue itself" (Annal. lib. xvi.).

Ver. 16. We are esteemed of him as counterfeiters:] Our version seems here faulty, for such abandoned persons as are here described would not be at the pains to act under the disguise of piety, or assume the mask of religion; the meaning is, that he esteems us like dross, or as an impure and filthy mixture; which sense is confirmed by the very next sentence, and so the original word means, and the Syriac and Arabic versions understand it. The Vulgate reads nugaces, i. e. we are looked upon by him as persons that pursue trifles (for such do all the pleasures of the world appear to a truly humble and good spirit; but this term seems too soft and favourable for persons of such bad morals and wicked principles).

Ver. 18. For if the just man be the son of God, he will help him, and deliver him from the hand of his enemies.] Thus the primitive martyrs were insulted and treated in the like opprobrious manner, πῶς ὁ Θεὸς αὐτῶν, καὶ τί αὐτοῖς ὠφελεῖ ἡ Σπῆλαια, ἢν καὶ πρὸ τῆς ἐλπίδος ἔλκοντο ψυχῆς (Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. v. cap. 1). The expressions, from ver. 16 to 21 of this chapter, very much resemble those of the psalmist, Ps. xxii. 8, "He trusted in God that he would deliver him, let him deliver him now, εἰ ἔδει αὐτόν, if he loveth him." Compare likewise Matt. xxvii. 43, where the taunt and irony used by the Jews, by way of insult, to our Saviour, then expiring on the cross, very much resemble the manner of expression here. And indeed, St. Austin thus understands and expounds our author, and says, that in this and the following verses, "there is a plain prophecy of Christ's passion, and that the unrighteous here mentioned, are his wicked murderers" (De Civit. Dei, lib. xvii. cap. 20). St. Ambrose, St. Cyprian, and many others of the fathers, assert the like; but Lactantius is most express, and presses the Jews home with this testimony, which he says is "so full and particular in describing the wicked counsels against him, that this author may seem almost to have been present (lib. iv.) But I am not so sanguine as to imagine or assert, that there is any direct prophecy of our blessed Saviour's sufferings in these verses, which would be doing too much honour to this author, and the times in which he wrote; yet I think, by way of accommodation, they are applicable to our Saviour, who in scripture is called "the just one," by way of eminence, and in a very particular and appropriate manner calls God his Father.

Ver. 20. Let us condemn him with a shameful death: for by his own saying he shall be respected. i. e. If his own word may be depended upon, God will have respect unto him, ἐὰν αὐτοῦ ἐπισκοπῇ ἐκ λόγων αὐτοῦ, "there shall be a visitation or interposition of God in his favour, probably by bringing him from the dust of death again. The expression here very much resembles that of Joseph's brethren, Gen. xxxvii. 20, "Come now, and let us slay him, and we shall see what will become of his dreams" (see also Jer. xviii. 18). It is a severe irony, and a sneering sarcasm upon the hopes of the just man, not unlike that of the heathens upon the ashes of the primitive Christians, who gloried in the hopes of a resurrection: their persecutors pleased themselves with reducing the dead bodies of the several martyrs unto atoms, with scattering them in the air, or throwing them into rivers, and then scoffingly said, "Let us now see whether they can rise again, or whether their God can help them, and deliver them out of our hands" (Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. v. cap. 1).

Ver. 21. For their own wickedness hath blinded them.] See the like sentiment, iv. 12. St. Chrysostom observes, "That sin doth so blind the senses of sinners, that seeing not the ways of falsehood and error, they run headlong into them: nor could any errors ever have prevailed over man, if sin had not made the way; for first a man is blinded by his sins, and then drawn away and seduced; for error (saith he) begetheth not sin, but sins beget and bring forth error" (Homil. 19. in Matt. vii.). But still it is no less true, on the other hand, that error, especially in fundamental principles, produces generally wicked practices. St. Austin accordingly observes, that the different degrees, and, as it were, gradations of licentiousness, are very justly described in this chapter: "That men first efface all impressions of a Deity, then deny the immortality of the soul, and a future state; that immorality is the certain consequence of such infidelity; that debauchery and intemperance is their resort in particular, as being the most effectual remedy to drown thought; and that when men are once heated, they easily proceed, through excess, to oppression, cruelty, and murder" (in Ps. lii.).

Ver. 23. For God created man to be immortal, and made him to be an image of his own eternity.] God not only created man ἐν ἀβύσσῳ, free from corruption, but made him εἰκόνα τῆς ἰδέας αἰώνιος, which is a very strong expression, to denote a peculiar resemblance of the Deity; and accordingly the Arabic interpreters render, Fecitque illum imaginem peculiarem; and the Syriac, Ad imaginem ideæ suæ. Our translators undoubtedly read, αἰδιόνητος, which properly signifies eternity; and this Dr. Grabe has inserted in the text, esteeming it probably the best reading.

Ver. 24. Through envy of the devil came death into the world.] The devil, jealous at the future happiness designed for man, resolved to tempt him to disobedience, that he might deprive him of the blessing of immortality, and reduce him to the same forlorn condition with himself and his apostate brethren. St. Chrysostom makes the same observation upon the devil, ὅτι οὐδὲν παρ' ἡμῶν ἡλικημένος, ἰδὼν τιμηθῆναι τὸν ἀνθρώπον, εὐθὺς ἰβάνεκεν αὐτοῦ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς (Homil. 25. de Diabolo Tentat.). "That though man had given the devil no occasion of offence, yet when he saw the honour designed him, he immediately envied him the favour" (see also Euseb. Præp. Evangel. lib. vii.). St. Austin observes, "That death began at the same time with the transgression; and that neither age nor pain could have touched our first parents, so long as they held the privilege of eating of the tree of life; but afterward their bodies, even in a natural way, contracted the seeds of disease and death" (De Genes. lib. ii.). And thus the Apostolical Constitutions, ὅσοι βούλει εἶναι, &c. "Duæ sunt viæ, vitæ una, mortis altera, illæ autem nullam habent inter se convenientiam. Naturale quidem est vitæ iter, adscitum autem iter mortis, quod non ex voluntate Dei exitit, verum ex insidiis adversarii" (Constit. lib. vii. cap. i.).

And they that do hold of his side do find it.] The Vulgate reads, Imitantur autem illum qui sunt ex parte illius; and Coverdale's translation renders in like manner, "And they that hold of his side do as he doth;" and so does Fulgentius, De Prædestin. ad Monimum, lib. i. but the construction before given would be more consistent and agreeable, and the relation between the two chapters more apparent, if the rendering here was, they tempt it (i. e. they solicit, they court, they draw death upon themselves), as many as are partakers of it; for the οἱ τῆς ἰδέας περὶος ὄντες, and the οἱ ἀγιοὶ τῆς ἰδέας περὶος εἶναι (i. 16), are the same sons of perdition, those over whom is ἄνθρωπος βασιλεὺς (i. 14), which is not of God's appointing, but their own seeking and procuring. The present rendering of this place is little less than tautology, for to be partakers of death, is certainly to find it. I shall only observe, that it appears, from the whole drift of these chapters, that the death which wicked men call, correspond, covenant with, and at last partake of, is all along to be understood of death eternal.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—In order to confute the false and dangerous principles maintained by the irreligious and profane scoffers in the foregoing chapter; in this is displayed the great happiness of the righteous, and the impotent malice of the wicked against them. For though God, for wise ends of his providence, permits the righteous sometimes to be afflicted, and even to die under the severity of their persecutions, yet do they not totally cease to be; but as they die in the Lord, so they still live unto, and with, God, in whose hands their souls are. But the wicked, on the contrary, though they promise themselves great happiness in their sinful courses, are miserable both here and hereafter. The chapter concludes with the praise of chastity, and the sad state and condition of adulterers and their children.

Ver. 1. The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God.] i. e. In the state of separation, the souls of the righteous that are departed, shall after death find great refreshment and comfort of their labours; and being in God's keeping, enjoy a state of the greatest happiness and security. This state of the piously deceased, the ancient Jews, according to Grotius, called Paradise, or the Garden of Pleasure; where, though they enjoyed not the consummate happiness, which they were in expectation of hereafter, yet even at present, and in their intermediate state, they had some foretaste and anticipation of their future happiness; but they held none to have this pleasing sense, but the ψυχαὶ δικαίων περιεσπομένην, such as had their souls well purified before they departed from their bodies. From this expression, "that the soul is in God's hand," we may infer, that the human soul is not only a substance distinct from the body, but that it lives after it in a state separate from it, and such a state as is susceptible of happiness or misery; for why are the souls of the righteous here said to be deposited in the hand of God, but because it denotes a place of rest and safety? where the departed souls shall not only live and survive, but live too in a manner far different from that in which they lived here, where no temptations shall be able to assault, no sin to pollute, no affliction to discompose them.

And there shall no torment touch them.] Nor are such as die in the Lord only freed from temptations and dangers, from injuries and persecutions, from diseases and death, and all other burdens of the flesh, but we may piously believe, that more is here implied than a bare freedom from evils, that they are possessed of some positive degree of happiness; that in particular, they have pleasing anticipations of their reward, and wait for it with a holy impatience; and in the mean time are in paradise, or in Abraham's bosom, or some place of rest and refreshment appointed for them by God; but with respect to the martyrs in particular, who had suffered gloriously in God's cause, it was a notion very early entertained in the primitive church, that these entered immediately upon a perfect state of happiness and glory. Or we may understand this passage, of the afflictions which the righteous may undergo in this life, that, though their torments be the most exquisite that heathen malice can invent, yet by the strength of their faith, and a sure dependence upon God, they shall overcome the reluctance of nature, and not only suffer with patience, but with joy and thanksgiving. Not that this resolution of the righteous is the effect of any stoical apathy, or that they have not flesh and blood, like other folks, to feel the force of sufferings; but it is the power of a strong faith that makes them more than conquerors. "If the souls of the martyrs were indeed in their bodies when they had trial of such a variety of sufferings, they could never (says St. Bernard) have been able to have gone through them; but while their bodies were in the hands of their persecutors, and mangled by them, their souls were in the hand of God; and the Holy Spirit, with which they were filled, kept them above all sense of pain, and rendered them quite invulnerable." And whoever reads the letter from the churches of Lyons and Vienna to those of Asia and Phrygia, wherein the exquisite sufferings of the martyrs, and their invincible constancy in the most severe trials, are described (see Euseb. Eccles. Hist. lib. i. cap. 1), will acknowledge the truth of this observation, and at the same time be convinced, that the history of their sufferings is the most complete comment upon the beginning of this chapter.

Ver. 2. In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die : This is a very happy expression, for good men rather sleep than die, their hope and well-grounded assurance changes the nature of death, and turns it into sleep. St. Chrysostom expresses himself to the same purpose, "Death is no longer to be counted death, it is only a name; nay, the very name also is gone, for Christians call it not death, but rest and sleep!" (Homil. 29. in Genes.). Accordingly, in many places both of the Old and New Testament, where the death of good men is mentioned, it is expressed by sleeping (John xi. 11; Acts vii. 60; 1 Thess. iv. 14). Hence the day, on which the blessed virgin died, is in the Greek church called κοιμησις, "her rest;" and the places where the first martyrs were buried, κοιμητήρια, or "resting places."

Ver. 3. And their going from us to be utter destruction : but they are in peace. The wicked, who are also in the former verse called the unwise (for in the book of Proverbs, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus, wickedness and folly are synonymous terms), imagine the righteous to be miserable, because, when alive, they were mortified, as to all pleasures, and when dead, extinct and annihilated, according to their opinion. To such vain reasoners, who had no notion of a life beyond this, it is here very justly replied, that the righteous are so far from being sufferers by death, that when dead they are in peace, and their happiness the greatest (see Job iii. 17, 18). And this the voice from heaven confirms, Rev. xiv. 13, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, for they rest from their labours." Instead of being objects of ridicule and contempt, the character of the righteous is rather that beautiful contrast of St. Paul's, "as deceivers and yet true, as dying and behold they live, as chastened and not killed, as sorrowful yet always rejoicing" (2 Cor. vi. 8—10).

Ver. 4. Yet is their hope full of immortality. In the midst of their misery and afflictions, they comforted themselves with the pleasing hopes of a happy resurrection to a blessed state of immortality, as the seven brethren did, 2 Macc. vii. and when, as a reward of their constancy and virtue, the saints shall be finally in possession of their happiness, and receive their μωθὸν πλήρη (2 John 8), then in another and no less proper sense of these words may it be said, ἡ ἐλπίς αὐτῶν ἀθανάσιος πλήρης, "their hope of immortality is full," i. e. fulfilled and completed.

Ver. 5. And having been a little chastised, they shall be greatly rewarded : This cannot relate to the smallness or lightness of the sufferings, which are above described so violent as to affect even the life of the righteous; but the meaning seems to be, that having suffered through the malice of their persecutors for a small space of time, with respect to eternity, those afflictions which were comparatively but for a moment, "will work for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Thus the writer to the Hebrews having described at large, ch. xi. the sufferings of the worthies mentioned there, says, that such chastening (παιδεία, the word here used), though "for the present it seemeth grievous, yet afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness to them which are exercised thereby" (xii. 11). St. Gregory observes, "that God permits the afflictions of good men, that he may draw much benefit from them : for this reason he permitted Jacob to be persecuted by Esau, and David by Saul, that the persecutions they suffered might be at once the exercise and crown of their virtue. And the reward of such suffering virtue follows in the next sentence, that God, having tried their faith and constancy, and found them worthy, is pleased finally to translate them to himself, to live with him, and with the blessed society of just men made perfect, of whom the world in their several ages was not worthy, to enjoy his beatific presence.

Ver. 7. And in the time of their visitation they shall shine. The Vulgate, which Coverdale follows, joins this to the former verse, and reads, Et in tempore erit respectus illorum, i. e. that God will in due time have a respect to, and reward, such saints and martyrs who fell a sacrifice in his service, who, like the victim in the burnt offering, were consumed in the flames, and whose souls are purified by their afflictions, and prepared for heaven, and made fit offerings for God to receive. This sense the Syriac interpreters prefer. Our version, with the Arabic, follows the Greek, καὶ ἐν καιρῷ ἐπισκοπῆς αὐτῶν ἀναλάμψουσι; which expression may be taken in two senses, either it may be understood of the afflictions and sufferings of the righteous in this life, for so ἐπισκοπῆ and ὑπὲρ ἐπισκοπῆς often signify in the LXX. particularly, Isa. x. 3. According to this acceptance, the meaning of this place is, that the righteous shall shine the brighter for their afflictions, and that God will glorify his saints in and by them. Thus God promises to such as set their love upon him, not only that he will "be with them in trouble, but that he will deliver them from it, and bring them to honour by it," Ps. xci. 15. We cannot have a more remarkable instance of the presence of God with his servants in afflictions, than in the history of the three children cast into the furnace, where the text acquaints us, that one in the form of the Son of God, probably an angel, conspicuous and distinguishable by his brightness, walked with them, and accompanied them in the very flames; and that this accident, and their miraculous deliverance from it, was the occasion of their being promoted in the province of Babylon (Dan. iii.). The sentiments of the primitive writers, upon occasion of the martyrs' sufferings, are most noble and magnificent: "A Christian (says Tertullian) never thinks himself so fine, never so illustrious, as at the stake; he is then in his triumphal chariot, going to heaven in state" (Apol. pro Christianis). Nor is what Eusebius writes less observable: "That it was a most charming sight to behold the martyrs in prison, to see how their misery became them, how they adorned their fetters, and looked as captivating in their chains, as a bride in all her glory upon the day of marriage" (Eccles. Hist. lib. v. cap. 1). Or we may understand this passage in another sense, viz. "That the righteous shall shine with glorified bodies," ἐν ἐπισκοπῇ ψυχῶν (ver. 13). For the Jews have a tradition, that the bodies of the righteous shall be clothed at the resurrection with a clothing of light, as of a pure flame. This is agreeable to the descriptions made in the Old Testament, of the just rising from their graves, "That they shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars, for ever and ever" (Dan. xii. 3). And in the New it is said, "That they shall shine as the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. xiii. 43). Hence in scripture, and particularly in the writings of St. Paul, the state and happiness of the blessed is expressed by the word glory (see also Matt. xvii. 2; Acts ix. 3; Rev. i. 14, 15).

And run to and fro like sparks among the stubble. By the stubble it is certain the wicked are meant, called also chaff, by a like metaphor, Ps. i. 5. The expression here is proverbial; and if it be understood of the righteous in this life, and of their conduct, as distinguished from the wicked, the meaning then will be the same with that of St. Paul, Phil. ii. 15, "That the sons of God," i. e. the righteous, "shine as lights in the world, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation." But if it is applied to the future state of the righteous, it seems to intimate their great swiftness in their heavenly vehicles. Our translation, it must be confessed, which renders διασπαρῶνται, by "running to and fro," conveys but a flat and low idea, the image only of a few random sparks; the sense would be more sublime and just, after this manner, "They (the saints) shall run or pass through the ranks of the wicked (discourant, says the Syriac version, justi inter impios) as fire spreads through the stubble every where uncontrolled and irresistible." Hereby probably is intimated their power over them; a farther description of which follows in the next verse.

Ver. 8. They shall judge the nations, and have dominion over the people, and their Lord shall reign for ever. Though the righteous may be said even in this life to judge the nations, i. e. to condemn the wicked, by the conspicuousness of their faith and virtue, in which sense κρίσις, is taken by the Arabic version, and is often understood so by St. Jerome, and by St. Austin, (De Civitate Dei, lib. xx. cap. 5, see also John v. 24), yet I rather incline to apply this passage to the next life, "That in the great and final judgment of the world, the saints shall be assessors with God in judging the wicked:" for it is piously thought by many learned men, that the saints, when crowned themselves by God, shall be invested with the authority of pronouncing sentence even against evil angels and wicked spirits. And it was an opinion that prevailed generally in the early times of Christianity, that at the resurrection every man should rise in order, ἕκαστος ἐν τῷ ἰδίῳ τάγματι, i. e. according to the degree of his goodness; and that they who were raised and judged first, should themselves have a part in judging those which followed (see Dan. vii. 8. 22; Matt. xix. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3; Rev. ii. 26, see note on i. 1 of this book).

Ver. 9. They that put their trust in him shall understand the truth; and such as be faithful in love shall abide with him:] i. e. Persons so qualified shall happily experience this truth in particular; or the meaning may be, that they are the fittest and most likely to attain the knowledge of divine truths in general, which is the sense of Messieurs du Port-Royal; for the author seems to point out two ways or conditions for that purpose; the first is, trust in God, or rather a distrust of a man's self, and of his own perfections and abilities, because humility is the surest way to divine knowledge; the second is, a sincere and unfeigned love of God, which displays itself in obedience and a readiness to do God's will; for an honest and well-disposed heart, free from any corrupt passions or affections, may soonest hope to receive spiritual illuminations, and the knowledge of saving truths, according to that observation of our blessed Saviour, "That if any man will do his will, he shall certainly know of his doctrine" (John vii. 17). According to the different pointing of the Greek text, the last clause of this passage of our author may be differently understood; either we may render with the margin, and the Geneva bible, "Such as be faithful shall remain with him in love;" and thus the oriental versions point the place; or, as our translators take it, "Such as be faithful in love shall abide with him;" i. e. cleave to him with so firm and unshaken a resolution, that neither tribulation nor distress, life nor death, shall separate them from him; and in this sense προμένειν τῷ κυρίῳ is taken, Acts xi. 23. The Syriac interpreters seem to understand this clause in the sense of not falling away, Qui sunt fideles, per charitatem permanebunt ipsius; quia gratiam et misericordiam electis suis impertitur.

Ver. 11. Whoso despiseth wisdom and nurture, he is miserable. This and the former verse refer to those vain reasoners, and wicked libertines, whose character is so justly drawn in ch. ii. The sentiments of this writer agree frequently, we may observe, with the book of proverbs; and this passage very much resembles that fine advice in the conclusion of the eighth chapter of that inspired writer, particularly the last two verses, where wisdom speaketh thus of herself, "Whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord; but he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul; all they that hate me love death" (see also Ps. ii. 12, in the LXX. version). St. Cyprian opens his treatise, De habitu Virginum, with an encomium of discipline too fine and remarkable to be here omitted; "Disciplina custos spei, retinaculum fidei, dux iuvenis salutaris, fomes ac nutrimentum bonæ indolis, magistra virtutis, facit in Christo manere semper, ac juxta Deo vivere, et ad promissa cœlestia et divina præmia pervenire. Hanc et sectari salubre est, et aversari ac negligere letale." Tertullian, throughout his works, is equally full of his commendation.

Ver. 12. Their wives are foolish, and their children wicked: It is obvious to observe, that the book of Proverbs not only calls wickedness in general by the name of folly, but seems to brand the sin of uncleanness, or lust, with that name more particularly. What therefore our translators here render foolish, in the marginal reading is, light, or unchaste; and the Arabic version confirms this sense, which reads, Uxores ejus procaces; and the Port-Royal comment. Les femmes sont déreglées. As to what is here observed, that the children of such parents are generally vicious and wicked; this is almost unavoidable; for, as the Apocryphal Esdras speaks, "Like as the field is, so also is the seed; and as the flowers be, such are also the colours" (2 Esd. ix. 17). This so natural and constant a resemblance shows the great duty and necessity incumbent on parents to be good and virtuous themselves, upon account of their children, and the good or evil consequences derived to them; for, according to their own conduct and behaviour, they entail either a blessing or a curse upon their children, as it follows in the next words, which the oriental versions join with great judgment to this verse.

Ver. 13. Blessed is the barren that is undefiled, which hath not known the sinful bed: This is to be understood of the barren wife, that is chaste and free from adultery, whose great commendation in scripture is, κοῖτη ἁμάρτος, Heb. xiii. 4. And though she may be reproached by some upon account of her barrenness, as was the sentiment of the Jews particularly, through their hopes and expectations of the Messiah, yet shall her virtue be recompensed by God, as far preferable to the most fruitful adultery. In vain have some popish writers endeavoured to ground upon this place, which undoubtedly relates to married persons, the order of perpetual virgins; as if that was established and approved of in the age of this writer, and known to the ancient Jews, which is certainly the invention of more modern times.—In this passage no reflection is intended against marriage, nor any preference given to a continued celibacy; the comparison is between married persons only, viz. a barren wife, and a seeming adulteress (see Chemnitzii Examen, par. iii. p. 17). Nor does this writer commend a person in general, ἥτις οὐκ ἔγνω κοῖτην, but such a chaste wife in particular who has not defiled the bed, ἐν παρανομίᾳ. I shall only observe upon the Greek reading of this passage, that the particle ὅτι which introduces it, and seems harsh and ungrammatical, is here, as it is often in the sacred writers, pleonastical (see instances of this in Blackwall's Sac. Classics, vol. i. p. 118).

She shall have fruit in the visitation of souls. Though she has not the blessing of children, and "the fruit of the womb which cometh of the Lord," yet shall she have her fruit, i. e. her recompense and reward, when hereafter she shall be crowned, and reign in glory with other pure and immaculate souls. The writer of this book probably entertained that notion, so frequent to be met with among the rabbins, and even primitive fathers, that after six thousand years there will be a glorious millenium, when the saints shall reign a thousand years upon earth; this they call dies magnus judicii, and is probably the ἐπισκοπή ψυχῶν, here referred to: in this sense the learned Mr. Mede understands this passage; as likewise ver. 7 and 8, of this chapter (see Comment. Apoclypt. lib. iii. p. 536).

Ver. 14. And (blessed is) the eunuch which with his hands hath wrought no iniquity—unto him shall be given the special gift of faith. The meaning is not, that the special gift of faith shall be given him, as our version has it, but rather that some special gift or reward shall be given him for his faithfulness; and so the Syriac interpreters render, Dabitur ei, pro ipsius gratia et fidelitate hereditas desiderii. And in this sense of faithfulness we are to understand St. Paul, when he says, "I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness," 2 Tim. iv. 7. And though eunuchs were forbidden under the law "to enter into the congregation of the Lord" (Deut. xxiii. 1), that is, were not admitted to honours and offices either in the church or commonwealth of Israel; yet the inward qualifications, and rare endowments of the soul, shall be sufficient to give such pure persons, as offend not against God by any loose action or impure thought, a title to the communion of saints, and not only take off the outward legal restraint, but give them an honourable place in the temple of the Lord, and even make them, for their victory in overcoming the flesh, pillars in it (Rev. iii. 12). The sense of this passage greatly resembles that of Isa. lvi. 4, 5, "Thus saith the Lord unto the eunuchs that keep my sabbaths, and choose the things that please me, and keep hold of my covenant; even unto them will I give in my house, and within my walls, a place and a name better than of sons and daughters."

Ver. 15. And the root of wisdom shall never full away. i. e. Of chastity, which is the subject of the foregoing verses; and so the Syriac version understands it, Radices castitatis non evellentur. The sense of the whole verse is, that every good work will be attended with a reward; and thus the Arabic version, Bonorum enim operum eximius ac pulcherrimus est fructus; and that chastity in particular, which is a glorious victory over ourselves, hath this pleasing prospect and comfort in reversion, that many blessings and privileges will descend from God upon the branches of a chaste and holy stock; and that the virtue and goodness of parents is a security and treasure to their posterity. We may observe, that as in the book of Proverbs, the adulterer is described to be a man void of understanding (vi. 32), so this writer makes chastity to proceed from wisdom; and this possibly St. Paul might intend, Rom. xii. 3, when he advises φρονεῖν ὡς τὸ σωφρονεῖν, which St. Jerome renders, Sapere ad pudicitiam (Cont. Jov.).

Ver. 16. As for the children of adulterers, they shall not come to their perfection, and the seed of an unrighteous bed shall be rooted out. Τεκνὰ πορνῶν ἀτέλεια ἔσονται, which we may understand in two senses; either that a bastard shall not be partaker of holy things, i. e. shall not be admitted to officiate in the sacred mysteries, nor to hold public dignities, according to the marginal reading, and the Geneva version; and so the sense will be the same with that in Deut. xxiii. 2, "A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even unto the tenth generation." And indeed some lawgivers anciently fixed such a mark of infamy upon bastards, as to forbid their coming to the sacred offices: even the heathens themselves excluded bastards, as well as the profane and wicked, from the participation of their mysteries; and according to the old ecclesiastical laws, bastards were not capable to be ordained without a dispensation (see Watson's Compl. Incum. p. 102). That ἀτελής will admit this sense, see Hesychius, and Leigh's Critica Sacra, in voice; and thus it is sometimes understood by the ancient Greek fathers.—Or we may understand the place, with our translators, of the short and uncertain continuance of such a spurious offspring upon whom God may visit the iniquity of their fathers. And indeed we meet with in the scripture a most remarkable instance of the divine vengeance in this particular, viz. that the darling offspring of David's guilt was smote by God, and perished quickly from before his eyes; and God gives this very reason for it, "Because thou hast done this thing, the child that is born unto thee shall surely die" (2 Sam. xii. 14).

Ver. 18. If they die quickly, they have no hope, neither comfort in the day of trial. Some learned men have thought (see Usher's Body of Divinity, p. 16), that what is said here, and in the context, is a hard and uncharitable sentence upon bastards, whose very birth and entrance into the world, though it be indeed by a crime of their parents, yet themselves may be thought guiltless, and, as such, undeserving of punishment: but the observation of this writer will be less liable to exception, if we consider, that there is often a natural and hereditary taint in wicked and debauched families, and that some particular sins run as it were in the blood, the seeds of future wickedness. Hence holy Job, speaking of such wicked parents, says in very strong and significant terms, that they lay or "treasure up iniquity for their children" (xxi. 19), which natural propensity and vicious turn of temper God foreseeing, sometimes has recourse to extremities to stop the infection, and hinder the spreading guilt. Though viciously disposed children more generally hasten their own death by irregularity and loose living; or if by chance they live long, like the wanton elders that tempted Susanna, being grown old in wickedness, they lose all the respect and reverence otherwise paid to gray hairs. And when they come to die, their case, like that of other wicked men, is most desperate; nor will they have any thing to allege in their favour in the great day of inquiry, δαιμόσιος. Thus the psalmist, describing the end of the wicked, says, "The ungodly shall not be able to stand in the judgment," Ps. i. 6, where the LXX. read, οὐκ ἀναστήσουσι οἱ ἀσεβεῖς ἐν κρίσει, which has been unaccountably perverted in favour of the opinion, that there shall be only a resurrection of the just. But that passage of the son of Sirach, Eccles. xli. 9, comes nearest the sense of this writer. "Woe he unto you, ungodly men; if ye be born, ye shall be born to a curse; and if ye die, a curse shall be your portion."

Ver. 19. Horrible is the end of the unrighteous generation. Calmet very properly observes (see Comment. in loc.) that what is said in this and the following chapter, of the sad prospect and miserable fate of the children of adulteries, ought not to be understood as spoken absolutely by this writer, but only of such as, being abandoned and debauched themselves, imitate and follow the vicious courses of their parents; for otherwise, the crimes of their ancestors cannot be imputed to them in the judgment of God, nor will they be answerable for them before his tribunal: for it is very possible that children thus born in sin, and from a criminal and forbidden commerce, may yet prove virtuous and regular in themselves; and that the children of even good men and saints may be lewd and vicious; as was the case of old Eli's children in particular, who made the Lord's people to transgress through their scandalous uncleanness (1 Sam. ii. 22).

CHAP. IV.

ARGUMENT.—In this chapter the author pursues the same subject with which he concluded the former, and shows how much happier upon the comparison chaste and virtuous persons are, though without children, than adulterers and the brood of a sinful and polluted bed: that the former, if they enjoy long life, as they generally do, are in a state of peace and security; and if taken away by an early and untimely death, it is an instance of mercy to them, that they may escape thereby some imminent danger or approaching evil. But the life of the vicious and debauched is, on the contrary, both short and unhappy; their death is dishonourable, their hope desperate, and their future estate full of misery and torment.

Ver. 1. Better it is to have no children, and to have virtue: for the memorial thereof is immortal: because it is known with God, and with men. The Vulgate reads, O quam pulchra est casta generatio cum claritate! which is not a just translation of the original words, κρίσιον ἀρεκία μετ' ἀρετῆς; for ἀρεκία is very improperly rendered by generatio; and then it seems, as does our version, either to confine chastity to celibacy, or to such as, being married, have no children; as if virtue and fruitfulness were incompatible.

Whereas the true meaning is, that though a person hath no children, and seeks not any by acts of incontinence, or unlawful mixtures, his virtue supplies what is wanting to him in that respect, and his good actions shall be like children to him, and hinder his name from being lost in oblivion. Such a virtue as can withstand a criminal passion, and is proof against all the dangerous temptations of it, is approved by God, and will be finally rewarded by him, and cannot fail of being respected and well spoken of by the valuable part of mankind. And however the libertine may pride himself in his spurious issue, and the adulteress value herself on the fruit of her womb, yet incontinence will always differ from barrenness, as a crime does from a misfortune.

Ver. 2. When it is present, men take example at it; This observation is not true of men in general, that they have an esteem for virtue; for with respect to very many of the species, that reflection of Horace is still too true, "Virtutem incolumem odimus." The meaning therefore must be, that good men esteem, admire, and follow after, virtue; that they will make virtuous men, while they live, the patterns for their imitation; and honour their memory when they are dead.—And even wicked men have been known to regret the loss of good men, and to lament and even pity their suffering fate. Thus Antiochus Epiphanes wept for the death of Onias the high priest (2 Macc. iv. 37), and the Athenians for that of Socrates, though they occasioned it.

It weareth a crown, and triumpheth for ever. Ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι στεφανηφόρος ποιεῖται, οὐ στεφανὸν φόρος ποιεῖται. Junius understands αἰῶν of the present world, and renders, In sæculo hoc triumphat; i. e. that virtue, through a consciousness of having done its duty, through hope anticipates, even in this life, its future reward, and by faith triumphs, as already sure of a crown. And indeed the Syriac and Arabic versions confirm this conjecture, both of which render, In hoc sæculo. There is a manifest allusion in this verse to the Olympic games, and the crowning of the conquerors therein; for in the original the following technical terms are worth noting, viz. στεφανηφόρεῖν, ποιεῖται, ἀδλῶν, ἀγῶν. From whence the learned, among other reasons, infer, that this book was not written by Solomon, who was dead above two hundred years before the first Olympiad (see Usher's Annals).

Having gotten the victory, striving for undefiled rewards. The sense of these words, as they stand in our translation, seems obvious enough, and is not much unlike that of Horace; "Virtus repulsa nescit sordide, Intaminatis fulget honoribus" (Carm. lib. iii. od. 2); but it does not agree with any of the ancient versions. The Vulgate reads, Incoquinatorum certaminum præmium vincens; St. Cyprian yet more obscurely, Incoquinatorum certaminum præmium vincens; and the Greek, τὸν τῶν ἀμιάντων ἀδλῶν ἀγῶνα νικήσασα. The expression in each of these passages is very unusual and singular; with respect to the first, a conqueror that receives the reward of his services, is not properly said, vincere præmium certaminum, but reportare præmium, or something to that effect; but the next, certaminum præmium vincens, which is the rendering of St. Cyprian (De Singularitate Cleri) and of the Greek, has still less authority to justify it; vincere prælio is classical, but vincere præmium certaminum, I believe, is quite without precedent. Nor is ἀμιάντων ἀδλῶν without its difficulties and objections. If I might be indulged the liberty of proposing a very small alteration, I would read the passage thus, ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι στεφανηφόρος ποιεῖται, τὸ τῶν ἀμιάντων ἀδλῶν, ἀγῶνα νικήσασα; where by ἀδλῶν, I would understand the reward of the contest, and not the contest itself; and by ἀμιάντων, those that had merited this crown or reward by being undefiled. And I have the pleasure to find this conjecture confirmed by the Syriac version, which renders, Præbet se victicem agonis eorum qui sine macula sunt, applying it manifestly to the persons, to the agoniceta himself, and not to contests, or the nature of their rewards. Calmet's comment is likewise to the same effect, and that of Messieurs du Port Royal still more explicit; Elle triomphe et elle est couronnée comme victorieuse, après avoir remporté le prix dans les combats pour la chasteté.

Ver. 3. The multiplying brood of the ungodly shall not thrive, nor take deep rooting from bastard slips. Ἐκ νόθων μοσχευμάτων: probably the true reading may be μοσχεύματα, slips from spurious trees, i. e. without a metaphor, children begotten of unlawful beds, as it follows in ver. 6, the sense, as well as ἐπιφαλῶς βεβηκότα, seems to require this. And this reading is confirmed by Coverdale's version, which renders; "And the things that are planted with whoredom, shall take no deep root, nor lay any fast foundation." And it has been observed in the vegetable world, that slips from such irregular productions do not thrive to any purpose. The book of Job describes the generation of the wicked in like terms: "This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage of oppressors which they receive of the Almighty: if his children be multiplied, it is for the sword; and his offspring shall not be satisfied with bread: those that remain of him shall be buried in death, and his widow shall not weep" (xxvii. 13—15). The description in this and the following verses is agreeable to the scripture dialect, where mankind in general is often represented under the metaphor of trees, or a plantation (see Ps. l. 3; xcii. 12, &c.). According to the Hebrew style, a bough or branch often denotes a son; the word ben, or son, nearly according with banna, which signifies the root; see Gen. xlix. 22, where the Hebrew word banoth, which we translate branches, literally signifies daughters. In like manner we find the wicked in particular compared to unpromising plants, or withered and decayed trees: thus St. Jude, speaking of such libertines as defile the flesh, emphatically describes them as "trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the root" (ver. 12). The sense of this passage is briefly this, That God will visit the posterity of such loose and debauched persons, and that even their children shall not continue for any long time, but "as plants which God hath not planted, shall be rooted up." Besides the instance before given of David's child struck with death, St. Austin's account of his is very particular; he ingenuously acknowledges that he had a son "carnaliter ex se natum de peccato suo," but that God quickly deprived him of the child, though one of very promising hopes; "Annorum erat lere quidecim, et ingenio praveniebat multos graves et doctos viros" (Confess. lib. ix. cap. 6).

Ver. 4. For though they flourish in branches for a time; yet standing not fast; they shall be shaken with the wind. i. e. Though they equal or even overtop, the prosperity of the good and virtuous, yet having laid their foundation in wickedness, they shall be overthrown by calamities; like a tree that has taken no deep root in the earth, and is violently shaken with storms and tempests: to which agrees that observation of the psalmist; "When all the workers of wickedness do flourish, then shall they be destroyed for ever;" i. e. they are then hastening the more to their excision, their flourishing being in order to their destruction, ὅπως ἂν ἐξολοθρευθῶσιν, say the LXX. Ps. xcii. 7. But the righteous are compared to the immovable cedars in Libanus, ver. 12, according to that of Solomon, "A man shall not be established by wickedness, but the root of the righteous shall not be moved," Prov. xii. 13. See also Ecclus. xl. 15, where the children of the ungodly are called, "unelean roots upon a hard rock."

Ver. 5. Their fruit unprofitable. i. e. Ὁ καρπὸς αὐτῶν ἀχρηστός. This adjective, though it has indeed this signification of unprofitable, yet it means rather here insuavis; i. e. that the fruit is unpleasant, not of a kindly sort, and has not the right taste or flavour, as fruit will always be that comes from a tree which is wrongly planted, either in a soil that is not proper for it, or where it wants its natural sun, or when the ground is too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry, too sour or too stubborn.

Ver. 6. For the children begotten of unlawful beds are witnesses of wickedness against their parents in their trial. i. e. Ἐκ γὰρ ἀνόμων ἱστανόμενα τέκνα γεννώμενα. Ἵππος here does neither mean bed, as our translators render, nor sleep, as the margin and Vulgate have it; it rather means concubitus, in which sense it occurs, vii. 2, and accordingly the Syriac interpreters render, Liberi ex illegitimo congressu procreati; who, being monuments of their parents' guilt, are a perpetual brand while they live, of infamy upon them. Agreeably to the sentiments in this and the foregoing verses is that description of the adulteress, and the punishment of her unlawful offspring, Ecclus. xxiii. 25, 26. "Her children shall not take root, and her branches shall bring forth no fruit; she shall leave her memory to be cursed, and her reproach shall not be blotted out:" but the reproach does not terminate in the parent only: the children likewise, according to the sense and opinion of the world, are partakers of the shame, according to that farther observation of the same wise writer; "The inheritance of sinners' children shall perish, and their posterity shall have a perpetual reproach: for the children will complain of an ungodly father, because they shall be reproached for his sake" (Ecclus. xli. 6, 7): but such illegitimate children being here mentioned, "as witnesses of wickedness against their parents in their trial," which Calnet understands to be the same with ἡμέτερά διαγνώσκεις, iii. 18. I am inclined to think there is this farther meaning in the words, viz. that such children will be accusers of, and witnesses against, their guilty parents in the other world. And thus the Geneva bible expressly reads, which is confirmed by the Arabic version, which renders in the future, Testes erunt nequitie parentum suorum, cum explorabuntur.

Ver. 7. Though the righteous be prevented with death, yet shall he be in peace. That the righteous are often snatched away before they arrive at any maturity of age, is evident from observation. This is frequently the effect of God's goodness, which removes them from the evils or dangers of life; but in what time or manner soever they depart, their death ought not to be considered as a personal misfortune, since God fixes them in a place of rest and repose, free from the temptations, as well as troubles and inquietudes of life, waiting with a holy impatience for farther degrees of happiness. The prophet Isaiah has the same reflection, "That righteous and merciful men are taken away from the evil to come, and shall enter into peace" (lvii. 1). And one of the ancients has made the like observation, "That he that is a favourite of the gods dies young;" ὃν φιλοῦσι ἀποδύησκει νέος. By the righteous being "prevented with death," we are not to understand his being surprised by death when he least thought of it; for the good man can never, properly speaking, be surprised; he is always on the watch, prepared and ready to leave the world and appear before God; his death may be indeed sudden or hasty, but not careless or unguarded.

Ver. 9. But wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age. Ἡλικία γῆρας. Our translators seem not to have expressed ἡλικία at all in their version, which yet has a strong and significant meaning here, viz. That an unspotted life is mature old age, or the standard of old age. Fulgentius quotes this and the preceding verse, and adds most excellently by way of comment, "Ad eognoscendum, quantum possibile est, ejuslibet defuncti meritum, non quantum vixerit, sed qualiter quisque vixerit intuemum. Sicut enim vita mala, quanto magis fuerit temporaliter prolongata, tanto magis delinquentibus multiplicat poenam; sic in vita bona, quamvis hic brevi tempore terminata, magnum sempiternamque conquirat bene viventibus gloriam. Vita igitur mala immaturos aeternosque senes demergit in Tartarum, vita vero bona defunetos juvenes maturos perducit ad Regnum" (De Statu Viduali, epist. 2). Philo observes of their great legislator Moses, τοὺς ἡλικία προήκουτας, &c. "Ut provocetis aetate appellat juvenes et eos qui nondum senuerunt seniores, non respiciens annorum numerum, aut tempus breve longumve, sed potentius animæ, prout movetur melius aut deterius" (De Resipisc. Noe, et de Vita Contempl.). Agreeably to this the Romans styled their chief council Senatus, and the Lacedæmonians called theirs γερουσία, not so much upon account of their age, as the wisdom and prudence of those that composed it; in like manner presbyters, in ecclesiastical history, had their name assigned them on the same account. There is hardly any subject on which the sages have moralized more finely than on this; honeste acta ætas is, in the opinion of one of them, the surest way to lengthen our lives, and frustrate the malice of mortality. Cicero has many beautiful sentiments upon this occasion; particularly in his book De Senectute, in the eighteenth chapter, there is a thought which is very like what is contained in this and the foregoing verse; "Non cani, non rugæ repente auctoritatem arripere possunt, sed honeste acta ætas superior fractus capit auctoritatis extremos." And so the poet:—

"Ampliat ætatis spatium sibi vir bonus; hoc est Vivere bis, vita posse priore frui."

But no reflection of the ancients is more judicious, than that of a learned modern: "Gray hairs (says he) consist not in the multitude of years, but in the number and variety of useful observations that are made; nor is there any reason why wisdom should be peculiarly ascribed to the aged, except such persons, by having lived longer in the world, and having had the opportunity of many and various occurrences to ripen their judgment, have accordingly improved it; for it matters not much, whether a man makes his observations in a longer or a less time, provided he makes them well" (Boyle's Occasional Reflections).

Ver. 10. So that, living amongst sinners, he was translated. This passage is undoubtedly to be understood of Enoch, whom, being the first example of eminent sanctity, God was pleased to translate, as he had condemned the first instance of transgression, to show his great detestation of sin. The great question is, whether these words signify a natural death, or a miraculous translation, as that of Elijah was; from some expressions in the context many learned men have been inclined to conjecture that the author of this book thought Enoch died a natural death, and that his translation here mentioned, was only such a translation: one reason in particular, that has induced them to think an ordinary death is here spoken of, is, that the holy scripture often uses the like expressions to signify death. See 1 Kings xix. 4; Jonah iv. 3, and particularly Job xxii. 16, where the Vulgate renders, qui sublatus sunt ante tempus, though the writer is speaking of such as die a sudden death. And it must be confessed, that the Hebrew phrase in all these passages is the same with that which Moses makes use of to express the translation of Enoch; and from hence some have inferred, that even Moses' words, Gen. v. 24, may be understood of a natural death, and do not necessarily imply a miraculous translation. But the reasons and arguments for a miraculous translation seem to carry with them much greater weight; for, first, though the text of Moses above mentioned does not absolutely imply the miraculous translation of a man yet living into heaven or another world; nevertheless, when we compare what he says of Enoch with what he relates of the other patriarchs, it is plain he intended to distinguish the manner in which Enoch went out of the world from that in which the other patriarchs left it; for of all the rest mentioned in that chapter it is said, they died, but of Enoch this is not said, but only that "he was not, οὐκ εὐρίσκειτο, was not found on earth," because God had translated him from it. Farther, Moses takes notice of the eminent probity of Enoch's life, which made him well-pleasing to God, as this writer does here, and then immediately adds, according to the Vulgate, Et non apparuit, quia tulit eum Deus; implying, that though he was no more seen upon earth, yet he was still alive. This is the sense which the Chaldee-paraphrase takes it in, which renders expressly, Subductus est, et ascendit in cælum coram Domino. Again, it is said of Noah and of Abraham, that "they walked with God," Gen. vi. 9; xvii. 1, but it is not said, that "they were not, because God took them." This phrase therefore must import something that happened peculiarly to him. Secondly, The holy penman, 2 Kings ii. 3. 5. 9, giving an account of Elijah's translation, which was confessedly miraculous, uses the very same word, viz. taken away, several times to express it by. Thirdly, the son of Sirach seems most favourable to Enoch's being translated alive, Ecclus. xlv. 16, where, to avoid any equivocalness, the Vulgate reads, Translatatus est in paradysum, a term not commonly made use of to express the ordinary death of a man. But, fourthly, The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, xi. 5, puts this matter beyond all dispute, and understands it clearly of a miraculous translation; "By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death." Lastly, Many of the fathers expressly assert a miraculous translation: the author of the Recognitions, bearing the name of St. Clement, says, "Enoch having pleased God, was translated into immortality." And St. Cyprian, "That he deserved to be taken from the contagion of this world by a singular favour" (De Mortal.). St. Jerome yet more fully, "That he was translated into heaven, and fed with celestial bread" (Epist. 38, ad Panmach. See Calmet's Dissertation more at large).

Ver. 12. For the bewitching of naughtiness doth obscure things that are honest; and the wandering of concupiscence doth undermine the simple mind. This seems to refer to the corruptions introduced by Cain and his descendants, by which the holy seed by degrees fell off, and became infected. Calmet observes that there is a particular beauty in the word βασκανία, here rendered bewitching, and that it is with the greatest propriety applied to sinful pleasures; for as there is a sort of magic or fascination which imposes upon men's eyes and makes them see false appearances, and obscures what is real; so a like fatal mistake, arising from the blindness of men's understandings, or the perverseness of their wills, makes them fancy there is truth and reality in false and imaginary pleasures, and tempts them to overlook the real danger that attends them. Nor is this true only of pleasures in general, but applicable in a more particular manner to the sweets of love or amorous delights; I have therefore sometimes fancied φιλότητος to be the true reading, which seems warranted by what follows. The like observation we may make upon μεμβασμός, which the Vulgate renders, inconstancia concupiscentiæ: and the lexicographers, who refer to this place, no less imperfectly, occupatio mentis. The meaning is, that a continual round or circle of criminal pleasures turns people's heads; for so μεμβασμός properly signifies, and transforms things and persons in other natures, like Circe's enchantments; for so μεταλλασίαι may be interpreted, which probably too is a technical term. Dr. Grabe thinks the verb μεταλλοῦω would be more agreeable to this place, and likewise more proper in ch. xvi. 25 (see Prolegom. cap. 4. tom. ult.). The sense of this whole verse is not improperly expressed by those words of Tully; "Impedit consilium voluptas, rationi inimica est, ac mentis, ut dicam, præstringit oculos, nec habet ullum cum virtute commercium" (De Senectute, cap. 12).

Ver. 13, He, being made perfect in a short time, fulfilled a long time: It may be asked, with what propriety Enoch is here said to have fulfilled a long time, since he was the shortest-lived of the patriarchs before the flood, and lived but three hundred and sixty-five years? To this the answer is very obvious, "If we measure not his life by the number of years, but by the perfection of his goodness, ἐκ ἁπλῆς ἀρετῆς τελειώσων, by his consummate virtue and extraordinary sanctity in the corrupt age he lived in, he may be allowed, to all useful purposes of living, to have fulfilled an honourable age" (Euseb. Præp. Evang. lib. vii. cap. 8). So of Abraham it is said, Gen. xxv. 8, that "he died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years;" expressions exaggerated on purpose to denote an extraordinary length of life. But here again it may be as justly inquired, how Abraham can properly be said to die in "a good old age;" when if we compare his age with those that lived before him, it comes much short of theirs; for one hundred seventy-five years may be considered as a small point of time, with respect to those several hundreds of years that the fathers before the flood arrived at (see Gen. v.); and in the computation of the lives of the fathers after the flood (Gen. xi.), we find all of them, except one, to be older than Abraham was. The true answer therefore to this difficulty is, that Abraham died in a good old age, not as to the measure of his life by days or years, but in regard to the great progress he had made in faith and holiness.

Ver. 15. Neither laid they up in their minds, That his grace and mercy is with his saints, and that he hath respect unto his chosen. Ἐπισκοπή, though it often signifies visitation by punishment, yet here means that favour and regard which God shows to his elect: and the sense of the whole passage is, that the wicked, among whom Enoch conversed, considered not the true reason for which God took him, that it was an act of mercy, rather than severity, to remove a saint, "whose righteous soul was vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked," to a state of purity, perfection, and happiness: much less did they consider that he was taken up alive into heaven, to be an example of that happiness which God has prepared for those who walk with him and please him; and also a proof, that our bodies are capable of immortality. Nor did they make any use or improvement of his translation, though it certainly was the noblest exhortation to piety and virtue that can be imagined. The construction of the Greek in the former part of this verse is singular, λαὸν ἰδόντων is a more usual way of expression.

Ver. 16. Thus the righteous that is dead shall condemn the ungodly which are living: Our version and the commentators understand this in the future tense, following the present accenting of the Greek; but the Vulgate reads the passage in the present tense, Condemnat autem justus mortuus vivos impios, which all the ancient English versions follow; Junius also and Calmet render in like manner; so that probably the original reading, at least of some copies, was κατακρίνει. If we follow this reading, the passage may relate to any righteous person speedily taken away, whose good life condemns or leaves without excuse the wicked that outlive him, and grow old in their wickedness: or it may relate to Enoch in particular, who may be said to condemn his contemporaries, either virtually by his word and doctrine, or judicially, by denouncing God's judgments against the ungodly of his time (see the same expression applied to Noah upon a like occasion, Heb. xi. 7.)

A youth that is soon perfected the many years and old age of the unrighteous. This is what the prophet Isaiah means, when he says (lxv. 20), "That the child that has an early sense of goodness and perfects holiness betimes, shall die a hundred years old; but the sinner, being a hundred years old and confirmed in wickedness, shall die as an overgrown child and be accursed."

Ver. 17. And shall not understand—to what end the Lord hath set him in safety. The wicked triumph over a godly man suddenly snatched away, as if God had forgotten to be gracious, and was unmindful of his piety, or was induced through some secret fault to cut his life short, not considering, for such have not a knowledge of God or his councils, that it was in mercy to him, and for his greater safety and reward. This is assigned by learned men as the reason why Lazarus is mentioned, Luke xvi. as dying before the rich man—because God graciously removed him from the evils of life, but continued the profligate in order to his repentance, or to fill up the measure of his iniquity.

Ver. 18. They shall see him, and despise him; but God shall laugh them to scorn.] Grotius says, that the future is used in this description for the præteritum, and calls it a Hebraism; though it is certain that such changes are not unusual in the best classic writers. The repetition, "they shall see him," is beautiful, upon the supposition of this book being metrical; and is otherwise very defensible, especially as supported by the authority of all the editions; I should else have thought ὁκώσονται the true reading which seems to make the opposition in the words following more beautiful; and so small an alteration might easily be occasioned by the nearness and affinity of the sound.

And they shall hereafter be a vile carcass.] ἔσονται πῦρ τοῦτο εἰς πῶμα ἄριμον. Can all the wicked before referred to with propriety be said to be "a vile carcass," or to compose "one vile carcass?" and is not this sense in some measure comprised in the sentence following? possibly καυθήσονται may be the true reading here, which opens a new sense, and yet proper to the occasion, viz. that they shall be confounded and fall shamefully; which signification πῶμα will equally admit of; and it is certain, that εἰς is frequently to be understood in the sense of in: and I have the satisfaction to find this conjecture confirmed by the authority of the Vulgate, which reads, Erunt posthac decedentes sine honore; and by the Syriac version, Erunt posthac in ruinam turpissimam. Junius also is to the same purpose; and to these agrees the Geneva bible, which renders, "They shall fall hereafter without honour."

And a reproach among the dead for evermore.] Εἰς ὕβριν ἐν νεκροῖς δὲ αἰῶνος. This expression may seem to relate to the everlasting disgrace of wicked men in infernis, that, like the giants of old, they shall stand upon a lasting record there; but it is more probable, it should be taken in a more limited confined sense, for the phrase νεκροῖς αἰῶνος, or δὲ αἰῶνος, is a Hebraism, and may receive some light from Lam. iii. 6, where the prophet, complaining of his terrible situation in his dungeon, says, "He has made me stay in dark places," ὡς νεκροῖς αἰῶνος, veluti mortuorum sæculi, "as those that have been long dead," as those that lie buried in their graves. And that the term evermore, does not here mean eternity, strictly so called, seems the more probable from the order of the description, because the judgment, or day of accounts, is mentioned after, ver. 20.

Ver. 19. For he shall rend them, and cast them down headlong, that they shall be speechless. &c.] ῤίξει αὐτοὺς ἀψύχους πρηνεῖς. Calmet observes, that the author here has expressed in three words three different punishments; ῤίξει implies, that God shall beat or dash them against the ground; and the other two probably allude to a more infamous kind of death, viz. that they shall be strangled, and suffocated, and burst asunder. And thus πρηνεῖς is used, Acts i. 18, in the description of Judas' death (see Wall's Critical Notes in loc. and Hammond). Osiander thinks ἀψύχους the true reading, rather than ἀψύχους (see his observations on the Vulgate), but he assigns no reason, and is supported by no authority of MSS. The description of the punishment here is not unlike that supposed to be inflicted upon the Rephaim of old, to whom Enoch in his prophecy refers; and possibly such wicked ones as resembled them in their proud and blasphemous speeches and notorious acts of violence and oppression, are here meant: for can there be a proper punishment for a γίγαντιώδης θυμὸς (for so the son of Sirach calls a proud and defying temper), than what is here described to be its fate; or can pride and insolence be represented under stronger circumstances of meanness and disgrace? The opposition is too beautiful in what follows not to be taken notice of: for, were they swollen with pride? the Almighty shall burst them. Disrumpet illos inflatos, says the Vulgate. Did they aspire against heaven? they shall be "cast down headlong." Did they use great swelling words and threats of defiance? they shall be speechless. Did they pride themselves in works of greatness, and trust in their strong holds of security? they shall be "shaken from their foundations" and become desolate. Did they love noise and disturbance, and was their name terrible upon earth? they shall "come no more into remembrance, but their memorial shall perish with them." Were they such desperate and bold wretches, as to set every thing at defiance? they shall be afraid even of their own consciences. Did they finally ridicule God and his justice? they shall tremble at the apprehension of their sad punishment.

CHAP. V.

ARGUMENT.—To show the great difference in point of happiness, between the virtuous and the wicked, the latter are introduced as groaning under inexpressible misery, and lamenting before the tribunal of God their former ill courses, and the sad consequences of them. From hence the writer takes occasion to show, that the vengeance of God always pursues sinners, either immediately from himself, or by the agency of second causes, his appointed instruments and executioners. Calmet thinks the first six chapters may be considered as a sort of preface to the rest of this work.

Ver. 1. Then shall the righteous man stand in great boldness before the face of such as have afflicted him.] At the end of the former chapter, the wicked are represented as trembling under a sense of their guilt and the apprehension of punishment due to it: here, by the way of antithesis, is shown the holy confidence and sweet security which will arise in the breast of every good man in the day of trial, from the justice of his cause and the testimony and approbation of his conscience. Thus παρρησία is used in many places in the New Testament; see particularly 1 John ii. 28, and iv. 17, where the righteous man is said "to have boldness in the day of judgment."

And made no account of his labours.] We may understand this of such as laughed at the good man's deeds as fruitless, or endeavoured to make them so by their opposition: but St. Austin, and others of the fathers, understand this passage of such oppressors as, by violence, spoiled the righteous man's goods, which he had acquired by his honest labours. Thus St. Cyprian, diriperunt labores eorum (Testim. lib. iii. ad Quirin. cap. 16). And the Vulgate renders accordingly, abstulerunt labores eorum, which Coverdale and the Geneva bible follow. Calmet explains the passage in both these senses.

Ver. 2. When they see it they shall be troubled with terrible fear.] The Syriac and Arabic versions read, him. The sense is, The wicked shall be confounded at the sight of him whom they have so much abused, and shall behold with amazement the sudden and wonderful turn of providence in favour of the righteous, beyond what they expected or thought of; and from the happiness conferred upon the righteous, shall conclude and anticipate their own misery. To give the more lively impression of this, the author represents them both as standing together before the judgment-seat of God, and as witnesses of each other's happiness or misery. The circumstances of the surprise upon the signal deliverance of the righteous, are very justly here preserved; and the consternation and despair of the wicked, from the killing reflection of a too late and fruitless repentance, are no less beautifully described, with all the terror and exaggeration of expression. For it will be no small torment to the wicked, to see those, whom they most despised for their great advances in piety and goodness, very highly advanced in honour by God, and rewarded by him as his faithful servants; envy at others' happiness, and despair of their own, will render them completely miserable. This is finely represented in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus.

Ver. 3. And they repenting and groaning for anguish of spirit shall say within themselves, This was he, whom we had sometime in derision, and a proverb of reproach.] The προσπορεία here is very natural, and may be considered either as a soliloquy in each repenting sinner's breast, or as a joint reflection made by them all, and a set discourse which they had one to another. The Greek will admit of either sense, but Calmet thinks the latter most agreeable to the context. It is very observable, that there are three words in this verse to express the same thing, viz. γέλωτος, παράβολῃ, ὀνειδισμός, which are designed to denote an excess of abuse and rudeness; but that in Ps. xlv. 14, 15, is still more remarkable, where David uses five synonymous terms upon the like occasion; ἔδον ἡμᾶς, ὀνειδὸς τοῖς γείτοσιν ἡμῶν, μυκτηρισμὸν καὶ καταγέλωτα τοῖς κίχλω ἡμῶν, ἔδον ἡμᾶς εἰς παράβολῃν ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσι, κίνησιν κεφαλῇς ἐν τοῖς λαοῖς. The confession of these scoffers may be applied to all others of the like turn and denomination; for it has been the unhappy fate of good men in all ages, to be thus ridiculed by libertines. It was the observation of Job long since, that "the just upright is laughed to scorn" (xii. 4). And with respect to himself, he complains particularly, that "he was made a by-word of the people;" and "before them," as the margin reads, "he was as a tabret" (xvii. 6), i. e. for them to make sport with (see Mercer in loc.): which is no improbable interpretation of the place, the LXX. rendering it by γέλωτος.

Ver. 4. We fools accounted his life madness.] Religious men, and such as retire from the world for the opportunity of a greater piety, are often represented by debauchees as melancholy and disordered; but in the end, such libertines as abuse the world will be found to be the only fools, and religion acknowledged to be the truest wisdom. The like reflection was thrown upon such of the primitive Christians as were dead to the world; they were looked upon as senseless, for despising the pleasures that courted them, and foolishly credulous, for trusting to invisible rewards: "Let fools and idiots (says Celsus in his sneering way) come to the Christian mysteries, for such are the most agreeable disciples to the God they worship" (Origen cont. Cels. lib. iii.). Nor did our Saviour himself escape the censure of "having a devil, and being mad" (John x. 20). So certain an attendant upon extraordinary sanctity is obloquy and reproach. There is, seemingly, the like reflection on him, Mark iii. 21, and even uttered by his own friends, as our translation has faultily rendered it: for, as the learned now generally agree in interpreting the place, ἔξιστον does not relate to our blessed Saviour, but to the clamorous multitude, whose behaviour often gives just occasion for such a suspicion.

Ver. 5. How is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the saints? How different are the cool reflections of an unbodied spirit, from the wild sallies of a heated fancy; and how do the sentiments of the same persons vary, considered in this different light! The very same scoffers, who rallied the just man upon his glorious title of "the Son of God," ii. 18, at length confess the truth of what he said; they perceived the invaluable privileges of such a relation in the next life, and that the true inheritance of the sons of God is among his glorified saints: ἐν ἀγίοις ὁ κληρος αὐτοῦ. See Dan. xii. 13, where the angel tells him that "he shall rest in a happy condition, and stand in his lot at the end of the days;" i. e. in the resurrection of the just; which the LXX. render, ἀναστήσει εἰς τὸν κληρὸν σου. The phrase alludes to the division of the land of Canaan (a type of heaven) among the twelve tribes by lot.

Ver. 6. And the sun of righteousness rose not upon us. Coverdale's and the other English versions read in like manner, following the Vulgate; but all the Greek copies omit the words "of righteousness," and so likewise do several of the fathers, when they quote this passage (see particularly St. Gregory, lib. xxiv. Moral. cap. 6. St. Ambr. Serm. 3. 16, and St. Cyprian in many places). The Syriac and Arabic versions likewise omit them. They seem either to have been put in the margin by way of explanation, and to have crept from thence into the text, or else to have been added from the former sentence, for they are neither in the Alexandrian, nor any other copy.

Ver. 7. We wearied ourselves in the way of wickedness and destruction. One cannot help observing, at first sight, how closely wickedness and destruction are here linked together, and that one seems to follow naturally at the heels of the other: nor is sin, however represented to be all pleasure, without its drudgery. The prophet expresses himself like this writer, "They weary themselves to work iniquity," ix. 5 (see also Hab. ii. 13). It is a very pretty observation of a very learned writer, that the Greek word πονηρία which signifies "wickedness," comes from another that signifies labour, viz. πόνος (Sanderson's Sermons. p. 596). And it is not without great elegance and particular good reason, that the lusts and practices of sinners are so frequently in scripture styled works, and sinners emphatically called "workers of iniquity," and said "to work wickedness;" expressions all implying the toil and drudgery of wicked courses. St. Chrysostom is very copious on this subject, and shows, both from scripture and reason, that the life of a wicked man has more real weariness and slavery, than all the mortifications and severity of a godly life. And this truth the wicked here confess, though too late, ambulavimus vias difficiles, as the Vulgate renders. And here again the subject suggests to me the same useful reflection, viz. That when men are about leaving this world, and their soul is a little more at liberty to reflect (which holds much stronger of an unbodied spirit), there will then be a strange alteration in their judgment and opinion concerning the things of this world; they will then be sensible of the extreme vanity and folly of them, and fruitlessly wish for a few hours of their irrevocable time, mispent in a succession of vanities. But bitter will be the remembrance of former pleasures not innocent, and so much the greater will the detestation and cursing of them be, as they have taken more delight in them. But this will appear in a stronger light from what follows. Our version follows the present reading of the Greek, ἐν πλάγχθημεν τριβούς, but ἐν πλάγχθημεν seems to be more suitable, viz.

"We wandered up and down in the paths of wickedness and destruction."

Ver. 8. What hath pride profited us? or what good have riches with our vaunting brought us? i. e. What good have all our proud and haughty conceits, our admiration of worldly state and riches, our pursuit of vain curiosities and unlawful pleasures, done us, since these admired trifles are so uncertain, and all vanished into nothing? It is obvious to observe, from this self-reflection of a wicked man, very naturally here represented, that the sensual person in a future state will condemn himself in the first place, that, by pursuing with eagerness the uncertain pleasures of this world, he has forfeited his title to more durable and lasting delights. Secondly, that he is for ever incapable of recovering his lost happiness; and the sad prospect or reflection upon that happiness, which he might have enjoyed, but lost through his own folly, will greatly increase his misery. Thirdly, that the remembrance of his imprudence in this respect will be a part of his future punishment; all his favourite pleasures and enjoyments being past and gone, they will, by a miserable exchange, be succeeded with dreadful and tormenting reflections: for it will be an addition to the torments of the wicked, that they shall not be able to forget all those sins and follies which they have ever been guilty of, but must have always in their remembrance, as it were purposely to haunt and disturb them, all those once dear delights, which they would now willingly, at any rate, purchase the oblivion of.

Ver. 9—12.] We meet with several of these similes and comparisons, with respect to the shortness of life, and its satisfaction; in the book of Job, ix. 25, 26, "My days are swifter than a post, they flee away, they see no good: they are passed away as the swift ships, as the eagle that hasteth to the prey." And among the memorable sayings of Agur (Prov. xxx. 19), "The way of an eagle in the air, and the way of a ship in the midst of the sea," are taken notice of as so obscure and uncertain, as to leave no trace behind them. The comparisons made use of in the course of these verses, to represent the uncertainty of life and its enjoyments, we may observe, thicken apace, as if the wicked, described in this chapter, took pains and were concerned to impress upon others that lively sense of the vanity of worldly pleasures, which, by a sad experience, they had unhappily gained. The images are very natural, and placed in different lights, to be more affecting; they seem compassionately designed as notices to warn others, "lest they also come into that place of torment;" and they are each of them particularly proper to express what they are brought to illustrate. I shall only observe thus much of them farther,—(that though they very naturally describe the licentiousness of the wicked, and the eagerness with which they abandon themselves to their lusts and passions, and the rapidity with which they are carried away by them; yet herein all the images are deficient, that they do not sufficiently point out the destructive consequences and mischievous effects of a misspent life: for can a wicked life be thought as harmless as a shadow? or will it, like that, pass away without any farther notice? Is the speed of a messenger an adequate resemblance, without considering the consequence of his errand, and how he will be received at the end of his journey? Does the soaring of birds into the upper regions, and their aspiring even towards heaven, sufficiently denote the contrary course of sinners, and their certain tendency downwards? Or should a ship be described only as passing swiftly over the sea, and no notice taken of the danger of a shipwreck? And will the great gulf finally be as easily passed over as the waves, or come together like the light air? The propriety of our translation too, in some of the foregoing similes, may be a little suspected; for (ver. 9), ἀγγελία παρατρέχουσα, which in our version is rendered, "as a post that hasteth by," may probably, with more justice, be translated, "as a flying report." And thus Calmet explains it, comme une nouvelle qui court; comme la renommée qui vole; and then he quotes Virgil's description of fame, Æneid. iv. And indeed ἀγγελία properly means the rumour itself, and not the messenger that carries it. Again, ver. 11, the light air is said, in our version, to "be parted with the violent noise of the bird's wings," ἀεζόμενον βία ποίρου (the next word expresses the motion of them): but certainly this is inaccurate, for the noise does not part the air, but follow from it. Coverdale's, and the other ancient versions, render more justly, "paring the air through the vehemency of her going;" per vim itineris. Vulgate. Our translators were led into this mistake by the double sense of ποίρος, which signifies both stridor and impetus, but the latter signification is far preferable here: and thus the Syriac and Arabic interpreters understand it. The last observation is upon the Greek text, ver. 12, ὁ ἀνὴρ εὐθέως εἰς λαὸν αὐτὸν ἀνέλθῃ, where I would read with Grotius, ἀνελήλυθε, which seems more proper.

Ver. 13. Even so we in like manner, as soon as we were born, began to draw to our end.] i. e. Our life has been wasting ever since it was first given us, and we are continually dying by degrees; like that of the poet, Nascentes morimur, quædæ enim demitur aliqua pars vitæ; "We die daily, for our life is daily decreasing." But that of St. Austin is still closer, Profecta ex quo esse incipit in hoc corpore, in morte est homo (De Civit. Dei, lib. xiii.). An expression not unlike that moving one in our burial-service, "In the midst of life we are in death;" for life is continually exposed to so many perils, that what David says of himself (Ps. exix. 109), is true of every man, "My soul is always in my hand;" i. e. it is always in danger to be taken from me. The Hebrew word signifies the palm of the hand, out of which any thing will easily slip; and intimates, that he esteemed his life always in danger, and always was ready to resign it.

And had no sign of virtue to show;] Coverdale's translation is much better, "And have showed no token of virtue." The Greek reads in the present tense, "We have no sign of virtue to show;" i. e. We have nothing to urge in our defence, no good action to produce in our favour. One cannot help observing from hence, how insignificant, even in his own confession, a wicked man is; he is born and dies, can say no good of himself, nor any body else for him.

But were consumed in our own wickedness; i. e. We spent our whole life in wickedness; and as we died in our sins, we justly suffer the reward of our evil deeds.—These, and such-like dreadful reflections, will the wicked make in their torments.—Thus far the wicked are introduced speaking; accordingly the Vulgate here inserts, Talia dixerunt in inferno his, qui peccaverunt. And indeed such a soliloquy from a great sinner, or such repenting strains from a company of them in despair, seem very natural; for such is the power of a guilty conscience, that the wicked shall be self-condemned, even before the hooks are opened: they will anticipate their doom, and acknowledge the justice of their sentence, before it be passed upon them. The making the scene of this long prosopopœia, which reaches from the beginning of ver. 3, to the end of this, to be in hell, as the Vulgate does; and the representing them, by an ingenious fiction, as really speaking and lamenting there, in the way they would have done if they had power, can never be enough admired in this writer. We have a remarkable and beautiful instance of this in Luke xvi. 24, where an imaginary discourse is carried on between Abraham and the rich man.

Ver. 15. But the righteous live for evermore;] The author, having shown the dreadful consequences of sin, according to the inward sense and acknowledgment of the wicked themselves, their sad prospect, and the final ruin of all their hopes; and illustrated, by several just comparisons, the shortness of life, especially of one spent in a continual round of sinful pleasures; proceeds, in this and the next verses, to set down, by way of contrast, the glory of the righteous, and their exceeding great reward; that it is not only with, but in the Lord, for so it is in the original; and the Syriac and Arabic translations render accordingly, in Domino. It is also observable, that their reward, and even their future life, is expressed in the present tense, to denote probably the certainty of their reward, and their immediate entrance upon it.

And the care of them is with the most High.] The true and common acceptance of these words is, that God careth for the righteous, will defend them with his favourable kindness as with a shield, and will provide for them a reward, great even beyond imagination or expression. Stella understands this passage in a different sense, "That the chief care of the righteous is about the most High, and his whole study and endeavour to please the Lord in all instances of duty." Tota sollicitudo et diligentia iustorum circa id versatur, ut Deo placeant; illi enim vere iusti dei possunt, qui Deo curant placere (Stell. Enarrat. cap. 1. Lucæ). This sense would indeed have been very proper, if the original reading was, ἡ φρονις αὐτῶν περὶ ὑψίστου, as he seems to have understood it; but the true reading, in all the editions, is, ἡ φρονις αὐτῶν παρὰ ὑψίστου, Cura eorum penes altissimum, as the Arabic renders. That of the Syriac, Cogitatio illorum in altissimo, may seem to favour either sense.

Ver. 16. Therefore shall they receive a glorious kingdom and a beautiful crown from the Lord's hand;] The Arabic reads, Diadema pulehritudinis, and the Syriac version more explicitly, Diadema bonorum operum. The Greek, τὸ βασιλεῖον τῆς εὐπρετίας καὶ τοῦ δαδύου τοῦ καλλοῦς; which manner of expression by the substantive is very beautiful. Instances of it are frequent in scripture and profane authors: thus, i. 10, we have οὗς ζηλώσεις for the "jealous ear;" and πνεῦμα δυνάμεως, a "mighty wind," v. 23. And in Luke xviii. 6, the "unjust judge," ὁ κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας; and the "forgetful hearer," ἀκούωνς ἐπιλησμονῆς, James i. 25 (see more instances, John xvii. 12; James v. 15; 2 Thess. ii. 8.) This must be allowed to be a fine description of future happiness, and, considering the times of this writer, very clear and distinct. The New Testament, indeed, speaks of the righteous in heaven, under the idea and character of mighty kings and princes; and no wonder if there are better and clearer promises therein; but in the Old Testament, at least under the particular economy of Moses, we meet with no such explicit discovery of the happy and glorious state after death.

For with his right hand shall he cover them.] As by the organs of sense attributed to God, the knowledge of God is set forth; so by the organs or instruments of action is his power deciphered, and most eminently by the hand: so that the hand of God, in scripture, means ordinarily the power of God; but the right hand being more active than the left, and the more usual instrument in outward works, hence it is taken to intimate the exceeding abundance of the power of God. The sense of this passage is much the same with that of the psalmist: "The righteous shall dwell under the defence of the most High, and shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty: he will defend them under his wings, and they shall be safe under his feathers; his faithfulness and truth shall be their shield and buckler" (Ps. xci.).

Ver. 17. He shall take to him his jealousy for complete armour.] I have before observed, that sin in scripture is often compared to spiritual adultery (see note on ch. i. 10): so that the sense is, "That his jealousy," i. e. his enraged justice, "will furnish him with complete armour." The Syriac version expresses this very fully; In gratiam ipsorum in zelo suo armabit omnia. The following descriptions, to the end of the chapter, are full of the sublimest imagery: God is drawn in all that terrible glory with which the strongest imagination can paint him; his whole figure strikes us in the highest and most amazing manner: he is represented as completely armed with terror; we see his helmet, his breastplate, his invincible shield, his sharp sword, his thunderbolts, and, in fine, his whole artillery of heaven. He is more dreadful than Mars moving to battle, while he commands the creation round him (for so I would render τὴν κτίσιν in the following sentence), to execute his decreed vengeance upon his enemies, and to determine the fate of guilty nations. In Moses' song, the Lord, or Jehovah, is represented, in like manner, as a fierce man of war (Exod. xv. 3). Nor is the description of the psalmist less to be admired, where he says of God, "If a man will not turn, he will whet his sword; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready; he hath prepared for him the instruments of death; he ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors" (Ps. vii. 12, 13).

Ver. 18. He shall put on righteousness as a breastplate.] The breastplate is known to cover the heart, which is the source of all the passions: hence this writer says, that God will arm himself with justice as with a breastplate, to intimate that he will do nothing out of mere passion, or by an absolute, uncontrolled power, without regard to the rules of equity; but that he will conduct all his proceedings and determinations, even against his enemies, according to the eternal rules of justice: and therefore it follows very properly in the next sentence, "that he will put on true judgment instead of a helmet;" i. e. as a wise judge, whose infinite wisdom searches into the secrets of every crime and action, and who cannot be mistaken or imposed upon, he will give true and impartial judgment; and, as a just judge, he will observe a strict proportion between the crimes and the punishment. With great propriety therefore is true judgment here described as the ornament of his head. This can only be exceeded by that sublime description in the inspired writer upon the like occasion: "He put on righteousness as a breastplate, and a helmet of salvation upon his head; he put on the garments of vengeance for a clothing, and was clad with zeal as with a cloak" (Isa. lix. 17). How much more amiable is the description of this writer, representing the Almighty, clothed with the breastplate of righteousness, than that of Jupiter in Homer, whose ægis girded terribly with the figures of horror, affright, and discord?

Ana true judgment instead of an helmet.] Καὶ περιβητοῦται κόρυδα κρίων ἀνυπόκριτον. The learned editor of Philo Judæus applies the epithet to κόρυδα rather than κρίων, and conjectures the true reading of this place to be, περιβητοῦται κόρυδα κριων ἀκαθάρτων. Accipiet pro galea inextinguibili judicium; which he justifies by two parallel passages in Philo, where the same sentiment occurs, εὐνοίαν ἀκαθάρτων τὸ δίκαιον ἡγοῦμενος; and in another place, ἀκαθάρτων χρῆμενοι τοῦ δικαίου συμμαχία (Phil. de Mose).

Ver. 19. He shall take holiness for an invincible shield.] St. Bernard observes upon this passage, that at the time when this true judgment is passed, God's equity, as the margin rightly renders, will be so absolutely inflexible, that he will not suffer himself to be overcome by any arguments of pity that can be offered; nor can he possibly relent by any weakness or tenderness of nature. As the wicked have so long abused the riches of his goodness and long-suffering, his dignity calls upon him to do justice to his injured honour. And since this judgment or procedure is founded upon the most perfect equity, it will in all respects be so irrefragable, that even the wicked themselves shall be convinced of the justice of their sentence; and while they experience the greatness of his power, shall acknowledge the justice of all his determinations, and that his equity is no less infinite.

Ver. 20. His severe wrath shall he sharpen for a sword.] This is capable of two senses; either that he shall sharpen the sword of his fierce wrath, as the Syriac version understands it, Mirum in modum exaceret lanceam iræ suæ; or that he shall sharpen his wrath into a destructive sword, εἰς ἀσόντον βόμβαν, as the Arabic renders, Iram suam excollet in gladium acutum. And thus God punished the transgression of our first parents; he sharpened τὸν θυμὸν τῆς ὀργῆς (Numb. xiv. 34), into a flaming sword to guard the avenue of Paradise against them: "to keep the delinquents (says St. Chrysostom in loc. Hom. 18) in continual remembrance of what had passed, and to strike frequent terror into them by so menacing an object." The description in this and the following verses is agreeable to the language of scripture; for when God is mentioned as angry with the wicked, he is represented as standing continually with his bow bent, with his arrow upon the string, as ready to let fly; and with his sword not only drawn, but whetted, as if he was just about to strike (Ps. vii. 13).

And the world shall fight with him against the unwise.] This is the same in effect with that sentence in the seventeenth verse, "He shall make the creature," i. e. the creation, "his weapon for the revenge of his enemies." Not that almighty God has any need of all, or any, of his creatures, to assist him in executing his vengeance; but he sometimes chooses to make use of them, as instruments of his wrath, to convince the unwise, i. e. the wicked, of their folly, in their immoderate, or unlawful pursuit of them; and therefore his wisdom purposely punishes them by such creatures as they have abused, and makes the objects of their pleasures become the instruments of their punishment; "Quia in cunctis deliquimus (says St. Gregory) in cunctis ferimur" (Homil. 35 in Evang.). It is an observation of the book of Job, that all the works of nature are prepared by God to be his instruments, either for judgment or for mercy: thus (xxxvii. 12, 13), it is said of the clouds in particular, that "they are made to do whatsoever he commandeth them upon the face of the whole earth, either for correction or for plenty." And of the treasures of snow and hail, the same writer observes, that they "are reserved by God against the time of trouble, against the day of war and battle" (xxxviii. 23.). In the song of Deborah it is said, that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." And, indeed, God can make all the elements in their turns to conspire against the wicked: he can discomfit them with thunderbolts and tempests (ver. 21), as Livy says it happened to the Romans in the great battle at Cannæ; or command the air to be his destroying angel: he can make the waters to rage and swell horribly (ver. 22), and to destroy them by another deluge: he can make the fire to fulfil all the purposes of his providence, and his flame shall burn up the ungodly; or, he can command the earth to "open her mouth, and death shall come hastily upon them."

Ver. 21. Then shall the right aiming thunderbolts go abroad;] Βολίδες ἀσπαρῶν. "The arrows of the lightning;" and so the Syriac version has it, Jacula lancearum ignearum ac fulgurum. The meaning is, That the Lord shall show his wrath and indignation against the wicked by terrible thunder from heaven, like that in the days of Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 10), when "the Lord thundered with a great thunder upon the Philistines, and discomfited them;" and that these his instruments of destruction shall be so infallibly directed, as to execute his designed vengeance with an unerring certainty. An ingenious writer observes, "That compound epithets heighten the diction; and that even one of these is itself a short description" (Pope's Pref. to Hom. Iliad). We see the justness of this observation in εὐστόχου, or right-aiming; for can any thing convey a finer or more lively idea, than thunderbolts animated as it were with sense, and discharging themselves with judgment and discretion? We see the uplifted hand of vengeance, and the bolt not only grasped and levelled rubente dextera, but executing its fated commission with as much certainty, as if each particular stroke had its charge assigned it. Aristotle justly commends Homer for having found out living words, "His hero's arrow is impatient to be on the wing, and his weapon thirsts to drink the blood of the enemy—δρὺν μίμνεται. Here the Almighty's thunder is winged with death, and his unerring wisdom guides it to the mark; Jehovah but sends out his arrows, and they know where to go, and what to do; in short, to use the words of another polite writer upon a like occasion, the description here and in the context "is a noble picture in which the gusts of hail, and flashes of fire, burst out from the clouds with as much spirit and force as in a real tempest."

And from the clouds, as from a well-drawn bow, shall they fly to the mark.] Ὡς ἀπὸ εὐκύκλου τόξου τῶν νεφῶν, i. e. As from the well-arched or well bent bow of the clouds. Not any well-drawn bow is here alluded to, but that particular bow, the τὸ τόξον ἐν τῇ νεφέλῃ, which was "at first set in the clouds" (Gen. ix. 14). And thus the Vulgate renders, A bene curvato arcu nubium. To which agree the Syriac and Arabic, and most ancient English translations; but Coverdale's is more explicit than the rest, "Then shall the thunderbolts come out of the rainbow of the clouds to the place appointed;" i. e. to execute God's will, and to fulfil their own commission, as is explained above. There is an expression in the Psalmist, with respect to God's vengeance, which, if rightly understood, is much to this purpose: "He (God) made a way to his indignation" (Psalm. lxxviii. 50), οδοποίησε τῖβιν τῇ ὀργῇ αὐτοῦ, LXX. i. e. He directed his anger where, or to what quarter, it should fall: it does not mean in general only that God was angry, but that he had appointed a certain tract or path for his vengeance, which it must follow and pursue; the Latin version therefore expresses this with great judgment, Libravit semitam iræ suæ (see 2 Esdras xvi. 13). Isaiah describes the surprising massacre of the Assyrian army by the just vengeance of God in the like figurative way, and with a sublimity suitable to his grandeur, which the Vulgate thus expresses: Auditam faciet Dominus gloriani vocis suæ, et terrorem brachii sui ostendet in comminatione furoris, et flammâ ignis devorantis; allidet in turbine et in lapide grandinis. A voce Domini pavebit Assur, virgâ percussus; and the LXX. express more properly, τῇ πληγῇ ἣ ἂν πατάξῃ (κτύπος) αὐτοῦς (Isa. xxx. 30, 31. see also Ps. xlviii. 13, 14). In the pagan theology the vengeance of the gods is expressed in the like manner: thus Homer describes the wrath of Apollo, according to Mr. Pope's excellent translation:

"Bent was his bow the Grecian hearts to wound;
Fierce as he moved, his silver shafts resound:
Breathing revenge, a sudden night he spread,
And gloomy darkness roll'd around his head.
The fleet in view, he twang'd his deadly bow,
And hissing fly the feather'd fates below." (B. i. 63.)

Virgil has expressed the same sentiment:

— "Arcum intendebat Apollo
Desuper. Omnis eo terrore Egyptus et Indi, Omnis Arabs, omnes vertebant terga Sabæi."
(Æneid. viii. 704.)

Ver. 22. And hailstones full of wrath shall be cast (as out of a stone bow.) Hailstones, the artillery of heaven, shall likewise come down upon the heads of his enemies, as in the days of Joshua, when God sent hailstones and lightnings from heaven in the faces of the enemies of his chosen people (Josh. x. 11), which shall come with such fury and vehemence, as if they were discharged by the force of some machine, which our version calls a stone bow, and among the Romans had the name of balista. The Vulgate renders here, Et a petrosa ira plenæ mittentur grandines: which is followed by Coverdale's, and Pagnine's interlineary version, and is indeed a close translation of the Greek, as it is pointed in all the editions: but if I might offer a conjecture, I think, by the help of a comma only, the sense might be rendered more complete in this manner, καὶ ἐκ πετροβόλου, θυμοῦ πλήρεις βεβηθουσιναι χάλαιαι ἐκ πετροβόλου, sc. ὀργάνου, or τόξου, from the preceding verse. I am aware of an objection which may be urged, that the particle ὥς, or some such-like note of comparison, is here omitted; but, besides that as may, without any force, be fetched from the foregoing verse, instances of this ellipsis are very frequent in scripture and profane writers. See Gen. xvi. 12. Ps. xi. 1. xii. 6. xxii. 13. xlv. 2. Gen. xlix. 9. Cant. i. 15, in all which places this particle is omitted in the Hebrew, and supplied in the versions. Our translators, it is plain, understood the words in the sense which I have given them, and have inserted as, though this particle be not in the original. In the prophetic writings, this metaphor of hailstones is frequently used to denote an enemy's falling on a country (see Isa. xxviii. 2. xxx. 30). It conveys a grand and terribly magnificent idea, and is but imperfectly compared with the volleys from the artillery of walls closely besieged.

And the water of the sea shall rage against them, and the floods shall cruelly drown them.] i. e. God shall take such vengeance of wicked nations, that their enemies shall come pouring upon them like a flood. Rain, showers, storms, floods, and seas, are all symbols of multitudes of men in motion and disorder; or else of armies ravaging and destroying countries: hence Servius has observed, that the sea in a storm, and people in confusion, are reciprocally compared to each other, Virgilius tempestati populi motum comparat, Tullius populo tempestatem (Servius in Æneid. lib. i.). In the inspired writings, multitudes are frequently compared to waters, and the invasion of an army to the inundations of the sea, or a rapid river, which carries all before it. It is familiar with David particularly, to represent a vast hostile force under the idea of a flood of waters, a noble instance of which is to be found in Ps. xlii. (see also Isa. viii. 7. xvii. 12. Dan. ix. 26. xi. 22).

Ver. 23. A mighty wind shall stand up against them,] Wars and commotions are likewise metaphorically denoted by winds; so here, by a most powerful wind blowing, πνεῦμα θυμώσεως, is signified the storm of war, and the calamity attending it, which shall be brought upon the wicked. The description of the fate of the wicked man, Job xxvii. 20, 21, is so close and parallel to this, that I shall set it down at large; "Terrors take hold of him as waters, a tempest stealth him away in the night, the east-wind carrieth him away, and he departeth, and, as a storm, hurleth him out of his place." The east-wind, which is mentioned particularly in this passage, being a very blasting wind, is most frequently used in scripture, and especially in the prophetic writings, to denote the calamities of war, and such-like wasting judgments. The prophet Jeremiah often applies this metaphor to those enemies and destroyers whom God makes use of as his instruments of vengeance (see Jer. iv. 11. xlix. 36. li. 1). And in Ezekiel, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army is foretold under the figures of stormy winds, and overflowing showers (xlii. 11. 13). By these and such-like figurative expressions God's severe judgments upon the wicked are usually denoted in scripture. But it is not improbable, that the writer of this book had in mind, and herein alluded to, a particular wicked nation, punished in this extraordinary manner, viz. the Egyptians, to whom most of these instances of vengeance happened; for "God smote their cattle with hailstones, and their flocks with hot thunderbolts" (Ps. lxxviii. 49). By the east-wind also he plagued them with the locusts, which laid waste their whole land; and the waters of the Red sea at last cruelly drowned them. Calmet understands by πνεῦμα θυμώσεως, not "a mighty wind," as our version has it, but un vent envoyé par la puissance de Dieu. And the sense of a mighty wind may seem perhaps not so proper here, as it is compared immediately to λαίλαψ, or a whirlwind. If we should understand this expression of the spirit of power, or the powerful breath or spirit of the Almighty, the vengeful breath of God, expressed significantly, and displayed terribly, by the desolation of a whirlwind, furnishes as grand an idea as our imaginations are perhaps capable of. This seems confirmed by xi. 21, where there is the like expression.

And like a storm shall blow them away:] The translators do not seem here fully to have expressed the sense of the Greek word ἐκλευσάσει; it is a technical term, and means, that God will make use of his fan, "and thoroughly purge his floor," when the wicked, in the language of the psalmist, "shall be like the chaff which the wind scattereth away from the face of the earth" (Ps. i. 5). With what dreadful pomp is the wrath of God here displayed! How magnificently and nobly hath the writer of this book drawn the artillery of heaven, the rapidity of its motion, the terror of its appearance, the desolation occasioned by it, and the certain death attending it! What an assemblage of terrible ideas in a small compass! The earth, the sea, the rivers, the clouds, the winds, the heavens, like so many auxiliary forces, are all listed, and conspire against the wicked. What a lively idea of God's infinite power over all his creatures does this description convey! This latter part of the chapter must certainly be allowed to be a great instance of the hypotyposis, a figure well known to orators and poets.

Thus iniquity shall lay waste the whole earth,] By this expression we may understand "all the earth strictly," terram universam, as the Arabic renders; and thus the old world, with its inhabitants, was destroyed by water for their iniquity; and St. Peter seems to intimate, that "the present earth, and all the works that are therein, shall at length be burnt up," for the same reason (2 Pet. iii. 7. 10); or we may understand this sentence, of judgments that shall befall any particular land or country. And thus the Syriac version expounds it, Vastabitque totum terram impiorum; and Coverdale's translation takes it in the same sense, "Thus the unrighteous dealing of them shall bring all the land to a wilderness:" according to that observation of the psalmist, "A fruitful land maketh he barren, for the wickedness of those that dwell therein" (Ps. cvii. 34).

And ill dealing shall overthrow the thrones of the mighty.] The truth of this observation cannot be better exemplified than in the fate of Nebuchadnezzar and Sennacherib; the latter prided himself in being called the great king, the king, by way of excellence, and considered himself as the lord of the earth, and the vanquisher of men and gods; this prince, so proud and haughty, God seems to despise as below an ordinary man; he treats him as a wild beast, puts his hook in his nose, and a bridle in his mouth, and turns him back with disgrace and infamy, by the same way that he came triumphant and glorious (see Rollin on the Belles Lettres, vol. iii. p. 167).

CHAP. VI.

ARGUMENT.—Having established the preference of wisdom or religion above vice and wickedness, the author presses upon princes and rulers, whom he addressed in the first chapter, the study and observance of it, as the means of ruling well; that, through a conceit and imagined privilege of their high station, they should attempt nothing injurious; because God careth for all alike, being the common Father of small and great, and will punish them proportionably to the great trust which they abuse. He concludes with a eulogium of wisdom, its general use to mankind, and the means of obtaining it.

Ver. 1. Hear therefore, O ye kings,] In Coverdale's translation, this chapter begins, "Wisdom is better than strength, and a man of understanding is more worth than one that is strong;" which be copied undoubtedly from the Vulgate, which is single in inserting this verse, and renders, Melior est sapientia quam vires, et vir prudens quam fortis: but it is not to be found in the Greek, nor in the Syriac or Arabic translations: it seems taken either from Prov. xvi. 32. or from Eccl. ix. 16, but more probably from the latter. However that be, or however true and useful the reflection may be, yet it is certainly quite out of place here; the connexion between the beginning of this chapter and the conclusion of the last, is really better without it; for if "ill-dealing (or wickedness) shall overthrow the thrones of the mighty" (v. 23), the advice here given to kings, to attend to good instruction, and to conduct themselves with religion and justice, is very seasonable and natural. From the great liberty here taken in giving advice and direction to persons in such high authority, some have inferred, that a king is the writer of this book; for who so proper to take this freedom with kings, as one of their own great rank, or who so able as the wise Solomon? But what foundation there is for this pretence, see in note on ch. ix. 7 of this book.

Ver. 3. For power is given you of the Lord,] "By me kings reign," says God, Prov. viii. 15. And to the same high original does this writer ascribe their power. Irenæus very properly remarks, "That the devil never more truly proved himself to be the father of lies, than when he said to our Saviour, concerning the kingdoms of the world, 'All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them, for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will, I give it.'" The hint here given to princes concerning the original of their power is very properly inserted, lest, being exalted so high, they should be ignorant or forgetful of him from whom they received their authority; "for they are accountable to God for the abuse of their power, as well as subjects are for obedience to it; because it was committed to them not for their own pleasure or advantage, to gratify their pride, or to enable them to do acts of tyranny and oppression, but for the good of those who are under their charge" (see Humily of Obedience to Magistrates). Cyrus has not only given in his own person a perfect model of the manner in which princes should govern their nations, and the real use they ought to make of absolute power; but he lays down excellent rules for the conduct of princes; Ἐγὼ μὴ αἰμῇ δέω τὸν ἄρχοντα τῶν ἰσχυρίων διακρίνειν, οὐ τῷ πολυτελείῳ, κ. τ. λ. "That a king ought not to be distinguished from his subjects by the splendour of riches, the pomp of equipage, or luxury of diet only, but by a superiority of merit of every kind, by an indefatigable application to make his people happy—that the very glory of their character, and the true use of their eminence and greatness, is being devoted to, and studious of, the public good" (Cyp. lib. i.). Tully has the same opinion of government; "Mihiqueid videntur huc omnia esse referenda ab iis qui præsent alius, ut ii, qui eorum in imperio erunt, sint quam beatissimi" (Cic. epist. 1. lib. i. ad Quint. Fratr.). This has been assigned by critics as the reason why Homer calls his kings by such epithets as δογῶντες, "born of the gods;" or διορρεγέτες, "bred by the gods," viz. to point out to themselves the offices they were ordained for; and to their people, the reverence that should be paid them: expressions correspondent to those places of holy scripture where princes are called "gods," and the "sons of the most High" (Annot. on book i. ver. 229). And the like reasoning will hold in proportion with respect to judges, magistrates, ministers of state, generals of armies, governors of provinces, and ecclesiastical superiors, and all other persons in authority.

Ver. 4. Because, being ministers of his kingdom, you have not judged aright, nor kept the law.] Both the Vulgate and St. Austin read, Nec custodistis legem justitiæ. The meaning is, that, being appointed by God, who is your sovereign in a much higher degree, as his ministers and vicegerents, you have acted as if you were absolute and uncontrollable, and accountable to none for your proceedings; ye have made your own wills and passions the rule of your conduct, and have forgot that for this cause God raised you up to such an eminence above the rest of his creatures, that you might resemble him in goodness, and impartially distribute justice. Tully's reproof of Verres upon this occasion, is very remarkable and fine, "Nunquam tibi venit in mentem, non tibi idcirco fasces et securæ, et tantam imperii vim, tantamque ornamentorum omnium dignitatem datam, ut earum rerum vi et auctoritate omnia repagula juris, pudoris, et officii, perfringeres, et omnium bona prædam tuam duceres?" (Orat. 5). But nothing can exceed that charge of king Jehoshaphat to the judges which he set over the land, and ought to be considered as the urim and thummim of every public magistrate; "Take heed what you do, for ye judge not for man but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment; wherefore, let the fear of the Lord be upon you, and take heed unto it, for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts" (2 Chron. xix. 6.)

Ver. 5. Horribly and speedily shall he come upon you: for a sharp judgment shall be to them that be in high places.] Not that this sharp judgment shall come upon the mighty, and such as are in high places, merely for being mighty; the expression in this sense is too lax and rigorous, for there is no offence in the office, as such, nor would God raise any of his creatures to such an honour and dignity, as to be his vicegerents, and even to be called gods (Ps. lxxxii. 6), in resemblance of him, if the office and elevated state itself was faulty or punishable: the meaning is, that, if kings and rulers pervert the order and original design of their institution, and act contrary to the established rules of justice, they will then not only be answerable for this abuse of power to him that entrusted them with it, but be punished in a greater degree, in proportion to their superior station and the weighty talents committed to them.

Ver. 6. For mercy will soon pardon the meanest: i. e. God will sooner or more easily pardon a small fault or breach of duty in a private person, from whom so great a perfection is neither expected nor required, as having wanted perhaps opportunities of knowing his duty, and been deprived of the means of instruction: such a person's transgression, being to himself, proceeding rather from ignorance than malice, and not attended with a train of bad consequences to others, will be less regarded: but the sins of kings and rulers are, as St. Austin styles them, contagious and mortal, their bad example has the most powerful influence, it is fatal through their eminence and authority, and they ruin as many as are led away by it. Hence God commanded Moses to apprehend all the princes of the people, and the rulers of thousands and of hundreds, and other principal persons in their tribes, who had been guilty of foul idolatry, and "to hang them up before the Lord," i. e. before the sanctuary, as men who had forsaken the worship of their God. And this was to be done openly, or against the sun, that all the people might see and fear when they saw persons of their distinction and authority made public examples of God's displeasure (Numb. xxv. 4). This is the sense of the LXX. who read παράκεινται αὐτοῖς. The Vulgate and Symmachus understand it in like manner, and Selden De Synedr. lib. ii. "Nor can we better (says Calmet) account for God's severity to David, for an act of seeming curiosity only in numbering the people, 2 Sam. xxiv. and his threats to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xx. for a piece of secret vanity, in showing his treasures, than by considering them as public persons, who should rather have regarded God's glory than their own" (see Comment. Literal. in loc.).

But mighty men shall be mightily tormented.] Private persons seldom dare take the liberty to represent to kings, and persons in great authority, the wickedness or injustice of their proceedings, much less to remind them of the danger of such steps. This writer therefore very artfully, as St. Bernard observes, assumes the borrowed character of Solomon, to give the greater weight to his reflections: as a king, superior to all others of the same rank in experience and wisdom, he assures them with the greater confidence, that however they may flatter themselves from their high station, that they are out of the reach of danger, and have nothing to fear; their great eminence ought rather to possess them with contrary apprehensions; nothing being more difficult than to fill a high post with sufficiency and credit, nor any thing so easy as to abuse it and miscarry. That God, though he has established them his vicegerents, has not made them independent of himself; he considers them still as his creatures, and, from the nature of their trust, accountable in a greater degree. That if at any time they abuse their authority by notorious acts of violence and oppression, they must expect that God will display his own power by punishing them very remarkably, and make them as terrible instances of his vengeance, as many others of their high rank, whose sufferings are recorded both in sacred and profane history. This is finely illustrated in Isa. xiv. 9, where all the ghosts of deceased tyrants, condemned to the infernal mansions, are represented as rising from their thrones, called so by way of irony, and coming to meet the king of Babylon, and congratulating his arrival among them. Ver. 8, of this chapter, our author again adds, "A sore trial shall come upon the mighty;" which is the very same sentiment, but is not here to be considered as a tautology, but a repeated warning. It is observable, that all the ancient versions express this sore trial in stronger terms than our translation; the Vulgate reads, Fortioribus instat fortior cruciatus, which all the old English versions follow; but the Arabic express it more terribly by the superlative, Potestate præditos rigidissimum obruet examen, ad vos enim spectant sermones mei, O rebelles retractarii. And this sore trial or punishment will be more disagreeable and insupportable to princes, even upon account of their former delicate way of living, and their former absolute sway over others, because disgrace, adversity, and suffering, are far more painful and vexatious to those that have been in high stations, and lived at ease, than those of an inferior rank, who have been inured to hardships: hence we may imagine Lucifer, the "chiefain of the devils," as Mr. Mede calls him, to be more deeply affected with his sore punishment than any of the rest of his inferior accomplices.

Ver. 7. For he which is Lord over all shall fear no man's person, neither shall he stand in awe of any man's greatness: for he hath made the small and great, and careth for all alike.] There is a passage in Job xxiv. 19. 24. 27, which very much resembles the first part of this verse, and probably this was taken from it; "God accepteth not the person of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor, for they all are the works of his hands: he shall break in pieces mighty men without number, because they turned back from him, and would not consider any of his ways." And the sense of the latter part is agreeable to that of the psalmist, "The Lord is loving unto every man, and his mercy is over all his works" (Ps. cxlv. 9). As common Father of all, he is desirous that all should be saved, and not willing that even the meanest should perish. Magna Dei curant, parva negligunt, was an unbecoming notion of God, and worthy only of a heathen (Cic. De Nat. Deor.). How much better is that most excellent sentiment of St. Austin, Tu sic curas unumquemque nostrum, tanquam solum cures, et sic omnes tanquam singulos: "God takes as much care of every particular person, as if each were all; and as much care of all, as if all were but one." St. Cyprian has a sentiment upon this occasion no less beautiful; Deus se omnibus ad celestis gratia consecutionem aequalitate librata præbet parcm. "A true knowledge of providence, as it is an attribute of God, is most necessary, and of the greatest importance, as it influences all events, both public and private, and every man ought to have it in his view in every circumstance of life, and every action of the day: it makes us more thoroughly sensible of our entire dependence upon God, of our weakness and wants, and presents us with opportunities of exerting the greatest virtues, such as confidence in God, a grateful acknowledgment of his mercies, humility, resignation, and patience; and is the very basis of religion, and of all those holy exercises of prayers, vows, thanksgivings, sacrifices," &c. (Rollin on Sacred History, vol. iii. p. 130).

Ver. 10. For they that keep holiness holily, shall be judged holy:] Calmet applies this sentence to dignified ecclesiastical persons, to such as composed the Jewish Sanhedrin, and were the judges of their nation; "Le Sage parloit aux Juges de sa nation, qui étoient pour l'ordinaire de l'ordre des Prêtres." St. Bernard and St. Austin (De Pastor. Cur. cap. 4) both imply what is said of rulers here and in the context to the Christian clergy, whose duty likewise rises in proportion to the high dignity of their office. Moses, who had the care of God's chosen people, was considered by him as their lawgiver and chief ruler; and accordingly we find that even a small transgression of his (if any can be called so that is committed against God) was the reason, in the judgment of many learned men, of his not being permitted to enter into the land of promise. And the like may be said of the severity which befell the disobedient prophet, 1 Kings xvi. 21. But I think it more agreeable to the context, to understand this of good kings, who are full of zeal for the glory of God, the establishment of religion, and the security of its rights; such as are in scripture said to be "after God's own heart," who consider themselves as his ministers, and whose authority is employed to make their subjects happy, by making them better. It is a reflection very commonly to be met with upon the kings mentioned in the Old Testament, that "they did evil in the sight of the Lord according to all that their fathers had done;" but yet there are some particular exceptions, some instances of illustrious goodness, recorded there, which ought in justice to be remembered, and must with pleasure be related, for the credit of their high calling: let any one but carefully reflect upon the sentiments of piety which David expressed in the translation of the ark; and his magnificent and almost immense preparations for the building of the temple; Jehoshaphat's pious visitation of his kingdom, and his zeal to send Levites with the princes, to instruct the people in the law (2 Chron. xvii. 7. 8); Hezekiah's great care and concern to restore religion, to "sanctify the house of the Lord God of his fathers, and carry forth the filthiness out of the holy place;" and the many other good "works which he began in the service of the house of God, and in the law, and in the commandments, to seek his God with all his heart" (2 Chron. xxix. 5; xxxi. 21); Josiah's indefatigable zeal from the very beginning of his reign to reform religion, and restore the true worship, not only in Judah, but in the ten tribes also (2 Chron. xxiv.); and he will plainly see, that these princes thought themselves placed on the throne as guardians of the faith, and as nursing fathers of the church, to establish and promote the kingdom of God in their dominions. Such righteous kings who have "kept holiness holily," and been exceedingly zealous for the honour of the Lord God of hosts, will always find what to answer that they may dare to appeal to him for a reward of their integrity and sincerity, and with humble confidence say, with Nehemiah, "Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds, that I have done for the house of my God, and for the offices thereof" (Neh. xiii. 14).

Ver. 13. She preventeth them that desire her.] There is a fine eulogium of wisdom in this and the following verses, not only to raise men's curiosity after it, but likewise their desire of it; and, to encourage them the more in the pursuit of it, the author shows how easy it is to be obtained, that though she is glorious and beautiful, yet she is not so coy and backward as to hide herself, or fly away from her pursuers and admirers; but rather desires to be known to them, and even makes the first advances and overtures of familiarity and acquaintance to such as are well-disposed to her. What follows in the context is a close imitation of the book of Proverbs, where wisdom is represented as inviting men to come into her dwelling, as going into the most public places to call them to her, that such as listen to her, and watch at her gates, are happy, and those that find her, find life and happiness; expressions so like this writer, that, were there not stronger arguments to the contrary, one would be almost tempted to pronounce that they came both from the same pen.

Ver. 17. For the very true beginning of her is the desire of discipline;] We have here, and in the context, the several degrees set down, by which a person well-disposed towards wisdom, may rise by little and little to the perfection of it: the first step mentioned is the desire of discipline or instruction, as the first step to a cure is, being sensible that we are out of order; and this desire of instruction in virtue or wisdom, in religion or science, proceeds from the good opinion which a man entertains of it, and the love which he bears to it; and this love is the cause of his perseverance and willing obedience; and his obedience will produce the reward of happiness: which happiness consists in incorruption, i. e. in a state of immortality, and a crown of glory, that fadeth not away. This desire therefore of instruction, by a regular deduction of particulars, and a kind of logical inference and conclusion, may be said to be the principal thing which conducted men to a kingdom, ad regnum perpetuum, according to the Vulgate; as that which sets the machine a going, may properly be reckoned the cause of all the other motions, and of what is effected in the conclusion by them. In this and the three following verses, the learned will easily discern the beauty of the climax, or regular gradation from one thing to another, like that of St. Paul, Rom. v. 3, 4, "Tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed" (see also 2 Pet. i. 5). Not unlike to which is that of St. Austin, Velle meum tenebat inimicus, ex voluntate perversa facta est libido, et dum sevitur libidini, facta est consuetudo, et dum consuetudini non resistitur, facta est necessitas (Confess. lib. viii. cap. 5). But that of St. Chrysostom, with respect to baptism, is still more beautiful, and hardly to be paralleled; "You are herein made not only free, but holy; not only holy, but just likewise; not barely just, but children also; not children only, but heirs; not merely heirs, but brethren of Christ; not brethren only, but coheirs; not coheirs only, but members also; not members only, but his temple; not temples only, but organs of the Holy Spirit" (Homil. ad Neophyt.). After which instances, it may seem almost needless to mention that of Tully, In urbe luxuria creatur, ex luxuria existat avaritia, ex avaritia erumpat audacia necesse est; inde omnia scelera et maleficia nascuntur.

Ver. 21. If your delight be then in thrones and sceptres O ye kings of the people, honour wisdom.] What has been observed of the usefulness of history by a learned writer, is equally applicable to wisdom, here recommended; "That it is useful both to small and great, to princes and subjects; but more necessary to princes and great men, than to all the world besides. For how can truth approach them amidst the crowd of flatterers which surround them on all sides, and are continually commending and admiring them; or, in other words, corrupting and poisoning their hearts and understandings? How can truth make her modest and feeble voice to be heard amidst such tumult and confusion? How venture to lay before them the duties and slaveries of royalty? How show them wherein their true glory consists, and represent to them, that if they will look back to the original of their institution, they will clearly find they were made for the people, and not the people for them? How put them in mind of their faults, insinuate into them a dread of the just judgment of posterity, and disperse the thick cloud which the vain phantom of their greatness has formed around them? How that a Caligula, a Nero, and a Domitian, who were praised to an excess during their lives, became the horror and execration of mankind after their death; whereas Titus, Trajan, Antoninus, and Marcus Aurelius, are still looked upon as the delights of the world, for having made use of their power only to do good?" (Rollin, vol. iii. p. 2).

Ver. 22. And will not hide mysteries from you:] The Vulgate here renders sacramenta Dei, without authority from any more ancient versions, or countenance from the original; the true meaning is, that he will reveal or discover the arcanæ or secret things of wisdom, as the reason of her name (see Eccles. vi. 22), her original and existence, her nature and properties, her effects and operations. "even from the beginning of the creation;" for so I would understand the words in the Greek text ἀπὸ ἀρχῆς γένεως, viz. that wisdom was present at, concurred in, and is displayed by, the works of the creation, in a much better and loftier sense than that of our version. The Syriac translation seems to carry it still higher, understanding these words of wisdom, eternally existing with, or in God, before all creation, quod creaturas præcessit investigabo: the author here endeavours to discover and set down the origin of heavenly wisdom, and indirectly confutes the pretences and boastings of the heathen sages, all whose philosophy is but of human invention, the work of a Socrates or a Pythagoras: but wisdom is not of so late a date, is more ancient than any historical monuments of the Greeks, has existed in all ages, may be traced through the times of the patriarchs, and its origin ultimately resolved into God himself (see Calmet in loc.).

Ver. 23. Neither will I go with consuming envy; Some Latin translations render, Neque cum eo, qui invidia tabescit, &c. So that the meaning may either be, that he would show no envy or narrowness of spirit, in his discoveries about wisdom, but as he had "learned diligently, he would likewise communicate liberally" (vii. 13); or, that he would hold no commerce or society with a person of that selfish and inhospitable temper; for envy does not only pine and grieve at the outward prosperity of others, but is vexed at their inward accomplishments, at any attainments or happy discoveries which they may make, or have communicated to them by others: whereas charity, or a beneficent temper, which is kindly disposed towards all, envies no man's merit; nor does it pride itself in the singularity of its own knowledge, nor conceal what may be useful to others: she is not afraid that others may equal, or even exceed, her in knowledge, but with pleasure opens and communicates to them what she apprehends may be of public benefit, and considers not from what quarters a useful discovery comes, only that its advantage may be made general, and others share in the improvement. St. Basil's observation upon this occasion is very just and useful; "Adepts," says he, or such as have made uncommon discoveries in any science, "should be ready to impart their knowledge without envy; and such as want to be instructed, should offer themselves without any shame" (epist. 12). And the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal gives the true reason for imparting the treasures of knowledge to others, "C'est pourquoy on les doit communiquer aux autres sans envie, puisque plus on les repand sur eux, plus on en jouit, et qu'elle ne diminue point par la multitude de ceux qui la possèdent."

Ver. 24. The multitude of the wise is the welfare of the world: and a wise king is the upholding of the people. The Greek reads σωτηρία κόσμου, and the Vulgate, Multitudo sapientium sanitas est orbis terrarum; and Calmet's exposition is to the same effect, viz. "That wise men are as it were the physicians and recoverers of the world, especially of the wicked part of it; and that their examples and discourses are like powerful medicines to the sick." This is the very language and comparison of Philo; πᾶς σοφὸς λόγος ἰσχύει τοῦ παύλου—καθὼς ἰατρὸς τοῦ νοσοῦντος (De Sacrific. of Abel et Cain). Plato bears testimony to the truth of the last sentence, when he advises, "that kings should be philosophers, or philosophers kings." "Ille quidem princeps ingenii et doctrinæ Plato, tum denique fore beatas republicas putavit, si aut docti et sapientes homines eas regere cõpissent, aut, qui regerent, omne suum studium in doctrina ac sapientia collocassent. Hanc conjunctionem, videlicet potestatis et sapientiæ, salutis censuit civitatibus" Cit. epist. 1. ad Quint. Fratr.). And it was no less piously than excellently wished by Justin Martyr, "that kings and rulers, together with their sovereign power, might be possessed of wisdom and a good mind."

CHAP. VII.

ARGUMENT.—Under the borrowed character of Solomon, the author proceeds to show the original and powerful effects of wisdom; that though all men agree in this, that all are born, and all must die, it is wisdom that puts the difference between man and man, according as the intermediate time between the cradle and the grave is improved or neglected; that the wisest man was at first as helpless as other children, and attained to the perfection of understanding by a steady pursuit of wisdom, and prayers to God for it, and that it is attainable by all others observing the same method. The chapter concludes with a fine eulogium of wisdom, as essentially inherent in God, and derivative in man, as a ray from his divinity. Calmet says, the first six chapters of this book are as the preface to the work, which may be considered as an abridgment or paraphrase of the first nine chapters of the book of Proverbs (Pref. sur le Livre de la Sagesse.)

Ver. 5. I myself also am a mortal man, like to all. As nothing is so great an enemy to instruction and improvement as pride, the author, intending to communicate the secrets of wisdom, and the method of obtaining it, begins with showing man his true original, what he is by nature, and what by grace, thereby to depreciate his conceit and inflame his gratitude: and to humble even kings, and take away all affectation of divinity, a notion which flattery is too apt to insinuate, he assures them that they are equally the children of Adam, sprung from the same first common parent with slaves and the meanest of their subjects; and as liable to corruption and mortality as the very beggars. Well, therefore, may Pliny cry out, O demetium hominum à talibus iniitius existimantium ad superbiam se genitos!

The offspring of him that was first made of the earth. Eusebius calls Adam πρῶτος γυνή (Præp. Evang. lib. xi.), and to this St. Paul may be thought to allude, when he says, that the first man is of the earth, earthy" (1 Cor. xv. 47); the derivation of homo, ab humo, according to the etymologists, seems natural and proper, and the very name Adam denotes the same original. The Greek writers accordingly make use of the term γυνή, to denote the great antiquity and unknown original of their first and earliest heroes. But though all men thus resemble Adam in their origination, yet may his condition in this respect be considered as singular, that he was created perfect at once both in soul and body, quite different from the state here described of his posterity, who arrive slowly, progressively, and with difficulty, to the perfection of either. Philo has the same observation upon Adam, whom he calls emphatically ὁ γυνή, and says, that he far excelled all that came after him in the excellencies of soul and body; ἐκείνος ὁ πρῶτος ἄνθρωπος ὁ γυνή, ὁ παντὶ τοῦ γένους ἡμῶν ἀρχηγός, ἐκάτερα ἄριστος, ψυχὴν τε καὶ σῶμα γεγενῆσθαι μοι δοκεῖ, καὶ μακρὸν τινι τοῖς ἑπειτα διενεγκεῖν, κατὰ τὰς τῶν ἐμφοτέρων ὑπερβίαις (De Mundi Opificio).

Ver. 2. Was fashioned to be flesh in the time of ten months. The Alexandrian MS. and all the other versions, make the comma after flesh, and join the rest to the next sentence. As to the precise time of "ten months," mentioned here, the ancient Greek and Latin writers express themselves in like manner: Ovid, speaking of the year of Romulus, which consisted only of ten months, says,

"Quod satis est utero matris dum prodeat infans, Hoc anno statuit temporis esse satis." (Fast. lib. 1.)

And Virgil is no less express:

"Matri longa decem tulerunt fastidia menses." (Eclog. iv.)

Upon which Servius makes this observation; "Mares decimo nascuntur mense, feminae nono." Plautus often mentions the like time; he is particularly jocular in what follows:

"Nam me illa in alvo menses gestavit decem,
At ego illam [Faniem] in alvo gesto plus annos decem."
(Plaut. in Stich.)

The like time is mentioned by Terrence (Adelph. act. iii. sc. 4), and by Censorinus (De Die Natali, cap. 12). Philo calls τὴν τεσσαρακοντάδα, or forty weeks, τὴν ζωογονικωτάτην ἐν ἣ διαπλάττεσθαι ἄνθρωπον ἐν τῇ τῆς φύσεως ἐργαστηρίῳ (De Mose, lib. ii.). And Menander mentions the same time as most usual, γυνὴ καὶ δέκα μῆνες. Hippocrates reckons such as are born in the tenth month, as most perfect and promising (lib. De Septimestri Partu). Theocritus accordingly mentions Hercules as born at this age (Idyll. 24).

Being compacted in blood. Παιεῖς ἐν αἵματι. St. Bernard expresses himself in the same manner, alluding, perhaps, to this very passage; Quid sum ego? Homo de humore liquido; fui enim in momento conceptionis de humano semine conceptus: deinde spuma illa coagulata, modicum crescendo, caro facta est (Mediat. cap. 2). Παιεῖς occurs in the like sense, Job. x. 10, in the most correct editions of the LXX. And Pliny uses coagulum upon the like occasion.

And the pleasure that came with sleep. The modesty and reservedness of this writer are here much to be admired; it is a resemblance of the great decency in the sacred writings upon the like occasion. ὕπνος in the original, rendered sleep by our translators, here means concupiscence; the Syriac version reads, concupiscencia concubitus. The like expression occurs, iv. 6, where bastards are called τέκνα ἐξ ἀνόμων ὑπνῶν (see note on that passage). And in this sense, I think, we may understand that expression of Terrence, "Interdum propter dormias" (Eunuch. act. ii. sc. 3). We find sleep understood in the like sense frequently by the Hellenist Jews, and the Platonists and in the following line of Homer:

Πάντων μὲν κῆρος ἱστί καὶ ὕπνου καὶ ψιλότῃρος.

Ver. 3. And when I was born, I drew in the common air, and fell upon the earth.] It is the most general opinion, that the fœtus does not respire or breathe in its mother's womb, but as soon as it is born, it then first begins to breathe, and cannot live without it. Galen, among the ancients, thought that it breathed before its birth; but Aristotle (lib. De Spir. cap. 3) is of a different opinion, and is followed herein by the moderns. This writer likewise seems to favour the negative. To point out the infant's helpless state after its birth, it is added, that he "fell upon the earth." The ancient Romans seem to intimate this, by their custom of laying the new-born infant immediately upon the bare ground, and imploring the help of the goddess Ops, to assist and bring it forward (St. Austin, De Civit. Dei, lib. iv. and Calmet in loc.).

And fell upon the earth, which is of like nature.] Coverdale renders, "I fell upon the earth, which is my nature." And the Syriac, Omnium more hominum, super terram decidi. So that probably ὁμοιοπαθὴς may be the true reading; and I have the satisfaction to find this conjecture confirmed by Junius, who renders in the nominative case, isidem perpassionibus infestus. The word ὁμοιοπαθὴς, which our translators have in this place very justly rendered, occurs, Acts xiv. 15, καὶ ἡμεῖς ὁμοιοπαθεῖς ἴσμεν ὅτιν ἄνθρωποι, where they have as remarkably misread; the true rendering of it, according to Erasmus, is, "We also are of like nature with you; and not 'Men of like passions with you,' as our version there has it; which destroys the beauty of the antithesis. It is judiciously rendered in the ancient Latin version, Mortales sumus, similes vobis homines, which, in the judgment of a great critic, is far preferable to the rendering of our translators (Bentley's Boyle's Lect. p. 179).

And the first voice which I uttered was crying, as all others do.] Instead of the common reading in all the editions, πρῶτην φωνὴν τὴν ὁμοίαν πάντων ἰσα, I would read, πρῶτην τε φωνὴν ὁμοίαν πάντων ἰσα seems tautology after ὁμοίαν. We have here, and in the context, a fine picture of human nature, and the state and condition of it very naturally represented in its several stages, viz. "That man is a creature turned naked into the wide world, and cast upon the bare ground, without any covering to shelter or defend him; that unfurnished with what is fit and necessary for him, he is bound up and swaddled, and requires help and teaching even for the very feeding and supporting himself; that he is perfect in no other instance of nature's teaching, except that of crying; this he brings into the world along with him, and a very fit emblem it is of our fortune and condition; that infirmities and miseries make up his middle state, and rottenness and worms his latter end; and histories of good authority assure us, that some nations welcome their children into the world with this salutation, 'Child, thou art come into this world to suffer, take it patiently, and hold thy peace'" (see Charron. De la Sagesse). And therefore Zoroastres' laughing when he was born, instead of crying, as all other children do, is remarked by many writers as a prodigy (Solin. Mirabil. lib. i.). In this just representation of the condition of human nature, our author imitates the true Solomon, who has drawn man at full length in his true colours and proportions, from the cradle to the grave. St. Chrysostom's observation upon this first stage of life is very apposite, viz. "That nature seems, by the cries of the infant, to foretell its future misery; and when God said to our first parents before the fall, 'Increase and multiply,' he intended it as a blessing; but it was a curse and a punishment upon Eve and her posterity, when he afterward told her, 'In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children'" (De Utilit. Lect. Script.). St. Austin's account is still more melancholy: Nascuntur homines homine generante, Deo create, peccato inficiente, diabolo possidente. But Pliny's description of the infant state is most natural, and comes nearest to this writer: Natura hominem tantum nudum, et in nuda humo, natali die abijcit, ad vagitus statim et ploratum; nullumque tot animalium aliud ad lacrymas, et has protinus vitæ principio—Ab hoc lucis rudimento (quo ne feras inter nos genitas) vincula excipiunt, et omnium membrorum nexu—infelicitate natus jacet, manibus pedibusque devinctis, fletus animal, cæteris imperaturum; et à supplicis vitæ animaspirat, unam tantum ob causam, quia natum est (Plin. Nat. Hist. lib. vii. in Proem.).

Ver. 6. For all men have one entrance into life, and the like going out.] The meaning is very plain and obvious, that all are born, and all must die; not that all depart by the same means, or in the same manner, as our version seems to countenance; for though there is but one passageway into life, there are, perhaps, a thousand ways out of it, and almost every accident sufficient, though different, to let in death. The word ἐξόδος, in the original, is the term used by sacred and profane writers for death, or a departure out of this life (see iii. 2. Eccles. xxxviii. 23; 2 Pct. i. 15.) The connexion of the following verse is intricate; nor is it easy to determine what ἐὰν οὗτο, or wherefore, refers to. I take the sense to be, that as his nature was the same with that of others, and wisdom was not a natural gift to him above others, therefore he prayed to God to bestow it on him.

Ver. 7. I called upon God, and the spirit of wisdom came to me.] Calmet observes, that throughout this book, we are to understand wisdom, or the spirit of wisdom, as synonymous to religion, piety, the fear of God, &c. in a sense far different from that in which wisdom is taken in the writings of the heathen philosophers, where wisdom has no connexion with, or relation to, religion, nor aims at its improvement, by enforcing the practice of virtue; its chief design appears to be only to make men more knowing, to brighten and improve their natural parts, to raise and elevate the genius, and to instil some dry, useless notions of an imperfect morality; Quelques connoissances steriles d'une morale fort imparfaite (Pref. sur le Liv. de la Sagesse.)

Ver. 8. I preferred her before sceptres and thrones, and esteemed riches nothing in comparison of her.] The author gives here, says the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal, une excellent marque pour juger si on a véritablement l'esprit de Sagesse et l'esprit de Dieu, &c. "an excellent rule to judge whether a man has the true spirit of wisdom and piety; for a truly sincere piety is that which esteems God above every thing, which desires nothing but him, which prefers his favour before thrones and sceptres, and, placing its whole happiness and crown of rejoicing in him, is pleased, easy, and contented, under the loss of all other things besides." Such was that elevated piety of St. Paul, which "counted all things but dung for, or in comparison of, the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus" (Phil. iii. 8.)

Ver. 9. Neither compared I unto her any precious stone.] Λίθον ἀρίστηνον, ὅτι ὁ πᾶς χρυσός, κ. τ. λ. Perhaps the true reading may be, λίθον ἀρίστηνον τοπάζιον, "I did not compare unto her the invaluable stone, the topaz;" see Job xxvii. 19, where the topaz and gold are joined together in the same verse, as not comparable to wisdom; nor does there seem an occasion for ὄρι or πᾶς; the former, probably, is improper, and the latter unnecessary. But I submit this conjecture to the learned.

Ver. 10. And chose to have her instead of light.] Ἀντὶ φωτός. Our version seems faulty here, for though ἀντὶ is often used in the sense in which it is taken by our translators, it is probably improper in this place. The meaning here is, That I determined to have her for a light or guide; in which sense ἀντὶ often occurs. The Vulgate accordingly reads, Proposui pro luce habere illam, and the Arabic, Elegi ut esset mihi pro luce, which is the sense of Junius. Coverdale follows the Vulgate, and renders, "I purposed to take her for my light;" to which agree the other ancient English versions. Or the meaning may be, that he chose her for the sake of her light, gratia lucis. There may be also another sense, that he chose her pro luce, before light, because, as it immediately follows, "The light that cometh from wisdom never goeth out, but after light succeeds darkness" (see ver. 30). In all these senses, ἀντὶ is used by good writers, whose authority will warrant our interpretation: any of which is preferable to that in our version. This and the two preceding verses seem taken from Job xxviii. 15, &c. and are a close imitation of that ancient writer. Or they may refer to Prov. viii. 10. xi. 18, 19.

Ver. 11. All good things together come to me with her, and innumerable riches in her hands. j. e. "Through her hands." So the Vulgate, per manus illius, which the ancient English versions follow. I have before observed, that this writer often personates Solomon, and this long prosopopœia is spoken under that borrowed character. This verse refers to that grant of wisdom which is mentioned 1 Kings iii. where Solomon, upon his advancement to the throne, prays earnestly to God for the direction and assistance of wisdom, without any mention made of wealth, honour, or long life; and God bestows upon him, for his disinterested piety, the two former in great abundance, though unasked, and even unexpected by him, together with "wisdom and understanding to discern judgment." The like promise of additional good things occurs in other parts of scripture, to such as "seek God's kingdom in the first place." And, indeed, throughout the whole history of the Old Testament, and particularly under the Mosaic dispensation, rewards and promises are annexed to piety or true wisdom, and almost all temporal advantages distributed in proportion to the degrees of it; as, favourable seasons, plenty, fruitfulness, health, peace, deliverance from dangers, and victory over enemies; which, though very valuable privileges, and such wherein the prosperity and welfare of any nation chiefly consist, are yet very far exceeded by those greater blessings, and more worthy of God's magnificence to bestow, reserved for the righteous in another state. On the other hand, wickedness, especially when it becomes general, draws down all the scourges of God's anger,—famine, plague, war, destruction, bondage; and is the true cause of the ruin of whole kingdoms. After this account, it may seem needless to mention the curse which it brings upon private families, which are often observed to dwindle away insensibly; and their prosperity, like Jonah's gourd, withers through the venom of this worm, which preys upon its vitals.

Ver. 12. And I rejoiced in them all, because wisdom goeth before them: Ἀνὼν ὑπεῖραι σοφία, i. e. Wisdom not only brings them with her, but conducts and heads them, like their leader and commander. The Geneva bible renders, "For wisdom was the author thereof;" but the rendering of Vatablus is more exact and judicious, Ut quorum caput sit sapientia, that wisdom was the head, or most valuable of all the gifts which God gave him. The Vulgate reads, without any authority, Quoniam antecesserat me sapientia, which seems not so proper or agreeable to this place.

Ver. 14. Which they that use become the friends of God, being commended for the gifts that come from learning. i. e. Recommended to God, which is the better rendering; and thus Coverdale's and the other ancient English versions understand it, which read, "And are accepted with him for the gifts of wisdom." Our translators followed a corrupt Greek copy in the first part of this sentence, which read, ὅν οἱ χρησάμενοι, and the Vulgate and Arabic seem to have followed the same; and so do the most ancient English versions: but we need no other argument to prove this a corrupt reading, than the badness of the Greek; for χρησάμενοι does not admit of such a construction. The Alexandrian MS. preserves the true reading, ὅν οἱ κηρύττεται, and the Syriac renders accordingly, qui possederint eam, i. e. they that possess wisdom enter into friendship with God, as the margin rightly has it (see ver. 27 of this chapter, and vi. 19, where the like sentiment occurs). For in corruption as it is there called, or a life led according to the rules of piety and wisdom, "maketh us near to God," and "to be allied unto wisdom" is not only the way to obtain immortality (viii. 13), but it is called (ver. 17), immortality itself. But that passage of St. Paul, "He that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit" (1 Cor. vi. 17), which can never enough be admired, points out the nearest intimacy and relation; such a happy and accomplished Christian is mystically one spirit with God, by a spiritual and more noble union than that of flesh. Our author probably refers in this passage to Abraham, who had the singular honour of so high a title, for he was called, says St. James, for his faith or righteousness, "the friend of God" (James ii. 2); and probably he should be so styled, Gen. xviii. 17, where Philo's reading is very observable, μη ἐπικαλεῖσθαι ἐγὼ ἀπὸ Ἀβραῆν φίλου μου, which our version wholly omits, and the LXX. express not so fully. The like observation may be made upon the ancient Vulgate, Judith viii. 26, where the rendering is, Pater noster Abraham per multas tribulationes probatus, Dei amicus effectus est: of which there is no mention in the LXX. nor in our translation of the place: it shows, however, the sense of those interpreters. And the like appellation we find given to Abraham by Clemens Romanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and other writers (see note on ver. 27).

Ver. 15. God hath granted me to speak as I would. Ex animi sententia, according to the Vulgate; but Coverdale's rendering is preferable, "God hath granted me to talk wisely." Ut consule loquar, says the Syriac; and Vatablus not less properly, Sententiosè. And so Calmet, de parler d'une manière sententieuse, et pleine de Sagesse, which the Greek phrase κατὰ γνώμην will well admit of. Some copies express this by way of prayer, ἐμπὶ ἐλπίδι ὁ θεός εἰσέτω, which is the marginal reading, and of the Syriac, and of St. Gregory (23 Mor. cap. 17.) but there is no reason for such an alteration, the sense of our version, which is followed by Calmet and all the commentators, exactly agreeing with the character of Solomon, whose fame for wisdom was such, that people came from all parts of the world to hear and be instructed by it: and we have the prayer for wisdom at length throughout the whole ninth chapter, so that it may seem here superfluous.

And to conceive as is meet for the things that are given me: Or, more properly, "to conceive, as is meet, of the things that are given me;" i. e. to have just and worthy sentiments of the gifts which I have received: D'avoir des sentimens dignes des dons que j'ai reçus, says Calmet. Our translators follow the Vatican copy, which reads ἀδοκίμως, which is the sense likewise of the Vulgate, and of the ancient English versions. The Alexandrian MS. prefers λεγομένως, which both the Syriac and Arabic interpreters follow, and seems indeed the truer reading.

Ver. 16. All wisdom also, and knowledge of workmanship. Even wisdom itself, which men are so apt to value themselves upon, and to boast of as their own, as being the supposed fruit of their own understanding, acquired with much industry and pains, must yet be acknowledged to come from God, τοῦ πατρὸς τῶν φώτων. The heathens themselves ascribed the first invention of the several arts and sciences to supernatural assistance, and looked upon the authors of them as so many gods; as if they were out of the power of unassisted reason, or man's bare ingenuity, to make such useful discoveries. But the honour which they ignorantly ascribed to some deified benefactor, with justice belongs to the true God; for, as Job expresses it, "It is the inspiration of the Almighty that giveth men understanding" (xxxii. 8). But what are we to understand by "the knowledge of workmanship," in the following part of the verse? The present reading of the Alexandrian, and the other copies, is ἐργασίων ἐπιστήμη, which seems to be a mistake, for no such word is to be met with; I think the true reading is, ἐργασίων ἐπιστήμη which is very properly expressed by, "the knowledge of workmanship," in our version. Vatablus renders with great judgment, operum scientia. And the Geneva bible expresses it accordingly, "the knowledge of the works," i. e. works of art. The sense is, that the attainment to a great perfection in these is the gift of God, and cannot be complete without his inspiration and assistance: for I am rather inclined to think, from the manner of expression, that wisdom and knowledge are not to be taken here in their usual high sense, and as they generally are in this writer, and in the book of Proverbs, but mean only extraordinary skill or accomplishment in work. Thus Exod. xxxi. 3 (which I am persuaded this passage refers to, and probably viii. 6), it is said that God called Bezaleel for the work of the tabernacle, and filled him with wisdom, and understanding, and knowledge, in all manner of workmanship, where ἐπιστήμη, σύνεσις, σοφία, are all used by the LXX. to express a great perfection in manual skill. And what follows in ver. 6, of that chapter, is very observable. "In the hearts of all that are wise-hearted (or ingenious) I have put (says God) wisdom, that they may make all that I have commanded them;" i. e. God, by an inspiration from above upon this occasion, endued the minds of all such ingenious persons as were employed with an extraordinary skill, which they could never have attained to it by their own industry, at least not so soon, nor so perfectly, as to go immediately and skillfully about the building of the tabernacle in the manner he designed it (see Patrick in loc.).

Ver. 17. To know how the world was made. Though philosophy, through the improvements which it has received in every age, may be able to explain the operations of the elements; how the clouds are engendered, the rain and thunder produced, the treasures of the snow and hail collected, and "where is the way in which light dwelleth," may judge of the force, qualities, and temperature, of the elements, and the sensible effects which they have upon human bodies, and understand the other phenomena of nature, which follow in this chapter, and are enumerated more at large, Job xxxviii. where God proposes the like questions, and challenges Job to answer them; yet this important truth of the creation of the world can only be certainly known, and truly understood, by communication from God, or revelation in his word: for neither can reason, nor philosophy, nor the best account in profane history, which takes in only temporal facts and events, give any satisfaction about the original of the world which we inhabit, whether it had a beginning, how or when it was made, by whom or to what end it was created, how it is supported and governed, whether it is continually decaying, or to last to all eternity: we learn nothing certain from thence, what we really are ourselves, what is our original, nature, design, and end. Whereas divine wisdom, imparted by God, and contained in sacred history, teaches us in a few words all these great truths; that the world was not the product of chance, but the work of God's power; that it was made in time; that he made it out of nothing, or rather called it into being by his almighty fiat, according to, and in the manner related in, the book of Genesis, so denominated from containing the true account of its creation; that his providence continues it in being, and God is almighty in that respect likewise; that man, the lord of the creation, sprang from the dust, and is resolvable into it at God's pleasure; that his infinite wisdom is no less displayed in the beauty, symmetry, and contrivance of the world, than his omnipotence in the act of creation; and in this latter sense I find the Vulgate understands this place, which renders dispositionem orbis terrarum, which seems rather to include the nature and constitution of the world, its order and economy, the arrangement and union of its several parts, their wonderful correspondence, relation, harmony, and mutual dependence, for the good of the whole. But in either sense, divine wisdom is the best instructor; it shows within this beauty and order first existed, who is the ὁ τοῦ κόσμου γενεσιάρχης (xiii. 3), and the fountain of all perfection. Calmet observes that the author here designed by his eulogium, to set forth the superiority of divine wisdom, and to advance it above the theology or philosophy of the heathens, d'elever la vraie sagesse au dessus de la philosophie des gentils (Comment. in loc.).

Ver. 18. The beginning, ending, and midst of the times: the alterations of the turnings of the sun, &c.] Origen understands by times here, the most early, the future, and the present times (Homil. 21. in Luc.): St. Ambrose reads rerum, instead of temporum, and expounds the place, of things done in ancient times, of events to come to pass hereafter, and the transactions of the present age (lib. ii. De Abrah. cap. 7): Grotius understands it of the several seasons of the year, their beginning, continuance, and ending, and their successive and regular returns, which is most agreeable to the context: the sense of the whole seems to be, that Solomon knew the greatest elongation or distance of the sun from the earth, and its nearest approach to it; the solstices, solstitiorum vicissitudines, says Vatablus, the equinoxes, and all the alterations which proceed from its course and motion through the celtipic; as the change of the seasons, the vicissitudes of day and night, the succession of time, and the revolution of years. As these phenomena succeed one another in the account of this writer, almost as regularly as they do in the heavens, it is surprising that the Vulgate here should translate ῥημάτων ἀλλαγὰς, morum mutationes, which has no manner of connexion with the subject. Our translators have rightly judged in applying it to the sun, and, by attending to the sense of the context, have avoided the equivocality of the Greek.

Ver. 19. The circuits of years, and the positions of stars:] Ἐνιαυτῶν κύκλους. By κύκλους in the plural number I would rather understand the cycles of years, the lunar and solar cycles, especially if these were known and used in this writer's time; and ἀστέρων θέσεις I would rather translate the "places of the stars," i. e. the longitude and latitude of them, which the word position does not so strictly express.

The violence of winds:] Πνευμάτων βίας. Junius renders, Spirituum vires, by which he understands the powers and faculties of the human soul: he thinks the mention of winds and their force very absurd in this place, and supports his conjecture from the very next sentence, which contains the "reasonings of men." Origen reads, Spirituum violentias, and understands the passage, of the power and violence of evil spirits; which is a probable interpretation enough, if there was any foundation for the tradition which he mentions of Solomon writing several books De Exorcismis (Homil. 21. in Luc.).

Ver. 20. The nature of living creatures, and the furies of wild beasts:] Calmet renders L'instinct des bêtes, ou leur penchant, "the temper, inclination, or instinct of beasts." This is agreeable to what is recorded of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 33), that "he spake of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes." And the account in the latter part of this verse, viz. his great skill in "the diversities of plants, and the virtues of roots," answers to the former part of the place referred to, viz. that "he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall." It is obvious to observe, that this writer very frequently assumes several particulars in the character of the real Solomon, with an artful design to pass for the same person, and to make his pretences more plausible, and his judgment more infallible.

Ver. 21. And all such things as are either secret or manifest, them I know.] Ὅσα σὺ ἐστὶν κρυπτὰ καὶ ἑρμηνεύ ἔγνω, which is the reading in all the printed copies, and followed by our translators; but there seems to be a mistake in all the editions: for where is the great wonder in Solomon's knowing things that are manifest; or what glory is there or excellency in any man to make such a discovery? the true reading undoubtedly is, ἀφανῆ, which is confirmed by the Alexandrian MS., by Eusebius, Præp. Evang. lib. ii. cap. 7, and St. Ambrose, De Abrah. lib. ii. cap. 7. The comment also of Messieurs du Port-Royal takes it in this sense, J'y appris tout ce qui estoit caché, et qui n'avoit point encore esté decouvert; i. e. such things as have not yet been discovered. The Vulgate very justly renders, Quæcunque sunt abscondita aut improvisa didici, which Coverdale's version follows, "All such things as are secret and not looked for, have I learned; which is the rendering likewise of the Doway Bible. Ἐρμηνεύ seems also a better reading than ἔγνω, as it agrees with εἰδέναι, which goes before, especially as it is connected with the conjunctive particle τε.

Ver. 22. For wisdom, which is the worker of all things, taught me:] Wisdom may be considered either as a divine attribute, the infinite wisdom of God, or as it is in some measure made known to, and participated by, a finite creature, not as the natural property of the creature, but as the superadded gift of God: it is capable therefore of very exalted epithets, as ὁ δὲ πάντων χωρῶν πνευμάτων νοστής, καθάρων, καὶ εἰς ψυχὰς δέσας μεταβαίνουσα φήδους Θεοῦ καὶ προφήτας κατασκευάζει (ver. 27). "It is a treasure that never faileth" (ver. 14). It may be "communicated liberally" to others (ver. 13). It maketh men speak wisely, and conceive as is meet (ver. 15). It is more to be desired, as being more profitable, than any thing else, and teaches the cardinal virtues, and every thing useful to be known (viii. 5—8). All the other epithets, as νοστής, ἅγιος, λεπτὸν, τρανὸν, ἀμύλιντον, σαφές, ἀπῆμαντον, φιλάγαθον, &c. will suit wisdom, either as original, and essential in God, or as it is communicated to, and may be considered as derivative in, man; for, as Calmet very judiciously observes, Ce qui est dit dans ce livre touchant la Sagesse, s'entend tantôt de la Sagesse incréée, et tantôt de la Sagesse incréée et inspirée aux hommes: this distinction is very necessary for the right understanding of this chapter.

Ver. 22, 23.] The author here, in his enumeration of the several excellencies and perfections of wisdom, seems to use different words of the same signification, to set forth his description the more copiously, and for the stronger conveyance of his own sentiments: but perhaps, upon a nicer attention to the peculiar force of the Greek words, and to their order and situation, a separate consistent sense may be given to each epithet; thus ἅγιον, and ἀμύλιντον commonly give the same sense, but in strictness are different; as are also ἐνεργητικὸν and ἀπῆμαντον; the negative in either case falls short in sense of the positive epithet. Our translators, indeed, who render ἀπῆμαντον, "not subject to hurt," i. e. incapable of receiving hurt, have explained away the true meaning of the word (see the note on i. 4, where the like mistake in our version is taken notice of); it means rather, not disposed or inclined to do hurt, and would be better rendered harmless, innocuous, according to Vatablus, the same as ἀπῆμων. The Geneva bible renders, not hurtful; and Coverdale's and the other English versions, following the Vulgate, sweet; which yet falls short of ἐνεργητικὸν, which means not only inoffensiveness, but a readiness to do positive acts of kindness. Βέβαιον and ἀσφαλές differ likewise in degree; for here the negative expresses more than the positive, viz. such a steadfastness as is not to be moved or shaken. Among the positives, τρανὸν and σαφές give commonly one sense, but they may be understood differently; the first may be expounded eloquent (see x. 21), the latter clear, or manifest.—The difference between λεπτὸν, εἰκίνητον, and ὀξύ, will best be explained by a parallel passage Heb. iv. 12. Ὁρῶ γὰρ ὃ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ ἐνεργῆς, καὶ τομωτέρος ὑπὲρ πᾶσαν μάχαιραν, καὶ διεικνύμενος ὅχρι μερισθῆναι ψυχῆς τε καὶ πνεύματος, ὁρῶν τε καὶ μελέδων, καὶ κρητικὸς ἐνθυμησιῶν καὶ ἐνοσιῶν καρδίας. Λεπτὸν, subtle, i. e. piercing into the secrets of men's hearts, answers to the latter part of that verse; εἰκίνητον answers to ἐνεργῆς in the beginning, i. e. active, or operative, which is more expressive than lively; ὀξύ may as well signify sharp, and so indeed Coverdale's version has it, and the Vulgate, and Junius, and that it answers to τομωτέρος ὑπὲρ πᾶσαν μάχαιραν, in the middle; which passage will equally explain the twenty-fourth verse of this chapter.—By μονογενής, πολυμερής, may be understood, that wisdom is in its origin or fountain simply one and the same in God, la même, says Calmet, en substance et en nature, but variously expressed, and infinitely diversified in his works. The thought is not very unlike that of St. Paul, "There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit; and there are diversities of administrations, but the same Lord; and there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God that worketh all in all" (1 Cor. xii. 4—6), in which sense it is farther said of wisdom (ver. 27), that, "being but one, she can do all things, and remaining in herself, she maketh all things new" (see note on that place).

Ver. 23. Going through all understanding (i. e. intellectual) pure, and most subtle spirits. This may be understood in two senses, according to the different reading of the Greek; our version follows the Vatican edition, which reads ἐκ πάντων γωρῶν πνευμάτων νοερῶν, καθάρων, λεπτοτάτων. According to that, the sense is, that wisdom, as a divine attribute, not only penetrates into things corporeal, but things spiritual and intellectual; is not only a discernor of the thoughts and intentions of the heart, but the several orders and degrees of intellectual beings, even the most pure and invisible spirits, how knowing or subtle soever, are subject to it, and within its influence. The Vulgate reads in the nominative case, intelligibilis, mundus, subtilis, which Coverdale's version and the Syriac follow, from a copy, doubtless, which read, νοερῶν, καθάρων, λεπτοτάτων, still applying each particular epithet to wisdom itself, exclusive of the consideration of other spirits.

Ver. 24. For wisdom is more moving than any motion: she passeth and goeth through all things by reason of her pureness. The account of Canilla's swiftness, according to Virgil's beautiful description of it, is surprising and incredible:

— "Assueta pedum cursu prævertere ventos:
Illa vel intactæ segelis per summa volaret
Gramina, nec teneras cursu læsisset aristas:
Vel mare per medium, ductu suspensa tumentis,
Ferret itur, celeres nec tingeret æquore plantas,"

(Æneid. lib. vii.)

No bodily motion can be conceived to exceed this in quickness; but the spirit of wisdom being incorporeal, and, by reason of her pureness not meeting with any sensible resistance or impediment, far surpasses it; nay, she is quicker than thought, because she pervades the mind itself, is not only present to men's thoughts, but prevents and influences them: "She meeteth them," as this writer elegantly expresses it, "in every thought," (vi. 16). Elle vient au devant d'eux dans tous les bonnes pensées qu'ils forment; and powerfully acts upon the will to put such good thoughts and resolutions into practice. And this power she exerts in an instant, and carries her view through all things at the same time, which perhaps is Fulgentius' meaning, when he translates this place, Attingit ubique propter suam munditiam (De persona Christi, lib. ii.). In this sense wisdom may be said to be, Permeator universitatis; which short sentence of Seneca is more expressive than the many metaphysical circumlocutions of the schoolmen.

Ver. 25. She is the breath of the power of God. Ἀρπὶς τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ δυνάμεως; i. e. The afflatus of the Almighty; where ἀρπὶς, even applied to eternal wisdom itself, is not such a degrading or diminutive term, as Capellus, in his strictures upon this book, has represented it; for ἀρπὶς may be considered as equivalent to πνεῦμα; and our translators, we may observe, render accordingly ἀρπὶς by breath: but it certainly stands clear of that objection, if understood of infused or derivative wisdom, communicated from God to his saints and prophets in such degrees and proportions as were necessary. Plato makes use of the same image, and represents wisdom as a vapour, or spark of celestial fire, communicated from heaven to men (Plato in Protag.). The like thought is to be met with in Philo, De Somniis.

A pure influence flowing from the glory of the Almighty. Ἀπὸ θόρας ὀφθη, i. e. A pure efflux or emanation issuing from God's glory; which is more agreeable to the Greek than influence, which our version uses. The Vulgate reads, Emanatio quædam claritatis, which the ancient English versions follow: or it may be rendered, in fewer words, "a glorious emanation of the Deity." Some of the primitive writers express themselves in like manner concerning the Ἀγίος, whom they style πρῶτον Θεοῦ: we meet with the like expression, Eccles. v. 6, which a learned writer translates, "the personating Shechinah of God" (Tension on Idol. p. 334). And for the same reason he is called "the angel of his face," by Philo and the ancient Jews, because he truly reflected the glory of his person.

Ver. 26. She is the brightness of the everlasting light. i. e. Wisdom is an effulgence or ray streaming from the original fountain of light, the resplendence of the eternal glory, and the reflection of its brightness. St. James accordingly styles God, from whom all wisdom and illumination proceed, ἡ ἀρχὴ τῶν φῶτων (i. 17). It is observable that the word used by our author for brightness, is ἀπαύγασμα, the very same that is made use of in the Epistle to the Hebrews (i. 3), which by Estius upon the place is very properly rendered deradiatio (see also Leigh's Critica Sacra in voce ἀπαύγασμα). This similitude of a ray from the sun, or light from light, must be allowed to be a fine illustration, and a proper representation of the infinite wisdom of God, considered as a divine attribute; and the same has been applied to illustrate the consubstantiality of the Ἀγίος. Thus Justin Martyr says, that he proceeds from the Father, ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡλίου φῶς, "as light from the sun;" and in another place, ὡς ἀπὸ πυρὸς πυρᾶ, "as fire from fire" (Dial. cum Tryph.). And by the Nicene council he is called more closely, "Light of Light:" but whether any such notion is here meant, or the Ἀγίος described by our author, shall be considered under the next words.

The unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of his goodness. Limpidissimum divina virtutis speculum according to Vatablus; i. e. she is the true and unsullied glass in which we may discern the beauty of God's works, which therefore reflects his power in the strongest and best light, and exhibits the perfection of his goodness. One cannot help observing, that, from ver. 21 to the end of the chapter, the epithets thicken, and that the character of wisdom is expressed in a very sublime style, a magnificence and grandeur of language, and in terms seemingly importing divinity itself. Hence some have taken occasion to imagine, that something more and higher is contained herein, than an encomium of wisdom considered in its highest denomination, as a divine attribute, and have applied therefore these passages to the person of the Ἀγίος, or to the Holy Spirit. And indeed it must be confessed, that however originally intended, they may, by way of accommodation, be so used and applied, and considered as expressive similes, to illustrate the eternal generation; nor is the manner of expression very unlike that of Heb. i. 3, which is very full and explicit on that occasion; and it must be further allowed, that these passages have been so understood and explained by most of the commentators, and even some of the fathers, many of whom use expressions concerning the Ἀγίος, very much resembling these, and endeavour to explain that mystery by the very same similitudes and illustrations (see Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph.; Epiphanius in Anomæo. Hæres. cap. 3., et cont. Æthum. Hæres. 76.; Holstani Dissert. 2., in loc. quæd. Concil. Nicæn., and Waterland's Serm. passim). And some of the primitive writers, to confirm their point, have actually quoted and argued from these very passages (see particularly Fulgentius de Persona Christi, ad Trasimund. lib. ii.). Philo, who speaks the sentiments of the ancient Jews, and is by some thought the author of this book, from its great resemblance to many of his notions, has some expressions in relation to the Ἀγίος, very similar to these, De Confus. Linguar. and De Monarchia, which others, with more probability, contend he borrowed from hence. But as this kind of reasoning, drawn from authorities, is precarious and inconclusive, and slender or suspicious proofs are really disserviceable to a cause; and as that great mystery, of the eternal generation and coequality of the Ἀγίος, is sufficiently established by canonical and undoubted scripture, and wants not to be defended by any disputed testimony, non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis; I rather incline to the following sense, viz. That the writer of this book, who personates, and, as far as he can, imitates, Solomon, observing in the book of Proverbs, particularly chap. viii., how wisdom is praised under the character of a divine female, or celestial beauty, pursues the same figure or image in a more copious and encomiastic way, using indifferently wisdom and the spirit of wisdom, as the same beautiful object, which he loved, and desired to make his spouse, &c. But though he speaks of her as an intelligent person, and personal acts are ascribed to her, yet this seems to be a figurative way of writing, taken, as I said, from Solomon's Proverbs. And if the well-known passages in the chapter above cited be scarce allowed to be understood of the Ἀγίος (see Bishop Patrick's argument to that chapter, and the writers in the Trinitarian controversy), much less reason have we to assert these passages of the Book of Wisdom to belong to the Ἀγίος, or to the Holy Spirit, considered as persons in the Godhead. For if this encomium be supposed to come from any (Hellenistic) Jew, or even from the pen of Solomon, such titles and attributes of the Divinity, if interpreted of the Ἀγίος, or Holy Spirit, seem incompatible with those times. I am therefore more inclined to understand this high encomium of a divine attribute, the infinite wisdom of God, communicated sometimes, according to the exigence of the occasion, to his saints and prophets in different portions, as a.

drop from his fulness (ver. 27), and then there will be no occasion to suppose these passages to be an addition or interpolation of some Christian writer, who borrowed ideas and expressions from the New Testament, which seems to be the sentiment of Grotius, with respect to many passages of this book; but how far his conjecture is right, and whether it is always safe to follow him, I shall not determine. I shall only subjoin Calmet's remark upon this assertion, and answer in his words: "Grotius s'est imaginé que ces passages y avoient été ajoutés par quelque Chrétien depuis la mort du Sauveur; ce qui est contre toute sorte d'apparence, ces passages étant tellement liés avec la suite du discours, qu'on ne peut les en séparer sans violence" (Pref. sur le Livre de la Sagesse): i. e. "The passages objected against are so interwoven with the rest of the subject, and have such a necessary relation to the context, that they cannot be separated without manifest violence." And the same learned writer there observes, that this author often speaks of wisdom, considered as an attribute only, even in the most pompous and magnificent terms, and applies to it that which in strictness only belongs to the Deity itself. In this comment upon this place he has this farther remark, which will justify my sense of it. "That as it is very common in natural cases, to assign to the effect many properties and attributes of the cause; so in matters spiritual, that perfection is frequently attributed to qualities proceeding from God, which strictly belongs only to the Holy Spirit which communicated them."

Ver. 27. And remaining in herself, she maketh all things new: i. e. She is the author of all changes and spiritual renovations, though herself remains unchangeable; 'Toujours immuable en elle-même, elle renouvelle toutes choses. St. Austin explains this renovation, and shows from whence it proceeds; De plenitudine ejus accipiunt animæ, ut beatæ sint, et participatione manentis in se Sapientie renovantur, ut Sapientes sint (Confess. lib. xii. cap. 9). The scripture furnishes us with many instances of her good offices and kindness to men in this particular; all graces are ministered to us by her, and she purifies the soul, to make it fit to receive them; she enlightens men's understandings with the knowledge of saving truths, disposes and inclines their wills to virtuous and holy actions, and comforts and supports them in the discharge of their duty under the greatest difficulties and discouragements. And though her communications are so various, and, with respect to all ages and nations, may be considered as infinite, yet her nature continues unchangeable. What Plato says of God with a very remarkable emphasis, is very applicable to her, οὐδέποτε, οὐδὰμ, οὐδὰμὸς ἀλλοίωσεν εὐεργίαν ἐνδύεται (Plato in Phæd.).

And in all ages entering into holy souls, she maketh them friends of God, and prophets.] Karà γενοῖς, which may be interpreted either of ages or nations; the Vulgar takes it in the latter sense. This observation is not only true of Abraham (see note on ver. 14), and Moses, whom God favoured in an especial manner, and admitted to a more particular intimacy (Exod. xxxii. 11. Philo de Mose, lib. i.), but of David, whom God "took away from the sheep-folds, that he might feed Jacob his people and Israel his inheritance" (Ps. lxxviii. 71, 72). The like may be said of Joseph, and the other instances of this truth, mentioned by this writer in the tenth and eleventh chapters; from whose history it appears, that divine wisdom, without any respect of persons, in every age and nation, makes choice of such as are well disposed, to confer her favours and blessings on, and sanctifies them, by her inhabitation and presence, for her own great purposes. True religion, indeed, seemed for some time as it were confined to Judea, and the Jews to have been only entrusted with sacred truths; but yet we sometimes find the spirit of wisdom discovering herself to other people, and enlightening them amidst their ignorance and darkness. It is more than probable, that God made uncommon discoveries of himself to Job, and that in proportion to the greatness of his sufferings, he was favoured with a greater degree of light, and larger communications of divine knowledge (see Bp. Sherlock, Dissertat. 2). The like may be observed of Balaam, who, according to scripture, "heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the Most High" (Num. xxiv. 16), which implies some discovery of God's will to him; and as a prophet he foresaw and foretold what should happen in the latter end; and particularly, has left a very remarkable prophecy relating to the Messiah. We are sometimes surprised with uncommon discoveries in the writings of heathen philosophers, and the several important truths therein scattered, seemingly above the reach of mere unassisted reason, are enough to convince us, that divine wisdom has communicated itself in all ages, and conversed with her favourites in every generation. As to the gift of prophecy here mentioned, it is certain, that the qualifications that did fit a man for the prophetic spirit, which rendered him habilem ad prophetandum, were inward piety, true wisdom, probity, and virtue. The rabbins universally agree in this, that the spirit of prophecy never rested but upon a wise and good man; and no instance, says Maimonides (More Nevoe. par. ii.), can be mentioned of its ever dwelling in a vicious person, unless he had first reformed himself; and among the preparatory dispositions for obtaining it, he reckons the perfection of virtuous qualities or manners, a heart purified and free from sinful affections and sensual passions. Hence we find, that anciently many were trained up in the way of school-discipline, and fitted by religious nurture to become Candidati Prophetie (see Smith's Sel. Disc. on Prophecy, chap. 8, 9). And the several schools of education at Naioth, Jerusalem, Bethel, Jericho, Gilgal, were only so many colleges for disciplining and training up young scholars in those preparatory qualifications which might more dispose them for the gift of prophecy.

Ver. 29. For she is more beautiful than the sun—being compared with light, she is found before it.] This is true of wisdom, considered as a divine attribute, in many respects: 1st, Because the sun, the stars, and the whole system of inanimate bodies, are not fit to be opposed in value to the human mind or spirit; for the enlarged intellectual powers, and improved faculties of the mind, can arrive at the knowledge, and explain the glories, of the firmament; whereas the sun, though a most glorious body, is utterly insensible, and has no consciousness of that light which he gives to others: which prerogative of the mind, Tully finely remarks; Nec vero illa parva vis est rationis, quod eorum ipsorum, quæ aspectu sentiantur, nullum aliud animal pulchritudinem, venustatem, convenientiam partium sentit (Cic. De Off. lib. i.). 2dly, As divine wisdom formed and fashioned the glorious body of the sun, it is not only prior to it, or before it in point of time, which is the sense of the Vulgate, but it must be in the order of causes and effects, more beautiful and excellent than any or all the creatures; Vatablus therefore renders with great judgment, Luci comparatas, potior deprehenditur. 3dly, the sun cannot make that which is deformed or ugly to be beautiful, and his light is often hurtful and injurious to tender and diseased eyes; his beams are too bright to be borne sometimes, they not only dazzle and confound, but frequently hurt and weaken the sense: but wisdom never offends by its excess, the brighter and more heavenly it is, the more she pleases, and where she finds any moral defects or imperfections, she removes or amends them. Is the soul polluted and disfigured by trespasses and sin? Divine wisdom purifies it by the infusion of her supernatural grace. Do any wander in darkness and error? she guides and assists them by the brightness of her saving truths. Are any sensible of their sad estate, and really desirous of a cure? She giveth medicine to heal their sickness. So that what was said by Tully of virtue, and has been so justly applauded, is equally applicable to the spirit of wisdom, "That could we behold all her charms, the whole world would be infinitely in love with her" (Cic. Off. lib. i.).

Ver. 30. For after this cometh night:] That wisdom does thus exceed the light, is manifest from this farther argument, because night constantly succeeds the day, and therefore the light is as constantly interrupted by darkness. But divine wisdom admits of no such privations or inequalities; it has no mixture of light and darkness, of good and evil, but is always the same. "yesterday, to-day, and for ever." St. Austin reasons in like manner upon the transitoriness of worldly things: Omnis iste ordo pulcherrimus rerum valde bonarum, modis suis peractis, transiturus est, mane quippe in eis factum est et vespera (Confess. lib. xiii. cap. 35). But St. Chrysostom comes nearest this writer, and has the very same thought applied to grace; οὐχ οὐτως ὁ κόσμος ἐστὶ λαμπρὸς, κ. τ. λ. Non sic mundus clarus est oriente sole, ut anima illustratur et splendidior fit, à Spiritu gratiam recipiens: hanc nempe lucem et volentibus nobis et nolentibus nox subsequitur (οὐδὲν μὲν γὰρ διαφέρει τοῦ νυκτός, which are the very words of our author); illum verò radium tenebræ non nōrunt (Homil. 21, ad Pop. Antiochi.).

But vice shall not prevail against wisdom.] If we attend only to what passes ordinarily in life, this observation may perhaps seem not to be altogether just or well grounded; for human wisdom, or that which God is pleased to communicate to mankind, is subject to many frailties; as "the bewitching of naughtiness" will obscure men's reason, so the "wandering of concupiscence" quite perverts and undermines it (iv. 12). Such as have been admired in all other instances for their wisdom, have been hurried away by sinful passions, and the finest understanding has been found a weak fence against a criminal passion. Solomon himself is a lamentable instance of this truth, who fell shamefully, notwithstanding his singular accomplishments; and his wisdom served only to heighten his transgression and disgrace. We must understand this writer, therefore, of divine wisdom, which sin cannot approach, nor its contagion sully, much less can the power of it prevail over her. Grotius understands this place of adversity, and refers to Matt. vi. 34, where κακία, the term here used, is taken in that sense. According to this acceptance the opposition is no less just and beautiful, for as prosperity is the sunshine of fortune, so adversity may be considered as its shade; in this view, the meaning is, that however dark the cloud may be, which hangs over a good man, yet shall it not overwhelm him; though misery be his lot, as it is too often the fate of goodness, yet shall it not get the better of him; "We are troubled on every side (says St. Paul, speaking of himself and other suffering Christians), yet not distressed; we are perplexed but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down but not destroyed" (2 Cor. iv. 8. 9). And even in such a catastrophe, when vice is so triumphant and successful as to destroy a good and virtuous man, yet if we take in the consideration of another life, the righteous, however afflicted or tormented, will be found to have come off conqueror.

CHAP. VIII.

ARGUMENT.—The praise of wisdom is continued, which, upon a comparison of the most desirable things in life, is shown to be preferable to them, and, from an induction of several valuable and weighty particulars, she appears to be the procurer of such great advantages, and ought, therefore, to be honoured and followed after by such as have the greatest regard to their own happiness. The chapter concludes with the proper dispositions to obtain wisdom.

Ver. 1. Wisdom reacheth from one end to another mightily; and sweetly doth she order all things.] i. e. The divine wisdom is infinite and immense, extends itself throughout the whole world, and does every thing in it mightily, that is, effectually, in respect of the end, and sweetly, that is, without any violence or difficulty, in the use of the means. This is the sense of the Arabic version: Porrigit autem sese, ab extremo terrarum orbe ad extremum usque integrè. St. Bernard expounds it in the same manner: Attingit à fine usque ad finem, i. e. à summo cælo usque ad inferiores partes terræ: à maximo angelo usque ad minimum vermiculum, substantiali quâdam et ubique præsentî fortitudine, quæ utique universa potentissime movet, ordinat, et administrat suaviter, i. e. sine necessitate aut difficultate (Bern. Lib. De Grat. et lib. Arbitr. See also Fulgentius De Persona Christi, lib. ii.). But by sweetly, we may further understand the manner in which the divine wisdom works upon men's minds; for she begins the great work of salvation in men's hearts, by overruling them through her motions and impressions, inclining them to their duty, and assisting them in the performance of it; and at length, having happily perfected it, she conducts them to glory and a blessed end of their labours. But though she reaches from one end to the other of this important event, and acts powerfully upon the soul to bring it to pass; yet she does it sweetly, and without any violence or inconsistency with men's free agency: she encourages them by all the endearing methods, and in the most engaging manner, to their duty; and by this amiable mixture of sweetness, tempers and softens the yoke, which would otherwise be complained of as hard and rigorous.—Some have understood these words of God's foreknowledge, that his prescience reacheth to the end of the world, and by it he foresaw, from all eternity, all future events, even to the consummation of all things; so that, when the whole mystery of God's dispensations shall be finished and unravelled, it will appear, that nothing is contained in them but what God had formerly foretold and declared by his prophets (see Lowth's preface to his Comments). And to this purpose he applies what Isaiah says of God's foreknowledge (xlv. 10), that "he declares the end from the beginning;" an expression, it must be owned, not very unlike that of this writer. I shall only observe farther, that this verse, in some copies, is made the conclusion of the former chapter.

Ver. 3. In that she is conversant with God, she magnifieth her nobility:] This is but indifferently expressed; it would be better rendered literally thus, "Herein she displays her high birth, that she exists with God, and is intimately united to him." Elle fait voir la gloire de son origine, en ce qu'elle est étroitement unie à Dieu, says Calmet. Vatablus very properly renders, Nobilitatem generis ejus hoc illustrat, quod convictu Dei utitur; συμβίωσαν θεῷ ἐχουσα, which is imperfectly rendered in our version, "conversant with God," as that phrase is now commonly understood, for it implies much more, viz. that wisdom, as a divine attribute (for I would understand the place of this principally), is intimately united with God, lives always in and with him, and is inseparable from him, as his spouse and partner; and thus συμβίωσις is used ver. 9 (see more in that note). Nor is it better expressed in the Vulgate by contubernium. The Syriac version uses consortium; but those interpreters, as if they were sensible of some defect, and that they had not reached the force of the original, add immediately after, by way of explanation, quoniam Deus est pater ejus. Philo, in his allegorical way, explains the nearness of this relation between God and wisdom; his words are a close and excellent comment upon this place, τὸν γοῦν τόδε τὸ πᾶν ἐργασάμενον ἐπιστροφὴν ἑαυτοῦ καὶ πατέρα εἶναι τοῦ χειροῦτος, μητέρα δὲ τῆς τοῦ πνευματικῆς ἐπιστήμης, ἥ συνὼν ὁ θεός ἐσπερε γίνεσθαι (Phil. De Ebriet. et alibi). In a lower sense we may understand this passage of human or derivative wisdom, that this likewise shows her great worth, and singular excellence, in that God himself vouchsafes to communicate himself to, and converse with, a truly wise soul, not in dreams by night, as with Joseph; not by an audible voice, as with St. Paul; but with the "still small voice," speaking to the soul, in breathings not to be uttered.

Ver. 4. She is privy to the mysteries of the knowledge of God.] The marginal reading is teacher, which agrees with the Vulgate, Doctrinæ enim est disciplinæ Dei, and with Μόρσις ἐπιστήμης in the Greek; for Μόρσις is a technical term, and, according to Budæus, signifies an interpreter of sacred mysteries. The sense here is, that divine wisdom can best teach the knowledge of God, reveal its mysteries, and initiate men into them, as "knowing the deep things of God," and being in his bosom, cannot but be privy to them. And so the Syriac happily renders, Ipsa est a secretis Dei, et à consiliis ejus.

And a lover of his works.] Alperis, with which agrees the marginal reading; and the Vulgate renders in like manner, Electrix operum ejus, "Chooser of his works." Dr. Grabe and Budæus read eliperis. According to either reading the sense seems to be, that the divine wisdom designed, contrived, and appointed God's works, as is declared more explicitly in the two following verses. Calmet understands it in a more extensive sense, of wisdom's superintendency and direction of his works, qui est la directrice de ses ouvrages. The Syriac and Arabic versions understand this passage of wisdom in the most exalted sense; the former reads, Gloria cunctorum operum ejus, and the latter, Sublimior dignitate cunctis operibus ejus.

Ver. 5. What is richer than wisdom, which worketh all things? Sapientiâ omnium rerum artifice, according to the Arabic; and the Syriac renders, Quandoquidem ipsa fecit omnia. But the meaning probably here is, that skill and wisdom make men successful and thriving in every business and calling, and are the most likely means to procure men reputation and a good fortune, "Riches and honour are with wisdom," says the true Solomon (Prov. viii. 18), who could confirm this truth from his own plentiful experience of both, which God annexed to his gift of wisdom. But we must observe at the same time of wisdom, that she teaches men rather the contempt, than an immoderate and eager pursuit of riches; to be content with a little, and to esteem spiritual attainments, and the improvements of the soul, as their chiefest good, their truest riches.

Ver. 6. And if prudence work;] Εἰ δὲ φρόνησις ἐργάζεσθαι, i. e. If skill and industry produce the most admired works of art, who is so justly to be esteemed the author of them, as wisdom, the most accomplished, and, I may add, universal artist? and is therefore, with great propriety, called, πάντων τεχνῶν σοφία (vii. 22), for she presides over every instance of science, directs and perfects it. Instead of ἐργάζεσθαι, which is the common reading, and followed by our translators, Dr. Grabe reads ἐπάρεσθαι, as more agreeable to what goes before and follows after, viz. εἰ δὲ παρόρος ἐπιστήμη τὴν κτῆμα (ver. 5), εἰ δικαιοσύνην ἀγαπᾷ τις (ver. 7), εἰ πολυπερίαν ποιεῖ τις. Expressions all equivalent to ἐπάρεσθαι (see Prolegom. cap. 4). In the midst of these he thinks it comes in very properly, "And if prudence is admired and loved;" the only objection with him is, that ἐπάρεσθαι is a poetical word, which will indeed have but little weight, if what that learned critic seems to insinuate be true, that the book of Wisdom was originally written in metre. It is certain he has placed it among the metrical books, and in the Alexandrian MS. it preserves the appearance of verse, as well as the book of Psalms, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, &c. Calmet also is of opinion, that it was written in metre (see his Dictionary in voce Wisdom). However the learned may determine about this nicety, still I am of opinion, that ἐργάζεται is not only the true but the better reading; for φρονέω without it is too general, and may be applied to any thing else as well as work, and for want of it the beauty of the next sentence is lost. The same words very nearly occur together, vii. 16 (see note on that place), and in Exod. xxxi. where works of different sorts are mentioned; ἐργάζεται is the term used often upon the occasion.

[Who of all that are is a more cunning workman than she?] Τίς αὐτῆς τῶν ὄντων μᾶλλον ἔστι τεχνίτης; The ancient Vulgate reads, Quis horum quæ sunt magis quam illa est artifex? which can neither relate to persons nor things, as different interpreters have understood the place; not to the former, as our version takes it, for then the reading should be, Quis horum qui sunt, &c. not to the latter, as Coverdale's version and the Geneva bible have it, for then it should be, Ecquid horum quæ sunt, &c. or something to that effect, and in the Greek. Τί τῶν ὄντων; as in the verse foregoing it is, Τί σοφίας πλουσιώτερον. I think, therefore, the sense of this place has hitherto been mistaken, and that the true rendering of it, as it stands connected with the context, is, "If wisdom is so good a worker as to work all things, who has a better claim, or is more likely to be the maker, τῶν ὄντων, of all things existing?" This sense the very placing and structure of the Greek points out to us; it is likewise the meaning of the Vulgate quoted above, and probably of Junius, who renders, Quis eorum quæ in natura sunt, artifex potius est quam ipsa? Messieurs du Port-Royal understand it of wisdom, as being the supreme directress and architect, by whom all things were made, Qui a plus de part qu'elle dans cet art, avec lequel toutes choses ont esté faites? (see Rom. iv. 17).

Ver. 7. If a man love righteousness, her labours are virtues: This is obscurely expressed: the meaning is, that wisdom produces the several following virtues, or that they are her work; for the very end and scope of wisdom is, to make men just and virtuous, considerate and resigned; and that which does not propose this as its object, may be looked upon as curiosity, folly, or vanity. The pursuit therefore of wisdom, necessarily leads to the four cardinal virtues, as they are distinguished, which compose righteousness, considered in its largest sense; and the following virtues, or graces, are so many branches of it: for temperance teaches men moderation, and a restrained use of pleasures and the good things of the world; fortitude, how to bear and behave under the evils and afflictions of it; prudence is employed in finding out and making use of proper ways and means; and justice in a fair and impartial rendering to all their dues. Philo has exactly the same thought and distinction, expressed only in his allegorical way, upon Gen. ii. 10, "A river went out of Eden, and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads;" which he thus allegorizes, Fluvius est virtus generalis, quatuor autem derivationes sunt totidem virtutes ex Edene, id est sapientiâ Dei, effluentes; nimirum, prudentia, temperantia, fortitudo, justitia. Prudentia circa agenda, terminos illis ponens: fortitudo sustinendo; temperantia eligendo; justitia suum cuique tribuendo (SS. Legum Allegoriarum, lib. i.). Which are the four species here enumerated, arising from one common fountain-head, viz. righteousness.

Ver. 8. If a man desire much experience, Πολυπειρίαν, The Vulgate renders more justly, Multitudinem scientiæ, to which Coverdale's version agrees, "If a man desire much knowledge;" the Syriac is to the same effect, Si quis item cupiat admodum esse peritus, which Vatablus also favours. The word experience, seems here improper and disagreeable to what follows; for experience cannot possibly relate to what is to come, nor foresee any future events; but wisdom can prognosticate what shall happen, can foresee the changes of weather, and foretell eclipses of the sun and moon, which are called here signs and wonders: for anciently such discoveries were extremely rare, and the ignorance of the people was so great, that they looked upon such phenomena as prodigies. Plutarch remarks, that "Anaxagoras, and such as first discovered and explained the causes of them, durst not speak in public, for fear of being thought atheists or magicians, but instructed their disciples in the reason of them privately, and by word of mouth, without committing their observations to writing" (In vit. Nicææ).

Ver. 9. I purposed to take her to me to live with me, Ἐκρίνα ταύτην ἀγάγεσθαι πρὸς συμβίωσιν. "I purposed to take her to be my partner for life, to be my spouse," as is expressed ver. 2, for I understand ἀγάγεσθαι in both places to refer to the marriage ceremony of leading the bride to the bridegroom's house. What follows seems to confirm this acceptance, for she was to be to him his bosom counsellor, "bona daturam consilia," says Vatablus, one that would faithfully advise him in all difficulties, comfort him tenderly in all afflictions, and kindly divide his cares and griefs with him; which is the description of a happy marriage. The reading of all the copies is, παραινέσις φρονήδων, possibly παραινέσις may be the true reading, agreeably to μέγιστος, ἐμπερίσι σύμβουλος, which go just before, adhortatrix.

Ver. 11. I shall be found of a quick conceit in judgment, and shall be admired in the sight of great men. This was eminently true of the real Solomon, as appears by that distinguishing judgment which he showed in the case of the two contending harlots, when by a nice decision he brought to light what artifice and dissimulation had concealed, and artfully found a way to come at even the bottom of the heart, and to unravel its most secret intentions; for, by an appearance of severity only, without any violence to the parent or the child, nature herself at once declared, by the motions and sentiments of either tenderness or indifference, which were then visible without disguise, which was the counterfeit, and which the real, mother; upon which the text adds, "That all Israel heard of the judgment, which the king had judged; and they feared the king, for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment" (1 Kings iii. 28).

Ver. 12. If I talk much, they shall lay their hand upon their mouth. It is a proverbial expression, and implies silence (see the like, Eccles. v. 12. Prov. xxx. 32). The poet well expresses it, digito compece labellum; accordingly Harpocrates, by the ancients feigned to be the god of silence, is pictured with his finger on his mouth, to recommend, by this expressive gesture, either a well-timed silence, or at least a discreet government of the tongue (see Stephan. Diet. Histor. in voce).

Ver. 15. I shall be found good among the multitude, and valiant in war. We have here the two essential qualities to constitute a complete prince, goodness in the care and management of his own people, and valour to head them in any warlike expedition against others. Alexander the Great is said to have studied much, and repeated often, that fine maxim of Homer, which the expression of this writer very much resembles, and is worthy indeed of the true Solomon:

Ἀμρότερον, βασιλεὺς τ' ἀγαθός, κρατερός τ' αἰχμητής, Virgil has happily expressed the same thought in the following line;

"Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos."

Where both these celebrated poets agree with our author, in making the excellence of a king to consist in goodness and clemency to his own subjects, and in martial courage to reduce an insulting enemy; in being amiable to the one, and terrible to the other. So that even according to the notion of paganism, a prince is only so far great, as he is tender and careful of his subjects: nor should he think of his power but with a view to do good, and, in imitation of the title of the gods, to place the character of very good before very great, to be optimus maximus, like Jupiter, from whom he derives his power. Seneca has an observation to the same purpose, "Proximum Diis locum tenet, qui se ex Deorum natura gerit; hoc affectare, hoc imitari debet, maximum ita haberi, ut optimus simul habere" (Senec. lib. i. De Clem. cap. 19). But, upon the comparison, a prince should prefer the amiable name of Pater Patriæ, or father of his country, to all the pompous titles and appellations which victory and triumph can heap upon him, and not so much to aim at his own glory, or the enlargement of his dominions through ambition, as to protect his subjects, and labour to make them happy; for the trophies of even a successful war are not so much to be coveted, as the blessings of a settled peace; nor the conquest of foreign nations, as the love, preservation, and good order of his own people.

Ver. 18. In the works of her hands are infinite riches; Ἰλαστός ἀνεκλήσις, i. e. Riches which are durable, and fade not away. Vatablus renders accordingly, perennes divitiæ, and the Vulgate is to the same effect. Calmet understands it of riches, qui ne manquent jamais. And that this is the true rendering, appears from the like expression upon the same subject, vii. 14, where wisdom is called θησαυρός ἀνεκλήσις, which our translators rightly there render, "A treasure that never faileth." The expression in our version seems rather to denote the quantity than the quality of the riches, and so it is commonly understood. The sense of the passage is, that true wisdom, which is from above, and makes us wise unto salvation, will procure for us riches which fade not away, together with that glory, satisfaction, and pleasure, which preferment, honour, and wealth, the rewards of other studies, are only faint resemblances of. For such is the excellency of divine knowledge, that it will not only forward our admission into heaven, but accompany us thither: St. Jerome therefore well advises, Discamus in terris, quorum nobis scientia perseveret in cælo (Epist. ad Paulin.).

Ver. 19. For I was a witty child, and had a good spirit. Παῖς ἦμην εὐφροδῆς, ψυχῆς τε ἔλαχον ἀγαθῆς. Εὐφροῖα answers to bona indoles, and in Junius's version is properly expressed by it; i. e. I was naturally well disposed towards wisdom, and of a good capacity, had a quickness of parts and readiness of apprehension, and a soul more susceptible of instruction than many others, and superior to them in its natural talents and endowments. That all souls are not equal as to their disposition, nor equally capable of, nor inclined to, wisdom, is the sentiment of most writers; particularly St. Austin says, Alii fatui, alii tardissimi ingenii, et ad intelligendum quodammodo plumbei, alii oblivisi, alii acuti memoresque nascuntur, alii utroque munere præditi (Aug. lib. iv. cont. Jul. cap. 3). But I rather choose to understand this of moral dispositions, and of the inclination of the soul to goodness. But Philo's notion comes nearest our author, who acknowledges two sorts or species of souls, placed in the air; "That some always continue there, and others descend into and inhabit bodies; of the latter, some apply themselves to sublime and useful knowledge, which, even after the death of the body, they continue to pursue, to purchase a life incorruptible and eternal; but others, overwhelmed by the weight of the flesh, neglect the care and study of wisdom, are intent upon riches and vanity, and attached wholly to things sensible and corporal" (De Gigantibus). Our author mentions it as his good luck and fortune to have a soul well inclined, and of the better sort, with the additional happiness of its being joined to a body pure and undefiled. I say good fortune, for the learned father above observes upon ἔλαχον, which the Vulgate renders sortitus sum, that "it intimates that he received his good spirit or disposition as it were by accident, by the free donation and undeserved bounty of God's goodness, to exclude and guard against the least surmise of any precedent merit, ad auferendum suspicionem præcedentium meritorum sors nomen accersit" (De Gen. ad Lit. lib. x. cap. 18). How justly this remark is grounded, and whether this writer intended such a sense, the learned will determine.

Ver. 20. Yea, rather, being good, I came into a body undefiled. This sentence seems to favour the opinion of a pre-existence of souls. It was a notion of the Pythagoreans and Platonists, of the Jewish doctors, and rabbinical writers, and, after them, entertained by Origen, and some other Christian writers, that all souls were created by God at the beginning of the world out of nothing, and were reserved and deposited in some of the heavenly regions; that, according to their good or ill behaviour in the state and region above, antecedent to their being incorporated with mortal and earthly vehicles, they were afterward, as infinite wisdom saw occasion, sent down into bodies ready fitted for, and properly disposed to receive them, and were accordingly lodged here below, either in sickly or healthful, in vicious or well-inclined bodies. This notion, that souls pre-existed, and descended into suitable bodies, was the opinion of the Pharisees particularly, which they are thought to have borrowed from the Platonists (Joseph, De Bell. Jud. lib. ii. cap. 12). Philo, who, upon occasions, speaks the sentiments of the ancient Jews, favours this notion in many places (De Confus. Linguarum, De Gigantibus, De Abraham); but he is most express in the following passage: Τούτων τῶν ψυχῶν, αἱ μὲν κατὰ τὴν ἐνδοξασθῆναι οὐσίαν θνητοῖς, δεῖα προχειρίζεται καὶ φιλοσοφίαι—Harum alie descendunt illigandæ corporibus mortalibus, quotquot viciniore sunt terræ, amantioresque corporum (De Somniis). To this notion that question of our Saviour's disciples is generally thought to allude, John ix. 2, "Did this man sin, or his parents, that he was born blind?" And some have interpreted to the same sense, ἀναλίστα, Phil. i. 23, and ὁ καιρὸς τῆς ἐμῆς ἀναλίσσεως, 2 Tim. iv. 6, but ἀνάλυσιν, even though we should understand it in these and other places where it occurs, in the sense of return, rather than departure, does not countenance the notion of a pre-existence, as it is commonly understood. It is farther objected against this passage, that it is inconsistent with the doctrine of original sin; for we cannot suppose the body of any descendant of Adam to be pure, untainted, or undefiled, as is here asserted, nor any soul to enter into an earthly vehicle, that is entirely clean and perfect, and altogether free from any original leaven: Nemo mundus à peccato (says St. Austin), nec infans, cujus est unius diei vita super terrarum (Confess. lib. i. cap. 7). In the Belgic version, the translators, in their preface prefixed to the Apocrypha, single out this passage as exceptionable on this account (see Limborch. Theol. Christ. lib. i. cap. 3). To obviate this objection, founded upon a truth which we must all own, and do sensibly experience, as being equally by nature sinners, and children of wrath, Calmet observes, that this writer is not to be understood as speaking of a body absolutely pure and undefiled, and entirely free from any hereditary infection, but of a body less corrupt and less disposed to evil than many others, moins corrompu et moins porté au mal que beaucoup d'autres, (Comment. in loc.). But the justness of this solution itself will perhaps be disputed; and it may probably be questioned, whether a body less vicious, or less subject to human corruption, can, with any more propriety, be said to be both pure and undefiled, than a body can be said to be chaste, that is less unclean; or sound and healthful, that is less infirm and sickly. Lyranus, and some other commentators, have attempted another interpretation of the place to the following sense, "Increasing more and more in virtue and goodness, I came to have a body chaste and undefiled," which is founded upon the rendering of the Vulgate, Et cum essem magis bonus, veni ad corpus incoquinatum; i. e. says Tirinus, Cum magis magisque per virtutum exercitium crescerem in bonitate, eo deveni ut etiam corpus mihi esset bene temperatum, mundum et castum (Comment. in loc.). And even Messieurs du Port-Royal take it in the same sense, Devenant bon de plus en plus. But neither does this remedy seem quite to heal the sore, for the true rendering of the Greek, μᾶλλον δὲ ἀγαθὸς ὢν, is not cum essem magis bonus, but literally magis vero, or rather, in quo vero cum essem bonus; so that magis is transposed in the Vulgate, either designedly or by accident: nor is μᾶλλον ἀγαθὸς the usual comparative way of expression among the Greeks, but ἀμύνων or βελτίων; as in the Latin tongue we do not usually say magis bonus, but melior, or emendatior: nor does ἤλθον εἰς σῶμα ἀμίαντον signify, "I came at length to have a body undefiled," but "I entered into a body at first undefiled." Upon the whole, as the expressions here seem to favour a pre-existence, and this writer labours, as it were, to establish that notion, using an ἐπ'ανήρθαι or a rhetorical correction of himself, as if he had said too little, in the words ψυχῆς ἔλαχον ἀγαθῆς:—as the Syriac and Arabic versions both understand and render this passage in a sense rather favouring the notion of a pre-existence; the former very expressly, Propter bonitatem meam veni in corpus purum; and the latter, in bonum eram ideoque immaculatus ingressus sum in corpus:—and, lastly, as the solutions offered to evade the objections urged against this place, seem weak and unsatisfactory,—I must ingenuously acknowledge, that it seems to me to savour of Platonism; nor is it improbable, that this writer, who was undoubtedly a Jew, received a tincture in this and some other instances, to be met with in this book, from the prevailing notions among his countrymen. This, however, is certain, that whether we understand this verse of a body absolutely and originally chaste and undefiled, free from all taint of original sin; or of one, subject to its frailties, lusts, and corruptions, but subdued and freed from the power and domination of them, by temperance, prayer, and religious exercises; in either respect we cannot well understand or apply this to the true Solomon, whose purity more especially cannot be mentioned to his honour.

Ver. 21. Nevertheless, when I perceived that I could not otherwise obtain her. Ἦνοις δὲ ὅτι οὐκ ἄλλως ἔσμαι ἐγκρατῆς, which the Vulgate renders, Ut scivi quoniam aliter non possem esse continens, nisi Deus det, adiit Dominum: "And knowing that the gift of continency was from God, and that his grace could alone preserve me chaste, I prayed unto him;" which Coverdale follows in his version, "When I perceived that I could not keep myself chaste," &c. The Syriac also takes the words in the same sense, Sciens quod non possem me ipsum domare; and St. Austin, Confess. lib. x. cap. 31. It is surprising that an interpretation, which is by no means agreeable to the context, and founded probably upon a mistake, should be supported by so great authorities; for it seems to have taken its rise from a misunderstanding of the meaning of the Greek word ἐγκρατῆς, which signifies both continsens and compos; but the latter sense, which is followed by our translators, the Arabic version, Vatablus, and the Geneva bible, is far preferable, as will appear if we include the nineteenth and twentieth verses in a parenthesis, as indeed they ought to be; and then the true sense of this passage will be clearer, and the connexion more visible; for the meaning will then plainly be,—I went about seeking wisdom, to take her to me, and when I found that I could not otherwise obtain wisdom, Me non aliter fore compotem illius, nisi Deus dederit, says Junius, "I prayed unto the Lord for it." There is the same mistake in the Vulgate, and upon the very same occasion, Ecclus. vi. 27, where ἐξπαρὴς γενόμενος, in the Vulgate, continens factus, is much more justly rendered in our version, "When thou has got hold of her (wisdom), let her not go," in the sense which the context necessarily requires. Vatablus and Junius expound the place in the same manner; the latter expressly renders, Compos factus, eam ne dimittito. See also Ecclus. xv. 1, where there is the like mistake in the Vulgate.

Except God gave her me; Wisdom, which is here meant, and not the gift of continence (see the note above), like other good and perfect gifts, is "from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights" (James i. 17). It is a pretty observation which Bishop Sanderson makes on these words, and very applicable, "That those perfections and virtues which the heathen moralists call ἔξεις, or habits, the apostle, by a far better name, calls δόσεις, or gifts, to intimate to us how we came by them, and whom we ought to thank for them" (Sermon 3. ad Clerum.); and the same inspired writer has a more particular direction as to the very point before us, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and it shall be given him" (i. 5). The ingenious Mr. Cowley observes of Virgil, "That his first wish was to be a good philosopher, and that God, whom he seemed to understand better than most of the learned heathens, dealt with him just as he did with Solomon: because he prayed for wisdom in the first place, he added all things else which were subordinately to be desired" (see Martyn's Georgics, lib. ii. p. 198).

I prayed unto the Lord, and besought him; To apply to God for the gift of wisdom, who has the sole disposal of it, was not only an instance of it; but a sure and infallible way of obtaining it. Philo has a fine observation upon God's disposal of his gifts and graces, Αἱ τῶν χαρίτων αὐτοῦ πηγαὶ ἀένηται, οὐ πᾶσι δ' ἀνεμένα, ἀλλὰ μόνους ἰκέτασι. The efficacy of prayer, was what the heathens themselves greatly depended upon in most of their great undertakings. It has been observed by critics, that Homer hardly ever makes his heroes succeed, unless they have first offered a prayer to heaven; whether they engage in war, go upon an embassy, undertake a voyage, or whatever they enterprise, they almost always supplicate some god; and whenever we find this omitted, we may expect some adversity to befall them in the course of the story. We must likewise mention it to their honour, that they prayed to, and thanked the gods, for the advantages of riches, honour, and health; but I cannot find, that the heathens ever acknowledged God for the author and giver of wisdom, or, indeed, of any virtue. Thus Cotta in Tully, Num quis, quod vir bonus esset, gratias diis egit unquam? Jovemque Optimum Maximum appellant, non quod nos justos, temperatos, sapientes, efficiat, sed quod salvos, incolumes, opulentos, copiosos. Neque Herculi quisquam decimas velit unquam, si sapiens factus esset (De Natura Deor. lib. iii.). How much finer is this writer's description of wisdom, than that of a concealed stoic; and how much more deservedly is he to be admired for referring wisdom so justly to its true original, and acquainting us with its divine extraction? Herein our author agrees with the scripture account of the original of wisdom, which assures us, that it is he who "giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and commandeth the light to shine out of darkness," that must, in this case more particularly, "shine in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God." I shall shut up this chapter, with an apposite and fine reflection of Messieurs du Port-Royal, in their comment upon this place; "Happy are those that have this knowledge, that wisdom and all perfection come from God, which may be called the knowledge of the truly humble—they know all things, because they are persuaded and sensible that they know nothing; they can do all things, because they are convinced, that, of themselves, they can do nothing. We ought, therefore, to put up often to God that excellent prayer of St. Austin, not very unlike the beginning of this, Da mihi, Domine, gratiam tuam, quā potestest omnis infirmus, qui sibi per illam conscius sit infirmitatis suæ."

CHAP. IX.

ARGUMENT.—The author's prayer for wisdom is set down, wherein is shown particularly, how necessary the gift of wisdom is to enable kings and rulers to discharge their high office with sufficiency and credit. The prayer itself is so like that of the real Solomon (1 Kings iii. 9), which he made to God in the beginning of his reign, that some from hence have been induced to ascribe this book to him. Calmet says this prayer is continued from the beginning of this chapter to the end of the book, and is of opinion, that the book itself was never finished, or at least that the conclusion of it is lost; for the author does not conclude his prayer, as it is natural to conclude he should have done, according to his first design (Preface sur le Livre de la Sagesse).

Ver. 1. O God of my fathers, It is very observable that Solomon, or rather this writer under that borrowed character, begins his prayer with great humility, and a religious spirit of meekness; he beseeches God to hear him, not for his own merit's sake, but for the worthiness of the ancient patriarchs, for Abraham and David his fathers' sake. He builds all his hopes upon the pure goodness of God, as knowing that humility is an essential in prayer, and the most likely means of success.

Lord of mercy, who hast made all things with thy word, Κύριε τοῦ ἔλεους σου. All the editions which retain this pronoun, which may as well be omitted, have the same corrupt reading; the true one probably, instead of σοῦ, may be Κύριε τοῦ ἔλεους, αὐτὸ ποιήσας; κ. τ. λ. Coverdale seems to have followed a copy which read so, "O Lord of mercies, thou that hast made all things with thy word," i. e. who spakest all things into being, and "by thy almighty fiat they are and were created." Or, Who madest all things by thy Word, thine eternal λόγος, that same Word who was "in the beginning with thee, and without whom was not any thing made that was made" (John i. 3). In this latter sense Calmet understands it, Le Seigneur a créé l'univers par son Verbe, par son Fils; and so do many of the fathers.

Ver. 4. Give me wisdom, that sitteth by thy throne; i. e. The assessor of thy throne, which may mean more than being present with God, viz. assisting in his councils and presiding over them. Sitting here may be considered as a technical forensic term, and not only to imply a right of judicature, in which sense it is used in many places of scripture, (Prov. xx. 8. Isa. xvi. 5), but even dominion and sovereignty, according to St. Jerome (Comm. ad Ephes.), by which supreme dignity of place, wisdom is distinguished from ministering spirits; for when angels, principalities, and powers, are described as attending about the throne of God, they are generally represented as standing, or falling down before it (2 Chron. xviii. 18. Isa. vi. 2. Rev. iv. 10). In this high sense some primitive writers have explained this passage, as implying a joint sovereignty of the λόγος with God: see ver. 9, 10, of this chapter, where the same exalted character is continued, which seems a very close imitation of Prov. viii. especially ver. 27, ἥνικα ἠρτίμασε τὸ ὀρθρὸν, συμπάριτον αὐτῷ. But, for the reasons before given, (see note on ch. vii. 26), I think the meaning rather to be, that wisdom, as a divine attribute, is always present with God; as his joint counsellor, his assistant, if I may be allowed the expression, and the partner of his throne or tribunal; that she always exists in the eternal mind, is privy to its sovereign decrees, and influences all its deliberations and actions; that wisdom therefore is not only the ornament, but the support and basis of God's throne, in as high, exalted, and proper a manner, as righteousness and equity are by the psalmist said to be "the habitation of his seat" (Ps. lxxxix. 15). Philo describes justice in the same manner, τὴν παρὰ τὸν Δία τὸν πάντων ἀρχέμενον (Philo, De Justitia, et de Joseph). And the heathens equally made her an assessor of Jupiter's throne, Δίκη συνέδρος Ζηνός (Sophoc. in Œdip.). But Plutarch expresses himself concerning her in a manner which most resembles this writer: "Justice (according to his description) does not only sit like a queen, at the right hand of Jupiter, when he is upon his throne; but she is in his bosom, and one with himself."

Ver. 6. For though a man be never so perfect among the children of men, yet if thy wisdom be not with him, he shall be nothing regarded. This observation, according to the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal, holds true, applied to rulers in the church, as well as those in the state; "For though a man have all knowledge, and be so consummate in wisdom as to discourse even with the tongue of angels; though he have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries; though he could work miracles, even to the removing mountains; and though he give all his goods to feed the poor,—yet, if he is devoid of the only true wisdom, that wisdom which proceedeth from God, and should be employed in his service, he may appear great indeed in the eyes of men, but, according to St. Paul, he is nothing, or will be accounted as nothing, in the sight of God" (1 Cor. xiii. 2).

Ver. 7. Thou hast chosen me to be a king of thy people.] Melchior Canus and Sixtus Senensis lay great stress upon this passage, to prove Solomon the writer of this book; but their way of reasoning will prove too much, for if a bare assertion, the mere assuming the person of another, shall be thought sufficient to establish this point, then the Apostolic Canons may for the same reason be pronounced canonical, for in the last of them we meet with these words, πράξεις ἡμῶν τῶν Ἀποστόλων. And yet notwithstanding this assertion, and though the title itself seemingly bespeaks them to be the authors, they are now generally decried and disclaimed, even by some of the Romanists themselves (see Rainald's Cens. Libr. Apoc. Præl. 15). It is most probable this passage of our author is spoken μηρητικῶς, i. e. by a feigned representation of a person, to take away any odium from the speaker, and to give the greater weight to what is delivered. Upon this occasion, no character was so proper to be assumed as that of Solomon, who himself was a king and eminent above all others for his understanding and wisdom; because instruction offered and inculcated under so great a name, would be more regarded and attended to by persons of the same high rank and authority. Such a rhetorical artifice we often meet with in the books of oratory: thus Tully sometimes argues under the person of Cato the elder, "Omnem sermonem tribuimus Catoni Seni, quo majorum auctoritatem habeat oratio." But what comes nearest the point is, that Isocrates inscribes a whole oration, Nicocles, and speaks in the person of that king, as if he really was the author, to give the greater sanction, and procure more reverence to the duties enjoined in it; and yet nobody, from that name or title, supposes it to belong to Nicocles, or that it was any thing else but an ingenious fiction of Isocrates. "The ancients (says Calmet) do often call their works by the names of the persons they introduce as speaking: thus Plato has given to his dialogues the names of Socrates, Timæus, Protagoras, &c. And Cicero, in the same way, gives to one of his pieces the title of Brutus, and to another that of Hortensius. Xenophon styles the history in which he has drawn the model of a complete prince, Cyrus, as being the principal person or character in it; but none will pretend that these were written by the persons whose names they bear, for it is agreed on all hands, that Plato, Cicero, Xenophon, were the true authors who composed those pieces under feigned names" (Dissert. sur l'auteur du Livre de la Sagesse). And in another place the same learned writer gives the reason for this artifice and invention: "It may be considered as a prosopopœia, as a sort of device wherein a person, to give more weight to what is delivered, speaks in the name, and assumes the person, of some other more ancient. The scripture has some instances of this sort, as that artful fiction of the widow of Tekoah, 2 Sam. xiv. to incline David to fetch home Absalom; and that of the prophet, 1 Kings xx. 35, to rebuke Ahab: and that of Nathan, reproving David by that significant and fine parable of the ewe-lamb, 2 Sam. xii. And thus the prophets sometimes introduce God, Moses, Abraham, &c. speaking, to make their discourses more lively and more affecting" (Præf. sur le Livre de la Sagesse).

Ver. 8. A resemblance of the holy tabernacle, which thou hast prepared from the beginning.] i. e. Upon the model, says Calmet, of the tabernacle, which Moses, by God's direction, erected for the people in the wilderness; and the temple was a true resemblance of it in all respects; only that was small and as it were in miniature in the one, was inconceivably grand and magnificent in the other; but the disposition in both was nearly the same, and framed according to the pattern which God at first exhibited in the mount, Exod. xxv. 40. The Arabic version understands it in the same sense, Simile tabernaculo sancto, cuius delineamentum ab initio præmisisti. But Grotius, and other writers, understand these words in a higher sense, viz. that the temple was a resemblance of heaven itself, prepared by God from the beginning for the righteous. And indeed the Jews seem to have had the same notion, for they fancied three heavens, and the third or highest heaven to be the habitation of God, and of the blessed angels; and to this distinction they imagine the atrium, sanctuarium, and sanctum sanctorum, answered in the temple and tabernacle: the encampment of the twelve tribes about the tabernacle, they fancied likewise to be a representation of the angels and heavenly host about the throne of God: Philo has the same sentiment in several places, and Josephus, lib. iii. cap. 7. No wonder therefore that this writer, from the great analogy and agreement which the Jews supposed betwixt them, should call the temple, in which was the sanctum sanctorum, the resemblance or image of heaven itself, prepared by God from everlasting. This is the language of an inspired pen, even the writer to the Hebrews, who, speaking (viii. 5), of the tabernacle, calls it the exemplar and "pattern of heavenly things;" and (ix. 24), he calls "the holy places made with hands, the figures of the true," or celestial ones. St. Chrysostom, speaking of the temple, calls it "the great and typical fabric, the image of the whole world, both sensible and intellectual;" and he justifies his notion from these canonical passages (Homil. de Nativ.). And as the comparison in all these places is made to heavenly things, so St. John in the Revelations describes the heavenly sanctuary by representations taken from the Jewish temple; particularly the throne of God, with his ministering spirits, is represented like that over the ark, where the Shechinah, or divine glory, sat encompassed with the cherubims, (see Spencer de Leg. Hebr. tom. i. p. 215). It may not be amiss to observe upon the Greek reading of this passage, viz. μίμημα σκηνῆς ἁγίας, ἣν προτοίμασας ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, that however the passage itself be understood, whether of the heavenly or earthly tabernacle, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς seems unnecessary after προτοίμασας. I would therefore carry these words forward to the beginning of the next verse, and read ἀπ' ἀρχῆς καὶ μετὰ σου ἡ σοφία, κ. τ. λ.

Ver. 13. For what man is he that can know the counsel of God? or who can think what the will of the Lord is?] From this passage some confidently affirm St. Paul borrowed the thirty-fourth verse of the eleventh chapter to the Romans, and therefore they would infer this book to be canonical. But this is a groundless pretence: for, first, we do not perceive in any part of the New Testament, this, or any other ecclesiastical book, cited or referred to as scripture; secondly, it does not follow by any necessary consequence, that such sentences in scripture as are like and parallel to some others in apocryphal or ecclesiastical writings, should be really taken from thence; nothing being more common, than for different authors to hit upon and agree in the same moral maxims, without having read or ever seen one another's writings: thirdly, some of those very sentences which are said to be taken out of the book of Wisdom, or Ecclesiasticus, occur in some part of those books which are confessedly canonical; and particularly this passage of St. Paul is in the same terms, or to the same effect, Isa. xl. 13, 14, where the words are, "Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or being his counsellor, hath taught him? With whom took he counsel, and who instructed him and taught him in the path of judgment?" That St. Paul had this place of the prophet in view is the opinion of many learned men (Tertull. cont. Marc. lib. v. Basil de Sp. Sanc. cap. 5. Du Pin's Hist. Can.). Fourthly, supposing St. Paul does actually refer to this passage in the book of Wisdom, does not the same St. Paul confessedly quote the heathen poets, and some ancient apocryphal book, for the story of Jannes and Jambres? (2 Tim. iii. 8). And does not our Saviour himself, in the opinion of some learned men (see Bishop Sherlock, Dissert. 1), quote another such apocryphal book, under the title of the Wisdom of God, and appeal to it as containing ancient prophecies? (Luke xi. 49). Did apocryphal writings receive any higher sanction or authority from hence, or ever any one imagine the canon of scripture imperfect for the want of them? One may easily see the design of the Romanists, in endeavouring to bring the apocryphal books into the canon; they hope by their authority to establish some favourite notions of their church, which yet, if examined and compared with the original, upon which they are pretended to be grounded, will be often found to have no other foundation than in a wrong version, as may be proved more particularly from the books of Maccabees.

Ver. 15. For the corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth upon many things.] Γρωδὲς σκῆνος. This expression is manifestly borrowed from the Platonists. Thus Clemens Alexandrinus, Τὸ σῶμα, γήινον φέρον τὸ Πλάτων σκῆνος (Strom. 5). We meet with the like expression, 2 Pet. i. 14, where death is called ἡ ἀπόδεξις τοῦ σκηνώματος. But the description of the body is most remarkably exaggerated by St. Paul, 2 Cor. v. 1, ἡ ἐπιγῆστος ἡμῶν οἰκία τοῦ σκῆρους. Philo, Hippocrates, and other Greek writers, in like manner, use τὸ σκῆνος for a human body; and Lucretius, in imitation of the Greeks, uses vas in the same sense (lib. iii. ver. 441). We may hence therefore very properly render ἐσκήνωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν (John i. 14), "he dwelt in a human body amongst us" (see Pearce in Longin. p. 102). This powerful pressure of the body is so apparent, that it is acknowledged by all the wisest heathens: hence the Platonists frequently impute the diminution of the powers of the soul to its conjunction with the body. And in the ancient academical philosophy, it was much disputed whether that corporeal and animal life, which was always drawing down the soul into terrene and material things, was not more properly to be styled death than life (see Smith's Sel. Disc. p. 447). There is a thought not unlike this in Philo, which he seems to have taken from Plato, in Cratyl. καὶ γὰρ σῆμα τινὲς φασὶν αὐτὸ [σῆμα] εἶναι τῆς ψυχῆς, ὡς τεθάρμενης, ἐν τῷ νῦν παρόντι (S. Leg. Allegor. lib. i.). 'The Pythagoreans looked upon the body as no better than the prison of the soul, τῆς ψυχῆς δεσμωτήριον, as Philo expressly calls it (De Migrat. Abrah.). And to this agrees that of Scipio, "Imo vero, inquit, il vivunt que è corporum vinculis, tanquam è carcere, evolaverunt; vestra vero quæ dicitur vita, mors est" (Somm. Scip. cap. 3.). Xenophon introduces Cyrus, speaking after the same manner to his children just before his death; "I could never think that the soul, while in a mortal body, lives, and when departed out of it, dies, or that its consciousness is lost, when it is discharged out of an unconscious habitation; but that it then truly exists, when it is freed from all corporal alliance." In the same contemptible manner the saints and martyrs speak of the flesh, calling it the chain and burden of the spirit: hence we find them praying and longing with St. Paul, to be dissolved and set at liberty from it, as soon as God pleased (Theophyl. in Luc. ii. Arnob. adv. Gent. lib. ii. Marc. Anton. lib. iii. Ambrose de Bon. Mortis.). "This state of human imperfection is finely represented (says St. Austin) by that woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, Luke xiii. 11, 'and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself,' who was immediately 'made straight, and loosed from her infirmity,' by the powerful Spirit of our Saviour working on her, whose cure is a figure or emblem of man's recovery from the bondage of sin, through the power of grace. It is for this reason, and because men's thoughts are apt to wander, and grovel upon the earth through the infirmity of the flesh, that the priest calls upon us, in the celebration of the holy mysteries, to lift up our hearts, "sursum corda" (Aug. De vera Relig. De bono Perseverant.). Horace exactly expresses our author in what follows:—

—"Corpus onustum
Hesternis vitiis animum quoque pregravat una, Atque affigit humo divinæ particulam aure."
(Sat. lib. ii.)

Virgil too has some fine thoughts upon this occasion; he shows how the vigor animæ is impeded by the body in the following lines:—

—"Noxia corpora tardant,
Terrenique habetant artus, moribundaque membra,
Hinc metunt cupiantque, dolent gaudentque, neque auras
Respiciunt, clausæ tenebris et carcere cæco."

And even after death he imagines some sordid, contracted from its union with the body, still to adhere to it, and therefore supposes it to undergo a sort of purgation in another state:—

"Quin et supremo cum lumine vita reliquit,
Non tamen omne malum miseris, nec funditis omnes
Corporeæ excedunt pestes; penitusque necesse est
Multa diu concreta moidescere miris.
Ergo exercentur penis." (Æn. vi.)

Ver. 16. Hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth—but the things that are in heaven who hath searched out? This writer argues very justly here from our ignorance of natural causes, which we every day see and experience, to our imperfect views and conjectures of things spiritual and invisible: for since the most illuminated understanding in this world sees only in part, and cannot have a perfect or adequate idea of things that shall be revealed more fully hereafter, reason should confine itself within its own province, and not attempt the knowledge or explanation of such arcana as are confessedly out of its reach. "If I have told you earthly things (says our blessed Saviour), and ye believe them not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?" (John iii. 12.) It is a very just observation therefore of Lord Bacon, "That he labourerth in vain, who shall endeavour to draw down heavenly mysteries to human reason; it rather becomes us (says that great philosopher) to bring our reason to the adorable throne of divine truth." The heathens have prettily conched this moral, in that excellent fable of the golden chain, with which neither gods nor men were able to draw Jupiter down to the earth, but he could with ease draw them up to heaven. If this observation, even of an apocryphal writer, was but well weighed, the great advocates for the all-sufficiency of reason would surely be more modest and humble, nor would the credibility of mysteries be so obstinately disputed.

Ver. 18. For so the ways of them which lived on the earth were reformed, and men were taught the things that are pleasing unto thee,] Τὰ ἀγαθὰ σου. Would not this be more correct if we read, τὰ ἀγαθὰ σου? The sense is sufficiently clear, viz. that, through the help and instruction of wisdom, mankind, from the beginning of the world, have been informed in their duty, and attained to the knowledge of the divine will and pleasure, by the careful observance of which they were preserved both from sin and punishment. The Vulgate very properly restrains this to good men, which otherwise might seem too general. This appears from the ancient patriarchs, who lived before and after the flood, and through wisdom kept themselves free from the general corruption, and escaped these evils which others suffered; many of whom, as instances of this truth, are mentioned in the next chapter, which in some editions begins with this verse: the ancient versions differ very much in the rendering of it; some understand it of the future, some of the present, but it seems best to refer these words to the times past, from the very early instances which immediately follow.

CHAP. X.

ARGUMENT.—The great advantages of wisdom are enumerated from the earliest account of time; that such as would not be conducted by it, have been miserable, exemplified in Cain and his descendants; and such as have followed its guidance have remarkably prospered, from Adam to Moses inclusively.

Ver. 1. She preserved the first formed father of the world, that was created alone,] Μόνον κτισθέντα. Does this mean, that Adam alone was created by a true and proper creation, and that all others, as being descended from him, were formed out of him, as from a pre-existing principle? Or does it mean, that Adam was created when nothing else existed? This cannot be the sense, as the works of the former days, and even the serpent among the rest, were confessedly before him; or are we to understand this of the creation of Adam, before the existence of Eve, or any of the human species? But is not as much implied in his being called here πρωτόπλαστος; and πατὴρ κόσμου? Or is it usual to express one and the same thing by three synonymous terms? I am inclined to conjecture, that the true reading here is, μόνον τισθέντα, and not μόνον κτισθέντα, as all the copies have it, which mistake might easily happen from the likeness and affinity of the sound: i. e. wisdom preserved Adam free from all harm and danger, when he was placed alone and by himself in Paradise; see Gen. ii. 8, where the LXX. read, ἐρρύτισεν δὲ Θεὸς Παράδεισον, καὶ ἔθετο ἐκεῖ τὸν ἄνθρωπον. Nor am I quite singular in this interpretation: Tiranus expounds the passage in the same manner, Quamdiu solus fuit, nec à consorte sollicitatus ad malum (see Comment. in loc.).

And brought him out of his fall.] It was wisdom which preserved Adam in Paradise when alone, and, after his fall, by particular grace vouchsafed to him, produced in him humiliation and repentance, proportionate to his great transgression: he was sensible upon his expulsion from Paradise, that all that sad train of evils and miseries which he saw entering into the world, and now are natural and hereditary to the whole species, were so many punishments brought into it, and imposed upon his posterity, purely on his own account; he considered the growing wickedness of the world, as introduced and occasioned by him; he considered the mortality of his descendants, their frequent, and often violent deaths, as the consequence of his sin. These reflections, arising from his ingratitude to God, and his affectionate concern for his unhappy race, sank so deep into the mind of the first-formed father of the world, that during the nine hundred and thirty years which he lived upon earth after his fall, he continued under such a lively sense of his sin, and God's just displeasure, that he became an humble and remarkable penitent. This penitence, or recovery of our first parents from their fall, which seems here referred to, has, by some of the fathers, been represented as the effect of the grace of the second Adam, to whom the glory of being the deliverer of the first was justly due, and been maintained by the church in the most early times as a catholic truth. Irenæus, who lived at the end of the second century, reckons it accordingly (lib. i. cap. 31) among the heresies of Tatian, that he held, that Adam and Eve were not saved: "For, (says that father), as Jesus Christ had undertaken to redeem man from the power and dominion of sin, it is but reasonable to give him the glory of the delivery of our first parents from it; for he would not have been so entirely victorious over the devil, if he had left them under the hands of that apostate spirit, who, by his subtilty, had taken their out of God's hands" (Iren. lib. iii. cap. 34. St. Aug. Epist. 99. ad Evod., Tertull. lib. ii. cont. Marcion., Epiphan. Hæres. 46). This was the sense of antiquity concerning Adam's fall, and his happy recovery from it. Milton has finely represented Adam's tender concern for his unhappy posterity in the following lines:—

"All that I eat or drink, or shall beget,
Is propagated curse. O voice once heard
Delightfully, Increase and multiply,
Now death to hear! for what can I increase,
Or multiply, but curses on my head?
Who, of all ages to succeed, but feeling
The evil on him brought by me, will curse
My head,—Ill fare our ancestor impure,
For this we may thank Adam." (Book x).

Which concludes with Adam's seeking peace and forgiveness of God, whom he had offended, by supplication and repentance—

"So spake our father penitent, nor Eve
Felt less remorse; they forthwith to the place
Repairing where he judged them, prostrate fell
Before him reverent, and both confess'd
Humbly their faults, and pardon begg'd with tears
Watering the ground, and with their sighs the air
Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite, in sign
Of sorrow unfeign'd, and humiliation meek."

It is observable that Moses, in the book of Genesis, where he mentions Adam's fall, says nothing of his repentance, which though it is not expressly asserted in the text, yet neither can any thing certain or conclusive to the contrary be inferred from Moses' silence: this author has supplied what is there wanting, and acquainted us with the opinion of those of his time, with respect to this very important inquiry.

Ver. 2. And gave him power to rule all things.] Before his fall, God gave to Adam the dominion over the creation (Gen. i. 28), and it is not improbable, that upon his transgression God deprived him of it, by way of punishment, at least for a time, or in part, and, upon his sincere repentance, restored him to his full sovereignty and power. This seems to be the sentiment of this writer, who, after the mention of Adam's recovery from the sad consequences of his fall, says, that God "gave him power to rule all things," which cannot relate to the original grant, which was previous to his misfortune. Perhaps, instead of the present reading, ἔδωκεν τε αὐτῷ ἰσχύιν κρατῆσαι πάντων, the true one may be, ἀνέδωκεν τε αὐτῷ ἰσχύιν κρατῆσαι πάντων; or thus, ἔδωκεν τε αὐτῷ ἰσχύιν κρατῆσαι, αὐ πάντων, i. e. "She restored to him the power of ruling all things," or, "She gave him the power again to rule all things." And such a fresh donation of power seems necessary; for, as Calmet judiciously observes, Avant son péché, toutes choses lui étoient soumises; il exerçoit sur elles un empire libre, aisé, agreable, volontaire, tant de sa part, que de la leur: mais depuis sa chute, il ne conserva qu'avec peine le reste de domaine que Dieu lui avoit laissé; i. e. "Before the fall, Adam's government of the creatures was free, easy, and agreeable, and their submission voluntary and willing; but after the fall, he with difficulty maintained his sovereignty, and the state of his affairs being altered, called for the same or a greater power" (Comment. in loc.).

Ver. 3. When the unrighteous went away from her in his anger.] i. e. Cain, who had no regard either to wisdom, piety, and even humanity: he is eminently called the unrighteous here, because he committed the first act of violence in the world; as the scripture calls him, for the same reason, "the offspring of the wicked one, who was a murderer from the beginning," ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ ἦν (1 John iii. 12). And his brother is there denominated, "righteous Abel," from his extraordinary and exemplary goodness (Matt. xxiii. 35).

Ibid. and ver. 4. He perished also in the fury wherewith he murdered his brother. For whose cause the earth being drowned with the flood.] The scripture makes no mention of the perishing, or death of Cain: on the contrary, we read, that God prolonged his life to a miserable estate, as an example of his vengeance, and to continue Cain's punishment: and for this reason he gave a strict charge, that no one should for this fact destroy him, threatening to take vengeance sevenfold upon any that should kill him (Gen. iv. 15). God is said also to have set a mark upon Cain, i. e. to have given him a sign or token to assure him, that none should take away his life (see Shuckford's Connex. vol. i. p. 8). How therefore are we to understand this writer when he here says, that "Cain perished also in the fury wherewith he murdered his brother?" Did Cain then perish at the same time, and by the sudden and violent effects of the same fury and passion? Or shall we imagine him to allude to a traditional story among the rabbins, that "Lamech being blind, took his son Tubal Cain to hunt with him in the woods, where Cain used to lurk up and down in the thickets, afraid of the commerce and society of men; that the lad mistook him for some beast stirring in the bushes, and that Lamech, by the direction of Tubal Cain, with a dart or arrow killed him." I cannot persuade myself to think that our author refers to this uncertain tradition, which has no countenance from any good history, and is generally exploded as an idle and unsupported conceit. Nor can the meaning be, that Cain perished in the deluge, which happened, as is generally agreed, about Ann. Munn. 1656 (see Usher's Annals), long before which time Cain was dead. Much less reason is there to assert, that the deluge happened purely upon his account, or was occasioned by his single transgression, as the sense seems to be of our present version. I think therefore that our translators have quite mistaken the sense of this place, which is not to be understood of Cain solely or exclusively, which seems manifest from the following reasons; 1st, ἄδικος is improperly joined with ἀναπώλετο, except we suppose that more persons perished. 2dly, Ἀδελφοκτόνοι θυμοί, expressed in the plural number, relates not to Cain's fury, which is mentioned immediately before, but to persons of the like bloody temper and disposition. 3dly, The Arabic version expressly understands it of such persons, which renders, Perit unā cum animabus fratricidis. 4thly, Coverdale's version, following the ancient Vulgate, renders, "the brotherhood perished through the wrath of murder:" which means a number of persons, probably a whole fraternity or kindred that perished on that account. It remains then to inquire next, what wicked and unhappy persons are here meant in particular. This difficulty, Origen, who incidentally mentions this passage, helps us to explain, who understands it of the descendants of Cain: for in the antediluvian world there was not only a general neglect of virtue, and pursuit of wickedness, but there was one reigning crime, which Moses takes notice of in particular, viz. that the earth was filled with violence. This expression, and the severe law made against murder soon after the flood, makes it probable, that the men of this first world, especially the descendants of Cain, had, in imitation of him, and by the evil influence of his example, taken great and unwarrantable liberties in usurping upon, and destroying, the lives of one another: these seem to be the persons whom this writer for their unnatural and bloody temper, styles ἀδελφοκτόνοι θυμοί, for whose sake, and upon account of whose violence and blood-shedding, the deluge really happened. Hence then I am induced to offer a conjecture, that the true reading of the next verse is not δι' αὐν, but δι' αὐ, and most probably the copy which Origen made use of, read so, for he expressly renders, Hanc ob causam diluvium fit, ut deleatur Cain semen, that God's purpose in bringing the deluge, was to extinguish the posterity of Cain (Orig. in Evang. Joh. See also St. Basil. Orat. 6. St. Aug. De Civit. Dei, lib. xv. cap. 24). And the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal, which understands it, De Cain, et des autres mechans qui l'avoient imité. This is farther confirmed from the testimony of the son of Sirach (Ecclus. xl. 10), who, enumerating the several instruments of God's vengeance against the wicked, as the sword, famine, &c. immediately adds, καὶ δι' αὐτοὺς ἐγένετο ὁ κατακλυσμὸς, that for their sakes came the deluge, i. e. for the wickedness of such ungodly and bloody-minded men, as went in the ways of Cain, as St. Jude expresses it. For the single fact of Cain, though very shocking, was not a sufficient cause alone, of bringing the universal deluge, nor of consequence enough to involve the whole earth in it: but when the earth was filled with violence through the wicked manners and attempts of Cain's descendants, then, or on that account, God destroyed the earth with a flood. We may lastly add the authority of the Arabic version, to establish this conjecture, which reads, as I before observed, Perit unā cum animabus fratricidis; and then adds, ob id obrutum diluvio terram, &c. and Vatablus, I observe, renders in like manner. Such being then the fate of Cain's descendants, Cain himself may with propriety enough be said to have perished with them, inasmuch as his whole race thereby became extinct. The words, therefore, ἄδικος ἀναπώλετο are not to be understood of Cain personally, as our version takes them, but as consequentially suffering in the destruction of his posterity. From this general calamity of the flood, we may make this useful reflection,—that it is no security to ungodly persons that there are great numbers of them; they ought rather for that cause to be so much the more apprehensive of speedy and dreadful judgments. For because of the greatness of their number, because "all flesh," as the scripture expresses it, "had corrupted themselves," the inhabitants of the whole world were so much the nearer destruction, and it involved them for that reason.

Ver. 4. Wisdom again preserved it, i. e. By preserving Noah and his family, by whom, and their posterity in successive ages, the earth was replenished by degrees, and the several parts of the world at length inhabited; we may also, with Messieurs du Port-Royal, consider this preservation mystically, for the ark was a figure and type of the church, as Noah and his family were of the members of it, whose preservation in the flood prefigured also our redemption by the laver of regeneration or baptism, as St. Peter explains it, 1 Pet. iii. 21. So that the power of one and the same element, may be considered as the end or destruction of vice, and as the original and fountain of virtue.

And directed the course of the righteous in a piece of wood of small value.] Per contemptibile lignum, according to the Vulgate (see note on xiv. 6). Our author intends here no reflection on the structure or usefulness of the ark, which was the design of infinite wisdom, and the work of a whole century, and so conveniently contrived, as to contain Noah (whose very name, according to Philo, signifies righteous), and his family, and all living creatures, according to the appointed number of them; he speaks only as to appearance, and as it was then judged; for while it was building it appeared so contemptible, that Noah and his sons were laughed at for their design, as being seemingly unable to endure such a conflux of waters. And, indeed, that such a piece of wood should rise safely when all the high hills were covered, and not be overset by winds or waves, or the many violent shocks it must necessarily meet with; that it should not be dashed to pieces against rocks which were invisible, nor sink under so prodigious a weight as it contained,—displays most illustriously the power and providence of God, who chooses to effect his purposes oftentimes by means the most unpromising and unlikely. Nor is the wisdom of God less to be admired in the contrivance of the ark, which may truly be said to be a world within itself, than his infinite power in directing it; for it has been demonstrated mathematically, that there was sufficient room in it to contain all the things, animate and inanimate, which it was designed for; and that the measure and capacity of the ark, which some sceptics have made use of as an argument against the scripture, ought rather to be esteemed a most rational confirmation of the truth of it, and of the wisdom that designed it (see Bishop Wilkins' Essay on a real Character).

Ver. 5. Moreover, the nations in their wicked conspiracy being confounded, Our version here is faulty, the true rendering seems to be, "When the nations around conspired or joined together in wickedness;" Lorsque les nations conspirent ensemble pour s'abandonner au mal, says Calmet, and with him agree Messieurs du Port-Royal; and the Vulgate renders accordingly, In consensu nequitiae cum se nationes contulissent; i. e. when they were overrun with idolatry: for neither the creation of the world, nor the universal deluge, nor the confusion of languages, could preserve the belief of one supreme God only; but the new world was as universally overrun with polytheism and idolatry, as the old world was with violence, and the very dispersion of mankind probably contributed to it. Then, when all the nations around were sunk into idolatry, God called Abraham from Chaldea, whom the context shows to be here meant. This I take to be a truer sense of the place, than with some to interpret it of the conspiracy to build the tower of Babel. The learned Usher, it must be confessed, seems to understand it in this latter sense, for in his account of that bold and presumptuous design, he refers to this very place, which is somewhat surprising; for this cannot be reconciled even with his own chronology, for the building of this tower was A. M. 1757, and Abraham was not born till A. M. 2008. Calmet therefore mentions this, in his preface, as an objection against our author, Il semble croire qu' Abraham étoit au tems de la construction de la tour de Babel: but this anachronism is removed by the sense which I have given of this passage.

She found out the righteous, and preserved him blameless unto God.] Some have asserted, that Abraham not only lived blameless in the midst of idolatrous nations, but that even in his father's house, where he spent the first part of his life, he preserved himself free from the idolatrous worship which infected all the rest of the family (see Sherlock on Div. Provid. p. 293). But others, with more probability, say, that he was at first engaged in this wrong way of worship, and, like other Chaldeans, adored the sun

(Phil. De Abrah., Clem. Recogn. lib. i., Cyril. cont. Jul. lib. iii., Suidas voce Ἀβραῖνα), but that by God's giving him a better understanding he renounced it: and on this account he is said to have suffered a severe persecution from the Chaldeans, who threw him into a fiery furnace, from which God miraculously rescued him (Hieron. Tradit. Hebr. in Genes.). And, indeed, the text of the ancient Vulgate, Neh. ix. 7, seems to confirm this tradition, which reads, Eduxisti cum de igne Chaldeorum; and the Jews generally assert the same. However this be, which probably is a mistake from confounding the word Ur, which signifies both fire, and the city from which God called Abraham, it is certain that Abraham, from the time of his call, A. M. 2083 (see Usher's Annals), became the great restorer and reviver both of natural and revealed religion to a corrupt world; and we cannot have a stronger proof of his extraordinary piety and virtue, than that God thought him the fittest person to reveal himself to, and to begin a new reformation of the world by. It is very likely Abraham demonstrated to his father the vanity of idols, since he engaged him to forsake the city where he was settled (see Calmet's Dict. in voce Abram). And by his own sons, and his nephew Lot, he spread the true religion far and wide, and their very numerous descendants carried the knowledge of it still farther. After all this care, we cannot think that Abraham relapsed, but that God preserved him blameless ever after. We are not therefore to understand this passage, as if Abraham was always free from idolatry, for that Terah and all his children were infected with it, by living among the Chaldeans and sorcerers, which are synonymous terms in the book of Daniel (see Usher's Annals, tom. i. p. 7): but the meaning here is, that when God removed him from the infection of Chaldea, and vouchsafed to him the knowledge of the true religion, through his assistance he continued pure, and was not any more polluted.

And kept him strong against his tender compassion toward his son.] The rendering literally is, "She kept him strong in his bowels towards his son," as the marginal reading is; i. e. she gave him strength to vanquish the tenderness which he had for his son; for Abraham was so entirely devoted to God, that he was dead to all the moving calls of nature and instinct. Nor is such an instance of obedience to be wondered at in him, whose faith was so strong, that he was verily persuaded that God was able to raise Isaac from the dead again after the sacrifice, to make good his promise to him of a numerous progeny. "What a number of virtues meet (says St. Ambrose) in this single action! the piety of the patriarch appears, in his readiness to offer up his son at God's command; his courage is displayed, in resisting the sentiments of nature on so trying an occasion; his justice, in returning to God that which he had received from his liberality; and his faith, in believing that God could restore him from the dead, and bring him from the deep of the earth again" (Ambros. de Offic. lib. i. cap. 2).

Ver. 6, 7. When the ungodly perished, she delivered the righteous man, who fled from the fire which fell down upon the five cities. Of whose wickedness even to this day the waste land that smoketh is a testimony, and plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness: Καρποφοροῦντα φυτόν ἀρετῶν ὄψαις. Philo describes the destruction of the cities where Lot dwelt in the same terms, ἡ φλόξ, κ. τ. λ. Vim vitalem in summam sterilitatem convertit flamma, ita ut nihil superesset, unde vel fructus vel herba germinaret, in hodiernum usque malo durante; where the learned editor, referring to this place, very judiciously conjectures, that the true reading of it is, ἀρετῶν ὄψαις (Mangey's Philo, de Abrah. vol. ii.). Grotius thinks it probable, that by "plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness," may be meant fruits in appearance only; and in this sense the author seems to allude to the "apples of Sodom" in particular, which are said to have been beautiful in appearance to the eye, but within were full of rottenness. Messieurs du Port-Royal understand it in like manner of trees, Qui portent des fruits bastards semblables aux autres en apparence, mais qui se réduisent en cendre lors qu'on les ouvre (Comment. in loc.). And this Tertullian confirms, Sodomam et Gomorram igneus imber exussit, olet adhuc incendio terra, et si qua illic arborum poma, oculis tenus, cæterum contactu cinerescunt: and thus Solinus describes them: Pomum quod gignitur, habcat licet speciem maturitatis, mandī tamen non potest, nam fuliginem intrinsecus favillaceam, ambitus tantum extimæ cutis cohibet, quæ vel levi pressa tactu, fumum exhalat, et fatiscit in vagum pulverem (Solin. Polyhistor. cap. 37). But Josephus' account comes nearest our author, who, speaking of this once happy region, says, φασὶ ὡς δὲ ἱερὸς αὐ οἰκητῶσαν κεραυνῶν καταφλέγειν, κ. τ. λ. Fertur enim ob incolarum impietatem fulmi-nibus conflagrasse. Adhuc ignis à Deo immissi reliquias.

et oppidorum quinque isthic videre licet umbram; insuper et fructus, specie quidem et colore edulibus similes sunt, manibus autem decerpti, in favillam et cinerem resolvuntur (Lib. v. de Bello Jud. cap. 8). Nothing was more known or celebrated among authors, sacred and profane, than this fire, which fell down upon Pentapolis, or the five cities of Sodom. Diodorus Siculus (lib. xix.), Strabo (lib. xvi.) and Philo, speak of it as burning in their times: and some have thought St. Jude alludes to the continuance of this fire, ver. 7, and that he calls πῦρ αἰώνιον, because it continued burning (see Tacit. Hist. lib. v. Chrysost. Hom. 19. ad pop. Antioch. Maccab. lib. iii.). But I shall not be so distinguishing as to omit what Mr. Maundrell, who was upon that spot, says, viz. "That he never saw or heard of any such fruit hereabouts; nor was there any tree to be seen, from whence one might expect such a fruit; and adds, that he believes its very being, as well as its beauty, is a fiction" (Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 85). The Vulgate renders, Incerto tempore fructus habentes arbores, intimating, that the fruit growing here was, on this account, unlike all other fruit, which has a certain and fixed season of being ripe, but this never came to perfection (see Tirin. in loc.). We find that Homer had a notion of this great truth, that God sometimes exerts his judgments upon guilty cities, by sending a real fire from heaven upon them in a signal and terrible manner (see Iliad. lib. xxi.). And the fate of these cities suggests a very useful reflection—that though the patience of God bears with the crimes and impinence of mankind, even for several ages, yet when his justice shows itself at last, it is so destructive and inexorable, that nothing can withstand or avert it. From this destruction of Sodom we may likewise farther see the truth of our author's observation, that the punishment is usually proportioned and adapted to the nature of the crime, for these wretched cities, burning with unnatural lust, and impure fires, are, by a correspondent vengeance, overthrown and consumed by fire.

And a standing pillar of salt] The Vulgate renders, figmentum salis, others call it cumulus, and some columna salis; the last is the most agreeable to the Greek, στήλη ἀλάς. Sulpicius Severus says, Reflexit oculos, statimque in molem conversa tradidit. It has been thought by some authors probable, that the statue retained her own form; so St. Cyprian seems to have imagined,

— "stetit ipsa sepulchrum,
Ipsaque imago sibi, formam sine corpore servans."

This pillar was subsisting in the time of Josephus, who says that it was then standing, and that he himself saw it, ἑστῶσα δὲ ἀντὶν, ἔτι γὰρ νῦν διαμένει (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 11).
Later writers attest the same of their times; Benjamin the Jew, who lived in the twelfth century, mentions it in his Itinerary; and some more modern authors speak of it as yet existing; "Suo quasi sale condita," as Bishop Fell jocularly speaks of it. Adricomius quotes three authors that were eye-witnesses of it, and he particularly tells us its situation, that it stands between En-gaddi and the Dead Sea (Theatrum terræ sanctæ, p. 55). Mr. Maundrell, on the other side, gives so little credit to the reality of this pillar, that though he wanted not curiosity, yet he wanted faith to induce him to go see this monument of Lot's metamorphosed wife (Journey from Aleppo, p. 85). Various have been the conjectures of learned men about the reality of this pillar of salt: some, with much subtilty, understand "a pillar of salt" to signify only an everlasting pillar, of what matter soever made, in the same sense as they interpret the covenant of salt, Numb. xviii. 19. Others have fancied that this history, like that of Nabal, 1 Sam.
xxv. 37, is to be understood comparatively, that Lot's wife was as a pillar of salt; as Niobe, according to the fable, which most probably took its rise from this history, is said to have been turned, through grief, into a sort of stone:
but there is more reason to understand this literally. But it will then perhaps be asked, how it happened that this woman was not destroyed with fire and consumed to nothing, as the Sodomites were, but was converted by the powerful wrath of God into this pillar of salt, a perpetual spectacle for all beholders? To this inquiry I shall return an answer in the words of a polite writer, who explains this accident in the following manner: "That as thunder, or rather lightning, stiffens all animals it strikes in an instant, and leaves them dead in the same posture in which it found them alive, this unhappy woman's body, being prepared by heat, and penetrated and encrusted with salt, which fell down from heaven in great quantities upon this devoted region, might long subsist as a statue of salt, in the very posture in which this judgment from heaven found her. Nor is there much difficulty in conceiving how salt should continue so long undissolved in the open air, since it is well known to naturalists, that rocks of salt are as lasting as any other rocks" (Revelation examined, vol. ii.

p. 229). Pliny mentions a mineral kind of salt, which never melts, and serves for building as well as stone (lib. xxxi.
cap. 7). The reason which Tertullian assigns for the durability of this pillar, "Quod perpetuis temporibus re-paretur, et si quis advena formam mutilaverit, vulnera ex sece complet," is so surprising and incredible, that it can be considered in no other light, than as a fable or legend, handed down by an imperfect tradition, upon no better foundation than another story relating to this woman, which for decency's sake I forbear to mention.

A monument of an unbelieving soul.] It would be better rendered, "A monument of the unbelieving soul." And so Coverdale's and the ancient English versions render, "A token of remembrance of the unfaithful soul." The transgression of Lot's wife is greatly aggravated by the following particulars:—1. She was delivered with her husband and daughters, out of Sodom, and brought forth by the angel's own hands. 2. She was warned that she should not look back, nor abide in all the plain, lest she perished.
3. There was a city very near to them appointed, which she might easily have reached and been in safety. 4. She had her husband and children with her, whom she ought to have accompanied; but she neglects these, and not believing the angel, that Sodom would be so soon destroyed, would indulge a criminal curiosity of looking back; her punishment, therefore, for these reasons, was just. Many useful reflections, for the conduct of others, have been raised from the signal misfortune of this woman. Our Saviour, we may observe, to guard his disciples against any hardness of heart, bids them to remember Lot's wife (Luke xvii. 32), lest they also should perish through unbelief. St.
Austin says, "That God chose this public punishment for the sake of others, to proclaim to them to beware, by her example, not to look back to a wicked Sodom, i. e. not to return to their old vices from which they have been called away by some gracious means that God hath afforded them; "Quo pertinet quod prohibiti sunt, qui liberabantur ab angelis, retro respicere, nisi quia non est animo redeundum ad veterem vitam, qua per gratiam regenerati exui-mur." (De civit. Dei, lib. xvi. cap. 30). The like useful inference St. Cyprian draws from this accident (epist. 11.7)
But St. Clement most fully expresses the sense of this and the former verse, and how we should improve by the history of their misfortunes: "By hospitality and godliness was Lot saved out of Sodom, when all the country round about was destroyed by fire and brimstone; the Lord thereby making it manifest, that he will not forsake those that trust in him, but will bring the disobedient to punishment and correction: for his wife, who went out with him, being of a distrustful mind, and not continuing in the same obedience, was for that reason set forth as an example, being turned into a pillar of salt unto this day; that so all men may know, that those that are double-minded, and distrustful of the power of God, are prepared for condemnation." (Clement. epist. 1. cap. 11. See also Cyr. Cath-echet. Mystag. i.)

Ver. 8. So that in the things wherein they offended they could not so much as be hid.] This reflection refers not to Lot's wife only, but regards equally the Sodomites, Cain, and his descendants, and the several faulty instances before mentioned; all of whom, through their ignorance of or disregard for, true wisdom, fell into very grievous transgressions, and are recorded as so many standing monuments of the just judgment of God against such abominable practices, the shame whereof they inherit even at this day.
Calmet applies this even to Lot himself, who, slighting the direction of the angels, who ordered him to escape to the mountains, retired into a cave, was overtaken with drunkenness, and committed incest with his daughters; crimes which arose from his neglect of true wisdom, and are a lasting reproach upon this otherwise righteous man.

Ver. 10. When the righteous fled from his brother's wrath, she guided him in right paths.] i. e. When Jacob fled from the wrath of Esau into Mesopotamia, he was delivered from great dangers through wisdom that attended upon him, according to God's promise to him.—"Behold, I am with thee and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again unto this land: for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of." (Gen.
xxviii. 15). Herein Jacob is an image of all the-faithful, whom God separates from the rest of mankind, protects with his favourable kindness, and conducts, as his chosen, in the right way to happiness; which the wicked, through a fatal mistake and irregular wandering, out of the true path, cannot arrive at.

Showed him the kingdom of God.] i. e. When he beheld in his dream a ladder, the foot whereof stood upon the earth, and the top reached to heaven, and the angels of God were ascending and descending upon it; at the sight whereof, awaking from his sleep, and being amazed at the glory of the vision, he could not contain himself from crying out, "How dreadful is this place! for the Lord is here, though I knew it not: this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven" (Gen. xxviii. 12. 17). This mystical ladder, according to the sense of the fathers, represents to us the care which the divine providence, in all ages, takes of the righteous; that God is present with them in the time of their affliction, and in the place of their exile and pilgrimage; and that in their sad and solitary condition, in a state of desertion as to all outward appearance, they shall not want the assistance and comfort of the holy angels, who are God's ministering spirits, to attend and succour the saints in all their difficulties and necessities whatsoever.

And gave him knowledge of holy things.] This contains something more than the former sentence, for wisdom taught Jacob moreover things relating to the service of God, it is probable, that in this vision he received from God himself, who then appeared to him (Gen. xxviii. 13), instruction of this nature, by his erecting a pillar instantly, that very stone upon which he had rested his weariness, and pouring oil upon the top of it, to consecrate it as a monument of God's great mercy to him; by his dedicating the place to God's service under the name of Beth-el, or God's house; by his vowing a vow, the first probably of that nature, and promising to restore to God the tenth of all that he should give him.

Made him rich in his travels, and multiplied (the fruit of) his labours.] Καὶ ἐπλήθυνε τοὺς πόρους αὐτοῦ. The literal rendering of the place is, "That wisdom multiplied his labours, and made him rich by them;" and so Junius understands it, Locupletavit eum in ærumnis, quum multiplicaret labores ejus. All the commentators and ancient versions take it in another sense, "That she prospered the fruits of his labours;" which is apparently the sense of our translators. This blessing Jacob happily experienced, as a reward of his hard and continual labour; for though Laban defrauded him of his wages ten times, when he had served him twenty years faithfully in his house, and through constant and painful watching was "consumed by the drought in the day, and by the frost in the night," yet God suffered him not to be sent away thus empty, but gave him success and riches equal to his labours: for it was he that gave that extraordinary blessing to the artifice of laying the rods before the cattle, and, as the learned think (see Bishop Patrick in loc.) directed him by an angel to that invention, and promised to give success to it (Gen. xxxi. 10-12), intending to transfer unto Jacob a good share of the wealth of Laban; which was accordingly effected by this contrivance, and Laban's injustice hereby punished, and his policy overruled. And to this agrees the Arabic version of this place, Sinus ejus implevit opibus eorum qui insultaverant ipsi. In this sense one cannot help observing the propriety of the word ἐπλήθυνε, which seems to intimate the manner of Jacob's coming by his riches, viz. that it was by the multiplying, or surprising fruitfulness, of the cattle.

Ver. 11. In the covetousness of such as oppressed him she stood by him, and made him rich.] Ἐν πλεονεξίᾳ κατακυρόωντων αὐτὸν παρίστη. Calmet says, the true reading of the Greek is, αὐτὸν παρίστη, and explains it accordingly. Elle l'assista contre l'avarice de ceux que vouloient user de violence, ou qui avoient l'avantage. In the book of Genesis we meet with the several ways and stratagems by which Laban, who had a greater regard to his own interest than to justice, endeavoured to surprise Jacob, and hinder him from receiving the fruits of his labours: for when Laban, to his surprise, found the contract very advantageous to Jacob, and had the mortification to see the cattle bring forth their young directly against his interest, he dissolved his own agreement, and made a new one with Jacob. Coverdale, therefore, very properly renders, "In the deceitfulness of such as defrauded him, she stood by him," which is more agreeable to what Jacob himself says (Gen. xxxi. 7), "Your father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times, but God suffered him not to hurt me." For it was impossible but Jacob must have been greatly injured by a man of that profound subtilty, had not the extraordinary interposition of God wonderfully prevented it, and disappointed the deceiver, which the patriarch very gratefully acknowledges.

Ver. 12. She defended him from his enemies, and kept him safe from those that lay in wait.] i. e. Either by turning away the wrath of his brother Esau, which, through his prudent conduct and humble submission, was at length mollified and changed into love and tenderness; or by God's threatening Laban in a dream from attempting any thing against Jacob, or seizing upon any of his possessions, when he pursued after him. In Gen. xxxii. we read, that the angels of God met Jacob in his journey, to encourage and comfort him no doubt, with the assurance that God was with him; and that he called the name of the place Mahanaim, i. e. two hosts or camps; for it is probably supposed that the angels might appear to him as distinguished into two armies, the better to defend him against his enemies on all sides (see Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. i. p. 361).

And in a sore conflict she gave him the victory; that he might know that godliness is stronger than all.] This relates to that conflict or wrestling which Jacob had with the angel, over whom he was at last victorious; nor would he quit his hold till he had obtained a blessing. The struggling of an angel with a man may seem impar congressus, and the victory of the latter is still more surprising; but many worthy ends were implied in this combat, and several useful reflections may be drawn from it. 1. Jacob having such power with God, as to be able to prevail over one of his ministers, was hence reminded not to fear his brother Esau, nor any attempt that he should make against him. 2. God enabled Jacob to prevail over the angel whom he contended with, to show the great power that those saints have, who put their whole trust and confidence in him. 3. We farther from hence learn, that when God suffers his saints to be exposed to great trials and severe temptations, it is with a design to teach them, by an experience of their own weakness and his might, that it is he alone that makes them victorious; and that he whom they have preferred to the world, is greater than the world, and more powerful than all things and persons in it. The fine observation contained in the conclusion of the verse, viz. "that godliness is stronger than all," though true in an eminent degree of Jacob, as has been shown, and is indeed implied in his victory, need not be confined to his single person; there are many other signal instances in the Old Testament to confirm this truth: it was by godliness that Jonathan, with his armour-bearer alone, put a whole garrison to flight; that David, unarmed, overthrew Goliath, and prevailed against the artifices and violence of Saul; that Jehoshaphat, without drawing a sword, triumphed over three confederate nations; that Hezekiah saved Jerusalem, and the kingdom of Judah, against a hundred fourscore and five thousand Assyrians that came against it: it was piety that determined constantly the fate of the Jewish people, and according to their observance of this, was the public happiness and condition of that state. And the same observation will hold with respect to any other nation or people, who will be always found to be successful, or otherwise, according as they regard God, and encourage and promote a true sense of piety. So that the advice of the psalmist is at all times best to be followed, and will be found, upon trial, to be even the truest policy: "Some put their trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will remember the name of the Lord our God" (Ps. xx. 7). This power of piety, or truth, as it is called, is finely displayed by the apocryphal Esdras, in that contest before Darius, 1 Esdras iii. iv. where, after the arguments used in favour of wine, women, and kings, at length truth beareth away the victory, and being "stronger than all things, for truth endureth, and is always strong, it liveth and conquereth for evermore; neither in her judgment is any unrighteousness; she is the strength, kingdom, power, and majesty, of all ages. And all the people shouted, and said, Great is truth, and mighty above all things."

Ver. 13. When the righteous was sold, she forsook him not.] Joseph, who is here emphatically called the righteous, is another remarkable instance of God's protection and care of his afflicted servants; Joseph was sent to his brethren upon a friendly message, and his coming was even beneficial to them; but the recompense he met with was treachery and violence; it was unnatural to sell their brother, but it was an aggravation of their cruelty to sell him, an innocent and tender youth, to rough barbarians, and by them to be carried away into such a country as Egypt. Ephraim Syrus is very pathetic upon this occasion; he makes the unhappy Joseph to stop at his mother

Rachel's monument, as he was going with the merchants into Egypt; his complaint there, and the deep and melting impression it made, even upon his Ishmaelite masters, is very moving and affecting (De Laud. Jos.). Nor are his eloquence and invention less to be admired upon the other part of Joseph's sad history. The affliction of Joseph is a common allusion in scripture, and the standard, as it were, to try others' afflictions by. It is recorded of him, that he was but seventeen years old when his troubles first began; and though the patriarchs that were before him, underwent their respective trials and calamities, yet the Holy Spirit mentions none of their afflictions with the same emphasis as that of Joseph, as if they were to be the badge and characteristic by which he was to be distinguished from the rest; but, through the favour of providence and its secret but wonderful economy, his very afflictions were made the means of his advancement. This so remarkable an instance of the guidance of divine providence, another father applies to the afflicted and unfortunate, for their comfort and encouragement: "Joseph, a single person, sold a bondsman into Egypt, there destitute, imprisoned, enslaved; at length went forth a multitude from thence, even to the number of six hundred thousand souls, which grew up to be a great and very powerful people" (Greg. Nazian. Orat. 32).

But delivered him from sin:] This relates to Joseph withstanding the solicitations of his mistress, Potiphar's wife, who, through a criminal love, would have tempted him to adultery; but by a strict regard to chastity, and a religious adherence to his duty, he was deaf to her entreaties, and proof against her amorous violence. The reflection of Rollin upon this part of Joseph's character, is so fine, and the advice therein given of such consequence to young and unguarded minds, that I cannot better illustrate this place, or more please well-disposed readers, than by transcribing it: "We find in his (Joseph's) conduct an excellent model of what we should do when we are tempted. Joseph defends himself at first by the remembrance of God and his duty; 'How,' says he to that bold and shameless woman, 'can I commit such an action, who have God for my witness and my judge? It is in his sight that you and I shall both become criminal: it is he who commands me to disobey you upon this occasion. How can I escape his view, or corrupt his justice, or be covered from his indignation? How then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?' But when the temptation became so strong, that he had cause to fear his weakness might yield to it, he prudently betakes himself to flight, rather than parley any longer, or continue in such a state of danger or temptation, as might at length incline him to offend against God" (Method of studying Belles Lettres, vol. iii. p. 141).

She went down with him into the pit.] Joseph's noble resistance provoked his impudent mistress, who wrongfully accused him to her husband, and was the occasion of his being cast into prison; over whom God was, under this unhappy circumstance, more abundantly watchful. For the scripture seems to be particularly careful to make us take notice, how God protected this his servant, by informing us, that "the Lord was with Joseph; or, according to the Chaldee paraphrase of the place, that "the Word of the Lord was with him" (Gen. xxxix. 21.) This expression, that "the Lord was with Joseph in the prison," seems to intimate, that when Joseph was thrown into it, and seemingly forsaken of all, God descended with him into the obscure dungeon; and the expression of our author, that "wisdom went down with him into the pit, and left him not in bonds," is to the same purpose, viz. that the eternal wisdom became in a manner prisoner with him; i. e. according to the same polite writer, "she softened the tediousness of his nights, which were spent in watching and suffering; she was a light in that darkness where the rays of the sun could not penetrate; she took away from the solitude of his confinement which neither reading nor business could amuse or suspend the disagreeable sense of; and she diffused a calmness and serenity over his mind, which arose from an invisible and inexhaustible spring. In this his miserable confinement she was nearest to Joseph, as she is to every man in adversity that has faith: nor is it said, when Joseph was made a partner in the throne of Pharaoh, that wisdom ascended with him thither, as it is said, that she descended with him into prison, and assisted him in his bonds" (vol. iii. p. 139). St. Ambrose has the like reflection upon the same occasion: Non turbantur innocentes, cum falsis criminibus impetuntur, et oppressa innocentia detrahuntur in carcerem; visitat Deus et in carcere suos, et ibi est plus auxilii, ubi est plus periculi (De Joseph. cap. 5).

Ver. 14. And left him not in bonds, till she brought him the sceptre of the kingdom.] This is no where mentioned in the books of Moses; it is there only said, that Joseph "was made governor over all the land of Egypt:" Philo says, indeed, speaking of Joseph, that Pharaoh made him his viceroy, or, to speak more truly, says he, king; πάλλον δὲ, εἰ χρὴ τ' ἀδελφεὶ τινὶ, βασιλεῖα. But we are not to understand our author, as if he meant by the "sceptre of the kingdom," a truly royal power, a sovereignty strictly so called, an regne un empire absolu, says Calmet; but only, that he was the second person in the kingdom, and had a most extensive power and authority. Some make him to be a partner in the throne with Pharaoh, and think he was invested with this power when Pharaoh took off his ring, which was the royal seal, from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's, "and they cried before him, Bow the knee." But notwithstanding these ceremonies, and the supreme honours paid him therein, Joseph was still a subject; he was indeed his prime or chief minister, governor over all the country; but as his power came from Pharaoh, so it was subject to him. Grocius says, it was usual with the Hebrews to give the name of king to such as were raised to some very extraordinary honour, and were invested with great authority; and refers to ver. 16 of this chapter, which he understands in the like sense (Comment. in loc.). And thus governors of provinces, and persons of chief note and authority in countries of small extent, are called in scripture: see Judges i. 7, where the three score and ten kings, mentioned to have had their thumbs and their great toes cut off by Adoni-bezek, are not to be understood as real kings and princes, but as so many rulers of cities or small territories, called indeed kings, as having a resemblance of kingly power, by their jurisdiction in such places. Many such petty kings were in Canaan in Joshua's time, who were very numerous: Tous les seigneurs qui gouvernoient une ville (says Calmet in loc.) s'appeloient du nom de rois: till at length the greater overcame, and as it were devoured the rest. The like may be said of the thirty and two kings which went up with Ben-hadad the king of Syria to besiege Samaria (1 Kings xx. 1. Isa. xix. 2). And some of the ancients have given this name even to Abraham, Moses, and Israel (see Justin, lib. xxxvi. cap. 2, and Nicol. Damascen. apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7, and Calmet in loc.). This seems confirmed likewise by the new name which Pharaoh gave him; which he conferred, not only because he was a foreigner, and intended to honour him, but to denote him to be his subject, though ruler of every body else (see Pat. in loc.): a name which, according to St. Jerome, and the vulgar Latin, signified "the saviour of the world" (see Gregory's notes, p. 65), probably in allusion to the services done by him in the time of the famine. But perhaps this name may mystically include something higher; for some learned men have remarked, that there are few saints of the Old Testament, in whom God has been pleased to express so many circumstances of resemblance with his Son, as in Joseph (see the particulars of the agreement, and the parallel drawn by Rollin, vol. iii. on the Belles Lettres, p. 155). This is doing the greatest honour to Joseph, and strictly giving him perpetual glory.

And gave him perpetual glory.] By the term perpetual, we may understand that Joseph's glory did not die with him, but was preserved and handed down to posterity, by some public monument in his favour, or by some symbol representing him. Dr. Spencer contends, that the ark and cherubims were honourable hieroglyphics of Joseph; both of which had a symbolical reference to him, and preserved his memory; Æquum est opinari, Deum cherubim et arcam, præ aliis omnibus instituisse, eo quod Josephi piissimi et charissimi monumentum extarent. Nam arca non tantum nomine, sed et figura cum Josephi arca, et cherubim cumbore, Josephi nomine et insigni, maxime conveniebant—ut utraque ejus vitam et mortem ab oblivione in æternum vindicaret (tom. ii. De Orig. Arcae et Cherub. p. 578, 9). But the learned Vossius has made it appear, with more probability, from the testimonies of Ruffin and Suidas, and other authorities and arguments, that the memory of Joseph was preserved under the Egyptian Apis; for he observes, first, that it is highly probable so extraordinary a person, so great a prophet and statesman, and so public a benefactor, as Joseph was, would have had his memory consecrated to posterity: that the Egyptians were most likely to do this, by some symbolical representation of the kindness; and that no symbol was more proper for this than the Egyptian Apis; because the famine was prefigured by the lean kine, and the time of plenty by the fat, the ox being a known symbol of fruitfulness and plenty, which Joseph was in a very great degree the happy occasion of. It is evident likewise from Pharaoh's rewarding Joseph, that the Egyptians were desirous of showing their gratitude; and it is no less certain, that it was the common practice among them, to perpetuate the memory of benefactors by some symbols, which, though at first designed only for civil use, were afterward abused into idolatry and superstition. And, lastly, the very names, Apis and Serapis, give great light and probability to the conjecture; for Vossius conceives Apis to be the sacred name of Joseph among the Egyptians, and answers to the Hebrew אב ab, i. e. father; and such, indeed, he was to Pharaoh and his people, and Joseph expressly calls himself so, Gen. xlv. 8. The scripture likewise informs us, that by the order of Pharaoh they cried before him, Abrech, which is a compound word, and means, according to the rabbins, both king and father. Serapis, it is well known, had a bush on his head, another very significant symbol of Joseph; and the very name of Serapis, is probably derived from שור sor, which signifies a bull, and Apis. So that we seem here to have the sacred history of Joseph visibly traced through all the Egyptian darkness and superstition (Vossius De Idololat. lib. i. Sulpic. Sever. lib. ii. cap. 21, in notis. Gregory's Observations, p. 65. Reeves' Apology, vol. ii. p. 39).

Ver. 15. She delivered the righteous people and blameless seed from the nation that oppressed them. It has been an objection against this writer, that he represents the Hebrews, when they were in Egypt under the bondage of Pharaoh, as a just and irreproachable people; which is not agreeable to what Ezekiel says of them, and some others of the prophets, who accuse them as given to idolatry, in that place and at that time (Ezek. xx. 8. xxiii. 3). Others think that, as a Jew, he speaks of them in general, according to the notion which they had conceived of themselves; for they were full of spiritual presumption, looked upon all other nations with the utmost contempt, as imagining themselves to be the only righteous and accepted, and thought every thing their due; and, that as God had shown particular honour and kindness to the Jews, in choosing them to be his people, he would never reject them. In this latter sense the profoundly learned Dr. Jackson understands this place; for he observes of our author, "That though he was a man of an excellent contemplative spirit, as full as the moon in points of high speculation of God's general providence in governing the world; yet when he comes to discuss the different manner of God's dealing with the righteous (which in his language are the seed of Abraham) and the wicked heathen, he betrays himself, in some measure, to be infected with a disease, common to his countrymen, the Jews." The radical disease which was common to the whole Jewish nation at that time, and to this author in particular, he says, was this, "That, because they were the seed of Abraham, they were the only righteous and blameless seed. And however the Lord God of their fathers did often chastise and correct them, yet all his corrections were filial (xi. 10. xii. 22), that he would not, or could not, at any time plague them, as he had done the unrighteous heathen, or punish them with the like blindness of mind, or hardness of heart, as he had done the Egyptians. But St. Paul has given a receipt or medicine for curing this disease in his countrymen then living, and for preventing the like in after ages, whether in Jew or Gentile (Rom. ix. 18). "Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth." The extract of which aphorism is this,—that the Lord was not so tied by oath or promise unto Abraham, but that he might or would harden the hearts, and blind the eyes of his seed, after the same manner he had done Pharaoh's and the Egyptians', if at any time they should become as obstinate as Pharaoh and his people had been. To harden the seed of Abraham, upon the like pride of heart, obstinacy, and contempt of God's forewarnings, could be no prejudice to God's oath to Abraham, no impeachment of his promised loving-kindness to David, but rather a proof to all the world, that the God of Abraham was "no respecter of persons;" but as they who in every nation fear him, and love righteousness, shall be accepted of him; so all those of any nation that despise him, and work unrighteousness, shall be ejected by him (tom. iii. 206, 7). And the history of the Jewish people justifies this observation; for as they grew still more corrupt, wicked, and idolatrous, in the promised land, than they had been in Egypt, notwithstanding the many instructions, invitations, reproofs, and miracles, of their prophets and holy guides to reclaim them, God was at last obliged to send them captive to Nineveh and Babylon; and at length, when neither corrections nor benefits, nor even the coming of their own Messiah, could overcome their obstinacy, God was pleased to reject his once-beloved, and to call and adopt the Gentiles that were afar off. But perhaps, we may explain this passage of our author, which hath been excepted against for the reasons before given, in a good consistent sense, without supposing any prejudice or partiality to his countrymen, as the latter objection does, or that the author maintains any false fact in the instance before us, as is the sense of the former: for, 1. This writer may probably call the Jews a righteous, or, as the margin has it, a holy people, λαὸν ὁσίων, upon account of their external holiness, as being a peculiar people, a chosen generation, a holy nation, separated more immediately to God's service, and called with a holy calling. 2. The Jews may be here, not improperly, called, a blameless seed, σπέρμα ἀμώμων, upon account of the imputative righteousness of the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, their forefathers; the root therefore being holy, the branches may be considered so in like manner. 3. Though the Jews cannot indeed properly be said to be a righteous and blameless seed, with respect to God, who permitted their disgrace and punishment in Egypt, upon the account of their wickedness; yet, with respect to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, they may be said to be righteous and blameless, just and irreproachable; Qui n'avoient jamais offensé les Egyptiens, as having never injured or offended them, though greatly oppressed by them: this is Calmet's exposition (see Pref. sur le Livre de la Sagesse, et Comment. in loc.).

Ver. 16. She entered into the soul of the servant of the Lord, and withstood dreadful kings in wonders and signs; i. e. She entered into the soul of Moses, here called "the servant of the Lord," by way of eminence, as he is in many places of scripture. It is observable, that this writer speaks of dreadful kings, in the plural number, though he only appeared before Pharaoh; nor is there any reason to imagine more kings than one in Egypt, except we should, with De Muis, include some neighbouring kings, then captive or tributary to Pharaoh (Comment. in Ps. cv.). But this author, as I have before observed (see note on ver. 14), gives the names of kings to great men and nobles. We have an instance of the like plural expression, and upon the same occasion, Ps. cv. 30, "Their land brought forth frogs, yea, even in their kings' chambers." Ἐν τοῖς ταμίειαις τῶν βασιλέων αὐτῶν, LXX. Coverdale's translation refers it to Pharaoh only, "She stood by him in wonders and tokens against the horrible king." The sense of the whole verse is, that wisdom entered into the soul of Moses, and spake by his mouth, and made him even a God unto Pharaoh, before whom, his royal issue, and his nobles, he wrought so many surprising miracles as might have convinced them, that God was the sovereign ruler, not only over all the kingdoms of the earth, but even over the elements and universal nature.

Ver. 17. Rendered to the righteous a reward of their labours, God gave the Israelites, at their departure, the goods of the Egyptians as the reward of their labours among them, and as their just due for their past services. Many of the ancient fathers, as Irenæus, Tertullian, Epiphanius, &c. understand the case in this light, and look upon the spoiling of the Egyptians, as a piece of justice only due to themselves: for undoubtedly the Israelites ought, both in equity and strict right, to have had some wages or recompense for the labours and hardships they underwent in their service; to which they seem more entitled, considering the great benefits the Egyptians received from them in general, and from Joseph in particular. St. Austin, therefore, well observes, speaking of the Egyptians, Homines peregrinos labore, gratuito injustè et vehemente afflixerant; digni ergo erant et Hebræi quibus talia juberentur, et Ægypti, qui talia paterentur (Lib. xxii. cont. Faust.). We may add further, in vindication of this fact, that it was done by the appointment and command of God himself, who thus punished the Egyptians for their injustice and cruelty to the Israelites. And though it is contrary to the law of nature, as well as positive law, to take away the just goods of another, because no man has a right for that purpose, yet the case is quite altered, when such an action is done by the command of God, who has an unquestionable right in, and power over, all persons and things, as the maker, and giver, and Lord of all. There could be therefore no injustice in this particular, as God had an undoubted right to transfer the property of the Egyptians to the Hebrews. Nor does scripture any where condemn or disapprove this fact; it is rather a confirmation of scripture, for thus the promise to Abraham was fulfilled, "That nation whom they shall serve will I judge, and afterward shall they come out with great substance" (Gen. xv. 14). I shall not enter any farther into this argument; such as desire to see it discussed more at large, may consult Shuckford, Connex. Sac. et Prof. Hist. vol. ii. p. 495; Waterland's Scripture Vindicated, par. ii. p. 10; Grotius De Jure Belli et Pacis, and other writers, who justify this fact, by a great number of good reasons.

Guided them in a marvellous way, and was unto them for a cover by day.] This refers to the divine protection exhibited to the Israelites in their journeying through the wilderness, when God led them by a pillar, which stood still when they were to rest, and moved forward when and which way they were to march. This pillar appeared as a cloud in the day, and served for a covering over them, to defend them from the scorching heat of the sun; which the writer of Ecclesiasticus expresses very strongly when he calls it, σκήπη ἀπὸ καθωσώτος, καὶ σκήπη ἀπὸ μεσημβρίας (xxxiv. 16). It was a cloud erected towards heaven, like a pillar upwards, but downwards flat and broad, spread over the body of the people, as afterward more eminently over the tabernacle; and, though but one pillar, had two different appearances and uses; of a cloud by day, to defend them from the heat, which, in those parts, was very excessive; and of a fire by night, to direct and illuminate them. Coverdale's and the Geneva bibles express the first very properly, "On the day-time she was a shadow unto them." This darkness of the cloud had also another use, viz. that it blinded and confounded their enemies, that they might not come near to assault them. Mr. Toland's account for one and the same thing giving both light and darkness to different parties, is very odd and singular, to say no worse of it: he supposes a fire was made by order of the Hebrew general for a blind to the enemy, that they might be suspected to be where indeed they were not (see his Hodegus, and note on xix. 7).

And a light of stars in the night season;] The Greek reads, εἰς φλόγα ἀστέρων τὴν νύκτα, according to Grabe's and some other editions; but ἀστέρων, which the Vatican copy preserves, seems more proper and expressive; for ἀστέρων signifies a constellation, or a great collection of stars together, according to Didymus, ἀστὴρ δὲ ἀστέρων διαφέρει, ὅτο δ' μὲν ἀστὴρ, ἔν τι τῷ τῷ δὲ ἀστέρων ἐκ πολλῶν συνίστηκεν ἀστέρων, ζώδιον ὅν, δ' καὶ ἀστροβόλημα καλεῖται (In notis ad H. Δ. 75). Many of which constellations, by their joint and united light, might imitate a torch, or a flame, as the margin renders. But could the light of common stars, scattered here and there confusedly, assist the Israelites, travelling in a vast and pathless wilderness? or would so feeble a light serve for their direction, and be sufficient for all their purposes? Calmet compares to this light the ὁ ἀστὴρ, or the star which appeared at our Saviour's birth (Matt. ii. 9), "which (says he) was a light that moved in the air before the magi, something like the pillar of the cloud in the wilderness, which either stopped, or went forward, in such manner as was necessary for the conduct of the wise men to the proper place." This he takes to be an inflamed meteor in the middle region of the air, with miraculous and extraordinary circumstances attending it: as our version, following the Greek, seems to make the real light of the stars to be the guide of the Israelites in the night season; ἀστέρων, taken in this sense, may be sufficient for their direction. But the Syriac and Arabic versions understand this pillar in a different sense, that it was as a light of stars in the night-season; the former reads, vice splendoris siderei, and the latter more fully, noctū verò, vice fulgoris stellarum, splendor. We may therefore understand this place, either of a number of constellations placed together, shining with a natural but very extraordinary light; or, of a collection of meteors with a preternatural light; or, lastly, comparatively, that this light imitated that of the brightest stars, in the sense of the oriental versions. In the scripture, this appearance is described in much stronger terms; for the pillar, which appeared in the day like a cloud, is there mentioned to be like a light, or pillar of fire; and thus the psalmist, "In the day-time he led them with a cloud, and all the night through with a light of fire" (Ps. lxxviii. 14). And to this the prophet alludes when he says, "The Lord will create upon every dwelling-place of mount Zion, and upon her assemblies, a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of flaming fire by night" (Isa. iv. 5). Salvian rightly describes this pillar, with its different appearances, when he calls it, "Mobilem columnam, nubilam die, igneam nocte, congruas colorum diversitates pro temporum diversitate sumentem: scilicet ut et die lucem latea obscuritate distingueret, et caliginem noctis flammeo splendore claritatis radiaret" (De Gubern. dei, lib. i.). It seems, after all, best, without aiming at explaining the nature of this appearance, to say, that the glorious Shechinah, itself, in this pillar, gave light and comfort to God's own peculium: for the regent of this cloudy pillar was he that forms the light and creates darkness; and as "there was the hiding of his power, so his brightness there was as the light," Hab. iii. 4, where the reading of the LXX. is too particular not to be taken notice of, καὶ ἔδωκε ἀγάπην κραταιὰν ἰσχύος αὐτοῦ; for it intimates the principle upon which the great Goel, or deliverer, proceeded to exert his might under these different appearances, viz. his strong and powerful love towards his people (see note on xix. 7). Messieurs du Port-Royal, besides the literal, give us a very useful allegorical sense of this pillar, viz. "That, as the cloud, by its overshadowing, sheltered the Hebrews from the extremity of heat, so the assistance of the Holy Spirit defends us against the burnings and flames of concupiscence; and as that light of fire guided them in a marvellous way in the very darkness of the night, so the Holy Spirit illuminates men's minds with its heavenly light, under their sad state of spiritual darkness; and with its holy fire cheers and comforts the saints in their greatest afflictions" (Comment. in loc.). And, indeed, according to the mystical sense of the fathers, the whole people of Israel, and that which befell them, were types or figures of Christ and his church, as the apostle himself makes them, 1 Cor. x.: their bondage in Egypt was a type of the slavery of sin, and their deliverance from thence, of our redemption from Satan: the desert through which they passed, and the difficulties they encountered in it, were a lively figure of the miseries of this life: as Moses, their leader, was of Christ; Canaan, of heaven; the Red sea, of baptism; and manna, of his heavenly doctrine, which came down from heaven, and nourishes unto eternal life.

Ver. 19, 20. And cast them up out of the bottom of the deep. Therefore the righteous spoiled the ungodly.] The expression here is ambiguous, and the interpreters are accordingly divided about the true sense of it; the far greater part of them understand it, either of the Israelites' happy escape from the Egyptian bondage, or from the dangers of the Red sea. This seems to be the sense of all the old English translations, of the oriental versions, and of the Vulgate, which metaphorically renders, et ab altitudine inferorum eduxit illos, as if their escape from thence was like a return from the grave. Calmet renders very expressly, elle a retiré les siens du fond des abîmes; and, among the sacred critics, Grotius and Badwell are of the same opinion. But there is another, and I think, with submission, a better sense, and more agreeable to the context, which applies these words to the Egyptians, which is favoured by the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal, which renders, qui les a rejettés morts du fond des abîmes; i. e. that after they were drowned, they were cast by the tide, or by God's appointment, from the bottom of the sea to the shore, where the Israelites were encamped; by which means they possessed themselves of their spoils. And to this agrees, in great measure, the account which Josephus gives, "That the winds and the waves forced their arms ashore just at the place where the Hebrews had pitched their tents; which Moses understood to be another providence, in furnishing the people with arms in this manner that they so much wanted, which were gathered together and distributed among the Hebrews" (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 16). That the first sense, which applies these words to the Israelites' escape from the dangers of the Red sea, cannot be the true one, seems manifest from the context, and the following reasons: 1. That the spoiling of the Egyptians, by the borrowing of their valuable goods, is mentioned just before, ver. 17. 2. That the mention of it follows very improperly, after the relation of the drowning of their enemies; for can any thing be more absurd than this reason, that, because they were happily escaped from the Red sea, therefore they spoiled the Egyptians before they came to it? Διὰ τοῦτο, therefore (ver. 20), cannot relate to this first spoiling of the Egyptians. 3. At their departure from Egypt, when they went out laden with the goods of their oppressors, there was no hymn composed on that occasion, nor do we find any recorded in their history. But in the sense which I contend for, all is right and easy; for after the account of the Egyptians being drowned, and that they were cast up from the bottom of the sea to the side where the Israelites were, it follows very naturally, that the dead bodies coming by this means into their power, they therefore spoiled them, Διὰ τοῦτο ἐσκόλευσαν ἀσπίδας i. e. stripped them, and took their arms from them, which they most wanted. And what confirms this is, that a hymn was actually composed and sung upon this signal overthrow of their enemies (see note following). 4. Ἀνίστασεν is not to be taken in the sense of leaping, as Grotius seems to understand it, making it synonymous to σκιρτῶν, and ἐξάλλεσθαι, but is a metaphor, taken from water issuing from its source or fountain; or rather, from the bubbles rising in boiling water. Our translation, therefore, is too flat, when it barely renders, "cast them up;" for the bodies rising in the act of drowning, are here, by a beautiful and expressive allusion, compared to bubbles rising in boiling water; and the true sense is, that he made the bodies of the Egyptians rise up like bubbles from the bottom of the sea. In the sense of our version the reading should be, ἡψίστου (see 2 Macc. i. 12).

Ver. 21. For wisdom opened the mouth of the dumb, and made the tongues of them that cannot speak eloquent. [The ancient English versions read in the present tense, "Wisdom openeth the mouth of the dumb, maketh the tongues of the babes to speak;" which is the rendering of Coverdale's and the Geneva bible, and may be considered as a judicious epiphonema, or useful reflection, wherewith the author concludes the chapter, to show the great power of God, that he "who removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged, who leadeth counsellors away spoiled, and maketh the judges fools" (Job xii. 17. 20), can, with equal ease, make the dumb eloquent, and the mouth of babes and sucklings to chant forth hosanna and praise. But I think this verse relates rather to the foregoing, and concerns the same persons; the sense, according to the original, and the oriental versions, seems to be, that the Israelites, who before were silent through fear of the Egyptians, and were not, by the many former miracles wrought in their favour, induced to bless and praise God for them upon a sight of the sudden and universal destruction of their enemies, from a sense of the danger which themselves had escaped, and out of gratitude for the unexpected spoils which they were possessed of, sang unto the Lord, upon the occasion, that hymn of thanksgiving, or eucharistical ode, which has been so justly celebrated by all antiquity, which Archbishop Usher styles, Onnium, quorum uspiam memoria extat, primum et antiquissimum; "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea:" which was seconded by Miriam the prophetess, and all the Israelitish women, with umbrellas and with dances (Exod. xv. 1); and, according to Grolius, the children joined in and completed the harmony (Comment. in loc.).]

CHAP. XI.

ARGUMENT.—The account of what wisdom did for the Israelites after their departure out of Egypt is continued. God's different dispensations towards the Egyptians and the Israelites in the wilderness are recited, and a parallel or comparison drawn between the plagues with which God smote the former, and the great mercies which he vouchsafed to the latter, even in the same instances. That the Egyptians were deprived of water, by the river and all their springs being turned into blood, by which plague great numbers died through thirst; but the Israelites were supplied with the same element at the same time that they were afflicted, and afterward, in a more extraordinary and miraculous manner, from the rock, which flowed like a stream or river, and even followed them from place to place in their travels through the wilderness.

Ver. 3. They stood against their enemies, and were avenged of their adversaries. [Such as the Amalekites, who fell upon those of the Israelites, who, through weakness or fatigue, could not keep up with the rest of the army (Deut. xxv. 18), and endeavored to oppose their passage, and hinder their settlement in Canaan; the king of Arad, who attacked the Israelites as they passed that way, and took some of them prisoners, without any provocation (Numb. xxi. 1); Og the king of Bashan, and Sihon king of the Amorites, who were likewise the aggressors, and opposed their march; for in this sense we are to understand the place, that the Israelites did not act offensively till they were assailed; and thus the Arabic version takes it, Bellum contra se gerentibus restiterunt, and ἀντιμαρμαί is so used in the best Greek writers.

Ver. 4. When they were thirsty they called upon thee. [This happened twice in the wilderness; at Rephidim they first murmured for water (Exod. xvii. 1), and then at Kadesh (Numb. xx.). But though this miraculous supply of water seems mentioned twice in this verse, there is no necessity to suppose, that both these times are referred to. There is the like repetition, Ps. lxxviii. 16, which seems, according to the rendering of the LXX. to relate to the same miracle (see also Ps. cxiv. 8). One may often observe in this book, and the like may be said of Ecclesiasticus and the book of Proverbs, that the same sense is frequently expressed in two periods or members of the same verse, with no other difference, but a variation of the phrase. This observation will be found not without its use; but there are two others in this chapter which it may be proper to mention, as being more material, and even necessary, for the right understanding this book, and may indeed be considered as the very key of it, at least of the remaining part; we have the first in the next verse, "That by what things the Egyptians were punished, by the same the Israelites, in their need, were benefited;" which parallel is almost constantly pursued, and strongly drawn, by way of contrast or opposition, to acquaint us, as it were in one view, with the joint history of those people, and God's respective dealing with each of them; the second is in ver. 16, viz. "wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished;" which aphorism, well weighed and attended to, will be of great service for unravelling and explaining the ten plagues in particular, and the reason why God chose to afflict that people with them, rather than with any other.

And water was given them out of the flinty rock. [It is not without good reason that water is said to be given to the Israelites from the rock. That this miracle is mysterious, is evident from the circumstances related of it; for if there had been no other design but the relieving their necessity, that might have been supplied by rain from heaven: or, if only a visible effect of the divine power was intended to have been displayed, that had been as easily discovered, in causing new springs to rise from the earth; but Israel was not supplied with water from the clouds or the valleys, but from the rock. Hence therefore learned men have drawn a parallel, between the rock and Christ: 1. Because a rock is the ordinary title of God in scripture, and in a special manner it resembles Christ (Ps. cxviii. 12. 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8). 2. It was the Son of God, "the angel of his presence," the conductor of his people, that then spake to Moses, and stood upon the rock, to signify the relation it had to himself (Exod. xvii. 6). 3. The apostle himself so explains it, "They drank of that spiritual rock which followed them, and that rock was Christ," 1 Cor. x. 4 (see Bates' Harmony, p. 458).

Ver. 6. For instead of a fountain of a perpetual running river [Ἀντὶ μὲν πηγῆς ἀειδαίου ποταμοῦ. Πηγὴ ποταμοῦ is not a usual expression, and seems to relate, if it be the true reading here, to the source or fountain-head of the Nile, the river here intended: for thus much must be allowed, that the ancients inquired after nothing more than the fountains of the Nile (see Stephan. Diet. Histor. Geograph. in voce Nilus). And Strabo and other Greek writers constantly use the word πηγὴ in speaking of them, and even whole treatises have been written concerning them; and when any streams are corrupted, it is natural to ascribe the fault to the corruption of the fountains whence they flow, though perhaps the accident proceeds from some other cause. There may also be, possibly, an allusion in this expression to the fountain and river in the wilderness; for the place where the water issued from the rock in Horeb, was, in the strictest sense, πηγὴ ποταμοῦ; and indeed the stream flowing thence is expressly called by the LXX. πηγαὶ ὕδατων, Ps. cxiv. 8 (see also Joseph. Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 1). And the stream that followed (as St. Paul words it) the Israelites in the deserts wherever they went (or as some conjecture the fact, they followed the river, which way soever God directed its course, whereby he ordered their journeys as he pleased), was to them ἀειδαίος ποταμός. In allusion, I say, to this stream in the wilderness, πηγὴ ἀειδαίου may here perhaps be ascribed to the Nile. The Arabic version applies ἀειδαίου to πηγῆς, and renders, Pro fonte fluminis abunde manante; i. e. instead of a clear and perpetual running spring, they were troubled with a river foul with blood. But as all the other versions join this epithet to ποταμοῦ, and as the opposition lies not between what the river was in its natural state, and after it was turned into blood, but between the Egyptians being deprived of water, and the Israelites supplied with it, in the same miraculous manner; and, which is of great moment in the present inquiry, by the very self-same instrument,—I am more inclined to think, that the true reading of this passage is, ἀντὶ μὲν πηγῆς ἀειδαίου ποταμοῦ, see Exod. vii. 20, where the text says, that "he (Moses) lifted up the rod, and smote the waters that were in the river, and all the waters that were in the river were turned into blood." It is no less observable, that the same rod was the immediate instrument in the other miracle, viz. in supplying the Israelites with water; for the scripture is very full and explicit in this point, "And the rod, wherewith thou smotest the river, take in thy hand and go—And thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come out water" (Exod. xvii. 5, 6). This conjecture is confirmed likewise by the context, particularly ver. 5, which manifestly alludes to the rod that struck both the Nile and the rock, and may be equally applied both to the cause and to the effect. To establish this farther, I shall show upon what account this river may be styled αἰνῶας ποταμός; 1. Αἰνῶας is applicable to it, as it is a common epithet of a river. Instances of this may be found in the classic writers; Horace, particularly, thus describes the perpetuity of its course,

"Rusticus expectans dum defluit amnis: at ille Labitur, et tabetur in omne volubilis ævum."
(Epist. lib. i. ep. 2.)

in opposition to brooks that often dry up, and have little or no water in them. Thus Calmet expounds this term, Comment. in loc. Besides this general reason, may not the river Nile in particular be so called, 2dly, as being, in the opinion of many learned men, one of the four rivers of Paradise, originally Gihon (Gen. ii. 13)? and as such may be considered, in point of time, as a perpetual running river. 3dly, The Nile may be termed αἰνῶας ποταμός; as a never-failing river, its fountain being never dry, but its streams continually fed, though in a country where it seldom or never rains: and though its source remained concealed, yet its supplies were constant, and as it were miraculous. Hence the Phœnicians, Canaanites, Syrians, Greeks, and other travellers into Egypt, had a notion that God himself supplied Egypt with these surprising and never-failing waters: and hence Homer probably calls the Nile, Διὸς ποταμός, Fluvius à Deo missus, i. e. "a river sent and maintained by God;" Odys. Δ. 581. Strabo gives it the same title, lib. xvii. And indeed the Egyptians represent this constant miracle by the symbol of a river flowing out of the mouth of the sun, the known and fixed image of God among them. 4thly, The Nile may be called αἰνῶας, as being, according to the Egyptian notion, perpetual à parte ante, for they esteemed water to be the very origin and principle of all things, and on that account they worshipped it: the Nile in particular is sometimes termed Ζεὺς Αἰγύπτιος, and therefore God smote it in the first place. And thus Philo, Primum ab aqua Deus pœnas infligit, proterea quòd, cum aquam supra modum Ægyptii colerent, originem rerum omnium et principium esse statuerent, eam primum æquum esse putavit ad eorum castigationem advocare (De vita Mosis). Lastly, May not this very ancient and celebrated river, by Juvenal called, the river, by way of eminence (Sat. xx.), be considered as αἰνῶας, in contradistinction to the occasional water in the wilderness, which then first existed, and at length ceased to flow?

Ibid. and ver. 7. River troubled with foul blood, for a manifest reproof of that commandment, whereby the infants were slain. i. e. God changed the waters of the Nile, which before was a clear running stream, into a discoloured and foul water, or rather a sort of stagnating blood, wholly unfit for the Egyptians' use. Our author seems to represent the river as turned into real blood, at once to exemplify and chastise the crime of drowning the Hebrew infants therein (see Origen and Theodoret in cap. vii. Exod.). The latter expressly says, Hanc plagam intulit Deus propter pueros Judæorum in aquis immersos; fluvius enim, mutatus in sanguinem, conqueritur de cæde puerorum per eos commissæ: i. e. "This plague God brought upon them for the children that were drowned, and the river thus turned into blood complained of that slaughter." Coverdale's version is to the same purpose, "Unto the enemies thou gavest man's blood instead of living water," which is a literal translation of the Vulgate, pro fonte semperiterni fluminis humanum sanguinem dedisti injustis. St. Austin (De Miraculis Scripture) and other ancient writers, mention what is equally surprising, that the springs and fountains themselves were likewise so affected and changed, that if an Egyptian dug for fresh water, what issued forth from the earth was like actual blood from a wound. Philo's account is nearly the same; Ὡὰ καὶ καὶ mari cruentantur lacus, fossæ, alvei, rivi, putei, fontes, universa in Ægypto aquæ vis, apertæque humoris venæ velut in profluvio sanguinis, cruoris torrentes emitterent (De Mose, lib. i.). But others think, that this calamity extended only to that part of the river, or those waters, that were nigh the court of Pharaoh; for if this plague was universal, the magicians could have had no place to practise their skill in, and effect the like (see Jackson's works). That such bloody and foul water should breed distempers in the Egyptians, and be even poisonous to them, is no wonder; but Josephus adds, that this was particular to the Egyptians, for the water was wholesome to the Israelites, and with respect to them retained its own nature and usual sweetness (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 14).

Thou gavest them abundance of water by a means which they hoped not for: God gave the Israelites drink in a barren and uninhabited desert, in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is; and this he did from a solid and unpromising rock. The Israelites, according to Josephus (Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 1), "had conceived a notion, from Moses's mentioning water out of the rock, that, dry and wearied as they were, a way was to be cut by them through the rock for the water, which gave them more uneasiness than the thoughts of the cooling refreshment gave them pleasure. But when, upon the striking of the rock with the rod of Moses only, a large stream of water forthwith followed, they praised God for giving them σῶτηριαν οὐδ' ἐπιστάσαν." An expression not very unlike our author's. And to increase the miracle, this crystal stream not only refreshed them for that time in their distress, but even followed them in their journey. The Jewish rabbins are very fond of the conceit, that the rock itself followed them; but others, to soften this prodigy, more wisely assert, that the water from the rock became a river, and flowed after the camp. The reasons for this opinion are, 1. That from the time of this flow of waters from the rock at Horeb, until they came to Kadesh, the Israelites are not said ever to have wanted water, which they must have continually stood in need of, and indeed perished for want of, in their passage through the wilderness, if God had not thus miraculously supplied them. 2. Some expressions in the Psalms seem to imply, that a river from the rock attended them from place to place in their journeyings (Ps. lxxviii. 16, 17, 21. cv. 40). 3. St. Paul says, that they "drank of the rock which followed them" (1 Cor. x. 4), which the best interpreters agree in expounding of the water that flowed from it, and went along with them (see Poole, Whitby, Hammond, in loc. and Usher's Annals ad A. M. 2513). The rendering of the Syriac version of this passage is very particular and remarkable, Quibus et aquam dedisti in optima illa vita, quæ non deficit, alluding probably to that living water, John iv. 14, which our Saviour promises to all the faithful, which "shall be in them a well of water springing up into everlasting life." In like manner this miracle has been allegorized by the fathers, and is, according to them, a visible representation of the overflowings of grace; for Christ is the true rock from whence issue those waters of life, which quench the thirst of his people, during the weary steps they take in the wilderness of this mortal life.

Ver. 8. Declaring by that thirst then how thou hadst punished their adversaries. A contrast or comparison is carried on here, and in the verse foregoing, between the thirst of the Egyptians, occasioned by their foul and distempered water, and that of the Israelites in the wilderness; the first was the just punishment of obstinacy and wickedness, the second was designed to prove and admonish God's chosen people. The sense of the whole verse is, that the Israelites perceived, by their thirst of a short continuance, the different manner of God's dealing with them and with the Egyptians; the former he treated with mercy and favour, and the latter with the utmost rigour and severity. St. Austin observes, that in this plague bibentibus erat exitium, non bibentibus pœna ob sitim quam sustinebant (De Mirac. Script.), i. e. "unto them that drank it was death, and unto them that drank not it was a sore punishment on account of their great thirst." Philo says yet more expressly, πολλὰ καὶ ἀνθρώπων ὄχλος ὑπὸ δίψης διαβδάραις, κ. τ. λ. hominum siti enectorum magnus numerus acervatim jacebat in triviis, non sufficientibus domesticis ad sepultura officia (De Vita Mosis, lib. i.). i. e. "a great number of persons, dead with thirst, lay by heaps in the streets, their servants or friends not being able or sufficient to bury them."

Ver. 9. They knew how the ungodly were judged in wrath and tormented. Ἐγνώσαν πᾶς ἐν ὀργῇ κριθέμενοι δόσεις ἱβανίσοντο. I think the rendering of Coverdale's and the ancient English versions far preferable; "When they were nurtured with fatherly mercy, they knewed how the ungodly were judged, and punished through the wrath of God." The Geneva bible is to the same effect, "When they were chastised in mercy, they knew how the ungodly were judged, and punished in wrath," ἐν ὀργῇ ἱβανίσοντο, which is the better construction. Judged in wrath, as our version has it, seems to carry a reflection upon the equity of God's proceedings. The oriental versions understand it in like manner, and render accordingly.

Thirsting in another manner than the just. The different effect of their thirst sufficiently appears from the description in ver. 8, that of the Israelites being only troublesome for a time, but the other was dangerous and fatal. The Greek Vulgate, and all the ancient versions, entirely omit this sentence in this place. Our translators seem to have inserted it here, to illustrate this verse, and specify the torment: it is fetched from ver. 14, in the Vatican copy (the 15th in Grabe's edition), where it certainly is very improperly placed, as having no manner of relation to the context. So that one cannot but wonder how all the copies and versions should conspire, as it were, in this mistake, and our translators alone be so sagacious to find it out, and restore this dislocated passage to its proper place. Though it would not come in amiss at the end of the eighth verse, reading only δελήσαντας, instead of δελήσαντες.

Ver. 10. For these thou didst admonish and try, as a father: but the other as a severe king thou didst condemn and punish. When the Israelites were chastised, their trial continued but a short time, and God never entirely withdrew his mercy and loving kindness from them; even their chastisement was tempered with tenderness. But the Egyptians were loaded with miseries without intermission; for after having harassed them with ten successive plagues, which terminated in the death of their first-born, God at length drowned the whole army of Pharaoh at once in the Red sea. This distinction, and the different manner of God's acting, is well expressed here, under the respective images of an indulgent father, and an inexorable king: and the opposition is no less beautifully preserved in the terms ἐδοκίμασας and ἐτίμασας. As the former implies kindness and respect, so the latter signifies the extremity of punishment, the putting a man to the rack, and examining him by torture. And thus it is used by this author, ch. i. 9. ii. 19. iv. 6. vi. 4, and in the book of Ecclesiasticus, xvi. 22. xxiii. 10. The comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal has a judicious and useful reflection upon this passage: "That we may hence learn with what patience and thankfulness the just ought to bear the evils which happen to them in this life; for though calamities are common to them with the wicked, yet the reason of sending them is infinitely different: God sends afflictions to good men as a tender father, who chastises his children, because he loves them; but with respect to the wicked, they are to be considered as the just punishment of an abused master, or an enraged king" (Comm. in loc.).

Ver. 11. Whether they were absent or present, they were vexed alike. Some interpreters understand this, that whether the Egyptians were present, or at a distance from the place where Moses was, they were equally tormented; for there was this very remarkable difference between the miracles wrought by Moses, and those of the magicians—that his were permanent, and extended over all the land of Egypt at the same time; Moses no sooner orders frogs or locusts, but they appear at once, and cover the face of the whole country, so that the absent as well as present, are equally incommoded by them; but theirs were but of short continuance, and disappeared almost as soon as produced; and their influence went no farther than the spot where the magicians themselves were. But the context seems rather to require the following sense,—that the Egyptians were equally tormented in the absence and presence of the Israelites, both when they were in Egypt, and after they were delivered from it. When they were in Egypt, they were visited with ten different plagues on their account; and after their departure thence, they were envious and uneasy at the prosperity of a people whom they hated and despised.

Ver. 12. For a double grief came upon them, and a groaning for the remembrance of things past. Διπλὴ γὰρ αὐτοῖς ἔλαβε λύπη, καὶ στεναγμὸς μνημῶν τῶν παρελθόντων. The true rendering of this place is, "Grief and groaning came upon them doubly (for διπλὴ seems here to be used adverbially) upon the remembrance of things past." Our translation expresses this ambiguously; it seems as if one member of the sentence was wanting; but the ancient English versions quite mistake the sense of the passage; for can anything be more foreign to it, than the rendering of Coverdale's and the Geneva bibles? "Their grief was double: namely, mourning and the remembrance of things past." Or διπλὴ may be understood, not numerally to signify a precise number, but as a Hebraism, that great grief and concern fell on them, upon the recollection of things past. Junius seems to have translated it not amiss, Duplex eos occupavit dolor et gemitus, rerum præteritarum recordantes. And thus Calmet, Ils trouvoient pour eux un double sujet de peines, et de larmes, en se souvenant du passé. "Their first grief (says he) was their reflection upon their past plagues, their want of water, the death of their cattle, and that more lamentable one of their first-born. Their second cause of grief and concern was the consideration of the happiness of the Israelites, since their going out of Egypt, and God's merciful dealing with them in the wilderness. The first arose from a shame of being seen in such distressed circumstances by a people whom they despised; and the latter, through a jealousy of the happiness which that people, through God's favour, was possessed of" (Comment. in loc.).

Ver. 13. When they heard by their own punishments the other to be benefited, they had some feeling of the Lord. Our version is somewhat obscure; the meaning is,—when they understood the Israelites to be assisted and refreshed with a supply of such things as they were punished with the want of, and considered the different conduct of God towards his friends and enemies, they at length acknowledged his power, which before they disregarded, and were obliged to own, that what happened to them was from the avenging hand of God and the effect of his enraged justice. For the reason of this different procedure, with respect to the same thing or element, was to exemplify to the world in general, and the Egyptians in particular, that God hath power over all his creatures to continue or alter them, to give or take away the use of them, from whom or in what manner he pleases.

Ver. 14. For whom they rejected with scorn, when he was long before thrown out at the casting forth of the infants, him in the end, when they saw what came to pass, they admired. i. e. That same Moses, who had been sometimes the subject of their railery, whom they had treated with scorn and contempt in the execution of his ministry, who had been formerly exposed and thrown into the river by the cruel order of Pharaoh, and from a happy escape thence received his name, in the end commanded their wonder and admiration by the power of his miracles, which declared him to be the favourite of heaven, the ruler of nature, and the god of Pharaoh. And it is the opinion of some writers, that even among the Egyptians, Moses was honoured after death with religious veneration. Eusebius, from the authority of Artapanus, says expressly, that he was honoured among that people ἰσθίου τιμῆς (Præpar. Evang. lib. ix. Cyril. cont. Jul. lib. i. Tenison on Idolatry). Our version of this place is obscure; it represents the Egyptians ridiculing Moses when he was flung into the river; which scoffing, though it may well be supposed true in general, yet is not particularly applicable to Moses at that time: it is better therefore, and more agreeable to truth, to understand this of him in his public character, and in his employment as God's messenger to Pharaoh: ἀπείπον χλευάζοντες, was often true. I think, therefore, the sense would be more determinate and clear, if part of the first sentence was included in a parenthesis, thus, or ὅν γὰρ (ἐν ἐκθροῖσι πάλας βυβλόντα) ἀπείπον χλευάζοντες, ἐπὶ τέλει τῶν ἐκθροῶν ἐθαύμασαν i. e. "him, whom they rejected with scorn (that same Moses who was long before thrown out with the rest of the children), they in the end admired," &c. For it was a remarkable instance of providence, as well as matter of great surprise to the Egyptians, that he who was thrown into the river should be the instrument of turning that river into blood, and that the Israelites, seemingly an abandoned and forsaken people, should be so wonderfully succoured and preserved.

Ver. 15. But for the foolish devices of their wickedness, wherewith being deceived, they worshipped serpents void of reason. God, by way of punishment for the folly and iniquity of the Egyptians, permitted them to fall into the most ridiculous idolatries, to adore even crocodiles and venomous serpents. Jupiter in Lucian says, that the Egyptian gods were αἰετὶ καὶ γελαιότερα, "filthy and more ridiculous than the gods of other nations" (De Concil. Deorum). And it is observable, that their deities are called not only by the fathers, but by the poets, Portenta instead of Nympha. Thus Juvenal:

— "Quis nescit qualia demens Ægyptus portenta colat?" (Sat. xvi.)

And Virgil pays them no greater compliment when he calls them

"Omnigenūmque Deūm monstra."
(Æn. lib. viii. ver. 695.)

Origen has the like charge against the Egyptians, and exposes some of their favourite deities with much pleasantry. "When you approach (says he) their sacred places, they have glorious groves and beautiful chapels, temples with magnificent gates and stately porticos, and many mysterious and religious ceremonies; but when once you are entered, and got within their temples, you shall see nothing but a cat, an ape, or a crocodile, a gnat or a dog, worshipped with the most solemn veneration" (Orig. cont. Cels. lib. iii.). Ælian says, that serpents among the Egyptians τιμῶνται ἰσχυρῶς, "are zealously worshipped," that they are kept in their houses, and become so tame, that even among their children they are innocent and inoffensive. He describes their latibula, diet, and the manner of feeding them, and shows in many instances the great care taken of them, and the particular regard paid to them (Ælian. lib. xvii. Hist. Animal. cap. 5). Philo is very express as to the crocodile in particular, Ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ τὸ ἀνδροφάγον καὶ θηρίον ἀργαλεῶταρον κροκόδειλος, κ. τ. λ. i. e. "The crocodile which devours men, and is the fiercest of animals, is bred in the sacred river Nile, and abounds in those parts where he is worshipped by the natives" (Fragm. Philon. tom. ii. p. 646). Juvenal, to expose the superstition of the Egyptians, very ludicrously describes a fierce contest between the inhabitants of two neighbouring towns about the superior honour of a serpent or an ape (Sat. xv.); and Tully, amongst the monstrous objects of their worship, reckons crocodiles, aspidæ, serpentes (De Consol. See note on xv. 18). Herodotus speaks of τεῖοι ὄφεις, or sacred serpents about Thebes, which, when they were dead, were buried by the superstitious with great pomp in the temple of Jupiter (Herod. in Euterpe). It is certain, that in the Egyptian hieroglyphics no symbol was more frequent than that of a serpent (see Orus Apollo). Many reasons are assigned by the learned for the particular honour paid to serpents—as, because they can twine and turn themselves into all shapes; hence probably called σκολιῶι ὄφεις by our author (xvi. 5), and because they enjoy, as it were, perpetual youth, by annually casting their skin, and therefore not improperly made the symbols of life and health in Egypt and other countries: but these, however plausible for their being made symbolical representations, are not sufficient reasons for their worship, which more properly owes its original to the subtlety and artifice of the devil; for it is his favourite stratagem, his darling engine, to deceive mankind under this form, encouraged, no doubt, by the fatal success of his first attempt upon Eve in this borrowed shape. Nor is this true only of the Egyptians, but wherever the devil reigned, the serpent was had in some peculiar veneration (see Stillingfleet's Orig. Sac. b. iii. cap. 3).

And vile beasts.] Tully observes of the Egyptians, that they consecrated almost every kind of beasts; "Omne fero genus bestiarum Ægyptii consecrârunt" (De Nat. Deor. lib. iii.). But the sacred animals which they principally regarded were, according to a learned writer, these that follow, viz. "the serpent, the beetle, the hawk, the wolf, the lion, the goose, the crocodile, the bull, the cat, the dog, and the baboon. These, as being symbolical of their two principal deities, Osiris and Isis, they accounted sacred, and substituted them in the place of their deities" (Shaw's Travels, p. 397). At first, as Plutarch thinks, they did not directly worship these, but adored the divinity that was represented in and by them. But though it is certain that the Egyptians chose at first the figures of beasts for the symbols, or hieroglyphical signs, of their gods, yet it is certain, that at length their worship came to be terminated in them; for as they worshipped their Jupiter Ammon under the figure of a ram, their Anubis under that of a dog, from whence Virgil calls him, Latrator Anubis, and their Apis under that of a bull, or ox: so, in time, at least among the vulgar, who considered not sufficiently the intention of these symbols, these representations were esteemed as real and original deities themselves. Lucian's account of the introduction of these animals into their theology is very extraordinary, and even ludicrous, "That in the wars between the gods and the giants, the former for safety fled into Egypt, where they assumed the bodies of beasts and birds, which they ever after retained, and were accordingly worshipped and revered in them, εἰσέτι καὶ νῦν φυλάττεσθαι τοὺς τότε μορφὰς τοῖς θεοῖς (De Sacrificiis). Grotius thinks the original of this practice of worshipping beasts came from hence, viz. that the stars were by astronomers cast into the forms and shapes of particular beasts, and great benefits were supposed to be received from their influence (Explicat. Decal.). And it must be confessed, indeed, that many of the animals, of which the stars bear the name, and to which, by a strong fancy, they were imagined to bear some resemblance, were honoured with a religious veneration by the Egyptians, such as the bull, the ram, the goat, and the dog. The first of these animals, being their favourite Apis, the prophet Jeremiah takes notice of (xvi. 15), and, by a severe sarcasm, according to the version of the LXX. exposes the worship of it; for he represents it as flying from the desolation of Egypt: and the question, Διὰ τί ἐφυγεν ἀπὸ σοῦ ὁ ἄπης, ὁ ποταμὸς ὁ ἐκλεκτός σου (which is the reading likewise of the Arabic version); shows its inability to assist others in distress, though by the Egyptians esteemed θεὸς ἐναργέστατος (see Ælian. de Animal. lib. xi. cap. 10. Spencer, de Legib. Hebr. tom. ii. p. 848). The last, viz. the dog, was the peculiar object of worship of a whole Egyptian province, and was an animal revered and sacred from one end of Egypt to the other. This Juvenal means, when he says,

"Oppida tota canem venerantur"——(Sat. xv.)

And in the same manner the other pagan writers make themselves merry with the Egyptian superstitions (see note on xii. 24. xv. 18). Nor can we, if more authorities were wanted, have a stronger instance of the very particular regard paid by the Egyptians to dogs, cats, and sheep, than what Prideaux mentions, viz. "that Cambyes placed these in the very front of his army, when he took Pelusium, as knowing them to be sacred to, and honoured by, them" (Connex. vol. ii. p. 14. in not.).

Thou didst send a multitude of unreasonable beasts upon them for vengeance;] The author of this book mentions elsewhere (xvi. 3), beasts being sent among the Egyptians as instruments of vengeance; though no express mention is made of this in Exodus, or any part of scripture. Indeed, in Exod. vii. 21, where the text reads, "Behold, I will send swarms of flies upon thee," the margin has it, "a mixture of noisome beasts;" and the Chaldee paraphrase on Ps. xviii. 45, renders more explicitly "a mixed multitude of wild beasts of the field." The Jews have a notion, as appears from the author of the Life and Death of Moses, quoted by Bishop Patrick in loc. that God sent lions, wolves, bears, and leopards, and such-like furious beasts, which killed not only their cattle in the field, but their children in their houses; which seems likewise to be the opinion of Josephus, who, among the Egyptian plagues, reckons ἐνρίπα παντοία καὶ ποδύπορα (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. 14). But as Bochart, De Muis, and other good writers, understand these passages of scripture of swarms of flies only, so it is plain from what follows in our author, that wild beasts are not here to be understood, but rather frogs, locusts, and venomous flies. And thus Calmet renders, des grenouilles, des mouches, des sauterelles, des poux (Comm. in loc.). I think therefore here, and in Rev. iv. 6, where there is the like mistake, ζῶα would be better rendered living creatures than beasts; and so the same word is well translated, Ezek. i. 5. The reflection of Messieurs du Port-Royal upon this occasion is very just, and too fine to be omitted; L'homme abuse de la creature: i. e. "Man abused the creature to provoke God, and God made use of the creature to punish man: he showed his equity at the same time in proportioning the punishment to the crime, and his power, in making even the smallest, and otherwise the most despicable creatures, become formidable to man, which he can do with the greatest ease, when he pleases to make use of them as the instruments of his vengeance" (Comm. in loc.).

Ver. 16. That they might know, that wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished.] In God's government of the world, instances are very frequent, where the nature of the sin and the punishment attending it have very remarkably answered to each other. It would be almost infinite to transcribe profane history upon this occasion; but it may not be unacceptable to exemplify the truth of this observation in general, from the principal facts of this nature recorded in scripture, nor improper to illustrate it from a survey of the plagues of Egypt in particular. To begin with the first sin, which, it is melancholy to observe, was almost as early as the very existence of man: Adam eats of the forbidden fruit of the earth, and the curse of the ground was the punishment to him and all his posterity. The overflowing of vice in the old world was miraculously punished with a deluge of waters; and Sodom, that had burned so long with unnatural lust, was at length consumed by fire and brimstone. Nadab and Abihu, for putting strange fire in their censers, were instantly struck dead in the tabernacle, by fire from heaven. Samuel observed the like rule of justice and retaliation in the execution of Agag, pronouncing, "That as his sword had made women childless, so should his mother be childless among women." The adultery and homicide of David was revenged by the incests and murders of his children; and, because he gloried in the number of his people, he was punished with the loss of seventy thousand of them by pestilence. And the barbarous Adonibezek, who had cruelly dismembered so many captive princes, met himself at last with a suitable requital, and was treated in the same manner. Hezekiah's vanity, in showing his riches and treasures to the ambassadors of the king of Babylon, was requited with the threat, that all that he had thus proudly shown, should one day be carried away into Babylon. The like return was made to Saul, Goliath, Ahab, Jezebel, and Jehoiakim (see also Ezek. xxxv. 15. Isa. xxxiii. 1. Joel iii. 6—8). But this retribution, called ἀντίκτισις, or "the punishing like with like," will be best and most appositely exemplified in the history of the Egyptians in particular, where the connexion between the crime and the punishment is visibly distinguishable in every one of the plagues. 1. God turned the river into blood, and thereby rendered its water not only useless, but unwholesome, to punish the death of the Hebrew infants thrown into it. 2. The disagreeable croaking of frogs throughout the land of Egypt, represents either the cries of the children, or the shrieks of the oppressed Israelites. 3. The nastiness of lice was not only designed to chastise the effeminacy and luxury of the Egyptians, but, according to the Jews, was intended to punish them for employing the Israelites in dirt and filth. 4. The stings of the venomous flies revenged their oppression by cruel and painful tasks. 5. God destroyed their cattle by a murrain, because they had deprived the Israelites of their cattle, and had used them like beasts of burden. Or, we may suppose this plague to be inflicted for their worship of beasts. 6. The bites on the Egyptians themselves, from head to foot, represented the marks of cruelty upon the flesh of the Israelites by their blows and scourges. 7. God revenged their reproaches, insults, and menacing language, by lightnings, strange hail, and thunders, which the Hebrew and the LXX. style "the voices of God," and the Chaldee paraphrase very expressly, Tonitrua maledictionis. 8. As they robbed and deprived the Israelites of their wages, the locusts in return ate up all the fruit of their ground. 9. The Egyptians kept the Israelites close prisoners, and God confined them as remarkably by that thick darkness which would not permit them to stir. 10. They evil-cursed God's first-born, his chosen people, for a long time; and God destroyed all their first-born in one moment. In the Jewish writings there are many examples, in which the vengeance of God has discovered itself in a manner and way adapted and suited to the very crimes (see particularly, 2 Macc. ix. 5, 6. and iv. 24. 32). Nor is the connexion less visible in the history of the church and its persecutors.

Ver. 17. For thy Almighty hand, that made the world of matter without form.] The author seems to intimate by this expression, that God created the world out of pre-existent matter; and possibly he may speak this according to the opinion of the Platonists, who held not any temporal creation of the world, in the strict and proper sense of that word, but the production of its form only from formless hyle, which they called ἀνοκία, or shapelessness. Plato, speaking of the Almighty δημιουργός, says, εἰς τὸν αὐτὸ ἦγαγεν ἐκ τῆς ἀταξίας (In Timeo). But Chalcedius, in his commentaries upon this piece, after a great deal of learned pains taken to search out the true meaning of Plato, concerning the origin of hyle, thinks him to mean, not only the bringing of matter into form, but the original production of matter itself (Chalcid. in Tim. p. 377). Allowing, therefore, Plato to assert a pre-existence of rude matter before the formation of the world, yet he may be understood in the same sense that we believe a chaos to have gone before the bringing the world into the order it is now in. Our author, therefore, though in this sentiment he should transcribe Plato, may, and probably does, mean, that God at first created all matter out of nothing, which, in the beginning, was tohu ve bohu, i. e. "without form and void," as our version has it, but in the Hexæmeron, "God gave everything its form, and ranged and placed them in the order we now see them." And this the writer to the Hebrews seems to mean, when he says, "That the worlds were made by the word of God, so that things which are seen were made," ἐκ μὴ φανερῶν (Heb. xi. 3), or rather, ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων, as the writer of the second book of Maccabees more fully expresses it, vii. 28. For this, as it conveys a higher idea of God's omnipotence, so is it likewise more agreeable to the scope of the argument; for the reasoning in the following verses, we may observe, proceeds a major ad minus, that if God could create the world out of nothing, and stamp beauty upon the rude chaos, he might, with much more ease, make any part of the creation fulfil his vindictive will, or even create new instruments of his wrath on purpose.

Wanted not means to send among them a multitude of bears, or fierce lions.] "God did not punish the obstinacy of the Egyptians all at once, but by degrees and intervals, that he might evidence his mercy, even in the pouring forth of his wrath and fury, and the desire he hath, that lesser chastisements might prevent greater, and exterminating judgments. It was as easy for God to have sent at first lions to have destroyed them utterly, as to send the flies and frogs by way of a timely warning; but he restrains the course of his wrath, and contents himself at first to inflict a lighter punishment, to the end that men, being affrighted with those timely and more favourable strokes, may judge how intolerable it will be to bear the extremity of his wrath, and to drink the dregs of the cup of his fury. But when he meets with hearts altogether hardened, he makes them pass through all the degrees of his anger; he is forced by their impudence to proceed to extremity, and to be as firm in his justice as they are in their obstinacy" (Royaumont's Hist. Bib.). Philo, who often imitates our author, has likewise some useful reflections upon this place: ὅπως τις ἐπιστήσῃ διὰ τὴν τοῖς οὐδὲν ἀπάνει καὶ ἡμελημένους ζώων ἐπιμαρτυρίαν τῆν ἡσυχίαν, παρὰ τὴν ἀνθρώπων καὶ λέοντας κ. τ. λ. i. e. "Perhaps some may inquire, why God punished Egypt with so small and despicable animals, passing by bears and lions? The answer is, 1. That God designed to correct the inhabitants of that place, rather than quite destroy them; for if he had intended the latter, he never would have made use of such small and seemingly insignificant creatures as his instruments, but rather famine, or the pestilence, which are scourges from heaven, and carry a sweeping desolation along with them. 2. The different manner of God's procedure from that of his creatures is hence discernible; for when men go to war to revenge an injury, they form the strongest alliances, and such as are able to assist them with the most powerful succours, and to strengthen their weakness most effectually: but God, who is the supreme power, and all-sufficient for his own great purposes, if at any time he makes use of instruments of vengeance, does not choose the greatest, or the strongest, being indifferent as to the natural powers of the creatures; but he gives to small, and otherwise feeble things, a superior and uncontrollable force, and by them more surprisingly punishes the wicked. For what is more despicable than lice? And yet such was their avenging power, as to subdue the Egyptians, and even extort a confession from the magicians themselves, that this was the finger of God" (Philo de Mose, vol. ii. edit. Mangey).

Ver. 18. Or unknown wild beasts, full of rage, newly created.] This may either mean beasts of an uncommon kind, and of a fierceness hitherto unobserved, or beasts that have unusual venom, or in a greater degree; for so δυσὸς is often used (see xvi. 5); and thus Calmet understands it, des bêtes d'une espèce inconnue, pleine d'une fureur toute extraordinaire, ou d'un venin nouveau (Com. in loc.). The Vulgate renders, novi generis irā plenas ignotas bestias, which may take in any or all the foregoing senses.

Breathing out either a fiery vapour, or filthy scents of scattered smoke, or shooting horrible sparks out of their eyes.] Our version follows a copy which read βρόμους, "filthy scents;" but Calmet thinks βρόμους, which other copies retain, the true reading, and understands it of smoke, flung out with great force and much noise, like that which is thrown out from mount Vesuvius, or that which the poets have feigned to issue from some fabulous animals, who are described by them as throwing fire with a roaring noise out of their mouth and nostrils: but should not the reading then be ἢ βρόμους λυκωμένους καπνόν, or "with a mighty noise puffing out smoke?" The description here of imaginary beasts formed for destruction, which is very poetical, is not unlike that fine one of the leviathan in the book of Job, with this difference only,—that those circumstances of terror which are here given to this or that particular species of beasts, are all united in him "who can open the doors of his face, his teeth are terrible round about, by his neesings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eye-lids of the morning: out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out: out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething caldron: his breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth: in his neck lodgeth strength, and sorrow is turned into joy before him." Where the rendering of the LXX. is observable, and conveys a more lively idea of terror, ἐμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ προτρέχει ἀπὸ δάκρυα, i. e. "before him marches destruction. Behold, the hope of him is in vain; shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him?" (xli. 9. 18—22.) Ovid's description, which has been much admired, comes far short of the inspired writer in the sublimity of the sentiments:—

"Ecce adamanteis vulcanum naribus efflant
Æripedes tauri, tactaque vaporibus herbe
Ardent" ————— (Metam. lib. vii.)

Ver. 20. Yea, and without these might they have sent down with one blast, being persecuted of vengeance, and scattered abroad through the breath of thy power:] ἀνεπιθύντες ὑπὸ πνεύματος διωγμῶς σου. i. e. "By one pestilential blast of air," as it is generally understood; or it may be rendered in a higher sense, "by the spirit of thy power," or "the powerful πνεῦμα, the Spirit of the Almighty" (see note on v. 23). The sentiment, according to the common acceptance, is very grand and magnificent, that God could have created beasts on purpose for vengeance, whose very looks, even without their violence or poison, should have scattered death; and with more ease could he have destroyed the Egyptians by a look, a word, a blast. And thus he destroyed the formidable army of the Assyrians: for when all things seemed desperate, and the enemies of Jerusalem thought themselves just masters of it, God sends his blast and instantly "a hundred fourscore and five thousand became dead corpses" (Isa. xxxvii. 7. 36). The psalmist has finely expressed this, by "the blasting of the breath of God's displeasure" (Ps. xviii. 15); which includes at once what our author has expressed in both these sentences. Job, whom this writer seems often to imitate, expresses himself concerning the desolation of the wicked in like manner: "They that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, by the blast of God perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed" (iv. 8, 9). By any of these means the Egyptians have perished, "being persecuted of vengeance," and pursued by it, which the Vulgate understands, "of the stings of their own consciences," persecutionem passi ab ipsis factus suis; and so Coverdale renders, "being persecuted of their own works." But though God can use all or any of these extraordinary instruments of vengeance, yet his known and ordinary way of dealing is to follow the impartial rules of justice, and to proportion his punishments to the nature and quality of men's crimes.

But thou hast ordered all things in measure, and number, and weight.] This aphorism is very just, when applied to the beauty and harmony of God's natural works; but the context necessarily confines it to the government of the moral world, viz. that God's wrath, in his dealings with the children of men, is neither rash nor hasty, inconsiderate nor excessive, fickle nor inconstant, groundless nor unjust, as that of his creatures too generally is; but he exercises his justice with the strictest impartiality, "in measure, number, and weight;" i. e. he considers the nature of the offence, and the heinousness of its aggravations, and proportions the duration and extent of his vengeance accordingly. And as he acts not through passion, resentment, or hatred, his chastisements are always just, suited to the greatness of men's faults, and the demerit of sinners. It was not therefore without good reason that the heathens have painted Jupiter with a pair of scales, in which he weighs and determines men's respective destinies:

"Jupiter ipse duas æquato examine lances Sustinet, et fata imponit diversa duorum;" &c. (Æn. xii.)

Ver. 22. For the whole world before thee is as a little grain of the balance,] As God's justice weighs all actions in an equal balance, so, with respect to his power, the whole world may be considered as the most minute and inconsiderable thing in it. The prophet Isaiah has the very same comparison upon the like occasion, which the LXX. express almost in the same manner, ὡς ἰσὴν ζυγού (xl. 15), and it might as well have been expressed by the "dust of the balance" here, as our version has it in that place. For as the "nothingness of the world," if I may be allowed the expression, is placed here in a contrast with God's infinite power, the most inconsiderable, the most imperceptible atom is more proper to be mentioned, than a little grain, or any, even the least sensible weight, as the margin has it.

Ver. 23. But thou hast mercy upon all; for thou canst do all things, and winkest at the sins of men, because they should amend] Ἐλεεῖς δὲ πάντα; ὅτι πάντα ὀνείραται. "Ori should not be translated for but because; the meaning being here, that almighty power is the cause or foundation of his unbounded clemency, as mercy is always the generous attendant upon real greatness. That this is the true sense, is plain from ver. 26, and xii. 16. This mercy God offers to all, and suspends for a time the execution of his vengeance, to give them time and room for repentance; and when they do repent, for so Calmet farther understands these words, as a tender father, whose arms are always open to receive the penitent and returning prodigal, he is ready to pardon all that truly turn to him. It is a pious reflection of Messieurs du Port-Royal, "Happy are those who rightly understand the infinite goodness of God, and improve the consideration of it to their great advantage; for they who know it only so far as to abuse it, and lose sight of his justice, in the pleasing contemplation of his mercy, and thereby make it the occasion of sin, have great reason to fear, that his patience and forbearance, so often disregarded by them, will at length turn into rigour and severity, according to the account of the true Solomon, Prov. i. 26, 27, &c."

Ver. 24. For never wouldest thou have made any thing, if thou hadst hated it.] God did not make the world, or any thing in it, for the mere exercise of his power, much less for the sport of his tyranny; but his goodness was the cause of the production of all things. God is an all-sufficient being, perfectly blessed in himself, nor was his essential felicity capable of any accession from the existence of any creature; it was therefore his free goodness only that moved him to create all things, that he might impart happiness to all his creatures. That notion therefore is certainly not only groundless, but cruel, which represents God from all eternity decreeing some men to endless and unspeakable torments, whom, according to this opinion, he must create with a formed design of making them unhappy, and falling, without any demerit, a sacrifice to his justice. This gloomy tenet of the supralapsarians, as it is called, is inconsistent with scripture, which represents God not only loving all his creatures, but emphatically as love itself. How much juster, and more worthy of the great Creator, is that sentiment of Pherecydes, εἰς ἔρωτα μεταβλήσθαι τὸν διὰ μέλλοντα δημιουργεῖν, i. e. "God transformed himself into love when he made the world!"

Ver. 25. How could any thing have endured, if it had not been thy will?] The same tender affection which at first inclined God to create things as they are, and to communicate his extensive goodness to the several orders of beings, moves him to preserve the things made by him, and to continue them in their original condition. For there is nothing which God has created, that is either so distant, so little, or so inconsiderable, which God does not inspect and take care of, and, to speak in the language of a polite writer, which he does not essentially inhabit. And if the great Maker of all things should not be thus graciously disposed towards his creatures, if he should withdraw his overruling providence, there would not only be the greatest confusion, but an end of universal nature. Seneca assigns the true reason of the world's continuance, manent cuncta, non quia æterna sunt, sed quia defenduntur curâ regentis (Epist. 58): and the psalmist the cause of its decay, "When thou hidest thy face they are troubled, when thou takest away their breath they die, and are turned again to their dust" (Ps. civ. 29).

Or been preserved if not called by thee?] i. e. How could any thing have continued, if thou didst not order it to continue? And thus the Syriac version understands it, Quomodo conservaretur aliquid, nisi tu præciperes? And Calmet, Qui se pût conserver sans votre ordre (Com. in loc.). To call, when applied to God, is the same as to create, ordain, command. And thus St. Paul uses the expression (Rom. iv. 17), "God, who quickeneth the dead, calleth those things which be not, as though they were;" i. e. he equally commands the dead and the living. And the psalmist (cxlvi. 4), he "calleth them all by their names;" i. e. he commands them into his presence.

Ver. 26. Thou sparest all: for they are thine, O Lord, thou lover of souls.] φιλόψυχος, or "lover of souls," is the highest character that can be given of God. To call him φιλεβραῖος or φιλέλλην, "a lover of Jews or Greeks," is in comparison a low and scanty denomination, as it expresses his care for only a part of the species (see Barrow's Works, tom. ii. p. 203). Nay, even φιλιππύροπος itself, which is the most complex term, and takes in the genus of mankind, is not so amiable and perfect as φιλόψυχος, which includes his love and tenderness for the more valuable part of our nature. It is pretty observable, that God is no where in scripture called φιλάγγελος, though even this character, if it was predicated of God, would not, with respect to us at least, be so adorable. But as God is said here to spare all, and to be a "lover of souls," without distinction, perhaps our author may allude to that command of God to Moses, Exod. xxx. 12—15, that when they took the sum or number of the people, every man so numbered, from twenty years old and upwards, should pay half a shekel to the sanctuary, as a ransom for his soul to God, under the penalty of a plague to ensue the neglect of such a payment; which was a most easy and favourable capitulation, inasmuch as, when their lives were the forfeit of their sins to God, God in mercy thus accepted a small ransom for them; and he accepted an equal ransom for the lives of the lowest as well as the highest among them, as they were all of equal value in his sight, who careth for all alike.

CHAP. XII.

ARGUMENT.—The author mentions fresh instances of favour bestowed by God upon the Israelites, particularly in bringing them to, and settling them in, the land of Canaan, from whence he drove out the old inhabitants for their barbarous and inhuman rites of sacrificing their children, and feasting upon blood, &c. by which the holy land was defiled. But unworthy as the Canaanites were of mercy, God did not exterminate them at once, but his conduct towards them was very gracious. And from God's slowness to take vengeance even on these, he proceeds (ver. 19) to deduce this useful and comfortable lesson, viz. that the intention of God's forbearance is to invite sinners to repentance, who are from hence encouraged to hope, that they shall be accepted through the sincerity of it; but such as slight his gentle corrections, and disregard his kind notices, shall at length experience a judgment worthy of God.

Ver. 1. For thine incorruptible Spirit is in all things.] This verse seems necessarily connected with the last of the foregoing chapter, though in all the editions it is separate and distinct from it. It contains the reason why God is φιλάνθρωπος, or, "a lover of souls," viz. because his Spirit dwelleth with or in every man, τετινυ ἐν πάντι even with the wicked, till they, through their own fault, force it to depart (see note on i. 5). This is manifestly the sense of the Syriac translation, which is more explicit than the rest of the versions, beginning this chapter, Anator es animarum quia Spiritus tuus bonus habitat in omnibus. And this it does without any prejudice to its own perfection, for the Spirit contracts no defilement by its inhabitation for a time in a wicked breast; its purity, like that of the sun, remains unsullied, though it shines upon filth and dirt. The Vulgate is particular in reading this place with an epiphonema, or note of admiration, at the goodness of God, O quam bonus et suavis est, Domine, Spiritus tuus in omnibus! "O how benign and full of sweetness is thy Spirit, O Lord, towards all men," or in all its proceedings! which pious reflection may refer either to God's dealing with the Egyptians in the former chapter, or with the Canaanites mentioned in this, or respect his forbearance towards sinners in general. Grotius understands by Spirit here, the soul of man, that it is incorruptible and immortal, and an image of the divine eternity, and refers to i. 23, which is not so agreeable to the sense of the context.

Ver. 2. Therefore chastenest thou them by little and little that offend.] God does not proceed with haste and eagerness to punish his enemies, as if he was jealous or afraid that they would escape from him, nor does he pour on them all his wrath at once, or on a sudden, as if he could not command his temper or resentment: he punishes not usually with such excess and rigour, as if he purposely sought the destruction and utter extinction of his enemies, but, aiming at the amendment, welfare, and happiness, of those he corrects, he chastises rather as a master, a father, a God. St. Ambrose finely observes, "that what is here mentioned of God's lenity in punishing by little and little, is an excellent maxim for the conduct of life, for that we ought equally to avoid the two contrary extremes, and to observe a medium between a faulty complaisance, or tenderness, that pardons every thing, and a rigid severity, that excuses nothing, which makes no favourable allowance for human frailty, and is not at all softened by any mitigating and alleviating circumstances."

Ver. 3. For it was thy will to destroy by the hands of our fathers both those old inhabitants of thy holy land.] The Israelites were raised by God on purpose to be a scourge upon every shocking vice and flagrant villany of the nations around them. This people, eminently distinguished by the divine favour and protection, God made choice of to chastise the enormities of the Canaanites, Amorites, &c. who were every way profligate and utterly abandoned, as appears by the context, to drive them out of the holy land by their hands, and to retort in a particular manner their cruelties upon their own heads. As God had purposed utterly to destroy the nations of Canaan, so he did not dispose any of them to accept of peace from the Israelites, in order to their preservation; "it was of the Lord (as the sacred text expresses it) to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour, but be destroyed as the Lord commanded," Josh. xi. 20, where the exaggeration of the expression is very observable, and is intended to denote the certainty and violence of their destruction (see also Deut. vii. 1, 2).

Thy holy land.] The Almighty at first represented himself to the Jews as a gentilitical God—the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; afterward, as a local Deity, who had preferred Judea to all other countries, and chosen it for his peculiar residence, on which account it is generally characterized in the sacred writings by the name of his land (Lev. xxv. 23. Deut. xi. 12. Ps. x. 16. Isa. xiv. 25), and here by this writer more fully, "his holy land." It was called "the holy land," ἁγία γῆ, either because it was promised to the patriarchs, and was the habitation of them and the prophets; or because God's chosen people dwelt there; or, lastly, because the true worship of God, under the Old Testament, chiefly flourished there. Upon account of the single temperature of the air, the wholesomeness of the climate, the fruitfulness of the soil, and the very great plenty of all kinds of things, it is said in scripture to flow with milk and honey, and Ezek. xx. 6, to be the glory of all lands, and frequently, upon account of the great blessings with which it abounded, it is made a type of heaven, from thence called the heavenly Canaan. No wonder therefore that God should promise this good land to Abraham and his seed for an inheritance, and that he should at length give it to the most worthy colony of his children. See ver. 7, and Adrichomius' Pref. to Theatr. Terræ Sanctæ, where he says, that it was anciently called the land of promise, and by the writers of the Old Testament, and Josephus, the land of Canaan, from Canaan the son of Ham, who lived there with his children. By Ptolemy, and the ancient geographers, it is styled Palestine, but the most common name is, "the holy land;" and yet this does not occur in scripture, nor any where in the apocryphal writings, but here and 2 Macc. i. 7.

Ver. 4. Whom thou hatedst for doing most odious works of witchcrafts.] Canaan, from whom the Canaanites were descended, was the son of Ham or Cham, and from him the learned derive the original of witchcraft and sorcery: he is thought by some to be the same with Zoroastres, the inventor of magic. Cassian acquaints us from a very ancient tradition, that Ham, before he entered into the ark with his father Noah, engraved upon stones and plates of metals, which the waters of the deluge could not spoil, his art of magic and sorcery, that it might more effectually be preserved, which memorial he found when the deluge was over; and, communicating them to his children, propagated that art and wicked superstition among his posterity (Cassian. Collat. viii. cap. 21). He adds also, that, besides the elements, the inhabitants of Canaan worshipped a multitude of devils that presided over their τελεῖς ἀνομίους, or "wicked rites."

Ver. 5. And also those merciless murderers of children.] What is mentioned in this and the following verse about the inhuman murder of children, most undoubtedly relates to the sacrificing of them to Moloch. Thus Selden, whose authority is beyond all commentators, speaking of the rites of Moloch, De Diis Syris, Sentag. i. cap. 6, says, Hæc sunt sacra, quæ Sapientia voluminis auctor vocat τεκνοθύτους τελεῖς (cap. 14. com. 23. et cap. 12. com. 5, 6). The sacrifices that were offered to Moloch were of seven sorts, six of them were the same as some of the Jewish sacrifices instituted by Moses; the seventh was the sacrifice of a son; and he that sacrificed this kissed the idol, which had the face of a calf, and to this the prophet Hosea is thought to allude, xiii. 2. The manner of offering the children to Moloch was this: the image was heated by fire put under it, till it was red hot, and shone again, and then the priests took the victim or child, and placed it in the burning arms of Moloch, which were extended on purpose; and that the parent or relations might not hear the shrieks of the child, they danced before the image to the sound of drums, from whence the place was called Tophet (see Fagius in Lev. xviii. 21. Selden De Diis Syris, Syntag. i. cap. 6. and note on xiv. 23). That parents did sacrifice their own children, is evident from many instances even among the Greeks and Romans; and innumerable testimonies might be produced of it from profane writers, whether founded upon the mistaken instance of Abraham's offering up his son Isaac, I shall not determine (see Philo De Abrah. Macrob. Saturn. Ovid. Fast. Sharrock de ἀνθρωποθυσία, p. 496, 7). And that the worshippers of Moloch, among whom may be reckoned the Canaanites and Phœnicians, whom Grotius supposes to be the same (in Deut. xviii.), Amorites, Moabites, Carthaginians, Cretans, Ammonites, Syrians, too many and sad instances of human degeneracy! did consent to have their children sacrificed to this monster of cruelty in particular, appears from many passages of scripture (Lev. xviii. 21. 2 Kings iii. 27. xxiii. 10. Jer. vii. 31. xix. 4, 5). To instance in the Syrians only, we read expressly (2 Kings xvii. 31), that the Sepharvites burnt their children in honour of Adrammelech and Anammelech, which are said to be the gods of Sepharvaim, but, in reality, were no other than different names for Moloch, as the learned agree (see Selden in loc. citat.). And the psalmist observes (Ps. cvi. 35), that the Israelites, being mingled with these heathen, learned their works, inasmuch that they likewise "offered their sons and their daughters unto devils, and shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and their daughters, whom they offered unto the idols of Canaan, and the land was defiled with blood:" ἐν τοῖς αἵματι, LXX. in sanguinibus, Vulg. both in the plural number, to express the great effusion of it. Plutarch, Περὶ ἀσέβειας, mentions what is still more shocking, that the parents even stood by when their children were offered upon such execrable occasions. But, that the parents themselves should be the very executioners, should kill with their own hands their own issue, innocent, harmless souls, destitute to be sure of help when their own parents were their betrayers and murderers, which our author mentions in the following verse, exceeds all instances of cruelty, as it does indeed almost all bounds of faith.

And devourers of man's flesh, and the feasts of blood,] Though one may easily guess at the author's meaning, yet this passage is very perplexed in the original; and, amidst the multitude of various readings, it is difficult to find the true one. The Roman edition reads, παραχρησάμενοι ἀνθρώπων σαρκὶν θοῖαν, καὶ αἷματος. The Complutensian, παραχρησάμενοι ἀνθρώπων σαρκὶν, καὶ θοῖαν αἷματος. Ald. edit. with Vatablus, θοῖαν αἷματος ἐκ μυσθῶν. Our version manifestly follows the second reading, which seems countenanced by all the versions, which render in like manner. If we may suppose μυσθῶν to be here understood, or to be brought forward from the preceding verse, it will, perhaps, help the difficulty, and give some light and clearness to this intricate passage; i. e. "Thou hatedst both those old inhabitants of thy holy land, as being guilty of witchcrafts and abominable rites, and also the eaters of the bowels of men," comestores viscerum hominum, as the Vulgate has it, or "the devourers of human flesh, and their feasts of blood," &c. for so ἀνθρώπων σαρκὶν, I think, may be better rendered, as including the flesh of children, rather than man's flesh, as our author has it; for it seems to be this author's opinion, that they did eat the flesh of the children that were sacrificed; and from thence they may be here called παραχρησάμενοι. Calmet differs from this writer and says, "That though there are too many instances of their sacrificing both men and children to Saturn, or Baal (which are names likewise of Moloch), yet it is not sufficiently clear, either from scripture or profane history, that they ate the entrails of the unhappy victims" (Comment in loc.). We meet with παραχρησμός, indeed, 2 Macc. vi. 7, and παράνομος παραχρησμός, ver. 21, in the description of the feast of Baccus. But the entrails of beasts seem there only meant.

Feasts of blood,] The eating of blood was practised among the heathens in their sacrifices, treaties, feasts, magical rites, and as a ceremony of initiation into their mysteries, and the worship of their demons. This the psalmist alludes to, Psalm xvi. 5, which Aquila translates σπονδὰς αὐτῶν ἐξ αἱμάτων and in this sense Spencer understands the place (De Leg. Hebræor. vol. i. p. 30), Maimonides observes of the heathens, that though they looked upon the eating of blood as an instance of impurity and uncleanness, yet it was practised by them, through a fond conceit that it was the food of their demons, and that, by eating of it, they should ingratiate and recommend themselves to them, and have a freer communication with them, and larger discoveries of future events made to them. Lucian's account, in his tract De Sacrificiis, of the revels of the demons at their feasts of blood, however witty or pleasant it may have been represented, yet, instead of inspiring us with any agreeable sentiments, cannot but appear shocking to all who have any bowels left, and are not themselves divested of the tenderness of human nature, which, far from being entertained with such unnatural repast, startles and shudders, as it were by sympathy, at the sad relation.

Ver. 6. With their priests out of the midst of their idolatrous crew (leg. crew).] There are, I think, as many readings of this place of the original, as there are editions, which have either no sense at all, or a meaning widely different. The Vatican edition reads ἐκ μέσου μυσθῶν θείων, which seems a manifest corruption; for what does μυσθῶν θείων mean, or in what other author does it occur? The Complut. ἐκ μέσου μυσθῶν θείων, which is no less unintelligible.

The Vulgate, rendering a medio sacramento tuo, seems to have followed a copy which read μυσθῶν σου. But this reading of the passage is absurd; for how can the Canaanites, which knew not the true God, be said to feast upon blood in the midst of his mysteries, or indeed to act contrary to them, which they knew nothing of? Vatablus reads, μυσθῶν θείων σου, and Grotius more fully, ἐκ μυσθῶν μυσθῶν θείων σου. The Alexandrian MS. has, ἐκ μέσου μυσθῶν θείων σου, joining the two words θείων; σου in the second reading together, which seems in good measure to remove the difficulty; but I think the whole would be more correct and better connected, if the reading was, ἐκ μέσου μυσθῶν τε θείων, which Ald. edit. retains; i. e. "And also those priests of Moloch whom thou principally hatedst, and directedst thy vengeance against, and didst determine ἐκ μέσου ἀπολέσαι, to take out of the way;" or rather (because ἐκ μέσου may be thought at too great a distance from its adjunct ἀπολέσαι), "Thou wast determined to destroy those priests particularly amidst all the crew of idolaters," which is the sense of our version, ἐκ μέσου θείων, ex medio Tripudiantium choro vel ceta; for so θείων is understood by the lexicographers; and next to these the inhuman parents, who either themselves killed their own children, or gave them willingly to be sacrificed. Priests may relate indifferently either to those of Moloch, or those of the old inhabitants of the holy land; but αἱθέρων γονεῖς relate only to the worshippers of Moloch. The version then of this and the three foregoing verses (plainer in construction, and more agreeable to the Greek, without the transposition that is made in our translation) lies thus: "For thou, hating both those old inhabitants of thy holy land for their odious works of witchcrafts, &c. and also (hating) those merciless murderers of children, and devourers of human flesh, and their feasts of blood, didst determine to destroy, by the hands of our fathers, the priests from amidst their idolatrous congregations, and the parents that were guilty of destroying helpless souls, viz. their children." If it be asked, why any distinction is made between the old inhabitants dealing in witchcrafts, and the worshippers of Moloch, which our version retains, the reason probably is, because Moloch was an idol originally of the Ammonites, and the rites of sacrificing children were likewise Ammonitish, and came only by degrees into Canaan (see Selden De Diis Syris, Syntag. i. cap. 6). Or if it should be farther inquired, How did God destroy the worshippers of Moloch, "that his holy land might receive a worthy colony of children?" I answer, in the vengeance taken on account of Baal-peor, when all the Midianites were utterly destroyed, the priests ἐκ μέσου θείων, from Balaam down to the meanest, and also all the women (Numb. xxxi.), which must include αἱθέρων γονεῖς. In confirmation of this opinion, see Lightfoot, vol. i. p. 783, who understands the matter of Baal-peor, to be the sacrificing of their children to Moloch; answerable to which he interprets Ps. cvi. 28, "They ate the sacrifices of the dead." And this being the first idolatry they fell into after their coming out of the wilderness, and just before their getting possession of the holy land, he tells us, that St. Stephen upbraided them with it in the words of the prophet, that after their neglects of sacrificing to God forty years in the wilderness, they yet could presently take up "the tabernacle of Moloch." In confirmation of this opinion, see Selden, also, De Diis Syris, who says, that all the Baals (however distinguished) of Syria, of which Baal-peor is the first mentioned, were only other names for Moloch (see also Jer. xix. 5). And to confirm what Lightfoot and Selden say, we may add the authority of J. Jer. Vossius, who contends learnedly for the same opinion about Moloch and Baal (Theol. Gentil. vol. vi. p. 123, 124, 720. edit. fol.). Thus we have a ready solution of the history to which this passage refers, and thus may it be interpreted consistently with little or no alteration in the Greek. To what I before mentioned about the manner of these unnatural and inhuman sacrifices (see note on ver. 5), we may add, that at first they made the children only to pass between two great fires lighted before Moloch, as a sort of imaginary purification; but afterward, confounding the worship of this idol with that paid to Saturn, the worship of Moloch became equally barbarous and bloody. Such as thought they had too many children, burnt them in honour of him, and consecrated them to their tutelary god, for the greater good of the family, as they supposed; and often, on important occasions, and in times of imminent danger, it was the eldest, the most beloved child, whom they devoted to Moloch. This abominable practice lasted long among the Canaanites in a place anciently called Gehenna, or the valley of Hinnom; it was also called Tophet, for the reason given above.

Ver. 8. Nevertheless, even those thou sparedst as men, and didst send wasps, fore-runners of thine host, to destroy, them by little and little.] The meaning is not that God absolutely spared them; for this is not consistent either with the context or sacred history; the sense must be, that to these as men, and his creatures, though the greatest sinners, God showed some marks of tenderness, and did not treat them with all that rigour which they deserved. The psalmist has thought which very much resembles this, Ps. lxxviii. 39, 40, "Many a time turned he his wrath away, and would not suffer his whole displeasure to arise; for he considered that they were but flesh, and that they were even a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again." By "wasps, forerunners of God's host," we may understand, either that God, before the Israelites came into those parts, sent hornets, a sort of wasps of all others the most deadly and pernicious, which so infested the Canaanites, that many of them were forced to leave their country, or, that when the Israelites came to give them battle, these hornets made such assaults upon them, as facilitated the victory. Some rabbins say they flew in the eyes of the Canaanites, and made them so blind that they could not see to fight; and such as fled away they pursued, and killed in their lurking-holes. Joshua confirms the sending of these hornets, xiv. 12, which God had before threatened to send, Deut. vii. 20, and says in general, (for we have no where in scripture any more particular account of them), that the Amorites were not driven out by the sword and bow of the Israelites, but by the stings of these venomous creatures. Philo says of the Canaanites, that they were unworthy, many of them, to be conquered by men, ἐνίοις τῶν ἐθρῶν ἀνάτοις; and therefore God sent troops of hornets to fight for his holy ones, and to destroy them by a most shameful overthrow (De Præmiis et Pœnis). To show the probability of this, Bochart instances in whole people who have been forced by them to forsake their country (Hieroziæ. lib. iv. p. 2). Herodotus, Appian, Strabo, and Calmet, confirm the same. Many writers, it must be confessed, have understood the wasps or hornets mentioned here, and in the books of Moses and Joshua, metaphorically; St. Austin in particular supposes their fear to have had the same effect upon them as being pursued by hornets. But, 1. The literal sense, which our author favours, is maintained by Theodoret, Procopius, and Bochart, vol. iii. p. 533, 2. The fear which God threatened to send upon the enemies of his people, is mentioned as distinct from these hornets, Exod. xxiii. 27, 28. And, lastly, the scripture speaks of them as real animals, Deut. vii. 20. Josh. xiv. 13.

Ver. 9. Not that thou wast unable—to destroy them at once with cruel beasts, or with one rough word : Of God's extraordinary manner of punishing by wild beasts, there are very many examples in holy scripture. As, the Samaritans, that were slain by them because they feared not the Lord (2 Kings xvii. 25, 26); the children that mocked the prophet Elisha (2 Kings ii. 23, 24); the disobedient prophet (1 Kings xiii. 24). This was agreeable to what God threatened the wicked, Lev. xxvi. 22, "that he would send wild beasts among them to rob them of their children, and destroy their cattle, to make them few in number, and their high ways desolate" (see also Isa. xv. 9. Jer. v. 6. vii. 17. xv. 3. Ezek. xiv. 15, 21). The instance which is next mentioned by this writer, viz. that God can destroy guilty nations by one harsh word, finely displays his power. David, in his book of Psalms, seems to have had the same thought, that one word from the mouth of God was sufficient to blast and confound his enemies. See particularly, Ps. lxxxiii. 1, which some learned men have understood in this sense. Or if by a metaphor we explain this of thunder, which is often God's voice of vengeance (see Ps. xviii. 13, 14. xlv. 6), the thought strikes us more forcibly. But if we suppose this to be meant of the Word of the Lord, or the Λόγος, personally, as Calmet seems to take it (Com. in loc.), enraged and exasperated at the proceedings of the wicked, and executing the Almighty's orders upon them, as he is represented xviii. 15, 16, and often under the Old Testament, the idea rises still higher, is more magnificent and terrible.

Ver. 10. But executing thy judgments upon them by little and little. Though the history of the wars against the Canaanites be briefly summed up in scripture, yet they lasted a long time (Josh. xi. 18); seven years, according to the opinion of many learned men: and such a length of time God was pleased the war should continue, partly in respect to the old inhabitants themselves, who, being chastened by little and little, had place of repentance given them, and also to exercise the faith and patience of his own people, and that the difficulty of the conquest might make them the more sensible of God's power and goodness. To these may be added the following reasons, which are to be met with in scripture: first, God did not drive out these nations hastily by the victorious hand of Joshua, that he might thereby prove Israel, whether they would keep the way of the Lord, to walk therein; for if none of them had been left, there would have been no temptation to worship their gods (Judg. ii. 22, 23). Another reason for driving out these nations by little and little was, lest the land should become desolate and uncultivated Exod. xxiii. 29; for the Israelites were not yet numerous enough to people the whole country, had these nations been destroyed all at once. And a third reason occurs in the same verse, that a great part being thus left without inhabitants, it would be possessed and overrun by wild beasts, which would have been very dangerous to the Israelites in the other neighbouring parts where they were settled.

Not being ignorant that they were a naughty generation, and that their malice was bred in them, and their cogitation would never be changed. The expression here is not unlike that mentioned Gen. vi. 5, "God saw that every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart was only evil continually," and his dealing was in like manner; for though he saw them unalterably bent upon wickedness, yet he allowed the men of the old world time for repentance, and the prevention of their ruin. And thus God knew that Pharaoh would not let his people go, and that his mind would not be altered (Exod. iii. 19), and yet he tries him by different methods, he executes his judgments upon him by little and little, and gives all possible warnings to reclaim him. He foretells the plagues, before he sends them, to admonish him; he performs signs and wonders before him, to soften him; he inflicts worse and worse judgments upon him to frighten him, but all without effect; for it appears that Pharaoh six times hardened his own heart, before God hardened it once. But it may be asked to what purpose God gave the Canaanites place for repentance, and visited them with admonitory chastisements, if he knew that their cogitations, or wicked intentions, would never be altered? To this I answer, that though God certainly foreknew that they would not make a right use of his forbearance, yet his prescience no way determined their acting; still they were at liberty to have changed their cogitations or designs, and to have altered their vicious course of life; for there is a great difference between God's foreknowledge and his decrees; a distinction never to be forgotten. God always knows when men are wickedly disposed, and their sinful habits become, as it were, natural to them; but he does not therefore decree their sinning, nor take away all possibility of their conversion, nor does he unconditionally predetermine their punishment; for then all motives to repentance would indeed be useless and ineffectual, and their doom irreversible: his knowing therefore that the Canaanites would never change their sinful inclinations, no more inferred any necessity of their sinning, than God's knowing that Adam would fall, was the occasion of his fall. Nor were all the seed of Cham any more necessarily vessels of wrath, because of their innate and natural propensity to evil, than all the seed of Abraham were necessarily vessels of mercy (see Jackson's Works, tom. iii. cap. 41).

Ver. 11. For it was a cursed seed from the beginning : It has been generally supposed that Cham, or Ham, was the person whom Noah cursed for discovering his nakedness; but there are stronger and better reasons to induce us to think that Canaan was cursed rather than Ham. 1. It has been a received tradition, that Canaan first saw his grandfather's nakedness, and made sport with it to his father. 2. Several expressions in scripture seem to fix this upon Canaan; when Noah awoke, it is said "he knew what his younger son had done unto him" (Gen. ix. 24), which could not be true of Ham, who was the middlemost; but Canaan may very well be called his younger or little son, nothing being more common than to call grandchildren sons; and Canaan was indeed the youngest of them. 3. The most correct editions of the LXX. agree in pointing out Canaan particularly; for they read ἐνικατέπαρος Χαναάν τῶν υἱῶν; which reading both St. Austin and St. Chrysostom follow. And indeed this particularity seems purposely inserted to prevent any mistake with respect to his father. 4. That if Canaan himself is not meant, then by Canaan we must understand his father Ham, which is a forced interpretation. 5. This is probably the reason why Ham is always mentioned as the father of Canaan, as he resembled his father most, and was concerned with him in the same wicked crime. Lastly, If Ham was cursed, it would have affected his other children and their posterity; but it is observable, that the curse affects Canaan only.

Neither didst thou for fear of any man give them pardon for those things wherein they sinned.] The meaning is not, that God really pardoned them, as our version seems to imply, for the Canaanites are mentioned all along as devoted to destruction; but God deferred their punishment, indulged them in a seeming security, and gave them ἀμειν i. e. impunity for a time, which was rather a respite than a pardon. And thus the Syriac and Arabic interpreters understand it, rendering the Greek word very justly by prolatio. Calmet observes very beautifully, "That God, whether he punishes or pardons, has no selfish or partial views, is not influenced by any motives of hatred, fear, or interest, which men are generally actuated by: he loves without excess, is jealous without uneasiness, repents without grief, is angry without disturbance, and punishes without resentment" (Com. in. loc.). Herein he has happily transcribed St. Austin: Amas, nec æstuas; zelas, et securus es; pœnitet te, et non doles; irasceris, et tranquillus es (Confess. lib. i. cap. 4).

Ver. 12. Or who shall accuse thee for the nations that perish, whom thou hast made? [Τὶς δὲ ἐγκαλέσει σοὶ κατὰ ἔθνη ἀπολωθόντων, ἃ σὺ ἐποίησας. Our version probably is faulty here; the true rendering seems to be, "Who shall object to thee, or call thee to account for, the things which thou hast done to, or against, the nations which are destroyed?" This is the sense of ποιεῖν in the beginning of this verse, and in very many passages of scripture. The Greek would be better pointed thus, τίς δὲ ἐγκαλέσει σοὶ, κατὰ ἔθνη ἀπολωθόντων ἃ σὺ ἐποίησας.

Or who shall come, to stand against thee, to be revenged for the unrighteous men? [Ἢ τίς τίς καθίστασθαι σοὶ ἐκδίκαι ἐκδικῶν κατὰ δίκων ἀνθρώπων. Our translators seem to understand καθίστασθαι in a military sense, "Who will come to a set, or pitched battle with thee, to avenge the cause of the wicked?" Καθίστασθαι, sometimes is so used in good writers. But there is likewise another sense of this place: "Who will appear before thee, to undertake the defence and vindication of the unrighteous?" for ἐκδικῶν signifies "an advocate" as well as "an avenger." And thus Messieurs du Port-Royal render, Qui paroitra devant vous pour prendre la defense des hommes injustes. And so the Arabic version, Quis se constituit apud te ad intercessionem auxiliorum pro hominibus iniquis. But in either sense ἐκδικῶν κατὰ δίκων ἀνθρώπων, as the present reading of the Greek is, seems not right. If we join κατὰ and δίκων together, which seem to have been separated through the fault of the transcribers, and make it καταδίκων, i. e. judicio damnatorum, the harshness of the construction will be avoided, and a sense rather more agreeable to the context will take place: "Who shall dare to stand against thee in battle to revenge, or who shall appear before thee to undertake the cause of those thou hast condemned to death?" There is the like expostulation in the book of Job (xxxvi. 22, 23), according to the LXX. version, which comprises the sentiments in this and the following verse: τίς γάρ ἰστί κατ' αὐτὸν δυνάστης; τίς δὲ ἐν αὐτῷ ἐτάξων αὐτοῦ τὰ ἔργα; ἢ τίς δὲ εἰπὼν, Ἐπράεν ἄδικα.

Ver. 14. Neither shall king or tyrant be able to set his face against thee. [The Vulgate, which renders, "Neque rex neque tyrannus in conspectu tuo inquit de his quos perdidisti," and the ancient English versions, fall short of the spirit of the original; the word ἀντιπατάσθαι is remarkably strong and elegant; it is a vigorous compound word, which singly contains all the particulars before enumerated (ver. 12); nor is our translation less to be admired for preserving the beauty and boldness of the expression here, which Junius renders but imperfectly by oculum obfirmare, and the Arabic still more faintly, oculos atollere; both of which, by being too literal, express not sufficiently the force and spirit of the metaphor (see Blackwall's Sac. Class. vol. i. p. 10).

Ver. 15. Thinking it not agreeable with thy power to condemn him that hath not deserved to be punished. [Ἢ ἔδικας, in the beginning of this verse, be taken to signify strictly just, the sense then is, that the infinite greatness of God's majesty cannot sway his most holy will from the exact observance of the rules of justice; that though he is almighty, he acts as if injustice was out of his power, as being contrary to his will and the perfection of his nature, and therefore will never punish any of his creatures that do not deserve to be punished, merely to display an act of power. The sentiment, that God will not punish those that do not deserve to be punished, seems to me to convey no very high idea of the Deity. For is it any commendation of the God of Israel not to do a flagrant act of injustice? or would this be an excellency to be boasted of even in a heathen Jupiter? How much properer, and more agreeable to the nature of the God of the Old Testament, to say of him, that the greatness of his majesty does not prompt him to cruelty, to sudden and immediate revenge, or to exceed in the degree of punishment; but, all-powerful as he is, that he is forbearing and merciful, "even to such as do indeed deserve to be punished," either passing by their transgressions, or punishing them less than they deserved. And in this sense of good, benign, merciful, I rather am inclined to understand δικαίως, which is a known signification of the word, and will furnish a sublimer and more agreeable sense. From hence then I am induced to offer another explanation of this passage, and attempt a small alteration in the reading of the Greek, which perhaps would be more perfect, if, instead of αὐτὸν τὸν μὴ ὀφείλοντα κολασθῆναι, we read, αὐτὸν τὸν μὴ ὀφείλοντα, or (which I should still like better, if it may be allowed) αὐτὸν μὲν τὸν ὀφείλοντα κολασθῆναι καταδικάζουσι ἄλλοι τὸν ἡγούμενον τῆς οὐχὶς δυνάμεως, illum quidem (or illum ipsum quidem) qui debet puniri, morte statim multare alienum putas a tua potestate. "Thou thinkest thy power does not extend so far as instantly to condemn to death him that deserves to be punished." For the whole scope of the chapter seems to be to display the mercy of God; but there is no mercy shown, nor justice properly, in not punishing the innocent. Coverdale's version in this place is very faulty; "Thou punishest even him that hath not deserved to be punished;" which corrupt reading in some ancient copies, and particularly St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, manifestly charging God with injustice, and reflecting in the strongest manner upon his goodness, the Vulgate has corrected to the sense of our version.

Ver. 16. For thy power is the beginning of righteousness, and because thou art the Lord of all, it maketh thee to be gracious unto all. [i. e. Thy power is the foundation or basis of justice and equity, which are inseparable from it. The power of men is frequently the source and motive of their injustice; and tyrants oftentimes show their power by acts of cruelty and oppression, as if their maxim was that of the wicked ones, in ii. 11, "Let our strength be the law of justice." But God displays his omnipotence most chiefly in showing mercy and pity; and though he spares many guilty nations in the universe, yet he is the same absolute sovereign of the world; as the power of a king is no less visible, and always more amiable in reprieves and acts of mercy, than in the horrible pomp and bloodshed of executions: nay, according to what follows in the next words, he is therefore graciously disposed towards all, because he is Lord of all; and though he may exert his absolute power how and when he pleases, yet he is the more favourable and indulgent to his creatures upon account of his dominion over them, and relation to them. We cannot have a finer or more lively instance of this, than that we meet with in Jonah iv. 11, where God is introduced arguing with great tenderness in favour of Nineveh, devoted to ruin and destruction: "Shall not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons?" From the compassionate concern for the united misery of so many of his creatures, which prevailed with him no less than their repentance at length to avert the impending evil, we see that God is love, and that love is his very essence as Creator.

Ver. 17. For when men will not believe that thou art of a full power, thou showest thy strength, and among them that know it thou makest thy boldness manifest. [Ἰσχύον γὰρ ἐνδείκνυσθαι ἀπιστοῦμένους ἐπὶ δυνάμει τολμήθητι, καὶ ἐν τοῖς εἰδόσι τὸ θράσος ἐξελέγχεις. The Arabic renders, Declaras robur tuum his, qui plenitudinem potentie tue minime credunt; inter eos autem qui norunt illam, audaciam eorum coarguis. Exactly as our version, the translators of which seem to have read ἀπιστοῦμένους, in the sense of ἀπιστοῦσθαι, against use, and without authority. But I take the true and exact rendering of the Greek to be, "When thou art suspected or questioned with respect to the plenitude of thy power, thou displayest it, or givest them a specimen of it; and as to such as know thy power (ceux qui connoissent vostre toute puissance, according to the comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal), and yet act in defiance of it, thou convincest them of thy boldness." And thus Grotius and Junius understand ἀπιστοῦμένους in this place, and the Vulgate, which renders virtutem ostendis tu, qui non crederis esse in virtute consummatus—et horum qui te nesciunt, audaciam traducis; from a copy which read οὐκ εἰδότες. This latter clause of the Vulgate, though the least perfect, is followed by Coverdale's version; and from this authority Dr. Grabe seems to have inserted σε in his edition, though it is not in the Alexandrian MS. nor in the other Greek copies, nor indeed necessarily wanted.

Ver. 18. But thou, mastering thy power, judgest with equity, and orderest us with great favour:] The sense of this place in our version is, that God, out of regard to mankind, waves and overrules his power for the more pleasing work of mercy; and though the frequent instances of his goodness and loving-kindness are usually required on man's part with baseness and ingratitude, yet does not the greatness of his majesty urge him to sudden revenge, nor the sense of his injured prerogative prompt him to an immediate resentment. Accordingly, punishments are called by the prophet his "strange work," Isa. xxviii. 21, i. e. they are what God is not inclined to inflict, they are disagreeable to the benignity of his nature, and such acts as men's sins constrain him, as it were, to exercise. The following reflection of the very learned Dr. Jackson upon this passage of our author is so judicious, that it needs no other light. "To derogate from God's power is dangerous, and to compare the prerogatives of the most absolute princes with his is more odious; yet this comparison may safely be made, that God doth not more infinitely exceed the most impotent wretch on earth, in power and greatness, than he doth the greatest monarch the world hath, or ever had, in mercy, justice, and loving-kindness. Nor is his will the rule of goodness, because the designs thereof are backed by infinite power; but because his holiness doth so rule his power, and moderate his will, that the one cannot enjoin, or the other exact, any thing but what is most consonant to the strictest rules of equity. Bad therefore was the doctrine, and worse the application or use which Anaxarchus would have gathered from that hieroglyphical device of antiquity, wherein Justice was painted as Jupiter's assessor. It did not mean, as that sophister interpreted it to Alexander, that the decrees of great monarchs are always to be reputed oracles of justice, and that their practices are never unjust; nor that omnipotent sovereignty alone would justify the equity of all his decrees, who was subject to rage and passion; but that Justice was always ready to mitigate and temper his wrath with equity. The true Jehovah, as he needs no sweet tongue to moderate his anger, so hath he need of no such sophistry to justify the equity of his decrees" (tom. ii. p. 66). I shall only add, that ἀπαρσάνων ἰσχύος, in the original, which our translators and those of the Geneva bible render "mastering thy power," hath been considered by others as a title only, the same as "Lord of might," or "Lord of power," as Coverdale and all the other ancient versions understand it; and Calmet renders in like manner, O Dominateur Souverain. St. Austin's sense is the most elevated, Dominus virtutum, as if it was the same with "Lord of hosts," or Κύριος Σαβαώθ; or perhaps he may mean Dominus omnipotentissimus, as he elsewhere expresses himself (Confess. lib. i. cap. 4), a superlative which seems to carry its own confutation with it; but should rather be ascribed to his zeal than inaccuracy, as if he could never carry his thoughts or expressions high enough in describing the infinity of God's attributes.

For thou mayest use power when thou wilt.] This expression falls vastly short of the sense and majesty of all the other versions. The reading of Fulgentius here, who almost transcribes the Vulgate, is infinitely more magnificent, and worthy of God, Subest enim tibi, cum voles, posse, i. e. "Thou only wiltest a thing, and it is done." Nor is the Syriac much inferior, Si velis, præsto est potentia. The expression is not much unlike that of the psalmist, "Whatsoever the Lord pleaseth, that does he in heaven and in earth, in the sea and all deep places" (Ps. cxxxv. 6). Where the true reading, as well as the more sublime, is, "Whatsoever the Lord wills, that he does," πάντα θεα ἡθέλησεν ὁ Κύριος, ἐποίησεν, lxx. This instantaneousness of the effect upon the act of his will is finely expressed by St. Matthew, Θέλω, καθάρθῃς, "I will, be thou clean" (viii. 3). Nor are the words of our author in the original without their beauty, πάρσσι σοί, ὅταν θέλῃς, τὸ δύνασθαι. We have the very same thought, and even expression, Constit. Apost. lib. vii. cap. 35. σὺ γὰρ εἰς ὃ χρηστὸς ἐν ἐνεργείᾳ, καὶ φιλόδοξος ἐν οἰκτροῦσι, ὁ μόνος παντοκράτωρ ὅτε γὰρ θέλεις, πάρσσι σοὶ τὸ δύνασθαι κ. τ. λ. Calmet seems to understand the passage in the sense of our version, viz. "Thou hastest not, having all times and seasons at thy command, to suppress the insolence of the wicked, and to punish the sinner, because thou knowest they cannot escape thee, and that thou hast it always in thy power to cite them before thee, and to deal with them according to their works. God loses nothing by waiting for the repentance of the wicked, and the wicked are no gainers by the impunity of a few years. The sovereign judge will at length sufficiently compensate for the slowness of his proceeding by a heavier degree of punishment."

Ver. 19. But by such works hast thou taught thy people that the just man should be merciful.] "Ὅτι οὖν τὸν δίκαιον εἶναι φιλόδοξον, i. e. "Thou temperest all thy judgments with mercy and equity, and by that mixture of mercy with justice, thou teachest thy people to show the same temper to one another." St. Austin's observation upon the sinners of the old world is very pertinent; "God foreknew they would abuse the reprieve allowed them, yet he was so gracious to vouchsafe it to them; teaching us by this example, how much it is our duty to bear with those whom we know to be bad men at present, but uncertain how long they may continue so: that we should not be too hasty or rigorous in condemning or punishing them, since God himself is so merciful as to allot even to such sinners as he foreknew will make an ill use of his forbearance, so long a space for repentance" (De Catechiz. Rudib.). As these two virtues are so intimately united, and have such a strict relation to each other, we may perhaps not improperly consider them in the following view, as resembling Jacob's two wives. Stern judgment is deformed as Leah, but smiling mercy is as beautiful as Rachel: justice may claim the privilege of being the first born, but mercy is always the best beloved. Like sisters should they lovingly go together, and be married to the same man; what the barrenness of the one wants, the fruitfulness of the other will supply.

And hast made thy children to be of a good hope that thou givest repentance for sins.] It should rather be, "that thou givest room for repentance for sins,"—en leur domant lieu de faire penitence, says Calmet; "for God does not give, but accept repentance;" and so the Vulgate reads, Judicans das locum in peccatis penitentibus, which Coverdale follows in his version. Our translators seem not thoroughly to have considered the force of the Greek word; for εἰκος has another signification, and more agreeable to this place; i. e. "thou allowest, permittest repentance." See Acts ii. 27. Ὅτι δώσεις τὸν ὁσίων σου ἰδεῖν διαφθοράν. "Thou wilt not allow, or permit, thine holy one to see corruption." The Syriac seems to understand it in like manner, Filiis tuis spem fecisti: et concedis (leg. bonam spem) fecisti, ut concedis penitentiam delictorum. The sense of the passage is, that men may, from the experience or observation of God's forbearance to punish, and the continuance of his long-suffering to sinners, presume that God is placable and forgiving, and will not be rigorous in his proceedings with them; may hopefully promise themselves that God will favourably accept their sincere repentance, and the compensations of unfeigned sorrow and contrition which they offer in lieu of the exact performance of their duty, and that at length their guilt will be atoned by the truest sin-offering they can present. This consideration carries a pleasing and encouraging hope with it. If God, indeed, judged his creatures with the utmost rigour of his justice, how should even his own children presume to hope for pardon or to be justified before him? But when he showeth such clemency towards his enemies, what may they not then hope for, from a God so full of goodness and mercy? And can the faithful have any greater encouragement to have confidence towards God, and assure their hearts before him!

Ver. 21. With how great circumspection didst thou judge thine own sons, unto whose fathers thou hast sworn, and made covenants of good promises? The sense seems necessarily to require that this should be read in the future tense, "With how great circumspection wilt thou judge or punish thine own children?" &c. which is the rendering of the Geneva bible. This is confirmed by the Arabic version, which reads, sane (leg. sine) omni rigore et profundissima penetratione judicabis filios tuos. Hence it seems probable that the true reading of the Greek is, μετὰ πόσης ἀκριβείας ἐκρινες τοὺς υἱούς σου, and not ἐκρινας, as the printed copies in general now read. The sense of this and the foregoing verse is, "That, if thou didst show so much patience towards the Canaanites, ἀρρηκαμένους Σανάρ, 'who through sins were worthy to die,' as Coverdale renders, and had forfeited not only their land, but their lives, to thy justice; with how much more wariness and caution wilt thou punish thine own people the Jews, with whose fathers thou enteredst into covenant, and made to them therein goodly and precious promises?" for so I choose with the ancient versions to render "covenants of good promises," in the latter part of ver. 21 (see the like expression, Eph. ii. 12).

Ver. 22. To the intent that, when we judge, we should carefully think of thy goodness, and when we ourselves are judged, we should look for mercy.] i. e. When we reflect upon the difference thou hast made between us and our enemies, it should teach us to remember the example of thy goodness and long-suffering, when we judge or punish others, and to imitate it by treating them in the same tender and compassionate manner. This is the sense of the Arabic version, which reads, Ut, cum judicamus, de tua simus bonitate solliciti, eamque imitemur. And when we ourselves are punished, we are taught and encouraged, by happy experience, to put our trust in thy mercy (so Coverdale renders), and to expect a gracious deliverance from our troubles.

Ver. 23. Wherefore, whereas men have lived dissolutely and unrighteously, thou hast tormented them with their own abominations. Such therefore of thy enemies as lived unrighteously, ἀδίκως and not ἀδικούς, as most copies have it, "in a foolish, senseless way of life," ἐν ἀφροσύνῃ ζωῆς (which our version expresses but indifferently by "dissoluteness," and Coverdale's by "ignorance"), "having their foolish hearts darkened," as St. Paul, speaking of such idolaters (Rom. i. 21), expresses it, "thou didst thou torment with their own abominations." The word βδέλυγμα sometimes signifies the false object of worship, and sometimes those abominable sins and filthy practices which were notorious and customary in the mysteries of the idol-worship; so that these words may refer, in a larger sense, to the enormities and detestable sins practised in the heathen τελεταί, and hidden mysteries (see xiv. 24—26. 2 Mace. vi. 4), and that God, as a just punishment for such wickedness, tormented them with their own abominations, i. e. gave them up to a reprobate mind and vile affections (see Bishop Fell on Rom. i. 26). But if abominations be taken in the first sense, as signifying false objects of worship, it will be proper to inquire what they were, and who were guilty of such worship. The worship referred to in this place, is that of vile beasts and senseless animals; and the guilty persons must be either the Canaanites mentioned in the foregoing part of the chapter, or the Egyptians. Those who apply this passage to the Canaanites, understand it of their being tormented by hornets (ver. 8), as a just punishment, and perhaps too εἰς ἐμπαιγμὸν, for their ridiculous worship. For the Philistines, and in all appearance (says Calmet in loc.) the Canaanites too, worshipped flies, the god Baal-zebub, particularly the people of Ekron, or Accaron (see 2 Kings i. 2. where the LXX. read Μύαν Θεὸν Ἀκκαρόν.) Josephus and Greg. Nazianzen confirm the same; see also Selden (De Diis Syris, Syntag. ii. cap. 6), who says, the name of this god was Baal-zebub, Θεὸς Μύα, Deus Musca; and afterward called Βαλζεβούλ, Deus coreus, by way of derision (see Piscator and Drusinus in Matt. x. 25, and Leigh's Critica Sacra, p. 60). That religious rites were paid to flies in the temple of Apollo Actus, see Elian. de Animalibus, lib. ii. Grotius and Spencer think the author returns here to the Egyptians and their abominations, mentioned xi. 15, 16. And indeed it must be confessed, that this and the following verses, to the end of the chapter, resemble the argument there very much, and would come in better in that place, if that was any authority for such a transposition: for the mixing and confounding the Canaanites with the Egyptians together in different parts of the chapter, without any certain mark of discrimination, renders it obscure, and, without great care, scarce intelligible. As applied to the Egyptians, the sense is,—that as they worshipped beasts, God punished them by a variety of living creatures.

Ver. 24. And held them for gods, which even among the beasts of thy enemies were despised. Θεοὺς ὑπολαμβάνοντες τὰ καὶ ἐν ζωῶσι τῶν ἐχθρῶν ἄνιμα, i. e. according to the common acceptance of this place, they worshipped such beasts as were despised and laughed at by their enemies, the Hebrews, who in their sacrifices offered some of those very beasts which they worshipped as gods; which, in the opinion of some learned men, was purposely ordered and appointed to guard the Israelites against this idolatry (see Spencer de Leg. Hebr. tom. i. p. 298). But probably our translation here is wrong, and ἄνιμα τῶν ἐχθρῶν should be neither rendered "such beasts of their enemies as were despised," nor "such beasts as were despised by their enemies," as Grotius, not without some violence, expounds the Greek; but, "they held for gods despicable and mischievous beasts," such as dogs, cats, wolves, serpents, crocodiles, hippopotami, and other the most odious creatures, which the poet justly calls portenta (see note on xi. 15), as fit only to inspire horror. There is the like general charge, xv. 18, and τὰ ζῶα τὰ ἔχθιστα are mentioned as the objects of their worship. The manner of expression indeed by two adjectives may seem particular: but this construction is not unusual in the Greek language, and is equivalent to ἄνιμα καὶ ἐχθρά. Nor am I singular in this interpretation; Calmet understands the words in the same manner, c'est à dire, les animaux les plus vils, les plus méprisables, et les plus ennemis de l'homme (Com. in loc.).

Ver. 25. Therefore unto them, as to children without the use of reason, thou didst send a judgment to mock them. Calmet understands this of the Canaanites, that as they fell into the most childish and ridiculous errors, by transferring that honour which is due to God only, to despicable animals, such as are described Ezek. viii. 10, which the Israelites are supposed to have taken from the Phœnicians or Canaanites, God sent upon them in like manner chastisements seemingly as ridiculous, even an army of wasps, to attack, pursue, and destroy them. And the like may be observed of the Egyptians, that God treated them as children, whom they resembled so much in their folly; for as they pursued flies and little insects, so these went after κνιδάλα εὔτελα, and were chastised with a suitable punishment. At first he played with them, as it were, sending a company or swarms of inconsiderable flies (Exod. viii. 21), dallying with them by mock judgments, in comparison; for so I understand τὴν κρίσιν εἰς ἐμπαιγμὸν and the author seems to exemplify this play by a paronomasia, or a correspondent allusion in the original words, διὰ τοῦτο ὡς παῖσιν τὴν κρίσιν εἰς ἐμπαιγμὸν ἐπεμψας. But Philo calls such idolaters by a more odious name than children, bestias obambulantes sub humana specie. This judgment is by the LXX. styled κνιδόματα (Exod. viii. 21. Ps. lxxviii. 45), as if a particular species of tormenting flies was meant; but this, in both places, is a corrupt reading; the true one is indisputably κνιδόματα. St. Jerome accordingly reads Cœnomys, and explains it by, omne genus muscarum, and so do the other Latin versions. Aquila, in both places, renders it παμνύτον, and so the learned Usher understands it, calling this plague muscæum et aliorum insectorum colluvies, ad A. M. 2513 (see also De Muis on Ps. lxxviii. 45).

Ver. 26. But they that would not be reformed by that correction, wherein he dalled with them, shall feel a judgment worthy of God. This verse may be understood, either as a moral reflection with respect to sinners in general in the future tense,—that such as will not be reformed by those gentle methods wherein God may be said only to dally with them, shall afterward feel a heavier and much sorer vengeance; and this is the sense of the Greek, and of the Syriac and Arabic versions; or it may respect the persons mentioned in the foregoing verses, that they, having slighted God's milder punishments, at length experienced a judgment worthy of God. Dignum Dei (leg. Deo) iudicium experti sunt, says the Vulgate, which Coverdale severely follows, even in this mistake, "they felt the worthy punishment of God." Grotius says, that πεπράδουσι, which is the reading of some copies, is the true one, and that the present tense is used for the præteritum. In this latter sense the observation holds true with respect to the Canaanites; for such of them as were not affected, nor brought to a right sense by the plague and persecution of hornets, suffered much sorer calamities afterward in the wars which Joshua waged against them, and by their final extermination. As applied to the Egyptians, the remark is as just; at first God visited them with plagues, that were rather noisome than destructive to them (for we do not read of the death of any useful creatures, except fishes, till the plague of the murrain), but these had little or no effect upon them; for Pharaoh, as Dr. Jackson expresses it (tom. iii. p. 204), behaved himself under them like a proud and wanton humourist, and was still for experiencing a greater variety of them; God therefore visited him with more and more grievous plagues, and at length terribly completed his vengeance, and filled up the measure of their punishment, by those two unparalleled judgments, the death of their first-born, and the destruction of Pharaoh and all his host in the Red sea.

Ver. 27. For, look, for what things they grudged, when they were punished, that is, for them whom they thought to be gods; [now] being punished in them, when they saw it, they acknowledged him to be the true God, whom before they denied to know; and therefore came extreme damnation upon them. Our translation here is so confused and so clogged with parentheses, that it is very difficult to come at the true sense of this place; and as no light is afforded us either from the old translations, oriental versions, or commentators, we must have recourse to the Greek text itself, and from thence, obscure as it is, endeavour to find out the author's meaning. The present reading of the Greek, according to all the copies, is, ἐπ' οἷς γὰρ αὐτοὶ πάσχοντες ἡγανάκτουσι, ἐπὶ τοῖς οὗτοι ἰδοὺν Θεοῦς, ἐν αὐτοῖς κολαζόμενοι, ἰδόντες δὲ πάλαι ἠρνούσθαι εἶναι, Θεὸν ἐπίγνωσαν ἀληθεῖ διὰ καὶ τὸ τέρας τῆς καταδίκης ἐπ' αὐτοῖς ἐπὶ ἡλθε. The Vulgate renders, In quibus enim patientes indignabantur, per hæc quos putabant Deos, in ipsis cum exterminarentur, videntes illum quem olim negabant se nosse, verum Deum agnoverunt, &c. This is very obscure: Junius is still more unintelligible, Nam de quibus illi, quum perperentur mala, cum indignatione erant solliciti, de iis, inquam quos putabant Deos, quum se iisdem puniri viderunt, verum agnoverunt Deum, &c. Vatablus renders much more clearly. His ipsis rebus, quas passi sunt indignabundi Chanaanæi, cum per ea, quæ ut Deos colebant, punirentur, tandem suo malo agnoverunt verum Deum esse, quem ante negabant se nosse: i. e. "The Canaanites being displeased and angry at what they suffered when they were punished by those animals whom they thought to be gods, at length, being made sensible by their misfortunes, acknowledged there was a true God," &c. This is very intelligible, and comes near the true sense: but I cannot help observing, that Vatablus omits ἐν αὐτοῖς, and ἰδοῦντες, which immediately follow, and are the very words which occasion all the obscurity in the original and the other versions as they now stand. I have therefore been tempted to suspect that there is some mistake in them, and that the true reading probably is, ἐαυτοῖς, κολαζομένους ἰδοῦντες, ἢ ἐν αὐτοῖς κολαζομένους ἰδοῦντες; and my reasons are as follow:—1. The Bishops' and Geneva bibles both render, "when they saw themselves punished by them." 2. Junius, who in the other part of the verse follows the Greek literally, renders, quum se iisdem puniri viderunt. 3. Calmet, and the Port-Royal comment, explain it in this manner, se voyant avec douleur tourmentez et exterminiez, &c. The sense then of the first part of the verse I take to be this: "For, whereas when corrected only they were displeased and angry, seeing themselves more severely dealt with, and punished in good earnest by, or upon account of, those whom they thought to be gods, they acknowledged the true God, whom before they denied to know," &c. The next difficulty lies in rendering τὸ τέρμα τῆς καραδίκης by "extreme damnation;" it might have been better translated, "the utmost extent of judgment, or the severest temporal judgment or punishment" (though St. Austin on Ps. ix. quoting this passage, understands it strictly); but I take it to be no more than ἄγρια Θεοῦ κρίσις in the verse before, as opposed to παίγνια ἐπιτιμήσεως, slight corrections, which they were displeased with: but when it came properly to punishment, when they saw themselves κολαζομένους, then they were awakened to an acknowledgment of the true God, who had thus punished them; and therefore it was, that this last and most effective method was taken with them; διό καὶ τὸ τέρμα τῆς καραδίκης ἐπ' αὐτοῖς ἐπῆλθε, i. e. "when the dallings of correction would not do, punishment in full measure was given, which had the effect." This divine vengeance, when it fell so severely upon them, made them open their eyes; when they saw and felt it, then, and not before, they acknowledged him to be the true God, whom before they denied to know; and therefore, or for this end and purpose, that they might acknowledge him, were they thus severely visited; not only anathematized and exterminated, but interneece deleti, as Grotius renders, "cut off with an utter and final destruction" (Com. in loc.). This is spoken in vindication of the justice of God, who does not punish particular persons or nations without weighty reasons, and previous notices of their danger. This extreme severity, therefore, was at length necessary, that those who had continued in wilful blindness and incorrigible obstinacy, and so were without excuse, might be convinced and made thoroughly sensible that they had brought this damnation upon themselves, for not discovering all the while the true God, when they had such awakening means afforded them for that purpose. And thus I think a pretty good and consistent sense may be fetched from this verse, which has none at all, or a very obscure one, according to our version. Calmet understands this of the Canaanites; "That, seeing themselves persecuted, afflicted, tormented by horns, which they regarded as deities, and from whom they expected favour and protection, they were at length forced to acknowledge the God of the Hebrews for the only true God." Not that they actually, on this account, turned from their idolatry; but, notwithstanding the force of inveterate prejudice, were obliged to own the superiority of the God of Israel, and, by consequence, that the little animals they worshipped were contemptible, less than nothing, and their religion gross superstition. Junius, and many others, apply it to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who could insolently say, when the hand of God lay not very heavy upon him, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go" (Exod. v. 2). But when he and his people were visited by a succession of plagues and judgments, and the land was corrupted by the grievous swarms of flies, he as remarkably relents, and gives them leave to go and offer sacrifice to the Lord their God (Exod. viii. 25). But as there is no authority in history, that the Egyptians worshipped the very insects, or animals, that God plagued them with; and as this author particularly mentions their being "tormented with their own abominations," διὰ τῶν ἰδίων βέλουςμάτων; I am inclined to think with Calmet, that the Canaanites are rather here meant, and that they are spoken of through this whole chapter.

CHAP. XIII.

ARGUMENT.—From the mention of the barbarous and idolatrous rites of the Canaanites, expressed in the former chapter, the author takes occasion to treat of idolatry in general, its introduction and origin; of the vanity, folly, impotence, or rather nothingness, of idols, and the mischievous effects attending such a worship. He distinguishes idolatry into three sorts,—that of the heavenly bodies; images of deceased princes, heroes, and benefactors; and living brute animals. The first sort he treats of in the beginning of this chapter to ver. 10, and from thence, to the end of the fifteenth chapter, he considers the two other. Nor is this a digression or deviation from his principal and main design, which is to exalt wisdom, piety, and true religion, and to excite a love and regard for them in all, especially princes and great men. And can this be done more effectually, than by showing the folly and illusion of superstition, exposing the false objects of worship, and pointing out the mischiefs and unhappy consequences, which a forgetfulness or ignorance of the true God leads men to?

Ver. 1. Surely vain are all men by nature, who are ignorant of God. Μῆταια μὲν γὰρ πάντες ἀνθρώποι φύσει, οἱς παρὴν Θεοῦ ἀγνοοῖα. That idolaters are called vain persons in scripture is beyond dispute (see 2 Kings xvii. 15. Rom. i. 21); but how are we to understand vain by nature? I think, if this be the true reading, it either means, that such men are naturally weak and senseless who are ignorant of God, or that they are foolish who cannot by the light of nature make a discovery of him. But perhaps φύσει may be a mistake here, for neither the Vulgate nor oriental versions, nor Coverdale's translation, take any notice of it; possibly the original word was εἰσι, which they all agree in, and retain. And the true reading of the whole sentence in the Greek may be, μῆταιοι μὲν γὰρ πάντες ἀνθρώποι εἰσι, οἷοιπερ ἦν Θεοῦ ἀγνοοῖα. Calmet seems to understand by μῆταιοι, "insignificant, unprofitable," in the sense that vanity is used by Solomon in the book of Ecclesiastes. His reflection upon this place (Com. in loc.) is too just and useful to be omitted; "Without the knowledge of God, which is the first principle of wisdom, truth, and religion, all men, even the greatest, are vanity and nothing, all science is but darkness, all philosophy error and delusion. Hence St. Paul renounced all other knowledge, and determined to know nothing but Jesus and him crucified (1 Cor. ii. 2). It was the superior excellency of divine knowledge, which best discovers the nature of God, that induced Justin Martyr, after having tried all the sects of philosophers, and entered into all sorts of human learning, to relinquish them as unsatisfactory; he was at length convinced, that there is no wisdom, science, or philosophy, complete and perfect, without the discovery, knowledge, and worship, of God" (Dial. cum Tryph. in init.).

And could not out of the good things that are seen know him that is: Τὸν ὄντα, i. e. "The sovereign Being, the only Being," or "Being itself." In the first revelation which God makes of his own being, he entitles himself, "I am that I am;" by which name the great Creator does in a manner exclude every thing else from a real existence, and distinguishes himself from his creatures, as the only Being, which truly and really exists. The ancient Platonic notion agrees with this revelation which God has made of himself; for there is nothing, according to that, which in reality exists, whose existence, as we call it, is pieced, or made up of past, present, and to come. He only properly exists, whose existence is entirely present. Hence Plato calls God τὸ ἐν (in Timeo), which probably he borrowed from Moses (Exod. iii. 14); and Justin Martyr, who once embraced that philosophy, has often the same expression. By knowing God, is not barely meant that there is a God; but the discovery likewise of the excellence and beauty of his perfections, his goodness, wisdom, and other attributes, which the visible world every where proclaims; for in all creatures there are such lively marks and tokens of them, that from thence we may form some, though imperfect, idea of the inexpressible and infinite perfections that are in God. For the whole extent of that which may be known of God, the τὸ γνωστὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ, as St. Paul calls it, Rom. i. 19, 20, is manifest in the creatures, and the invisible things of God; even his eternal power and God-head are clearly seen in them. St. Basil therefore very justly calls the world, θεσμοταξίας παιδείαν, "the very school where the knowledge of God is to be learnt." And Clemens Alexandrinus, "the book in which we read God," using the same expressive metaphor (Strom. 6). This knowledge of the Deity from the works of nature is what some call natural theology, and others, the ascent of the soul to God by the scale of the creatures. Nor would any injury be done to the sense, if instead of τὸν ὄντα, we read τὸν ὄντα, i. e. "and from the good things they saw could not trace out the God that gave them;" for thus ἀγαθῶν and ὄντα answer to one another, as ἐργούς and τεχνίτην do in the following line.

Neither, by considering the works did they acknowledge the workmaster;] The knowledge of God was no difficult discovery, and therefore ignorance of him was not only surprising, but inexcusable! for a man need only lift up his eyes to heaven, and view the beautiful order and regular motions of the celestial bodies, to be convinced that there is a wise Author of nature, who at first created, and still preserves, this system of things. St. Cyprian therefore very justly observes, hæc est summa delicti nolle agnoscere, quem ignorare non possis (De Idol. vanit.). But that of St. Chrysostom comes nearest this writer, ἐποίησεν ὁρατῶν ὁ Θεός, ἵνα θαυμάσιος τὸ ἔργον προσκυνήσῃς τὸν ὁρατῶν, κ. τ. λ. Cælum condidit Deus ut opus admirans dominum adorares: at alii, conditore relicto, cælum ipsum adorarunt, id vero propter eorum ignaviam et insipientiam accidit (Hom. 25. De Diabolo Tentatore). Thus Cicero expresses the natural sense of mankind on this head: Cum videmus speciem primum candoremque cæli deinde conversionis celeritatem, tum vicissitudines dierum atque noctium, commutationesque temporum quadripartitas, eorumque omnium moderatorem solem, lunamque, et stellas eosdem cursus constantissime servantes: hæc cum cernimus, possumusne dubitare quin his præsit aliquis effector? (Tuscul. Quæst. lib. i.). But it would be almost endless to transcribe the many passages that occur in his works upon this subject, particularly in his book, De Nat. Deorum.

Ver. 2. But deemed either fire,] It is certain there were some among the heathen who worshipped universal nature, or the system of the material world, as an entire object, and made God and nature to be the same (see Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. ii. cap. 7); and others, who worshipped particular visible and useful parts of it, which was the more general, the chief of which are enumerated by this writer; and the first is the element of fire. That this was the prevailing worship in the eastern countries, among the Persians and Chaldeans, see Pocock's Spec. Hist. Arab. Hyde de Relig. vet. Pers. Strabo, lib. xv. Selden observes; Tamesti multi Persarum Dii, tamen ante omnes ignis ab eis cultus, et in omni sacrificio eum imprimis invocabant (Syntag. ii. cap. 8). And a little after, to show the very ancient worship of fire among the Chaldeans, he says, that the rabbins, by "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi. 31), understand their god Fire; and that, according to Maimonides, it means, terra deserviens igni. This he takes to be the "God of Nahor" (Gen. xxxi. 53), and the chief among the strange gods worshipped in Chaldea during Abraham's abode there (Josh. xxiv. 2). We read also of horses and chariots consecrated to the sun by some of the kings of Judah (2 Kings xxiii.), and of twenty-five apostates, "that worshipped the rising sun towards the east even in the temple of the Lord" (Ezek. viii. 16). The eastern nations worshipped fire as the cause of light, and the sun in particular, as being, in their opinion, the most perfect fire, and causing the most perfect light. For this reason in all their temples, they had fire continually burning upon altars erected in them for that purpose, and before these sacred fires they offered up all their public devotions, as likewise they did their private ones before fires in their own houses (Prid. Connex. par. i. b. iii.). As fire among these nations was a symbol of the sun, so the sun itself probably was a symbol of God, as being thought the most perfect emblem of his divinity, and to convey the most lively idea of the power, beauty, purity, and eternity of God; but at length this expressive and noble symbol was misunderstood and abused, and the worship transferred to the sign itself from the being represented by it. Vulcan and Vesta, in the pagan theology, originally meant nothing but fire. Thus Ovid:

"Nec tu aliud Vestam, nisi vivam intellige flammam."

And the name itself the learned have derived from ὤν Ignis. At length it was made one of the Dii Penates, and uncommon honours decreed to it by the appointment of Numa Pompilius.

Or wind,] The four principal winds were esteemed as gods by many people, by others particular winds were acknowledged as such. The Gauls worshipped the wind Circius; and, according to Seneca, Augustus when in Gaul dedicated a temple to it (Nat. Quæst. lib. v. cap. 17). The Egyptians adored the symbols of the Etesian and southern winds, which were most beneficial to them, and of the utmost consequence with respect to the overflowing of the Nile. The worship paid to the winds seems in general to have sprung from an ancient tradition, that the winds were governed by angels set over them, and ruling in them. From what Virgil says of Æolus's presiding over the winds (Æneid, lib. i.), it appears that this notion is very ancient; so that it is no wonder that in the symbolical learning and theology of the eastern nations intelligent beings or angels should be introduced as commanding and directing them. The Targum on 1 Kings xix. 11, as quoted by Lightfoot, expressly mentions the angels of the winds.

Or wind, or the swift air,] Ἡ πνεῦμα, ἡ ταχύν ἀέρα. Grotius understands this quite contrary to our version; by πνεῦμα he understands "the air," and by ταχύν ἀέρα, "the swift wind;" where it is observable, that he applies the epithet to the wind, rather than the air. The Arabic version in like manner, sed ignem, aut rapidos, ventos, aërem, aut astrorum orbem, &c. as if the original reading was, ἡ πνεῦμα ταχύν, ἡ ἀέρα. And indeed swiftness is the known epithet of the wind; hence we meet with "the wings of the wind" in scripture, to denote their rapidity. Hence, probably, the Egyptians made birds the symbols of the winds, as esteeming them the most natural emblems, on account of the swiftness with which they cross the air. But swiftness does not seem always to belong to the air, as such, the state of which varies according to its qualities. If, indeed, we understand by the air the ether, or that fine, fluid, agitated, and most subtle part, which permeates the pores of all bodies, and is supposed to be the cause of all motion and fermentation, which anciently the heathens called Ζεὺς or Jupiter, ταχύν, in this sense, will not be improper. But it is generally taken here to signify the clouds; and this Juno (for so the ancients called the grosser air) was not without her adorers and votaries. Even Socrates is accused in the poet for worshipping the clouds (Aristoph. in Nub.); and Juvenal charges the Jews with the same folly:

"Nil præter nubes, et cæli numen adorant." (Sat. xiv.)

Coverdale's version makes the wind, or the swift air, to be the same; "Some took the fire, some the wind or air—for gods."

Or the circle of the stars,] i. e. The constellations, according to Calmet and Grotius; by which some understand the Pleiades, others the constellations in the zodiac, called here, from the asterisms in it, and its glorious figure, the stary circle; many of which are known to have been worshipped, particularly by the Egyptians. Selden seems to have been of this opinion, Ægyptus priscis dodecatemoria signiferi ζοι βουλαῖοι, seu Dii consiliarii, planetæ vero lictores, qui ascensi solis consistorio adstant, censebantur. Teste vetere ad Apolloni Rhodii Argonauticon IV. scholiaste (Seld. de cult. extran. primord. cap. 3). But as the article is wanting before κύβελος, it may as well mean some other group of stars. This was a very ancient idolatry, and spread farther than most other superstitions. The Israelites are in scripture often charged with paying their adoration to the host of heaven, i. e. to the stars, of whom the sun and moon were esteemed the leaders, which they seem to have fallen into by the infection of the neighbouring nations. This worship sprang from an early notion, that the stars were tabernacles or habitations of intelligences, which animated those orbs in the same manner as the soul of man animates his body, and were the causes of all their motions. But the planets being nearest to the earth, and generally looked upon to have the greatest influence on this world, the heathens made choice of these, in the first place, for their gods. Hence we find Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Venus, and Diana, to be first ranked in the polytheism of the ancients, as being their first and principal deities (see Prid. Connex. par. i. b. iii. p. 140. fol. edit.).

Or the violent water,] The heathens had likewise a multitude of sea and river gods, as Oceanus, Neptune, Thetis, Triton, Neræus, &c. Homer speaks of the rivers of Troy, Simois and Scamander as two deities. It is certain that the Egyptians esteemed the Nile as their god, calling it ὁ ἑρῶν ἱεὺς Νεῖλος, and that they worshipped the water, above the other elements, as being, in their opinion, the principle of all things. Hence, says Philo, God first smote their water, and turned it into blood (De Vit. Mos. lib. i.). Suidas humourously tells a story of a famous contest between the Chal-deans and Egyptians about the strength and power of their respective deities, fire and water (in voce Κατωτος; see also Shaw's Travels where it is related; and Gregory's notes, p. 222). Tully has in few words comprised the several objects of false worship, Idol persanum etiam solem, lunam, stellas omnes, terram, mare, Deos esse.

Or the lights of heaven, to be the gods which govern the world.] The sun and moon were worshipped in different places by very different names (see Vossius de Orig. Idol. lib. ii. cap. 5). It was the sun whom one country worshipped under the name of Baal, another of Chemosh, as Hecate and Diana; the same was most probably the Egyptian Isis, the Assyrian Astarte, or Ashtaroth, and the Greek Ilithyia. Egypt was early infected with idolatry, especially of the sun and moon, as appears from Diodorus Siculus, and Lucian, De Dea Syria. Though it is more probable that Babylon was the mother of this kind of idolatry, and from thence the contagion spread through Egypt, Assyria, Phœnicia, and other parts of the world. The sun was the most glorious object that ravished the eye, and it showed itself no where more gloriously than the plains of Chaldea. Some learned men think that the tower of Babel was consecrated by the builders to the sun, as the most probable cause of drying up the mighty waters, Tenison on Idol. cap. 4, who acquaints us, from Julius Firmicus, that the Egyptians expressed their devotions to the sun in this form: "Sol. Opt. Max. mens mundi, dux omnium principescens."

Ver. 3. With whose beauty if they being delighted took them to be gods; let them know how much better the Lord of them is: for the first author of beauty hath created them.] Coverdale's version of this place seems preferable, "Though they had such pleasure in their beauty, that they thought them to have been gods; yet should they have known how much more fairer he is that made them, for the Maker of beauty hath ordained all these things," γενεσιουργος, the Original, the Founder, the Parent of beauty, hath created them, ipsamet naturæ pulchritudinis origo, says the Vulgate; nor does St. Austin express this word amiss by Pulchritudo pulchrorum omnium (Confess. lib. iii. cap. 6). Plato, who himself calls these glorious luminaries μυταλοι θεοι, says, that the Greeks formed the word θεος from the verb θειν (in Cratyl.); for, looking up to heaven, and considering the brightness and glory of the celestial bodies, running their several courses with the most wonderful harmony and order, they entertained in their minds so very high and exalted notions of them, that they were tempted even to an idolatrous worship of them. And other learned men observe that they gave the name of κόσμος to the world, from observing the beauty and ornaments of it (St. Jerome Comm. in Jon. i.). Caesar assigns this as the reason of the Germans worshipping the host of heaven, Germani deorum numero eos solos ducunt, quos cernunt, et quoniam aperte opibus juvantur, Solem, et Vulcanum, et Lunam (lib. vi. De Bello Gal.). It is generally agreed, that the worship of these luminaries was the first idolatry; it is certain that the only kind of idolatry mentioned in the book of Job (and therefore we may presume of all others the most ancient) is the worship of the sun and moon; "If I beheld the sun when it shined (says that holy writer), or the moon walking in brightness, and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand (in token of adoration, and from whence indeed the very term itself is derived; see Selden, De cult. extran. primord. cap. 3), this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge, for then I should have denied the God that is above" (xxxi. 26—28). This idolatrous practice of his time he opposes, by asserting God to be the maker of these very bodies, and that "by his Spirit he hath garnished the heavens," xxvi. 13 (see Vossius De Idol. lib. ii. cap. 5. Sharroek. p. 326). The inference of this writer is very just—that, instead of worshipping the heavenly bodies, which, like those of the intellectual world, were all created by God, and for him, they should rather have concluded that there was a first cause, the Author and Fountain of that perfection and glory which are displayed in any or all the creatures (see note on the latter part of the next verse).

Ver. 4. But if they were astonished at their power and virtue.] It was a very ancient opinion, and a received tradition of paganism, that the gods had their mansions in the στοιχία τοῦ κόσμου, or "the celestial bodies," and that the luminaries of heaven were all alive and instinct with a glorious and divine spirit. For the adoration they paid to the sun and moon, they paid it not to them as mere inanimate bodies, but as intelligences, or the supposed habitations of such beings; which seems evident from this verse, addressed to the sun:

Ἡλιός Σ' ὅς πάντ' ἐξοργί, καὶ πάντ' ἐπακούει.

We have an intimation likewise of this notion in Virgil (Æneid. vi.):

"Spiritus intus agit, totamque infusa per artus Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet."

From this notion they inferred, that it would be a thing pleasing to the supreme God, to address themselves to him by the mediation of these glorious intelligences, which they thought so much nearer to him than themselves, and to have the greatest influence upon the world. This conceit, seconded with pretended revelations and miracles, said to be done by the στοιχία, or "heavenly bodies," in time brought forth sacrifices to them, and images of them, by means whereof great blessings, they thought, might be procured to them through their power and influence (Maimon. De Idol. Thorndike's Epilogue, p. 287.)

Let them understand by them how much mightier he is that made them.] Coverdale's version is here again preferable, "Or if they marvelled at the power and works of them, they should have perceived thereby, that he which made these things is mightier than they." For, notwithstanding the regular courses of these heavenly bodies, and their dispensing life and heat, health and vigour, to all the parts and products of the earth, yet they should not so entirely have depended upon their sight, nor have been so far led by their own imagination, as to offer an idolatrous worship to beings, which a little philosophy, and the assistance of improved reason, might have informed them, had themselves been made, and, consequently, were by nature no gods. How much rather ought they, from the origin and effects of these heavenly bodies, to have concluded and adored the infinite power and most transcendent perfection of the great Creator of them, the Father and Fountain of these lights, from whom they received all that is glorious or beneficial in them, and must therefore be infinitely more excellent? St. Austin has some beautiful sentiments upon this head, Si placent corpora, Deum ex illis lauda, et in artificem eorum rectorque amorem, ne in his quæ tibi placent, tu displiceas:—Hunc amemus, hunc amemus; ipse fecit hæc, et non est longe (Confess. lib. iv. cap. 11, 12). And in another place, from the gifts discernible in the creatures, he deduces the perfection of the Giver, "Tu, Domine, fecisti ea; qui pulchre es, pulchra sunt enim; qui bonus es, bona sunt enim; qui es, sunt enim. At nec ita pulchra sunt, nec ita bona sunt, nec ita sunt sicut tu conditor eorum: cui comparata, nec pulchra sunt, nec bona sunt, nec sunt. Scimus hæc; gratias tibi. Et scientia nostra, scientiæ tuæ comparata, ignorantia est" (Confess. lib. xi. cap. 4).

Ver. 5. For by the greatness and beauty of the creatures proportionably the maker of them is seen.] The Greek copies vary here; the Complut. reads, ἐκ γὰρ μεγέθους, καὶ κάλλους, καὶ κτισμάτων ἀναλόγως, κ. τ. λ. which Junius follows, Nam ex magnitudine, et specie, ac creatis rebus convenienter, &c. and our version, with a little alteration. The Vatican edition has ἐκ γὰρ μεγέθους καλλότης κτισμάτων ἀναλόγως, κ. τ. λ. and thus the Syriac renders; i. e. by the greatness of the beauty of the creatures, the Maker of them is seen proportionably, or by analogy, by comparing the creature with the Creator, the effect with the cause, as far as the difference is capable of being known, cognoscibiliter, according to the Vulgate, and as the natures of the beings compared will admit; which probably is what Junius means by convenienter, and as the ratio between finite and infinite, if any such could be, will allow. St. Chrysostom quotes this passage of our author, and has the following just reflection upon it: εἶδες τὸ μέγεθος, θαύμασον τὴν δύναμιν τοῦ ποιητῆρος; εἶδες τὸ κάλλος, ἐκπλήγῃ τὴν σοφίαν τοῦ κοσμητῆρος.

Ver. 6. But yet for this they are the less to be blamed: for they peradventure err, seeking God, and desirous to find him.] Coverdale's version is clearer; "Notwithstanding, they are the less to be blamed that seek God, and would find him, and yet miss." But that of the Geneva bible is preferable here; "But yet the blame is less in those that seek God, and would find him, and yet peradventure do err." A comparison is here made between the worship of the heavenly bodies, and that of statues and images. The former has most to be said in its defence, though far from excusable, because these luminaries are glorious and magnificent, have a visible and apparent beauty and sensible virtue, power, and benefit, issuing from them, and therefore are worshipped for their own sakes, and the advantages which the world receives from them. But what merit of any sort is in an image, or what pleasure or profit can be drawn from it? which at best is a representation only, and, perhaps, of some thing or person in itself worthless or disgraceful. If the worship, therefore, of the former is not to be excused, as it follows, ver. 8, the worship of the latter is much more to be condemned, because nothing is a greater dishonour to God, than to suppose him like the image of a corruptible creature, or the product of man's art or invention. There is this farther to be alleged in mitigation of their error who worshipped the heavenly bodies, that the creatures which they worshipped they looked upon to be eminent representations of the most glorious attributes of the Deity: they worshipped the host of heaven, because they are visible representations of his glory and eternity; and the elements, because they represented his benign, sustaining, and ubiquitous presence. Philo compares the adoration of the sun, moon, and stars, with other instances, and particularly with the worship of statues and images, and has the very same sentiments with this writer, Peccant procul dubio (speaking of the former) dum, posthabito principe, venerantur subditos; minus tamen a recto declinant, quam qui ligna, lapides, argentum, aurum, similesque materias veritatas et simulacra, &c.

Ver. 8. Houbert, neither are they to be pardoned.] Though there are these mitigating circumstances, in some measure to lessen the guilt of the worshippers of the heavenly host, yet is their offence very grievous. For to instance in the sun himself, which undoubtedly is the most glorious and perfect, what property has he of divinity? He is neither self-existent, nor sufficient to continue his own being. And though he may warm and cherish the earth, yet can neither of the luminaries, nor both jointly, of themselves, produce either corn, grass, or fruit. It is therefore wisely conjectured by some learned men, that one reason why Moses, in the history of the creation, particularly mentions, that the fruits of the earth and the trees yielding fruit were produced on the third day of the creation (Gen. i. 11), and the sun and the moon not until the fourth day (ver. 14), was, to guard against the worship of them; that men might not think the influence of those celestial bodies to be the cause of the growing of these fruits, but the power and providence of God (see St. Ambr. Hex. lib. iv. and Philo, Περὶ κόσμου). For this was a sensible argument to the Jews and others, that these heavenly bodies, which the heathens paid their devotions to, were only secondary and instrumental causes in the hand of God, and that he could have supplied mankind with all the produce of the earth without them. Nor is it without a weighty reason that the sun, in the Hebrew language, is called Shemesh, i. e. a minister or servant (Deut. iv. 19. Isa. lx. 20. Joel ii. 10), which very name alone should have kept all that understood its meaning from worshipping that luminary; and yet even some Jews seem to have fallen into this idolatry, from what Ezekiel says, viii. 16, who are there reproved for turning their faces to the east for this very purpose.

Ver. 9. For if they were able to know so much, that they could aim at the world;] ἴνα δύνανται στοχάσασθαι τὸν αἰῶνα. The sense which is most common and received of στοχάσασθαι τὸν αἰῶνα is, that if they could give so good a guess at the world, the beauty of the heavenly bodies, and the effect and influence which they have upon the earth; could dive into the secrets of nature, as, the cause of winds, flux of the sea, violence of earthquakes, nature of animals, &c. might they not have discovered, by the same search of reason and happy conjecture, the Lord and Maker of the universe? For there seems less study and meditation required to know that the beautiful frame of things which we see was not by chance, or self-produced, but the work of an almighty Creator, than is necessary to penetrate into the mysteries of the natural world, and unravel the causes of such surprising events. But probably στοχάσασθαι τὸν αἰῶνα is a mistake, for στοχάζομαι has generally, if not always, in this sense, a genitive case in the most approved writers; and therefore τὸν αἰῶνα seems wrong in this respect, as well as in regard to τοῦτων, which follows. The true reading seems to be τῶν ἄνω. Besides, this expression answers very well to the things mentioned in the second verse, which belong to the upper regions. Whereas αἰὼν signifies principally duration. Perhaps the transcribers might mistake ἄνω for αἰῶνα contracted, such abbreviations being usual in manuscripts.

Ver. 10. And in dead things is their hope,] i. e. In idols which have no life, no knowledge, no sensation. It is worth observing, that the original word for an idol signifies vanity, a mere nothing, that which has no existence. The primitive Christians accordingly looked upon the heathen temples as charnel-houses, esteeming their gods as dead men, according to that of Tertullian, Mortui et Dii unum sunt (De Spectac. cap. 13). And thus some learned men explain ἐπερόσαν τοὺς νεκροὺς (Deut. xviii. 11), according to the LXX. not of a mere necromancer, who consulted familiar spirits, but of one that inquires of the dead idols, which the heathens had set up in the nations round about the Israelites, in opposition to the living God (Shuckford's Connex. vol. ii. p. 398). There may be also another interpretation given of this place, which is countenanced by the Vulgate, Coverdale's, and the other ancient English versions, viz. that their hope is vain, fruitless, desperate, without any prospect of help or remedy, like that of dead men, inter mortuos spes illorum est, according to the Vulgate, Ilis sont (says Calmet) comme des gens reduits au tombeau, sans secours, sans esperance. As the hope of good men, or such as serve the true God after an acceptable manner, is, on the contrary, a sure and certain hope, a joyful confident assurance, a hope full of immortality (iii. 4).

Gold and silver, to shew art in,] Χρυσὸν καὶ ἀργύρον τέχνης ἐμμελέτημα, i. e. "Some device" or "invention of art." Coverdale's and the old English versions put the comma after silver, and understand τέχνης ἐμμελέτημα, as a distinct particular from gold and silver before mentioned, and render, "Gold, silver, and the thing that is found out by cunning." The Vulgate takes it in the same manner, and so does the Syriac version, and Calmet. I cannot help observing here, the very great resemblance which there is between this passage and that of the Acts, xvii. 29, οὐκ ἀφείλονεν νομίζειν χρυσὸν ἢ ἀργύρον ἢ λίθον, χαράγματι τέχνης καὶ ἐνθυμήσειν ἀνθρώπου, τὸ θεῖον εἶναι ὁμοιον.

Or a stone good for nothing, the work of an ancient hand.] The antiquity of the idol was thought of great importance; its venerable rust added not a little to its divinity: hence "adoranda rubigo," in the poet, applied to such things as time itself had in a manner consecrated (Juvenal, Sat. xiii.). Even a stone badly cut has had a veneration paid to it, merely because it was ancient. Whole nations, says Calmet, have adored, for a succession of ages, an ancient block of marble, badly finished, or a figure in wood rotten and worm-eaten. But supposing the most complete piece of work, and that the hand of a Praxiteles or a Phidias stood plainly confessed, yet cannot time, though it may and does add a value to busts and medals, confer divinity, nor excuse the adoration paid to a piece of senseless matter, though beautified by art, dignified by a celebrated name, and recommended by the prescription and authority of many ages. It may not be unacceptable, perhaps, nor foreign to the occasion, to transcribe part of an epistle wrote by St. Austin to the principal inhabitants of a city in Africa, who had murdered a great number of Christians, because some of them were suspected to have taken away their god Hercules. That learned father expostulates with them upon this accident in these strong and pathetic terms: "The barbarous treatment which ye have offered to so many innocent persons, calls for vengeance from heaven and earth. But as ye urge the affront and damage, which ye have received against the massacre we complain of, let us state, in a few words, the injuries on both sides. You object, that your god Hercules is taken away: we are willing to make you satisfaction; we have money, stones, and workmen ready to set about the work; they shall instantly cut you out another deity, and paint it too in like manner, and finish such a Hercules in its stead, as you shall have no reason to complain of the difference. It is thus we restore your idol, it is thus we repair your loss: give us now back, in return, the souls of those many innocents you have murdered, and only to revenge the injured honour of a sorry, lifeless piece of stone" (Ang. Epist. 267. ad Princip. Colon. Suffet.). This instance shows the great veneration paid by the heathen to their statues, and how far superstition or a blind devotion will hurry men, even to sanctify murder.

Ver. 11—13.] The author in this and the following verses, exposes with great smartness of argument the absurdity of image-worship, by showing their original, and the vileness of the materials of which they are made: "That an ordinary carpenter (whom he purposely fixes upon, to show the clumsiness and inelegance of the work), having taken from a tree cut down what was best and most valuable, and fittest to be employed in some necessary piece of work; among the refuse, or rather the refuse of the refuse, for so τὸ ἐξ αὐτῶν ἀπόβλημα signifies, fixes upon a knotty and coarse piece of stuff, such as he could otherwise make no use of; and this he thinks good enough to make a god of." Horace, in like manner, makes himself merry with a workman, who deliberated whether he should make a bench or a god of an offal piece of wood, and at length determined it for a god; "Maluit esse Deum" (Serin. lib. i. Sat. viii.). The chief part of this description is borrowed from Isa. xlv. Jer. x. Baruch vi. and Lowth's paraphrase upon those passages in the prophets is equally applicable here: "What an absurdity is it for a man to dress his meat and make his god with the same stick of wood, or to think that a piece of timber hath any more divinity in it, than it had before, because it is fashioned and carved into the figure of a man?" To give an account of the original of images, how and whence made, is alone sufficient to expose the folly of worshipping them. This argument the ancient apologists for Christianity often insist upon, to show the absurdity of the heathen idolatry; but none of them more happily than Minucius Felix in the following words, and almost upon the like occasion, allowing only for the difference in the materials: Quando igitur hic (deus) nascitur? Ecce funditur, fabricatur, scalpitur: nondum deus est. Ecce plumbatur, construitur, erigitur: nec adhuc deus est. Ecce ornatur, consecratur, oratur: tunc postremo deus est, cum homo illum voluit et dedicavit; which in Mr. Reeve's most excellent translation runs thus: "But when, pray, does it commence divine? Behold, it is cast, fashioned, and filed: well, it is no god yet. Behold it is soldered, put together, and set upon its legs: well, it is no god yet. Behold, it is bedecked, consecrated, prayed to: then, then at last behold a complete god, after man hath vouchsafed to make and dedicate him." Thus Arnobius (lib. vi.), who was himself once a pagan idolater, and had, as he confesses, often asked blessings, "nihil sentiente de ligno," at length makes this just reflection upon such senseless conduct: At quæ dementia deum credere quem tunc ipse formâris, supplicare tremebundum fabricatæ abs te rei? This sort of idolatry, besides its wickedness, hath something in it too very preposterous; for should not the idol rather worship the maker, than the maker the image, since, in some sort, he may be considered as the creator of it? Philo has, I think, the like observation; Certe si error placuit, pictores et statuarii magis merebantur ut divinos honores acciperent; nunc ipsis contemptis, ac si nihil egregium præstitissent, pro diis habentur eorum opera.

Ver. 13. When he had nothing else to do. i.e. Postponing it to all other work, as thinking it of no great consequence, and then only taking it in hand when nothing better offered. Our version follows a copy which read ἐν ἐπιμελείᾳ ἀργίας; αὐτοῦ, which some Latin translations render, diligentia otii sui: and others, accuratio otio: other editions have ἐν ἐπιμελείᾳ ἐργασίας; αὐτοῦ, which is likewise the reading of the Alexandrian manuscript; and this the oriental versions seem most to favour.

Ver. 14. Or made it like some vile beast, loying it over with vermilion, and with paint, colouring it red, and covering every spot therein. That it was usual thus to paint and set off their images, see Ezek. xxiii. 14. Arnob. lib. vi. And no wonder that the Lares, or little household deities, for such this writer seems here to mean, were so adorned, when Pliny acquaints us, that the face of the image of Jupiter was usually painted with vermilion upon festival days, and other grand occasions among the Romans; Jovemque a censoribus miniandum locari, that the censors hired artists for that purpose; that Camillus and other generals, to whom the honour of a public triumph was decreed, were painted in the like manner; and that among the Ethiopians, totos eo tingei procures, huncque decorum simulacris esse colorem (Plin. lib. xxxiii. cap. 6, and Calmet in loc.).

Ver. 15. And when he had made a convenient room for it, set it in a wall, and made it fast with iron. This "convenient room," we may understand to be a shrine, which was a sort of little chapel, representing the form of a temple, with an image in it, which being set upon an altar, or fastened in a wall, or to some other place, the idol, when the doors were opened, was represented to the worshippers as standing or sitting in state. Coverdale's and some other ancient versions call this a tabernacle, following herein the Vulgate, which renders, Faciens ei ædiculum illo dignum, the very word used by Minucius Felix to express one of these shrines by. And in this sense, probably, we may understand "the tabernacle of Moloch," Acts vii. 43, for the σκηνη mentioned there was a kind of little cabinet, wherein the image of the false god was kept. And such I imagine those silver shrines to be, ναοὶ ἀργυροὶ, which Demetrius made for Diana (Acts xix. 24); Isaiah, likewise, mentions the silver chains by which these idols were fastened to walls or pillars (xl. 19).

Ver. 18. Humbly beseecheth that which hath least means to help. Τὸν ἀνευθάρων, i.e. that which hath no experience at all, as our margin has it. Nannius reads, ἀναυθάρων, egentissimum; our version seems to follow a copy which read either ἀνευθάρων, or ἀναυθάρων: any of which are more properly opposed to ἐπικονίας than ἀνευθάρων.

Ver. 19. Asketh ability to do of him, that is most unable to do any thing. Our version here manifestly follows the Vulgate, which reads, et de omnium rerum eventu petit ab eo qui in omnibus est inutilis; which Calmet thinks has been corrupted, and that the ancient reading there was, de manuum eventu petit ab eo qui manibus est inutilis. And indeed the Greek, τὸ ἀδυνατεῖν ταῖς χερσίν, favours this conjecture. I should not do justice to this writer, if I passed by the beautiful turns observed which close this chapter, which cannot but strike every judicious reader. I am sensible that Arnobius, Lactantius, Minucius Felix, and many of the primitive writers, have been very large in exposing the folly of idol worship; yet I know no occasional remarks, nor even any whole treatise purposely wrote on the subject, where this is more happily executed than in the compass of these last two verses, which alone may serve as a specimen of this writer's skill and judgment, where the contrast is so beautiful, and the contraries so happily and justly placed to illustrate each other, that a person of taste cannot but immediately discern and admire the justness and elegance of the piece. It is inferior only to some instances of the same kind in the inspired writings, particularly that well-judged opposition, which we meet with in the following words of St. Paul: "As deceivers, and yet true; as unknown, and yet well-known; as dying, and behold we live; as chastened, and not killed; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things" (2 Cor. vi. 8—10, see also iv. 8, 9). I shall conclude this chapter with a just reflection of St. Austin upon another species of idolatry, which, though less perceived, is no less fatal: "Besides the senseless sort of idolatry which consists in worshipping brutes and images, which may easily be avoided, there is a more common and dangerous way of worshipping the work of a man's own hands (continues he), by a secret and subtle idolatry, which consecrates our own favourite wills and passions, deifying the desires of our own hearts, and giving them the preference before the will of God, and is, in other words, the adoration of our ourselves; an idolatry, which is so much the more dangerous, as it is within our own breasts, and we constantly carry the favourite image about with us."

CHAP. XIV.

ARGUMENT.—The insufficiency of idols farther shown from their inability to preserve their worshippers in a voyage at sea; from hence the author takes occasion to mention the first invention of a ship, the form of which probably was taken from the model of the ark; that God rules the boisterous element, and his providence steers men's course, which can save them from accidents without the use of artificial means. The original of idolatry is inquired into, ver. 14, and some conjecture in the verses following, from whence probably it might take its rise. The chapter concludes with the abominable rites attending upon it, and the scandalous vices introduced by it.

Ver. 3. But thy providence, O Father, governeth it. As men had likewise their tutelar deities and favourite idols, which were thought to preside over the sea, and able to assist them in their voyages, the author shows the absurdity of idol worship in this particular also,—that neither the strongest ship, built by the most skilful workman, nor the rotten images that are sometimes in it, or carved upon it, probably of Neptune, Castor and Pollux, &c. are sufficient to procure a man a safe voyage, but the overruling providence of the true God only. ἡ δὲ αὐτῆς, πάτερ, διακοσμεῖται πρόνοια which is a proper technical sea term, and means that God's providence steers and guides the ship. That particular deities were supposed to superintend sea affairs, appears from an old inscription upon the Pharos, built by Sostratus, mentioned by Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 12, and Strabo, lib. xvii.), which is preserved in Dr. Hody, (De Bib. Text. orig. p. 87), and is as follows:—

ΘΕΟΙC ΟΥΤΗΡCΙ
ΥΠΕΡ ΤΩΝ ΠΑΡΙΣΤΟΜΕΝΩΝ.
DIIS SERVATORIBUS
PRO NAVIGANTIBUS.

That the sailors, in their distress in a tempest, used to cry for help to their false gods, and even implore the mercy of the sea itself, appears from Erasmus' Naufragium, where they cry out in their fright, "O clementissimum mare, O generosissimum mare, O formosissimum mare, mitesce, serva;" where the epithets made use of are too soft for that boisterous element, but are intended as compliments to bespeak its favour. But a more remarkable instance, and which I shall, for its greater authority, choose more particularly to mention, is what occurs in the prophet Jonah, ch. i. where we read that the "Lord sent out a great wind into the sea, and there was a mighty tempest in it, so that the ship was like to be broken; then the mariners were afraid, and cried every one unto his (false) god" (ver. 5). But notwithstanding their prayer to these pretended deities, and their rowing hard to bring the ship to land, the text acquaints us, that they found no help, the sea continuing tempestuous against them, till they cried unto the Lord Jehovah, the God of heaven, the only true God; and then the sea, at his command, ceased from her raging. This unexpected escape so affected the mariners, that from thenceforth "they feared the Lord exceedingly" (ver. 16), being convinced of his power and greatness, which appeared both in raising the storm, and so suddenly laying it. But the divine power over that unruly element never appeared more signally, than when our Saviour said to it, "Peace, be still; and immediately there was a great calm" (Mark iv. 39).

For thou hast made a way in the sea, and a safe path in the waves;] This may either mean, in general, that God giveth a safe and secure passage over the sea to the faithful that depend upon and cry unto him; or it may mean, that God made a safe way for his favourite people, the Israelites, to go through the Red sea on foot; which seems the most probable interpretation, because this sentence seems borrowed from Ps. lxxvii. 19, where the words are almost the same, "Thy way is in the sea, and thy paths in the great waters;" which the best interpreters refer to the same occasion.

Ver. 4. Showing that thou canst save from all danger: yea, though a man went to sea without art.] Ἰνα καὶ ἄνευ τέχνης τις ἐπιβῇ. Ἐπιβῇ seems to require something after it, and πλοῦον (ver. 3) is too far off: I think the true reading of the Greek is either ἵνα καὶ ἄνευ τέχνης τις ἐπιβῇ, and thus the Arabic interpreters translate, ut quispiam sine ulla arte lignum abjectum conscendat, or ἵνα καὶ ἄνευ τέχνης τις ἐπιβῇ; and thus Calmet takes it, vous pouvez sauver de tout peril quand on s'engageroit même sur mer, sans le secours d'aucun art (Com. in loc.): and the Vulgate itself so understands it, etiamsi sine arte aliquis adeat mare; but the sense is the same in both emendations, viz. that art or skill is not always successful, nor indeed always necessary on ship-board, or at sea; not always successful, as appears from the instance of the mariners in Jonah, and because there are many shipwrecks, notwithstanding the skill of the best pilots; nor always necessary, because God can save without the use and assistance of secondary means, as in the Israelites' safe passage through the sea; or contrary to the known laws of nature, as when St. Peter, at Christ's command, walked upon the sea. And though the pilot should have little or no skill, or, like Palinurus, should by some accident, fall overboard, yet God's power can preserve from danger, when the ordinary and usual means fail. Or, should the violence of a tempest render all art and management ineffectual, and at length force the ship upon rocks, so that nothing but instant death is apprehended, God can, even in this extremity, unexpectedly succour the miserable, by an unforeseen interposition of his providence; as he has done upon many occasions, well attested in history. One cannot read the description of St. Paul's voyage, and of that sad tempest, Acts xxvii. when neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, when they were forced "with their own hands to cast out the tackling of the ship, so that all hope of safety was then taken away;" nor reflect upon the ensuing shipwreck of him and his companions, and their very surprising and happy escape to land, "some on boards, and some on pieces of the ship," without discerning the hand of God in their wonderful preservation, which then is most visible and distinguished, when hope is desperate, and art ceases.

Ver. 5. Nevertheless thou wouldest not that the works of thy wisdom should be idle.] These words may either mean, that God not only displays his power at sea, but also his wisdom is visible there, particularly in the make of a ship, and in the art of navigation; for God may very properly be said to have taught men these, as he first gave the model of a ship, when he instructed Noah to build the ark after such a particular form; and from thence, or by that pattern, men first attempted to build ships, and to sail in them on the surface of the waters. The heathens, indeed, have given the honour of this invention to different persons; some to Jason, and the Argonauts, that sailed to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece: some to Neptune: others to Atlas, or Minerva: some to the people of Crete, and others to the Phœnicians. But hence, or from the plan communicated to Noah, we may with most certainty derive it; and here we should fix the epoch, or first original of navigation. Or the meaning may be, that God would have a commerce and correspondence carried on even amongst the most distant nations, by traffic and exchange of their several produces and commodities; that the abundance of some might be a supply for the others' want, that so none of the good things which God has so liberally provided for the comfort and conveniency of life might be idle, i. e. useless and superfluous; and therefore, or for this purpose of a mutual intercourse, men undertook long and dangerous voyages, encompassing both sea and land to establish commerce, and to circulate what might be necessary or wanting. We meet with the like observation among the fragments of Philo, ἄξιον θαύματος εἶλασσαν, δι' ἧς, κ. τ. λ. Beneficio maris, terræ regiones sibi invicem commutantes bonorum pendunt, atque tum ea, quibus carent, accipiunt; tum ea, quibus abundant, remittunt.

And therefore do men commit their lives to a small piece of wood,] Seneca has the like expression:—

"Audax nimium, qui freta primus
Rate tam fragili pericla primum,
Dubioque secans æquora cursu
Potuit tenui fidere ligno."

And indeed the poets in general are full of beautiful sentiments on the occasion, but none so jocular as Juvenal:—

"I nunc, et ventis animam committe, dolato
Confusus ligno, digitis a morte remotus
Quatuor, aut septem, si sit latissima tæda." (Sat. xiv.)

Which Ovid has as fully and more seriously described in the following short verse:—

"Tam prope nam letium, quam prope cernit aquam."
(De Ponto, lib. ii.)

No wonder, therefore, that persons of the greatest courage have trembled at the nearness of the danger; and that the great hero Æneas himself was in such a panic, in the violent storm mentioned in the first Æneid, especially as the heathens had a notion that the soul was fire, and might possibly be extinguished by the waters. But the description of the inspired poet exceeds all others in majesty and terror—"They are carried up to the heaven, and down again to the deep; their soul melteth away because of the trouble" (Ps. cvii. 26). This is exactly in the strain of Virgil:—

"Tollimur in cælum curvato gergite, et idem Subducta ad manes imos descendimus unda."
(Æneid. lib. iii.)

Ver. 6. For in the old time also, when the proud giants perished.] Καὶ ἀρχῆς γὰρ ἀπολλυμένων, κ. τ. λ. I think this, which is the present reading of all the Greek copies, a mistake; probably καταρῶς γὰρ ἀπολλυμένων, κ. τ. λ. is the true reading. Ab initio cum perirent superbi gigantes, &c. as the Vulgate has it; i. e. when the old world, through excess of wickedness, perished by water. But why are the giants particularly mentioned, when the text in Gen. vi. 12, says, "that all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth?" the answer is, that, by a known figure of speech, a part here is put for the whole; and those giants are principally mentioned, as being the ringleaders, and the most flagrant examples of wickedness. For by the word giants we are to understand, not only men of uncommon stature, but violent and bloody men, who filled the world with rapine and murders. Hence some of the ancients explain the word γίγαντες by βίαιοι, "violent men;" and some by ἀσεβεῖς, "wicked men." They are here called υπερηφάνοι, which may mean, not only their being proud upon account of their size, but, which is a general consequence, their being overbearing by reason of their great strength. We may likewise understand by perished, their perishing by an everlasting destruction: for the ancient name for hell among the Jews was cætus gigantum, and there are many texts of scripture that seem to lead to this sense (Job xxvi. 5, 6, in the Hebrew and Vulgate; Prov. xxi. 16. See also Mr. Mede's 7th disc.).

The hope of the world governed by thy hand escaped in a weak vessel.] Coverdale's and the other ancient English versions apply these words to the ship, and not to the persons in it, rendering, "He, in whom the hope was left to increase the world, went into the ship, which was governed through thy hand;" and so the Vulgate understands it, and the Arabic. Our version follows the Greek.

And left to all ages a seed of generation.] When the earth was purged from a deluge of sin by a deluge of water,—that there might be some living witnesses of the world's being thus destroyed; and that the memory of such an instance of God's justice, power, and hatred of sin might be preserved to succeeding ages,—Noah and his family, upon whose safety likewise the future increase and peopling of the world again depended, and therefore here properly called the hope of it, were preserved in the ark from perishing by the water, and by God's command he preserved some few individuals of every species, to repair the almost universal loss, and by a new progeny renew the face of the earth, which is the "seed of generation" here meant. According to the ancients, only Deucalion and Pyrrha survived the flood, and in these they placed the growing hopes of the world: thus Ovid.—

"Nunc genus in nobis restat mortale duobus."

Plato and Lucian call those few persons who remained alive Zóncupa, i. e. live coals, who were to rekindle the vital flame, and continue the human race. When Noah went out of the ark, God blessed him and his sons, i. e. he renewed the blessing bestowed before upon Adam, saying, as after a new creation, "Increase and multiply;" nay, it is very observable, that God repeats this blessing twice (Gen. ix. 1. 7), to denote as well its greater certainty a universality. "Noah (says Theodoret) was now the seed of mankind, the new root of human nature, and, as it were a second Adam: accordingly God confers upon him the same benediction, as upon the father of the former world" (Quest. in Gen. 53). As Noah stood thus as it were in the place of Adam, so St. Chrysostom observes of Noah, that he repaired the loss of dignity sustained by Adam's fall, and obtained from the divine goodness some external privileges Adam had lost; and, as an instance of this, he alleges the return of the savage world in the ark, to that submission, which, according to the divine appointment, they paid to the first man before the fall (Hom. 25. in Gen.).

Ver. 7. For blessed is the wood whereby righteousness cometh.] i. e. Blessed is the wood which serveth for good and righteous purposes, and blessed is the ark in particular, which preserved so good a man as Noah was (for blessedness in scripture is applied to things as well as persons that contribute to any good work), for he was a great instance of the righteousness which is by faith, and as such is numbered among the heroes in the eleventh to the Hebrews: he was also a remarkable preacher of righteousness to the old world, warning them, for a hundred and twenty years, to escape the general danger and destruction that threatened them; and in his family the true religion was preserved, particularly in Shem, who was the root of the divine peculium, in the postdiluvian, as Seth was in the antediluvian world. But I cannot think that these words are spoken prophetically of the cross, or that they any ways allude to it: that they may be applied to it by way of accommodation, and have actually been so applied by several of the fathers, particularly St. Cyprian, Justin Martyr, Ambrose, Austin, Chrysostom, Clemens Alexandrinus, &c. I readily grant, and indeed such a comparison seems easy and natural: for referring this passage to the ark spoken of in the foregoing verse, to which undoubtedly it originally and primarily relates, this ark of wood may in a secondary sense be considered as a type of the church, and of that salvation, which true believers shall, in all ages, obtain by faith in a crucified Saviour, who in the Old Testament is called "The Lord our righteousness" (Jer. xxiii. 6). Some have understood this passage of our author of the punishment of notorious offenders; that the wood upon which such sinners suffer, and which is the adjudged instrument of justice and vengeance, is blessed, as doing service to the public, by the exemplary dispatch of such as are not fit to live. But this interpretation seems forced.

Ver. 8. But that which is made with hands is cursed.] Something is here omitted or must necessarily be understood; for it is not true, that everything that is made with hands is cursed, for then the ark itself would be cursed: I conceive, therefore, that graven images should be supplied; "Cursed is the graven image which is made with hands."

But this likewise must be understood with some limitation, for the bare making of an image is not in all cases to be condemned: for, besides that Moses calls this art one of the gifts of God, that act of God in giving orders for the brazen serpent to be made and set up, and the cherubim to be placed over the mercy-seat, shows, that the bare making of images is not unlawful. Accordingly, the writers of the decalogue do not understand the second commandment, as if it forbade the making of images in general, but the making them with a design to represent the divine majesty, or to worship and kneel before them. The sense therefore of this passage seems to be, that the image, which is made with an intent to be worshipped, and by which cometh unrighteousness, is accursed. And the reason of its being accursed is, from the great, I should say infinite, disproportion that there is between an image and the divine nature; and that being corruptible it should be accounted God. If the insensible wood, or image, then, is cursed, no wonder that the maker of it should be so in an equal or greater degree, as it follows in the next words.

As well it, as he that made it.] This is agreeable to scripture, which says, "Cursed is the man which maketh any graven or molten image, and putteth it in a secret place;" i. e. privately worships it; for it is upon account of its being worshipped, that it is there called "an abomination unto the Lord" (Deut. xxii. 15). Nor is it particular to the scripture only, to denounce and execute vengeance upon the idol-maker; even the poets, when they give us an account of Prometheus's vanity, tell us, at the same time, how their Jupiter vindicated his honour, by the severe punishment inflicted upon the insolent offender. I think this verse and the context would be more perfect, if the worshipper, who is the principal, if not the only offender, had been inserted. For the idol itself is senseless and inanimate, or, as St. Paul in one word well expresses it is nothing, and therefore, as such, cannot be the object of punishment; but the person who sins by it, which is Capellus's objection against this place: and as to the statutory that makes the idols, how far he is faulty, the following lines of Martial will inform us:—

"Qui fingit sacros auro vel marmore vultus, Non facit ille Deos; qui colit, ille facit."

So that as he alone turns images or pictures into idols or false gods who worship them, he should have been chiefly taken notice of as most obnoxious to the divine displeasure. As it is the worship therefore that makes properly the idol, possibly the idolater may be included in the maker, and is the ὁ ἀειδὼν in the next verse: and thus Calmet says it may be understood, le faux Dieu, avec celui qui lui rend un culte sacrilege (Com. in loc.).

Ver. 11. Therefore even upon the idols of the gentiles shall there be a visitation.] This may be taken in two senses according as we understand the term idol, which may either mean the material image, or the false god represented by it. But it may be asked, how a visitation or punishment can properly come upon the idol which is inanimate? The Chaldee paraphrase upon Exod. xii. 12, will explain this, where the judgments threatened upon the gods of the Egyptians are expressed in the four following instances: Idola fusilia liquefient, idola lapidea rescabuntur, idola testacea fiunt minuta frustra, idola lignea fiunt cinis. And that the images of their god Apis and their other deities, were thrown down by an earthquake when their first born were slain, St. Jerome asserts, ad Fabiol. from Jewish tradition, and Artapanus in Euseb. lib. ix. de Præpar. The like example was made of Dagon, by the virtue of the divine majesty appearing on the ark, for he fell before it, and laid on the ground a headless idol, and a senseless trunk. Or it may mean, that the demons and evil spirits which inhabited these idols, and from thence gave their delusive oracles shall be detected and dispersed. St. Cyprian speaks of them in aftertimes as thus visited, Illi adjurati per decem verum a nobis, statim cedunt, et de obessis corporibus exire coguntur:—videas illos nostra voce et operatione majestatis occultæ, flagris cædi, igne torreri, incremto penæ propagantis extendi, ejulare, gemere, deprecari (De Idol. vanit.). The prophets, in many parts of their writings, foretell that there shall be a final period put to idolatry, Isa. ii. 11. Zech. xiii. 2. Jer. x. 15, where the prophet, speaking of idols, says, according to the LXX ἐν καιρῷ ἐπισκοπῆς αὐτῶν ἀπολοῦνται, an expression which has a near resemblance with that of this writer; and in ver. 11, he has the same threatening, but in the Chaldee language, as the learned observe (see Witsii Exercit. in Symb. Apostol. p. 125. Poli Synop. in loc.), that the Jews, being thus prepared against the attempts of the idolatrous Babylonians might be better able to answer them in their own language.

Because in the creature of God they are become an abomination.] The sense seems to be, that idols are an abomination by the abuse of some of God's creatures; for whatever be the matter of their idols, whether gold, silver, stone, or wood, things otherwise harmless and useful are perverted by this misapplication of them to idolatrous purposes; and, on this account, God will show his displeasure and resentment even against such insensible things.

Ver. 12. For the devising of idols was the beginning of (spiritual) fornication.] In the language of scripture, idolatry is represented as a sort of fornication or adultery; and the worship of false gods is called "The going a whoring after them." (Lev. xvii. 7. Ezek. xxiii. 30. Hos. iv. 12. ix. 1.) Hence the idolatry of the Jews is expressly called unclean-ness, because it was an alienation of the hearts and bodies of them from the God of Israel, who had chosen that church as his spouse. And when the Jews were at length brought off from this sin, they represented the idolatry of others under the name of fornication (John viii. 41). Our version, it is plain, takes it in this sense, by calling it here "spiritual fornication," though none of the other versions so confine the sense, or take any notice of the word spiritual. And indeed the observation is equally true of fornication strictly so called; for the heathen idolaters were likewise the most infamous fornicators, and their hidden mysteries were little else than acts of uncleanness, a melancholy detail of which follows in the conclusion of this chapter. Tertullian's words are very observable, who joins these vices as if they were inseparable. Quis immundis spiritibus operatus, non concupiscatur, non concupiscatur incedit (De Idol. cap. 1)? And St. Peter describing the vicious customs of the gentiles, says, "that they walked in lasciviousness and lusts, and abominable idolatries" (1 Pet. iv. 3). To these impurities they were led by the traditional accounts of the lewd amours of their false gods; and when once men began as it were to consecrate crimes by the authority of their gods, there was nothing which they did not commit without scruple and without shame, under the shelter of their example. Ego Homuncio non facerem (Eunuch. act. iii. sc. 5)? was therefore but a natural conclusion, when the great thunderer was known to have committed a rape, and authorized the same villany.

And the invention of them the corruption of life.] As the practice of idolatry was attended with impurities of all sorts, and particularly with unnatural and shameless uncleanness, it is very properly here called φθορά ζωῆς, "the corruption of life." That φθορά signifies corruption through lust, is evident from many places of scripture where it is so used, particularly in the epistle of St. Paul and St. Peter; it is so taken by Ignatius, and other ancient ecclesiastical writers, and by Philo, who ranks it with fornication and adultery; and, as a branch of great uncleanness, ranks it among other instances of transgression, which are a breach of the seventh commandment (Phil. de Spec. Leg.).

Ver. 13. For neither were they from the beginning, neither shall they be for ever.] The most ancient idolatry was undoubtedly the worship of the heavenly bodies; but, as ancient as this was, we read nothing of it certain, and which may be absolutely depended on, before the deluge; nor are learned men in general agreed, that it was one of those pollutions which defiled the old world. And indeed there were many causes which might prevent the sin of idolatry so early,—as, the infancy of the world from the creation, the memory of which must be still fresh; the longevity of the antediluvians, of Adam, Seth, and the rest of the holy line, who could, and did most probably, inculcate and deliver to their families, what themselves were so abundantly assured of with respect to almighty God's being and oneness. Add to this, likewise, the appearance of the Δύλος, or Son of God, to Adam and others (see Tenison on Idol. p. 39). The worship of images came in much later; the earliest account we have of them is probably that of Laban's teraphim, Gen. xxxi. or his Penates, as they are thought (see Selden, de cult. extran. primord. cap. 3). It appears from Varro, that the Romans had subsisted above a hundred and seventy years before they had any images, but they were idolaters long before that time. Tarquinius Priscus is first thought to have introduced them from the Greeks (see Aust. de Civ. Dei. lib. iv. 31. Thorndike, of the laws of the Church, p. 289). Our author intimates, that the custom of worshipping dead men for gods contributed to it (ver. 15), the date of which may be fetched from history. And as to polytheism in general, one knows from thence the epoch and original of all the false gods, when Jupiter, Hercules, Neptune, &c. first commenced deities, and on what account; so that idolatry may be looked upon as of late date, compared to the most ancient and true religion, which has always subsisted, and will always continue in the world. And as God hath already blotted out the very names of many of the heathen idols, it may be looked upon as an earnest of the utter destruction of the rest.

Ver. 14. For by the vain-glory of men they entered into the world, and therefore shall they come shortly to an end.] Vain and proud men, not content with common honours, aspired after divine, and affected to be called gods; and, from a principle of vanity and self-love, would have their images erected and adored, proposing immortality to themselves from hence; but their expectations have been frustrated, and their images of no longer continuance. Our translators render it in the future tense, as prophetic of what should happen hereafter; but the original expresses it by the time past, διὰ τοῦτο σύντονον αὐτῶν τῶς ἐπειρήσθῃ. The Arabic assigns here the same reason for such ambitious attempts, cumque propterea finis illorum sit brevis, hinc idola excogitarunt; "that idols were invented as a sort of artifice to prolong the shortness of their lives." The Vulgate takes κενοδοξία in the nominative case, and renders, supervacuitas hominum advenit in orbem terrarum, et ideo brevis illorum finis inventus; understanding it probably of the sin of our first parents; but Dr. Grabe, who has Σύναξις in a parenthesis, is more explicit; viz. that death entered at first into the world through man's ambition, and on that account they lost their intended immortality, and a period was fixed to human life. This indeed appears to be the sentiment of our author in several places (i. 16. ii. 23), but that sense does not seem so agreeable to the context.

Ver. 15. For a father afflicted with untimely mourning, when he hath made an image of his child soon taken away, now honoured him as a god, which was then a dead man.] The author here points out the beginning or source of a particular species of idolatry; viz. that a father having lost, by an untimely death, a dear son, causes the image of him to be made to perpetuate his memory, which is adored by himself and domestics. At first this was intended only to so-lace grief, by an imaginary, or representative presence of him that was dead; but that tender respect which parents bear to their children increasing after their death, and a certain impotent desire joined thereto of still enjoying their companies whom they so dearly loved, together with a fond persuasion that the dead were in a capacity of knowing and accepting such ceremonious instances of love and respect, put them upon procuring sacrifices, and other acknowledgments of divine honour, to be publicly assigned them after death; and at length a civil respect terminated in superstition and idolatry. Thus St. Cyprian: Inde illis instituta templa; inde ad defunctorum vultus per imaginem detinendos expressa simulacra, quibus et immolabant hostias, et dies festos dando honores celebrabant. Inde posteris facta sunt sacra, quia primis fuerant assumpta solatia (De idol. vanit.). Cicero is a celebrated instance of the very fond affection of a parent for a deceased child. He had a mind to perpetuate the memory, and consecrate the virtue, of his favourite daughter Tullia by a temple, the most ancient way of doing honour to the dead that had deserved well. We have her apotheosis in the following words: Te omnium optimam doctissimamque, approbantibus diis immortalibus ipsis, in eorum cœtu locatam, ad opinionem omnium mortalium consecrabo (De Consol. see also Lactantius, De falsa Rel. lib. i. 15, and the writer of his life, vol. ii. p. 378). Not unlike our author's account is what Dio-phantis the Lacedæmonian mentions of Syrophanes the Egyptian, whose grief was so excessive for the death of his only son, the designed heir of his immense fortunes, that he ordered an image to be made of him, as a sort of relief and comfort to him under his distress; that his servants and dependants, to flatter their master, used to crown the image with flowers, to burn incense to it, and to fly to it as their deliverer, "quasi salutis certissimo collatori," after the commission of any great fault: Fulgent. Mythol. lib. i. and, according to the etymologists εἰδώλον is so called, quasi εἰδωλόν, i. e. doloris species. And that in scripture idols and sorrows are expressed by the same word in Hebrew, see Selden, De cult. extran. primord. cap. 3. So that our author's account is not quite singular, nor so much to be condemned as Calvin (Instit. lib. i. cap. 11), and Capellus have represented it (Strict. in lib. Sap.). For the design of this writer was not to set down all the sorts of idolatry, nor the original and order of each in point of time; he did not mean this as the only or the first source of all idolatry; nor does he exclude, or deny, that there are others more ancient, which he himself mentions in some of the foregoing chapters. His design here is only to show the ridiculousness of idolatry.

and the folly of idolaters; and this he has sufficiently done, by showing the rise of some of them, in some very remarkable instances (see Calmet's Diction. in voce Idolâtry, and his Dissertation sur l'Origine De l'Idolatrie).

Ver. 16. And graven images were worshipped by the commandment of kings. Or tyrants, as the marginal reading is. And thus Coverdale renders, "Tyrants compelled men by violence to worship images;" which seems preferable, as it suits better with the character of the latter; for a good king will rather labour to establish virtue, which is his best image, a stamp more honourable than any upon the most valuable coin, or even than art itself can reach. We cannot have a fuller proof of the vain-glory of a tyrant than in that worship which Nebuchadnezzar ordered, upon pain of death, to be paid to the golden image, which, in the province of Babylon, he had set up (Dan. iii.). Nor had Darius' decree less vanity in it, "That whosoever should ask a petition of any god or man for thirty days, but of him only, should be cast into the den of lions" (Dan. vi.). The like observation may be made upon many of the Roman emperors, whose ambition carried them to have their statues erected, and divine honours paid to them. Ninus also introduced the same superstition, for he set up the image of his father Belus, to be publicly honoured by his people; and, that great resort might be made, and respect paid to it, he pardoned all offenders, how great soever their crimes were, that fled unto that image; which encouragement, together with the authority and command of the king himself, multiplied the number of its worshippers.

Ver. 17. Whom man could not honour in presence, because they dwelt far off, they took the counterfeit of his visage from far, that . . . they might flatter him that was absent, as if he were present. The author here considers the original of the worship and deification of kings; that at first an image, picture, or statue, was made of them, as an instance of civil respect to them, and fondness for them; who being far distant from many parts of their dominions, and often absent from them in foreign wars, their subjects by this device supplied the loss of their personal residence among them. But this afterwards was the occasion of great superstition and idolatry; for in time, and especially after the deaths of their favourite kings, which was a loss irrecoverable, and an absence the most regretted, they proceeded even to adoration of them. The heathens were induced probably to this worship of their kings, either out of a compliment to their vanity, which was oftenest the case; or from an opinion that, being the representatives of God's power on earth, worship was really due to them; or upon account of their extraordinary virtues; or from a sense of gratitude for benefits received from them: but there was something of policy in the worship of their dead kings; for by thus paying homage to departed merit, they hoped hereby to induce their successors to the like endeavour of governing well. Nor was their apotheosis without a mixture of flattery too of their successors' vanity, who were pleased to be thought of divine extraction, and to be descended from so high an original; which notion itself contributed not a little to the establishment of this error (see Lactantius, De falsa Relig. lib. i. 15). The same observation upon the original of this worship is made by Minutius Felix, "Dum reges suos colunt religiosè: dum defunctos eos desiderant in imaginibus videre; dum gestiunt eorum memorias in statu detinere; sacra facta sunt, quæ fuerant assumpta solatia" (p. 375. Cypr. De Idol. van.).

Ver. 18. Also the singular diligence of the artificer did help to set forward the ignorant to more superstition. i. e. To lead the ignorant into more superstition. Coverdale's version of the place is clearer, and better expressed, "The singular cunning of the craftsmen gave the ignorant also a great occasion to worship images." At first the figures or images of the deities seemed to have been made of earth, clay, stone, wood, in a rude and imperfect manner (see Principes de la Sculpture, liv. ii. cap. 1). Clemens Alexandrinus observes, that before the art of carving was invented, the ancients erected pillars, and paid their worship to them, as to statues of their gods (Strom. lib. i.). Pausanias, in his excellent survey of Greece, says, that in early times men worshipped rude stones, sharpened only at the top, for their gods; which Scaliger shows was the custom of the Phœnicians in particular (see Append. ad lib. de emend. Temp.). But when sculpture, and picture, and other ways of imagery, were brought to perfection, idolatry in proportion advanced; for images, as appears both from the Greek and Roman history, being the means to increase it, the more art and skill that were used to recommend and set these off, the more danger there was of men's being pleased with and seduced by them; for the unskilful multitude, seeing the sacred image of their prince, or some favourite benefactor, carved into all the members and organs of life so artificially, that to the sight it seemed to be a real and living person, were easily drawn, through the weakness of their understanding, and the finished beauty of the piece, to imagine that it was indeed animated, and to adore it as a living and powerful deity, such as was able to do them good or hurt, according to its own pleasure. Hence, says Philo, Moses with great prudence banished ἑωπαρίαν καὶ ἀνθρωπομορφίαν from the Hebrew commonwealth, as fearing the dangerous consequences which such artificial resemblances of nature might have upon a gross people, inclined to idolatry (Lib. de Gigantib.). The like observation may be made upon other images of the ancients, many of which were so contrived, as to help forward superstition, and to lead the ignorant into a higher opinion of the supposed deity. Of this sort were those, whose mechanism was so curious, that they seemed to hold immediate converse with heaven: thus in the image of Serapis at Alexandria, a little window was so framed by art, that the sun shone on the eyes, lips, and mouth of it; inasmuch, that the people believed it to hold communication with that deity, and to be inspired by it. No less artful was that device which Pliny mentions of an iron image, which was sustained with magnets, that the people might behold it with more veneration, and imagine it supported in the air by nothing but miracles. Dædalus, who brought sculpture to great perfection, and after his return from Egypt instructed the Grecian artificers to imitate in their statues the attitude of a person in action, or motion, contrived himself a Venus, which moved so naturally, that it was thought to have real life and sensation; but all the wonder lay in the quicksilver, or mercury, which that cunning artist put within the figure, to make it play; and so the good people were persuaded of the presence of the divinity, by the surprising motion of the figure. Nor was the singular diligence of the artificer employed about the image itself only, to give it the appearance of life and sense, but as much care was taken to make the idol-temple beautiful; for the more superb and magnificent this was, the greater and better did the god seem to the multitude, more easily allured through the beauty of the work. Thus Alexander, to solace the excess of grief for his Iliæstion, not only decreed him a temple, but promised uncommon rewards to Cleomenes, the overseer of his works, to finish it with the utmost nicety and exactness (Arrian. de Exped. Alex. lib. vii.).

Ver. 20. Took him now for a god, which a little before was but honoured as a man. Σέβασμα ἰδογισαντο. Σέβασμα is more generally taken for worship; but sometimes it signifies the thing, or being, that is worshipped. Thus we find it used, Acts xvii. 23, ἀνθερώπων τὰ σεβήματα ὑμῶν, which our translation renders, "beholding your devotions;" but the reading would be much better, "beholding your idols;" or, as the margin has it, beholding the gods you worship. Theophylact accordingly expounds it by δαίμονες, which Athens was notorious for worshipping.

Ver. 21. For men, serving either calamity or tyranny, did ascribe unto stones and stocks, &c. This is a short, but somewhat obscure rehearsal of the causes of idolatry, mentioned at large in the seven foregoing verses; that, concurrently with other reasons, it arose either from grief for the loss of some favourite person, whose memory, by an instance of mistaken tenderness, was endeavoured to be preserved; or from the uncontrollable will and authority of tyrants appointing worship and adoration to be paid to insensible statues; which was complied with generally out of a servile fear: but to good princes they voluntarily erected them, not as mere compliments to their vanity, but as testimonies of love and respect. St. Chrysostom's observation on the beginning of idolatry is very just: οὐτος εἰκόδολα- κρία τῶν ἀνθρώπων εἰσήλθεν, ὅτι μέρων τιμωμένων τῶν ζωντων, καὶ τῶν ἀποθανόντων οὐτως εἴματα προσκυνῆθη, νῦν πορεύει ἱκάρτας. Hom. 87, in Matt. where πορεία seems to be used in the sense of our author, (ver. 12).

Did ascribe unto stones and stocks the incommunicable name. i. e. Of God, as the margin rightly supplies: which title eminently, and by way of distinction from all other gods, belonged to the God of Israel, the one, absolute, and only true being. The Hebrews accordingly call God Hashem, i. e. the name; and from hence, no doubt, Ashima, an appellation of God, is derived. The critics likewise observe, that wherever the name, or the holy name, is found by itself or put absolutely, in the Mosiac writings, or elsewhere, it means God himself, or the "incommunicable name." And indeed the name of God cannot properly be communicated, or be common to him and some other being. For though names proper are given, we know, to the in-viduals of the same species, to distinguish them from each other; yet, God being singular in his kind, his name is as incommunicable as his essence. And thus St. Cyprian; Nec nomen Dei quæras; Deus nomen est illi. Illic vocabulis opus est, ubi propriis appellationum insignibus multitudinem dirimenda est; Deo qui solus est, Deus vocabulum totum est (De Idol. vanit.). And therefore, when Moses earnestly inquired after his name, he took the name of I am; implying, that he was the only one of his species, that there is none but God that truly is, and that all others were false gods, pretending to what they were not, and assuming a name which did not belong to them. Hence therefore we see the reason and peculiar sanctity of the Tetragrammaton; for other names of God being applicable to other things or persons, as Elohim to princes, &c. the name Jehovah, or Jave, or Jai, was not communicated to, or participated by, any other thing or being; wherefore God challenges this as his own peculiar name (Exod. iii. 14); and thus the ancient English translations, and the oriental versions, seem to understand it. But there is another sense likewise of the incommunicable name; viz. that great ineffable name which must not be communicated or mentioned. Josephus calls it, προσηγοριάν περί τῆς οὐ μὴ λέγεται λέγειν, i. e. "a name which it is unlawful to speak of." This the Jews were so tender of, and paid such a religious regard to, that the name Jehovah was among them ἀνεκβήντων, never to be uttered, unless once in a year by the high priest, on the great day of expiation; and hence he was said to be "a God without a name;" and thus he is described by some early writers, particularly by Justin Martyr, who calls him Θεὸς ὁ ἀόριστος (Apol. Secunda). And in this sense we may understand ἀμήνητα ῥήματα, 2 Cor. xii. 4, which are not so properly "unspeakable words," as our translation renders, as "words which ought not to be spoke;" and so ἀόριστον is used by Philo, De Somnii; or rather, to avoid the tautology in what follows, "words which God alone can utter;" and thus a learned writer explains them: Verba tantæ majestatis, ut homine majora, Deum autorem et prolocutorem arguerent (Witsii Miscell. sac. p. 25).

Ver. 22. Whereas they lived in the great war of ignorance, those so great plagues called they peace. Μεγάλη ζωὴν ἀγνοίας πόλεμον. Ἀγνοία here plainly refers to the words before, πλανάσθαι περί τὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ γνώσιν, "ignorance of the true God and his worship;" which being attended with the slaughter of children, obscene rites, adultery, murder, and other great evils and mischiefs, of which there is a long and black catalogue in the following verses, may in some sense be called the mother of war as well as superstition; and yet, as shocking as these vices were, these they called peace; i. e. they were pleased with them, and thought themselves happy in the most miserable condition, and under the greatest evils: Ils sont assez insensibles, pour regarder cet état comme un bonheur, says Calmet, Com. in loc. And their ignorance was as fatal, and their case as deplorable, as those who should esteem the calamities of a war a blessing. The expression in this verse is very singular, but Tacitus has one which very much resembles it, Jul. Agric. vit. cap. 30, where, speaking of the Romans, he says, that when they have destroyed all before them with fire and sword, they pretend to call all the injuries they have done by the false name of peace, ubi solitudinem fecerunt, pacem appellant.

Ver. 23. For whilst they slew their children in sacrifices, Some of the vices mentioned in this and the following verses were the very sacred rites of the heathen worship itself, as that inhuman and impious custom of offering their children in sacrifice to Moloch. Grotius says, that it was a custom among the Phœnicians for their kings, in times of great calamity, to sacrifice one of their sons, him especially whom they loved best (Annot. in Deut. xviii.). Silius Italicus confirms the same:

"Mors fuit in populis, quos convenit advena Dido, Poscere cæde Deos veniam, ac flagrantibus aris
(Infandum dictu) parvos imponere natos."

Philo mentions the same custom, ἔθος ἡ τοῖς παλαιστοῖς . . . τὸν ἡγαπημένον τῶν τέκνων εἰς σφαγὴν ἐπιβάδοναι, λήτρον τοῖς τιμωροῖς δαίμονι (see Lactant. lib. i. cap. 31. Plutarch. De Superstit. Minut. in Octav.). Nor was this unnatural rite of sacrificing their own children peculiar to barbarous nations; we likewise meet with instances of this cruelty among the Greeks and Romans, and even, by the palmist's account, among God's own people, Ps. cvi. 39 (see note on xii. 5, 6, where the subject is handled more at large).

Or used secret ceremonies. Κρύφια μυστήρια. They were also called ἀπόκρυφα σέμνοδα, ἱερὰ ἀόριστα, τελεταῖα μυστικά, and opertania sacra, which the οἱ μεμνημένοι were acquainted with only, and were concealed from all others; hence, in such writers as make mention of these rites, as Herodotus, Diodorus, Apuleius, all is mystery and darkness; such were the sacrifices of Ceres, Isis, Cybele, Proserpina, Venus, Priapus, Bacchus, and other impure deities, which were usually celebrated in the night, in groves, caverns, and secret places; and to such mysteries of iniquities practised among the heathen, St. Paul may be thought to allude, when he says, "That it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret" (Eph. v. 12). It appears, also, that they were initiated into the service of their idols by lewd and indecent ceremonies; the LXX. therefore very properly, in Hos. iv. 14, where these rites are referred to, call these idolaters by the sacrificial term, τετελεσμένοι, which the Chaldee paraphrase upon the place thus renders, Ipsi cum meretricibus societate se jungunt, et cum scorto comessantur et potant. Nay, which is still more shocking, there are instances, both in profane and sacred writings, of prostitutions even in the very temples themselves: thus Juvenal, —"Ad quas non Clodius aras?" (Sat. vi.)

And in a following satire there is the like charge,

"Quo non prostat femina templo?" (Sat. ix.)

The like may be inferred from the history of Paulina, who was debauched by Decius in the temple Isis, under the notion, and with the pleasing thought, of her lying with the god Anubis there (see Joseph. Antiq. lib. xviii. cap. 4. see also Amos ii. 8, which is by many understood in the like sense). But the account in 2 Macc. vi. 4, "That the temple was filled with riot and revelling by the gentiles, who dallied with harlots, and had to do with women within the circuit of the holy places," is so full, that no further proof seems necessary.

Or made revellings of strange rites, Ἐμμανεῖς ἐξάλλων θεσμῶν κύριον. The Geneva bible renders, "Or raging dissoluteness by strange rites." The passage seems to be wrong printed in our version: it should be, "used secret ceremonies or mad revellings of strange rites," i. e. Bacchanalian rites, such as Theodoret calls τὰ τῆς ἀσεβείας ὄργια; and Lactantius, more closely, works of madness, Quid de iis dicam qui abominandum, non libidinem, sed insaniam exercent (Institut. lib. vi. cap. 23). Κῶμος here is used in an impure sense, and means amorous revels, or unlawful gratifications; by means of which, as it follows in the next verse, they grieved others with adultery: and so, where mention is made, 2 Macc. vi. 4, before quoted, that the temple was filled, ἀσωτίας καὶ κύμων, it is explained after, by "dallying with harlots." In the same sense κύμων is used, Rom. xiii. 13. Gal. v. 21. 1 Pet. iv. 3, and by Theocritus, and the scholiasts on that poet, an impure person is styled κύμαστις; which is agreeable to the character of the god Comus, who, according to the ancients, is described to be "Dæmon amorum impudicorum inceptor" (see Philostrate. lib. i. De Imagin. Suidas in voce Κῶμος. Spencer, De Leg. Hebr. tom. i. p. 618). Instead of ἐξάλλων θεσμῶν, Dr. Mangey reads ἀλλοκότων θεσμῶν here, which seems indeed more expressive and proper (see his notes on Philo, vol. ii. De Abrahamo).

Ver. 25. So that there reigned in all men without exception blood, manslaughter. Our translation manifestly follows a copy which read πάντας, probably the Vatican; but the expression must be confined, though a very general one, to the idolaters only; for to fix such black crimes upon all men, without exception, is too extensive and unjust a charge; and if, as it is considered thus universally, carries with it a false and unwarrantable imputation: it must, therefore, have the same limited sense as πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, Acts xiv. 16, which should not be rendered "all nations," as our translation has it; but the meaning is, and the rendering should be, "That in times past God suffered all the heathen, as distinguished from others, to walk in their own ways;" and so πάντες here must imply only the heathen idolaters, who were the persons guilty of these detestable vices. But the Alexandrian manuscript has another and better reading, πάντα δ' ἐτίμιξ' ἔχει, αἷμα καὶ φόβος, "all things or rather crimes, are confounded;" i. e. all sorts of sins are promiscuously committed by these idolaters, which are the sad consequences of idol-worship. This is the sense of Junius and Calmet, and is confirmed by the Vulgate and all the ancient versions, and is indeed to be preferred, as it stands clear of the former objection.

Blood, manslaughter. Αἷμα καὶ φόβος. I think our translation should rather have rendered αἷμα by manslaughter than φόβος, which undoubtedly means murder, and ought so to have been expressed. Αἷμα, in the sense of manslaughter, is used Deut. xvii. 8, where mention is made of a matter in dispute between blood and blood, ἀναιέουσιν αἷμα αἵματος; where one of them must mean casual murder, and both together answer to αἷμα καὶ φόνος here, and to דָּם דָּם, and דָּמִין damin in the Hebrew, i. e. "blood and bloods," or "bloodshed and murder;" that דָּם in the singular number, takes in all manslaughter, in battle, tumults, casualties, &c. and רָמִים "treacherous, wilful, and insidious murders," and so implies the strongest expression of guilt (see Pagninus' Thesaurus, and Kircher's Concordance, in voce דָּם); and thus, in Gen. iv. 10, where Abel's murder is mentioned, which was undoubtedly a wilful murder, it is expressed in the plural, according to the Hebrew. We have in Eccclus. xl. 9. θάνατος καὶ αἷμα, "death and bloodshed;" where αἷμα cannot mean murder, because it is a punishment inflicted by God, as by the sword; so in Ezek. v. 17, xxviii. 23. xxxviii. 22, θάνατος καὶ αἷμα is rendered "pestilence and blood;" where αἷμα signifies any unusual sort of death rather than murder.

Dissimulation.] ἄδωδ. This, I think, would be better rendered deceit or cheating, which is its more usual acceptation; and so it is taken in the description of such idolaters, Rom. i. 29. This sense likewise is more agreeable to the context. By the Syriac interpreters it is rendered, fraude, and by Calmet, la tromperie.

Corruption, unfaithfulness.] Φθορὰ, ἀπιστία. We are not to understand φθορὰ of corruption of manners in general, nor yet of corruption by lust in particular; but of such practices, probably bribery, in some, as induced others to unfaithfulness, or breach of trust, which is the ἀπιστία that follows, and is used for perfidia; and in this sense the Syriac and Arabic versions, with Junius, agree, rendering the words by corruptela and perfidia; which latter is certainly a more proper word than infidelities, which the Vulgate uses (see Rom. i. 31).

Ver. 26. Disquieting of good men.] Θόρυβος ἀγαθῶν. It may as well signify, according to the present pointing of the Greek, "confounding of good things," bonarum rerum confusio; and so some interpreters do indeed expound it. According to the sense of our version, and of almost all the commentators, these idolaters were not only ἀγδάλαιοι, "despisers of those that were good" (2 Tim. iii. 3), but their opposers and persecutors: but I question the propriety of this rendering; for I do not well understand how θόρυβος ἀγαθῶν can signify anything, but a crowd or tumult of good people, as θόρυβος τοῦ λαοῦ (Mark xiv. 2) means an uproar of people in general; or how it can be rendered with our translators, "disquieting of good men." Would not the construction be better, if these three words ἀγαθῶν χάριτος ἀμνηστία were taken together, as they stand by themselves in the same stiche in the Alex. MS. and θόρυβος be rendered by itself? It will be sufficiently distinguished from ταραχος, which goes before, as it is of stronger signification and greater force. Ταραχος, properly means, "disturbance, strife, stir;" ταραχος οὐκ ὀλίγος (Acts xi. 18), "no small stir among the soldiers;" but θόρυβος is properly "tumults, riots, insurrections," which are of a more public and dangerous nature, and it may be considered as the conclusion of that climax. And, indeed, the bible commonly called St. Jerome's actually so distinguishes, and renders θόρυβος by itself, tumultus: bonorum Dei immemoratio, i. e. "forgetfulness of God's benefits," or of the good things received from the grace and kindness of God; which is likewise Tirinus' interpretation of χάριτος. But, according to our version, it means no more than ingratitude; which is scarce of consequence enough to be inserted in the midst of so black a catalogue.

Defiling of souls.] Ψυχῶν μiasμός. According to the rendering of all the English versions, no particular vice seems denoted hereby; it may be equally predicated of every crime here enumerated, that, as a sin, it is a defiling of the soul. I would therefore understand ψυχῶν in the complex sense, as taking in the whole man, body as well as soul; in which sense it often occurs in scripture; and, as the expression is plural, it may be supposed to include the sin of more than one person, some heinous offence, in which persons, their bodies, as well as souls, were jointly concerned: and, according to the character of such idolaters, and as it stands connected with other like shocking vices, sodomy seems most probably to be meant; especially as γενέσας ἐν ἀλλαγῇ, and ἀεὶ λυγία, both which our version seems to understand of that particular vice, are capable of another and very consistent sense. But if this explanation of ψυχῶν be not satisfactory, may we not then suppose σαρκῶν μiasμός to be the true reading, and to denote that particular species of uncleanness? St. Jude has the same expression, and, as it seems, upon the like occasion of filthiness. That σαρκῶν is often used plurally, see Job ii. 5. Wisdom xii. 5. Apoc. iv. 15. xix. 18. 21. Or, lastly, if I may be indulged one conjecture more, may not ψυχῶν μiasμός be thought agreeable to this place? i. e. defiling of natures, or sexes, by bestial or unnatural mixtures; see Lev. xviii. where all the abominable practices here mentioned are forbidden, and the idolatrous Canaanites, on that account, said to be drove out. I shall only add, that persons guilty of such uncleanness, as if it did utterly depose them from their manhood, and debase their very nature, are in scripture called by the name of dogs (Apocai. xxii. 15).

Changing of kind.] Γενέσας ἐν ἀλλαγῇ. Our translators seem to have read γενέσας ἐν ἀλλαγῇ; but Coverdale's and the other ancient versions understand by it, "changing of birth," i. e. uncertainty of legitimate issue: for, says Calmet, where marriages are defiled, and adulteries frequent, there must be great confusion in the birth of children, l'incertitude de la naissance; and spurious and doubtful ones will often be brought into families. The Vulgate reads, nativitatibus immutatis; and the Arabic more clearly, partus commutatio; and Badwell, prolis suppositio et adulteratio; expressions all denoting spurious or supposititious children. Grotius is singular in expounding it of sodomy. The learned Selden proposes it as a conjecture, whether γενέσας ἐν ἀλλαγῇ may not relate to some idolatrous rite, particularly the change of the sex (which is the marginal reading), by the woman assuming the habit and appearance of a man, and the man of a woman, which was customary in the worship of the Assyrian Venus, or Astarte. According to Julius Firmicus, the priests of that goddess must not otherwise officiate: Nisi effeminent vultum, et virilem sexum ornatu muliebri dederent (De errore Prof. Relig. cap. 4). And in this sense Selden expounds Deut. xxii. 5, for the mere exchange of habit was not in itself so faulty; but being an idolatrous rite, as such, it was forbidden, and is therefore called an abomination; see Selden, Syntag. ii. cap. 4, who quotes Maimonides, as explaining the precept in the same manner, "That the counterfeiting the sex was not so much forbidden, as the worship of idols;" and particularly, ipsa Veneris et masculæ et feminae sacra (More Nevoeh. cap. 38. p. 3).

Disorder in marriages.] Ἰσχυὸν ἀταξία. This does not mean any indecency committed by either of the married parties, for that is contained in adultery, which is next mentioned, but incestuous marriages, which are mentioned at large, and forbidden, Lev. xviii. The Vulgate renders, nuptiarum inconstantia, by which it seems to understand unsettled marriages, which were dissolved at pleasure.

And shameless uncleanness.] Ἀεὶ λυγία. Not any particular act or species of uncleanness is here meant, but this word includes all the kinds and sorts of it; and thus Grotius explains it, omne lascivie genus (Annot. ad Gal. cap. v. 19). For when men are come to such a pitch of wickedness and degeneracy as to worship such gods, or evil spirits, as delight in uncleanness, and whose rites are so infamous and shocking as to be even a reproach to human nature; such a religion must of course corrupt their lives, and produce those scandalous disorders and vile affections, which are here enumerated. We have the like melancholy account of the heathen vices, Rom. i. 23, 24, which the apostle charges upon their idolatry, as the consequences and effects of it; for God abandoned them, who had displeased him so much by idol-worship, to those unnatural lusts, called there πάθη ἀνιμιίας, as being the greatest abuse of the species, and a dishonour to the human nature. That such instances of lust and uncleanness, as are here mentioned, were practised frequently by the heathen in their sacred rites, see Lev. xviii. 24. 1 Kings xiv. 24. xv. 12. 2 Kings xxiii. 7. 1 Pet. iv. 3. Hence πλεονεξία, which the fathers generally interpret to signify an action of lust, is in some of St. Paul's epistles called idolatry itself. Such actions of lust were also among the Gnostics in their worship (Epiphani. Hæres. xvi.). And instances are still more flagrant in profane authors.

Ver. 27. For the worshipping of idols not to be named] The Jews were forbidden to make mention of the names of the heathen idols, Exod. xxiii. 13, or idols of the people, as the Chaldee paraphrase expresses it; which the Vulgate explains by, per nomen externorum Deorum non jurabitis, neque audietur ex ore vestro; which the psalmist likewise refers to, and resolves against; "Their drink-offerings of blood will I not offer, neither make mention of their names within my lips" (Ps. xvi. 5). And this the Israelites religiously observed: for they either changed the name of the idol, and of the places dedicated to its worship, or else substituted such a word as had some affinity with the true name, but withal expressed their contempt and abhorrence of it: thus they called Baal, Bosheth, i. e. shame (Hos. ix. 10). And when the mount of Olives was defiled with idolatry, they called it the "Mount of Corruption" (2 Kings xxiii. 13), changing the Hebrew name: and Beth-el, which signifies the "house of God," when it came to be the seat of idolatry, was called Beth-aven, i. e. "the house of vanity" (Hos. iv. 15. x. 5). In like manner they changed Beelzebub into Beelzebul, i. e. Dominus Stercoreus, by way of contempt and derision: and that grand impostor Barchochab, who would have passed for the Messiah in the reign of Trajan, they called, says Selden, Barchozibani, i. e. filium mendacii (Syntag. ii. cap. 6, where more instances of this occur). And, as the Jews were not to mention the names of the heathen idols, or strange gods, so neither might they cause to swear by them (Josh. xxiii. 7). Maimonides says, that, by the Hebrew canons, it was forbidden to make an infidel swear by his god, or even to mention the name thereof (De Idol.).

For the worshipping of idols—is the beginning, the cause, and the end, of all evil.] Idolatry is, in the opinion of Tertullian, the principal crime of mankind, the chief guilt of the world, the total cause of God's judgments and displeasure; for thus he begins his book, De Idolatria: "Principale crimen generis humani, summus sæculi reatus, tota causa iudicii idolatria;" intimating hereby, that it is a kind of mother-sin, containing in it all other evils on which the Judge of the world passeth condemnation (Tennison on Idol. p. 39). Lactantius goeth still higher in his censure of it, calling it the inexpressible wickedness (Instit. lib. i. cap. 18). But, of all others, Gregory Nazianzen comes nearest this writer in his sentiments upon the guilt of idolatry; for he calleth it, ἡ ἀρχὴ καὶ πρῶτον τῶν κακῶν, "the beginning and end of all evil" (Orat. xxxviii. de Idol.); which are the very words of our author.

Ver. 28. For either they are mad when they be merry.] i. e. When they dance before the idol, or rejoice at the idol-feast; in both which senses the verb εὐφράνεται, here used, frequently occurs (see Acts vii. 41); or it may refer to the mad howlings in their orgia, or Bacchanalian feasts, or to the drunkenness and extravagance commonly attending them, when women ran about like so many furies, their heads wreathed about with snakes, wildly brandishing their thyrsus, and tearing the flesh even of living animals to pieces with their teeth. Julius Firmicus thus describes these revels: Illic [in Orgiis] inter ebrias puellas, et vinolentos senes, cum scelerum pompa præcederet, alter nigro amictu teter, alter ostenso angue terribilis, alter cruentos ore, dum viva pecoris membra discerpit (De Errore Prof. Relig.) That ὠμολογία, or "eating of raw flesh," and particularly the entrails of the victims, was customary at these feasts, see 2 Macc. vi. 7, where, in the description of the abominable rites of Bacchus, σπλαγχνισμός is expressly mentioned, called also, παράνομος σπλαγχνισμός (ver. 21).

Or else lightly forswear themselves.] i. e. Without any scruple: which is not to be wondered at; for an oath can have no tie upon, or sacred authority among, such as are neither convinced of the truth of their religion, nor influenced by the power of it, nor affected by any awe or expectation of punishment. Innumerable almost are the instances which may be produced of the perjury of the heathens; as that of Antiochus the younger, who, notwithstanding the oath made to the people of Israel, yet overthrew the wall of Zion (1 Macc. vi. 62). And part of the charge given by Judas Maccabeus to his men, before his final engagement with Nicanor, was to show the falsehood of the heathen, and their breach of oaths (2 Macc. xv. 10). To this sin of perjury, so frequent among the heathen, Spencer and other learned men think the psalmist alludes, Ps. cxliv. 7, 8, "Deliver me from the hand of the strange children, whose mouth talketh of vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of iniquity;" i. e. from such of the heathen as devise lies, and falsely swear to them, by lifting up dextra falsitatis, "the hand of deceit" (see also Ovid. Fast. lib. v. ver. 681).

Ver. 29. Inasmuch as their trust is in idols, which have no life; though they swear falsely, yet they look not to be hurt.] The like observation is made upon idols in the epistle of Jeremy; "Though a man make a vow unto them, and keep it not, they will not require it" (ver. 35). As the gods and idols they swore by had neither life nor power, so the heathens feared not any punishment from them for any breach of faith, as knowing they were ignorant of what passed, and were secure from their ever hurting them. Minucius, therefore, very wittily sneers the heathens on this account, when he says, Tutius his per Jovis, genium perjurare quam Cæsaris: for their emperors and magistrates they stood in awe of, being sensible they would punish them for their perjuries; but their idols being res nihili, "mere nothings," their oaths likewise were thought to be of no consequence: hence they made a jest of the obligation or sacredness of them; not unlike those Greeks of whom the orator speaks, quibus iurandum jocus, et testimonium ludus (Cic. pro Flac.): or those whom Juvenal describes, intrepidos altaria tangere, approaching the altars boldly, without any sense of fear, without any conscience of an oath. The heathens had likewise this farther reason to promise themselves impunity in the commission of many of their crimes—that herein they imitated their deities, and were warranted by their example. It is therefore a very just observation of St. Austin, that Jupiter was to no purpose armed with thunder to punish guilty mortals, which must be useless and imaginary, unless he himself had been better than his offending creatures (Confess. lib. i. cap. 16).

Ver. 30. Howbeit, for both causes shall they be justly punished:] Ἀμφότερα τὰ αἴτια ὑπερδικαιοῦν τὰ δίκαια. The true literal rendering of this is, utraque illos insequentur jura; where jura may either mean reasons or indictments, or vengeance and punishment. In the first sense, Demosthenes uses τὰ δίκαια; in the latter sense Horace uses jura; forsan debita jura, superbe, te maneat ipsum (Carm. lib. i. od. 28). Dr. Grabe seems not sensible of this, and flings τὰ δίκαια, which is the reading likewise of the Alex. MS. as a corrupt one, into the margin, substituting τὰ δόγματα in its place. From the double punishment here said to pursue the idolater, one may infer, that the nothingness of the idol will not, as has been pretended, excuse the worshipper. For though an idol be formally nothing of that which it is taken for, and nothing materially but a lifeless piece of wood or stone, yet relatively an idol is something; and an oath by it, or worship and sacrifice offered to it, is not offered to nothing, but to demons, who in and by these idols imposed upon the heathen through their oracular delusions.

Because they thought not well of God, giving heed unto idols.] Not unlike is that of St. Paul, Rom. i. 25, where speaking of the gentile idolaters, he says, that "they worshipped the creature more than the Creator," παρὰ τὴν κτίσιν, i. e. they worshipped the creature jointly and together with the Creator; or rather, as the original words will bear, they worshipped the creature contrary to, and in defiance of the right of the Creator; as by παρὰ φύσιν, in the next verse, is meant a practice contrary to the right and usage of nature; for St. Paul cannot be understood as if he blamed the gentiles for being more given to the service of the creature than of the Creator (for one single act of religious worship designedly performed to a creature will make a man an idolater), nor can he be thought to mean, that they would be more excusable, if they had worshipped both equally; but he blames them for giving that honour to other things, or beings, which is his peculiar right, and belongs to him solely, and exclusively of all creatures.

Despising holiness.] Καραφρονήσαντες δεισιφροσύνης. The Vulgate renders, in idolo contentmentes justitiam, applying ἐν δόλῳ to the last sentence. St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, reads very particularly, in idolo contentmentes justitiam. All the versions agree in rendering δεισιφροσύνης either by justitia or veritas, applying it to that branch of righteousness which consists in the observance of truth, faith, promises, oaths, &c. which one man has a right to expect from another. And, therefore, Dr. Magney, with great judgment, conjectures, that the true reading here is, ισόφροσύνης, which seems the more probable, as nothing is more common, than the exchange of δεισιφροσύνης and ισόφροσύνης and vice versa (see notes in Philo, De Decem Orac.).

Ver. 31. For it is not the power of them by whom they swear: but it is the just vengeance of (leg. against) sinners, that punisheth always the offence of the ungodly.] Our version is somewhat obscure; but the meaning is, that idolaters and false swearers, who are here called the ungodly, whose offence is by the Vulgate rendered prævaricatio, shall certainly be punished; yet not by any act or power of their idols, or false gods, who can take no cognizance of perjury or falsehood; but by the just vengeance of an almighty God, the revenger of injustice, and of strange and false worship: that the punishment of perjured persons, when it has happened (which the superstitious pagans fondly attributed to the power and resentment of their false gods; see Juv. Sat. viii.), was rather to be ascribed to the vengeance of the only true God. St. Austin therefore rightly states the difference, non te audit lapis loquentem, sed punit Deus fallentem.

CHAP. XV.

ARGUMENT.—The author praises God for preserving his pecculum, or chosen people, from the sin of idolatry, with which all other nations were infected. He enlarges upon the folly of idolaters, and the invective is carried on against such as make idols; particularly images made of clay are condemned as an instance of greater folly, and the maker of them less excusable, than of the graven ones in the former chapter; inasmuch as himself and work are both a composition of clay, and are resolvable into dust; and that the very attempt to make a deity of such perishing materials, and by a hand itself frail and mortal, is little less than a contradiction; that they are contemptible, and nothing worth, as having neither life, sense, nor motion, in common with other images; but are more despicable on account of the earth they are made of, which speaks its own decay. The chapter concludes with the ridiculous and wicked worship of hurtful and venomous beasts, such as created even dread and horror from their very form and appearance.

Ver. 1. But thou, O God, art—true, i. e. The true God, a being that necessarily exists; whereas the existence of idols is only imaginary: or the meaning may be,—that thy word is true, and thy miracles real; but the oracles of demons are equivocating, and their works lying wonders.

Ver. 2. For if we sin, we are thine, knowing thy power : The whole verse is very obscurely expressed; the sense of this passage seems to be,—if we sin, we are in the hand of God, and under the power of his vengeance, and shall feel the effects of it. At the end of the former chapter, the author says, that the heathens perjured themselves without any scruple, because they did not fear, or stand in awe of, the vengeance of their dumb idols or blind deities. As for us, says he, who have the honour to be called thy chosen people, and have so many proofs of thy existence and infinite power, we are convinced, that if we have the misfortune to offend thee, thou wilt deal with us according to our sinful works, and make us experience the effects of thine anger (Calmet in loc.). Or it may be understood like Isaiah lxiii. 16, “Doubtless thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not;” i. e. our hope, even when we are sinners, is in our relation to thee. So in all the other places of scripture, where good men, as Moses, David, Ezra, Daniel, lament the sins of the Israelites, and supplicate for them, this consideration is more especially urged, that they are (even in their iniquities and transgressions) his peculiar people.

But we will not sin, knowing that we are accounted thine. i. e. If we continue faithful, and do not sin against thee, thou wilt reckon us in the number of thy children, and fill us with mercy and loving-kindness. All the ancient English versions, it is observable, read in the present tense: thus Coverdale’s; “If we sin not, then are we sure that thou regardest us;” and the Arabic is in like manner, Si minime peccemus, in tuos tuamque proprietatem nos reputari novimus. The comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal upon this whole verse is short and clear; “If we sin, we are in the hands of God, as his enemies; if we sin not, we are in his hands as his friends;” which is followed by this useful reflection; “How careful therefore should we be to pursue every thing that may make God our friend, and to avoid whatever may make him our enemy, because there is no escape from his sovereign hand, which is all-powerful either to save or to destroy!” St. Austin quotes this very passage, and draws the like inference; Quis dignè cogitans inhabitationem apud Deum, non enitatur ita vivere, ut tali habitationi congruat (lib. de fid. et oper.)? There is also another sense of this place, which seems more agreeable to the Greek, viz. We will not sin, because we know that we are in the number of thy children, and that thou regardest us as thine own peculium; from this consideration and persuasion, and from a more generous motive than that of a servile fear, we will be careful how we offend thee at any time, and forfeit thy love and regard for us.—The predestinarians therefore grossly abuse this passage, when they urge it in favour of absolute election; as if the sense of the place was, We shall not sin, knowing that we are thy chosen. But there is no authority from any of the versions for such a conceited interpretation; nor does human frailty permit it, or the scripture make any man a vessel of mercy absolutely and unconditionally.

Ver. 3. For to know thee is perfect righteousness: yea, to know thy power is the root of immortality. By knowing God, is not meant a barren knowledge, purely speculative; but a practical knowledge, or such as worketh by love, and is known by its fruits, in which consists perfect righteousness: and as the commission of sin is the cause of corruption and misery, so the knowledge of God’s power, and that dread and fear of its effects, which keeps men from sinning, may properly be said to be the root of immortality; as such a well-grounded faith leads to holiness, from whence, as from its true source, happiness is to be expected.

Ver. 4. For neither did the mischievous inventions of men deceive us, nor an image. It appears from this verse, as well as other particulars in this book, that king Solomon was not the author of it, however dignified with his name; for, whether we understand us, to mean Solomon himself, which is not an unusual manner of expression, when applied to or spoken by kings, or whether we understand it of the people of the Jews in his time, what is mentioned here does not suit with the morals and character of him or his people. For it is certain, that Solomon revolted to idolatry, and that this otherwise great prince, contrary to the caution given, Exod. xxxiv. 16, took him wives of the Moabites and Ammonites, and other strange women, who turned his heart after other gods. And it seems highly probable, by what is mentioned, 1 Kings xi. 33, that numbers of the people followed his example in worshipping “Ashtoreth, the goddess of the Zidonians; Chemosh, the god of the Moabites; and Milcom, the god of the children of Ammon.” The Jews, indeed, after the captivity, had the good fortune to keep themselves pure from the abominations of the heathens; and from hence one may conclude that this writer lived after the captivity; for before that time he could not say this with any truth or confidence, when idolatry was so common both in Israel and Judah.

Nor an image spotted with divers colours, the painter’s fruitless labour; From hence Grotius concludes the author of this book to be an Alexandrian Jew; for they, following the exposition which the LXX. make of the decalogue (supposed likewise to be Alexandrian Jews; see Hody de Bibl. text. orig.) understand οὐκ ἐπὶ παντὶ εἰκόνα in the most extensive sense; and include pictures, as well as images and statues, under the prohibition in the second commandment (see Grot. in Exod. xx). And Philo understands the words in the same sense, lib. De Giganti, and the like notion occurs in his piece De Legatione. It is observable likewise, that a painter here is called σκιαγράφος, i. e. “a drawer of shadows.” Calmet observes from Pliny (lib. xxxv.), that there was no painter so early as the time of the Trojan war; that its beginning was rude and accidental, found out at Corinth, by tracing with a pencil the shade which a man’s body cast upon the wall (Com. in loc.). This was its original, at first very simple, without any colours, diversity, or mixture; without any of that variety, boldness, or life; without that contrast, or pleasing emulation between art and nature; in a word, without that je ne sçai quoy, which is so much admired in complete and finished pieces; which improvement the author seems to mention as a probable inducement to idolatry.

Ver. 5. The sight whereof enticeth fools to lust after it. Our translators seem to have made use of a copy which read, εἰς ὅπερ ἐλπίσται which is the reading of the Alexandrian MS. but the most common reading is that to which our margin refers, εἰς ὅθεν ἐλπίσται. Dr. Grabe, instead of ἄφρονι reads ἄφρονι, in the singular number; as the Vulgate does insensato; and would not ποθυντ suit this emendation better than ποθῶν τε, which is the common reading of the next sentence? By lust, here mentioned, probably is meant that filthy lewdness which the demon, that resided in the idol, often raised in the worshipper towards the image itself: for, that very great and scandalous indecencies were practised, not only before, but even to the very statues themselves, is notorious from Pliny and Arnobius. Thus the latter: Pygmalionem, regem Cypri, simulacrum Veneris adumbrasse et fecminam, soliumque dementem, tanquam si uxoria res esset, sublevato in lectulum numine copularier amplexibus (lib. vi. cont. Gentes). And indeed the word ἡρεῖς will warrant this interpretation; for in such an impure sense it is often taken, particularly Rom. i. 27, where the vices of the idolatrous heathen are enumerated. “We may hence see the danger, and condemn the vicious taste of pictures, or statues, represented naked, and in indecent postures, which (says Calmet) raise loose ideas in weak and unguarded minds, and more so in tempers already corrupted and depraved” (Com. in loc.).

Ver. 7. The potter tempering soft earth, fashioneth every vessel with much labour for our service; yea, of the same clay he maketh both the vessels that serve for clean uses, and also all such as serve to the contrary. Καὶ γὰρ κεραμεὺς ὑπάλιν γλῆν ἑλίσσων ἐπιμοχθον, πλάσσει πρὸς ὑπηρεσίαν ἡδὼν ἱκανοῦν. I think the reading would be better thus: Καὶ γὰρ κεραμεὺς ὑπάλιν γλῆν ἑλίσσων, ἐπιμόχθων πλάσσει κ. τ. λ. This is the pointing of the Vulgate, which also reads laboriose: and indeed labour is more required here, than in the first instance. The meaning of the whole verse is, “Such images in particular are most ridiculous, as are made by the plasterer or potter out of clay; which, though very ancient, and probably before those of stone and metal (see Principes de la Sculpture, lib. ii. cap. 1, for as all arts had but rude and weak beginnings, so there is less difficulty to believe, that images of earth and clay were the most early), yet upon account of the meanness of the materials, and because the same lump of clay is often applied to base and dishonourable uses, are therefore the most despicable. And though in general the potter is the best judge of what comes properly under his own art and way of business, and knows what is most suitable to each design, and in the management of the same lump of clay has it in his power to what uses he will employ it; yet he never shows his own skill less, or the wretchedness of such an idol more, than when, from a parcel of common earth, which serves for the meanest uses, and often for vessels of dishonour, he attempts to make a Jupiter or an Apollo."

Ver. 8. A vain god] Idols are generally called vanities in the prophetic writings, and by the LXX, as frequently translated μάρνα. In Hebrew they are called elilim, which signifies, 1. things nothing worth, or which have no existence, רַם מִן הָאֵרָצָה, "things that are not," as they are called in the additions to the book of Esther (xiv. 11), Dicuntur elilim, says Mercer, a nihilitate, quasi nihil idola sint (Com. in Job xiii. 4). St. Paul confirms the same, when he says, that "an idol is nothing in the world" (1 Cor. vii. 4). Idols are, 2. called elilim, as being al elim, not gods, without power or strength (Lev. xix. 4. Ps. xevi. 5), whereas Elim and Elohim are Gods of strength (see Drus. observ. sac. lib. xvi.). 3. Idols are called elilim, from the radix ala, because they are abominable and accursed things. By the LXX, they are also styled τὰ ψευδῆ, mendacia, Amos ii. 4. Isa. xxviii. 15. Jer. xvi. 19, and in very many passages of the Apocalypse, Mr. Mede observes, idolaters and liars are synonymous (b. v. chap. 11).

When his life which was lent him shall be demanded.] Τὸ τῆς ψυχῆς ἀπαιτηθεὶς χρόνος. Phædrus thus expresses the like thought, Cum mors vicina flagitabit debitum. Life is represented in the same manner as a debt by many of the ancients; thus Plato, ἡ τε ἡμέκτα καὶ τὸ χρέος, vita etiam est debitum. Tully has a very remarkable expression upon the occasion, Dederunt [Dii] vitam tanquam pecuniam, nullā præsistutā die (Tusc. Quæst. lib. i.). Thus Seneca, speaking of the wise man, says, Vivit commodatus sibi, repositibus sine tristitia redditurus (De tranquill. animi, cap. 11). Hence the phrase, "animam reddere," to die. We meet with the like thought in Philo; see also Joseph. Antiq. lib. vii. cap. 15. lib. viii. cap. 12. Epict. lib. iii. cap. 13. Luke xii. 20, where the same expression is used and on the like occasion ταύτην νεκρὴν τὴν ψυχὴν σου ἀπαρτύνου ἀπό σου.

Ver. 9. Notwithstanding his care is, not that he shall have much labour, nor that his life is short; but that he shall excel goldsmiths . . . and counteth it his glory to make counterfeit things.] There is another sense of these words which the Greek will admit of; i. e. he has no concern or care upon him, lest he should be sick, or die, οὐτὶ μέλει κάμνειν, which is the marginal reading; and that at best his life is but short, but his whole contest and aim is for glory, and to carry the prize from all competitors, even the most celebrated in other arts; contending either for the precedence of the plastic art, above that of sculpture, &c. as being the mother-art, "mater statuarie, sculpturæ et cœlaturæ" (see Steph. Dict. Hstor. in voce Præiteles), or that his own excellence exceeds or equals the best performances in metal; but his ambition herein is faulty, for he ought to consider this material difference,—that not only his own life is short and uncertain, but that the materials of his counterfeit things, i. e. his earthen false gods (and such Varro assures us were common even in the city of Rome; see Pliny, xxxv. 12.) are mouldering and brittle; whereas the other artificers here mentioned, whether goldsmiths, or workers in brass, make their deities of what is more solid and durable, and do not descend to the same instances of meanness as to their matter. Though the worship of such gods as come out of the smith's furnace, or are fashioned by the anvil and hammer, is not here the more commended upon account of the value or strength of the materials, idolatry in every shape being, according to Arnobius, who was once guilty of it, a degree of madness (Lib. i. cont. Gent.).

Ver. 11. Forasmuch as he knew not his Maker, and him that inspired into him an active soul.] St. Chrysostom has the like comparison and observation, τησοῦ μὲν καὶ κεραμῆος οὐσία μία, κ. τ. λ. "The clay and the potter are of the same nature; the potter indeed excels the clay in beauty and dignity; but it is not owing to any difference of nature, but to the wisdom and appointment of his Maker" (De incompreh. Dei, nat. hom. 27). His obligation in particular therefore to God stands confessed, who made him what he is, gave him superior excellence, and animated him above that senseless mass which he abuses, by inspiring into him an active soul; animam quæ operatur, says the Vulgate; "that very soul by which he works," according to Coverdale's version; and Calmet understands it in the same sense, cette même ame par laquelle il travaille, a soul so active in its operations, that it may be in general affirmed to be the principle of all the designs, inventions, and actions, of the best workmen, and most experienced artists.

Ver. 12. But they counted our life a pastime, and our time here a market for gain:] i. e. says Calmet, such persons of unlawful occupations seem to imagine life to be either a farce, or comedy for diversion, or a fair and market for advantage: the fathers very commonly make use of the first simile, representing life as a comedy, in which every man must bear his part, and should endeavour to acquit himself with applause and satisfaction; but in a sense quite different from that of libertines, who indeed make life, and what is serious and useful in it, a farce; and, by proposing mere diversion and sinful pleasures as the ultimatum of their happiness, make a ridiculous figure upon the stage of life, and their exit is as contemptible. There are others who consider life as a great market for gain, who are only intent upon amassing riches without considering the lawfulness of their callings, or the means they make use of for obtaining them; who care not how they are employed, whether it be in making earthen deities, or silver shrines for some Diana, provided it "may bring no small gain unto the craftsmen;" as if their maxim was that mentioned in Horace,

"Ut facias rem,
Si possis, recte; si non, quocunque modo rem."
(Epist. lib. i. epist. 1).

Which cannot be better translated than as it stands in our version, "We must be getting every way, though it be by evil means." St. Chrysostom's reflection upon the mistaken conduct of mankind is very just: "Our life and our employments are like the pastimes of children: like them we make a serious affair of laying up trifles, building houses, which tumble suddenly; and should they continue any long time, would be of no great service to us, as we must leave them, and what we have heaped together will not follow us into the other world."

Ver. 14. And all the enemies of thy people, that hold them in subjection.] Καταδυναστεύοντες αὐτοὺς, which seems to imply more than holding them in subjection; it means oppressing them, and abusing their power over them. Accordingly Junius renders, qui potentia in ipsum abutuntur. From hence likewise an argument may be drawn, that Solomon was not the author of this book, because what is mentioned here of the Israelites being held in subjection, and oppressed by their enemies, does not agree with the happy and prosperous times of Solomon (see 1 Kings iv. 20, 21, 24, 25). If, therefore, the Jews were in the low and oppressed state here mentioned, and were not so in the time of Solomon, it follows, by an easy consequence, that this book was not written by him, nor in his time. This probably relates to the condition of the Jews after their return from the captivity, when this writer seems to have lived.

Are most foolish, and are more miserable than very babes.] As being idolaters; for that children, through inexperience and weakness of judgment, may often mistake images or statues for real persons, is no wonder; since sometimes art has arrived to such a happy imitation of nature, that even grown persons at first sight, at a distance, have mistaken them for life. Hence those expressions in the poets, vivide marmore vultus, et spirantia æra. And hence probably the fable of Pygmalion's love of a favourite statue. Lactantius, producing those verses of Lucilius,

— "Pueri infantes credunt signa omnia athena Vivere, et esse homines,"— observes, like this writer, that such as worship idols are weaker than children, "illi enim simulacra homines putant, hi Deos."

Ver. 15. For they counted all the idols of the heathens to be gods: which neither have the use of eyes to see,] i. e. They cannot observe the behaviour and devotion wherewith their votaries look up to them, and prostrate themselves before them. The imperfection of idols is described in like manner, Ps. cxv. 5—7. cxxxv. 16, 17, which this writer seems to have copied. Nor can we better expound that controverted passage, 2 Sam. v. 6. 8, than of David's ridiculing the idols of the Jebusites, or certain brazen images and statues of those heathen divinities in which they confided, calling them "the lame and the blind," by way of derision, supposed indeed by them to be the divine guards of the fort, the talismanical protectors of it (see Gregory's Notes and Observat. p. 33).

Nor noses to draw breath, nor ears to hear,] They have not the faculty of respiration, though necessary to the very being of life; and for the same reason the offering incense and sweet odours to them is fruitless, since they are insensible of the smell of them, and of the respect intended by them. It is equally vain to put up prayers and supplications to them; for, as appears from the instance of the worshippers of Baal, though they cry aloud to their false gods, from morning even until noon, "there shall be no voice, nor any that will answer" (1 Kings xviii. 26). Philo sneers such worshippers, whom he calls, homines deplo-ratæ amentie, in smart, but pleasant terms; Heus vos viri egregii, vortorum summa, et felicitatis finis est, reddi Deo similes; orate igitur ut similes fiat vestris statuis, non videntes oculis, non audientes auribus, et summa felicitate fruemini.

Nor fingers of hands to handle; and as for their feet, they are slow to go.] And though they are often represented to their worshippers with thunderbolts in their hands, and made to appear terrible with daggers, and other instruments of vengeance, yet have they no use of them, nor do the wicked experience any harm or punishment from them. Their feet too are equally useless, ἀργαί πρὸς ἐπιβῆσθαι, which would be better rendered unable to go; for idols cannot properly be said to move slowly, which do not move at all, ἀργαί here being the same as ἀέργαί, i. e. "feet idle and useless for walking."

Ver. 16. But no man can make a god like unto himself.] Οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἀνθρώπου ὁμοίον ἀνθρώπου ἰσχύει πλάσαι Θεόν. Nemo enim sibi similem homo poterit Deum fingere, says the Vulgate, which our version follows, as if the original reading was, ἑαυτοῦ ὁμοίον, and not ἀνθρώπου. The Alexand. MS. has οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἀνθρώπων ὁμοίον ἰσχύει πλάσαι Θεόν, but something seems here wanting: probably the true reading here is, with a very little variation, οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἀνθρώπων ὁμοίον ἀνθρώπου ἰσχύει πλάσαι Θεόν. And I offer this conjecture with the more confidence, as it is the exact reading of the Syriac version, Nemo autem illorum fabricare potest Deum homini similem; i. e. "none but the artists can make a god like, or equal to, a man;" for the maker of the idol, having life and motion, far exceeds the artificial god, who wants both: herein only the idol-makers, and such as worship and confide in them, are like the idol, because they are equally senseless. And thus that passage of the psalmist is to be understood, "They that make them are like unto them, and so are all they that put their trust in them;" Ps. cxv. 8 (see De Muis in loc.).

Ver. 17. For he himself is better than the things which he worshippeth:] If the maker, therefore, of the idol be mortal, how can the dead thing which he worketh be supposed to have immortality? The reasoning therefore in the epistle of Jeremy is very just, "They themselves that made them can never continue long, how should then the things that are made by them be gods?" (vi. 16)? "What an absurdity is it (says Chrysostom) for a person to worship an idol, the work perhaps of his own hands; as if men had the power of making a god, and it ceased to be any longer their workmanship! If idols had any sense, they ought rather to worship men as their makers, since even the laws of nature teach us, that, according to the stated order of causes and effects, the maker is more perfect than his work, and not preposterously the work than the maker" (Serm. de tribus pueris). And Lactantius no less expressly: "What divinity (says he) can an idol have, which it was in the maker's power to have made in another manner, or not to have made at all?" Upon the comparison, therefore, as Philo justly argues upon this occasion, the artists themselves deserved rather to have been consecrated, and to have received divine honours, than their works to be deified, and themselves forgotten: which shows the great absurdity of idol-worship in general, and of the maker particularly, in falling down before his own handy-work.

Whereas he lived once, but they never.] Ὡς αὐτοὺς μὲν ζῆσαν, ἐκείνα δὲ οὐδέποτε. This is the reading in the Alexan. MS. and all the editions; but it seems difficult to determine what ὥς relates to, or is governed by, except some such preposition as ante be dropped, or understood before ὥς, or we might read instead of αὐτοῦ, ὧς in this place, ἀπ' ὧς. But if this be objected against, why may not ὅτι αὐτοὺς μὲν ζῆσαν, κ. τ. λ. be admitted? which sense is confirmed by the Vulgate, Syriac, and Arabic versions, and, therefore, probably may be the true reading. Calmet renders, Parce qu'il vit quelque tems, which answers to ὥς; or ὅτι, the former of which might likewise do here.

Ver. 18. Yea, they worshipped those beasts also that are most hateful:] Τὰ ζῷα τὰ ἐχθρότα, which may mean either mischievous or odious, such as wolves, dogs, cats, lions, crocodiles, serpents. Thus Cicero, after having mentioned that almost all sorts of beasts were worshipped by the Egyptians, Boves, canes, lupos, felces, quibus nihil fœdius, obscœnius, lutulentius ne natura quidem ipsa viderit; adds, that even such animals as were really mischievous and hurtful to mankind were adored by them, viz. crocodiles, asps, serpents; etiam animalium monstra illa, a quibus hominum generi præcipua incommoda inferuntur, crocodilos, aspidas, serpentes (De Consol. See note on xi. 15. and xii. 24). This worship of the serpent is the more surprising, as the naturalists observe, that ever since the fall of our first parents, occasioned by the subtlety of the serpent, there is the most deadly enmity between mankind and the serpent, and the strongest aversion and antipathy to it, above all the beasts of the field: This, says Mr. Mede, discovers itself both in the natural and sensitive faculties of them both; for their humours are poison to each other, and each of them is astonished and frightened at the sight and presence of the other (Disc. 42).

For, being compared together, some are worse than others.] Either more mischievous, more odious, or more senseless, than others. In the last sense Grotius understands this place; and the Vatican, and some other copies, it must be confessed, seem to countenance it, which read, ὡς αἰα γὰρ συγκρινόμενα τῶν ἄλλων ἰστί χειρότα. And so does the Vulgate, Insensata enim comparata his, illis sunt detiora. And the like sense is favoured by the Bishops' bible, and all the ancient English versions; but ὡς αἰα, in this place, is liable to many objections, whether taken adjectively, or considered as a substantive. The true reading undoubtedly is that of the Alexan. MS. ἑνα γὰρ συγκρινόμενα τῶν ἄλλων ἰστί χειρότα, which our translators very justly render, "being compared together some are worse than others," which is true in general, or with respect to those particular animals which the Egyptians worshipped, as appears by the next verse.

Ver. 19. Neither are they beautiful, so much as to be desired in respect of beasts:] The Bishops' and the Geneva bibles render more properly and explicitly, "Neither have they any beauty to be desired in respect of other beasts." Calmet observes, that as to the appearance of reason and understanding, many other animals, particularly the horse, elephant, and fox, are more surprising, sagacious and cunning, than the ox, sheep, wolf, or beetle, which the Egyptians reckon among their deities. And as to beauty, almost all beasts, (not to mention birds, which may be here included among the ζῷα, or living creatures) are preferable in that respect to serpents and crocodiles, which they have such a great regard for (Com. in loc.). According to Messieurs du Port-Royal, the meaning of this and the foregoing verse may be, that some of the animals which the Egyptians worshipped were so frightful and monstrous, that, if compared even with some curious pieces of art, particularly with idols, or statues expressed to the life, they seem less worthy of adoration, because such finished pieces of art have something in them pleasing and entertaining to the sight, and are the more engaging by their great likeness to, and resemblance of men; whereas their sacred animals, and serpents in particular, are so odious above all others, that they naturally strike those that look on them with dread and horror.

But they went without the praise of God and his blessing.] i. e. says Calmet, they are not of the number of those whom God praised and blessed: they have, by being abused and perverted to idolatry, renounced, in some measure, God's benediction, and lost that original goodness and beauty which they were possessed of in common with other creatures, when they first came out of the hands of their Creator (Gen. i. 31). The author seems to intimate, that God, provoked with the crime of idolaters, cursed in like manner these animals, as in the beginning of the creation he did the serpent, the instrument of man's deception and ruin, whom, on that account, he condemned to go, ἐπὶ τῷ στήθει, καὶ τῇ κοιλίᾳ, upon his breast and his belly (Gen. iii. 14), for so the LXX. read, by way of punishment and disgrace, being probably before a glorious flying seraph (see Mr. Mede, Disc. 41). Or more generally thus, "All created beings, animate and inanimate, praise God in their beauty, and derive it from his hand as a blessing; but odious and deformed objects, such as for their ugliness are called monsters, proclaim not their Maker's praise, as not having received from his bounty those amiable and good qualities, which are to be esteemed a blessing." Some have fancied the meaning here to be, that God passed by all creeping things, and ser pents among the rest, when he gave his blessing to other creatures, Gen. i. 22, 28. Others, that he excluded these from their share of praise, when he pronounced of the works of his creation, that they were very good, as being produced at first from corruption, and consequently not of his making. But these are forced expositions, and fond conceits, the one unsupported by scripture, the other contrary to it, and to the received notions of true philosophy. Nor can I assent to those interpreters who think the meaning here to be, that serpents, by being so frequently worshipped in different places, usurped the glory due to God only, and rivalled his power of blessing; for though the fact itself must be acknowledged to be a melancholy truth, yet no such interpretation is warranted by the original, or any of the versions: it arose, probably, from mistaking the rendering of the Vulgate, and reading there effugārent laudem Dei, instead of effugerunt, as it is in all the correct copies. The Syriac and Arabic interpreters understand these words of the worshippers themselves, and not of the animals, and indeed this sense is agreeable to the beginning of the next chapter.

CHAP. XVI.

ARGUMENT.—The author opens this chapter with the observation (xi. 16), that God deals more graciously with his favourite people than with the wicked, exemplified by a parallel drawn between each, by his sending frogs among the Egyptians, which came upon their tables, and made them to loathe and fly from even their necessary food; but the Israelites were fed with quails. That God, even when he punishes his chosen, deals more favourably with them than with the heathen, shown by a comparison between the punishment of the Egyptians by flies and locusts, and that of the Israelites by fiery serpents, who, though their torment was greatest for the present, had a sovereign remedy appointed for their cure, even the brazen serpent, which was the means and instrument of health, and a sign of salvation to such as turned to it, and with faith looked upon it.—To the strange hail and rain sent upon the Egyptians, is opposed the manna, or bread from heaven, given to the Israelites: that, to serve the purposes of God's providence, the very elements suspended their natural force, according to his appointment; so that hail was not melted by fire mixed with it, nor manna dissolved by its power, though the sun had a different effect upon it. By all which instances, opposed to each other by way of antithesis, God's care in preserving the righteous was remarkably displayed, and his vengeance against sinners no less visible.

Ver. 2. Thou preparedst for them meat of a strange taste. i. e. A taste they were unaccustomed to. Coverdale renders, "a new taste;" for we must not suppose any new creation of quails for their use: the miracle consisted in this; that they were brought in such quantities, and at such a particular time, and fell in such places only as God appointed, viz. round the camp for their nourishment. Bishop Patrick, from the authority of Ludolphus, thinks, that locusts are here meant; but the psalmist, by calling them "feathered fowls," manifestly understands real birds (Ps. lxxviii. 28. See De Muis in loc. Bochart. vol. iii. p. 103).

To stir up their appetite: Εἰς ἐπιθυμίαν ὀρέξεως. This seems not properly rendered, for that their appetite was sufficiently keen, appears from their impatient murmuring for meat. The Geneva bible renders better, "To satisfy their appetite thou hast prepared a meat of a strange taste." But Coverdale's and the Bishops' bibles come nearer the Greek: according to the former, God gave them "their desire that they longed for;" according to the latter, he "prepared for the desire of their appetite a strange taste;" and thus Calmet, En lui donnait la nourriture délicieuse qu'il avoit désirée. The psalmist expresses it by, according to the LXX. τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν αὐτῶν ἠνεγκεν αὐτοῖς (Ps. lxxviii. 29). This gracious dealing, as it is here called, seems to refer to the first sending of quails, mentioned Exod. xvi. 13, rather than the second, which happened a year after (Numb. xi. 31), for the Israelites, upon their second petition for them, betraying too much impatience, were afflicted with a plague for their murmuring, and, as the psalmist expresses it, "While the meat was yet in their mouths, the heavy wrath of God came upon them, and slew the wealthiest of them" (Ps. lxxviii. 31). Calmet seems to include both, and thinks there is a mixture of mercy towards his people, even in this judgment; his reflection upon it is worth inserting: "If God (says he) fed his people thus deliciously, even when they had provoked him, what will he not give them, when they shall be faithful and obedient to him?" In either sense the instance proves what the author brings it for; viz. God's different manner of dealing with his own people, and such as are strangers to him.

Ver. 3. To the end that they, desiring food, might, for the ugly sight of the beasts sent among them, loathe even that which they must needs desire. Καὶ τὴν ἀναγκαίαν ὀρεῖν ἀποσπέρβανται. The Bishops' bible gives the true and literal translation; "To the intent that they . . . might begin to loathe even their necessary appetite." The Vulgate and St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, render in like manner, Edam a necessaria concupiscentia averterentur, i. e. through the disagreeableness of the animals sent among them, διὰ τὴν εἰδέσθαιαν τῶν ἀπεσταλμένων, as the true reading is, particularly the frogs, which tainted and spoiled their meat, they loathed the thoughts and the desire even of necessary food and refreshment. Josephus gives the same account of these disagreeable animals, τὰς τε κατ' οἶκον αὐτῶν ἡλίας, κ. τ. λ. Domesticam etiam vitam eorum consuetudinem turbabant in edulis et potu repetere, et in lectis eorum passim oberrantes (Antiq. Jud. lib. ii. cap. 14). This plague puts one in mind of the harpies, which Virgil thus describes:

"Exstruimusque toros, dapibusque epulamur opimis.

At subito horribilo lapsu de montibus adsunt

Harpyie, et magnis quatunt clangoribus alas,

Diripiuntque dapes, consuetudine omnia fedant

Immundo: tum vox tetrum dira inter odorem."

(Æneid. lib. iii. 225.)

Ver. 4. For it was requisite, that upon them exercising tyranny, should come penury, which they could not avoid. Ἀπαράτηρον ἐνέουσαν ἐπέλθειν, "Poverty without excuse," according to some of the ancient English versions; the Geneva bible has "extreme poverty," and Coverdale's follows the Vulgate, which renders, interitum sine excusatione: ἀπαράτηρος will bear any of these significations, which occasioned such a difference in the versions. The author shows, in this and the following verses, God's different manner of dealing with the Israelites and Egyptians in three particulars. 1. That he punished the Egyptians with rigour, as a severe judge, tormenting them for their tyranny and oppression of others, with deserved, extreme, inevitable want or hunger, occasioned by the animals which infested them, and drove them from their necessary sustenance: but he chastised his own people as a father, afflicting them comparatively but a little, but by that little making them sensible, how tenderly he had dealt with them in comparison of their enemies. 2. That though he suffered the Hebrews to be in want for a small season, yet he kept them from perishing by hunger in the wilderness; and to recompense, as it were, that short affliction by hunger, he fed them after, not only with necessary food, but satiated them with delicacies in abundance. But a succession of plagues, without respite, pursued the Egyptians. 3. That though the whole wilderness, through which the Israelites marched so many years, was full of fiery serpents (Deut. viii. 15), yet God did not permit these to assault them but for a small season only, and even then he appointed an immediate remedy, to heal them, viz. the brazen serpent: but the Egyptians died without mercy, neither was there any cure provided for the wounds and stings which they received from the flies and locusts.

Ver. 5. For when the horrible fierceness of beasts came upon these, Ὅτε αὐτοῖς δεινὸς ἐπῆλθε θηρίων θυμός. Θυμός here does not signify fierceness, but poison. Thus (Apoc. xiv. 8) what our version renders, "the wine of the wrath of her fornication," Mr. Mede expounds the poison of her fornication (see also xviii. 3, where there is the like expression). And it is remarkable, that the same word in the Hebrew, signifies both wrath and poison (Medc's Works, p. 910). And θυμός is used by the Hellenistical Jews in the same double respect. To the observation of this very judicious writer, I shall add an instance or two from the Old Testament, than which nothing can be closer, or more evince the sense I am contending for. The first is Deut. xxxii. 33, Θυμός, δρακόντων ὁ οἶνος αὐτῶν, καὶ θυμός, δασύδου ἀνίστατος where it is twice used in the same verse in this sense, and our translators render accordingly, "Their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps." The next is Job. xx. 16, Θυμὸν δὲ δρακόντων θηλάσκει, ἀνέλοι δὲ αὐτὸν γλάσσει ὄφεις, which our translators rightly render, "He shall suck the poison of asps, the viper's tongue shall slay him." And in ver. 14 of the same chapter, κολῆ, which is synonymous to θυμός, is used in the same sense. Κολὴ δασύτος ἐν γαστρὶ αὐτοῦ, which, though it signifies both wrath and poison, our version takes in the latter sense, and renders, "the gall of asps is within him." The last instance I shall mention is that in Ps. lviii. 4, Θυμός αὐτοῖς κατὰ τὴν θροῖαν τοῦ ὄφeos, which in our version is happily rendered, "Their poison is like the poison of a serpent." This poison, as naturalists observe, is the consequence of their rage, and thrown out by it, and therefore may be considered as one and the same. The word ἐπιβλε, here used by our author, intimates, says Bochart, the suddenness of the attack of these venomous creatures, who accordingly renders this place, Supervenerit (tanquam ex improviso), serpentum venenum (vol. iii. p. 425).

And they perished with the stings of crooked serpents, they wrath endured not for ever.] The sacred story relates, that the Israelites, by their rebellious murmuring, provoked God to send serpents among them, whose poison was so mortal, that it brought the most painful death upon them. In this affliction they addressed themselves to the Father of mercies, who, moved by their repentance, commanded Moses to make a serpent of brass, and erect it on a pole, in view of the whole camp, that whosoever looked upon it should be healed. This punishment by serpents the son of Sirach reckons among other instances of God's vengeance, "All these were created for vengeance—teeth of wild beasts, and scorpions, serpents, and the sword, rewarded the wicked to destruction" (Ecclesi. xxxix. 30, where the margin refers to this very passage). But it has been thought by some learned men to have been a punishment adapted on purpose by God to the transgression of the Israelites, which was evil speaking against the Lord, and slandering his providence. In this view, the conformity between the sin and the punishment is very visible, and the justness of our author's observation, xi. 16, farther proved. Σοφιστός, likewise, the epithet here given to the serpent, will equally suit the slanderer; for he is crooked through artifice, as the other is by nature; is alike mischievous and designing, and, to serve his own purposes, can turn himself into as many odious shapes. Solomon makes the same comparison, Ecclesi. x. 11. The serpent was a known hieroglyphic among the Egyptians and other nations; and perhaps its crookedness and perfection in turning, was one reason of its being made the symbol of their year.

Ver. 6. Having a sign of salvation, to put them in remembrance of the commandment of thy law.] The sign of salvation here mentioned was the brazen serpent, erected, by God's command, upon a pole or standard, like the Roman eagle, for the cure of the people. It was, in the opinion of many learned men, the image of a seraph, or glorious winged serpent. Arias Mont. reads Numb. xxi. 8. fac tibi saraph. It was a symbol of a good ministering angel, which executeth God's will on earth, whilst a secret virtue, from the unseen God, perfected the cure, by whose supernatural power it was effected, whose mercy worked in and by that emblem. It is properly therefore called a sign of salvation, as it was the instrument only through which the cure was conveyed. But it was salutary signum, or the means of recovery, to such only as looked up to it with faith, and its saving effect depended upon their reliance on God, and belief of his power to heal them, in and by that instrument. It had also this farther use implied in it—to admonish the Jews how to conduct themselves upon other occasions, when a like mysterious trial should occur, viz. to comply with all God's positive appointments, without any reluctance, even though the reason of such an injunction should not be discoverable by them. For the choosing this image, which had no inherent virtue in it, rather than any other, was the mere will of God, who can make things, evidently of no importance in themselves, effectual to what purposes he pleases, as might be proved from many other instances in scripture.

Ver. 7. Far he that turned himself toward it was not saved by the thing that he saw.] The mere beholding it did not alone confer the benefit of a cure; nor could it, though fixed in public view, effect a single recovery by any natural operation; God did not order it to be erected on any such account; nor was Moses induced to make this image from any occult skill or persuasion that he had, that the effigies of this brazen serpent could heal the Israelites by any power of art or nature, for the very matter of this serpent has been thought rather inconvenient and improper for such an effect. Nor can we find, says a learned writer, an instance or example of any tesleme that was ever known to cure a disease by only looking upon it; but in all wounds by venomous serpents, the cure was effected by a local application of some proper remedy to the part affected (More's Mystery of Godliness, p. 430). What, therefore, was the intent of elevating this image upon a pole, and why must the diseased look towards it, and the healing virtue be conveyed through their eyes? Undoubtedly this appointment, besides the exercising the faith of the beholder upon this occasion, had a reference to the mystery of Christ, whose victory over the old serpent, the grand enemy of mankind, was hereby typified and represented. Many of the ancients are of the same opinion, and imagine this serpent to be an emblem of the cross, and a symbol or sign of that salvation afterward to be effected by it: but Justin Martyr is more particular; for he adds, that this serpent was likewise made in the very form of a cross (Apol. 2). It is certain our Saviour, in his discourse with Nicodemus, explains it of himself and his cross (John iii. 14), and chose this figure for the instruction and information of the Jews, who always acknowledged a mystery couched under this serpent.

But by thee, that art the saviour of all.] Τὸν πάντων Σωτήρα. This, I think, relates to the Λόγος (see note on ver. 12), and comprises more than his bare healing the Israelites of this plague. The word Σωτήρ, or Saviour, here used, admits of several acceptations: 1. He may be called a saviour that saves the life of his enemy in the field; but he that thus saveth another, commonly doth it upon a prospect of some advantage to himself, either of selling the poor captive, or of making him his slave, which something abates his glory. 2. The word Σωτήρ not only signifies one that preserves the life of another, but also one that is the restorer of some happy condition which was lost; and thus the Roman orator explains it, Qui amissam salutem dat (In Verrem, lib. ii.). Now all the happiness which such a saviour or deliverer could confer was but a temporal happiness, which is, likewise, a lessening of it. 3. The judges of Israel, who delivered their country from the yoke of Midian, the Syrians, or the Philistines, are by Nehemiah called Σωτῆρες, ix. 27. But then these saviours saved but one country, or perhaps city, as Camillus did Rome, for which he was styled Σωτήρ, "a saviour." But all these characters come very short of ὁ Σωτήρ πάντων, which is a title too great to be applied to any less than a divine person; for the person here meant was far more glorious than any single hero, or all those judges of old together. He it was that smote all the first-born of the Egyptians, that brought the Israelites out of Egypt, that rescued them from their greatest bondage, that overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red sea, that led them in the wilderness, protected and sustained them there, and at last gave them possession of Canaan. But even this deliverance was but a type of a greater, designed for them by him, and that Canaan but an earnest of a better country intended for all true Israelites (see Dr. Gale's Serm. Disc. 14). With great propriety, therefore, this Saviour is described, in the next verse, as an almighty Redeemer, ὁ ῥυτῆρας ἐκ πάντος κακοῦ. Which expression of our author is agreeable to the sentiments of the ancient Jewish writers, and is founded on the very high notions which the Jews entertained of their great Goel, or deliverer. Our translators, it is observable, insert the word ever, not confining God's mercy, to save and heal his faithful children, to this instance only of his goodness. And indeed, the idea of God's philanthropy is greatly enlarged by understanding these expressions, and that in ver. 12, in a more comprehensive sense than a mere deliverance from the venom of serpents.

Ver. 9. For them the bitings of grasshoppers and flies killed.] This writer seems to intimate that the locusts, for so I understand grasshoppers, and so they are called Judg. vii. 12. Ps. lxxviii. 46, killed numbers of the Egyptians. This, if it be not strictly according to truth, very probably arose from too literal an acceptance of Exod. x. 17. "Entreat the Lord that he may take away from me this death only;" which may admit of another and fair interpretation, without supposing that the locusts killed any persons directly, as the hail did: for the locusts destroying the supports of life, by eating up the corn when ready for the sickle, and consuming all before them within the space of a few hours, may, by consequence, in bringing a famine, be said to kill the people; in which respect Pharaoh might properly call them deadly locusts. And thus Bochart, Locustæ homines et bruta occidunt, saltem ex consequenti, quod aini, quia consumptis illis quæ fuissent vitæ subsidio, sic ad mortem eos adigunt (vol. iii. p. 463). Pliny's account of them is really dreadful. In India, trium pedum longitudine esse traduntur, Deorum Iræ pestis ea intelligitur. Namque grandiores cernuntur, et tanto volant penarum stridore, ut aliæ alites credantur; solemque obumbrant sollicitæ suspectantibus populis ne suas opiant terras; sufficienti quippe vires. Et tanquam parum sit maria transisse, immensos tractus permeant, diraque messibus contegnunt nube, multa contactu adurentes, omnia verò morsu erodentes (Nat. Hist. Lib. xi. de Locust. cap. 29. See also Aristot. Hist. Anim. Lib. v. cap. 23. Boch. Hieroz. lib. iv. cap. 5. Bacon's Natural History, cent. 10). Agreeable to this account of Pliny, is that of a learned modern writer, who says, "That the number of locusts he saw in Barbary in the years 1724 and 1725 is beyond expression; that in the heat of the day they formed themselves into large bodies, appeared like a succession of clouds, and darkened the sun; that they marched directly forward, climbed over trees, walls, houses, ate up every plant in their way, and let nothing escape them. That the inhabitants, to stop their progress, made trenches all over their fields and gardens, and filled them with water, or else, placing in a row great quantities of heath, stubble, and such like combustible matter, they set them on fire upon the approach of the locusts, but all to no purpose." (Shaw's Travels, p. 256, 257). In the description of this plague, Exod. x. 5, it is said, that "they shall cover the face of the earth," where the Chaldee paraphrase reads, "They shall hide the face of the sun from the earth." But I should deservedly be thought wanting in the respect due to the canonical scriptures, if I should pass over in silence that beautiful description of the plague of locusts in the second chapter of Joel, for there cannot be a greater or more lively instance of the hypotyposis: the prophet, in the chapter referred to, represents the desolation occasioned by these creatures, whose teeth he calls "the teeth of lions," like the ravaging of a country, or the storming of a city by an army; which description is the more remarkable, because the analogy is carried on throughout so properly and naturally, "in the regularity of their march, eating up the provision, burning the country, scaling of the walls, running about through the conquered city, breaking into houses, and the general horror of the inhabitants, that (says a learned author) if one would have described the outrages of an army without a metaphor, it could hardly have been done in more proper terms" (see Nicols' Confer. par. iv. p. 152).

And flies killed—for they were worthy to be punished by such.] i. e. says Bochart, they sorely wounded them, and then sucked their blood till they killed them. And in this sense many commentators understand those words, Exod. viii. 24, "The land was corrupted;" or, as the margin has it, "was destroyed by reason of the swarm of flies;" to signify, that many of the people were poisoned or stung to death by them. See Pool's annot. in loc. and Ps. lxxviii. 45, where the LXX. read ἐξασταύλειν εἰς αὐτοὺς κυνόμηναν, καὶ κατέφαγεν αὐτοὺς as if a particular sort of fly was meant; but the true reading, as I have elsewhere observed, is, κυνόμηναν, which includes flies of all sorts, which through their number devoured them. We read of creatures of this nature so mischievous and deadly, that the Greeks thought fit to have a particular god to deliver them from them, under the title of Myiagros, or Myiodes (Pliny, lib. x. cap. 28. Selden, de Diis Syris, Syntag. ii. de Baal-zebub). One cannot but perceive in this punishment of the Egyptians, a conformity of it to the sin of that people; for the noise, tumult, and stinging of these vengeful animals, answered to the passionate language and severe blows of the Egyptian taskmasters, and might be designed to revenge that harsh treatment. Nor is the justice of God less to be admired in this particular also, that this plague was specially calculated for the punishment of a nice, effeminate, and luxurious people, no less indulgent to themselves than inhuman to others: for what could be more proper or effectual for humbling the pride and vanity of Egypt, or what a greater mortification to their niceeness, than to be thus tormented, and beset every where with shoals of frogs, and swarms of flies and locusts?

Ver. 12. But thy word, O Lord, which healeth all things.] This seems to be spoken of the very person of the Λόγος, and is undoubtedly taken from Ps. cvii. 20, ἀπέστειλε τὸν Λόγον αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἴδωσαν αὐτοὺς, "He sent his word and healed them, and they were saved from their destruction." That the Λόγος is here meant, seems reasonable to suppose, because it is certain, he inflicted the punishment referred to: for in Numb. xxi. 5, 6, where it is said that the people murmured against God, the Chaldee paraphrase read, "They murmured against the word of the Lord;" and afterward it follows, that "The word of the Lord sent fiery serpents among the people." But we learn still more expressly who that divine person was, whom the Israelites tempted, or spoke against, from those words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. x. 9. "Neither tempt ye Christ, as some of them also tempted, and were destroyed of serpents." It is certain, then, that the Λόγος was the person murmured against, and that punished them for it. And it seems very probable, from the passage of the psalmist before quoted, that it was he that likewise cured all them that were rightly disposed for a cure; and that the brazen serpent was the symbol of the presence of the Λόγος in particular, and of his divine power and goodness to heal all that truly turned to him. The Chaldee paraphrase on Numb. xxi. 8, thus understands it, Erit quemcumque non morderit serpens, et intuitus fuerit ipsum, tum vivet, modo cor ejus directum fuerit ad nomen verbi Domini. Et fuit quando morderat serpens virum, et contempleretur serpentem æreum, et cor ejus intentum erat in nomen verbi Domini, vivebat, i. e. "Whomsoever a serpent shall bite, he shall be healed, if he directs his heart to the name of the word of the Lord: and it came to pass, that when a serpent bit any man, and he directed his heart to the name of the word of the Lord, he accordingly recovered, and lived." The like presence of the Λόγος upon this occasion of healing, has been inferred by some learned men from John iii. 14 (see Tenison of Idol. p. 359). It may also, according to Calmet, be understood in this farther sense, viz. of a word of God's mouth, or of "his holy word." Of the power of the former to heal all bodily diseases, the centurion in the gospel seems to have been convinced (Matt. viii. 8); for, instead of troubling our Saviour to come to his house, he says, out of a principle of great faith, "Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed." Of the power of the latter to heal all the diseases of the soul, to cure those that are broken in heart, and as containing a medicine to heal every infirmity and sickness, St. Austin is to be understood, when he says, Omnis morbus animæ habet in scriptura medicamentum suum (In Ps. xxxvii.).

Ver. 13. Thou leadest to the gates of hell, and bringest up again.] We meet with the same thought, and almost the same expression, Tob. xiii. 2, "He doth scourge, and hath mercy; he leadeth down to hell, and bringeth up again; neither is there any that can avoid his hand." The expression in both places seems to be taken either from 1 Sam. ii. 6, or Deut. xxxii. 39, see also Apoc. i. 18, where Christ is said to have the keys of hell and of death. By the ancients, the place or receptacle of the dead is represented as a house, that has its doors and gates; and death, in their language, as the gate or entrance into hades; and to die, or to descend into the grave, is to go down to hades or to be brought to the gates of death: accordingly, to live again, is to leave hades, or to open the gates of death. Agreeably to this notion and periphrasis, so frequent to be met with in Homer, Virgil, Theocritus, Euripides, Hesiod, Theognis, &c. is the constant usage of this phrase in the Old Testament, and Jewish writers. In Job xxxviii. 17, the expression is very observable, and occurs twice in the same verse; "Have the gates of death been opened unto thee, or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death?" By the like phrase the psalmist describes the afflicted state of such as had been in captivity, and groaned under the severest hardships, Ps. evii. 18, where the expression of our version is again remarkable, and close to the present purpose, "They were even hard at death's door," which the LXX. render ἤγγισαν ἵως τῶν πυλῶν τοῦ θανάτου. And when God shows his power in restoring men from such an afflicted state, he is then said in scripture, to "lift them up from the gates of death" (Ps. ix. 13).

Ver. 14. A man indeed killeth through his malice: and the spirit, when it is gone forth, returneth not; neither the soul received up, cometh again.] St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, reads, Homo autem occidit quidem per malitiam animam suam, which Coverdale's version follows, "Man through wickedness slayeth his own soul;" but the rendering of the Geneva bible seems preferable, "A man indeed by his wickedness may slay another, but when the spirit is gone forth, it turneth not again; neither can he call again the soul that is taken away." And in this sense almost all the commentators understand the words, οὐδὲ ἀναλίσκει ψυχὴν παραλήθεισάν. Our version seems to follow a copy, which read, οὐδὲ ἀναλίσκει ψυχὴ παραλήθεισά and so indeed the Syriac and Arabic interpreters do expressly render the former, Spiritus egressus non revertitur, nec redit anima, quæ aufertur; and the latter, Egressusque spiritus non revertitur; neque redit anima assumpta. According to Grotius, the sense is, that a wicked man may indeed kill another, but he cannot hurt or destroy the soul; which, after its separation from the body, being lodged in its proper receptacle, is out of the power of man to injure; making the sense to be the same with Matt. x. 28. Calmet understands it in the same manner, L'homme n'aneantira pas l'ame lorsque Dieu l'aura reprise à lui; i. e. "Man shall not be able to destroy or annihilate the soul, when God has taken it again to himself;" its substance is inaccessible, and beyond the reach of malice and violence (Com. in loc). That after death, and before the day of judgment, the souls of men are reserved in a separate state or region, a paradise of comfort and rest, or a prison of misery and despair, according to men's respective behaviour, was the received doctrine of the synagogue, or ancient Jews. But this passage of our author not only favours such an opinion, but seems likewise to point out the place of this receptacle. It is remarkable, that those words of the psalmist, "O take me not away in the midst of my days," Ps. cii. 24, are by Arias Mont. rendered from the Hebrew, Ne facias me as- cendere, i. e. "make me not to ascend," or to go upwards to the invisible region of separate and departed souls. It seems also probable, that human souls, after their separation from the body, are carried by angels εἰς αἰθέρων αἰθρῶν (Luke xvi. 22), into regions of bliss or misery, as they have respectively deserved: and in that intermediate state have either a ravishing foretaste and pleasing hope of future happiness, or wait their doom and final sentence with sad forebodings, and dreadful apprehensions.

Ver. 16. For the ungodly, that denied to know thee, were scourged by the strength of thine arm: with strange rains, hails, and showers, were they persecuted, &c.] That proud Pharaoh, who could say to Moses, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go," at length experienced the severity of thy judgments, being persecuted with storms and tempests beyond all precedent and example. For hail, and particularly such dreadful storms of it as are described in the sacred history, was quite unusual and miraculous in those parts of Egypt, where, according to Josephus, Philo, and Pliny, there was no rain. Hence, with great judgment, they are said by this writer, to be "persecuted with strange rains," novis aquis, according to the Vulgate; i. e. rains falling at times or in places where it was not usual and customary. Hence, that lash and sarcasm in the Psalmist, "He gave them hail for rain" (Ps. cv. 32). But this observation of new and strange rain, is not to be extended to all parts of Egypt; for in the maritime parts, and those toward Ethiopia, instances of this sort of weather sometimes happen, and where it happened but seldom, or not at all, that want was supplied by the overflowing of the Nile. Thus Philo: Αἰγύπτῳ οὐ παροδεύεται, κ. τ. λ. Ægyptus hiemem nescit, hiemalesque tempestates. Hæc circa brumam irroratur parvis rarisque pluviis in locis duntaxat maritimis; supra Memphim autem nullas omnino sentit, restagnationes Nili arva satis fecundant, ut naturæ de imbris Ægypto providere non sit opus (De Mose, lib. i).

With hails, and showers, were they persecuted, that they could not avoid.] Καὶ χαλάσεις καὶ ὄμβροισι διωκόμενοι ἀπαραιτήτως. If we retain ἀπαραιτήτως, which is the reading in most editions, I think it should be rendered, severe or extreme (see note on ver. 4), rather than inevitable; for if the Egyptians could not avoid this plague of hail, but through it, and the fire mingled with it, were unavoidably to be destroyed, why did God, according to Moses' account (Exod. ix. 19), direct the servants of Pharaoh to gather their cattle, and all that they had in the field, into their houses; or what need of this caution and warning, if their doom was fixed, and they could not avoid it? I think, therefore, this does not relate to all the Egyptians, but to such obstinate and careless ones among them, as regarded not the word of the Lord, but left their servants and cattle in the field, and these perished by the extreme violence of the hail; which is no wonder, since the hail was of an uncommon bigness. The Complut. edition reads, χαλάσεις καὶ ὄμβροισι διωκόμενοι ἀπαραιτήτως, i. e. they were severely, and without mercy, persecuted by these, and at length consumed by them and the lightning intermixed. The Vulgate and Coverdale omit this word in their version, and Calmet in his comment. Philo's account of this plague agrees with our author. φοβῶς ἑρῶν, χάλασαν πολλὴν καὶ βαθεῖαν, κ. τ. λ. Imbrium nimbi, plurima et altè exaggerata grando, ventorum confluentium et obstrepentium procellæ (storms of wind—showers, as it is rendered in our version, diminish the terror of the idea, and is too mild a term), nubium fragores, fulgetra et tonitrua æterna crebraque, assidua fulmina, longe prodigiosissima specie. And a little after, he describes the consequence of this storm in much the same terms, "Non paucis animantibus simul exitio fuit, tum frigoris rigore, tum gravi lapidatione cadentibus vulgo grandinis, tum etiam ignis consumptione" (De Mose, lib. i). It is observable here, that three of the elements, though contrary and repugnant in their powers and qualities, were in confederacy, and united against this obstinate people—the air in the thunder, the water in the hail, and the fire in the lightning, which contrast, Milton thus beautifully expressed in a few words:—

"Fierce raia with lightning mixt, water with fire
In ruin reconciled." (Parad. Reg. b. iv.)

And this God did to show that he was Lord of universal nature.

Ver. 17—19. For, which is most to be wondered at, the fire had more force in the water, that quencheth all things—Sometimes the flame was mitigated, that it might not burn up the beasts that were sent against the ungodly—At another time it burneth even in the midst of water above the power of fire, that it might destroy the fruits of an unjust land.]

One cannot help observing many marvellous qualities and effects in the fire sent from heaven to punish the Egyptians: 1. That it kept burning, though mixed with rains and hail; and instead of being quenched by the quantity of rain which fell, as might be expected, it became the more violent for it, as if the water nourished it, and helped to inflame it; not unlike, says Calmet, that fire which fell from the Lord, and consumed the burnt-sacrifice, and licked up the water in the trench, which the prophet Elijah had ordered to be poured upon the altar and the wood in great abundance, to make the miracle more glorious and unquestionable (Kings xviii. 39, 40). 2. That this fire, hail, &c., happened in Egypt, where such storms were unusual, and spread over the whole country, except the land of Goshen; whereas other storms of lightning and hail generally reach but a little way in comparison, and fall within a small compass. 3. It melted not the hail with which it was mixed. Philo gives the same account of the lightnings: Θέοντες διὰ τῆς χαλάσεως, κ. τ. λ. Vulgo per grandinem in tanta naturæ repugnantia grassantia, tamen nec eam liquabant, nec ab ea exstinguiebantur, sed eadem usque durantia, et sursum deorsum cursitantia, grandinem incolumen conservabant (De Mose, lib. i.). 4. The lightning and hail spared all the cattle and fruits of the Israelites, but destroyed both man and beast, and every herb of the field among the Egyptians. Lastly, It never burnt or hurt any of those beasts that were sent to plague the Egyptians, as if it had sense and reason to know and distinguish them. Capellus objects against our author for supposing that the animals which were sent in the former plagues still subsisted in Egypt; for, says he, before the sending of the lightning and hail, "ranæ, κυνέματα, et omnia animalcula prius in Ægyptio immissa pridem fuerant abducta et extincta" (Cens. in lib. Sap. Sol.); i. e. the frogs and flies, and such other animals as infested the Egyptians before the hail, were gone and extinct, which indeed is agreeable to Moses' account, Exod. viii. 11. 31. Calmet endeavours to account for this difficulty two ways. 1. That by beasts are meant the lice, which still might remain upon man and beast, untouched by the fire, there being no mention of their ceasing, or being destroyed, in the history of Moses, as there is of the frogs and flies. 2. That by fire may be meant those occasional fires, which the Egyptians kindled to drive away the flies, &c., which had no effect upon them, and seemed to have lost all power over them. But, I think, the first solution agrees not with the account of the same animals, xix. 21, where they are described by this writer to be such as "walked in the flames," which suits not with a diminutive and almost invisible animalcule. Nor does the second remove the objection; for artificial fires, or such as are usually made to disperse noxious animals, seem not here spoken of; for the context shows, that lightning is here meant, or the fire of God from heaven, to take vengeance upon the ungodly. Instead of offering any forced interpretation, I must ingenuously acknowledge, that our author, in this particular, seems to have exceeded historical truth, and to have used a rhetorical exaggeration, to make God's dealing with the Egyptians appear more terrible, which may be observed also in his account of manna, and the Egyptian darkness in the next chapter, where many additional circumstances are inserted, purposely designed to raise terror and surprise, and to heighten the description, which are not to be met with in the account of Moses, or the psalmist.

For the world fighteth for the righteous.] This is true, whether applied to particular persons, as Moses, David, &c. or to whole nations. It is particularly visible in the history of the Jewish nation, which may be considered as a theocracy, and God their king and leader; at different times he commands the several elements in their favour. The air thunders, and his arrows go abroad, to assist Joshua, the conductor of his people; the sun stands still to prolong their victory; the fire consumes Korah and his rebellious accomplices; the waters stand on a heap, to make a way for his chosen; the earth at one time opens her mouth for vengeance, and at another her bosom for mercy; Egypt, at his command, becomes a desolation, and Goshen another Paradise. This discretionary power (if I may be allowed the expression) in the elements, that are vague and insensible, and a sort of wisdom to determine when, where, and how to act, and with what degree of violence to discharge themselves, is finely represented in the original, Job xxxvii. 36, which, according to the late accurate translation, runs thus, Quis posuit in Jactibus vagis sapientiam, aut quis dedit phænomeno distinctam intelligentiam? This fine thought, perfectly agreeable to the context, is wholly lost in our version, nor do the LXX. succeed better in their translation, τίς δ' ἔδωκε γνώμην ὑψίστου σοφίαν, ἢ ποιητικὴν ἐπιστήμην (Grey's lib. Job, p. 272, also see Mercer in loc.).

Ver. 20. Instead whereof thou feddest thine own people with angels' food.] Called also ambrosia, γένος ἀμβροσίας, γένος, xix. 21 (see note on that place). We are not hence to imagine that angels ate this sort of food; but it is so called, either to signify its excellence above common food, or because God gave them manna from the habitation of angels (and thus the Chaldee paraphrase on Ps. lxxviii, understands it), or by the ministry of angels, an instance of singular honour, and special dignity to the Israelites to be attended by such messengers; on either or all these accounts, it is in the next words properly called, "bread from heaven," and so it is styled Exod. xvi. 4 (see Theodoret on Ps. lxxviii. 25). By St. Paul it is called "spiritual meat" (1 Cor. x. 3); and in this sense it is taken by many of the fathers, as an emblem of God's word, and by others of the eucharist in particular, whose saving virtue the manner of nourishment, by manna, has been thought mystically to represent: for whereas manna was in substance very small, but yet gave great strength and vigour to the body, it was a proper image of the power of spiritual food, which being invisible, yet gives life and nourishment more truly and perfectly than gross and solid meats. And thus they interpret the words of Moses, Deut. viii. 3, "Therefore he fed thee with manna—that he might teach thee that man liveth not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live."

And did send them from heaven bread prepared without their labour.] By heaven, we are not here to understand that very place where the great and glorious presence of God is more immediately manifested, for it is certain, the manna descended only from the clouds, and therefore our Saviour tells the Jews, "Moses gave you not that bread from heaven" (John vi. 32). It is said to be bread prepared without their labour, because it fell every night round about the habitations of the Israelites, and was ready every morning for their use. Instead of labour to subdue the earth, and rain to make it fruitful, God sent showers of manna, which supplied the place of corn, and was ready prepared for them. And this made their ingratitude the greater, because they at length despised this heavenly nourishment, which they were at no labour nor expense about. Hence, or from its being thus always ready, says De Muis, and with him agrees Dr. Hammond (see comment. on Ps. lxxiii), it was called manna, from the Hebrew verb, מנא, mannah, which signifies to prepare, or make ready. The common etymology of manna he condemns, as if it was so called from the Israelites' doubting about, and examining what it was; for though מן, man, in the Chaldee and Syriac, may have such a sense, yet it has not in the Hebrew, which was the language of the Israelites: and therefore he blames Josephus, who was a Jew, for so misunderstanding and explaining it. The LXX. use the same periphrasis, and render τὴν ἰστίαν τοῦτο; ὅν γὰρ ἡγεῖσθαι τὴν ἡν, to which agrees our English version of the place.

Able to content every man's delight, and agreeing to every taste.] The Jewish doctors from ancient tradition maintain that manna had in it all manner of pleasant and agreeable tastes, according to men's different palates, and all the relish that could be desired in any food, being a complete epitome of every thing nice and delicate. The Syriac renders it, Panem omni dulcedine suaviorem, cunctisque saporibus, jucundiorum. But the scripture does not seem to represent manna as having any high goit, nor have we any hint from Moses' writings of its being so variously delightful to the palate, as the author of this book seems to suggest (see Shuckford's Connex. vol. iii. p. 10). This notion of manna accommodating itself in so great a variety to the several palates of those that ate it, is most probably a rabbinical conceit, lest the Israelites, being confined to one sort of food always of the same taste, for so many years together, should seem to be treated with hardship. It plainly appears from the book of Exodus and Numbers, that manna, however delicious, was but of one taste, like wafers made with honey (Exod. xvi. 31), and it appears yet more fully from their bold and presumptuous complaint about it, calling it in scorn dry meat (Numb. xi. 16); for which no pretence or ground can be conceived, if manna had all that variety of agreeable tastes, which has been ascribed to it by some Jewish writers. Or what occasion was there for their still requiring βρώματα ταῖς ψυχαῖς ἀβύτων, as the LXX. render Ps. lxxviii. 18, meat for their souls, i. e. to feed their fancies and lusts, if this alone was so complete, as to include every relish, and satisfy every desire?

Ver. 21. For thy sustenance declared thy sweetness unto thy children.] i. e. the manna, the sustenance which thou providest for thy people, as it tasted when newly fallen like honey, so was it both an instance and an emblem of thy tender love and kindness for them. Some of the ancient fathers read here thy substance, instead of thy sustenance, understanding by it the λόγος. Thus Fulgentius, Substantiam enim tuam, et dulcedinem tuam, quam in filios habes, ostendebas, which is the very reading of St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, and urges this passage to prove the consubstantiality of the λόγος, who was that living bread that came down from heaven (Arrian. Object. Discus. Nazianz. Orat. 49). And in this sense Philo expounds manna, calling it τὸν προβατέον τῶν ὄντων λόγον. Huetius also understands it in the same manner (Demonst. Evang. p. 624. edit. Paris). And it must be confessed that they are countenanced herein by the Vulgate, which renders, Substantia enim tua dulcedinem tuam ostendebat; and by the Greek, which reads, ἡδυστασίς σου; and by the Arabic version, which has, figura tua dulcedinem tuam præbuit liberis tuis, "thy image communicated thy sweetness to thy children." The commentators in general understand it in the first sense, of that nourishment which came down from heaven, which was a repeated evidence, and a proof always new of God's goodness to his chosen. Dr. Grabe places ἀπόστασις in the text, to denote, I suppose, the manner of, the falling or dropping of the manna.

And serving to the appetite of the eater, tempered itself to every man's liking.] Τὴν δὲ τοῦ προσφερομένου ἐπιθυμίαν ὑπακούον, πρὸς ὃ τις ἰδοῦσθαι μετεκινῶτο. Calmet says, that the literal rendering of the Greek is, "obeying the will of him that gave it," de celui, qui la donnoit, it changed itself into that which every man desired (Com. in loc.) The joining of ὑπακούον to ὑπόστασις, or ἀπόστασις, as Grabe has it, may seem harsh and unusual, but this is according to the Attic dialect, which joins sometimes the feminine substantive and masculine adjective. There may be three senses given of this place; the first opinion is, that the manna changed its taste according to the will and desire of those that used it, which is the common acceptation, and is the sense of the Syriac and Arabic versions; the latter reads, Ejusque sapor immutabatur apud eum cui offerebatur, et subministrabat ei summum appetitū sui, in qualibuscunque saporibus exoptasset. But this being mentioned in the foregoing verse, seems needless to be repeated by the author. The second sense therefore is, that the quantity of it served, or was according to the appetite of the eater, being ordered, and appointed to be gathered by every man according to his eating, and in proportion to the largeness of his family. Or the meaning may be, according to others, that the manna suited itself only to the appetite and taste of every good and thankful eater, but had none of that agreeable variety in it to a wicked and profane one. And this is thought by learned men to be the meaning of St. Austin, where he says, in primo populo unicoque manna secundum propriam voluntatem in ore sapiebat (Epist. 118): i. e. as Mr. Mede expounds it, the manna was unto every man's taste according unto his will, or as he was inclined and disposed (B. i. Disc. 46, Fagius in Numb. xi.). Lyra, from rabbinical tradition, says, That it had the taste of any sort of fish or fowl according to the wish of him that eat it; but then, with St. Austin, he restrains the privilege of finding in the manna the taste of what they most loved to the righteous, or God's faithful servants only; with respect to all others it admitted of no alteration, and some have asserted that to a wicked, as being a vicious taste, it was quite insipid. The reasoning of the same learned father against manna having all sorts of tastes indifferently to all is very strong: "To what purpose did the Israelites murmur against God and his servant Moses for want of meat, and their Egyptian food in the wilderness? Might they not have found the taste of what they wanted and desired in the manna, if indeed it changed its nature according to the wish and liking of the eater?" And therefore he confines this miraculous alteration to the good and obedient only (Retractat. lib. ii. cap. 9. 20). From this supposed quality in the manna, Mr. Mede runs the parallel between it and the eucharist, which may be considered as spiritual manna,—that as there were unworthy receivers of the manna in the wilderness, to whom the manna was merely such, without any alteration, so this acts differently upon the souls of men; in wicked ones, it produces no change for the better, no improvement or addition of good qualities; but upon the well-disposed it has most excellent effects, administers great comfort to them, and inward satisfaction, far beyond any sensible sweetness, according as the Holy Spirit, which is the dispenser of all graces, sees it most needful for men's spiritual exigencies, either to strengthen them in their weakness, or to enlighten them in their doubts, or to forward their progress in the ways of godliness (in loc. citat.). Messieurs du Port-Royal have the same reflection (Comment. in loc.).

Ver. 22, 23. But snow and ice endured the fire, and melted not, that they might know that fire burning in the hail, and sparkling in the rain, did destroy the fruits of the enemies. But this again did even forget his own strength, that the righteous might be nourished. Manna is here called snow and ice, from its likeness, says Calmet, to the hoar frost, or drops of dew frozen, to which Moses compares it (Exod. xvi. 14), and from its soluble quality of melting in the sun, and turning to water, as snow and ice do; hence called an "icy kind of heavenly meat (xix. 21), of a nature apt to melt," which the Vulgate renders, Quæ facile dissolvatur sicut glacies. A comparison is carried on here between the effect of the lightning mixed with hail upon the fruits of the Egyptians, and that of the fire upon the manna of the Israelites; that as the former burnt intensely and unusually for the destruction of their trees and plants, so the latter lost, or, as the author elegantly expresses it, purposely forgot its own strength, for the other's preservation and nourishment. Hence the Israelites might easily perceive the hand of God against their enemies, and his interposition in their favour—when lightning, even under all the disadvantages of being mixed with rain and hail, could occasion such a desolation, as if its violence was rather increased than abated, and the fire itself, though in its full strength, could not dissolve the food appointed for their nourishment, though naturally disposed to melt.

Ver. 24. For the creature that serveth thee, who art the Maker, increaseth his strength against the unrighteous for their punishment, and abateth his strength for the benefit of such as put their trust in thee. The author here speaks of the same creature which he treated of in the precedent verses, viz. the element of fire, which was fiercer and more powerful in the water, when it was ordered to afflict the Egyptians, but abated its fury to contribute to the good and advantage of the Israelites. This obedience of fire to the will of its maker, appeared remarkably in the double effect of the fiery furnace, which lost its power over those saints that were in it to such a degree, that even "the smell of the fire had not passed upon them;" and yet, through its exceeding fierceness, slew those that were without it, as if it acted where it was not, "increasing its strength against the unrighteous for their punishment, and abating its strength for the benefit of such as put their trust in God" (Dan. iii.).

We may also understand this place in a large sense, viz: that the whole creation serveth its maker, and thus κρίσις is used, Rom. viii. 22. In which sense it should be likewise taken in the three foregoing verses (see Wall in loc.). And indeed some of the old versions plainly favour this general meaning: the Syriac in particular renders here, tibi enim tota creatura tua subjecta est; and St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, renders, omnia transfigurata gratiæ tuæ deserviebant, which Coverdale's translation follows. And indeed the observation is equally true of the other elements, all of which do wait upon God, and follow his appointment, either for mercy or judgment; and when the creatures do exceed their natural powers, it is by the will and particular direction of their creator, for inanimate beings have certain fixed and general laws of their creation, which of themselves they cannot pass. Hence the psalmist, speaking of those things which are often the causes of great calamities in the world, says, "Fire and hail, snow and vapours, winds and storms, fulfil his word, or pleasure" (Ps. cxlviii. 8). Philo, in his description of the Egyptian plagues, observes of all the elements, what our author does of fire in particular,—that God makes use of them occasionally, as his instruments, to destroy a guilty land; at one time he employs them for the production of things, or the preservation of persons, and at another, the very same are made scourges and messengers of vengeance, τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ παντός, γῆ, καὶ ὕδωρ, καὶ πῦρ, ἀπὸ καὶ ἐνερθεύονται, κ. τ. λ. Elementa universi, terra, aqua, aer, ignis, ex quibus mundus constat, de sententia Dei opt. max. infesta ad evandam impiorum regionem inferuntur, imperium, potentiamque qua Deus utitur, ostendunt; qui quidem eadem salutariter ad rerum procreationem temperet, et cum commodum est, ad impiorum exitum convertat (De Vita Mosis, lib. i.).

Ver. 25. Therefore even then was it altered into all fashions, and was obedient to thy grace, that nourisheth all things, according to the desire of them that had need: i. e. says Calmet, the fire, to obey the orders of its maker, and to fulfil the designs of his providence, was variously altered, and acted not only in a different, but contrary manner. It destroyed the fruits of the Egyptians, and it spared those of the Hebrews, in Egypt; it burnt even in water; in the wilderness it seemed to have little or no power at all, and affected not even that which was of a nature apt to melt. And herein it acted in obedience to God's mercy, for so he understands grace here, as Vatablus likewise does, rendering here benignitati tuæ; which, as it takes care of mankind in general, so in particular it provides for the wants and necessities of the good and faithful, according as they ask or need it, πρὸς τὴν τὸν ἐσπόμενον ἰδεῖν, pro indigentium voto, says the Arabic. Junius renders very unaccountably, ad voluptatem gentium; but undoubtedly this is a mistake; the true reading there I suppose was, but corrupted by some accident, ad voluntatem indigentium. According to other expositors, manna is here meant, which was altered into all fashions or tastes, agreeably to the desire of the users in general, or such in particular who ate it with faith and thanksgiving, in which sense they understand τὸν ἐσπόμενον in the original, and the marginal reading seems to favour it. This, though exactly the sense of the twentieth and twenty-first verses, and so seemingly not necessary to be repeated here, is yet countenanced by the ancient versions, particularly the Arabic, which reads, propterea donum tuum in rem quamlibet tunc immutabatur, et in omni cibo pro indigentium voto subserviebat. It is observable, first, that ἐσπέσα, in the original, is here rendered gift, and not grace, as our translators have it, i. e. the gift of manna, called here, by way of excellence, and its extensive use, παντόσδε. Secondly, it is probable that the Syriac and Arabic interpreters followed different copies from the present, or however differently pointed, for both of them have ἐσπέσα in the nominative case. If this indeed was the true reading, it would answer to the same thought and expression a little above (ver. 21), τῇ ἐπιθυμίᾳ ὑπερπερῶν, but there seems no necessity to alter the present reading of the Greek, for κρίσις may be understood of fire, and ἐσπέσα of manna. And fire, which in one verse serveth the maker, may in another be properly enough said to be subservient to the gift, i. e. to the preparation of the manna, by God's appointment, and be seemingly altered in its qualities with regard to it. I take the whole, from the nineteenth verse to the end of the chapter, to be one continued reflection on the circumstances mentioned ver. 27, that manna endured the fire in all methods of preparing and dressing it by fire, and yet evaporated with the heat of the morning sun only: if indeed by κρίσις, ver. 24, we understand the creation, we may then take this place too in a more general sense, viz. that because the Egyptians, Greeks, and other nations, had a conceit that there were some gods of the earth, others of the air, some that ruled the fire, and others the water, therefore the true God altered the elements into all fashions; for he chastised the Egyptians, not only by the earth and the sea, but the air thundered, and his lightnings went abroad, that so he might teach them that he was the sovereign ruler of the elements, and that the God of Israel was the supreme Lord of universal nature.

Ver. 26. Thou thy children—might know that it is not the growing of fruits that nourisheth man: but that it is thy word, which preserveth them that put their trust in thee. i. e. Thy people Israel were hereby taught, that it was not the nature of manna, as such, that sustained them, but thy will, or command, or blessing, which by that provision supported them; for of itself it was of no subsistence or continuance, but was corrupted and good for nothing, if kept contrary to God's command. It was the observance, therefore, of God's word or direction in all its particulars, and his blessing upon the supply, that was their support so long in the wilderness. Or it may be taken in the same sense with Deut. viii. 3, which Calmet thinks it an imitation of, viz. that as man doth not live by bread alone, so neither does he by any of the sorts of the fruits of the earth only (for so I understand γενέσεις τῶν καρπῶν), but by any thing else that God is pleased to appoint for his nourishment, and will favour with his blessing. For though the fields should yield no meat, and the earth prove barren and unfruitful, yet can the Lord supply means, as he did manna to his chosen, to feed such as rely and depend upon him. The question, therefore, of the murmuring Israelites, "Can God prepare a table in the wilderness, or can he give bread, or provide flesh for his people" (Ps. lxxviii. 20, 21), was a wicked distrust of God's power and providence. The comment of Messieurs du Port-Royal raises another very useful reflection from hence, viz. not to depend on any of the creatures, but to rely upon God alone, who uses and governs them, who is so intimately concerned in every material occurrence, that it is neither marriage that introduces persons into the world, nor bread that nourishes them, nor diseases that kill them, nor medicines that cure them, i. e. independently, and of themselves, but the order and will of God only, who makes use of the creatures, in all these cases, as.

Ver. 28. That it might be known, that we must prevent the sun to give thee thanks, and at the dayspring pray unto thee.] The literal meaning of this, as it relates to the manna, is, that such among the Israelites as would gather this blessing vouchsafed them from heaven, were obliged to prevent the sunrising, lest the heat of it should melt it; but there is likewise a beautiful moral couched under it, and a very useful reflection to be drawn from it. For did almighty God give the Israelites in his mercy every night a supply of manna, and appoint it to be gathered very early for the comfort and sustenance of the whole day, and were they in duty and gratitude obliged to be as early in their return of thanks, and to show forth his glory before the sunrising? we are hence instructed to be each morning as early at our devotions, to bless God, as for his other benefits, so particularly for the safety of the night past, and the sweet refreshment of beloved sleep, and with the psalmist, "Prevent the night-watches to be occupied in God's word." But there is another very obvious reflection to be made from God's appointing a particular time to gather his manna, viz. That God's blessings are not at our election, or in our choice to have them when we will, but then only may we hope to find them, when we seek for them at the time and in the manner which he appoints. His manna is ready if we come in time, but if we delay till the sun arises, it melteth away and is gone.—God is very gracious, he giveth to all a gathering time, and expecteth we should use it as he intendeth; he would have the morning of our lives devoted to his service, that so we may eat the labour of our hands, when the evening of age cometh (see Bishop Babington on Exodus). God's forbidding manna to be kept till the next morning, had also this useful design or meaning under it,—to teach the Jews not to extend their care of necessary supplies beyond the present day, but to leave the provision for the morrow to the divine providence.

Ver. 29. For the hope of the unthankful shall melt away as the winter's hoar frost, and shall run away as unprofitable water.] i. e. Such careless Israelites as deferred gathering the manna before sunrising, found it melted away as the hoar frost, and to be as useless as corrupted water. This comparison is used here rather than any other, because manna in scripture is likened to it, Exod. xvi. 14, which it resembled not only in appearance, but in its short duration. And such other ungrateful persons as are unmindful of God's favours, or are in no concern or haste to return thanks for them, will see their hopes vanish in like manner. For though God gives his blessings with great readiness, yet it is only to the humble, he loves a grateful receiver, and would have us acknowledge his mercies, in order that he may continue them to us, or increase them in some greater degree and proportion.

CHAP. XVII.

ARGUMENT.—A farther account of the Egyptian plagues for their ill usage of the Israelites, particularly the thick darkness which was spread over all the land of Egypt for three days, excepting the land of Goshen, where the Israelites were, which enjoyed the blessing of light as usual.—A description of the terrors of an evil conscience, that the Egyptians were continually haunted with imaginary spectres and apparitions, and had no inward quiet, from an apprehension of danger and mischief from hissing serpents and fierce beasts, which seemingly passed before them.

Ver. 1. For great are thy judgments, and cannot be expressed: therefore unmortured souls have erred.] i. e. For want of knowing and considering them, they have erred and miscarried; for the knowledge of them keeps men in their duty. According to Calmet the meaning is, "Dreadful are the judgments which thou pourest out upon the wicked that oppose thy will:" the history of the Egyptian plagues manifestly evinces this, and therefore that people were greatly mistaken, when, by offending God, and injuring his chosen people, they exposed themselves to them, and brought the fierceness of his wrath upon them. Coverdale's and the other ancient English versions render, "Therefore men do err that will not be reformed with thy wisdom." And the marginal reading is to the same effect.

Ver. 2. For when unrighteous men thought to oppress the holy nation, they being shut up in their houses, the prisoners of darkness.] This plague of darkness is mentioned first Ps. cv. 28, where the rest are enumerated, though the ninth in order, according to the Mosaical account, where the succession of them is strictly preserved, as carrying in it, says De Muis, a greater degree of terror than any of the rest, as it startled and awakened their guilty consciences, and filled their minds with melancholy and despair. This darkness was purposely sent at a time when it might be most perceived, some time after the close of the night, about sunrising. This is intimated, Exod. x. 23, where the LXX. read οὐκ ἔλαβεν οὐδὲς ἐκ τῆς κοίτης αὐτοῦ τρεῖς ἡμέρας, i. e. "nobody rose from his bed for three days," as if it had been a continued night all that time, which our translators do not fully explain, when they render κοίτη by place. And the like seems intended here by ἐκείντο, κατακλιθεῖσιντες οὐρούς. The Chaldee paraphrase on the passage above fixes the precise time when the darkness commenced, "Erunt tenebræ super terram Egypti in aurora, at recedent prius tenebræ noctis." Philo's account is more particular and circumstantial, λαμπρὰς ἡμέρας οὐσίας, ἑξαπηνάκιος ἀνάκειται σκότος, κ. τ. λ. "When the day was bright and clear, on a sudden came a thick darkness, occasioned, perhaps, by an eclipse of the sun, which lasted longer than usual, or by a collection of very dark clouds, which by their closeness and thickness hindered the rays of the sun from breaking out, so that the day differed nothing from the night; or rather, it might seem to be a continued night for the space of three usual days and nights, insomuch that the people durst not rise from their beds, and such as upon any necessity were called abroad, like blind persons, taking hold of the wall or something else for their support, they with difficulty found their way out." (De Mose, lib. i.)

And fettered with the bonds of a long night.] It might well seem to be a very long night, from the unusual time of its continuance. A darkness of three days, without any intermission, exceeds any account in profane history upon the most extraordinary occasion. Tully indeed speaks of a darkness somewhat resembling this, in Sicily, occasioned by very extraordinary eruptions of mount Ætna; he tells us, it lasted two whole days, and that it was so gross and thick, that nemo hominem homo agnosceret (De Nat. Deor. lib. ii.). The metaphor of bonds and fetters applied to darkness is not improper, as it incapacitates men from stirring and acting; nor is it unusual either in profane or sacred writings. Thus Isa. lxi. 1, "The opening of the prison to them that are bound," is by St. Luke, who quotes that prophecy, rendered, πυρλοῖς ἀνέβλεψεν, "recovering of sight to the blind" (Luke iv. 18). So again, Isa. xlii. 7, "The opening of the eyes of the blind" is immediately after explained, by "bringing out the prisoners from the prison, ἐκ δεσμῶν, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house," which this passage of our author resembles, especially in the version of the LXX. We meet also with the like expression, 2 Pet. ii. 4, where, speaking of the fallen angels, the apostle says, God delivered them "into chains of darkness" (see also Jude 6).

Lay (here) exiled from the eternal providence.] According to the fixed and established order of nature, the sun each day enlightens the world; but at this time, that order seemed to be reversed, at least with respect to Egypt, where the sun shone not, or was not visible for a long time, and one tedious, continued night succeeded in its place; so that they were deprived of light and heat, the chief benefits and blessings of God's providence, which indeed are common to all mankind, and their seasonable influence is equally shed upon the just and the unjust. It is a figurative expression, and by a metonymy, the cause is put for the effect. Coverdale renders, "Shut under the roof, thinking to escape the everlasting wisdom;" as if the meaning was, that conscious of their wickedness, they fled from God's providence, and concealed and hid themselves, hoping to escape the divine notice, which seems to be the sense likewise of the Geneva version, and has indeed some countenance from the beginning of ver. 4.

Ver. 3. For while they supposed to lie hid in their secret sins they were scattered under a dark veil of forgetfulness.] This may either mean, that as they committed κρυφὰ ἀμαρτήματα, "sins of darkness," or "secret wickedness;" under the dark veil of night and secrecy, so were they in return punished with this gross darkness; or the meaning may be, that they supposed and hoped their secret sins committed in the dark, and under the cover of night, would have lain concealed and buried, as it were, in oblivion: for so I choose to understand the place, induced hereto by the authority of the Arabic version, which reads, Quod in occultis perpetrarunt, oblivionis velamine lucis experte latitum arbitrantur; and Junius renders in like manner. Our version seems faulty here, as it is in many parts of this chapter: the true rendering seems to be, "While they thought or flattered themselves, that they lay hid in their secret sins, under a dark veil of forgetfulness, ἐκαστοὶ ἑαυτῶν, they themselves were darkened, or overtaken with this plague of darkness." For I think this to be the true reading, instead of ἐκαστοὶ ἑαυτῶν, as the common editions have it; and I have the pleasure to find this conjecture confirmed by the Alexandrian copy, and from thence Dr. Grabe thus points the Greek, λαθόντες γὰρ τοὺς ἑαυτῶν ἐπὶ κρυφαῖς ἀμαρτίαις ἀγέγγει λήθη; παρακλήματι, ἐκαστοὶ ἑαυτῶν θαυδοῦντο δυνῶς: but in either sense, the sin is clearly discerned and exemplified in the punishment. The observation of St. Austin too is very just, whether we understand it of the Egyptian or moral darkness, Spargit Deus penales cæcitates super illicitas cupiditates (Aug. Confess.)

Being horribly astonished, and troubled with (strange) apparitions.] But what was more terrible than darkness, or rather increased the terrors of it, was, that they were haunted and tormented with monstrous spectres and frightful apparitions. Commentators differ about these spectres, whether they were real, or only the effects of a disturbed imagination; those that suppose the former, say, they were either the ghosts of the Hebrew infants which they drowned in the river: or of their own departed friends and relations, that died by some of the former plagues; or, lastly, the forms of some of their deities, which appeared to them in different shapes (see Calmet in loc.) But these are mere conjectures, nor is it of any great moment to determine them. The psalmist seems to suppose them real; for it is observable, Ps. lxxviii. 50, that instead of the plague of darkness, which he there omits, he lays great stress upon God's sending "evil angels among them," as if the furiousness of his wrath, anger, and displeasure, was chiefly shown in this particular, which is the learned Lightfoot's opinion, and that it had more effect upon Pharaoh than all the foregoing plagues. If indeed these were real, it may seem a just judgment of God, and agreeable to his usual proceedings, to punish the Egyptians by such evil angels as they, perhaps, had made the objects of their worship, or their magicians, in their enchantments, had had recourse to. The writer of the book of Ecclesiasticus intimates, as if God, for the punishment of the wicked, sometimes makes use of cæcilemons, as his instruments of vengeance, for so many interpreters understand his words, "There be spirits that are created for vengeance, which in their fury lay on sore strokes; in the time of destruction they pour out their force, and appease the wrath of him that made them" (xxxix. 28). This was likewise the opinion of some of the ancient heathens; thus Plutarch, An illud verius est quod a quibusdam Romanis dicitur, et Chrysippus opinatur, dæmonia quædam mala circuire, quibus Dii quasi carnificibus et scelerum ultoribus adversus injustos et impios utuntur (Plut. in Problemat.).

Ver. 4. But noises (as of waters) falling down sounded about them.] Ἦχοι καταρραδύντες, by which we may either understand great and terrible noises, for so the comparison which is included in the parenthesis, as not being in the original, is frequently understood (Ezek. xliii. 2. Rev. i. 15. xiv. 2. xix. 6): or screaming and ill-boding noises may be meant, which probably is the meaning of vox maledictionis in the Syriac version of this place: or, lastly, that they were frightened even at the sound of their own voices; for so the Arabic renders, Proprie ipsorum voces continuo cum strepitu conjunctæ perterrebant eos.

And sad visions appeared unto them with heavy countenances.] φάσματα ἀμετρήτως κατῆλθον προσώποις ἐνεφανίζοντο. Does not this seem to be tautology? For what are κατῆλθον φάσματα, or sad visions, but visions with sad or heavy countenances? The Arabic interpreters, as if sensible of this, render, Phantasmata nequaquam hilaria eum, cuius tristis erat vultus, consumebant, applying the words to the Egyptians themselves, that they, through fright, had heavy or melancholy and dejected countenances. The vulgate reads in like manner, Personæ tristes illis apparentes pavorem illis præstabant. Calmet understands it in the same sense, Ilis voyoient paroître des spectres affreux, qu'ils remplassoient encore d'épouvante. Baldwin's reading of the Greek, φάσματα ἀμετρήτως κατῆλθον προσώποις ἐνεφανίζοντο, seems preferable to that in the common editions, is clearer, and may suit either sense (Conn. in loc.).

Ver. 5. No power of the fire might give them light: neither could the bright flames of the stars endure to lighten that horrible night.] i. e. The darkness was so thick, that they could not see one another, nor attempt any business, for want of the necessary help from fire, candle, and the other usual means to convey light, which, upon this occasion, were useless, and lost their power; for the darkness which encompassed Egypt, was not like the common and ordinary darkness, which disappears at the approach of the sun: this began about that time, and hindered its shining, and was so gross with fogs and vapours, that it extinguished the light of the heavenly bodies, which were not to be discerned in the midst of it. Philo's account agrees with our author's, and is equally as surprising and extraordinary, καὶ γὰρ χρεῖσθους πυρὸς πῶ φέγγος, κ. τ. λ. Ignis quo utimur quotidie, vel ære turbato extinguebatur, vel vincebatur a crassissimis tenebris—videndi sensu adempto, cæterorum nullus erat usus; nam nec loqui, nec audire, nec cibis frui licebat, sed triduo illo vehementer fume cruciabantur, nulli vacantes sensui (De Vita Mosis, lib. i.). The Hebrew expresses the greatness of this darkness by a remarkable pleonasm, calling it "darkness of obscurity;" but the exaggeration of the LXX. is still more observable, who describe it by three words immediately following one another in the same verse, σκότος, γνόφος, θύελλα, "darkness, thick obscurity, tempestuous darkness." If, then, the force of the sun could not penetrate or overcome that darkness, much less can we imagine the feeble light of the stars to have any effect upon it, which were naturally either lost as it were in that thick medium, or, by God's appointment, they might withdraw their shining; for even these, in their courses, attend upon and fulfil the will of their Creator (Judg. v. 20). Thus, Job xxxviii. 15, it is said in general, that, "from the wicked their light is withholden," and the same reflection occurs often in this ancient writer; but in ix. 7, he particularly mentions, among the judgments of God, the withdrawing of the light of the stars, "He commandeth the sun and it riseth not, and sealeth up the stars;" a metaphor inexpressibly beautiful, which, though spoken upon another occasion, and thought to allude to a much more ancient piece of history (see Bp. Sherlock's Dissert. ii.), is very applicable to the Egyptian darkness; when, to pursue the metaphor, God sealed up the firmament with the signet of the Almighty, and rendered its glories invisible for a determined time. But if the Egyptians had really no light, it may be asked, How they could then discern the apparitions and spectres, which are mentioned in the preceding verses? To this Calmet answers, That it was by means of those sudden flashes which sometimes darted upon them, and are described in the next verse.

Ver. 6. Only there appeared unto them a fire kindled of itself, very dreadful:] Δεφαίνετο δ' αὐτοῖς μόνον αὐτομάτῃ πυρὰ φόβου πλήρης. The usual sense given of this place is, that they had no other light but what was occasioned by sudden flashes of lightning, which added greatly to their terror, for that faint light served to make the apparitions visible to them, though nothing else could be distinguished to any purpose. Or the meaning may rather be, and the words of the original seem to favour it, and the sense likewise is improved by it, that sudden flashes of fire or lightning appeared to the Egyptians only, and not to the Israelites, who were free from this darkness, and the surprising phenomena attending it. See ver. 21, where the like is said of the darkness, that over them only was spread a heavy night. In this sense, Junius understands the words, who renders, Apparebat ipsis solum pyra timore plena, &c. There seems to be the like mistake in our version, Phil. i. 27, "Only let your conversation be such," where the rendering would be better, "Let your conversation be only such as becometh the gospel of Christ." But besides this sense, that the fire appeared μόνον αὐτοῖς, to the Egyptians only, there is another sense of the words, which will very well suit with the context, and I am inclined to prefer, viz. that this fire was in appearance only, μόνον ἐνεφανίζοντο, was not real but imaginary, arising from and suggested by their fears; which is the rendering of the Bishops' bible, "A blaze of fire on a sudden appeared only." Μόνον, taken in either of these senses, is preferable to that in our version; but the latter sense I like best, for I think this, and what follows, to be not so much a description of any real incident, as of fear arising from the apprehensions of a bad conscience, which suggested imaginary noises and apparitions; or may we not understand, in a metaphorical sense, by αὐτομάτῃ πυρὰ φόβου πλήρης, an alarmed conscience itself, which accuses, condemns, and punishes? and πυρὰ, here used, comes nearer this sense, and is more proper than πῦρ, inasmuch as it signifies both fire and fuel; and where it is αὐτομάτῃ, "self-raised, self-kindled," it expresses more still, something like that of our Saviour, "a fire that is not quenched;" which is very applicable also to an evil conscience. This whole chapter is, undoubtedly, very obscure and difficult; and if it be taken as a description only of the state of the Egyptians during the plague of dark ness, I think it inexplicable in several places. But the author seems to intend (taking occasion from the literal darkness in Egypt) a description of spiritual darkness, or the state of a bad conscience in general, both invaded with real and reasonable fears, and creating to itself imaginary horrors: in this view a new light is struck out amidst the thick darkness, though hitherto unobserved by any of the interpreters: nor is the exposition any ways harsh or forced; and if there was the foundation in the context for understanding it of spiritual darkness, as there certainly is (verses 11—13, 21), yet such allegories are very frequent, especially in Origen and Philo; nor does the writer of this book seem to be acquainted with this manner of writing. See xviii. 24, which is a remarkable instance, among others, of the allegorical strain.

For being much terrified, they thought the things which they saw to be worse than the sight they saw not. [Ἐκδημα-
βλεπόμενα.] Our version seems again faulty here; for is this any argument of their being much terrified? Is it not natural for people to think those dangers or evils which they actually see and feel, worse than those which are at a distance, and they see or know nothing at all of? People that are much terrified, are apt to imagine, and be afraid of every thing, not only what they actually see, but of their own shadows and phantoms of their own raising; they are apprehensive that something worse and worse will still happen to them, and frighten themselves most with imaginary dangers: this seems to be a more just description of fear, which always forecasteth grievous things (ver. 11), especially when it proceeds from a bad conscience. I think, therefore, the present rendering not right. The true sense of the place depends very much upon the right pointing of the Greek. If the comma be placed after δόξης, as all the editions I have seen have it, though otherwise, I suppose, in the copy followed by our translators; the sense then seems to be, that being frightened at what they had only an accidental glimpse of (for the flashes were not strong enough, nor of a continuance sufficient to view and discern things distinctly), they were more afraid of the objects that passed before them, and thought them worse than they were; and thus Calmet, Etant épouvantés par ces fantômes qu'ils ne faisoient qu'entrevoir, tous ces objets leur en paroissent encore plus affrayables; for a sudden glimpse, a broken and uninterrupted view, instead of encouraging them, and raising their spirits, rather increased their terror, and made them imagine these objects still more frightful (Com. in loc). But I think this passage would be clearer still, and the sense more agreeable to the context, if conjecture might supply the place of authority here, in inserting μὴ before βλεπόμενα; thus ἠγούμετο χεῖρος τὰ μὴ βλεπόμενα: which may either mean, that being so much terrified at that imaginary appearance (sc. πύρας) which an evil conscience had raised, they thought such inward, unseen disturbances, which passed within their own breasts, and occasioned such dreadful appearances before them, to be worse than any outward calamities they had experienced; or, that being frightened at such a fantastical appearance, they apprehended that something more dreadful, though unseen and unknown, might still happen, and that worse was yet to come. Such an apprehension is the natural and common effect of fear, which Pliny makes to be more grievous than actual and positive pain; Parvulum differt patiaris adversa, an expectes: nisi quod tamen est dolendi modus, non est timendi (lib. viii. epist. 18). And Servius is of the same opinion: Expectatio penæ gravior est; nam in expectatione et præsens metus est, et dolor futurus, in ipsa autem pœna solus dolor (Ad Æneid. vi. ver. 614).

Ver. 7. As for the illusions of art magic, they were put down. The magicians themselves were not able to assist them, nor to remove this plague of darkness. Those tricks and cheating artifices, by which they used to impose upon the simple, were at this time of no service to themselves or others. Learned men are not generally agreed, whether the wonders wrought by these magicians were real miracles, or in appearance only; that they were only so in appearance, seems to have been the sentiment of the ancient Jewish synagogue, and of the author of this book, who calls them here ἐπαίγματα, or illusions: which was also the sentiment of Josephus, Tertullian, Justin Martyr, St. Ambrose, and St. Jerome. The magicians of Egypt always tried by their enchantments to imitate the real miracles of Moses; but herein God sufficiently distinguished between them,—that whereas he did indeed enable them to produce some effects of a wonderful nature, they were such as contributed rather to the calamities of Egypt; nor did he give them power afterward to remove them; they turned the waters into blood, but they could not restore them; they brought up frogs, but they could not take them away. That the chief of these magicians were Jannes and Jambres, is not only the opinion of the Jews, but even of some of the heathens. Numenius, a Pythagorean philosopher, cited by Eusebius, (lib. ix. Præpar. Evang. cap. 8), gives the following history of them: Jannes et Jambres, scribæ rerum sacrarum Ægyptii, quo tempore Ægypti finibus ejeti Judæi sunt, clauere; viri omnium judicio rerum magicarum scientia nemini concedentes: quippe ambo quidem communi Ægyptiorum consensu delecti sunt, qui Musæo duci Judæorum, cujus apud Deum potentissimæ preces erant, sese opponerent (see Usher's Annals ad Ann. Mund. 2513). But we have a more sure evidence; for St. Paul not only says, that "Jannes and Jambres resisted Moses" (2 Tim. iii. 8), but that their folly was "manifest unto all men," which is equivalent to the expression which follows here, "their vaunting in wisdom was reproved with disgrace."

Their vaunting in wisdom was reproved with disgrace. For they that promised to drive away terrors and troubles from a sick soul, were sick themselves of fear, worthy to be laughed at.] The wise men of Egypt and the magicians are joined together, Gen. xli. 8, as if they were synonymous, and they are here deservedly ridiculed, because, notwithstanding their pretence to wisdom from a knowledge of the magical art, and their skill in the mysteries of divination, to foresee impending evils, they could not prevent those calamities, which they pretended to remove from others, from falling upon themselves: for as in some of the former plagues which befell the Egyptians, they could neither preserve their own cattle from the murrain, nor themselves from bites; so neither could they at this time, by any spell or sorcery, by any power over the air, or interest with the demons in it, escape the common calamity of the darkness, and the miseries attending it, which God (who had permitted these magicians to exert an extraordinary power in some few instances, to show the world that the devil, with his permission, can do great things) now equally involved them in, to convince Pharaoh and his people of their vanity in trusting to such impotent magicians, and of their folly in opposing that God, who could control and confound their power when he pleased.

Ver. 9. For though no terrible thing did fear them; yet, being scared with beasts that passed by, and hissing of serpents, they died for fear.] The verb fear, is here taken in a very unusual and improper sense; one would imagine, according to our version, that the spectres and apparitions were so bold and courageous, as not to be afraid of the Egyptians, instead of their being so much terrified by them, as is above represented: but should we allow that it here signifies to make afraid, as indeed it ought to be rendered, we may next inquire, with what propriety it can be said, that no terrible thing did make them afraid, when it follows in the very next words, that they were so scared with beasts, and hissing of serpents, that they died for fear? Grotius, sensible of this seeming contradiction, expounds the passage thus, "That if no such terrible things, as sudden flashes of lightning, ghastly spectres, and strange apparitions, had before affrighted them," εἰ γὰρ μὲν αὐτοὺς ταραχώδεις ἐβόησει (where εἰ he observes has the force of the potential mood, and ταραχώδεις is the very word used before, ver. 3, concerning the apparitions, though other copies read ταραχῶδεις, which is still more expressive), yet were there other plagues now to disquiet them; they were alarmed and persecuted with the hissings of serpents, and the noise of furious beasts, which so affected them, that they were ready to die through fear: and in this sense it must be confessed the Arabic interpreters take it, who render, Etsi nihil eos turbulentum territasset, vitiosarum tamen belluarum stipitationes, et insectorum sibili propulsatos illos pavidosque profligant. And Junius in like manner, Etenim si nihil ipsos turbulentum conterruerat bestiarum transvectionibus et reptilium sibilis peribant tremebundi. Calmet too understands the place of real animals; "That God at this time permitted serpents, whom they kept in their houses, out of their very great regard to them (Herod. lib. i. cap. 36. Elian. Hist. Anim. lib. xvii. cap. 5), or which came into them, pressed with hunger through the tediousness and long continuance of the darkness, to make assaults upon them, and attempt to devour them, as a just judgment for paying divine honours to such venomous animals" (Com. in loc). This difficulty, or seeming contradiction, may be also avoided, by supposing these hissings of serpents, and noise of beasts, to be the effect only of a disturbed imagination, and that these inaginary dangers, suggested by an evil conscience, though no terrible thing, no real animal, no dreadful monster, from without, at this time, actually frightened them, had such an effect upon them, that they almost died through fear and apprehension. These hissings of serpents in particular, and the noises of other animals, God might permit to haunt them, as they had probably offended him by the worship of them, and the sense of their guilt might now lie heavy upon their consciences, who, in their sad state of darkness, and under an incapacity of attending to or executing any business, had little else to reflect upon but their own wickedness. Such descriptions of fantastical visions and imaginary frights, expressed in terms of nature and reality, and exhibited, as it were, present to the senses, are very common to be met with in the best writers, especially the poets. Euripides abounds with representations of this sort, some beautiful instances of which Longinus produces from thence in his chapter Περὶ φαντασίας, sect. 15 (Eurip. in Orest. passim). Nor are lively strokes of this nature wanting in some celebrated pieces of the modern drama. But though such representations are very common among the poets, yet I cannot agree with Capellus, that this and some other instances in this chapter are mere poetical fictions, invented at random by this writer, the sport of his fancy only; for there is nothing in this description so improbable, but what may be supposed to have happened to a wicked and disturbed imagination; or why may we not, lastly, understand this place metaphorically, of an evil conscience itself? for κνέδαλον, which is here rendered beast, signifies also an insect, or reptile, and particularly vermes, a worm: may it not then mean here the σκῆλη in Isaiah and Mark ix. that dieth not? And why may not the hissings of the serpents allude to dreadful apprehensions of devils, and the powers of darkness? The heathens themselves could describe the remorse of the mind, by animals gnawing the liver, and by furies armed with hissing snakes, &c., and may not these be considered as figures of the same import in this place?

Ver. 10. They died for fear.] If we should understand these words strictly, there are instances in history to justify the observation. Vopiscus, speaking of unusual thunders, says, “Negari non potest eo tempore—tantum fuisse tonitruum, at multi terrore ipso exanimati esse dicantur” (In Vit. Caril). And Pliny, “Crescente formidine mors sequebatur” (lib. vii. epist. 27). But I rather incline to think this an hyperbolic expression, meaning only, that they were ready to die; not unlike that of St. Luke, ἀπολύνειν ἀπὸ φόβου (xxi. 26), and that of St. Matthew, ἀπὸ φόβου ὡς αἱ νεκροὶ ἐγίνοντο, “became as it were dead men” (xxviii. 4); not that they actually died for fear, but were (xxv. do) so—like that too in Homer, where an ancient scholiast remarks, ὑπερβολικῶς, ἀντὶ τοῦ, ἐξέπνευσεν.

Denying that they saw the air, which could of no side be avoided.] Here again our translation seems faulty; for is this any proof of their consternation, that they denied they saw the air? Is it not rather a proof of their want of veracity? that they denied they saw that, which they could not, as is here expressed, avoid seeing? but neither is this true, that they could not avoid seeing the air; for do people in a fright see it only, or best; or is a thick darkness the proper medium to see the air in, which at mid-day we only discern by its effects? Do not some learned grammarians and etymologists tell us, that it is called ἀήρ, quod aer per se sit obscurus? and does it not often signify darkness, and is synonymous to ἀσρασία, especially in the feminine gender, which I take to be the sense and true acceptance of it in this place? for I conceive the author's meaning to be, that they durst not or would not look up or view the darkness, which could not escape their notice, as it was on all sides of them. Their inward terrors were so great, that they refused to mind or take notice of the outward darkness which surrounded them, as bearing no comparison or proportion to their fright within. The three following verses, manifestly relating to an evil conscience, greatly confirm the sense which I have before given of the context.

Ver. 11. For wickedness, condemned by her own witness, is very timorous, and being pressed with conscience, always forecasteth grievous things.] That this observation is true, the history of the lives of the most abandoned sinners and most wicked tyrants sufficiently evinces; for none have been more subject to this fear, which an evil conscience inwardly suggests, than such as have been placed seemingly in the height of the greatest temporal society, and for their greatness and tyranny have been most terrible to others; and yet even these have trembled in company only with themselves, and have been observed to shun retirement, as the reproof of conscience is then most sensible, and its lashes most powerful and affecting. See the account of Dionysius in particular, and the conference between him and Democles, Tuscul. Quæst. lib. v. And in another place the same orator finely observes, “Sua quæque fraus, suum facinus, suum scelus, sua audacia de mente ac sanitate deturbat, hæ sunt impiorum furie, hæ flammæ, hæ faces” (In Pison). And thus when Orestes was much disturbed and agonized for having killed his mother, he acknowledges the cause of his misery to be, ἡ συνείσκει, ὅτι σύννομα δέσιν' εἰργασάμενος, i. e. conscience torments me, for I am convinced I have done very wickedly” (Eurip. in Orest.). Plutarch supposes, that an evil conscience erects, as it were, a tribunal in a wicked man's breast; that fright and remorse are his accusers which accuse him, his judges which condemn him, and his executioners which torment him (De Tranquil. Animi. See Juven. Sat. xiii. Hor. Epist. lib. i. epist. 1). But nothing can exceed Job's description of the uneasiness of wicked men, “The wicked man travelth with pain all his days: and the number of the years of his tyranny is uncertain;” for so St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, reads this sentence, Et numerus annorum incertus est tyrannidis ejus:—“a dreadful sound is in his ears, in prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him: he believeth not that he shall return out of darkness, and he is waited for of the sword” (xv. 20—22). But the version before referred to, expresses the terrors of the wicked in this place more strongly, by the mention of his inward disquiet, and a suspicion of dangers continually falling upon him; Sonitus terroris semper in auribus illius, et cum pax sit, ille semper insidias suspicatur; non credit quod reverti possit de tenebris ad lucem, circumspiciens undique gladium. But the power of an evil conscience, and its dreadful self-reflection upon every accident and misfortune, is not any where so finely displayed, I think, as in the history of Joseph's brethren, who, even at twenty-three years' distance, could not help crying out, when they were imprisoned in Egypt by Joseph for spies, “Truly we are guilty concerning our brother—therefore is this evil come upon us” (Gen. xlii. 21).

Ver. 12. For fear is nothing else but a betraying of the succours which reason offereth.] Fear, in general, especially any great degree of it, for it is that which is here spoken of, may be defined to be a despair of succour, when a man sees his affairs desperate, and that reason suggests no expedients to him, nor application or industry any probable means of a recovery, and emerging from a calamitous estate, he abandons himself to despondency, and sinks into the deepest melancholy; but such a fear as arises from an evil conscience may be defined to be, a great concern of the soul, upon a view of its inward guilt, and an apprehension that it is deserted of all succour, is sinking into misery, in despair of help, and has not one comfortable glimpse of hope to speak any peace to it. Upon which account it has been wisely observed by some moralists, that there is not such a true coward as a wicked man; that he is suspicious of every thing, but afraid of himself most; that fear in general has the effect ascribed to it by this writer, that it betrays and indisposes a man from following the wholesome advice which reason offers, that it often deprives men of those helps and succours which might keep dangers off, and hinders them from guarding against many evils, which by a prudent and timely application might have been prevented, seems evident; because fear, when it is sudden and violent, suspends, as it were, for a time, the use of a man's reason, puts all things in confusion about him; he judges not truly of his present state, and has not resolution or forecast to amend it. The historian, speaking of the Persians, who in their flight flung away their weapons of defence, adds this very pertinent observation, Adeo timor ipsa auxilia reformidat. And Seneca, mentioning how people's senses are affected with fear upon great occasions, such as earthquakes, &c. has the following reflection; Quid mirum est animos inter dolorem et metum destitutos aberrasse? But I cannot explain this in stronger terms, than by setting down the description of the fear of the Canaanites, as it occurs Josh. v. 1, according to the reading of the LXX. ἐτάκηνσαν ἀνδρῶν αἱ διδασκίαι, καὶ κατέπλεονσαν καὶ οὐκ ἦν ἐν αὐτοῖς ὁρμήσεις οὐδεμία ἀπὸ προσώπου, κ. τ. λ.

Ver. 13. And the expectation from within being less, counteth the ignorance more than the cause which bringeth the torment.] This passage is more obscure than any in this chapter, or perhaps in the whole book. None of the Oriental or English versions give any light to it, and the commentators either pass it over, or leave it in the same obscurity; our version, in particular, is so far from delivering the true sense, that it seems to have none at all. The common read ing of the Greek, in most editions, is, "Ἐνδοθεν δὲ οὐρα ἦρτον ἡ προσδοκία, πλείονα λογιζέσθαι τὴν ἀγνοίαν τῆς παρεχόμενης τῇν βίαιον αἰτίας, which our translators manifestly follow, but give no determinate sense of the place: according to this reading I take the meaning to be, "The less the expectation of help, or means to escape, is, the more largely it computes, i. e. magnifies the danger, or imagines greater evils will happen through ignorance of the cause that brings the uneasiness, or torment." St. Chrysostom has a like reflection upon the sufferings of Job: Ignorantia causæ quæ penam affert, valde auget calamitatem. If we read τῇ ἀγνοσίᾳ with the Alexandrian MS. instead of τῇ ἀγνοίᾳ, the sense perhaps may be, "That the smallest expectation or apprehension arising from fear, computes more largely upon future dangers and mischiefs than any just reasoning, or well-informed understanding." Or thus: "That a less degree of fear reasons more, and determines better, about the nature and true cause of any calamity than a greater, which is attended with less presence of mind;" which seems to be Grotius' sense of this place: Metus remissior patitur rationem discernere, &c. According to Calmet the sense is, "That a state between hope and fear creates to itself more uneasiness, because the ignorance and uncertainty the mind is in of the evils and misfortunes which may happen, keep it in a continued state of inquietude, and it is apt, in such a situation, to imagine and represent dangers to itself, other and greater than they really are, through ignorance of its true state, and for want of knowing distinctly what to fear or rely on" (Com. in loc.). St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, renders, Et dum ab intro minor est expectatio, maiorem putat potentiam causæ, &c. And Vatablus, Magis reputat implacabilitatem causæ (in the margin, nimis) intus residens exigua spes; i. e. the less hope the mind has, the greater does it suppose the power to be of the cause that inflicts the evil, and if it approaches to despair, it represents the Deity as implacable. In the midst of such a variety of renderings and interpretations, it will be a pleasure if the reader can find any satisfaction, or some new light to clear up the obscurity.

Ver. 14. But they sleeping the same sleep that night, which was indeed intolerable. Οἱ δὲ τὴν ἀδύνατον ὄντως νύκτα. If νύξ ἀδύνατος be indeed the true reading, it must be either taken in the sense of our version, or in that of the margin; in the former sense the Arabic interpreters understand it, rendering, cum occupasset eos nox illa, quæ verè tolerari non potest. But this impotens is used, it must be confessed, as signifying intolerable, by good and approved classic writers. Tully has principatus impotentissimus to the same sense, (Philip. 5), and Livy and Quintilian use it in like manner. Or νύξ ἀδύνατος may be used in the sense of the margin, to signify a night, wherein they could do nothing. To apply ἀδύνατος in this manner, is a metonymy not unusual; for as it is no impropriety to say impotent poverty, meaning a person that is poor, and by that means disabled; impotent sickness, or sleep, meaning persons in those circumstances; so neither is there any absurdity in applying it to night or death. In either of these senses may ἀδύνατος be understood, if it be the genuine reading. But Grotius is of a different opinion, and corrects the place thus: οἱ δὲ τὴν ἀδύνατον νύκτα, κ. τ. λ. i. e. "that impenetrable night;" meaning, that thick and continued darkness which the sight could not penetrate. But if the passage is thought still to want emendation, and I might offer a conjecture among others, I would read, τὴν ἀδυνασίον ὄντως νύκτα, i. e. "a night truly infernal," which agrees well with the context. It is observable that the author here mentions the Egyptians as sleeping, and "sleeping the same sleep;" not that they were really so, for their fears would not permit that, but because, like persons asleep, they were in a like state of darkness, could transact and execute nothing, and had like disturbed fancies and wild imaginations.

Which came upon them out of the bottoms of inevitable hell. Ἐξ ἀδύνατον ὡς μυχῶν ἐκδοθέντων. It is as difficult to say what ἀδύνατος "αἰῶς" is in the Greek, as what "inevitable hell" is in our version. For are we to understand by hell, the place strictly so called, and by the "darkness which came out of the bottom of it," the darkness of hell beneath, or utter darkness, as the scripture expresses it? This surely might have been better rendered intolerable, as ἀδύνατος is translated above, than inevitable, which carries too harsh an idea with it, expressed so laxly; and indeed the Arabic interpreters render it so, Ex intolerabilis inferni crypta adveniens; and the Bishops' and Geneva bibles, by "the dungeon of hell which is insupportable." Or does αἰὼν here mean the region of the dead, which is indeed an invisible region of darkness, and may justly be said to be inevitable? Job very emphatically calls it a "land of darkness, as darkness itself, a land of the shadow of death, where the light is as darkness" (x. 22). Ἀδύνατος applied to αἰῶς, in this sense, may have here again the signification which the margin gives of it before. For αἰῶς is confessedly a state or region "wherein men can do nothing;" it is that night, according to the language of the New Testament, "wherein no man can work" (John ix. 4). And thus the true Solomon, "There is no working in the grave whither thou goest" (Eccles. ix. 10). Grotius here again dislikes ἀδύνατον ὡς, and reads ἔξ ἀδύνατον, ὡς μυχῶν. But besides that the same epithet being repeated so very soon looks suspicious, and which holds equally strong against ἀδύνατος, is not as much implied in αἰῶς itself? which, according to the etymology of many learned men, is αἰδῶς contracted (see II. Steph. Gr. Lexic. Leigh's Crit. Sac. in voce), the same with the Hebrew sheol, which signifies a place which is dark and obscure, where nothing can be seen. Probably, therefore, the true reading may be either ἀδύνατον ὡς μυχῶν, or rather, as Tartarus seems here referred to, ἐνστάτον ὡς μυχῶν, according to Homer's description upon the same occasion:
